“I can respect the man who steals my sheep or puts his hands into my pocket and extracts ten dollars, but this stealing of church members is a larceny for which the law does not provide and for which I have only contempt.

“This minister asserts that his creed is the only true creed. We can respect conviction even when it is based upon crass ignorance, but there is nothing more contemptible than the radiant smile which hypocritically sheathes a dagger.”—Exchange.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

Laxity is in the very air. The automobilist with his recklessness and disregard for others is typical of the time. The terrible increase in the proportion of divorces is but an appalling incident in a life that is unprecedented.

It is the idea of freedom carried too far. Every man considers himself a law unto himself, and there is none to punish the offenders because the courts are bought up and some of the churches too.

I don't consider divorces the root of the evil. They are but one of the details that are revolting.

Who is to blame? I say that fundamentally the women of the country are to blame, because men are but what women make them.

Consider the first marriage. Adam fell into a deep sleep and God took from him a rib and made from that a woman, perfect as the first woman must have been. I am inclined to think that when Adam opened his eyes and saw the woman by him that that was the first case of love at first sight.

What a change was that wedding, magnificent in its very simplicity and naturalness, from the vulgar display and ostentation of to-day. The more vulgar ostentation there is the more certain you may be that a divorce will come later.

Before state or church God founded the family. When the first man and woman sinned and fell God told her that her desire should be to the man, and that he should rule over her.

He did not mean that a bearded brute should beat and abuse her. He meant that in the natural course of events the man should be the head of the family and the greatest burden of the sin should be for her to suffer.

We have gotten so far away from that natural way that the man and woman are two entirely separate individuals who come together for a time and then drift apart to form new affinities.

There are the women's clubs and the men's clubs, and there is no home life at all.

We have a set whose gold gives them a kind of rotten respectability.

There are disgraceful judges on the bench who are willing to lend themselves to base usage. There are mercenary preachers who are ready to satisfy the demands of the libertines. There are States whose statutes are so framed that they invite libertines from other States to come and evade their lawful responsibilities.

We are in the midst of an epidemic of licentiousness. People are living so rapidly and so wildly that they are going mad faster than we can build asylums to put them into.

The moment is critical. If something is not done to check this wave of lawlessness which is in the very atmosphere we shall perish as a nation.

The cure is not in state legislation, nor in the national laws. It is in the cultivation of a public spirit which shall scourge with the lash of scorpions the libertines who lead American society. It should brand with infamy the author, although a woman, of that book which would by trial marriages and trial divorces, lower the holy institutions of matrimony to the level of the barnyard.—Doctor Henson in the Boston Sunday Post, April 7, 1907.

A SOLDIER'S LIFE.

In re Brownsville, Fort Reno, and Fort Leavenworth soldiers shooting up the town, Satan still finds mischief for idle guns to do!

As long as we take men from the arts of production and peace and make of soldiery a profession there will be trouble.

Soldiers who do not want to fight are like preachers who do not want to preach, or musicians who do not care for music.

A home-guard is all this country needs, with every man a soldier and every man at work every day in field, factory, mine, or office.

Any town that has a fort alongside of it is damned—mentally, morally, and financially. The city of Leavenworth, Kansas, is a hell-hole of vice. The only people who are prosperous are the keepers of the dives and rum shops. The town is given over to Beelzebub, Booze & Co., all through the Fort, three miles away.

Is this because soldiers are bad? Oh, no, not at all—soldiers are simply men. And bad people are good folks who misdirect their energies. And when you take one, two, or three hundred or a thousand men, from eighteen to thirty years of age, unmarried and with no homes, and dedicate them to idleness and vacuity, their undirected natural forces turn to riot.

"Of course," you say. "But soldiers are not idle!"

And the answer is, Soldiers do no useful thing—their lives are unproductive, non-creative—they live on the labor of others. They are legal mendicants, and even the dullest realize it, and are in time infected and overcome by the thought.

A soldier's life is moral and intellectual degradation. A soldier becomes a soldier, and there is one thing that he always kills, and that is time. And to kill time is to kill yourself. There are exceptions, but these prove the rule. God and nature designed that man should use his energies in useful effort. If he fails to do this he quickly falls a victim of arrested development. The soldier is a pensioner on the state, and to have a pension is to have a disease. A pension destroys the pensioner—vitiates his will, paralyzes his purpose. A soldier is a Remittance Man, and a Remittance Man, like the Devil, is a dead one.—The Philistine, March, 1907.

CEDAR WOOD FOR LEAD PENCILS.

The lead pencil is one of the most common articles in every-day use, and nearly 320,000,000 pencils are manufactured in this country every year. To manufacture these millions of pencils there are required 110,000 tons, or 7,300,000 cubic feet of wood, so that each day in the year 300 tons, or 20,000 cubic feet, of wood are used for pencils. Since practically all of the wood is red cedar, and since the pencil industry is steadily growing, the supply of red cedar is greatly depleted; yet no substitute has been found for it. Leaving out of consideration the imported pencils, the average educated American over ten years of age uses six pencils of home manufacture each year. Ten years ago he used less than five.

Red cedar has a soft, straight grain, and when grown under best conditions is very free from defects. Because of its peculiar qualities no equally good substitute for it has ever been found, and it is doubtful if any other wood-using industry is so dependent upon a single species as the pencil industry is dependent upon red cedar. In fact, red cedar suitable for pencil manufacture is the only wood the price of which is always quoted by the pound.

Strange as it may seem, no steps have heretofore been taken to provide for a future supply of red cedar. This has been largely due to a lack of information on the rate of growth and the habits of the tree, and to the widespread belief that second-growth red cedar never reaches merchantable size.

In accordance with its policy toward the conservation and economic use of commercial woods, the Forest Service has made a careful study of red cedar and has come to the conclusion that it can profitably be grown in regions of its development. Several changes are recommended in present forest management in order to secure the desired growth. In the southern forests the cedar will have to be given a better chance instead of being considered, as now, a negligible quantity in its younger stages, and many of the forest-grown trees which are now cut for fence posts can profitably be left to attain their full development and thus become available for pencil wood.—Department of Agriculture.

“The prophets in forecasting conditions that would characterize the latter days did not ignore the marked improvements which do now obtain along certain lines. For instance Daniel declared, ‘Shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end; many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased.’ Our age certainly is the age of travelers and students. Nahum and others pictured the wonderful inventions of the last days. These things of which they wrote are our special pride and boast—our inventions, our means of transportation, our libraries and schools.”

OUR BOYS.—NO. 10.

Close attention to little things becomes an imperative necessity for the boy who expects to succeed. If he has chosen his life work then it is well to remember there is no royal road to success in the occupation which he has chosen.

Upon this subject Mr. Fowler has this to say: “The man or boy who is careless in little things is successful in nothing. Success never ignores little things. Success demands constant attention and mastery of little things. Success will allow one to be inconstant with the things not of his field if he never forgets the little things within the province of his labor.”

The question naturally arises, What is a little thing? or indeed it may with all propriety be asked, Is there such a thing? If the word little conveys to our own or to the mind of our boy the same meaning as the word important, then indeed there is no such thing and the sooner this is impressed upon the mind of our boy the better for him and his friends. To the very smallest minutia, the very least detail of the trade or profession which he has chosen, it is his duty to give close attention, and this he must do if he expects to be successful.

It is very important for the boy to start right, but it is of equal importance that having started right he stick to his choice until he completes his course, or has mastered what he set out to learn. Men of fine natural ability often fail because of a vacillating disposition. Of course there are cases where to change is wise, but as a rule to persevere to the accomplishment of that undertaken, is the only way to succeed.

Our boy should be taught that in any occupation which he may set out to master he must naturally expect to encounter obstacles and have at times to do things which he dislikes. But he should not think this a peculiarity of the special business he has chosen or make the great mistake of supposing that such things could be avoided by a change to some other occupation. Every occupation, every business has more or less in it which demands patient, persevering effort upon the part of those who follow it, and a cheerful disposition to make the very best of both its agreeable and its disagreeable features is surest to win in the end.

It is often the case with our boy, that he is not always master of his own time. But there are few boys who have not some portion of time which they are at liberty to use just as suits them. It is often the way in which this time is employed that decides the success or failure of many boys. The moments which belong to the boy himself—when he is not under the constraint of any one—are the moments when the impulses which rule his mind will be free to act and when interested friends by observing closely will find much to indicate the real nature of the boy and learn what tendencies need to be encouraged and strengthened as also what need to be controlled or turned into other channels.

And now we come to the very important matter of honesty as an element of success. Perhaps before entering even briefly, as we must do, upon this important question, it may be well to refer to the definition before given of success. “Anything,” says Mr. Fowler, “is successful which has reached the height of its capacity, which is the best the doer can do, and is the flush result of his consummate ability and effort.”

It is too often the case that in speaking of such and such a man as a successful business man we fail to discriminate with sufficient nicety. If a man has made money in his business—has houses and lands with a long bank account to his credit—he is generally esteemed a successful business man. But we want our boy to understand that a man may have all these and yet so far from being a success he may be a miserable failure. Not because he has them, but because he has purchased them too dearly. He has given in exchange for them what he could not afford to give and the parting with which has left him poorer than a beggar.

He has given what all the wealth of a Rockefeller could not buy and neither has power to restore. He has parted with honesty; has sold his honor for what to him must ever be a mess of pottage.

Parents and teachers should, however, be careful how they instruct the boy upon this point lest in their great desire to impress him with the value of honesty they make a mistake in their method of doing it. "Many a parent and teacher," says Mr. Fowler, "who know from experience that dishonesty often leads to quicker financial returns teach that dishonesty never pays, even in a transient way. The boy with this belief instilled into him goes out into the world and finds that dishonesty apparently pays, that men of dishonest methods seem to succeed, and at one blow he severs the teachings of his boyhood and believes that what was taught him—the true as well as the untrue—is a lie, and so learns the lesson of his life from the dishonest practices of the world. Tell the boy the truth. . . . Tell him frankly what dishonesty will probably do for him, and tell him just as frankly" the sure reward of honesty. It may not bring him wealth, neither business success as the world looks upon it, but teach him that "a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches" and that he who parts with his honesty has bartered a priceless jewel which he may never regain for trash.

There is a man in our country now who seems to be living for the boys. (Would God there were many such!) That man is Judge Ben Lindsey, judge of the juvenile court of Denver and we can not better conclude this subject than in words recently used by him.

"Now, boys," said the judge one day, in addressing a group of them, "I want you to get the idea out of your head that it is enough in life to know how to make money, how to keep it, and how to spend it. You are on the wrong tack when you think that is all there is to life.

"I wouldn't give a pinch of powder for any one who limited his work to mere money-making.

"The first work you have to do in life is to get hold of a character that will stick. You need to make a character that will always stand a washing without showing spots. Get your character first. On top of the character put the ability to do some particular kind of work well. Learn a trade or a profession and learn it well. Then you have work joined to character.

"While learning what your future work is to be, save your money, and make money in every way that an honest character will permit. Never get a dollar into your possession that you'd be ashamed to tell any one just how you got. Always be able to bring your money into sight, and say:

"That's clean!"

"Thus, you see, you get character, work, and means finally into a fine partnership, one that ought to last for life. Incidental things you might do are, keeping good companions, going to a Sunday-school, trying the Y. M. C. A. helps, working along with people who are trying to do good things for themselves and others.

"If you can do these things, when the time comes for you to pass on, you will have left behind a good name, the record of some useful work accomplished, and that is the highest achievement any human being can record.

"Don't get the notion into your head that life is an awful mystery, and that, because we can't know all about it, we must face it gloomily. The more that wise and kindly people know of it, the brighter it looks to them and the happier they become.

"This is the point I am getting at—whatever your circumstances, take the best and brightest way of looking at what you have to do. Take a hard blow with a smile; do a piece of hard work with a smile; see a disappointment coming and smile at it; and welcome good fortune with a laugh.

"Somehow the people who take life this way, backing the smile up with real work, appear to get over the hard places easier than the growlers. A growler and grumbler uses up a lot of needed energy in worrying, and all about him are made gloomy. The smile of the hopeful one lifts up the despondent.

"Accept life just as you find it; make out of it all your abilities will permit; find your place in work and hold it; smile as you take each chance of natural fortune."

The practical side of Judge Lindsey's work has lain in his ability to induce boys of shiftless character to do sane things for themselves and helpful work for others. He gives them the opportunity to show that they can be trusted; and, when they have proved that, their responsibilities are increased.

"When a boy knows," said Judge Lindsey, "that he has a duty to perform to his home, his nation and his God, and strives to do that duty, he is set on the right road. The sooner he realizes that duty, the better for him."

Duty to home, to nation, and to God. Is there upon the face of all the wide, wide world a people better equipped for helping their boys to know these duties, than are Latter Day Saints? In all candor we do not believe there is. But who is to impart this instruction? Shall we obey God and train our children in a knowledge of his law as well as demonstrate to them by our own lives what that law demands in virtue, honor, and the helping hand to others? or shall we leave them untaught, unrestrained until possibly they come to stand in some juvenile court for defiance of law, or, escaping this, become a scourge to their kind—a curse instead of a blessing to us who bore them. It is a solemn question, but it is one demanding an honest answer, and demanding it now.

Questions on May Reading.

To what must the boy who is to succeed give close attention? Can he find any royal road to success? How is success affected by little things? In what sense are there no little things? What then should be impressed upon the boy? By whom? What necessity is there for perseverance in a chosen occupation? Should a change be made to escape difficulties? How does cheerfulness contribute to success? What may be learned by watching the boy in the times when he is free to act as he chooses? What understanding do we want our boy to have as to what constitutes success? When does a man pay too dearly for houses and lands and a large bank account? How should the truth be taught a boy regarding the results of dishonesty? Who is the man mentioned who seems to be living for the boys? What advice did he give to the boys about making money? What did he say was their first work in life? How did he teach them to join work to character? How were they to bring means into partnership with character and work? What did he tell them was the highest achievement any human being can record? How did he counsel them to take life cheerfully? When did he say a boy is set on the right road? What questions confront Latter Day Saints in regard to setting their children on the right road?

LINCOLN, Nebraska, March 11, 1907.

Editors Herald: Inclosed find two dollars, one dollar and a half for renewal of HERALD, and the other fifty cents you can put into the "home fund" and will send something later on for "rebuilding fund." I pray the Father may prosper these causes. I enjoy reading every week what others have to say; and many things I read are an inspiration to me, for we few scattered Saints are in need of "spiritual bread." The first Sunday in every month one of the elders from Nebraska City, Nebraska, comes here to cheer us up; we are always glad to have them come, although I am not always able to be with them, being badly afflicted with rheumatism. I ask the prayers of the Saints and the Prayer Union in my behalf, that if it be the Master's will I may be healed. My prayer is for your success, and may the Father keep us faithful that we may enjoy the blessings that are promised beyond, for this world holds so little that is worth while.

Your sister,
PEARL SCHOFIELD.

NEBO, Illinois, April 7, 1907.

Editors Herald: One week ago last Saturday I began an over-Sunday effort twenty-five miles from where the gospel had ever been preached, to my knowledge. At the first effort there was a fair turnout, at the second effort the crowd was larger, and at the third effort the house was full, a number standing. This is not far from Harden, the county seat. Considering the liberty continuously and unabatingly enjoyed, and the intense interest from young and old, whole families turning out, repeated invitations to "come again," "come often," and even suggestions to take up collections, and so many encouraging congratulations, "more light than I ever got in my life," etc., all this at the end of a hard week's physical work, I felt that it certainly was not overdrawing to feel that it was "good to be a saint" in latter days. Contrasting this encouraging experience with some of an opposite tendency, I can not in word tell how thankful I felt for the goodness of God in opening the hearts of so many, even though the message was to be delivered by a "local elder."

From this I again reason and ask how many have been called to carry this wonderful message to hundreds of just such communities, and of this number how many are waiting for conference appointment? Many of the traveling elders tell that financially speaking the missionary could do more at home. Now then, why can not we local men at home make—well, I was going to say a sacrifice; but may we not find some other name for that ennobling and soul-cheering work of seeking to elevate mankind?—at least a strong effort to face the foe and make new openings, and develop in the work of warning. Nearly a year ago I was invited, and responded to the invitation, to make a speech at a Sunday-school convention in Calhoun. This was to all appearance highly appreciated, judging by the "amens," even from the clergy that were there, and a half score of congratulations. Since last writing to the HERALD two years ago, giving account of Elder W. J. Smith's work at Nebo, our workers in the missionary force have been Arthur Allen, V. M. Goodrich, and J. A. Tanner. Did space permit, we could write encouragingly of the efforts of each of these brethren. Good was done for the Master's cause. The Missionary Baptists have baptized one of our sisters here, Sr. Ada B. Johnson Guthrie. In turn we baptized one of their sisters, Sr. Mary Conner. With the sometime sunshine, of course we have the cloud. We seem to have the out-cropping work of his Satanic Majesty through some of the members of other churches, especially through this Baptist Church here. I and others, even those of that church, believe the leaven is working, and that in some way there must be an out-cropping. Of course they believe that the Lord will sustain their cause. Developments are slow but sure. Who of our faith will watch and pray? I would not create the impression that I or we would provoke discussion, but we are acting slowly and cautiously, while the Baptists are accusing us of courting a theological fray.

With my whole soul I am conscious of this work being of God, and I do not want to be out of harmony with his will any more in provoking discussion than I would be in showing the white feather. Hoping and praying for the success of this wonderful cause,

Editors Herald: I have been told by those who have been there that the soil around Lamoni is not composed of the best material. Whether this be true or not I do not know, but this I do know, the Saints who live in the vicinity of Lamoni are made of the right stuff. When we received the small though welcome number of the HERALD for January 9, we thought of the words of the poet, "The pen is mightier than the sword." Especially is this true if the man who wields the pen is inspired by the living God and the words that are penned by him are those of truth.

"Truth is mighty; who can stay it?

Barriers may before it rise;

But its march will be its triumph,

Precious souls redeemed its prize."

Wishing you success of the highest order, I remain,

A fellow laborer,

Editors Herald: I am only eleven years old, and have been in the church eight months. God has blessed me wonderfully. I mean with God's help to do all I can to build up his kingdom here below. There are only a few dear Saints in this part of the vineyard. We have Sunday-school and prayer-meeting. I enjoy them very much. Elder Davis comes to see us once in a while, and we enjoy his preaching very much. Pray for me, dear Saints, that I may grow to be a good Saint for God.

Your sister in Christ,

NETA FAY JONES.

WEYBURN, Saskatchewan, Canada, March 27, 1907.

Editors Herald: After seeing my letter of February 15, published in the HERALD, several of the Saints have written to me inquiring about the land. As I know but little about some of the questions I have been asked to answer, I can only state that the land is adapted to raise small grain, wheat, oats, barley, rye, flax; all kinds of vegetables will grow here. I have not seen any kind of fruit grown here, but I am sure some kinds of fruit can grow here. I have seen several groves of small poplar-trees. They do well. Fruit-trees have not been planted in this part. There is very little timber here; it is one large plain. There is plenty of land to homestead. The government fee is ten dollars for filing; three years to live on the homestead, and break and crop thirty acres, and dig a well.

Now if those Saints who want land up here will write to Bro. Charles Watson, or John Frickey, Weyburn, Saskatchewan, Canada, they have homesteads, and they are able to answer all questions.

I am located thirty-six miles from Weyburn. There is a grocery-store nine miles from us doing a prosperous business. Now if those Saints think they can live where the winters are from thirty to forty degrees below zero for from ten to twelve weeks, and some days fifty to fifty-six degrees, with a blizzard every week, and sometimes twice a week, this is the country. Truth may scare them out.

I must tell you how nicely the tracts you sent came in. The very day I got them, three of my neighbors came to visit. I gave each one a tract to read, while I was busy getting dinner. One lady was so well pleased with the tracts she asked permission to send them to her father in South Dakota. I give them to all my neighbors. Now if every family of Saints would keep a few tracts on hand, and give them when an opportunity offers, how much they could help to open the way for the elders to get a congregation, when they come. We long for the time to come, so we can commence our Sunday-school again, and hear the gospel preached by the servants of God.

CAROLINE SANDIGE.

LOXLEY, Alabama, March, 1907.

Editors Herald: I have not been in the latter-day work very long, but do not regret the step I have taken. The Latter Day Saint elders have been through here a good many times, but the people do not take much interest in the work. Bro. Alma Booker spent quite a while here with us but did not seem to accomplish much. The people belong to other churches and seem to think any of them will do. We have meetings here of different denominations. A Baptist preacher was here the second Sunday in March. Father has a regular appointment for that day, but he gave it up and allowed the Baptist preacher to preach the first sermon and he preached the second. During father's sermon, which was upon the restoration of the gospel, the Baptist preacher interrupted him several times, and at the close made some objections. He also stated that before he would slip around with a Mormon Bible under his arm, ashamed to let it be seen, he would have his head cut off. The replies that he received were so strong that he left in a rage and did not take time to prove anything.

We are trying to do all we can but that seems very little to me sometimes. Wishing you all success in your good work and asking an interest in your prayers, I remain,

Your brother in the true faith,

ROBERT E. BANKESTER.

MCKENZIE, Alabama, March 3, 1907.

Editors Herald: The work does not gain very fast in this Southern land, though I believe it is gaining some. Many of the Saints are striving harder to overcome evil and to let their light shine than in the past. The missionaries who have labored here this year have done faithful work, though they were not able to accomplish as much and reach as many places and people as we would have liked. But as we are soon to enter upon a new conference year we hope and pray that the Lord of the harvest will send more laborers into his vineyard, for, notwithstanding the people in the South are very slow to hear and accept the angel's message of peace, I feel that there are many honest souls who have not had the privilege of hearing and that when they hear they will accept and obey. The work of the Patriarch among the Saints was highly appreciated and was another evidence to them of the divinity of the work and a confirmation of their faith in the same. May the good Lord prolong his days that he may be permitted to again visit this mission. He, as well as any of the other missionaries, will find a welcome among the Saints here. The year has been fraught with many blessings to the Saints, although we have had the usual amount of trials and difficulties to meet and overcome. The world with its allurements has sought to attract, entice, and draw us away from the service of Him who has called us to be coworkers with him in the redemption of man, but through the help of him who is able to succor in every time of need, and whose arm is ever extended to all who ask for his help, we hope to continue the conflict until the battle is over and the victory won. Every obstacle overcome, every trial met and overcome in the spirit of the Master is but the means of fitting and qualifying us for better service for him.

Before this reaches you the conference for another year will meet, and I pray that the Spirit of peace may meet with the servants of God and abide with them during this year to aid them in their work of proclaiming the gospel in plainness and in power unto the nations of the earth.

In bonds,

J. R. HARPER.

TORY HILL, Ontario, April 3, 1907.

Editors Herald: I still have health and strength, although I may not be worthy of such a blessing. Dear Editors, I was afraid you would stop sending the paper which I take so much pleasure in reading. There is so much encouragement in it that it revives one's mind and spiritual strength, and I can always learn something new—not always new, but new to me. It cheers me to read of so many who are trying to fight the battles of life. There are not more than six or seven Saints here, and it seems as though we are almost forsaken and left to ourselves, but we can not overcome the trials and temptations that the powers of Satan set in the way of God's children, unless we put our trust in the one who is most merciful and good. At one time there were prospects of a fine branch in these parts, but the blight struck the crop, and the weeds and tares grew up before there was much root. Praying that the success of the Saints may increase and their armies still keep up their courage to fight the foe, I remain,

Ever your brother in Christ,

WILLIAM B. DACK.

BANDERA, Texas, March 24, 1907.

Dear Herald: This is my first attempt to write for publication. I have been prompted to do so many times but would always find excuse by saying I had nothing to write. Others have said the same, and yet, after all, their letters were very interesting to me.

I love to read the HERALD; it is a source of strength to me. We have been subscribers only since the great fire. We were indeed sorry to hear of such a calamity. But Saints should never be discouraged.

As for the work here, there is always room for improvement; but I believe I can say there has been some improvement in the last year. The Saints here are badly scattered, but there are a few of us who meet once a month and spend the day pleasantly. We have preaching in the morning, and prayer and sacrament in the evening. It always strengthens us and we feel like pressing onward to better times. We were sadly disappointed this year; we had hoped for some of the missionaries to come, but our hopes were in vain. You may think we are all dead but we write this that you may know there are a few left yet. We are at the same old place and any of you will find a hearty welcome. None of our elders have preached in our neighborhood for several years; but we have had some good preaching here in the past and neighbors can not say they never had a chance. They seem to be satisfied with what they have; but if some of the elders will come we will gladly give them a second chance.

I wish to say to Bro. H. O. Smith that the Mellennial Dawn people have been just as dead as they claim to be ever since the debate. They will not even talk about it; not one has ever raised the subject. If we try to talk to them they will change the subject as soon as possible. Before the debate they would hail one on every side.

We hope Bro. S. S. Smith will come this way again. We have never forgotten him. He baptized my husband. I ask all the Saints to pray for us. My husband and I feel that we are among the weakest ones. We have three children to rear, and our desire is to bring them up in the way they should go. We need all the help our heavenly Father is willing to give. I remain,

Your sister in the one faith,

RENA SECREST.

SHERWIN, Kansas, April 1, 1907.

Editors Herald: The past month of this conference year has been quite a busy one. I have preached twenty-eight sermons, baptized eleven—three at Scammon, Kansas, Sunday the 24th, eight at Sherwin, Sunday the 31st—seven of the eleven being heads of families. I had a call to come and baptize four near Oolagah, Indian Territory, the 31st—the first time in my ministerial work that calls have come from two places to baptize on same date.

During the month I went home and took care of sick wife and daughter four days. Left them when they were not able to sit up one third of the time; went back to my field. They have ben blessed, and I have received wonderful blessings in administering the word, as I never had before.

MANCHESTER, England, March 21, 1907.

Dear Saints: Thomas Taylor, late bishop of the British Isles, passed away at eleven o'clock at night, the 18th inst., in his eighty-second year, at 68 Bristol Road, Bournbrook, Birmingham. I interviewed the old veteran in company with Elder Meredith of Birmingham on December 9, 1906, when he stated that his testimony was stronger than ever, and the work was his meat and drink. Further items forwarded later. Kind regards to all, with best wishes for a spiritual revival at conference.

Fraternally yours,

Editors Herald: As it has been some time since I have contributed anything for your columns, I feel constrained to do so now.

We have been blessed with the realization of a long-cherished desire, and that is, a visit from Bro. Alvin Knisley. He came here Friday evening, March 22, and preached four sermons in our house, besides administering the sacrament on Sunday afternoon. He also administered to my wife and eldest child, in which we have seen the works of God manifest. We had fairly good attendance considering the locality, and we think good will result from the effort put forth by Bro. Knisley in his endeavor to get the gospel before the people.

Bro. Knisley is an able speaker, and has a way of winning the confidence of the people. He also succeeded in disposing of seven or eight dollars worth of church literature during his short stay.

We feel greatly blessed in having the privilege of meeting Bro. Knisley and hearing a few sermons, as we have not heard a Latter Day Saint sermon for over two years.

As he was leaving here for Winnipeg, and General Conference, a man who does not make a profession of religion, and has been known to boast that he never gives a preacher a cent, had the kindness to give him five dollars in cash, and purchased about two dollars' worth of books, including the Book of Mormon.

So the good work rolls on. Let us seek to bring ourselves into closer touch with our heavenly Father, and so order our lives that we may ever be entitled to the presence of his Holy Spirit.

Hoping and praying for the welfare of Zion, and desiring the prayers of the Saints in our behalf, I remain,

Your brother in the gospel of Christ

ARGYLE, Michigan, April 10, 1907.

Dear Herald: For over six years we have lived here isolated from church privileges, unless we drove ten or twelve miles to our branch. Then Bro. and Sr. Gibson moved near us and you can imagine how good it was to have some one of like faith to converse with. But last October Elder Haun was called here to preach a funeral-sermon, which caused some to open their eyes in wonderment, after which they called for more preaching, which finally led to five obeying. So now we have twelve members.

We have our Wednesday evening prayer-meeting, and Religio on Sunday.

Last Sunday was prayer-meeting in our Religio, and as Bro. Burget (a priest) came out our way we decided to have sacrament, as it was the first Sunday in the month. God was pleased with our effort, as he bestowed a good degree of his Spirit upon us, for which we were encouraged to press onward. We have had many seasons of rejoicing in our little number, this winter, for when we come together humbly, seeking a blessing from God, he is ever true to his promise, for which we are thankful. We have a noble little band of Saints here, each striving to do his duty. Although one half of our number are children from nine to fourteen, all are mindful of their duty.

We expect to organize a Sunday-school ere long, which will be a source of great help to their young minds, also to teach and strengthen us older ones.

We have received very much strength and encouragement in studying our Religio lessons, and feel to thank God that there are such helps in the church to help us grow in grace and a further knowledge of the truth. We all belong to the McGregor Branch, but seldom get out there, as it is so far, and then we have our own meetings to attend to.

My companion tries to get out there once in a while, being teacher of the branch, to help liven things up, which is his duty. As for me, I am striving each day to come up higher, and with each effort God has blessed and encouraged me to do my duty. I ask an interest in the prayers of God's people that I may not grow weary in well doing.

Your sister in Christ,

MRS. CLARA SHEFFER.

CHIHUAHUA, Mexico, April 8, 1907.

Dear Herald: I have intended writing for some time but it seemed other matters have prevented.

Things have been moving along as usual in the Los Angeles Branch. The newly ordained priests under the leadership of Bro. J. I. Spencer have been systematically and faithfully visiting the homes of the Saints, and although they are all engaged during the entire week have devoted their Sunday afternoons to this work, and beneficial results are already realized. The spiritual condition of the branch seems to be steadily improving. The Spirit has been manifested more frequently of late and an exhortation given to the Saints to live more nearly up to all the commandments and observe to honor the laws of God. Also direction for guidance, correction, and encouragement.

Bro. T. W. Williams was elected to represent the branch at General Conference, and Bro. F. M. Weld expected to accompany him. We were much pleased to see the familiar countenance after so many years since we knew him in Lamoni, and pleased to note a considerable gain in his health.

A class has been organized in the Sunday-school for study of the Doctrine and Covenants, and while it was intended and expected there would be five or six members it proved to be an unqualified success. So many desiring to take up the study it was found necessary to form two classes. Bro. Weld taught the first few Sundays and many regrets were expressed at his departure.

Bro. William Schade and the writer were appointed on a committee sent by the Federal Timber and Colonization Company to inspect a large tract of land covered to a great extent with a dense growth of mahogany timber in the state of Chiapas, Mexico, fronting on the Usumacinta River, close to Guatemala; and if found satisfactory the company expects to acquire the land, about three hundred thousand acres. There are a number of prehistoric ruins of ancient temples overgrown with immense trees only a few miles distant from this land, and we hope to be able to visit and not only view these ruined structures but to actually have set foot on the land where such momentous scenes have transpired as recorded in the only book that does explain them and which is dear to the heart of every Latter Day Saint.

Trusting that infinite wisdom may direct all the deliberations of the conference,
R. T. COOPER.

Crusade Against Tobacco.

The crusade against tobacco as well as against liquor is spreading. The Syracuse University distributes yearly about one thousand scholarships, but Chancellor Day has announced that none of these scholarships will be given to students who use tobacco or attend the theaters. He declares that, "young men who can afford to pay for needless luxuries and indulgencies can afford to pay for their tuition." He concludes by making this pertinent statement: "The man who uses tobacco is a fool, at least in this particular." He ought to take better care of his nerves, and make a cleaner exhibit of himself.

A New Source for Fence Posts.

An experiment in the preservative treatment of dead lodgepole pine for fence posts, just completed by the Forest Service, on the Henrys Lake Forest Reserve in Idaho, has given results of economic value both to the people of the community and to the Forest Service. It has demonstrated that fire-killed lodgepole pine is well adapted to treatment with creosote oil by an exceedingly simple process.

The demand for durable posts by ranchmen in the vicinity of Henrys Lake has hitherto been met by the use of red cedar, but the supply of this species is now completely exhausted. The only native trees at present available for posts are lodgepole pine, quaking aspen, and Douglas fir. Though durability varies with the soundness and dryness of the posts when placed in the ground and with the character of the soil with which they come into contact, in general, aspen posts last from six to ten years, fir posts from five to seven years, and pine posts only from three to four years.

Lodgepole pine without preservative treatment is thus too short-lived to make desirable posts or poles. The idea of treating it was suggested by the requirements of forest management on the Henrys Lake reserve. Large bodies of dead lodgepole pine, both standing and down—the legacy of severe fires in 1902—are a serious handicap to the forest there. This timber must be got rid of to make room for young growth if the future forest is to be well stocked.

Properly treated lodgepole pine should last twenty years, which equals the life of the former favorite, red cedar. By treating the pine, and thus making it serviceable for posts, the Forest Service has found a way of removing the encumbering timber at a good price and supplying consumers with valuable posts at a reasonable figure. Since the success of preservative treatment has been demonstrated the value of the wood has risen from 25 cents to approximately 40 cents per cord.

The treatment was given in a galvanized-iron tank fitted with steam coils, in which from forty to fifty posts stripped of bark were placed upright. Enough creosote was run into the tank to submerge the butts for about two feet eight inches, heated to two hundred degrees Fahrenheit, or a little above the boiling point of water at that altitude, and afterwards allowed to cool.

The large quantity of fire-killed timber on many of the forest reserves, the pressing need for durable wood, the steady rise in its price due to the increasing difficulty of obtaining it, and, finally, the ease with which post timber can be treated, indicate that the preservative treatment of timber is to have an important development throughout the West. This, besides meeting the demands of the people and reducing the drain upon the forest, will lead to the improvement of conditions on the reserves and insure better crops hereafter.

It is the intention of the Forest Service to establish experimental treating plants where there are bodies of dead timber on the reserves and a demand for durable wood can not otherwise be met. Experimental work will be conducted with zinc chlorid and other processes as the needs of the different regions and the thorough testing of each process may require.

As a result of the post experiment, it is understood that a company will take up the treatment of dead lodgepole pine on a commercial scale in the spring. They are satisfied that the simplicity and economy of the open tank process introduced by the Forest Service will enable them, with certain modifications of apparatus, to treat and sell not only fence posts, but telephone poles and posts used for irrigation works. They count upon a local market already in good part developed by the confidence which the fence-post experiment has inspired.

Your Gawkly Boy.

That gawkly boy of yours—ungainly, gaunt, shy, unprepossessing, as he is,—writes Henry A. Shute in the March Delineator. You nag him. You laugh at him and ridicule him. Did you ever realize how it hurts? You ought to realize it for it is not long since you knew how it felt. You would have stood pain like a man and so does your boy. You would have borne privation like a stoic, and so does your boy, and there would have been a grim sort of enjoyment in it, for the joy of resistance is fully awake at fourteen.

But you could not bear ridicule and he can not, and yet there is scarcely a day when you do not cause him sharp discomfort.

The boy's mother never does this. She loves every awkward movement of her boy. She loves his long legs and she loves to hear his rancous voice. She smiles at it, too, and at him, and it is a smile of genuine amusement, but there is love in the smile, and love in her eyes, and he knows it, and adores her for it.

If he becomes depressed and despondent, he confides his troubles in his dog, which sits in front of him gazing at him with an almost human expression of sympathy and puts his paw on his master's knee.

A bit unfortunate, isn't it, that your own boy is obliged to depend on his mother and his dog for sympathy and affection? He gets none from you and but little from his brothers and sisters. It is true, isn't it?

My friend, if you paid as much personal attention to the proper development of your boy as you do in raising the two-minute trotter, or the blue-ribbon Guernsey, or the Black Strain Jubilee of Orpington or in beating boggy, or in your game of whist, you would be astonished at the results.

"Since the President was Here."

Joe Mitchell Chapple, in his article of "The truth about Panama," in the National Magazine for April, will tell of the great beneficial effects following the visit of President Roosevelt to the Isthmus. The following is a portion of what he has to say concerning the President's visit to Panama:

"Time passed quickly with me; for I talked with several people, all of whom were employed in some way on the canal. Without an exception, they all seemed enthusiastically interested in the work. If there is one predominating thought on the Zone, it is to find out how the work progresses.

"Along the old line may be seen the old-time stations, for the Panama railroad has been operated partially ever since 1855, though its line has been often changed to evade the obstacles thrown in its way by the vagaries of the swift and treacherous Chagres. The main line is now double tracked all through, but it will be obliterated at the opening of the Canal, new lines now being surveyed."

On the train, I acquired a large fund of information, and was interested to note that everything seemed to date from the President's visit. So many things had been done "since the President was here," that it was clear that his words and presence had struck the key-note of a splendid patriotic impulse which has probably never in equal degree inspired any great national industrial undertaking.

The Argument for Uniform Divorce Laws.

Professor Felix Adler, leader of the Society for Ethical Culture, in an article contributed to the March Woman's Home Companion holds that those who have united to give life to a human being should stay united to cherish and to develop that life.

The divorce movement of late years has had an alarming growth, not only in the United States, but in almost every civilized country of the world. He adds: "The causes which have contributed to this growth are numerous and complex, but undoubtedly one of the most active has been the spread of Democracy or rather of that individualistic view of life of which Democracy is the political expression. To-day, as never before, the individual is asserting his claims to the full enjoyment of life's opportunities; and while this movement has been productive of lasting benefits, it has also been coupled with a wide-spread disposition to resist the pressure of social obligations which interfere, however necessarily, with individual liberty or happiness. The conjugal tie and the duties of parenthood springing from it is of all human relations the one in respect to which the weight of social obligations is most directly felt; and it is at this point, therefore that mutinous individualism has put forth its most determined struggles. The conjugal relation has a twofold aspect: It is a relation between the partners in marriage themselves, and a relation to offspring. A characteristic feature of militant individualism is that in the discussion of marriage, the former of these aspects is preferentially emphasized, while the latter is more or less thrown into the shade. The right of married persons to obtain relief from a tie which is no longer pleasing is considered from the point of view of their own happiness; while the rights of the children as affected by divorce are treated with the most superficial attention.

"The Congress on Uniform Divorce Laws, recently held at Philadelphia, is socially significant, because it marks the turning of the tide in favor of stricter legislation on the subject of divorce. Uniformity is aimed at, not for the sake of uniformity itself, but for the sake of the greater protection of the family which such uniformity will furnish. It has been one of the favorite arguments of the adversaries of popular government that Democracy in the end must lead to social as well as political anarchy. The friends of popular government, on the other hand, have put their trust in what may be called the collective instinct of self-preservation of the masses. This collective instinct of self-preservation, this instinct for maintaining intact the primary conditions that make for social order and progress—and among these conditions none is more important than the family—is now clearly asserting itself. The Congress which we are considering is evidence that the danger of anarchy in the family relations is being realized, and that the Democracy is slowly making up its mind to put an end to that danger.

"The Congress is important and interesting for another reason: It is an attempt to secure by moral suasion, by voluntary action on the part of the law-making bodies of the different States, a certain minimum of uniformity in legislation, of which many have believed that it can only be obtained by a national law. The tendency to employ the short-cut method of national legislation in matters hitherto left to the several States is visibly gaining headway among our people. Undoubtedly, if the difficulty of amending the Constitution had not stood in the way as an almost insurmountable obstacle, a national divorce law would long since have been enacted. And this difficulty, in one way or another, will surely be overcome, if the method of voluntary agreement which this Congress has undertaken to apply shall prove illusory. There are advantages and disadvantages on the side of both national and of state authority in matters of social legislation. Many of us are strongly inclined to prefer the slower method of working toward a gradual approximation of standards among the laws of the several States. Nevertheless, certain social needs are imperative; and if the States fail to agree, the scruples dictated by regard for the independent spheres of the different commonwealths will have to give way and a way will have to be found to cut the hopeless tangle by means of the sword of congressional action.

"There is one other point to which, in conclusion, reference may be made: The attempt to amend the laws on the subject of divorce is helpful, inasmuch as it leads all those who are engaged in this enterprise to realize the ultimate ineffectiveness of any laws, however stringent, however wise, and to search for a deeper remedy than any which legislation can supply. The conscience of the people must be awakened; and the best law will prove mere dead-letter unless this can be accomplished. The mutinous individualism of our age must be overcome, the springs of duty must be touched, the fundamental value of the family as the cornerstone of all our social institutions must be brought home. Moral teaching, moral enlightenment, moral appeals, must re-enforce the law and engender among the people a spirit favorable to the execution of it.

"Above all, in the face of many heretical opinions that are now spreading in the community with respect to marriage, the reasons must be made plain why the permanence of this relation is so essential to individual and public welfare. There is a disposition at the present time, due largely to the ever-increasing influence of science, to rebel against mere authority in every sphere, in the sphere of conduct as well as of thought. The most ancient traditions, the most sacred institutions, are summoned before the bar of reason to give an account of themselves and to justify their claims. Of this tendency among civilized nations we must take note, and the reason must be adduced for the permanency of the marriage relation. Those who offer reasons for experimental marriage and the like, in short, for relaxing the tie—fatuous and ignoble reasons, as most of us believe—must be met with stronger and better reasons. It will not do merely to invoke immemorial custom or sanctified authority. Into these reasons it is not the province of this article to enter at length, but the two main reasons may be succinctly stated as follows: For the partners themselves of the marriage contract, the expectation of permanency in the relation is indispensable, because it is the permanency alone that makes the relation pure, noble, and human, and distinguishes it from the sexual commerce of the lower animals. For the child that springs from the conjugal relation, the permanency of marriage is indispensable, because the permanent home is necessary to insure its best development, because the child needs both parents in order that it may grow in the best possible manner, physically, mentally, and morally.—Woman's Home Companion for March.

"The Arena" for April.

Political, social, and economic problems occupy much space in the April Arena. The Honorable Edward Tregear, Secretary for Labor for New Zealand, contributes a deeply interesting paper on "Recent humanistic legislation in New Zealand." This article is illustrated with four full-page reproductions of architects' plans for the government homes which New Zealand is building for workingmen. The legislation providing for the erection of these homes was the result of the government's determination to reduce the exorbitant rents which house-owners were charging the workingmen and also to place homes within the reach of the laborers, as they will be able, by paying on the installment plan, in time to secure a free title to the homes. It has been the settled policy of the liberal government of New Zealand to help industrious citizens to become independent home-owners. Mr. Tregear has long been a leading statesman in the Liberal government of New Zealand, and the paper in The Arena will be read with deep interest by all students of progressive democratic government. Another discussion of special interest in this issue deals with municipal ownership in Great Britain. The opening argument is an attack on popular ownership and is entitled "Some results in municipal ownership in Great Britain." It has been prepared by H. Gardner McKerrow and is a powerful contribution written by a thinker who has evidently taken much time for the preparation of his argument. The paper is ably answered by Professor Frank Parsons, Ph.D., who owing to his two personal trips over Great Britain for the special purpose of finding out the facts for and against public-ownership, is probably the best equipped authority in the United States on the subject. The editor of The Arena supplements Professor Parsons' reply by an extended editorial, Mr. Flower devoting his space to the points not touched upon by Professor Parsons. Altogether the papers which divide the space equally between the arguments for and against public ownership, constitute one of the most valuable contributions to the literature of the subject that has appeared. The illustrated feature of this number is a paper by George Wharton James dealing with the Abraham Lincoln Center of Chicago and the great work of its master-spirit, the Reverend Jenkin Lloyd Jones. "Henry Demarest Lloyd, Messenger," is the title of a somewhat detailed but admirably written sketch of the life, writings, and deals of the great progressive democratic author whose untimely death removed from the firing-line of progressive democracy one of its ablest and most efficient leaders. "The historical aspect of the virgin birth," by the Reverend Algernon S. Crapsey, is probably the ablest short argument in favor of the position taken by the friends of higher criticism that has appeared in the compass of a magazine article. A fine portrait of Doctor Crapsey is the frontispiece of this issue, and there is an admirable sketch of his life and an account of the recent heresy trial which has been prepared by Mr. Harris Addison Correll, State Editor of the Buffalo Evening News. "Emerson the anarchist," by Bolton Hall, is a striking and highly suggestive paper by the distinguished single-tax advocate. The editorials in this issue are very able and timely, and the comprehensive departments embodying all the more important news in the domains of public ownership, Direct Legislation, and voluntary co-operation render this magazine indispensable to those interested in these great present-day movements.

Timber Statistics for 1906.

Schedule for the collection of statistics of forest products for 1907 have been sent by the Forest Service to all engaged in industries directly dependent upon our forests. This work is a continuation of that done in 1906 by the Forest Service in co-operation with the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association. It then received the universal approval and support of the users of wood throughout the United States. The work was undertaken to meet the urgent demand for accurate data upon the annual drain upon our forest resources. The results proved so valuable that the information will be compiled annually, in accordance with the plan outlined by the Forest Service a year ago. To add to the efficiency, accuracy, and promptness of compilation of the data the Bureau of the Census and the Forest Service are this year co-operating in gathering the statistics. This plan insures to the manufacturers the announcement of results at the earliest possible moment after all the reports have been received. Several new features will distinguish the collection and publication of figures for 1906, now under way. The figures for the production of lumber were withheld last year until returns had been received from every State. This year the production of each State will be announced as soon as the returns are in. The failure of the manufacturers of a single State to furnish the information promptly will therefore delay the publication of results for that State only. The total production of the United States will be compiled when all State reports are complete. The lines upon which inquiry will be made are practically identical with those of last year, covering lumber, lath, and shingles, pulpwood, railroad ties, tan bark, veneer, wood distillation, and cooperage. A single addition has been made in an inquiry as to the consumption of telegraph and telephone poles. The Service believes that the statistics for 1906 will be more complete and more promptly obtained than those gathered last year. If so, their practical value to wood producers will be greatly increased. Success depends very largely upon the ready co-operation of manufacturers throughout the country.

General Conference

APRIL 17.

Elders W. A. McDowell and Ammon White presided at the morning prayer-service.

At 10.45 o'clock Elder J. M. Terry was the speaker, assisted by Elder V. M. Goodrich.

At 2 o'clock business-meeting convened with President Joseph Smith in the chair. Prayer was offered by the presiding officer. The minutes were read and approved. Four baptisms administered during the day were reported.

The Fourth Quorum of Elders reported, and at their request the ordination of F. G. Hedrick to the office of president of the quorum, with Earl Bailey and Charles Dillon as counselors, was approved.

The Second Quorum of Deacons reported.

The Daughters of Zion reported, stating that the advisory board would act as a committee with the Bishopric in the matter of establishing the children's home.

The resolution on sale of mining stock was called up and adopted without discussion. Some question of its application being presented, a motion prevailed that the matter be considered, and after some discussion the following substitute prevailed:

Resolved, That we disapprove of our ministry giving their attention to speculative mining or other ventures, or their promotion, and that we advise all persons who may decide to invest in any enterprises of the kind to do so only after such investigation as shall be fully satisfactory to themselves as to the safety of their venture, the same as any other business enterprise, and not upon their confidence in the ministerial position of those who seek to interest them therein.

The ordination of William Newton to the office of high priest was approved on the recommendation of the Presidency and the High Priests' Quorum.

The petition from the Kewanee District touching the method of choosing high priests was called up, and the Presidency, to whom it had been referred, reported that they had not had time to consider it. They were given additional time; their decision to be published as soon as made.

The recommendations contained in the report of the Presidency were taken up. The matter of publishing a historical periodical, as a supplement to the HERALD, or otherwise, was placed in the hands of the Historian, Presidency, and Board of Publica-

"Failure and disaster in financial ventures in the world are common, and from every section, but they are soon forgotten. This can not be true with the church. The church must build upon such lines that its work will stand for ever. 'Upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.'"

tion. President Smith was authorized to employ necessary clerical help in the preparation of his memoirs.

The fourth day of the next General Conference was set apart for the consideration of the resolution on divorce and remarriage previously reported by the Quorum of Twelve.

President R. C. Evans pronounced the benediction.

Elder F. G. Pitt was the speaker at the evening hour, assisted by L. E. Hills.

APRIL 18.

Elders A. J. Moore and Evan A. Davis were in charge of the morning prayer-service.

At 10.45 Elder A. H. Parsons was the speaker, assisted by Elder Richard Baldwin.

At 2 o'clock President Joseph Smith called the business-meeting to order. Prayer was offered by Elder J. C. Crabb, after which President R. C. Evans took the chair.

President Smith apologized for an incorrect ruling of the day previous. President Evans suggested that his example was one worthy of emulation if others felt so disposed.

An additional report from the High Priests' Quorum was read. The Seven Presidents of Seventy reported recommending for ordination to the office of seventy the following brethren: W. Davis, F. B. Farr, and John Harp. The recommendation was approved and the ordination provided for.

Charles Fry was re-elected on the Board of Auditors.

In harmony with a recommendation from the High Priests' Quorum, a committee of three was provided to prepare blank forms for the use of districts, stakes, and branches, to be used in preferring charges, serving notice of trial, or notice of appeal, in the case of elders' courts. At a later hour the following brethren were named on the committee: Joseph Smith, E. L. Kelley, S. A. Burgess.

The Board of Publication was authorized to appoint a committee on translation and proceed to publish the Book of Mormon in the German language.

The various quorums, officers, associations, publications, standing committees, and church institutions were sustained by vote.

The following resolution of respect to the memory of the late Bishop Thomas Taylor was adopted:

Whereas, In the death of Thomas Taylor, late bishop of the British Mission, the general church has sustained a loss which it deeply deplotes, therefore be it

Resolved, That this General Conference of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints hereby expresses its esteem and appreciation of our brother's long-continued fidelity to the cause of Christ, and his encouraging services on behalf of the church for so many years, and to those thus bereaved, our deepest sympathy.

In response to a query from the audience regarding the standing committee between the Reorganization and the Church of Christ (called Hedickites), President Joseph Smith made the following statement:

In a conversation with a representative of the Church of Christ President Fred M. Smith and myself were authorized, in regard to the rumors that had been started in regard to the possible coalition between the church in Utah and the Church of Christ in Independence by which the possession of the Temple Lot would pass under the control of the church in the West, to state unqualifiedly, that that Temple Lot was not for sale, and no fear need be entertained in reference to it. No offer had been made, and none would be considered if it were made. I asked if we were authorized to make that statement to those who should inquire, and he said, "Yes."

A question was presented by one individual who stated that he had been told that the original manuscript of the Book of Mormon was in the possession of the Utah Church. In reply, President F. M. Smith made the following statement:

The manuscript of the Book of Mormon is in the custody of the Presidency, and at the present time is in the hands of the secretary of the Presidency, and is in a vault at Independence. The Utah people have not got it.

Elder R. S. Salyards, church secretary, then made the following statement regarding the manuscript of the Inspired Version of the Bible:

The manuscript of the Inspired Translation, also the copy from which it was published, are in the possession of the Church Secretary, and safely lodged in a fire-proof vault.

In reply to a query as to whether the Utah church now owns any part of the Temple Lot, proper, Bishop E. L. Kelley made the following statement:

The nearest that they have to any of the Temple Lot, so marked and held as the Temple Lot, is the corner of the piece of land that they bought which comes within about one hundred and fifty or two hundred feet of it. It is across the street in a diagonal direction, southeast. They own no part of the Temple Lot and never have. On the contrary the Reorganized Church, with the exception of three lots now with the members, owns the entire land circling this Temple Lot. A part of the Temple Lot we own, about one fourth of it.

Morgan.—Is that where they own the twenty-three acres?
Kelley.—Yes, sir.

Sheehy.—Is that any part of the original sixty odd acres?
Kelley.—Yes, sir.

There has been quite a lot of talk among the members of the Reorganized Church as well as others, to the effect that the Utah church had so much property at Independence. They have laid out about thirty thousand dollars in property at Independence. The Reorganized Church and its members hold three hundred thousand dollars' worth of property in Independence to-day. So when you hear such stories do not get alarmed. And when they were going to buy some more this spring, and some of our brethren came to me very hurriedly and breathlessly about it, I stated I just as soon they would buy as not. Why not? If they send good people here we will convert them. If they send bad ones, they will put them in the penitentiary down at Jefferson City.

Elder W. A. McDowell rose to a question of privilege and made the following statement regarding the work of the clergy credentials committee:

I am somewhat acquainted with the principal officers in the Clergy Bureau at Chicago. The lady who is the chief clerk in the Western Passenger Bureau said that she could truly say that our system of arranging names in their order and getting the matter before the Bureau so that it would cause the least trouble and effort was better than almost any other church that was represented there. I thought that was a good recommend for our brethren who have the matter in charge, and for this reason I spoke of it, and hope that they may be sustained; also that our brethren will be very careful in the use of the clergy permits, so that no reflection in any regard can be made upon this matter before the bureaus, if the bureaus should be continued under the present rule and system.

The publication of the fifth volume of Church History was authorized.

Elder H. O. Smith spoke at the Saints' Home in the evening; and at the church, Elder Paul M. Hanson gave a very interesting lecture entitled "From Joppa to Jerusalem." This lecture was illustrated with stereopticon views from photographs taken by Bro. Hanson during his visit to the Holy Land. He was assisted by W. E. LaRue and Victor Gun-solley.

APRIL 19.

Elders T. W. Williams and W. W. Smith were in charge of the morning prayer-meeting.

According to previous announcement the closing meeting of the Conference was held at ten o'clock. The meeting opened with the singing of the old hymn "Glorious things are sung of Zion." Prayer was offered by President Joseph Smith, who was in charge.

The chief business of the meeting was the reading of the missionary appointments, which is always a matter of great interest at the General Conferences.

Short speeches were made by President Joseph Smith, and Elders Luff, Hilliard, and Maloney.

President Smith pronounced the benediction and the final adjournment occurred at a quarter past eleven o'clock.

FREDERICK A. SMITH, Secretary Twelve.

“To every individual is given the choice between the philosophy of the world and the philosophy of God. One permits us to violate every law of right, with the single injunction that we must be clever and not get caught. The other instructs us to live above the law; and then we will never fear any exposure or the judgments of any court on earth or in heaven.”

THE RESURRECTION.

SERMON DELIVERED AT INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, SUNDAY,
MARCH 31, 1907, BY PRESIDENT JOSEPH SMITH.

(Reported by Belle Robinson James.)

In the year eighteen hundred and sixty-five, not long after I had united myself with the Reorganization, I had the fortune—or misfortune, as it may terminate—to preach two funeral-sermons, one at the beginning of the month of May and the other at the close—two daughters of Sr. Lowe, of Plano, Illinois, young girls, just entering into young womanhood, who passed away that month, one the first part of the month, and the other at its close. I was young in the ministry, I had not yet seen what to me was an absolute testimony touching quite a number of points in the philosophy known as the latter-day work.

I had tried pretty hard in my early manhood before uniting with any religious movement, to convince myself that there was no resurrection. One thing stood in the way of an absolute disbelief and that was that everything by which I was surrounded and could take cognizance of by the intellectual forces of my nature, indicated that there had been a designer; but I could not accept the resurrection. It required too much of credulity to accept such a thought. When called upon to preach these funeral-sermons, the first especially, I was at a loss.

I was a stranger in the place. There were but few of our people there. I had never read extendedly the writings of the church found in the Times and Seasons, and I had not yet drawn my conclusions touching the resurrection. I wanted the cause to stand fair before that public. We had planted our HERALD Office there, and from there the literature of the church was to go forth, and for a time, at least, it was the business center of the Reorganization.

I remember that it had been given to one before me to be indoctrinated through the influence of prayer. I betook myself where I could have access uninterrupted to the Master and I laid the case before him like this: "I am young in the work; I am a stranger in this country. I do not know what to say. I am not familiar with the subject," and the answer that I got to my petition was this: "Put yourself in the way to discharge your duty and it shall be given to you what you shall say." This was but a repetition of the answer which the Master gave to his disciples years ago—"Take no thought what you shall say, but in the hour of your need it shall be given to you." I went to the hall where the funeral-service was to be held, and before entering upon the subject, the material fact of the resurrection of Jesus Christ was impressed upon me, and the logical conclusion that every thinker must reach was included in this important fact. If there had ever lived upon the earth a man whose name was Jesus, if that man had died, if he had been buried or placed within the tomb, if he had been resurrected or raised from the grasp of death to come forth out of the tomb and to be known and recognized among men, it was absolutely possible for God whom he served to raise all mankind by the same power. After that, the spiritual declarations found in the scriptures were but corroborative evidences of the conclusions that I had reached and that were forced upon me.

For instance, there were two sects in the days of the Savior, standing opposite each other in their view of the resurrection; the Pharisees believed in the existence or pre-existence of spirits and also in the resurrection. The Sadducees disputed both. There are none of us to whom the experiences have come that indicate clearly to us that there has some one come back from the other country, and manifested himself or herself to us in the flesh. I know it is said in certain circles it has been done, but for over forty-six years I have been challenging such operations; and too many of them, altogether too many of them, have been proved to my satisfaction to be but illusory and not confirmatory of a faith in the resurrection.

One of the standing arguments against this thought of a resurrection is that a man that lives to be three score years and ten passes through certain mutations and changes of organism until he is an exaggerated man in every respect. The apostle Paul, as found in the fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians, philosophizes upon that in a similar way that I would, and that I must have done to reach conclusions that I have touching the resurrection. He says: "It doth not yet appear what we shall be"—upon one occasion—"but this we do know, that when he shall appear we shall be like unto him." This simply signifies that as he bore a resurrected body, so will those that shall be resurrected. And Paul in writing to the Corinthians, reasons in reference to the sowing of grain. It is but bare grain. Similar grain had been planted for hundreds—perhaps thousands of years, and yet each succeeding year there had sprung up from the ground that blade, so-called the grain. Paul says it was but bare grain and God giveth it a body as it pleaseth him, each after its kind. This has been tested every year of the world since that time, and if you want grain, the kind you want you must sow; and I have year after year examined the grain from the time it was placed in the soil until it was gathered again. I was unable to detect the processes of growth, I was unable to detect the principles of life which gave it its character, and I was forced to the conclusion, just as you all must be forced to the conclusion that the statement of the apostle Paul is correct, "God giveth it a body as it pleaseth him, to every kind his own body. So is the resurrection."

We have scattered along in the history of time the thought of the literal resurrection of the dead; that the absolute particles which the body lies down at death, according to some, must be re-gathered from out the wide dispersion that may have taken place, from the atmosphere, the gases, and from the earth, the soil, etc., the component parts of earthy substance, the material things that have been gathered through life, and some of the materialists and unbelievers have said that this is absolutely impossible. Well, I have read somewhere in this book of an impossibility for man but all things are possible with God. And if God could create at the beginning a man, if he could establish the principles of life, if he could continue that principle operative upon the earth for hundreds and thousands of years as he has done, he is just as capable of giving to the spirit that has existed upon the earth and has been blessed with an identity, charged with a reasonable responsibility and given to understand that he will be held accountable for the exercise of that identity and for the exercise of that responsibility. He can re-clothe that spirit just as surely as he clothed Adam, the first man, and Eve, the first woman. We can not accept the thought that that which was born in them in the garden, wherever it may have been, the principle of life—that it has ever died, that it will ever die, but its influence upon those things which it is brought to bear upon, will give them life and they will dwell for ever.

Now let us see—and you will pardon me if I treat this a little in my own way—because I am now approaching the confines of that other world, and if there is ever a time when a man may calmly and dispassionately look over the barriers between this sphere and that which is over yonder, it is when he stands so close to the dividing boundaries that it is but a step, and his eyes may be so dim that he can not see that which he is taking, but if the inward man be lighted up with the hope, his spirit fired with the joy which has been born in him through obedience to the Master, whose Spirit raised him from the grave, he can look dispassionately over there and comprehend what God has promised unto man. Hence, the question whether the body, the absolute particles which may be in this body when it lies down or is laid away in the grave, are those which shall appear on the morn of the resurrection and occupy a place in this spirit that now moves this portion of clay, makes no particle of difference to me, or whether when that spirit is brought into judgment and the time comes for its re-clothing,

God by his infinite mercy, as he at the beginning created a man out of the forces that were with him and the material in his hand; he can, by the same processes, so let these bodies rise, let these spirits be clothed, and there shall come and take place precisely what Ezekiel saw, as we can read, I think, in his thirty-seventh chapter.

But you may say to me, Why, Elder Smith, that is a wondrous miracle. Life itself is a wondrous miracle. Who is there that has ever compassed even the life of the blade of grass? Who is there that has ever compassed the power by which the trees are now clothing upon themselves with that wondrous promise of the bounteous fruitage that is yet to be? Who is there that can tell by what peculiar power and force he now lives? He may not pass out of yonder portals in the exercise of his faculties but may be carried out an inert mass. But the spirit that is within, the identity, the sentient being, must be taken care of by the power that is within him: life, never to die.

I read in this wondrous book that a city was taken up to heaven, blessed with that gift of immortality by which the inhabitants of that city might live. A whole city was transported on high, and we are told that that city must come again, descending from out of the skies to be again an existence upon the earth. We have sung of Zion; we have sung of Enoch's holy band, and some of the principles that are there shadowed forth in song are those that we strive to conserve to-day on this Easter Day in commemoration of the rising of the Master.

I read also that the Savior taught the resurrection, and in order that he might give his teaching force among men that it might come down through all the corridors of time to our day, he manifested the power when he bade the stone to be rolled from the door of the tomb in which Lazarus lay, while those that were around him were persuading him that the door was never to be opened, and challenging their belief he caused the stone to be rolled away and he said to him: "Lazarus, come forth," and he did. How long he lived thereafter is immaterial. The man had been consigned to his tomb, and the record says that Jesus exhibited this power that it might be manifested that he had the power of the resurrection. It was manifested elsewhere, and by and by his own body was laid in the tomb, and as had been predicted of him "he should make his grave among the rich," it was in the tomb of one of these rich men that his body was laid away to rest.

By and by angels stood by the tomb, and when there came those devoted believers and stooped down to look within, there were the habiliments with which he had been clothed; there were the cerements of the dead; and they wondered where he was. As he was passing along he met one of those devotees; she was about to recognize him, and he said, "I am not yet risen to my Father who is in heaven"; but there was the resurrected body. Disguise it as we may, he has wrought the power of the resurrection in his own person. Paul, recognizing the power that was in him, said of those that were to come after him: "If the Spirit which raiseth Jesus from the dead be in you and abide, it shall quicken your mortal bodies."

Now what is the difference to you or me if, when we lay down these bodies in the grave, we shall be permitted to take the very identical particles of which this body is clothed at the time it is laid down when we rise, or whether we go to our rest trusting God to give that identity to that particular spirit which occupies now this frame and body as it shall be entitled to?

You will pardon me if I reason a little on this in my own way. My father was killed practically in the hey-day of his life, not yet thirty-nine years of age—had not yet attained to the fullness of his power, had not yet lived out the days of his usefulness; a strong-hearted, noble-looking man as far as the flesh was concerned. Of the spirit that was in him I shall not say further—I am talking now about the resurrection of the body. My mother lived to be seventy-four years of age, and was worn out, lost her fleshy contour. Her hair had turned gray, which when at thirty-eight years of age was dark and wonderfully pleasant to gaze upon, a woman strong and healthy and hearty in her hey-day, but worn by toil and care and deprivation at her death. Eyes had grown dim, teeth were lost. Now here are two contrasts. Two of those that had lived upon the earth.

In eighteen hundred and eighty-three, when I was writing my replies to L. O. Littlefield that were being published in the Utah Journal at Logan, I had come to a particular point in my narrative and my argument. I did not know just what to answer, so I betook myself again to prayer before I went to my sleep, and during that night I saw—I say I saw because I realized, I comprehended—the spirit that was within took cognizance of, though no men have seen with the outward eye, the fleshly eye, but the brain comprehended by that peculiar psychological visitation that gives us knowledge sometimes when we are absolutely unconscious of our existence in the flesh—brought to me this knowledge. I saw my mother. I am not going to tell all the circumstances but simply that which occurred. I saw my mother and her appearance was as it was in her best estate. I saw her with her hair black and shining—the curls that she wore as she used to wear them, the flesh of her face rounded, the contour handsome as it used to be—not wasted as I saw her last. I saw my father and he was something more matured than when I gazed upon him in my twelfth year. And when I rose from my bed I was prepared to answer. The reason why, this: I said to my father as I saw him: "Are you in a condition to know of what my mother and I have been talking about?" He said, "Yes, my son, I know." "What have you to say in regard to it?" He said, "You may depend, Joseph, that what your mother has told you is absolutely true."

This was sufficient for me and here was something to think about. My father had apparently grown older, sturdier, put on a little different appearance than when I saw him in life last. So had my mother, but mother had grown younger. It forced the conviction upon me that I saw them as they were in their best estate, and it forced upon me the conclusion that had been forced before that and since that by the reading of the testimony of the Book of Mormon, in which it is declared that not one single hair of the head shall be lost. It gives us to understand that in the resurrection time there will be a complete renovation of the individual. What they might have lost in life here in the flesh by virtue of no fault of their own, by no disadvantage which they have not placed upon themselves by their own acts, whatever they may have lost in such circumstances as these, shall be returned to them. So I comfort myself. I comfort you who have grown old and are passing down, that when you shall come in the resurrection, instead of being known as a gray-haired, bald-headed, toothless, skinny individual, the Lord shall see to it that you shall be restored in your best estate. Is not that comforting? I think so.

You will pardon me. I have been troubled a good deal with neuralgia and once when I was seriously worried about it, some one asked me about the resurrection. "I will tell you," I said. "If they don't give me a better set of teeth in the resurrection, I am going to revolt." That may have been a jocular expression, it may have been a little too light-minded, but now look at it.

We are to eat of the fruit of the vineyard, we are to drink of the fruit of the vine. We are to eat that food that shall be prepared for us. Another shall not rise and eat what we are entitled to. The idle shall not have place there. The industrious shall be there; as a consequence they will have to be fed, and I believe that we have read somewhere in this good book that there has been a sword put between mankind and the tree of life, and after a while that guardian that has stood there to wield that sword will be removed and the nations shall have access to the tree of life and eat thereof and live for ever. If that is the case, then there would be a restoration of that which may have been lost that shall prevent us from entering in and enjoying fully, to the extreme limit of the good things that shall be on the other side in the better land.

I read away back here something about the Psalmist David—and by the way—now, a little digression. We sometimes meet the statement in regard to David and the career of him after he slew the Philistine giant, that the things which David did were commended of God. That is a mistake. The statement that David was a man after God's own heart does not follow him after he entered in upon the kingly rule. Do not forget that, my friends. David was prevented from building the temple. Do not forget that. David was a man of blood. After his manhood and until the time he was chosen king he was a man after God's own heart, but the grasp of worldly power and of a scepter which slew people, spoiled the man. God told Israel plainly what would happen if a king were appointed unto them, and when they got a king, what followed the kingly rule from that time till now? I am glad from my heart that God has told us through the inspiration of his Holy Spirit and through his chosen prophet that in time we are to have no king. I am glad, and why? Because as an individual, I feel an assurance that the man has not been born of woman who is to be trusted with irresponsible power, and the kingly authority exercised by human kings has been fraught with injury and wrong to mankind from Saul until now, with very few exceptions.

As a consequence, when our King shall come, when he shall clothe upon all these identities that have been his and will be his at his coming, he will rule in righteousness, and not trust the sceptre in human hands.

David, in his best estate, in his better moments, wrote a great many good things, and among them was this: "I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness." Could the apostle Paul have written it better than that, when he says, "We shall see him as he is. It does not appear now what we shall be, but this we do know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, like his most glorious body"? Do you want any better promise than that? I do not. That is good enough. That is almost precisely what the Psalmist said, "I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness." Again, the Psalmist said, in one of his better moments—and by the way, I'd like to have the elders take cognizance of this statement. It is an opinion of mine, it is not a doctrine of the church, and if you do not like it, you examine it and come and talk with me and we will have it out, if we can. David says upon one occasion: "For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption." What does that mean? It is generally taken that both expressions mean Christ, Jesus. I do not so understand it. I understand the pronouns to apply just where I think they should do. The reason why the Psalmist David congratulated himself that he should be satisfied with the likeness of the Savior when he awoke from death, was because the promise had been made to him that the noble Son of God should not see corruption. That is, Jesus' body should not see corruption, but "thou wilt not leave my soul in hell." The Psalmist David was himself compassed about by the bands of death and the grave, but he was not to continue there. I have been told by some—I do not know how true it is; but I once asked my mother a question whether she ever heard anything said by the elders of the church about the Psalmist David and she said, Yes, and the conclusion she had reached was that he would not rise in the morning of the first resurrection. I do not know. It is neither here, nor there; but after the thousand years, then of course the promise is still good to him, that his soul shall not be left in hell; nor did the Holy One see corruption. It is because of that fact, my friends, that you and I can rejoice in the resurrection, is it not?

Our bodies shall see corruption. I expect they will. I doubt if any of us will be translated. I hope a good many of us are sufficiently righteous, but I can not hope for the promise, so far as my judgment upon myself is concerned. But how then? If Jesus' body did not see corruption, if Lazarus' body did not see corruption, if others that were resurrected as the history of the New Testament times tells us, did not see corruption, what shall be the result to the bodies which shall see corruption?

The apostle Paul comes to our relief in 1 Thessalonians, and states this: "Comfort ye one another with these words," "that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep." How is that? We that are then present and are changed in the twinkling of an eye at his coming will not prevent those whose bodies have seen corruption, but they will rise; they that remain shall be caught up into the air to meet him when he comes with his angels, all the wonderful august host of them, and then, says the apostle, "so shall we ever be with the Lord." Do you want a better spiritual promise than that? I do not.

One of the differences between the glories of which we read is, that he that is worthy of the celestial glory shall be permitted to enter in where God and Christ are; they who get the terrestrial or the final telestial glory will not be permitted to enter where God and Jesus Christ are. They may say to me just what they please, but it is worth everything that a man can do to live in accordance with the Christian philosophy in order that he may be found worthy to exist with Jesus Christ, who has served his probationary estate upon the earth and who has been found worthy for his triumph. The honorable men of the earth may get a good thing; the honorable women of the earth may get a good thing, but he that lives according to the philosophy of Jesus Christ will get a far better. That ought to be.

And so we have it. John, the beloved disciple, writes away back here in the Apocalypse touching that resurrection: "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection, for on such the second death shall have no power."

So, this Easter Day, this commemoration of that wonderful morn, that time when Jesus arose from the dead, that time when the wonderful spirit of Life gave evidence; evidence that he could raise men from the dead or the grave, is with us; and we rejoice to-day in the consideration of the thought, and we may make it a material thought; we may take it up and argue it as I have tried to do from the absoluteness of intellect within the region of our own consciousness, and we may justify ourselves, we may comfort ourselves from the spiritual evidences that we have in both the Old and the New Testaments, taking in the revelations given to us in the Book of Mormon and the Book of Doctrine and Covenants and the whole subject of the resurrection from the dead is before us grandly and is worthy our every consideration.

I'd like to illustrate, if I could, a little. We have with us Bro. Bond. He may not be present to-day but we know him. Bro. Bond had a sister. I used to know her—she lived at Kirtland. I believe that her days were extended something like three score years and ten, and she had always lived, the spirit in a broken, decrepit body. I presume that within the knowledge of every grown man and woman in this house there now exists the thought of either a boy or a girl in a similar condition, whether from accident after birth or from hereditary influences, the spirit of the living frame occupying a poor, broken, frail tenement—impossible that either the spirit could have its best estate in such a broken frame—impossible according to our methods of life that the body itself should grow into its developed proportions as it would had it never been disturbed—impossible. Now what occurs? After three score years and ten of bitter sojourn in such a broken frame as that, it is laid down to rest, and I pay this tribute to the memory of Sr. Bond, a brighter spirit I do not think I ever met. I do not wonder that at times she may have complained, but as a rule she was steadfast and earnest, undertook to look out upon life as she saw it, with all the patience it was possible for her to exercise and with the exercise of every hope that she might lay hold upon. Now that body lies down to rest. Will you tell me that God, in his infinite mercy, will give that spirit occupying that body, that identity, that peculiar being, that peculiar sentient being, that he will return to her that broken body that she carried so many years in this life? I do not believe it. I believe that he will give to that spirit the fairest body it would have been possible for that spirit to have been blessed with, if there had been no untoward condition governing her physical life. I believe that. I have reason to believe it.

Again, we are unfortunately living in a condition of things that frequently individuals through some peculiar formation of mind, become darkened—whether they open the avenues of their soul and allow some spirit to come in there that has no business to be there, but at all events we know that individuals' minds have become darkened and they live for years that way, have not come out from that, before their bodies have been laid in the grave. Am I to understand that when they come forth they are to come forth darkened in mind? No, I do not believe it, but that which has been forced upon them because of conditions they could not control in this life, they will be given back all that they have lost.

Let me cite you to my brother David. You talk about trials, my dear brethren and sisters. I have heard you talk about afflictions, and I have heard those that never passed through such a condition as that talk of afflictions. It is far better, the conditions seem to me to be far better to take that earthly tenement out to the grave and deposit it there when I could have an assurance that body and spirit had been in fit occupation as designed by God; but when there had been that interference, the brain was darkened, the faculties dulled and dimmed by the change that had taken place, it is worse than death. It is a constant living death, and brings with it constant frenzy of grief and pain that nobody can know unless he shall be placed under similar conditions.

When that man is resurrected, if he shall be accounted worthy of resurrection, I anticipate, if I am found worthy, that I shall meet him as he was in his best estate or as he would have been in his best estate. That is the condition which I expect to reach. To greet those that I have associated with in the past. If I am to rise in the resurrection, an old man with eyes grown dim and force expended, I had as soon quit now. I am going to trust for renovation. I am going to trust for that to be given back to me that has been lost here. That is the comfort and hope I extend to all of you to-day, you young, middle-aged and old people. Remember, that if you shall live so as to be worthy to meet the Savior in the resurrection of the dead, all that you have lost here will be given back to you.

But how about those things of which we are to know hereafter? I dare not tell you. The Book of Mormon says that when they pass over into the other country, they will have a lively consciousness of all their guilt. It is not worth while, then, to live in guilt while we are here. It is better for us to drop that consciousness of guilt here and sin not. But you may tell me, no person may live in the flesh and sin not. I tell you they can. Not because the power to sin is not left in the body, but because the disposition to sin has been overcome and men live godly because they will live godly, not because they are not tempted, not because they are not tried, but because they have determined they will not sin. Not that they have not the power. They have that and will have as long as life continues with them, so long as strength remains, but they will not necessarily sin.

It is this that gives us the glorious hope in Christ. He that overcometh he shall enter into and enjoy for evermore. Then it pays us, if we are to have a lively consciousness of all our guilt, then we shall also have a lively consciousness of all our good. It pays us to think of this; if we are to have a lively consciousness of all our guilt then the opposite is true and we will have a lively consciousness of all our good.

Let me exhort you this morning that you so live that when you pass out of this life you shall have that same consciousness that you lie down with at night, that you have not sinned during the day; a lively consciousness of the good you have done and that has come to you, so when the night of death reaches you, you will be able to say, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." "I have fought a good fight, I have kept the faith, henceforth there is a crown laid up for me, and not for me only, but for all those who love his appearing and his kingdom." So wondrous was the dignity and manhood and charity that characterized the apostle Paul in all that he said that he could not confine the blessings to himself, but he went further, "Not for me only, but for all them who love his appearing." He did not forget his fellow man, his loyal heart went out to them.

Then on this day in which we commemorate the rising of our Lord Jesus Christ, let us think of him as our powerful friend who shall give back to us all that we may have lost by reason of no fault of our own, but let us take cognizance of the fact of that which is taught us, that we must live as perfect here as God in his sphere is perfect. So may we live in our Savior, as perfect as he; not that we shall live as God or Christ, but that we shall live as men and women in the possession of our faculties, sinning not because we will not, and finding ourselves worthy of the resurrection of the just.

I may have talked about this brokenly, but I have given you subject for comfort and consolation. I have given you thoughts that have helped me all along the journey of life. I have told you that which has been forced in upon my consciousness by that which I have been taught and by that which I have seen in my life, and the things that have been borne to me by virtue of those I have known in life and that have passed away. So we may conclude that the song with which we opened the service will be resounding from the angelic choristers, "Jesus Christ is risen, no more to die," and as he has risen no more to die, we may comfort each other with the philosophy of the apostle Paul, "If Christ then is not risen, then our hope is in vain and we are of all men most miserable." But because Christ is risen, we may be of all men the most joyous, happy, contented, and with faith looking forward to the time when our pilgrimage here shall cease and we shall receive the reward we have so longed for, and for which we have wrought so faithfully.

BUILDING CHARACTER.

To be a noble character is to cultivate qualities of mind that are noble, and these are possible by reaching out for and following after God. It is character alone that counts with you—the honest, fearless, truthful character who scorns a lie as the basest of all hypocrasies. A truly noble character must be truthful. We are given the grand privilege of forming a character after the model character of all time, our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ. When we view his character, at once so lofty and so humble—so perfect—we almost despair of ever attaining to it, but his command is, be ye holy as I am holy. Christ would not have given the command if he did not intend us to obey it, but if we allow our sins which we call our "little weaknesses" to become our masters, then we become slaves to our "weaknesses," and are ruled by them, instead of overcoming them and building a character of holiness. God is pleading with his people to "come up higher." Can we do so and still cling to our weaknesses, "the sins that so easily beset us"?

We are building for eternity; what is the material? Is it "wood, hay, stubble"? When the X-rays and the searchlight from God's eternal throne are turned on our words and actions, will they stand that piercing glare of purity? Now is the time to build a character, while on this footstool. Let us be fearless in the right. Let our words have the true ring of honesty. "Ring out the false; ring in the true." "As a man thinks, so is he." If we allow our thoughts to run in a low groove, we can not become higher than our thoughts. Beautiful thoughts are an inspiration to beautiful deeds. The world is full of the noble deeds of men and women inspired to action by noble thoughts which have left their impress on history, written by a pen of iron which time can not erase.

"Character is not complete without divine ambition," a desire to do good to humanity at large, to so live that the world is better for our living. Good deeds, not words, are what will count in God's sight. Our daily living should be more than a beautiful testimony of soft-spoken words while we are daily bringing reproach on his work. The grand character of God is seen abroad in all his works, and the great plan of salvation—a plan so broad and liberal that it takes in all of his creation. Who can comprehend the vastness of a thought so wonderful? There is a lifetime of contemplation in the grandeur of the character of God. Our little minds are inadequate for the task; but in this contemplation the mind is drawn far away from scenes of confusion and care, and we can "come up higher" in having sweet communion with the unseen.

OVER IN THE AGES TO COME.

They tell us the saints will all sit on a cloud,
Over in the ages to come;

With no work to do—only sing very loud,
Over in the ages to come;

The fate of the wicked they dolefully tell,
In torment unending are roasting in hell,
While the clock of eternity is sounding their knell,
Over in the ages to come.

Probation they tell us will then be no more,
Over in the ages to come;

That when Jesus comes he will then shut the door,
Upon those in the ages to come.

The heathen who died without any light,
And those whom the Devil had conquered in fight,
In torment shall be through eternity's night;
Over in the ages to come.

God's word has a different story to tell,
Of things in the ages to come;

The wolf and the lamb together shall dwell,
Over in the ages to come;

The nations of earth dwell together in peace,
The dominion of Jesus for ever increase,
And those in the prison of death he'll release,
Over in the ages to come.

There's a wonderful work for God's children to do,
Over in the ages to come;

A work needing men that are able and true,
Over in the ages to come;

When the truth and the light make the darkness to flee,
God's glory fill the earth as the waves fill the sea,
The plan of redemption earth's millions shall see,
Over in the ages to come.

There's need of true men to enlist for the fight,
Over in the ages to come;

To put down all evil by spreading the light
Over in the ages to come;

When all shall be raised sleeping under the sod,

There'll be work for good men in the kingdom of God,
To teach all the nations, and rule with a rod,
Over in the ages to come.

The house of the Lord shall be builded again
Over in the ages to come;

All nations will come there to call on his name,
Over in the ages to come;

Messiah shall reign, and the people shall fear,
And bow at his feet—that time draweth near,
It is the long promised, "Great Jubilee" year,
Over in the ages to come.

DAMAGES FOR SCIENTISTS.

An interesting legal case is reported from Fort Worth, where a passenger of the street-railway, a woman by the name of Travis, sued for damages by reason of having been ejected from a car against her will. The complainant demanded heavy damages for the ensuing "physical and mental suffering."

On the trial of the case the company set up as a defense that the complainant is a Christian Scientist, who denies the existence for her of physical and mental suffering, therefore she could not conscientiously claim damages for suffering which she not only did not experience but which she contends does not exist. The contention was overruled by the trial judge and the jury returned a verdict for damages.

The case has been carried to the supreme court, which overrules the lower tribunal, saying, "If she had such control of her feelings, or thought she had, as to render her insensible to pain when she willed to be, we see no reason why that circumstance should not have been considered by the jury in determining be made on account of it."

VOICE AT THE MODERN JORDAN.

It is not at all out of reason to imagine the people of our time and land flocking, let us say, to the shores of our great central river to catch the message of some prophetic voice, and no message can be more pertinent and timely than that uttered on the banks of the Jordan that ushered in the appearance of Christ: Repent! Repent not merely of sin, but of very specific individual sins.

To young men He would say: "Away with the notion that good fellowship means good manhood or that gratifying the whim of a companion constitutes true friendship."

To the rich He would say: "Hold your fortune as a steward of God and as a trustee for your fellow man. Make your home not your castle, but a fountain of health." To the poor He would say the same, for the message to poor and to rich is one.

To the employer He would say: "Repent that you ever looked upon the man you use as a machine or a thing. Behold in him your brother man."

To the employee He would say the same: "There stands your brother. Together you labor for the common good."

To the student and scholar He would say: "Have done with your superciliousness and pride and remember that you are tracing the footsteps of God."

To the man of genius He would say: "Spurn the idea that you are a law to yourself and may have a code of morals of your own."

To the politician in office and the politician out of office there will come the mandatory words: "Hands off from the sacred ark of God's covenant with his people. To the victors belong no spoils except the trophies of a public trust loyally fulfilled."

To citizens crying, "What, then, shall we do?" will come the answer: "An end to the indifference and the negligence that gives the spoiler his chance to the dishonesty and corruption in private that furnish the soil and the seed for the prostitution of high office. Make honest returns, pay your share of the taxes, do your duty at the polls."

To teachers He would say: "For shame, that ever you look upon your occupation as a trade."

To preachers he would say: "Out with the time-server and the adventurer and the wolf in sheep's clothing."

To priests and Levites He would point to the men lying by the roadside and men everywhere in need.

To the church, supremely, He would ring out his one great word: "Repent! Down upon your knees pray to God to intermit the plague that needs must follow on age-long stagnation and ingratitude."—Frank Newhall White, in Princeton Telegraph.

SWORDS AND PLOWSHARES.

The peace conference that is in session in New York to-day is a gathering of idealists. But it is none the less important to mankind for that. It is an educational force that has a distinct and positive value, even if its fruits may be remote.

But universal peace will never come until it is preceded by universal justice. And that must not only be justice between nations, but justice between nations and men and between man and man.

The peace of justice is the only peace that will endure. Human nature will not tolerate any other kind. So long as there is injustice there will be war between nations and bloody revolutions within nations.

With millions of human beings starving in China and Russia, with other millions scattered throughout other nations of the world on the verge of starvation, all because the few have seized the heritage of the many, it is unreasonable to even hope for universal peace.

When this injustice threatens to deprive men of the means of life no peace agreement will ever prevent them from appealing to the first law of nature and taking up arms for self-preservation.

They may talk of peace, but there will be no peace until justice is enthroned in all nations of the world, the justice that will give to all men the opportunity to earn a living, that will open the resources of the earth to all the people thereof instead of the present exploitation of them for the profit of those who have seized and hold power over their fellows.—Pittsburg Leader.

GET RID OF THAT BIGOTRY.

Many New Thought people take pleasure in decrying the narrowness and bigotry which they see in some of the "old thought" people—they see what they look for, and hear the notes to which they are best attuned. But they fail to see that they are often just as bigoted as those "old thought" people—just as narrow, just as intolerant. Many New Thought people have merely changed their coats—same old people underneath the garment—same old intolerance and narrowness, needing a good scrubbing to get it off.

You must not forget that there is more or less truth in everything, and that no one thing can contain all the truth. There is no corner in truth—no monopoly of knowing. If the man at the other end of the field turns up one kind of soil, and you at your end are turning up another, it is most foolish for you to look upon the other man as a fool, or as untruthful, because he sees a different thing from you.—New Thought.

IS IT NEW, OR A FRAUD?

The more we consider the recent declaration submitted to and adopted by the April conference of the Mormon church at the first day's session, the more it appears that it is in fact a new declaration in many respects, or else it is the most astonishing piece of duplicity and hypocrisy that has yet been given out by the priesthood. We note certain of its conclusions formulated in brief paragraphs as follows:

"The absolute separation of church and state;

"No domination of the state by the church;

"No church interference with the functions of the state;

"No state interference with the functions of the church, or with the free exercise of religion;

"The absolute freedom of the individual from the domination of ecclesiastical authority in political affairs."

Now, either these formulated declarations are entirely false and a stupid piece of deception and hypocrisy, or else the church doctrine and practice in the past are absolutely repudiated; for it is undeniable that the position of the church has been just the reverse of this from the beginning. Apostle Orson Pratt probably made the best and most logical declaration of the real church position that has ever been printed. He understood fully the inner purpose and workings of Mormonism better than any one outside could possibly understand them, and he stated them in more logical, concise, and exact form than any other member of the priesthood was able to do. His statement of the church position as to temporal rule is as follows:

"The kingdom of God is an order of government established by divine authority. It is the only legal government that can exist in any part of the universe. All other governments are illegal and unauthorized. God having made all beings and worlds, has the supreme right to govern them by his own laws and by officers of his own appointment. Any people attempting to govern themselves and by laws of their own making and by officers of their own appointment, are in direct rebellion against the kingdom of God."—Doctrines of the Gospel, vol. 1, p. 666.

Likewise Apostle Parley P. Pratt, one of the early "martyrs" of the church, took the same position, where he said:

"This priesthood holds the keys of revelation of the oracles of God to man upon earth; the power and right to give laws and commandments to individuals, churches, rulers, nations, and the world; to appoint, to ordain, and establish constitutions and kingdoms; to appoint kings, presidents, governors, or judges.

"The priesthood upon the earth is the legitimate government of God, whether in the heavens or on the earth, and it is the only legitimate power that has a right to rule upon the earth."

President John Taylor, of the Mormon church, was also a great defender of the church power, recognized as a vigorous debater and extremely zealous in the defense of his religion. He was afterwards president of the church and stood higher in some respects in the estimation of the people than the president of the church does. President Taylor's idea on this question was as follows:

"Some people ask, 'What is the priesthood?' I answer, 'It is the legitimate rule of God, whether in the heavens or on the earth,' and it is the only legitimate power that has a right to rule upon the earth. . . . Who, then, has a right to appoint rulers? None but Him—God—or the man that he appoints."—Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, pp. 186, 187.

These positions, taken by those eminent authorities of the Mormon church and kingdom, have never been even attacked within the Mormon hierarchy, much less reversed; they are conclusive on the point that the recent declaration is absolutely a reversal as an exposition of the Mormon church doctrine and practice in the past.

But does anybody believe that there has been any change? The Deseret News says there has not. President Smith in his testimony in Washington in the Smoot case three years ago said there had been no change. Does any one believe that the weak and contemptible, the evasive back-and-fill twaddle adopted by the conference on Friday last makes any real change in the position of the church on this matter? There is not the least reason to suppose it, and among other reasons for disbelieving it may be quoted again the statement of Joseph F. Smith in the Improvement Era during last fall's campaign, as follows:

"At the present time we are about to make choice of some political leaders. It is scarcely necessary to say that a man who has the interest of himself and his people at heart, will choose his friends. Who are our friends? Men who have kept informed on the trend of affairs in the nation for the past two years or more may easily surmise. To vote any other way would be ungracious, against our own best interests, and would show a spirit of ungraciousness such as this people do not naturally possess."

Indeed, the declaration of itself is really conclusive not only as to the ability of the priesthood to control their people in political matters, but in the declaration of their intent to do so; especially as against the American party, which it falsely assumes is organized "to make war upon the church or menace the civil, political, or religious rights of its members as such." "Against a policy of that kind, by any political party or set of men whatsoever," the declaration says, "we assert the inherent right of self-preservation for the church, and her right and duty to call upon all her children, and upon all who love justice, and desire the perpetuation of religious liberty, to come to her aid, to stand with her until the danger shall have passed. And this, openly, submitting the justice of our cause to the enlightened judgment of our fellow men, should such an issue unhappily arise." It is here falsely assumed that the American party is attacking or intends to attack the Mormon religion or the Mormon people as such. An utterly baseless premise, and one which is used simply as an attempted justification of the continued intention of the church to dominate its members in political matters.

In this view of the case, there has been no change in the attitude of the church leaders whatever. They intend to control the votes of their people precisely as they have been doing in the past; and the people, by sustaining this declaration and submitting to the priestly dictation, consent to be used politically for church purposes, just as they have consented to be used all along.

So that if the declaration is intended to be taken at its face value, it is an absolutely new departure, and a radical one, from the old conditions and from the old doctrines and precepts. That is, if it is not sincere, it is not new, as the Deseret News says, but if it is sincere, and is to be actually carried out, it is the newest thing there is. But if it is not intended to be taken literally and seriously, then it is the same old rascally hypocrisy, the same buccaneering and piratical flag under which the autocratic, cruel, vicious, law-defying, lecherous, grasping, autocratic, avaricious hierarchy has sailed in the past and will continue to sail now and until its power is brought to an end.—Salt Lake Tribune, April 9, 1907.

SPEAKING WITH TONGUES AS A MODERN RELIGIOUS MANIA.

"Speaking with tongues" has been a feature of recent revival-meetings held in various cities of Ohio. As reported in the secular and religious press these manifestations have taken the form of articulate but unintelligible utterances for the most part. In one instance, however, a young woman is reported to have "babbled for nearly an hour in what is said to be the Greek language," though in her normal condition she disclaimed all knowledge of the ancient tongue. These involuntary utterances appear to be a part of the sign manual of the "Apostolic Faith Movement," which we are informed by the writer in the Weselyan Methodist (Syracuse), "originated in the pentacostal experiences of Evangelist Charles F. Parham and colaborers in Topeka, Kansas, in A. D. 1900, January 1." At that time a Miss Agnes Ozman, a member of the Bible school previously founded by Mr. Parham, "received the gift of the Holy Spirit and spoke with other tongues as the Spirit gave utterance." On January 3 following "twelve students were filled with the Holy Ghost and spoke with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance, while some in the room were said to have seen cloven tongues of fire, as they appeared on the day of Pentecost." In these events is said to reside the origin of a more or less wide-spread movement frequently referred to as the "present Pentecost." The adherents of this movement make the claim that "speaking with tongues" is "the only Bible evidence of the baptism of the Holy Ghost." An examination of the manifestations was made by S. A. Manwell and reported by him in the Weselyan Methodist (February 20). He writes as follows:

"Those with whom the writer has talked who claim this gift, say that the Spirit takes possession of their vocal organs and uses them as he wills, while their minds are at rest. They say they are conscious that their vocal organs are being used, but do not know how, nor do they know what they are saying. They have no power to stop speaking when once the Spirit possesses them. In the meeting I attended, two women were thus wrought upon. One remained in that condition four or five minutes; the other but a few seconds. The first indication I had of anything out of the ordinary was a low muttering sound without articulation. This muttering lasted but a few seconds, then the voice raised to a more natural tone and volume and it would be hard to imagine how a more rapid succession of sounds could come from the mouth of a human being. For the most part, these sounds appeared to be articulate, but if she spoke a language, no one knew it. She herself knew not the meaning of any sound she made. In the same series of meetings, on another occasion, another lady was similarly possessed, and when it was time to go home her tongue was yet speaking, and instead of taking a street-car, as she had formerly done, she walked, not desiring to enter a car with her vocal organs beyond her control. If I remember correctly, her tongue did not cease until she had nearly or quite reached her home. Some are said to have spoken in as many as twelve different languages, but in all this I had no evidence that what they uttered were languages of earth or heaven. That these people were sincere in their belief that the Spirit of God was moving them, I have no doubt. They believed they were talking a foreign language."—Literary Digest, March 9, 1907.

THE RED GOD'S CALL.

Doctor Woods Hutchinson paints, in the current issue of Harper's Magazine, the reverse side of the farmer's life.

Much has been written of the freedom and independence of the man who tills the soil; and of the exaltation which comes from living near to Nature, of the care-free existence of the man who follows the plow and plucks daisies from the furrow, stopping to indulge in "Bobbie" Burns' meditations.

Doctor Hutchinson believes that the other side should be written about. He has taken upon himself the task of informing the public, which knows the farmer and his life only by hearsay, of the reason why the farmer grows old early. Says Doctor Hutchinson:

"Any one who has lived on a farm does not need to be told the reason, for he knows of the strain under which the American farmer lives during the five months of spring and summer. His workaday is from four or five o'clock in the morning until eight or nine o'clock at night, including chores—fifteen to seventeen hours of the hardest kind of physical labor, and every minute of it at high tension, especially during harvest. Then comes a period of relaxation in the fall, the one time in the year when he has just enough muscular exercise to keep him in health. Later, the winter season, approaching stagnation, in which he takes on flesh, gets 'logy,' and then a furious debauch of hard labor through the spring and summer again. No wonder that by forty-five he has had a sun-stroke and 'can't stand the heat,' or has 'a weak back,' or his 'heart gives out,' or chill 'makes him rheumatic'; and when you add to this furious muscular strain the fact that the farmer sees his income put in peril every season, and his very home every bad year, so that each unfavorable change in the weather sets his nerves on edge, it can be readily imagined that the real 'quiet, peaceful country life' is something sadly different from the ideal."

Here is an iconoclast bolder than his fellows. For many a year the glories of farm life, the call of the red gods in the springtime, have been sung. Along comes Doctor Hutchinson and opposes the red gods, advises against the wander lust, the call of the flowing road. It is rank treason.—The Register and Leader, March 1, 1907.

Original Poetry

Life's Lesson.

If thou wouldst another teach,
Life's lessons now to know,
Be sure the knowledge thou possess
Ere to others thou'dst bestow.
That knowledge gained through pain and loss,
And sleepless weary hours,
Lifts up thy soul above the dross,
And gives thee longed-for powers—
The power to help, the power to live,
The power to love, and share
The weary load of others' woes,
While Christ thy burdens bear.

IVY CARPENTER FISHER.

Rejoice, Rejoice.

Tune:—Marching through Georgia.
Shout aloud, hosanna Saints!
And sing a glad new song
Sing it with the spirit
And the joyful notes prolong,
Sing it as we hope to sing it
With the ransomed throng
When we are safe over Jordan.

CHORUS.

Rejoice! Rejoice! the Gospel makes us free,
Rejoice, rejoice and faithful ever be,
So we'll sing the chorus let it ring from sea to sea
While we are nearing the Jordan.

Let us be united
And Jehovah praises sound,
Let no root of bitterness
In any heart be found,
We'll send the glorious gospel
To earth's remotest bound,
While we are nearing the Jordan.

The blessed, "Whosoever"
Means, all the world, to-day
Come all ye heavy laden
The gospel call obey
Find the "rest" most precious
In the straight and narrow way,
While you are nearing the Jordan.
We know the bridegroom's coming
To claim his chosen bride
So hasten and be ready
The door is open wide
And all who will may enter
And evermore abide Safe on the other side of Jordan.

Mothers' Home Column

EDITED BY FRANCES.

"My Yoke is Easy."

All ye that heavy laden are,
Come unto me and rest,
My yoke is easy; put it on,
And lean upon my breast.
Take courage; never fear, although
The angry billows rise,
And dash against thy feeble bark;
It never will capsize.

My yoke will be thy anchorage,
When storms are raging near;
Steer bravely on through darkest night,
The morning will appear.

The lovely sun will shine as bright,
As though no storm had tried
To wreck and sink thy feeble bark,
Upon the ocean, wide.

Thy heart will thrill with thankfulness,
To know God's words are sure,
To those who onward strive in faith,
And to the end endure.

"Better To-day."

He was pale and sick. You would know just by looking into his face that he suffered all the time, and yet, whenever one met him and asked after his health, back would come the cheery response:

"Better to-day, thank you!"

Better to-day! How much good it does us to meet one with such a disposition always to look on the bright side. There are so few who do it. The difficulties of life seem so immense; the obstacles we meet from day to day grow to be such gigantic things, and the trials we have to encounter rise up to be so tremendous in their proportions, that we do not know how to say from a full heart, "It is better with us to-day than it was yesterday."

And yet, why should we not say it? What does that beautiful verse say?

"We rise by the things that are under our feet;
By what we have mastered of good and gain;
By the pride deposed and the passion slain,
And the vanquished ills that we hourly meet."

Not in spite of these things, but by reason of them. The very lesson to-day which seems so almost unconquerable, if thoroughly mastered, becomes a help in to-morrow's work.

To-day a letter came to me from a lad who is very dear to me. A few months ago he told me how hard it was for him to translate the first chapters of Cæsar. Hear him to-day:

"We are having the fourteenth chapter of Cæsar now. It is quite hard, but not nearly so hard as when I began. I can read it much easier than I could then."

Better to-day. Ah, yes!

You would like to be able to run three or four miles without feeling exhausted when you reach the goal. Many young men have just such an ambition, and, within proper bounds, it is a worthy one. How would you set about it? Would you start out some morning, with no previous practice, and try to run the four miles? I know a lad who did and he was wiser after that. He sprained one of his ankles and was so lame for days afterward that he could hardly walk, saying nothing about running.

But had he set about it moderately, running a little way each day, and lengthening the distance as his muscles became stronger and more used to this violent exercise, by and by the time would have come when the four miles would tire him but little. Then he might have been able to say, "Better to-day, thank you."

Better to-day. Can we say it of the heart's great purposes? The years run swiftly on. They bring added burdens and greater responsibilities. Has grace come to bear them? How wise dear old Paul was when he told about "growing in grace"! Better to-day. Better able to stand up against temptation. Better worthy to be accounted as one who has really and truly conquered in the great battle of life. More fit to be numbered among those who, by keeping their bodies under, are able, therefore, to "run, not as uncertainly; to fight, not as one that beateth the air."

It is a grand thing to be able to say, "Better to-day." It shows progress in our own lives. It tells that we are really rising by what is under our feet. The world is helped by our firm and earnest report of victory. There never was a time when the world more needed young men and women who can look up through the questionings of the age and calmly say:

"I am sure I am not mistaken in what I believe. It is better with me now than it was when I began. I see clearly to-day what was not quite so plain to me yesterday. As I have gone on, the shadows have vanished and instead has come the clear sunlight. What I held so firmly in my hand a little while ago as being of supreme worth has slipped away, and I have now more precious jewels. I am leaving the things which I thought so wonderfully grand once, far behind me, and am coming nearer to the purer and holier things promised by the Father to those who diligently seek him."

Bad Art; Worse Morals.

One of the worst features of the Sunday newspaper is its so-called "comic supplement." Its splashes of crude color daubed over crude drawings have nothing to do with art except to dwarf and deform all artistic ideas in the minds of those into whose hands they happen to come. The "wit" of these atrocities is even coarser and more degrading than the pictures. How any boy or girl can be encouraged in a taste for these depraved and depraving supplements is beyond understanding. It is almost as difficult to understand how self-respecting editors and owners of newspapers can so lower themselves for the sake of "circulation." The comic supplement is cheaply produced, and it catches the thoughtless and the empty-minded, but that makes the responsibility for it all the heavier.

It is no necessary part of a real newspaper, as is proved by the fact that great newspapers can be maintained without being vicious. A recent exhibition of original drawings and paintings made for an illustrated weekly has proved, if proof were needed, how the people responded to the self-respecting work of conscientious artists. There never was a more insulting libel on American intelligence than the one which takes it for granted that coarse and malicious practical jokes, illustrated by shockingly bad drawings, are all that the majority of the people, or even of children, know how to appreciate. The exhibit above referred to gives the lie to that slander, and it is refreshing to know that not a few newspaper men are becoming ashamed of their part in the comic supplement's degradation of the popular taste.—Epworth Herald.

Prayer Union.

Sr. Mary Moldrup, Norman, Nebraska, asks the sisters of the Prayer Union to fast and pray for her. She says, "I came here from Oklahoma two years ago to see my sick brother, and helped take care of him until his death. Four months later I took sick with tuberculosis of the lungs. The first thing I thought of was, If only I could get an elder here! We live in a place where there are but two families of Saints. We would like to live among the Saints, and have thought some of moving to Independence. Now, dear sisters, I ask your prayers, that if it be the Lord's will, I may be healed and live with my dear little ones. I know the Lord does hear and answer prayers."

A Rock of Strife in Zion.

[The author of the following letter was recently baptized by Elder Peter Anderson. He was a former member of the Utah church.—EDITORS.]

MR. J. D. STEAD, Lamoni, Iowa.

Dear Brother: I am in receipt of your letter. Am pleased to learn you are well and enjoying conference. I went down to Salt Lake City during the conference and attended a meeting held by my native people in their language. All the speakers referred more or less to the danger there was from an activity among Josephites, and the Josephites were referred to as the rock of strife in Zion. The church issued a lengthy statement to the world and also commissioned Sylvester Q. Cannon to publish the Doctrine and Covenants in Dutch. At night I addressed a good-sized audience, notwithstanding they were warned not to go there, and we sent them all home with at least something to reconcile in their minds. Bro. Briggs arranged for another Dutch meeting in two weeks hence. I send you herewith copies of my letter of withdrawal from the Utah church and my defense to the charge of apostasy. It was all read before the Bishop's court, but I was found guilty of apostasy and worthy of excommunication. Our papers here did not publish it. I wonder if the SAINTS' HERALD wants it. Do not forget to urge the conference to publish tracts in Dutch. I hope it will be favorably acted upon. The "De Groot" family attend our Religio and also went to Salt Lake and attended meetings with us in the evening.

Please advise Bro. Peter Anderson that my full name is Gerart J. S. Abels; born March 20, 1870, at Amsterdam, Holland; baptized March 4, 1907, and confirmed same date by E. C. Briggs and William H. Kelley. Kindly have him forward me a certificate of baptism that I may have it entered on the records of the branch at Ogden. We trust all is well with you and family. I trust the branch here will try to become more and more spiritually-minded. We held prayer-meeting last week. Sr. Briant is quite active as our secretary. Accept kind regards from Sr. Abels. Greet all our acquaintances, especially our Utah laborers.

In bonds,
OGDEN, Utah, April 9, 1907. G. J. S. ABELS.

SALT LAKE CITY, Utah, April 15, 1907.

Editors Herald: I am glad to say that the work is onward in this part; the prospects are brighter than ever before and we believe that good can be accomplished with proper efforts.

On the 13th inst. we were called to this place for the purpose of leading into the waters of baptism Miss Agnes G. C. Nelson, and on the same evening said the words that made Bro. Carl Lundquist and the sister above mentioned one.

We are trying to care for the work here as best we can, but are unable to meet all the calls that require our attention; however, we are encouraged in the good work and trust the time is not far distant when we shall meet with greater success.

Fraternally,
J. E. VANDERWOOD.

WAMSLEY, Ohio, April 14, 1907.

Editors Herald: I have been reading in the late HERALD about the General Conference. It seems to me it was a grand time. I would have loved to have been there. It seems to me that the Spirit of the Lord was present. I got a letter from Bro. Beatty and was sorry to learn that he has been sick for some time. I hope it will be the will of the Lord for him to recover and be instrumental in his hands in doing a great work yet. The brother seems dear to the writer, as he is the one who brought the angel's message to this part of the country.

Sorry to learn of the burning of the printing house, but glad to know that the work moved along. I am thankful that the HERALD comes to our home. May the Lord stand by the editors and give them the Comforter, which is the Holy Spirit, to help them in this great work. I would love to live near a branch and enjoy church privileges. We have to do the best we can, and trust the Lord, and live in obedience to the commandments. Dear Saints, let us be faithful until the end, as such will be saved in the celestial kingdom.

Hoping to endure to the end, and meet all Saints in the first resurrection, I am,

Your brother in the one faith,
J. T. MITCHELL.

Dear Herald: This beautiful Sabbath afternoon I feel a desire to write you a few lines. My thoughts are almost continuously with the assembly gathered together for conference at Lamoni, and I pray that God's Holy Spirit may guide and direct it, that all may have a happy and profitable time and feel glad that they were so fortunate as to be there. It was my desire and intention to attend, but circumstances caused it to be otherwise. However, I have had the privilege of reading each day's proceedings, which comes to me in the little Patriot, and each little paper brings with it a blessing. Besides this I have the HERALD, which is full of good things. I want to tell you that W. A. Smith's letter was a feast to my soul. His experience of weakness reminded me of the many such experiences my husband has to pass through while out preaching, but, like Bro. Smith, after he calls upon the Lord he always comes to his assistance, and, like Paul, when he was weak he was made strong. I feel to praise the blessed Lord, for I know that his promises are true, and, Bro. Smith, as you hoped, the Spirit of God rested upon me while I read your letter, and tears filled my eyes. I felt to praise my heavenly Father, for by this we may know that we really are the children of God, for his Spirit can not dwell in unholy temples.

Your sister in the one faith,
MRS. PAULINE RUBY.

LINCOLN, Missouri, March 25, 1907.

Editors Herald: We are here isolated from Saints where we can not go to our own church and enjoy good sermons and other good meetings as we have in the past.

Sunday, March 17, I went to Knobnoster, Missouri, to have our little son baptized. I think I was one who did appreciate the good sermons and meetings of that day. Six years ago there were not over a dozen Saints met there to worship. A prophecy was given that in time to come the church there would be filled with Saints. Now there are over two hundred Saints in that branch. I think that looks like the hastening-time.

Now we are not out of Zion here; Saints who are too poor to buy high-priced land I believe could do well here. Land sells from fifteen to seventy-five dollars per acre, and will produce as good crops and some land much higher priced in other places. I will gladly send any interested party any information that I can give for sending a stamp.

Your sister,
E. C. BEEBE.

PETERSHAM, Australia, February 16, 1907.

Saints' Herald: It is some time since I wrote to your columns. There have been some letters lately containing matter for deep thought, from both brethren and sisters.

The various churches in this country seem to be waking up to activity, going out on the streets and parks on Saturday evenings and on Sundays, singing and preaching their various doctrines. The whole of the so-called Christian people seem to be badly divided, and confusion is what appears to be delightful to the many. The people here in Australia do not accept sound doctrine as readily as they do in the land of America. Why this should be I do not know.

A tent has been purchased by Bishop Lewis, and is being operated by Brn. Barmore and Haworth, assisted by several of the local officers, and willing hands of the Saints in moving and erecting the tent and distributing handbills, the instrumental orchestra under the able direction of Bro. Parks sounding forth that we have a message for the people truly divine, confirmed by signs following the believer in the doctrine. Already a fair number of strangers and foreigners to the commonwealth of Israel are attending the meetings.

We pray for a mighty revival, a pentecostal awakening; and that many may be added to the church. The Lord promised us some few years ago through Bro. John Kaler, at a conference in Balmain, that many would be added to the church in these islands of the sea, and if the Saints would live more faithful and humble before the Lord he would bless us in basket and in store, and would heal the sick amongst us. Hitherto the Saints had not been living well pleasing to the Lord. Also the voice of inspiration has been heard in tongues given through dear old Sr. Ellis, who now with her husband has gone to that rest that is prepared for the faithful in Christ, pleading with the Saints to be more humble and prayerful, and to put away from them those things that hinder their spiritual progress, which are displeasing to the Lord. The melting influence of God's Spirit has caused the Saints here to shed tears of repentance, and the whole assembly of the Saints openly confessed their shortcomings, and promised to live nearer to God.

All those things that Jesus told his disciples, heralding his second coming, are being rapidly fulfilled. Now what manner of people should we be, as Saints, seeing all these things are coming to pass before our eyes? Should not diligence and fervency of spirit characterize our lives, reflecting the light and power of the restored gospel to those around us, and we be found with oil in our vessels, and our lamps trimmed and burning, patiently and earnestly waiting his coming?

Be it my only wisdom here,
To serve the Lord with filial fear,
With love and gratitude.
Superior sense may I display,
By shunning every evil way,
And walking in the good.

In gospel bonds,

39 Norwood Street.

JOSEPH THOMPSON.

HAMONA, Saskatchewan, Canada.

Dear Herald: May the Lord's peace be with all the Saints, Amen. I write asking you to give my thanks to him who was so kind as to send me some of your papers, also to him who one day left a little book called Latter Day Saints—Who Are They? at a farm-house in Saskatchewan. For one day while out on a visit that little book was given to me, and after I got home I read it carefully, and something within me did seem to say, that what I had read was divine truth. (Now, before this I was much troubled, not believing in any of the many so-called churches; for they have not the gifts of the Holy Ghost, and therefore are not true. I said to myself, There is but one God, and therefore there is but one church; for the Holy Ghost can not become divided against itself. So I prayed unto the Lord to enlighten me as to which church of the many was his true one.) Then something else within me did say, May be it is the evil one trying to draw you into something displeasing to God. So for a time I was much troubled, and my neighbors told me that if I was wise I would have nothing to do with you, that you were impostors; and they spoke all manner of evil of you. And they gave me to read a book which related all manner of evil of you. So I read your little book, and also the papers so kindly sent, again, and lo, a light did shine upon the way. My prayer has been answered. I have found God in you, the true church of Jesus Christ.

Your loving brother in Christ,

JOSEPH F. WEBSTER.

Mrs. H. A. Cunningham, 198 West Ninth Street, Bloomsburg, Pennsylvania: "I wish the missionary in charge would send some elder here to open up the work."

News From Branches

TORONTO, ONTARIO.

On March 31 Elder R. C. Evans preached his last sermon in the Majestic to a crowded house. The past season has been the most successful yet held there. He preached twenty-one Sundays, and at each service the building was crowded, many turning away. The audience made an urgent request that he occupy in the theater again next winter. During the season many were baptized and the new church built.

Those baptized this winter are mostly young men and women between the ages of twenty and thirty-five. They make splendid additions to our Sunday-school and Religion. All departments of church-work are full of interest and the services well attended.

The young men of the church have formed an athletic association for the purpose of outdoor games during the summer. They are numerically strong, and desire to keep together in their recreations. We wish the boys a good time, and hope they will show by their conduct that our religion controls the Saint wherever he may be, whether in the church or on the ball field.

Elder A. E. Mortimer of London is with us since the departure of Bro. Evans for General Conference. He is preaching in the church to large audiences. Church was very nicely filled Sunday evening and Bro. Mortimer was blessed with good liberty.

Our branch has suffered considerably through sickness and death. Sr. William Norris of Toronto Junction was taken away after a short illness. Shortly after her death Sr. Alf Davis was called from our midst. A. F. MCLEAN.

LAMONI, IOWA.

The nice weather of Sunday drew a large attendance at all the services. President Joseph Smith was the speaker at the chapel in the morning, Elder J. C. Crabb occupying in the evening. Elder Hubert Case spoke at the Saints' Home, and Elder J. W. Rushton at Liberty Home. The attendance at Sunday-school was 578.

Plans are being perfected for the new Herald Publishing House plant, and the work of rebuilding will be pushed at once. Bro. Arthur Allen, of Holden, Missouri, will have charge of the work. Bro. Allen was a practical, and a hustling architect before entering the ministry. It is expected that the new plant will be completed by early autumn.

The Standing High Council of the church is in session here this week. The work of the council will probably be completed some time during the week.

Twelve were received as members of the Lamoni Branch at the April business-meeting. Three young men of this community have since been baptized: Loren Pitkin, Fred Sumption, and William Johnson. Alvin May, of Independence, Missouri, was also baptized here during the General Conference. Brn. Ammon White and Robert Elvin officiated.

TILLOTSON.—Saturday morning, March 22, occurred the sad death of our blind sister, Miss Carrie Tillotson, by burning, at between 5 and 6.30 a. m. She had been assisted by her sister, Mrs. Susan Welton, to pack her household goods, and to a temporary disposition of many of them by having them stored preparatory to taking up her abode at the Saints' Home at Lamoni, Iowa, where due preparations had been made to receive her and care for her during life. Last fall a mortgage on her little property came due, and she requested the church to take the property, pay off the incumbrance, saying several times to Bro. J. F. Mintun that she wanted the church to have what she might have left, if anything at her death. The brother wrote the Bishop and he consented to permit her to make such a transfer, and give her a life lease on the same property, which was done some few months later when the Bishop made a special trip to the city to talk over her request. The request by the Bishop at the time was for her to retain her properties, if she could make other provisions that would be satisfactory to her in meeting the debt on the place, and receive proper care, but she urged the church to take the property and care for her, and every preparation had been made by the church, and some near relatives, that she might be comfortable the remainder of her natural life, and where she would be free from many of the perplexing experiences she met with here. Her body was taken care of by the coroner, and at the Newlen Undertaking Co's Parlors received all the attention that kind friends could give. Funeral-sermon preached at the Saints' Chapel by Elder J. F. Mintun Sunday morning, after which the body was interred in the Waveland Park Cemetery. While she had in life made wise provisions for her comfort, yet she rests in a far more enjoyable sphere.

SOCIALIST DEFEAT IN GERMANY.

A typical illustration of the untrustworthy character of the daily press when commenting on news about which the plutocracy does not wish the people correctly informed was seen in the way the late German election news was given out, and especially in the long editorials dealing with the alleged crushing of the Socialists of the Empire. . . The one fact on which all these comments were based was the substantial reduction of the representation of the party in the Reichstag, it being cut down from 79 to 43, a fact which on its face would seem to warrant in a measure the scare headlines and labored editorials which sought to convey to the public the news that Socialism had received a great set-back. . . . But this fact of decreased representation is but part of the story. The Socialist vote at the last election was a little over 3,240,000, or almost a quarter of a million votes more than the party polled in 1903; and this enormous gain in four years does not represent merely the increase in the number of bona fide Socialists throughout the realm, for the reason that at the 1903 election the Liberals and Radicals, where they felt the Socialists had a better chance of election than any one they could nominate, supported the Socialist ticket in preference to giving the autocratic government and the reactionary Clericals an opportunity for using a pronounced victory to render possible the sinister plans in regard to the further limitation of the people's rights. . . . Furthermore, all the government, commercial, social, and reactionary influences were centered against the Socialists in the recent election, and a systematic attempt was made, not only to harass and discredit the Socialists, but to bring all persons holding their tenets into disgrace. When one remembers how much a powerful government, a hereditary aristocracy, a great capitalist press and other reactionary influences in society can do when they unite, it is amazing that over 3,240,000 voters dared to stand up and be counted for social democracy. . . .

INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM NEWS.

In quite a number of States this year the movement for establishing and safeguarding popular government by means of the direct-vote system has attained enough strength to become a dominant issue with the state legislatures. . . .

Maine: The statutory provision for the initiative and referendum pledged by the Republican party was submitted to the Maine legislature by Representative Weeks of Fairfield.

The bill provides that no act or resolution of the legislature shall take effect until ninety days after adjournment, except emergency measures and others of specified character, passed by a two-thirds vote of both houses. And if not less than seven thousand electors petition within the ninety days for reference to the people of any such suspended acts or resolutions, it shall be done at a general or special election, and if the act or acts are ratified by a majority of the popular vote, they shall take effect nine days thereafter.

Michigan: A constitutional amendment for the initiative and referendum and recall, drafted by the State Federation of Direct-Legislation Forces, has been introduced in the House by Representative Norton and in the Senate by Senator Bland. It provides for the initiation of statutes or constitutional amendments upon petition of 30,000 and the referendum of any but emergency measures upon a petition of the same number. For the recall of a state official a petition of 50,000 is required, one half of whom must have voted for the person who is to be recalled. . . . "Two hundred thousand intelligent men and women," says the Lansing Journal, "are actively engaged in the campaign for direct-legislation in this State."

Minnesota: Governor Johnson in his message to the legislature this year said:

"I would call your attention to the merits of the advisory initiative and referendum. This permits the people of a State, county, city, village, or town, to express their views upon questions affecting their organizations. The advisory initiative and referendum is but a step farther than the right of petition, and is not binding upon their officers. . . ."

In accordance with the Governor's recommendation, Senator Fitzpatrick has introduced a bill for an amendment to the State constitution, providing for the full initiative and referendum in state affairs.

Massachusetts: The Public Opinion Bill which is advocated by the Massachusetts Public Opinion League, with the support of all the direct-legislation forces of the State, is reported to have good prospects of becoming law. It provides for a purely advisory initiative and referendum in state, cities, and towns upon petition of three per cent of the voters, that being the percentage required to constitute a political party. . . .

Indiana: Representative E. A. Baker of Elkhart County, has introduced a bill requiring ratification, by referendum, of all public utility contracts and franchises. The bill takes the form of an amendment to the cities and towns law of 1905.

"Under the law the people have nothing to say concerning the letting of valuable franchises or the making of big public contracts, and they would be at the mercy of corrupt councils or boards," said Mr. Baker. "This is one of the most vicious features of the law. Complaints are coming from every section of the State on this score. Here in Indianapolis I understand there is agitation against renewing the contract with the Indianapolis Gas Company at a price of ninety cents a thousand feet, yet the people could not help themselves if the Board of Public Works and the Council were determined to go ahead. . . ."

Wisconsin: The legislature of Wisconsin has three important direct-legislation bills before it. . . .

Missouri: Governor Folk in his message to the legislature said: "Government by the people is best where the government is nearest to the people. I hope you will adopt a resolution for constitutional amendment providing for the initiative and referendum in legislation. This will eliminate the incentive for corruption in legislative affairs for the control will then rest with the people. Wherever the initiative and referendum has been tried—and it has in Oregon and other States—the result has been most satisfactory. It puts an effective stop to bribery in legislative halls, for bribery of legislators would be useless where the people are the final arbiter of a measure. I regard this as of much importance in the final elimination of corruption, and the establishment of true representative government."

In accordance with his request, the second resolution introduced in the House was a constitutional amendment embodying these principles. . . .

Rhode Island: A constitutional amendment establishing a constitutional initiative in ten per cent of the voters is now before the legislature of this State. . . .

Pennsylvania: Ex-senator William Flinn of Pittsburg, is the author of a carefully-drawn bill which has been introduced into the legislature by Representative McClough of Pittsburg. This bill is beyond question the best as yet submitted in any State. . . .

Oklahoma: The report of the committee on the initiative and referendum was formally adopted by the constitutional convention on January 26. The chapter is short and will be found in full in the April number of Equity. The Oregon law is closely followed. . . .

West Virginia: The Campbell bill providing for the initiative and referendum in this State has been defeated in the Senate.

California: Under the amendment [introduced by Senator Caminetti] the legislative power of the State would be vested in the Senate and Assembly, as yet present, but the people would "reserve to themselves the power to propose laws and amendments to the laws, and to enact or reject the same at the polls, independent of the legislature. They would also reserve the power to approve or reject at the polls any act of the legislature." . . .

The new city charter of Alameda has been approved by the legislature. This is a progressive document and contains the referendum feature which is now being incorporated in all modern charters.

By the adoption of a new charter at the election Tuesday the city of Santa Cruz brought itself into the front rank of up-to-date municipalities. Its charter embodies the latest ideas in municipal government, including direct-legislation. The "recall" proposition which was put to the voters separately was carried by a vote of five to one. This shows the sentiment of the people in regard to resuming the right of self-government.

PUBLIC-OWNERSHIP NEWS.

. . . The fight for public ownership of street-cars has only just begun and is largely confined to a few localities where it is full of interest and significance. The great fight, however, that is being waged to-day in municipalities throughout the land, between the public-service corporations and the people, is on the subjects of electric lights, gas, and possibly telephones. Probably few people realize how many victories are won for the people's cause in this struggle. While many of the towns and cities which are establishing their own plants are among the smaller-sized communities, the movement is gaining strength as well in some of our metropolitan cities. During the past two months we have received news of steps being taken in establishing municipal electric-light or gas-plants in thirty-seven cities and towns [in the United States].

Cleveland's Street-cars: After a long and bitter fight the Cleveland Electric Company has been compelled to accede to Mayor Tom L. Johnson's first demand and the people of Cleveland are now enjoying three-cent car-rides throughout the city. . . . Concerning this movement Mayor Johnson has recently said:

"The principal advantage in municipal-ownership is the removing of the public service from the influence of an interest that never sleeps, that never rests, but is constantly alive to the interests of its stockholders, which are averse to public interest. This influence, I think, is the chief cause of bad government, for so long as you offer such an immense price in the way of public franchise grabs, franchise-seekers will be sure to corrupt your government. It is not the benefit of low fares, nor betterment of service, that stimulates me to what is called an attack on public corporations, but it is the purification of the political situation in the great cities. Remove that handicap and you give the municipality opportunity to accomplish a great many things to make the city a better place for the people to live in."

South Norwalk, Connecticut: One of the most instructive instances of municipal-ownership in this country is furnished by the Municipal Electric Works of South Norwalk. . . . During the first six years the plant furnished city light only. Since 1898 it has done commercial lighting. . . . Last year's receipts were $39,077 . . . a net gain of $12,584, or 10% per cent on the entire cost of the plant. . . .

Burlington, Vermont: The Board of Electric Light Commissioners has made its first report covering a year's service of the plant. The total earnings of the plant are $24,136 . . . leaving a net gain for the year of $3,932. . . .

Springfield, Illinois: The daily papers are making much of the so-called failure of the municipal electric-lighting plant of Springfield, Illinois. The reason for this noise is that a private company has had power enough with the city council to get an electric lighting franchise. . . .

Canadian Railways: A largely signed petition from the merchants and other citizens of St. George and St. John, New Brunswick, to the Board of Trade, asks that the New Brunswick Southern Railway be taken over by the Intercolonial Railway and made a part of the government system. There is much dissatisfaction with the service under private management. It is owned by the Russell Sage estate. . . .

Italy's Railways: "If the American railroads were nationalized, says the New York World; if a man could ride from New York to Philadelphia for 75 cents; if a drummer could buy for $240 a ticket to tour all New England for a year, riding when and where he chose; if a passenger could go from Bangor to Chicago for $7 on a board seat or for $17.50 in a parlor-car, we might understand the interest which the railway experience of the Italian government is creating. Less than three months' trial of the new state schedules, which went into effect November 1, leaves no doubt of the popularity. . . .

Japanese Railways: The Railway Nationalization Act passed by the Japanese government about a year ago was no sudden revolution, but rather the carrying out of a long cherished purpose of the government according to Henry George, Jr., in an article in the Times Magazine for February. The Japanese government has always looked upon the railroad as a steam public highway, that should, like every other public highway, belong to the public. . . .

NEWS OF THE CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETIES.

The great department store at Lewiston, Maine, . . . has recently issued its semi-annual report, showing the business to be in a healthy and prosperous condition, and the spirit as well as the form of co-operation to be firmly implanted in the organization. . . .

Rochdale Wholesale Company of California: At the last annual meeting of the directors of the Rochdale Wholesale Company of Oakland, California, six new local co-operative companies were admitted to membership. The manager's report showed the company to be in a prosperous condition, notwithstanding the earthquake calamity which with the attendant fire loss compelled the company to move from San Francisco to Oakland. The business of the last six months showed a net gain of $1,353, which overcomes the fire loss, and with the apportionments paid in by the local companies restores the capital. . . .

Napa Rochdale Union: Until the past year this company had been unfortunate in its management and sustained serious losses, but under the new management of 1906 there has been an increase in the business done of over $8,000, and a net profit of $1,897.

Healdsburg, Rochdale: This company began business in July, 1900, with a small membership which has steadily increased. . . . Eighty-one of the shares held by members have doubled themselves by their earnings. . . .

Iowa Farmers' Elevators: One of the most successful lines of co-operative effort in America is the organization of farmers' co-operative companies for the co-operative selling of their products. The farmer's co-operative movement in Iowa has in a short time reached proportions that command attention, and concerning which, something at least, should be known, even by the college professors.

The Farmers' Grain Company, Omaha: The Farmers' Grain Company is a corporation organized under Nebraska laws to enable farmers to co-operate in the selling of their grain.

A Co-operative Creamery: The annual meeting of the stockholders of the Tulare (California) Co-operative Creamery, was held recently for the election of officers, and the reports of the year show the company to be in a prosperous condition.

The Industrial Union: Mr. Andrew McConnell of Birmingham, Alabama, is organizing an industrial union in Alabama cities. A charge of one dollar a year is made as a membership fee. The purpose of the union is to promote co-operative buying by securing wholesale prices for the consumer, to save middlemen's and retailer's expenses, which is, in effect, the saving made by the Rochdale stores. Discounts of from twenty-five to thirty per cent are secured by the members.

The Canadian Co-operative Concern: This is a general department store located at Hamilton, Ontario. . . . Its growth since its establishment, about a year ago, is marvelous; with its recent extension it has 18,500 feet of floor-space. It requires about 50 clerks. The stock is held mostly by farmers of the surrounding country.

Negroes' Co-operative Store: The Reverend H. Taylor, pastor of the Shiloh Baptist Church (colored) of Elizabeth, New Jersey, has established a co-operative store among the people of his parish.

Hartford Co-operative Ice Company: The Co-operative Ice Company of Hartford, Connecticut after making a brave struggle for independence, sold out finally to the ice-trust, with an agreement from the trust that members of the Co-operative were to purchase ice at $3 per ton. Very soon, however, the trust began to charge then $6 per ton and the members brought suit. The decision of the court just rendered holds the trust to its agreement.

Co-operative Farming in Europe: From a report of the German consul in Belgrade, Consul General Richard Guenther of Frankfort derives the information that the co-operative system is making rapid progress among the farmers in Servia. At the end of June last there were 508 agricultural co-operative associations existing in that country. Of these 105 were established within one year. The total number of members is 17,858. The Central Union, representing these associations, last year expended $53,000 for implements, seeds, etc. . . . —The Arena, April, 1907.

The Creation Expressed in Music.

Had Kuhnau composed the "Appassionata," one can easily imagine that he would have called it the "Creation." He would doubtless have ascribed to those first three solitary notes the Almighty summons—"And God spake!" Then silence, for the space of a breath or an eon, until, soft and slow, there is heard a gentle stirring of sound—tones that glide over the keyboard like the Spirit of God moving upon the face of the waters. There are faint evanescent trills; another silence; then again those three solemn tones—the voice of Omnipotence. The rustling sounds that follow are this time less indefinite; the trills are firmer; the pauses briefer; near and far we hear a tentative response from out of infinite space.

Then with sudden impetus a wild cascade of arpeggios deluge the senses. Chaos is cleft asunder! That three-toned phrase again proclaims command. Then bursts forth light; a furious crash of chords that causes the piano to shake and the timbers of the room to tremble. Again and again these splendid chords resound, upmounting like a glorious sunburst. Presently, from out of this elemental sequence of sound, is evolved a wondrous melody—the song of creation, the tune of the infinite!

Rare indeed are the melodies that would be worthy of such a setting, but Beethoven gave to the world a gift of the gods when he penned the "Appassionata's" theme. When listening to it we can better understand why and how "God saw that it was good."

It is easy to continue the picture as the towering music rolls on—the gradual awakening of astonished Nature, the warring elements bridled, the moon and stars emerging at the call of that primal Voice. The first movement closes with a soft, reiterated tremolo. We scarcely hear when it ends, but at last a stillness prevades the universe, and we are reminded that "God rested on the seventh day."

The second movement is clearly the Garden of Eden. Such peaceful harmonies!—such a singing of birds and rippling of rills!—such gentle repose and absolute beauty! such perfect accord with never a passing dissonance!—it puts one in Paradise to hear it. Did I say there is not one dissonance? I must correct this; there is one—just one—the very last chord. The harmony of Eden is shattered. We know that something has happened—something awful and terrible, for that chord is blood-curdling.

The last movement tells us the rest. The angel with the flaming sword stands at the opening. That same discord—cruel, cutting, merciless—is uninterruptedly repeated thirteen woeful times. It is something to flee from. It leaves the heart crushed, the spirit broken. The awfulness of life then follows in tempestuous grandeur. There is no cessation to the end—strife and conflict, all in the minor key—the sins of the world let loose in music. The chaos of human agony sounds the final note of the sonata.—Mabel Wagnalls, in the April Circle.

OF IMPORTANCE TO THE CHURCH.

LOCATION OF THE HERALD PUBLISHING HOUSE.

LOCATION OF SECOND PLACE OF BUSINESS.

Under the Articles of Incorporation the Presidency, the Bishopric, and the Board of Publication were authorized to remove the principal place of business of the church from Lamoni, Iowa, to any other place which in their judgment would be advisable for the interests of the church.

When the HERALD Office burned, on January 5, 1907, it was thought by many that the publishing plant should be removed at once to Independence, Missouri. This created quite a sensation of alarm among the citizens of Lamoni, both those in and those out of the church, as it was thought that the removal of the plant from Lamoni would be a great detriment to the interests of the locality. The citizens of Lamoni took immediate steps to express appreciation of the citizenship of the Saints and the influence which the office had exercised during the publication of the HERALD in their midst.

The Presidency, fearing the effects which a counter movement upon the part of the Saints at Independence and those of the citizens who might join with them in an attempt to secure the location of the HERALD plant in that city might have, published a statement to the Saints, that no money would be asked for by the authorities of the church for the rebuilding of the office at the then present crisis. This effectually prevented any clashing of local interests one against the other and tended in a measure to quiet the apprehension and unrest among the patrons of the HERALD.

The ex-officio and delegate representation at conference was to an appreciable extent the largest we have ever had. Whether this was owing to the interest felt in the location of the HERALD in its old quarters, or its removal to some other district of country, we may not say; but we presume that it was. At all events great interest had been created as to the determination of the authorities upon whom rested the responsibility of final action.

On the first day of the session, Saturday, April 6, a communication from the committee of Lamoni citizens making an offer of $17,467.00 was read to the conference, and the final disposition of the matter was deferred until Thursday, the 11th inst., when it was taken up, and upon consideration a resolution was adopted expressing appreciation of the offer of the citizens and instructing the authorities having the matter in charge to rebuild the HERALD Office and bookbindery at Lamoni, Iowa.

It was further resolved by the conference as follows: "We think it unwise under present conditions to remove the principal place of business from Lamoni, Iowa." "We recommend that the authorities provided for in the Articles of Incorporation under the statutes of Iowa, establish other places of business as provided for in the Articles of Incorporation; and to further incorporate whenever and wherever the interests of the church may require."

By virtue of the authority and direction conferred by the preceding actions of conference, the Presidency, the Presiding Bishopric, and the Board of Publication met at the office of the Presidency in Lamoni, Iowa, at two o'clock, April 20, 1907, for the purpose of taking into consideration the duties devolving upon them under the Articles of Incorporation and the instructions of conference. President Joseph Smith presided and Bro. J. A. Gunsolley, Secretary of the Board of Publication, and Frederick M. Smith, Secretary of the Presidency, acted as secretaries. At this meeting, upon separate motions, the council authorized the rebuilding of the HERALD Office at Lamoni at the earliest time practicable, and the trustee of the church, Bishop E. L. Kelley, was authorized to accept the subscriptions of the citizens of Lamoni and vicinity to assist in erecting the HERALD Office.

It was also decided to place the new building upon the site of the old building, as nearly as practicable.

It was further decided that the building to be erected for the Herald Publishing House and Bookbindery should be fifty feet wide and eighty feet long, two stories high, with basement under the whole building; that the building should be built of brick and concrete, or other fire-proof material, the whole construction to be as nearly fire-proof as practicable to make it.

Offices in the new building are to be provided for the following officers: The First Presidency and Presiding Bishop for the use of these officers when in Lamoni; the Church Secretary; the Historian; and room for the library.

Bro. Arthur Allen was appointed superintendent of construction, to have charge of the building operations, and the Executive Committee of the Board of Publication was made the Advisory Board for consultation with the superintendent of construction.

To carry into effect the instruction of the conference in reference to establishing other places of business, as provided for in the Articles of Incorporation the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved by the Quorum of the First Presidency, the Bishop and counselors, and the Board of Publication of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints in official meeting, as provided by the Articles of Incorporation of said church, that for the purpose of further carrying on the work and business of said church as provided in its constitutional law, that a place of business of said church be established in Independence, Missouri.

Resolved further, that the Quorum of the First Presidency and the Presiding Bishopric of the said Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints be authorized to prepare for carrying on the necessary work at such place of business by securing suitable and necessary offices by the erection of such building or buildings for this purpose as shall be deemed proper.

From the foregoing it must not be deduced that the principal place of business will be thereby removed from Lamoni, Iowa. The Articles of Incorporation under the statutes of Iowa are of such a character that the establishment of the principal place of business elsewhere out of the State would lose to the church such privileges as appertain under the laws of Iowa, which are very liberal. It was considered, however, that the necessities of the work might demand other places of business as provided for in the Articles of Incorporation themselves, which provide that other places may be established if deemed necessary. Necessities may arise which will make incorporation of special work contemplated by the church necessary. This has been provided for by instruction from the conference as given above.

We hope this instruction to the readers of the HERALD, together with what action has been had in the minutes of the conference will show, will allay all anxiety in reference to the location of the Herald Publishing House at Lamoni, and of a legal place of business at Independence, Missouri.

The action in conference upon the resolution declaring in favor of Lamoni as the place of rebuilding the HERALD Office was one of the most spontaneously unanimous acts of indorsement we have ever witnessed. It was evident from the discussion of the question of accepting the citizens' offer to that of instructing the authorities having the matter in charge to rebuild at Lamoni, that the tendency of thought and the trend of spiritual instruction had been directed toward the end reached—the location of the HERALD Office on its former site. It became further apparent that the appointment of the two stakes—Independence and Lamoni—was a precaution designed to meet an exigency when it should arise; and it may be clearly understood how, that Lamoni will continue to be a stake for an indeterminate time, at least, and that no removal of all the business interests of the church will be made to Independence at any immediately early day.

While we may not have understood heretofore what may have been the design of the instituting the two stakes, it may now have a meaning to the Saints.

The conference just passed in many respects was one of the most successful and important ever held by the Reorganized Church. While the discussion upon one of the important subjects was somewhat warmly contested and some of the disputants grew vehement and denunciatory, the final outcome showed the intervention of the spirit of wisdom and mutual accommodation which does not ask for a compromise with principle or the truth. Those attending the conference should go forth to their allotted spheres of business and fields of labor with additional courage and zest. The preaching from first to last was of a high order, showing a decided appreciation of intelligent consideration of the grandeur and sublime wondrous reaching out of the gospel economy for the benefit of man.

Official notice of the action of the authorities provided for in the Articles of Incorporation in regard to location of the HERALD plant at Lamoni and a place of business at Independence, Missouri, will be made over official signatures in the HERALD and Lustige, in due time.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

The readers of the HERALD will discover in the minutes of the late conference a report from the Quorum of Twelve on the subject of marriage and divorce. This was considered for a time and then deferred until the conference of 1908 and made a special order for the fourth day of the session at half-past two in the afternoon.

We suggest that the eldership generally make themselves familiar with the report and the subjects covered by it, also that those who may have the book of General Conference Resolutions acquaint themselves with resolutions Nos. 272 and 412, and take into consideration the matter covered by these several resolutions, and make a brief of their examinations and conclusions sufficiently explicit and clear to cover their opinions and convictions on the subjects to be considered next spring.

We have no other suggestion to offer other than that it must be apparent to every thinker that Jesus did not intend that the innocent should suffer unnecessarily for the crimes of the guilty.

The Presidency would like that those of the elders who would be willing to do so, after they have considered the question to their readiness to represent their views, would send them a copy of their briefs for reference. It may be that by this means some friction may be averted at the coming conference, which would be desirable, if the matter is of the importance that some have concluded it was.

It must also be remembered that should there be action sufficiently differing from that had hitherto to make the one adverse to the other, there would need to be a repeal of the former if the latter should prevail.

We do not desire in this to make any suggestion as to the character of the argument of either side of the question.

HOW THE UTAH AUTHORITIES ARE SUPPORTED.

The opening address of Joseph F. Smith at the late General Conference of the Utah church contained one statement that may interest our readers. We quote it, as it was published in the Improvement Era, May, 1907, as follows:

Before I sit down I would like to make another statement. Our enemies have been publishing to the world that the Presidency of the church and the leading officers are consuming the tithes of the people. Now, I am going to tell you a little secret, and it is this: There is not one of the general authorities in the church that draws one dollar from the tithes of the people for his own use. Well, you may say, how do they live? I will give you the key: The church helped to support in its infancy the sugar industry in this country, and it has some means invested in that enterprise. The church helped to establish Z. C. M. I., and it has a little interest in that, and in some other institutions which pay dividends. In other words, tithing funds were invested in these institutions, which give employment to many, for which the trustee-in-trust holds stock certificates, which are worth more to-day than what was given for them; and the dividends from these investments more than pay for the support of the general authorities of the church. So we do not use one dollar of your tithing. I thought I would like to tell you that much, so that when you hear men talking about Joseph F. Smith and his associates consuming the tithes of the people you can throw it back into their teeth that they do not use a dollar of the tithing for their support. I would like our "friends," if I might be permitted to use a vulgar expression, to "put that in their pipe and smoke it." (Laughter.)

We have not yet attempted to smoke this statement, not being addicted to narcotics or opiates, but thus far we have failed to discover the difference between appropriating tithes and appropriating the proceeds of the tithes after they have been invested in private enterprises; more especially when no statement is ever made as to the amount thus invested or the amount of proceeds yearly placed at the disposal of the church authorities.

GENERAL CHURCH ITEMS.

The Independent Patriot has this to say of the way in which the question of locating the HERALD Office was settled: "The broad and unselfish way in which the matter was considered and decided, deserves commendation and emulation; especially the spirit manifested by the people of Independence, Missouri. This unselfish spirit is the hope of the world."

In his sermon in the tabernacle at Salt Lake City, April 21, Joseph F. Smith declared, "If we love to serve the Lord, there is no difficulty in doing it." Before the Senate committee, in Washington, March 3, 1904, the same individual admitted that he was then living in disobedience to the law of God, as well as the law of the land, and declared his intention to so continue. Men may draw their own conclusions.

CURRENT EVENTS, SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS.

Shilo, Maine, is the seat of the "Holy Ghost and Us" Society, at whose head stands Frank W. Sandford. The church property is on the county records in the name of "Lord God Almighty, Frank W. Sandford, trustee." According to press reports the whereabouts of the party of the second part is unknown. Some time during last summer the society set sail for Palestine on board the barkentine Kingdom. The vessel returned to Portland, April 26, with all members still on board, with the exception of Sandford. They stated that he deserted them last January.

The Reverend Thaddeus A. Snively has resigned the charge of the St. Chrysostom's Church (Episcopal) in Chicago, because, as he declares, his flock loves automobiling and golfing more than Sunday worship. The rector declares that the whole world is going pleasure mad.

As a fitting accompaniment to the peace congress, New York City took up its crusade against the too prevalent custom of carrying concealed weapons. Disarmament began at home, and several hundred citizens were divested of guns, dirks, and stilettos. The majority of the offenders were Italians.

The American Peace Conference recently held in New York City was a notable affair. Thousands of delegates registered from all parts of the country. Andrew Carnegie, Secretary Root, and many prominent business men took part in its deliberations. Labor was represented by Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, and other labor leaders.

From the other side of the veil comes a little news of encouragement. Boston spiritualists claim to have established communication with the shade of Robert G. Ingersoll, and he tells them that he has quit the practice of law and is now deep in the study of chemistry.

Wounded Elk, a full-blooded Sioux missionary, is organizing a revival movement in New York City. He has a wonderful flow of simple oratory, besides a majestic presence. The Great Father, he says, does not like to look down on the "great white way," as it makes him sad to think of the souls that are being wrecked there. New Yorkers may keep on smoking, as all good Indians smoke, but they should follow the example of Powhatan and use a pipe. If some of the folks could only sleep in tents instead of being cooped up in their little bird-cage flats, the Sioux evangelist says, the town would be better off. Wounded Elk has a white wife.—Kansas City Journal, April 25, 1907.

News From Branches

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

A number of our members have been to conference to imbibe of the feast of good things there obtained, and we are patiently awaiting their return that we may receive that which they can impart to us.

At our sacramental service the first Sunday of the month the blessed outpouring of the Spirit was enjoyed by all present.

Sunday morning, April 14, nine of the priesthood occupied the hour in a most acceptable manner. The priesthood meeting of the branch was held April 9.

Our Sunday-school and Religio are alive and working for the interests of the young.

A pleasant surprise was tendered Bro. and Sr. T. J. Elliott of Lansdowne by a number of their St. Louis friends April 6.

Visitors with us this month were Bro. Bruce, of Kansas City; Bro. Nelson, of Council Bluffs; Bro. Burne, of Indiana, and Bro. and Sr. Larry, of Mt. Vernon, Illinois.

Bro. Joe Swift, Jr., left Monday, April 22, to take a position in Utah. We wish him success.

Your sister in Christ,

E. M. PATTERSON.

FIRST KANSAS CITY BRANCH.

During the month past the weather has been quite cold and damp, something very unusual for this time of year. Much of the fruit is damaged. It seemed also to interfere with our meetings, both in number and interest; but since the close of General Conference we are having quite a feast.

Last Sunday morning W. W. Smith preached. His text was: We are coworkers with God. It was indeed food to our souls, contrasting the loving manner of Jesus with that of the harsh, selfish nature of humanity. It was indeed a comfort to the God-loving congregation. In the evening Elder W. M. Aylor discoursed to a full house on the subject of the second coming of Christ. It was a good effort.

Our Religio is progressing nicely under the direction of Bro. H. Sandy, and the Sunday-school seems to be very attractive, and much interest is manifested. Bro. David H. Blair, assistant superintendent, is creating a good interest with the school in the collection for the children's home.

A MODERN PASTOR OF A MODERN CHURCH.

BURDETTE BREAKS INTO "MILLIONAIRES' ROW" BY WAY OF THE CLERGY.

The Gentiles are lifted up in the pride of their eyes, and have stumbled, because of the greatness of their stumbling-block, that they have built up many churches; nevertheless they put down the power and the miracles of God, and preach up unto themselves, their own wisdom and their own learning, that they may get gain.—2 Nephi 11: 14.

LOS ANGELES, California, April 20.—Special correspondence: The biggest concrete building in the world, the largest auditorium in the west, and one of the handsomest and most imposing structures on the Pacific coast is owned and used by a church. It is the auditorium, the property of the congregation of Temple Baptist Church, a combination auditorium, church-building, and office-block. It pays a handsome dividend to the church each month. Reverend Robert J. Burdette, the famous poet and lecturer, is the pastor.

Engineers never knew just how far they could go with cement until the auditorium was built. The makers had faith in the cement and sand and water that they mixed together, and they built the great structure of those and twisted steel rods. The result is a great success, from every point of view. Engineers from all over the world watched it grow, and many of them have seen it since it has been completed. It has been severely tested and has proved mechanically perfect.

One of the remarkable features of the building is the dome, with a span one hundred and twenty-five feet, twenty-five feet high, made of cement and twisted steel rods alone. Another feature is the galleries, two of which are not supported by pillars, but are suspended on cantilevers, like the rest of the building, of cement. Another feature, added later and completing the auditorium perfectly, is the great organ, one of the three largest in the world, with ninety stops and nine hundred pipes. These pipes are not displayed, but are hidden behind the grill work of the proscenium arch. The tones of the organ range from the flutelike note of the bird to a rumble that shakes the big building. A complete set of chimes is included with the organ and can be played from the keyboard, which has five rows of keys besides the pedals.

During the week the auditorium is used for a theater and opera-house, and just now a big opera company is producing all the great operas there. A stock company produces plays part of the time. On Sunday the same great forum is used by the Reverend Mr. Burdette, who works into his sermons the wit and humor and poetry of his books and lectures that have made him famous. Reverend Mr. Burdette lives in a beautiful home on millionaires' row (Orange Grove Avenue), Pasadena.—Burlington Hawk Eye, April 21, 1907.

A DEBATE.

Recently in reading over some old letters we came across the following account of a debate. We wonder if it is in any way characteristic of more ambitious debates:

"SAN BERNARDINO, California, April 2, 1901.

"Went to Religio the other evening. Found a debate on the program, 'Resolved that the negro has suffered more at the hand of the white man than the Indian has.'

"One of the debaters was absent and I was asked to take his place and was told to stand up and argue on the side of the Indian. Well, I did so. When I got up to talk I really thought that the negro had had the worst time; but when I listened to my arguments a little while I became convinced that I had been mistaken.

"It was a splendid victory of logic over prejudice; and I surely was glad to hear the facts in the case.

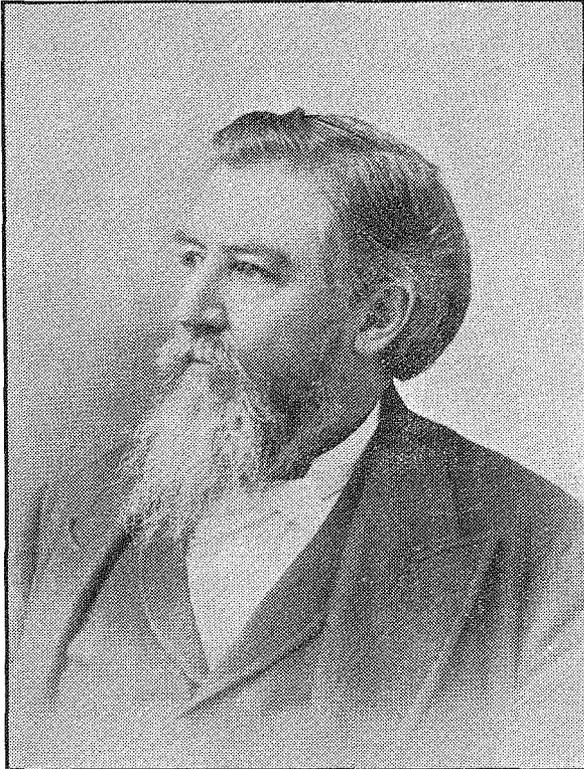

"An imagination is a lovely thing; my colleague and I painted the fate of the Indian in horrible colors, contrasting finely with the blessing of civilization and education showered upon the negro.

"Incidentally, we won out; but of course that was a secondary matter—our only desire was for truth to prevail.

PATRIARCHAL BLESSINGS.

ALEXANDER H. SMITH, PRESIDING PATRIARCH.

Alexander H. Smith was called to the office of Presiding Patriarch by the revelation of April 9, 1897. By this revelation he was also called to occupy in the First Presidency, which he did until released by the revelation of 1902. At the time of his calling to the office of patriarch he was president of the Quorum of Twelve, having been a member of that quorum since 1873. His official church-work began in 1862 when he was ordained a teacher.

For the great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand?—Revelation 6: 17.

But who may abide the day of his coming? and who shall stand when he appeareth?—Malachi 3: 2.

Dear Old Herald: There are some things which have come to my notice which prompt me to speak through your columns, to the members of the church, as I believe for their benefit, and while thinking over the matter which seems so important to me, the above scriptures came forcibly to my mind, so I head my communication with them.

I have for a long time felt impressed that the Saints do not rightly appreciate the patriarchal blessings, and when I have given much thought to the consideration of this matter, I have come to the conclusion that the reason for this lies in the lack of an understanding of what these blessings were ordained to be given for. In 1 Corinthians 12: 28, the apostle Paul says, "God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues."

I have quoted the whole verse, but I wish to emphasize the word helps, as it appears in the quotation. The Saints have been educated to believe in, and look forward to the day of great trial, when the Saints, the very best of them, will hardly be able to stand. It does not take a very imaginative mind to think that the scripture above referred to teaches us of just such a day.

The apostle warns us of the power of the adversary to deceive, if it were possible, the very elect. Now grant that such a time, or day, was foreseen, would it not seem in perfect keeping and harmony with the character of God for him to take especial pains to aid his people, that when such time shall come to them, they may be prepared for it and be able to stand?

Is it wise for us to have our eyes fixed in gazing or looking away afar off, to some distant epoch, and overlook the evil which lieth at the door? which may come, which will come to every one of us; which to many has come, and destroyed their faith and hope, and left them spiritual wrecks upon the shores of time. This is a mistake many are making. They are looking always to the final day of judgment to culminate and visit them with the deceptions of the adversary all at one time, and thus they allow themselves to drift along, easy like, not realizing what advantages the adversary is taking of the opportunities they are furnishing him. Doctrine and Covenants, 107: 38: "I give unto you Hyrum Smith to be a patriarch unto you, to hold the sealing blessings of my church, even the Holy Spirit of promise, whereby ye are sealed up unto the day of redemption, that ye may not fall, notwithstanding the hour of temptation that may come upon you." What I wish to call your attention to in this, is the fact that the hour of temptation may come to any of us, and we need all the help God has ordained to save us from it when it does come. It will come in this life surely, hence the warning and preparation.

Now I introduce the thought that God has ordained or set in the church this order, that the Saints may be furnished with a blessing, which is given as a help, to aid them in proving themselves faithful to their covenant.

I regret to say, it seems as if some of our people look upon the blessing much as if some one had told them their fortune, and some have come to the patriarch to have their fortune told, expecting him to tell them all about their posterity, and their own future, and their lineage among the tribes of Israel; and if the patriarch fails to do this they are dissatisfied, and if he tells them something they do not understand they are dissatisfied.

Not being satisfied they immediately seek to solve the mystery in their own way; they show their blessing to nearly every one, and ask them what they think of it, asking all sorts of questions, and seemingly to make confusion doubly sure, they sometimes go to the already dissatisfied ones in the church and ask them to explain the mystery, when if they would only wait a few days, weeks, or months, or peradventure years, they would see and understand it perfectly, time solving the problem by the fulfillment of the record. Now all this is wrong. If there are some things in their blessing they do not understand, it is but fair that the patriarch who gave it should be the first one to whom an appeal should be made for an explanation, before others should be consulted.

The blessings are given for the benefit of the individual and should be considered sacred, and if not understood the patriarch giving it should be consulted. Even then, sometimes the patriarch can not explain it; the one receiving or to whom the blessing is being given and the Spirit may be the only ones who may have a knowledge of the subject-matter referred to, for oftentimes the Spirit warns and reprimands the individual who may be receiving, in a manner that only the one most interested may know what the circumstances of the error or transgression may have been. A rebuke or reproof may thus be given, without accusation, and much good may result to the individual, if heeding the admonition of the Spirit.

And another view is taken by some: It is assumed that the patriarch is inspired to such an extent that he knows, or ought to know, whether the party seeking a blessing is worthy or entitled to a blessing or not, forgetting that if such power were given to him it would constitute him a judge, with the wisdom and power to pronounce judgment and condemn without a hearing or trial, a power which our Savior did not claim nor exercise.

Again, too many seem to think that what is said in their blessing ought to immediately come to pass, and if in a year or two the conditions which perchance may be foreshadowed in the blessing do not materialize or come to pass, why of course the prophetic character of the blessing is false, and straightway the patriarch is a false prophet, when if time be allowed, the conditions may come to pass and prove the truth of the blessing. It should be remembered that many times a blessing is of a character that it covers a lifetime in its scope, hence the Saints should not be too hasty in condemning it. It is written, "The spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets." Hence sometimes the patriarchs may be impressed concerning events and individuals, when it would clearly be prejudicial to the party were such impressions made a matter of record, but a warning or gentle rebuke given thus, made a record, for the private use and admonition of the one most interested, may save the erring one from trouble along like lines in the future.

Again, some look upon promises made in the patriarchal blessing as being made without conditions, and if they fail, as understood by these parties, at once the patriarch, or the system, the patriarchal order, is all wrong.

Is it not true that all the blessings of God are conditional? I believe that no one will deny that it depends upon the faithfulness of the child of God as to whether salvation itself will be obtained. It naturally follows then that to receive the benefit promised in the patriarchal blessing, the one receiving must study well the conditions, and faithfully comply with them.

There is a mistake made by some, in their interpretation of the sentence or words in section 107, paragraph 38, Doctrine and Covenants. "Even the Holy Spirit of promise, whereby ye are sealed up unto the day of redemption, that ye may not fall," etc.

It has been claimed by many in the Utah faction, or some who have come out from that organization, that to be "sealed up unto the day of redemption," endows the party with the right to eternal life and redemption without a condition, that they may do anything they please; so they do not sin against the Holy Ghost, or commit the unpardonable sin, they will be saved in the celestial kingdom, with the ransomed and the redeemed; in fact that they can do nothing to shut themselves out of the kingdom. This is a grave mistake, and men who have held this belief have sinned grievously before the Lord; at least so I have been informed. The revelations of our Lord expressly say, To him that overcometh shall be given eternal life; to him who is faithful to the end shall be given a crown of life and like promises made by the Lord.

Now what I wish to impress upon the minds of the Saints is, that a patriarchal blessing is something like a personal communication of the Spirit of God to them, and they should so cherish it, as if the Spirit had told them something sacred. While they are not prohibited from showing their blessing to others of like faith, it should not be made common, and exposed to the vulgar criticism of the unbelievers, who view them with eyes of prejudice and bitterness.

This is not because we are afraid or ashamed of what is written, but to preserve the sacred character of the ordinance. It is possible sometimes that prophetic statements may be made which fail to be fulfilled. We have known prophetic promises made to the sick by the elders when they have been administering to them, which have utterly failed. Shall we condemn the system of the laying on of hands for the healing of the sick because of such failure?

Again, how often have we heard, "Thus saith the Lord," or "Thus saith the Spirit," in our social meetings, when the subject-matter has been entirely out of harmony with God's word, and is evidently the result simply of a mistaken zeal upon the part of some one who is desirous of saying something of a spiritual character, which it is evident to the spiritual-minded they have not been authorized to say, but because this is the case, (it may well be the exception and not the rule,) shall we condemn the use of spiritual gifts in our social gatherings? The above instances are the exceptions and not the rule, and hence we should, and do, so treat them. Why not use the same degree of charity in the matter of patriarchal blessings? Now I pray you to study the object for which these blessings are given, and so use them as to be profited by them.

I grant you mistakes may be made; none of us are perfect, neither are we divine; but we are very human, and are also the servants of the Lord and Savior, and are learning by the things we are experiencing if not by the things we suffer. Now, dear HERALD, tell the Saints these things for me, that we may all come to a better understanding of our relative duties and obligations toward each other, and come to a unity of the faith.

A. H. SMITH, Presiding Patriarch.

A REPLY TO ROBERTS' "A SUFFICIENT ANSWER TO JOSEPHITES."

Mr. B. H. Roberts states (what he considers) the position of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and five positions held by the Reorganization against the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints or the Utah church. Then without any direct reply to the objections he makes this statement:

Technicalities and details aside, this is the attitude of the "Josephite" organization towards the Saints and the church; and it is to this attitude that this paper is to give "a sufficient answer," one that in the judgment of the writer will cover the whole ground of controversy, and be complete. An answer, in fact, that will be God's answer to the calumnies, and though it can not be hoped that it will close the mouths of those who have schooled themselves even "though vanquished to argue still," it is believed that it will be sufficient to satisfy the honest in heart who believe that Joseph Smith the prophet was an inspired servant of God; and it is also hoped that it will supply the brethren traveling in the ministry, and who occasionally meet with the objections urged by "Josephites," with material to expose the falsity of those things which are charged against the servants of God and the Church of Christ.

Mr. Roberts then relates the circumstances of a purported prophecy made by Joseph Smith to Stephen A. Douglass and the whole matter of the sufficient answer lies in that Joseph Smith made this prophecy:

JUDGE, YOU WILL ASPIRE TO THE PRESIDENCY OF THE UNITED STATES, AND IF YOU EVER TURN YOUR HAND AGAINST ME OR THE LATTER DAY SAINTS, YOU WILL FEEL THE WEIGHT OF THE HAND OF THE ALMIGHTY UPON YOU; AND YOU WILL LIVE TO SEE AND TO KNOW THAT I HAVE TESTIFIED THE TRUTH TO YOU; FOR THE CONVERSATION OF THIS DAY WILL STICK TO YOU THROUGH LIFE.

Mr. Roberts then tells of a lecture Mr. Douglass made against (a part of) the Latter Day Saints (the Utah people), and in his summary says:

Stephen A. Douglass did aspire to the Presidency of the United States. He received the nomination for that high office, from a great political party, but he had raised his hand against the Latter Day Saints, the people of the prophet Joseph Smith, and as a consequence he did feel the weight of the hand of the Almighty upon him, for his hopes were blasted, he never reached the goal of his ambition, he failed miserably, and died wretchedly, when his life had but reached high noon. Could anything be more clear than that Stephen A. Douglass felt the weight of the hand of the Almighty upon him? But mark you, these calamities came upon him for striking at the Saints of God in Utah. It was for turning his hand against them that he was disappointed in his hopes, blasted in his expectations, and died heart-broken. And when the Almighty thus vindicated the predictions of his prophet upon the head of this great man, he also did something more—he acknowledged the Saints in Utah as his people. The Church in Utah is his Church, and there is no escaping the conclusion. This prophecy was not fulfilled upon the head of Stephen A. Douglass because he raised his hand against the "Josephites"; that movement had not taken definite form when Stephen A. Douglass delivered his Springfield speech on the 12th of June, 1857. Joseph Smith who is now the President of that institution had not then given his consent to take the Presidency of the Reorganized Church, so that "Josephites" can claim no lot nor part in the fulfillment of this remarkable prophecy—the fulfillment of which is such a complete vindication of the Church of Christ from the charges "Josephites" make against it; and, furthermore, it should be remembered that this vindication came at the time when, according to "Josephite" contention, the apostasy of the saints in Utah was at its full height. That is, plural marriage, was publicly taught and practiced, and in part it was to this that Mr. Douglass, alluded in some portions of his speech; the doctrines which are supposed by "Josephites" to have led the people to follow after false gods, were then most taught; and yet, when from the "Josephite" standpoint, the apostasy of the Church in Utah is at its height, lo! God gives his people there this splendid vindication—so far acknowledges them as his people, that the man who dares to turn his hand against them—having been warned by his prophet not to do so—he strikes down with death after disappointing his hopes, humbles his pride, and makes him an object at which time would henceforth point his finger. Would God do this in vindication of a people who had transgressed his law, usurped his authority, abandoned themselves to whoredoms, followed after false Gods, and corrupted the priesthood? Such a thought is so revolting to reason that it may be dismissed without further consideration.

But on the other hand, what becomes of the charges of apostasy made against the people whom God thus vindicated? As idle tales are they henceforth to those who will weigh the force of the argument contained in the facts here set forth. I contend that there is no need of endless cavilings over technicalities; nor weary discussions over the sophistries of "Josephites." Here is God's answer to all their contention and calumnies. He owns his people, he vindicates his Church, by visiting judgment upon the head of one of America's foremost statesmen who raised his hand against the people and Church of God. I am content with God's answer to "Josephites." It is sufficient.

All we wish to do in reply, is not to enter into the truthfulness of the statements, but the wonderful argument of Mr. Roberts. The facts are, that the Latter Day Saints were scattered the world over, when the speech of Mr. Douglass was made, only a small part of them in Utah. But there were some there. That Douglass lectured against any of the Saints and that the prophecy uttered was fulfilled, in no sense would make that prophecy to mean that the Saints were living right or that that part of the Saints spoken against by Douglass were the only Saints, or that they were the true church, any more than when God in Isaiah, chapter 1, calls Israel "my people" (verse 3), and then compares them with Sodom and Gomorrah (see verse 10). "Yea, when ye make many prayers I will not hear; your hands are full of blood" (verse 15). Then, verses 16 to 19, God pleads with them to change and do right as he is doing through "Josephite" missionaries now in Utah. And he will again bless them through the small remnant of verse 9.

Again, Isaiah 3: 12: "As for my people, children are their oppressors, and women rule over them. O! MY PEOPLE, they which lead thee cause thee to err, and destroy the way of thy paths."

It does not seem to me because God recognized his people in error that he acknowledged that their leaders were the true servants of God, from this verse. Another parallel argument as a wonderfully sufficient answer to Mr. Roberts. Isaiah 9: 15, 16: "And the prophet that teacheth lies . . . For the leaders of this people cause them to err." Again God acknowledges his people when in transgression. Isaiah 58: 1: "Cry aloud, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and show MY PEOPLE their transgression." Jeremiah 2: 13: "For MY PEOPLE have committed two evils; they have forsaken me the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water." Verses 31, 32: "Wherefore say MY PEOPLE, We are lords; we will come no more unto thee. . . . Yet MY PEOPLE have forgotten me days without number." Jeremiah 5: 31: "The prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests bear rule by their means; and MY PEOPLE love to have it so."

Does not this also look as though God acknowledged his people even in apostasy? The Utah people are a part of the Latter Day Saints, only they are like those mentioned above. We love the people of Utah and want them to repent and return to God. God owns his people, no matter how wicked they get. See Jeremiah 7: 12: "But go ye now unto my place which was in Shiloh, where I set my name at the first, and see what I did to it for the wickedness of MY PEOPLE Israel." Jeremiah 8: 7: "called MY PEOPLE." Verse 9: "They have rejected the word of the Lord." Verse 10: "From prophet even unto the priest every one dealeth falsely." Verse 12: "Were they ashamed when they had committed abomination?" And again in verse 22 they are called "my people" by the Lord.

This is a parallel argument that their prophets and priests did not represent the true church. Jeremiah 18: 15, 16: "MY PEOPLE hath forgotten me. . . . Every one that passeth thereby shall be astonished and wag his head."

This is another evidence showing that God owned his people, and that he would just as well own the Utah people, only condemning their deeds. Jeremiah 23, all of chapter good. Verse 2: "Therefore thus saith the Lord God of Israel against the pastors that feed MY PEOPLE: Ye have scattered my flock and driven them away." Now as Mr. Roberts would have you believe, because God called them his people, why all they did was acknowledged of him his church, etc. Verse 11: "Prophet and priest are profaned, yea in my house have I found their wickedness, saith the Lord." Verse 14: "Prophets . . . commit adultery, and walk in lies." Read all of chapter as another parallel case wherein God in recognizing his people does not indorse their deeds nor their prophets, etc. Verse 22: "But if they had stood in my counsel, and had caused MY PEOPLE to hear my word: then they should have turned them from their evil way, and from the evil of their doings." Jeremiah 50: 6: "MY PEOPLE hath been lost sheep; their shepherds have caused them to go astray." See also Ezekiel 13: 1-4, 9, 10, 19, 23; also Micah 3: 1, 5. Israel fell so low that God would not hear them when they cried unto the Lord. In verses 4 and 5, we are told that the prophets make "my people" err, showing that God recognized them as his people even though they were so low that he would not hear them when they cried to him.

When God recognized the people in Utah as a part of the Latter Day Saints, or as his people, as Mr. Roberts puts it, from the light of the scriptures herein given we can clearly see that he did not recognize the church in Utah as his church. We have cited only a few of the many references in the Bible to sustain this thought. That God in Isaiah 1: 3 recognized his people when called in verse 4 a "sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity." Verse 5: "Why should ye be stricken any more? ye will revolt more and more, the whole head is sick and the whole heart is faint." Verse 6: "From the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it; but wounds, and bruises, and putrifying sores." Their Sabbaths, solemn assemblies, prayers, feasts, etc., were all rejected of God. This is the church and church services. So we see that the sufficient answer to "Josephites" is very, very insufficient and does not help their case at all. If the quotation made by Roberts is true, it is only another evidence that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God, and that God recognizes his people, even in sin and iniquity.

The argument might be raised that if the Utah people are acknowledged as God's people, that will settle the case, and leave the Reorganization out. That same argument might be raised against the small remnant of Isaiah 1: 9, "Except the Lord of hosts had left unto us a very small remnant," etc. God recognizes all Israel as his people, as herein shown. But he recognized the small remnant as his righteous people. And so the Reorganization is of the old stock and occupies the place to which the balance will have to come. As Isaiah occupied with the small remnant, so does the true prophet of to-day, Joseph Smith, the son and legal successor of his father Joseph Smith the Palmyra Seer.

In Elijah's day there was a remnant of seven thousand. (See 1 Kings 19: 10, 18.) Also referred to by Paul, Romans 11: 1-5, wherein he (Paul) refers to a remnant in his day; showing clearly that God when owning all of his covenanted people, especially approves the lives of the remnant.

GEORGE BARRACLOUGH.

DO WE ACT LIKE SAINTS?

Years ago when I first obeyed the gospel my heart was filled with joy and gladness because of having found the Truth. The doctrine perfect! Look at it as I would, it was wonderful! Examine as closely as I could, not a flaw appeared. The result was that I expected the people to be about as good as the faith they taught.

I well remember after having studied the Word of Wisdom and begun its practice, an elder came along and used tea and coffee. I was disappointed in the elder and in a vague way lost some of my zeal. Long since I have learned that those who refuse to comply with the instruction so lovingly given, simply lose the reward promised.

After a number of years I attended district conference. In the business session all was not peace and harmony. In fact it was far from it, and in consequence I had to re-adjust my faith in men, and found that like myself they were in a state of development and had as yet not reached the goal of "self-subjugation."

The good that I witnessed among the members helped me to do this, for all was not dark. However, I still cherished the idea that as I came to know those higher up in the work (as we term it), those who were leaders in the church, I would not see so much of the human, and a little more of the divine. At last I was enabled to attend General Conference at Lamoni, in 1902. This was the worst disappointment of all. But I no longer put my trust in man, for where I least expected I found weaknesses and faults. And again, when I was not looking for it, I found good. So, no matter where we are or who we are, we are only human, and the human is faulty.

But while I listened to discussions that grew into argument filled with sharp, personal thrusts, I felt, This is not the spirit of the gospel. Had there not been another side, I would long ago have been overcome with doubts.

Try as we may to get around it or excuse ourselves, the great test of the genuineness of this work is the result. What effect does it have? I am glad in my soul that I know of many who have been made better, are being made better all the time, by the gospel teachings. Individually the gospel is slowly but surely doing its work.

Then why, when we meet in conference, either local or general, can we not bring proof positive that we are disciples by showing that we love one another? Love is courteous; is kind; is long-suffering. "Do we look like Saints?" has been asked and I would add, Do we act like Saints?

If we do, then our task is comparatively easy, for the Bible, history, archæology, all prove the "faith" divine. It remains for us only to prove by practice that the results are sure. Let us ask ourselves daily, Do we act like Saints of God?

INTELLIGENCE, ENJOYMENT, USEFULNESS.

AN APPEAL DIRECTED MORE ESPECIALLY TO THE YOUNG.

The desire of all intelligent beings is to enjoy earthly life. Therefore, let us ask ourselves the question: In what does true enjoyment in this consist? It is recorded as spoken by Zecharias that the gospel was designed "to give light unto them who sit in darkness and the shadow of death; to guide our feet into the way of peace." Moreover, Paul, referring to the mission of Christ, says: "And came and preached peace to you which were afar off, and to them that were nigh."

To attain unto that condition of peace, or happiness, there are efforts required of us which we must conclude from the reading of the following: If you abide in me and my words abide in you ye shall ask what ye will and it shall be done unto you. If you keep my commandments ye shall abide in my love. Therefore there are two propositions for us to consider, namely:

How can we keep his commandments unless we are conversant with them, or his words abide in us unless we read and heed them? Moreover, let us consider that all "light and truth"—or intelligence—is independent; that is to say, it exists and acts of itself, a part thereof being the word of God. And furthermore that we have our agency in this respect which gives us the privilege of obtaining or not obtaining "light and truth."

The possession of light is not to have knowledge only, but power, mentally, morally, and spiritually. For God says, "Light and truth forsaketh that evil one," which means that just as fast as we obtain intelligence, will we cleave unto intelligence; just in proportion that we obtain wisdom will we become susceptible to wisdom. The consequence will be: We will love virtue, and within us it shall increase. We will love mercy and within us it shall increase. We will love justice and within us it shall increase and continue its course. Hence, Sydney Rigdon said: "Intelligence is religion, and religion is intelligence, if it is anything. Take intelligence from it, and what is left? A name—a sound—without meaning. It is designed to evolve the faculties—to enlighten the understanding—and through this medium purify the heart. It is calculated to make them better by making them wiser; more useful by making them more intelligent."

By what means is intelligence to be obtained? Is it not by education? Yes, we need a knowledge of our native language, because it was given that man might express and write his thoughts, and that intelligently, and, therefore, God has seen fit to institute institutions which call forth an exhibition of our intelligence and talents, and consequently we are developed therein.

If we do not worship God intelligently, what is the form of our worship? Rigdon has said: "A name—a sound—without meaning." If a person desires to be purely pious in the sight of God, he must be purely intelligent. Piety without intelligence is fanaticism, and devotion without understanding is enthusiasm."

Therefore, we can see that a knowledge of our native language will supply both ourselves and God with material to express our thoughts, and, aside from that, help us to think, and to acquire knowledge. And as all do not have the promise of the dictation of their speeches and writings, absolutely, as do the elders in their preaching, we can consider the following instruction as being true, with the exception of this fact: that God among his Saints helps those who help themselves. It reads thus: "The genius of remarkable men is method. Every one who speaks will find it of the greatest advantage to himself to have previously arranged his thoughts and classed under proper heads in his own mind what he is to deliver. This will assist his memory and carry him through his discourse without that confusion to which one is every moment subject who has fixed no distinct plan of what he is to say. And with respect to the hearers, order in discourse is absolutely necessary for making any proper impression. It adds both force and light to what is said. It makes them accompany the speaker more easily and readily as he goes along, and makes them feel the effect of every argument which he employs. Discourse has its possible power only when the parts, intimately united, exactly adjusted, mutually aid and sustain one another like the stones of an arch. As writers or speakers, without a strongly conceived plan, you will be without inspiration."

Again, have philosophy and science anything to do in our learning which brings happiness? Yes, they evolve our faculties, expand our understanding, enable us to understand and appreciate the things of God. They primarily accelerate unto perfection our intelligence, and where they end revelation begins, which is more extensive, more enlightening in its operation. It reveals what they (science and philosophy) fail to reveal. It develops within us fortitude, transforms us into the "glory of God."

In conclusion I will quote the words of Rigdon, as a cap-sheaf for the whole matter, which read thus: "It (intelligence) is that which forms the youthful mind. It is that alone which renders society agreeable and adds interest and importance to the worship of God. What is religion without intelligence? An empty sound. Intelligence is the root from which all true enjoyments flow."

THAT ORIGINAL TEMPLE BLOCK.

Reports reach us frequently that the Utah people are telling in different places both in America and Europe that they have purchased a part of the original Temple Block in Independence, Missouri, and some of the reports have it that they claim to have the Temple Lot.

It is possible that some or all of these reports may be erroneous, and that they have been misrepresented.

It will, however, be of interest to the Saints to know the truth about it. I will therefore place before the readers of the HERALD a description of the Temple Block as given by one of their own representatives, Elder James A. Little.

November 15, 1875, he wrote from Independence, Missouri, to the Editor of the Deseret News, as follows: "After breakfast we started for the Temple Block, about one mile west of the town. What is considered here as the Temple Block consists of about twenty-seven acres. The south-west corner of the survey is designated by a stone, which is nearly in the track of the wagon road running from Independence to Westport, and a few yards south of the bridge which carries the wagon road over the railroad running through here.

"The east line is a broad fence which was the western boundary of the old town of Independence. The road from Independence to Westport constitutes the northern boundary.

"The spot which we suppose is the site of the future Temple which the Saints are to build in Jackson County is the top of a rise of ground which slopes more or less in every direction, in the north-east corner of the plat."

Those acquainted with Independence will note that if the Temple Lot is in the northeast corner of the Temple Block then the east line of the Temple Lot is also the east line of the Temple Block.

This line being the west line of the possessions of the Utah people would leave their present holdings entirely outside of the original Temple Block.

We do not know whether the letter from which we quote was published in the Deseret News or not, but it was published in the Millennial Star, for January 17, 1876 from which we quote.

INTERESTING RELICS OF AN ANCIENT PEOPLE.

From time to time the explorer places Latter Day Saints under further obligations to him by reason of some new discovery that goes to substantiate the claims of the Book of Mormon. The ruins of Central and South America have come to light since the book was given to the world. The book described a complex civilization that formerly existed in those regions, and it is folly to suppose that Joseph Smith or any of his compatriots had any knowledge that in the then unpenetrated forests of a distant wilderness reposed the vast ruins that later would be unearthed to prove the truth of the book which they gave the world.

While these Southern regions have been most prolific of antiquities, interesting discoveries have been made as far north as Iowa. The Register and Leader (Des Moines), April 14, contained an article on this subject that may be of interest to the HERALD readers. We quote a part of it, as follows:

Not far from Newton, near the summit of one of the foothills on the north side of Skunk River, is a granite boulder, seamed with age, its outer layers weathering, or in other words, shelling off; on the two faces of this boulder are carved symbols, hieroglyphics, perhaps, forming what scientists know as a pictograph, and being the connecting link between us and, it may be, untold ages of the past. The top of the rock, which evidently came to a point, has been broken off and some of the characters have been defaced by the elements.

There are two faces, the larger one containing most of the inscriptions, fronting the south and the river bottom, while the other faces the east. The inscriptions are carved into the rock apparently by pecking it with pieces of sharp flint or other hard rock.

The stone has been visited by one of our most eminent anthropologists and also has been reported on by experts at Smithsonian institution, where pictures and tracings were sent. The characters are interpreted as being of religious signification and are those used by the most primitive people. They are such as were in use ages ago when the pages of history were principally made up of the crumbled bones, stone implements and weapons, fragments of pottery and ornaments which are to be found in the earth, beneath mounds and in the refuse of caves.

Much has been written about the findings in excavations in the so-called old world; around the ancient site of Babylon and in the pyramids of Egypt many of the remains and the property of the inhabitants of thousands of years ago have been found. Only in recent years has the public been pondering on the problem, whether or no America may have been the old world, the source from which civilization has spread.

The garden of Eden has been variously located by writers, any one of whom can support his claim by enough convincing arguments to fill volumes; for instance, the first home of man has been located in Greenland, which at that time was credited with being warm and salubrious.

No one should miss reading "Atlantis," wherein the original center of civilization was located on a continent where the Atlantic now rolls. Here man built cities, erected temples, sculptured and carved, and waged war and did many other pleasant things similar to what has occupied his attention throughout the remainder of the ages. The story tells us that by a great convulsion of nature, Atlantis was submerged beneath the sea; a portion of its inhabitants escaped to Europe, where in time they degenerated into the Dutch, English, and Irish whom we claim as our progenitors; the remainder moved to Mexico and Central America where they built the beautiful cities and monuments which Cortez and his brigands afterwards devastated; doubting this, you have only to read "Atlantis" and be convinced.

Others would have us believe that it was the refuse of Asia that crossed Behring strait and first homesteaded our glorious country, while still others grow more explicit and say it was the lost tribes of Israel that brought milk and honey here.

Well-bred Americans resent this; we claim, first, last and all the time, originality. Europe may have come back at us, after Columbus' time, but we shall always argue priority. The eastern plutocrats—we refrain from using the term, old world—had to come back here to get their tobacco and even their corn and such lesser articles of value.

Thousands of years since, Iowa, in common with other portions of the country, was covered by vast beds of ice called glaciers. In their movements these glaciers carried boulders—our Indian boulder was one of these—sand, gravel and like material which was deposited here, as the ice melted. The remains of man as well as many species of animals are found in this drift, showing that the country was already inhabited. Many years after this epoch the next evidence of man's occupancy was left by the people called the Mound Builders, who occupied the most of the Mississippi Valley. In Iowa there are thousands of these mounds. The race of people who constructed them has given rise to much speculation. The country must have been densely populated, the people living in cities and towns, to have accomplished such great results. They were advanced in civilization as evidenced by findings in the mounds; pottery with fanciful designs, stone and copper implements, and even the remains of cloth have been found; tablets on which are inscriptions and pictures are found buried with the bones of these old Mound Builders. In portions of the country ancient ruins in connection with the mounds, indicate still more the high standard of civilization attained by these aborigines. The ancient character of these mounds are proved in many ways which it is not in the province of this paper to discuss. Like all great problems there is a division in opinion, anthropologists differing in regard to whom these people were. However, the preponderance of evidence points to their occupancy of this country many centuries ago; perhaps long before our Christian Era; that they enjoyed a high order of intelligence, unmistakable evidence of their proficiency in building, mining, weaving of cloth, etc., testify. In time they were driven out by others more warlike, probably our American Indians, and it is believed that assembling in Mexico and Central America, they constructed buildings and public works, many of which were superior to contemporaneous ones in Europe at the time of the discovery of America, and that these people were finally exterminated by the Spaniards, following upon the invasion of Cortez and his ruffians.

Not far from the inscribed bowlder spoken of, is an Indian mound of more than usual dimensions—about 150 feet in diameter by 15 or 20 in height. Many of the mounds in Iowa are but a few feet in height and often plowed over by the farmer or are overgrown in the timber without being recognized as such.

Both the mound builders and the Indians who followed them depended principally upon stone for the manufacture of their implements and their weapons; near an old settlement may be found many such articles. . . . Arrowheads in abundance have been picked up and perhaps mark some terrific old battlefield. We only know that the mute evidence remains and that the details must be filled in by our imagination until, perhaps, in that great day when the heavens roll back like as to a screen, when all things may be revealed.

The Indians at the time of the early settlement of this country knew of and revered this bowlder; it was known as Indian Rock; they regarded it no doubt as they do all such as a symbol of the Great Spirit; a trail led to the spot and poor "Lo" made pilgrimages and deposited gifts. Not far from here and close to the sand hill where many arrow heads have been found is a high hill which they seemed to reverence, and there are numerous burial places in the vicinity, of the Indians of historic times, notably the Winnebagoes, Sac, Foxes, and others.

As we have the same license to exercise our imagination, accorded to all, so long as it is based on facts, we will interpret the story. Long ago, perchance, it may be when the Star of Bethlehem was making its appearance in the east, there were an intelligent people living upon the bounties of this productive Iowa land. They were advanced in a civilization equal to if not greater than the larger portion of Europe at that time. They worshiped God according to their own light. An important event, it may have been a convulsion of nature, a political upheaval, or a great battle, was commemorated by this inscription. On the south face are the symbols of creation, male and female; on the east face is the sun and the crescent, emblems of perpetuity. The details of the inscription we may never be able to decipher, but down through the ages this monument has come to show us that man was ever the same. He fought battles; he worshiped God; he was proud, for did he not thus seek to commemorate a deed of which he must have been proud?

If this paper . . . may stimulate research, then the purpose of this article will be accomplished, as this bowlder has remained unnoticed by science for untold years, so there may be many other interesting antiquities near us. In the historical building in Des Moines a stone battle ax found in this part of the State is the largest on record, while a large stone collar, evidently used in some religious rite, is the only one of its kind found this side of the gulf; fragments of pottery, arrow heads, and bones have been plowed out of mounds scarcely recognizable as such. The mounds of Iowa are arranged along the foothills of the rivers and larger streams; by intelligent research many more may be reported.

In the study of the history of these ancient people, fragmentary as it necessarily is, we may find not only entertainment but much that is useful and profitable, while it is all wholly absorbing.

The author of this article, Doctor E. H. Robb, argues that America has been inhabited from a very remote period of time. That idea agrees with the Book of Mormon, which teaches that the first settlement came here direct from the tower of Babel. According to Doctor Robb a second civilization followed, and at the time when the Star of Bethlehem rose in the East it was perhaps equal to the civilization of the Old World at that date. This corresponds to the Nephite civilization of the Book of Mormon.

SACRIFICE, SELFISHNESS, AND ZION.

The man, Christ Jesus, is our example. He was a being possessing wonderful possibilities. He could have made himself king of the Jews; in fact he could have obtained dominion over the whole world by one little act of obedience to Satan. Did he do it? No. He was a true king; he could rule himself. Thousands can command an army; but few can rule their own passions.

Jesus was tried in like manner as we are, yet he never gave way to the seductive whispering of a selfish desire. Wealth, pomp, and a life of luxury allured a man, beset with troubles, mistrusted by friends, and harassed by enemies; but the splendid volition of a God overruled the carnal nature.

Who will say that Jesus was not tempted by worldly things? If he were not, then God has deceived us in giving us a model, which we can not imitate, for the reason that we naturally desire worldly things and are enticed by them.

Are any of us walking in Christ's thorny path? We think some are. Who has experienced the life of a missionary? He leaves his business, thus sacrificing his means of livelihood. This means that he is to depend on some one else for subsistence. It means that some will say: "He is too lazy to earn an honest living; so is imposing on the good nature of others." If he goes to the home of a nonmember, a sickening chill seizes him every time he sits down to a meal. On the other hand, if he goes to the home of a member he is often treated with the cold handshake, the colder glance, and the coldest bed in the house. He tries to persuade his fellow Christian to assist him in obtaining a school-house in which to preach; but pessimism beams in the good brother's countenance. Perchance the brother has disgraced himself in the neighborhood by dishonest dealings, by reason of which every door is closed against him and his church. The missionary starts out alone and distributes a few tracts; but since the people fail to discern any fruits exemplified in the life of their neighbor they conclude that "faith without works is dead," and refuse the elder an audience.

The missionary is discouraged. He wishes in his soul that he could serve God in some other and more independent capacity. He gets a letter from his wife, who says she is lonesome. He knows that is not all. He knows that she is working and economizing continually. He knows how slowly the silent watches of the dismal night pass as she nurses her restless child. His own trials were sufficient, his own loneliness was well-nigh unbearable, but combined with all this is the depressing thought of his companion's hardships and sorrows.

Well, he intimates his condition to the comfortable-looking brother with whom he is staying, and that generous individual produces a little torn dollar and confidently presses it into the elder's hand, the while, his bosom swelling with the super-expansion of his philanthropic heart! He has a bank account, but no loose change on hand! He has forgotten how to draw out a check (?).

Dear Saints, this picture is not overdrawn. It does not express clearly enough the contrast between sacrifice and selfishness existing in the church of Jesus Christ, our unselfish benefactor. How long shall we selfish ones sleep? Have we forgotten the lessons of the past? "Change and decay," expresses it. We know not what to-morrow brings.

God gives us prosperity.

He can take it away.

Let us be liberal to the church and its ambassadors. It will pay us, when the curtain is lifted; we shall then be happy if we have sacrificed to bless the honorable warriors who bear the banner of the gospel amid the hostile ranks of the unthinking world.

We think of Zion, we talk of Zion, we sing of Zion, and we pray for Zion, but we shall never be able to pierce the dense mists of selfishness that surround the shining walls of the temple: we must scatter the fog. O selfishness, thou unmerciful God of this century, begone from Israel! Zion is a myth, so long as thou art king.

THE HERALD OFFICE QUESTION.

As most of our readers, if not all, by this time know, the HERALD Office is to be rebuilt here in Lamoni. We do not mention it for the sake of conveying the news now, as that has gone forth through various sources until generally distributed.

But we have two other things in mind, which we desire to emphasize. First, the generous spirit in which the matter was treated by those who could easily have been actuated by motives of a less worthy character. The broad and unselfish spirit in which the matter was considered and decided, deserves commendation and emulation; especially the spirit manifested by the people of Independence, Missouri. This unselfish spirit is the hope of the world; and a hope any narrower than the world is scarcely worth having. We commend it most heartily to the attention, consideration, and emulation of the people of Lamoni and vicinity.

In the second place we wish again to caution all against any spirit of either greed or speculation. If the immediate future shall bring a material prosperity in larger degree to Lamoni, let it be so received and manipulated as to be distributed among the many rather than grasped by the few. Let it be turned towards enabling many of small means to secure cheap and comfortable homes, rather than towards enabling a few to become wealthy at the expense of the many.

In other words reverse the ordinary rule of interpretation of the word prosperity. Generally we have been wont to regard a condition, where a few with immense wealth who allowed a few crumbs to drop for the many, as a condition of prosperity; whereas there is no real prosperity except in that more equitable distribution of the earth's bounties which makes possible the happiness and welfare of the many.

Let the citizens of Lamoni remember the lessons of the past, not only in their own experience but in the experiences of others; and give their influence toward turning the tide of prosperity so that it shall bless the greatest possible number.—Independent Patriot, (Lamoni) April 25.

NEW "HERALD" OFFICE.

The authorities of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints with whom the right is lodged by the statutes of the State to say where the HERALD Office shall be rebuilt, following the instructions of the General Conference just adjourned, have officially announced that the plant will be rebuilt at Lamoni, Iowa, and work has already begun, a gang of men being at work cleaning up the debris preparatory to beginning the work of excavating for the large basement of the new building.

Together with the announcement that the building will be located at Lamoni has been given out information concerning the building itself. It will be fifty feet wide and eighty feet long, two stories high, with spacious basement under the whole building. Brick and concrete will be used in the construction and throughout the building will be as nearly fire-proof as practicable to make it.

An experienced builder has been secured to have full charge of the work of building, Arthur Allen of Kansas City having been elected superintendent of construction. He is a builder and contractor of many years' experience, and has stated that he expects to have the building ready for occupancy by September.

The floors throughout the building will be of tile laid in concrete, while such partitions as are not of brick will be made fire-proof by using metal lath or building the partitions of terra cotta.

In addition to the main building, which will stand on the site of the old building, there will be separate building in which will be developed the heat, light, and power necessary to warm and light the main building and drive the machinery in press-room, composing-room, and bindery. Not only will the HERALD Office be lighted from this power plant, but the plant will be constructed sufficiently large to furnish power to light the large church-building, the Saints' Home, Liberty Home, and Graceland College and its dormitories and auxiliary buildings likely to be erected soon. It is contemplated that the power plant will be erected with an ultimate capacity of about one hundred and twenty horsepower, which will insure adequate power for lighting the present church and public buildings and allow a goodly margin for such buildings as are likely to be erected in the near future.

Remembering the experience with fire so recently had, ample provisions for fire-fighting will be provided by installing a modern independent water plant. The building will be modern in equipment so far as comforts are concerned.

With fine, spacious quarters, with modern, large, and speedy presses for fine book-work, each with its independent electric-motor, speedy folders, staplers, stitchers, paper-cutters, knife-grinders, routing-machines, electrotyping, jobbers, polishers, a well-equipped machine-shop, linotypes, modern office furnishings, an up-to-date bindery with adequate improved machinery, the new Herald Publishing House and Bindery will be one of the finest print-shops in the State, and the Chronicle welcomes it.

The church authorities are to be congratulated upon the determined zeal with which they have set about supplanting the burned plant with a fully equipped modern print-shop and bookbindery.

The cost of construction of the main building with its power-plant building is estimated at about twenty thousand dollars. About twenty-five thousand dollars will be spent for machinery and other equipment.—Lamoni Chronicle, April 25.

"HERALD" OFFICE AT LAMONI TO BE A FINE PLANT.

The question of rebuilding the HERALD printing plant at Lamoni having been definitely settled at the recent general conference of the Latter Day Saint Church held at Lamoni, the work of rebuilding will be pushed as rapidly as possible, a force of men being already at work clearing off the rubbish of the old building. The new building will be rebuilt on the site of the old one, and will be modern in every respect. The building will be constructed of concrete and brick, fifty by eighty feet, two stories and full basement. All the floors will be of tile and the building will be practically fire-proof. It will be equipped with electric-lights, steam heat and waterworks, a separate building being used as a power and heating plant, and the electric plant will be sufficient to supply electric lights to the College, Old Folks' Home, Liberty Home, and the church. All the machinery in the new building will be run with individual motors. The equipment of the printing-office will be the very latest, two linotype machines having been ordered in addition to one now being used at Lamoni. The building will cost twenty thousand dollars to twenty-five thousand dollars and with the equipment will represent not less than fifty thousand dollars. Arthur Allen, a well-known contractor of Kansas City, will have charge of the construction of the new building and promises that it will be completed by September 1.—Leon Reporter, April 25.

LATTER DAY SAINT VIM AND ENERGY.

On Friday morning just before adjournment [of the conference] the Presidency, consisting of Joseph Smith with Fred M. Smith, of his right, and R. C. Evans, of his left, announced the assignment of the twelve apostles to their fields of activities for the ensuing year and the Presidency and the twelve apostles made the assignment of the high priests and elders. Most of these appointees were sent to new fields—some being pleased and others displeased, yet all going forth with the vim and determination characteristic of a genuine Latter Day Saint.

In view of the great importance of the question to the membership, the question of marriage and divorce went over until the fourth day of the next conference.

In spite of the ugly conduct of the weather man the visiting Saints seemed to fall deeply in love with Lamoni, many buying property or making arrangements to buy at some future time. The two main acts of the conference to contribute to the desire of the Saints to invest in Lamoni property and at some time to make the town their future home, were passing the resolution proclaiming Lamoni the permanent headquarters of their favorite denomination and the motion that carried so unanimously to rebuild the HERALD Office at that place.

Before the conference had hardly adjourned the plans and specifications of the new HERALD Office had been adopted. The structure will be a magnificent brick building fifty by eighty feet, two stories high with a full story basement under all. The partition-walls will be made of cement and the structural parts of steel and roof of slate. It will be as near fire-proof as it is possible to make it. The plant will be furnished with every modern convenience. The manager, F. B. Blair, has already ordered two of the very best linotype machines, new presses, new type, and new fixtures. Work was commenced for the new building early Monday morning by clearing off the old site and getting ready to excavate for the large basement. The erection of the great building will be pushed as fast as possible. Lamoni and the rest of the county is to be congratulated on the promise of so magnificent a structure.—Decatur County Journal, April 25.

"BLACK HAND" BUSY.

NEW YORK, April 23.—Viago Mardone, a prosperous Italian merchant who did not comply with the demands in four "Black Hand" letters received by him last week, threatening his life unless he paid the blackmailers $1,000, was found in his apartment in Brooklyn to-day probably fatally wounded.

Mardone disregarded the warnings, and each night barricaded himself in his room by placing heavy furniture before the door and windows. Early to-day he awoke to find two men in his room. When he attempted to arise they shot him, inflicting a dangerous wound in the lungs. The assailants escaped through the window by which they had gained admission.

This latest "Black Hand" outrage has aroused the police to unusual activity, and Detective Sergeant Petrosini will again round up the murderous Italians, whose operations he partially stopped last year, only to have them break out again with renewed activity.

"Another Black Hand Outrage," appears with monotonous regularity as a newspaper headline. One day a store is blown up in the shadow of the President's home at Oyster Bay, the next day a judge at Paterson, New Jersey, is killed by a bomb. A Connecticut millionaire dies from worry caused by "Black Hand" letters. To-day it is a bomb, to-morrow a stiletto, next week it is pistol or chloroform, and the next a child kidnapped.

There are three societies of Italian criminals, the "Mafia," the "Reds," and the "Black Hand," but to one crime by the first two, there are a hundred by the last. Thousands belong to the "Black Hand" to scores in the "Mafia" and dozens in the anarchists.

The "Mafia" seek only their enemies, the "Reds" are looking for rulers and capitalists, but the "Black Hand" wars on minor personages for money and nothing else. "Money or we kill you," "Money or we will blow your home to bits," "Money or we will kidnap your children," their letters run.

One by one the threats are carried out. One man is murdered in his home, another in his store; here a store is fired, there a home dynamited; half a dozen children are kidnapped, just as the letters threaten. And so the New York police have organized a squad of detectives, headed by an Italian, Joe Petrosini, to run the writers down.

It is estimated by the police that the "Black Hand" has wrung $500,000 from its victims in this city alone, and that property worth $100,000 has been wrecked or burned. At least twenty children have been kidnapped, and half a hundred murders can positively be laid at the "Black Hand's" door.

From New York the scourge has spread to the smaller cities of New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Pennsylvania. In addition to the death of Millionaire Wesson, due to threats, the police have a record of a score of people who have gone insane through fear of the "Black Hand," and either killed themselves or some innocent person.

Late in January the "Black Hand" got to work in Oyster Bay. Receiving no money, they dynamited the store of their victims, almost at the front entrance to the Sagamore Hill estate. February 8, Justice Cortese, of Paterson, New Jersey, was killed by a bomb sent through the mail by the "Black Hand," because he was an enemy of all the murderous secret societies.

Gradually the assassins are growing bolder. When a crime is to be planned, its proposed perpetrators meet in the place least likely to arouse suspicion. Its headquarters are anywhere and everywhere that the criminal element of the immigrants congregate, and no one seems safe, once the "Black Hand" singles him out.—Kansas City Journal, April 24, 1907.

Of all those secret criminal organizations which are preponderantly Italian in membership, the "Black Hand," is the worst. It conducts a system of brigandage that knows not a single element of mercy or pity. The increase in the activity of this organization in this country has been amazing. Hundreds of men have been murdered, property has been destroyed and children kidnapped because the demands of the members of the "Black Hand" for money were denied. How many people have been frightened into paying this blood tribute will never be known.

That the "Black Hand" and kindred organizations of foreigners are the fruits of our lax immigration system can not be denied. It is true that even strict espionage could scarcely keep some of these criminals out of our country, yet their depredations would be more limited and less bold if the government had taken precautions against them in time. Every time some anarchist attempts the assassination of a president the country rings with horror and resentment. But under our beneficent system of doing nothing we are encouraging these assassinations.—Kansas City Journal, April 26, 1907.

The Lost Boy.

Little Boy Careless has strewn his blocks
From end to end of the nursery;
He has broken the top of the gaudy box
That held sliced animals—my, ah me!
His wooden soldiers are seamed and scarred
From battle with him, and his jumping-jack
Is lodged half way from a blow too hard,
Nor all of my coaxing will get him back.

Little Boy Careless has split his drum
And bent the tube of his screeching fife
Till all of his martial airs are dumb,
And the doll that squeaked has lost her life
From a mallet blow on her waxen head,
And none of her sister-dolls knows or cares
How the sawdust in her is strewn or spread
From the bedroom door to the hall down stairs.

Little Boy Careless has gone away
And Big Boy Hopeful has come to me.
The toys that were scattered on yesterday
Are stored up there in the nursery.
The broken drum and the jumping-jack,
The waxen doll in her crib alone.
Nor Little Boy Careless will e'er come back
To scatter the toys by his years outgrown.

And ah! but the heart of me aches and cries
For the Little Boy Careless to come and play.
The light of the dawn in his big, brown eyes,
With the toys that are gathered and laid away.
The Big Boy Hopeful will come to pine
For the world out there and will yearn to go,
But the Little Boy Careless was mine, all mine,
And that is the reason I love him so!—Sel.

ELDORADO SPRINGS, Missouri, April 13, 1907.

Sister Frances: I will relate a true incident. One of our neighbors in Western Kansas had a little boy less than two years old. He became fretful and restless. Night came and he cried and worried. They could not sleep.

The mother scolded and threatened if he did not quit she would whip. He sobbed and cried, and she finally gave him a hard spanking. He sobbed, and finally became still. Morning came, and he had gone to rest to trouble his parents no more. The poor mother would ring her hands and cry over her rash and cruel treatment of the little fellow.

Now, sister, if this is of any value, use it. I am a poor hand to write, but trust this may be worded so as to touch the hearts of parents. UNCLE GEORGE.

[Just as this came to us we publish it. Our own heart has been wrung by reading it. We trust not a single parent who reads our column needs its warning. But if perchance one such there be, God grant they heed the warning before it is too late.—EDITOR.]

At the End of the Journey.

A small boy sat quietly in a seat of the day coach on a train running between two of our western cities, says an exchange. It was a hot, dusty day, very uncomfortable for traveling and that particular ride is perhaps the most uninteresting day's journey in our whole land. But the little fellow sat patiently watching the fields and fences hurrying by, until a motherly old lady, leaning forward, asked sympathetically:

"Aren't you tired of the long ride, dear, and the dust and the heat?"

The lad looked up brightly and replied, with a smile: "Yes, ma'am, a little. But I don't mind it much, because my father is going to meet me when I get to the end of it."

What a beautiful thought it is, that when life seems wearisome and monotonous, as it sometimes does, we can look forward hopefully and trustingly and, like the lonely little lad, "not mind it much," because our Father, too, will be waiting to meet us at our journey's end.—Selected, Northwestern Advocate.

A Beautiful Custom.

"Come into the garden!" said a small boy, as he opened the door and saw me. "We are planting baby's tree." The new-comer had arrived that morning, and there was a subdued excitement among the children. My friend's garden was quite large, and half of it was given over to "the family index," as they call it.

Two beautiful elms, planted on their marriage day, were father's and mother's tree; Alfred's, the first born, was a silver poplar; John's, a fine hemlock; Mary was represented by a mountain ash. The little girl enjoyed the clusters of bright red berries that gladdened her eyes from July until winter, and the first real words that came from her baby lips, as she threw her arms around it, were, "My pretty tree."

I was glad to be present when the new baby's tree was to be planted. The father held it in his hand, and the children were interested spectators. It was a graceful white ash. "This tree," said he, "belongs to Alice."

"Alice is the baby's name," said Alfred to me. "Isn't it pretty?"

"I find," said the father, "that the children are happier and more interested in all out-door life to have these grand occasions marked in this way. From loving and studying each his or her tree, they are eager to learn about other growing things. Alfred has already made up his mind to be a fruit raiser. My little girl has her flower-beds, and all of us are more healthy and happy from being out of doors so much. The children will care for Alice's tree till the little maiden is old enough to look after it, for they consider it a sacred trust."—Anna Lyman.

Letter Department

Second Letter to Reverend Joel H. A. —

MAGNOLIA, Iowa, September 11, 1905.

Well, Bro. A—, it is time I was answering your last letter. The headquarters of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, of which I am an unworthy member, is at Lamoni, Iowa. Its presiding elder is Joseph Smith, the oldest son of the Joseph Smith by whom the Lord brought forth the Book of Mormon in 1830, and restored to the earth through the ministering of angels and the power of the Holy Ghost, his church and gospel. And thus the Lord has also recommissioned men to go forth and preach "this gospel of the kingdom" with power and authority, "in all the world for a witness unto all nations," that the end is near, and that "the hour of his judgment is come." John, in his vision of "things which must be hereafter," says, "And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying, with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come."—Revelation 14:6, 7. The commission and authority given of old, was lost by the apostasy or "falling away" of the primitive Christian church, and by the persecutions by which the former day saints were "overcome." (Revelation 13:7.) And the purity and plainness of the scripture record of the gospel was marred by the "great and abominable church" through whose hands that sacred record—the Bible—has come down to us, and also by the carelessness and errors of uninspired scribes. And thus it became necessary in these last days for the Lord, in beginning his great latter-day work, to restore to the earth by the ministering of angels and by the power of his Spirit, that which was lost, and restore the gospel in purity and plainness, as found in the Book of Mormon, in the Bible, and in the latter-day revelations.

There is a branch of the Reorganized Church at Magnolia, and many other branches throughout the United States and Canada, and in nearly every country in the world, and on many of the islands of the sea. The church now numbers about sixty thousand, I believe. When they are faithful, the gospel gifts and blessing had of old are manifest among them, in accordance with the promise in Mark 16 that "these signs shall follow them that believe." For the "faith once delivered unto the saints," for which Paul exhorts us to "earnestly contend," was "followed of old by the power of godliness and the manifestation of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, and by "the Lord working with them and confirming the word with signs following." (Mark 16:20.) Similar results will always follow the preaching of the word—the "everlasting gospel"—in purity by those truly sent of God, and the acceptance of it by "them that believe." For the same cause will produce the same effect now as of old, since the Lord "changes not," and is "the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever." (Malachi 3:6; Hebrews 13:8.)

Now you know that John's vision in his revelation related to "things which must be hereafter," (Revelation 4:1), after John's time, or after A. D. 96. And among the many things that John saw was an angel flying "in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth." (Revelation 14:6.) I believe that angel has come and has delivered his message, and that the gospel is now being preached by men divinely commissioned; and that this angel delivered to Joseph the "sealed book" of golden plates, from the unsealed part of which Joseph Smith translated the Book of Mormon by the gift and power of God—which book contains the record of the gospel in plainness and purity, and also makes plain many prophecies concerning the last days. But as you do not accept this book as being the holy scriptures of ancient America, and as being delivered by the angel that John saw, as part of his message in restoring the gospel, when do you say that Revelation 14:6 had its fulfillment, and to what church or people or man did the angel deliver his message? And who are now preaching the "everlasting gospel" by divine authority thus delivered, "to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people"? This is to take place before Christ's coming, and is to be one of the signs of his coming; for Christ said, "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come."—Matthew 24:14.

Do you suppose this work is now being done, or can be done, by the various churches of men, either collectively or individually, who deny present revelation from God, and who say the day of miracle and revelation is past, and that such things, with angel ministration, are done away because no longer needed, and which churches are built up by men without command or authority from God, and are not after the New Testament pattern, and hold conflicting and contradictory creeds and doctrines? Do such constitute the church and kingdom of God? Is the kingdom of God thus divided against itself? If so, it can not stand.

You say, "Christ said the stars of heaven shall fall and before this generation shall pass away the Son of man shall come. Now that means the generation that saw the stars fall in November, 1833." Now, I also suppose that this generation in which the Lord began his great latter-day work in 1830, will not all have passed away until the great consummation. But in connection with the falling of the stars as mentioned in prophecy, the sun and moon are to be darkened, "and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken." (Matthew 24:29; Mark 13:24, 25.) When did these things take place, as they must have, if all prophecy is fulfilled? And both Matthew and Mark make particular mention that all these things will take place "immediately after the tribulation of those days." Now when were "those days" of tribulation? And what was the tribulation that took place "immediately" before the falling of the so-called stars in November of 1833?

John saw that when the sixth seal was opened "there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood; and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind. And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and island were removed out of their places." (Revelation 6:12-14.)

This seems to be the same falling of stars referred to by Christ, as recorded by Matthew and Mark. Now if all prophecy preceding the coming of Christ is fulfilled, as you claim, when did this "great earthquake" take place by which "every mountain and island were removed out of their places"? And when was the power of heaven so shaken that "the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together"?

John saw that when "the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air," that "there was a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake, and so great. And the great city was divided into three parts, and the cities of the nations fell: and great Babylon came in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath. And every island fled away, and the mountains were not found.

And there fell upon ~~it~~ a great hail out of heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent." (Revelation 16: 17-21. See also Ezekiel 38: 22.) Has that "great earthquake" yet taken place, that will level with the earth by its "mighty" shaking "the cities of the nations"? and in which the islands will flee away to the main land or disappear; and by which the very mountains will be leveled with the plain and not be found? See also Ezekiel 38: 19, 20 for another account of this earthquake, apparently.

John also speaks of a "great earthquake" in which "the tenth part of the city fell," that will follow the resurrection and ascension to heaven of the "two prophets," who will be special "witnesses" for God, and whose testimony will condemn the world, because rejected and disbelieved by the world. These two prophets will be filled with the power of God, as possessed by Elijah and Moses, "to smite the earth with all plagues as often as they will," until such time as "they shall have finished their testimony." Then they will be overcome and killed. And their dead bodies will lie three days and a half without burial in the street of the great city of Jerusalem, where "our Lord was crucified." Then their bodies will receive resurrection, and they will ascend up to heaven in a cloud. (See Revelation 11.)

My father, like yours, saw the stars fall or the great meteoric shower of November, 1833. While this was probably one of the "fearful sights and great signs" (Luke 21: 11) of the last days, it may not have been the event that Christ and the prophets more particularly allude to, as spoken of or recorded by Matthew and Mark and John in his Revelation, where the falling of the stars is spoken of in connection with other great events of the last days just before Christ's coming. I am more inclined to think thus since I sat down to write this letter, and have been looking up these things a little in the Bible.

Now Revelation 11: 13 "the same hour" of the resurrection and ascension of the "two prophets" or "witnesses" there occurred one of the "great earthquakes" that John mentions. Isaiah says, "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust: . . . and the earth shall cast out the dead. . . . the earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain."—Isaiah 26: 19, 21. Now, at the time of Christ's resurrection "the earth did quake, and the rocks rent; and the graves were opened; and many bodies of the Saints which slept arose, and came out of their graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many."—Matthew 27: 51-53. So that connected with the resurrection of Christ "there was a great earthquake," (or rather "the earth did quake,") that opened the graves, and a resurrection of the righteous dead that had lived and died before that time.

Now at the time of this earthquake that John mentions, that will take place "the same hour" of the resurrection of the "two witnesses," in Revelation 11: 13, will this be at or about the time of the coming of Christ with power and glory, and will the rest of the righteous dead receive resurrection at that time, and have their graves opened by the earthquake? At this time there will be armies fighting against Jerusalem. When Christ does come there will be an earthquake and a resurrection of the righteous dead, according to prophecy. Zechariah speaks of a day to come when the Lord shall "defend the inhabitants of Jerusalem." "And his feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east, and the mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley; and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north, and half of it toward the south. . . . and the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee" (him).—Zechariah 14: 4, 5. This is probably the earthquake that John the Revelator speaks of, when "the great city was divided into three parts," and perhaps the same that he speaks of in another place, in which "the tenth part of the city fell."

Thus it appears that when Christ returns to the earth he will come to the same place from which he ascended—mount of Olives. But before the time of his coming Zechariah speaks of the gathering of "all nations against Jerusalem to battle; and the city will be taken, and the houses rifled," etc. Now will this be at the time that the "two witnesses" are slain, and while their bodies lie in the street three days and a half without burial, that this carnage will go on in the city, while "they that dwell upon the earth shall rejoice over them, and make merry, . . . because these two prophets tormented them that dwelt upon the earth," (Revelation 11: 10) just as Moses and Aaron tormented the Egyptians, and as Elijah troubled Israel, because of their evil ways, with drouth and other plagues? (See Revelation 11: 6.)

Now if "all prophecy preceding his coming has been fulfilled," as you suppose, many of these things must have already taken place. But the conditions are not such as to make it possible for them to have taken place, as yet. Before all nations are "gathered against Jerusalem to battle" and to take a spoil, the Jews must be gathered there with their riches. They are slowly gathering there by the "Zionistic" movement; and the Lord's great latter-day work, that must precede their gathering, has begun among the Gentiles to prepare the way for the gathering and restoration of his ancient covenant people Israel. The "stick of Joseph (Book of Mormon) has come forth and been put with the "stick of Judah" (the Bible), and they have become one in the Lord's hand, and have been set up as an "ensign to the nations." And by the power of the Lord's word that is in these books, and by the ministering of angels, he will reclaim Israel and gather them to their own land. But there are many great and momentous and miraculous events yet to take place before the coming of Christ, according to prophecy. This is the "day of his preparations," that Nahum seems to have had in view, when "the chariots shall seem like torches," and "shall run like the lightnings," apparently foretelling the steam- and electric-cars of our day. The prophet Amos says: "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secrets unto his servants the prophets."—Amos 3: 7. Therefore if the Lord has a work to do in the last days or a dispensation of the gospel to be preached to "all nations" to warn mankind to prepare for his coming, and the destruction of the works of darkness from off the face of the earth, he will call and set a prophet at the head of that work. Noah was a preacher of righteousness who warned the world for a hundred and twenty years, and he was a prophet and worked by the inspiration of God. And "as it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be in the day of the coming of the Son of man." Therefore we should expect to see prophets and men of divine inspiration engaged in the Lord's work in these last days. And these men will receive revelations and divine direction and guidance for themselves, as did the prophets of old. The angel that John saw "fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach to them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people," has come, and has delivered his message, restoring the everlasting gospel in plainness and purity to the earth, as found in the sacred record of God's dealings with the people of ancient America—the Book of Mormon, being the writings or "stick" of the descendants of Joseph of Egypt; and "this gospel of the kingdom" that Christ said "shall be preached in all the world as a witness unto all nations" that the end is near, is now being carried forth to the nations of the earth, by men commissioned with authority from God, as were the apostles of old, and as was Noah before the flood. But as it was in the day of Noah, so it is likely to be now; the great majority will probably reject the offer of salvation by the gospel, to their own condemnation.

But after the gospel has been preached to the Gentile world, and as many as will have received it, the gospel will be carried forth to the remnants of literal Israel in all countries; for the Lord has not forgotten his covenants to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, nor to Israel concerning their restoration in the latter days. And the nations of the Gentiles that reject the gospel will be left as salt without savor. And Israel will by the favor of God become the leader among the nations of the earth.

Isaiah speaking of the last days, when the Lord through his gospel word "shall stand for an ensign of the people," says: "And it shall come to pass in that day that the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria," etc., "and from the islands of the sea. And he shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth."—Isaiah 11: 11, 12.

Here, in the beginning of the latter-day work, the gospel ensign to be set up for the nations of the Gentiles is first spoken of, to be followed by the gathering or recovering of the "remnant of his people" Israel. And this final gathering of Israel here prophesied of has never yet taken place. Not only the "dispersed of Judah" that have been scattered to the "four corners of the earth," and are now found among all nations, but "the outcasts of Israel"—the lost tribes that were led away or cast out of their land, and whose whereabouts is unknown to the rest of the world to this day, are to be assembled again in their own land. But first an ensign is to be set up for the nations, which ensign is "this gospel of the kingdom" that Christ said "shall be preached in all the world as a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come"—the "everlasting gospel," to be preached "to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people," to warn them that "the hour of his judgment is come." For in the last days the gospel will go first to the Gentiles, and then to the Jews, that the first may be last, and the last first. In this gathering of Israel and Judah there will be miracles performed in their behalf, for they will (some of them at least) be led by a prophet as Israel was led out of Egypt. Isaiah continues: "And the Lord shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian sea; and with his mighty wind shall he shake his hand over the river, and shall smite it in the seven streams, and make men go over dryshod. And there shall be an highway for the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria; like as it was to Israel in the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt."—Isaiah 11: 15, 16. Have these things yet taken place? If not, how is it that "every prophecy is fulfilled that precedes his coming"?

C. W. LAMB.

FOREST, Idaho, April 20, 1906.

Dear Herald: Perhaps a few lines from this part of God's vineyard may prove interesting to some of the Saints. It has been over three years now since we established our prayer-meetings, and there have always been some of the Saints present every meeting day, although sometimes our meetings have been rather small. The work is still going on. Bro. Little, our main leader, has been somewhat discouraged this last winter, but is now taking hold of the work again, and we look for things to liven up. We also missed Bro. and Sr. Zigler this winter. Sr. Zigler has been sick for the last five or six months; but is now getting better.

The neighbors of this community have taken part, and been a big help in our meetings, and I am glad to say that some of them are ready for baptism. We expect to meet, Sunday, to organize a Sunday-school, and will probably organize a union prayer-meeting; but if we do our regular prayer-meeting will go on just the same. We have a new schoolhouse and expect to have a post-office soon.

A number of the sisters have been faithful workers in the cause, and have a good influence in the neighborhood. There will be a good ripe harvest for some ministers in the future. Wishing success for all,

STEPHEN DRAZEY.

THEODORE, Alabama, April 21, 1907.

Dear Herald: We take great pleasure in church privileges. My husband, the children, and myself go to prayer-meeting nearly every Saturday night; also to Sunday-school, which we enjoy very much. We are thankful to our heavenly Father for these privileges.

Bro. Alma Booker preached for us last evening. We have our Religio at five o'clock on Sunday. Only a few belong to it, but we pray that more may see the good there is in it and join with us.

I am striving to come higher, and believe that if we will seek the Lord aright he will help us in our effort to do his will. May the Lord bless all who are so striving.

MRS. JANE LONG.

ELK MILLS, Maryland, April 18, 1907.

Editors Herald: We have quite a nice branch at Elk Mills, and the work is prospering. I have been a member of this church thirteen years, and there is nothing to make its place. I think sometimes if my parents could only have understood as I do in raising the children, what a comfort it would have been. Saints, I am so thankful for the light of the gospel! I feel it is impossible to express myself sometimes. I pray that I may help some of the young in the church to shun the evil things of the world, and help them to study church-work. It was such a blessing to me to attend our last district conference held in Philadelphia, and while all the meetings were good, I shall never forget the sermon preached by President Joseph Smith, full of comfort, and so humble, so unlike the world believes it.

As I look back over my past life, how sad at heart I feel, when if I could only take those dark days and insert bright ones, what a difference it would make. But I take lessons from some of them as a child going to school; some lessons are hard to learn, some are easy; there is no task too hard if we try, and do the best we can; our kind heavenly Father will ever hear his children cry.

A number of ministers have labored in this place, whom our memory will ever cherish: Bro. A. H. Parsons, G. W. Robley, H. E. Moler, W. A. Smith, H. H. Robinson, W. H. Kelley, and many others; I must not forget W. E. LaRue and F. M. Sheehy. When I think of Bro. Parsons and his wife, there comes a homesick feeling. I can not help shedding tears when I think how good and kind they once were to me, how they taught me this path so straight and true. Bro. Parsons preached the gospel to us, and I was baptized by him, and so was my companion. We were married by him also; and so may the good Father prosper him, and all His Saints, that we may come up to that high standard.

I have many trials, and hard it seems sometimes, because none of my people believe enough of the work to obey it. But I am praying that some day they will turn.

We have a nice Sunday-school, Religio, and Daughters of Zion; so you see the Baldwin Branch is not always going to stay in the background, but all seem trying to push this glorious work along.

children, three of whom survive. Mr. Corless was married to Phebe A. Curtis, May 18, 1851. Five children were born to them—two dying in infancy. The funeral occurred Sunday, March 10, from the Saints' chapel, S. W. L. Scott preaching the sermon to an audience which taxed the capacity of the church. He was laid to rest in the Quincy Cemetery to await the reward of the just.

SUMMERFIELD.—William Summerfield, born November 29, 1829, in Chibsey County, Staffordshire, England; married to Miss Ann Horton, September 10, 1850. For nearly fifty years they walked side by side and fought the battle of life faithfully. There were born ten sons and two daughters, four sons and one daughter preceding him to the other shore. On his wedding tour he came to the United States, locating in St. Louis, Missouri. United with the church in England in 1850. Went to Utah in 1856. Was baptized into the Reorganized Church by Elder J. W. Glen, ordained elder by same. Returned to Missouri in 1868. Died at Stewartsville, Missouri, his late home, March 23, 1907. Leaves wife, six sons, one daughter, and twenty-three grandchildren. He was one of the charter members in the organization of the first district in the State, consisting of St. Louis, Hannibal, and St. Joseph. He was also president of the same for some years. The last twenty years he has been in the active ministry. Funeral services were in charge of T. T. Hinderks; sermon by William Lewis; laid to rest in the DeKalb Cemetery, two miles northwest of town. He was highly respected, as the following from the Stewartsville Record, and statement from a life-long friend, will show:

"There is no language at our command by which we can fittingly portray the sincerity of this man's Christian character; and in the experience of a lifetime, the writer hereof can safely say he never met one who seemed to more nearly walk hand in hand with God. Conscience guided every act. He was a model of mental industry in his efforts to entertain and instruct his people. He was strictly honest in the service he rendered. In short, he was not only a model Christian, but he was an honorable gentleman, in the highest sense that term implies. To man, woman, or child, saint or sinner, he always extended a cordial greeting, that lent a ray of light to brighten their pathway in the journey of life. He commanded the respect of all sects and classes of people, as the attendance at his funeral fully verified. It was so perfectly natural for him to do right, we did not fully appreciate his true worth, until after the thread of life was severed. But as we caught a glimpse of the snow-white sail that bore him away to the distant shore, we awakened to the realization that a good and righteous man had been taken from our midst."

"Bro. Summerfield is dead. He has gone but not for ever. He has gone but not to be forgotten. We loved him because he was lovable. We loved him as a friend because he was friendly. We loved him as a man because he was manly. We loved him as a father because he was fatherly. We loved him because he was devoted to his family. We loved him because he was a loving father and a true husband. He manifested that love for his dear companion up to the very last moments of his life. We praise him because he is worthy of it. He has gone to a well-earned reward. He sacrificed much for what he knew to be true. He spent much of his time preaching the gospel at the sacred desk and at the fireside, and he did it in such a way as showed he had the interest of men's souls at heart, and also that he loved God above everything else. Yes, he is gone. We shall miss him. He will be missed in the home. He will be missed among his friends—for they are legion. He will be missed in the church, and also among his neighbors. Yes, we shall all miss him, yet our loss is his gain. Therefore, dear Lord, help us to be reconciled."

WILKE.—Four miles north of Stewartsville, Missouri, March 29, at her home, Sr. Elizabeth Wilke. She was born in Kakebeck, Germany, March 18, 1828. She united with the church October 30, 1881, near Danville, Iowa, being baptized by T. T. Hinderks, and held to the faith to the time of her death. She was a kind mother, a faithful wife; leaves an aged husband, three sons, several grandchildren and great grandchildren to mourn their loss. Funeral in charge of D. E. Powell; sermon by T. T. Hinderks, at the German church.

The Scientific American Aeronautic Trophy.

Despite the fact that very many inventors throughout the United States are wrestling with the problem of aerial navigation by means of a true dynamic flying machine—that is, a machine heavier than air—no public flight has been made in this country with such a machine up to the present time. The most advanced knowledge of heavier-than-air navigation seems to be held by two young western experimenters, of whom much has been written. These men have undoubtedly made flights with their aeroplane, and these flights have been witnessed by a considerable number of people. The general appearance of their machine is known, and other experimenters are making good progress along somewhat the same lines.

We feel, therefore, that the time is ripe for the offering of a suitable trophy commemorating the conquering of the air by a heavier-than-air machine. As the Scientific American is the oldest journal in this country treating of Science and the Arts, its proprietors feel that it is fitting that this journal should be the first to encourage the development of the latest great invention—a machine that shall conquer the air. The proprietors have, therefore, decided to offer a valuable trophy for competition for heavier-than-air flying machines. The trophy is to be given under a deed of gift to the Aero Club of America, to be competed for annually by both American and foreign inventors. The rules for the competition will be drawn up by a committee of the Aero Club, and it is expected will be drawn up by a committee of the Aero Club, and it is expected that the first competition will occur at the Jamestown Exposition, September 14, and will be for a flight of one mile or less in a straight line. The competition is to be progressive in character, that is to say, if the flight of the predetermined distance is accomplished this year, next year a longer flight will be required, or a flight of a mile with turns. In other words, the conditions of the yearly contests will be such that they will be just ahead of the art, in order to induce inventors continually to strive to improve and perfect their machines. Should any one inventor win the prize three times, it will then become his property.

Further particulars regarding the first competition will be given from time to time in the columns of the Scientific American.

Socialism in Germany.

Socialism in Germany during the past twenty years has lived through many phases. It began distinctly as a war of classes and its leaders preached war as the necessary prelude to the revolution which was to sweep away kings and aristocrats and bring about that social utopia which was the dream of Marx and Engels and the other fanatical visionaries who believed in the purification of the sword. Bismark regarded them as traitors to the state and persecuted them relentlessly. The Socialists at that time waged almost open warfare against the constituted authorities, and as the blood of martyrs is the seed of the church, so Bismark's persecution had the sole effect of solidifying the Socialists and making them hold aloof from contract or alliance with other parliamentary groups. Gradually they saw the folly of these tactics. They now have become parliamentarians and are willing to form alliances for the time being if by combination they can harass the government or advance those reforms which they believe to be essential. Believing at first that Socialism was merely a passing whim of the moment and could have neither substance nor vitality, the German government, that is, the Kaiser and his advisers, refused to pay the least heed to those demands for legislation which was the raison d'être of the socialistic party; but a more enlightened policy of recent years has brought the Kaiser to realize that some of the things at least which Socialism demanded were in themselves good and for the benefit of the state.—A. Maurice Low, in the April-June Forum.

ONE STEP TOWARD UNITY OF OPINION.

First, unity of purpose and of spirit based upon love; second, unity of opinion and teaching, based upon mutual knowledge of truth: that is the divine order of progression.

Irreligious disputations over religious questions have furnished the Devil with about six thousand years of grand opera. Is it not time that the Saints should entirely withdraw from the chorus and learn more of the major and minor notes of the grand new song, whose sweet concord shall entertain the angelic hosts?

Two men of similar temperaments, whose past experiences have been identical, and whose present interests are affiliated, may think alike upon almost any subject; but given a little difference in disposition, past education, or present environment, and they almost certainly develop differences of opinion. And after they have had one or two collisions in argument it will be difficult for them to continue the friendship that may have sprung up. Obviously any method of discussion that will estrange the two will never bring them to a unity upon the subjects which now divide them. Manifestly one of the first steps toward unity of opinion will be for them to learn to discuss their differences in such moderate and gentlemanly terms as shall foster in the heart of each a respect for the other. Sarcasm, retort, evasion, deceit, ridicule, exaggeration—will not accomplish such an end. They may serve the purpose of men who are contending with each other for personal victory; but they will defeat the purpose of those who are seeking to discover the truth and unite thereon.

It is always best, when at all possible, to concede and believe that an opponent is honest in his convictions. One who is swift to make a charge to the contrary casts a rather severe reflection upon his own honesty. It is better to concede a mistaken honesty to ten hypocrites than to call one man a liar who really is contending for what he believes. Joseph Smith, even when under the full light of the inspiration that came to him while translating the Book of Mormon, was told, "You can not always tell the wicked from the righteous."

Christ at rare intervals denounced individuals; but Christ was an infallible judge of human nature, and not many of his followers have the gift of dis-

"Young men and women who are about to start in life are often taught false ideals. The world says, 'Get money! Get it honestly if you can; but get money!' We are told that one can not succeed in business and be strictly honest. That he can not have a good time and be strictly moral. That one must deviate a little to right and left. All these are teachings that are far, far below the highest. If you have given them any credence, then 'Doubt no longer that the highest is the wisest and the best.'"

cernment so highly developed that they can safely go beyond him and make their denunciations other than of rare occurrence. Christ at times denounced customs then in vogue; but Christ was pre-eminently an affirmative teacher. His main business was to tell and to show others what he believed; if he stopped to refute what they believed, that was incidental. His best negative of their belief was in the superior beauty of that which he affirmed.

Religious questions seem to have created more friction in the world than any other questions, probably because the methods that men have sought to employ in the religious field are more obviously out of place there than in any other field.

Two politicians who are struggling for supremacy expect to encounter guile, and each expects the enemy to use the weapons of the world; but when two long-robed priests in the heat of debate detect the mutual gleam of hate in rage-enkindled eyes, strangely enough each is surprised and feels himself deeply aggrieved. Even where the lapse from the true attitude has been confined to one party, the results are often disastrous. The man most hard for us to forgive is the one we have wantonly injured.

So while in the past political questions have whetted swords and set men at each other in more or less honorable combat, religious questions, and discussions of them, have created the most bitter, cruel, and unjust hatred, hatred that has known neither pity nor reason.

As the last argument women and children have been thrown to the wild beasts; men have been crucified; prophets have been stoned to death; helpless men have been bound to the stake and burned to death, while maddened church people fought for a vantage point from which to watch the spectacle, believing that divine grace came to one who said amen while fire devoured heresy.

Pagans have murdered Christians; and worse, Christians have murdered heathen; Catholics and Protestants have each burned the other; our fathers fled to America in search of religious liberty; later they mobbed the Quakers and murdered Joseph Smith.

When surrounded by such a howling mob, Christ himself said, "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do."

His words were true, for it is evident that from the first improper word in "religious" discussion, to the last act of unbridled hate that commits an adversary to his death, the man who uses such means to advance the cause of religion knows not what he does. He has not yet grasped the first faint gleam of the intelligence that God is love and that justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne.

Evidently it is too much to expect that a perfect unity of opinion on all subjects will obtain, even in the church, now or in the near future. There can be but one correct opinion on any one given subject, and where several individuals come together and any of them are anywise in error regarding the subject, they can not all reach the same conclusions. Not until the minds of all are freed from all error can all unite in opinion upon all subjects. God and Christ and the Holy Spirit are one in opinion upon all subjects, because they all are free from error, and all inevitably arrive at the one correct conclusion.

It is evident that such a condition may obtain among their children, when they arrive at a certain stage of development; but it is also equally evident, painfully so at times, that a long and thorough education is necessary before that stage is reached.

The Holy Spirit is to guide to the final destiny of all truth. We may as well expect that differences of opinion will be in evidence at all points this side of the terminal.

We repeat that we may as well expect these differences and so be prepared to deal with them in such a way that they shall not work injury to the church. We suggest as one of the first great steps toward unity that we learn to talk our differences over in a proper way—in a way that shall cement our friendship instead of severing it—in a way that shall hold us together in the bonds of brotherly love while we journey to the point where the mists shall clear away and absolute oneness be made possible.

Almost any subject upon which brethren differ is a fit subject for discussion; but there is a time, a place, and a way for all things, and discussion at the wrong time, at the wrong place, or in the wrong way will widen the breach, perhaps beyond repair.

It is no sin for Saints to differ; but it is a sin for them to quarrel about their differences. God has been offended in the past, not because his people have seen things in different lights; but because of the way in which they have treated each other as a result of those differences.

As long ago as 1833, the Lord, in speaking of conditions in the church, that had displeased him, said, "There were jarrings, and contentions, and envyings, and strifes."—Doctrine and Covenants 98:2.

Only a comparatively short time elapsed after the Reorganization entered the active field until the Lord again sounded a warning against the recurrence of such conditions. He said, "Let contentions and quarrelings among you cease. Sustain each other in peace, and ye shall be blessed with my Spirit, in comforting and strengthening you for my work."—Doctrine and Covenants 117:13.

The Lord was well aware that the Saints did not then see alike in all things; but he commanded them to cease quarreling about those differences, and on that condition only would the Spirit be given, bestowing such wisdom upon all that in due time unity of thought might be obtained.

First, unity of purpose and of spirit, based upon love; second, unity of opinion and teaching, based upon a mutual knowledge of truth: that is the divine order of progression.

We do not mean by the foregoing that no knowledge of or mutual understanding of the gospel need precede a unity of spirit or of purpose. A knowledge of the principles of the gospel is of primary importance. There must be a thorough unity of the disciples regarding those principles. But such a knowledge is only the beginning of the spiritual education that awaits one in the church of the living God. Some have thought, to their loss, that an understanding of those principles was all that would ever be required of them. They have camped at the first mile-stone and thought it their destination.

Broad avenues of research and study lie before us. We have declared that our creed is all truth. There are problems that have split the world into a thousand warring sects. There are problems that shall yet set every man's hand against his neighbor—in the world—and happy will we be if such be not the case in Zion.

A people who are united on the gospel platform, who have one purpose and one spirit, are in a condition to move forward in lines of investigation and development that will finally result in a unity of opinion upon all important subjects. Any other people may as well disband before they make the effort.

"WHERE CHURCHES FAIL."

Were it not pitiful it would be very amusing to hear the wailing from the various denominational churches in regard to the failing adherence to their several church tenets, and the consequent falling off in attendance upon the public services, preaching and others.

Of this sort is the following from the current newspaper notice of the sermon of the Reverend Wallace M. Short, pastor of the Beacon Hill Congregational church, of Kansas City, Missouri, April 28, 1907; the subject of his sermon being "The opportunity of the democratic church."

We have no reason to dispute the facts as stated by the reverend gentleman, as he undoubtedly is authorized to represent the members of his own following. We have a right, however, to present an altogether different condition of things as represented by the attendance upon the services at the church in the Independence Branch, on the same morning when the Reverend Wallace, at his church, was pleading the apparent inability of that and contemporaneous churches to hold their membership and congregations. Bro. Frederick G. Pitt, our genial laborer and "sweet singer," was the speaker at the morning service and the house was full. The sermon was a feeling home and "heart to heart talk," upon the development of the characteristics and graces which should be found adorning the "fighting soldier" of the cross; and according to the speaker, all were compelled to do more or less fighting against the adversary of souls and his various allies under the name of the "world, the flesh, and the devil"; so he exhorted his hearers to take on "the whole armor" and fight the good fight, keep the faith, and win "eternal life."

At the evening service, Bro. John W. Rushton, that bundle of dynamic energy from Leeds, England, our missionary in charge of the British Isles last year, and now associated with Bro. Peter Anderson, in charge of the European Mission, was the speaker, and again the house was full. The sermon was a stirring appeal to know God by "abiding in his word." His conclusion that he who would abide in the love of God was abiding in God was sublime; and few who heard him will ever forget either the fervor of the preacher, or the force of his impassioned oratory. "With the views I hold," said the speaker, "can I be anything else than a Latter Day Saint?" We who heard him, answer for him: No!

From my own observation, most of the young people who come into the city to seek their fortunes have been church-goers in their home towns, the larger number of them members of some church. After a few months of city life the majority of them are practically lost to the church.

A few set out at once to "see" the town, thinking they will go to church after a few weeks. They never go. A great number begin to attend service in some one of the prominent churches. No one ever seems to see them there. Their attendance grows less and less regular. Some of these drop out of church attendance altogether. Some of them become church tramps, going "when they feel like it," but known nowhere. A few find one of the little churches on the side street where there is a chorus choir they can join or club life of some sort where they can get acquainted. For the boy and girl, fresh from the old home and the old town where they knew everybody, must find companionship or die of loneliness.

For the thousands of young people flocking to our city, and for the tens of thousands of honest toilers unchurched, and for the youth who have left Sunday-school—these forming altogether the decided majority of our population—our churches know not what to do. A few of the weak and struggling churches are reaching and holding considerable numbers of these young folks. But, with a few splendid exceptions, our strong churches are doing practically nothing for them.

These strong churches are recruited from the well-to-do members flowing into them from all the other churches of city and country. These well-to-do people have their own homes and social ties. They join the church of their own congenial set, where there is a fine house, a grand organ, and a salaried choir, and where often a few rich men pay most of the-bills.

So far as the problems of our great democracy are concerned, the average well-to-do church has absolutely no efficiency. The minister, I am usually told, is cordial. The members are quite willing the multitude should come and "be saved," but they themselves either do not want to be bothered with the "herd" or else they do not know how to "warm up to them."

Large numbers of people in my own denomination have gone to seed, so far as any real heart for the democracy is concerned; have turned their faces to the wall and their backs to the people; have arrogated religious sanction for certain personal tastes and manners and social standards. And if the preacher brings in an army of fresh, wholesome, democratic manhood and womanhood to the house of God, these elect ones, with a significant elevation of the eyebrows, inquire "and who are these people?"

Our pulpits must proclaim frankly that a man is not a Christian until he has learned the law of service, and that no man is a disciple of Jesus whose heart does not kindle toward the great American democracy.

We must speak this truth and take the consequences. For no consequences can possibly be so bad as the concentration of our Christian wealth and culture into great churches that do not know how to love and believe in the people; while the churches that can render this service shall be left to perish, or to move away from the people because our Christian forces are not meeting successfully the greatest opportunity the world ever offered to the church—that of giving, in our great democracy, the moral and spiritual underpinning upon which alone our institutions can go forward to the fulfillment of their highest destiny.

THE UNWRITTEN LAW.

Thomas Speed Mosby, pardon attorney of Missouri, in a late article written for the Juvenile Nonpareil, of March 24, closes in the following terse language, which we commend to the readers of the HERALD; for the reason that as law-abiding citizens we can not afford as churchmen to arrogate to ourselves any fallacious reasoning calculated to show a disregard for the wholesale enforcement of the laws under which we have our freedom, religious and political:

The "unwritten law" can never make for conjugal fidelity. That it has no such tendency is apparent from the increasing frequency of its application. The chastity of American women will never be preserved by the assassin's bullet, or by adding murder to adultery. Matrimonial felicity will never be enhanced by the taking of human life. That such a monstrous doctrine should obtain in this country, and receive, as it does, the repeated sanction of American juries, is a reproach to our civilization and a stigma upon the American home. To uphold such a principle as the guaranty of purity in the American family life is a blot upon the national character. Woe unto the nation whose virgins require the revolver and the knife to protect them from prostitution; and woe unto a people whose wives and mothers stand in need of an unwritten law; for it spells murder wherever practiced, and casts a stain upon American womanhood whenever invoked before a jury.

No more dangerous idea may seize upon any people than this, that they may enact unwritten laws in the popular imagination, to be promiscuously applied, amended at will, and enlarged or altered to meet the individual caprice. It amounts to anarchy and strikes directly at the base of society. Under the guise of protection to the home, it undermines the pillars of organized government and sows the seeds of a lawless spirit that must ultimately destroy both home and country.

To say that there is an unwritten law, which may nullify statutory enactments, is to say that the laws of the country may be enacted, amended, or set aside, without regard to the will of court or legislature, irrespective of the constitution, and without recourse to the ballot.

The laws of Lycurgas were all unwritten laws, and historians record the fact that the immorality of the Spartan women led up to the ruin of the Spartan state. Unwritten laws will serve us no better than they served the Spartans. Nor would the enactment, by legislative act, of the death penalty for all unchastity tend in the slightest degree to amend the social morals of the times. When women desire to overstep the bounds of moral law in this regard, partners in sin will never be wanting and severity will only breed secretiveness. A state of society addicted to these vices does not require annihilation; it needs moral education. The summary infliction of the death penalty in such cases but augments the moral chaos by contributing a new species of brutality.

CURRENT EVENTS, SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS.

Representatives of the Utah church recently began the publication of the Liahona at Independence, Missouri. This periodical is now to be consolidated with the Elders' Journal, hitherto published at Chattanooga, Tennessee. The new periodical, under the name of Liahona, The Elders' Journal is to be published at Independence. It is claimed that twenty thousand copies of the first number will be issued.

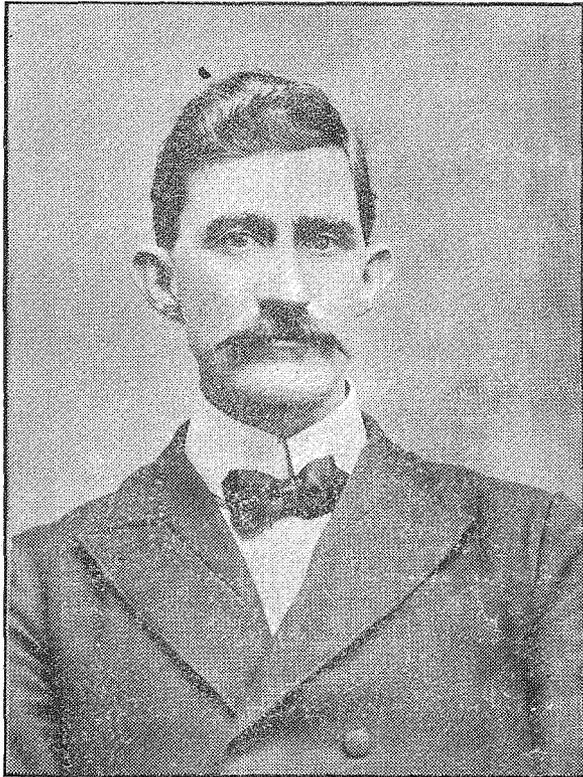

William T. Stead, the London journalist of world-wide fame, suggests that Americans should read less of the Thaw trial, and others of like kind, and more of Isaiah. He cites society women to the statement of Isaiah, "Wash you, make you clean, put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes."

Doctor Chester Mayer, before a council of the meeting of the council on medical education of the American Medical Association, recently declared that four thousand doctors are graduated every year by the medical colleges of the land and three fourths of them are utterly incompetent to practice medicine.

Judge Ira W. Christian, of the Hamilton County Circuit Court, Nobleville, Indiana, recently rendered a decision that the saloon is a public nuisance and can not properly be licensed. This is in harmony with the decision of Judge Samuel R. Artman, noticed in the HERALD for February 27.

The Straight Road

GOD'S WAY OF SALVATION.

ELDER GEORGE JENKINS.

[The next number in the Straight Road will be on the subject of Faith, by James Pycok. Articles on repentance, baptism, and the reception of the Holy Spirit will follow.]

“For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ: for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth: to the Jew first, and also to the Greek.” This being true, we need not look elsewhere for the saving grace of God.

The gospel that was preached by Paul and Peter saved all who believed and accepted it. By making a personal application of it to their lives they received the inherent right to ask of God an entrance into his celestial kingdom and glory. For this one purpose Paul is found preaching to the Corinthian saints the following, “Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the gospel which I preached unto you, which also ye have received, and wherein ye stand; by which also ye are saved, if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you, unless ye have believed in vain.”

God never gave but one gospel by which to save man, as there is but one God, and one mediator. Each one should be alike interested in that one plan: as there is no salvation in anything else. “In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation: in whom also after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise.”—Ephesians 1: 13.

Paul calls it the gospel of their salvation. It is our gospel as well as theirs; if we will accept it as they did, then it will save us. Why is it that so many to-day are not willing to accept of it? We have the same God, who, the Bible says, changes not. It is necessary that all should know what the gospel is, and it is the same in every age of the world.

Let us now turn to the word of God and see what it tells us it is, and let God's word be the end of all disputation. I think all should be willing that God's word should be taken as evidence in this case.

One must have faith in God, believe that we must do what he has told us to do, and not only believe that he is, but believe in every commandment he has given or will give. Hence to become a child of God, we must repent of all our sins and cease doing those things that are not right in the law of God. Quit sinning, is the fruit of repentance. A tree without fruit is no good.

We have now succeeded in taking two steps in the direction of final triumph; we can not stop here but must go on, heed the command of the Master, and be baptized for the remission of sins.

Right here the traveler stops and says, Who will do this? I can not baptize myself.

No, you can not, so we will go to the Bible and see who it is that has this authority.

“Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that receiveth whomsoever I send receiveth me; and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me.”—St. John 13: 20.

Dear reader, you now see that one must be sent of God, to do this work. Now turn with me to Hebrews, fifth chapter; here we can learn how this call comes: “And no man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron.”—Hebrews 5: 4. In the next verse you will see that Christ would not assume this right without receiving it according to the way God had appointed for him to receive it. You all know how Aaron was called. He was called through a living prophet—Moses.

No one can assume the right to officiate in the least office of our grand republic, much less to undertake it in God's government. Authority must be recognized in all governments or dismemberment, chaos, and anarchy will be the result. I care not how exalting the principles may be, without discipline the apex can not be attained.

These are the landmarks pointing to the station in life where we can receive the knowledge that Jesus is the Christ; that knowledge gives us eternal life.

“And this is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent."—John 17:3.

You now see that eternal life depends on receiving the knowledge that God is God, and Jesus is his Son.

We will now turn to God's word and read how this knowledge is received: "Wherefore I give you to understand, that no man speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus accursed: and that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost."—Corinthians 12:3.

You see that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost, so it is very important and necessary to receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. This blessing is like all others received from God: it must come in God's own appointed way.

We will look up the work the apostle did. We find an instance in the seventh chapter of the Acts, where Philip preached at Samaria and baptized. The news went up to Jerusalem. The apostles on hearing how that Philip had baptized at Samaria sent down two of the apostles. Let us see what they did when they got down to Samaria.

"Now when the apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John; who, when they were come down, prayed for them, that they might receive the Holy Ghost: (for as yet he was fallen upon none of them; only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.) Then laid they their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost. And when Simon saw that through laying on of the apostles' hands the Holy Ghost was given, he offered them money, saying, Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost."—Acts 8:14-19.

You now see how those at Samaria received this knowledge that gave them eternal life. I find that this was, and is, God's appointed way. God has not changed, for if God would change he would cease to be God.

Paul taught the same in Acts 19:1-6.

"But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed."—Galatians 1:8.

May God bless all who read the above with understanding of the same, and in the by and by may they meet with the redeemed of the Lord.

Your humble servant,

HOLDEN, Missouri.

GEORGE JENKINS.

BOOK OF MORMON CHARACTERS AND THE BOOK OF THE DEAD.

ELDER COLUMBUS SCOTT.

Senior President of the Seven Presidents of Seventy, and President of the Second Quorum of Seventy.

When Joseph Smith the Seer copied some of the characters found on a plate or plates from which the Book of Mormon was translated, and sent them untranslated to Professor Anthon, of New York, by Martin Harris, in 1828 or 1829, he may not have understood all the purposes of God in thus exhibiting "the words" of a book that was "sealed" to him "that is learned, saying, Read this, I pray thee." But the learned man was not able to read those words, so the book was left for the unlearned man to read (see Isaiah 29:11, 12).

Many learned men have declared of recent days that Isaiah's prophecy did not refer to a book, or the words of a book either, that the language was merely comparative, parabolical, or metaphorical and figurative, used only to represent the spiritually-blinded condition of the people at some time, or some such idea. (See tract by Elder C. J. Hunt.)

But we have the veritable words of the book as predicted by the prophet Isaiah, as presented to the learned man, Anthon, by the unlearned (so far as wordly wisdom goes) prophet, Joseph Smith. He presented some of the words of the Book of Mormon plates, in their original form. These words or characters, so preserved, we now have. The claim was and is made that the language from which the Book of Mormon was translated was the reformed Egyptian, as reformed by the people of Nephi, ancient American descendants of Joseph (son of Jacob) of Egypt.

In 1895 A. D. a work was published to the world by the Appleton & Sons Publishing House, and may be had of Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, called The Book of the Dead. This work contains printed plates representing the Idiographic, or Sign, or Picture System of the ancient Egyptians. This is perhaps the oldest Egyptian system of writing now known.

The volume named also contains photographed printed plates of the phonetic system of writing of the ancient Egyptians, also a translation of the latter, being descriptive of the religion of the ancient Egyptians, the translation being done by Mr. Charles H. S. Davis, one of our leading Egyptologists, and of reputation as a linguist in other ancient languages.

By the kindness of Mr. W. M. Thompson, of Dayton, Ohio, who has quite a store of quaint old and new books, also many samples of old out-of-print volumes, I was permitted, in December, 1906, to examine to some extent, the Hieratic system of writing. Its characters became of special interest to me at once. Bro. James M. Baggerly and I took the characters of the Book of Mormon—plates of Mormon—as found on page 207 of Presidency and Priesthood (by Elder William H. Kelley), and made a comparison of them with Hieratic writing of The Book of the Dead, so far as our time allowed and not impose on the good nature of Mr. Thompson, who treated us very courteously. Some rare books may be procured of him, some worth much, he being a collector from any sources he may draw from.

Let it be borne in mind that Mr. Charles H. S. Davis is the gentleman that was consulted by Elder Davis H. Bays, when collecting material for his book, Doctrines and Dogmas of Mormonism; and Mr. Davis is made to testify that the characters of the Book of Mormon plates resemble neither Egyptian nor any other ancient language or writing. Bro. Baggerly and I searched among the phonetic characters of The Book of the Dead, and found some twenty characters that resemble a similar number of the characters kept by Joseph Smith sufficiently to be identical with them, especially when we allow for the reform made in the latter. Others appear to resemble sufficiently as to have been derived, the latter from the former. We also found two characters on a printed plate of the Tell el Hesi Tablet, found at Lachish, Philistia, Palestine, 1892 A. D., and found on page 203 of Wanderings in Bible Lands, Honorable D. L. Miller, author. We herewith present a cut showing the outlines found in The Book of the Dead compared with outlines from Book of Mormon characters, and the similarity can easily be seen:

Egyptian Hieratic Phonetics, from The Book of the Dead, and Book of Mormon characters compared, as designated above.

Here are twenty characters gleaned from the ancient Egyptian Hieratic writings, writings of Egyptian priests, or sacred writings, which by comparison are seen to be quite identical with a similar number of those copied by the prophet Joseph Smith from the Nephite plates, and from which (plates) he translated the Book of Mormon.

In the Book of Mormon we read:

And now, behold, we have written this record according to our knowledge in the characters, which are called among us the reformed Egyptian, being handed down and altered by us, according to our manner of speech. And if our plates had been sufficiently large, we should have written in Hebrew; but the Hebrew hath been altered by us also; and if we could have written in Hebrew, behold, ye would have had none imperfection in our record. But the Lord knoweth the things which we have written, and also that none other people knoweth our language; and because that none other people knoweth our language, therefore he hath prepared means for the interpretation thereof.—Page 538, Palmyra edition.

As to whether Professor Davis gives a correct translation of the Hieratic of ancient Egypt, cuts no figure, as to the question at issue here.

Late students of Egyptian and American archæology and antiquity have asserted that there is no relation existing between the two ancient civilizations, but here are the characters both from the Egyptian ancient Hieratic system of writing, and of the Nephite, of ancient America. And a sufficient number of characters from the two sources to settle the controversy concerning their relationship. Here is a direct relation shown to exist that can not now be easily broken.

It can not be shown that Joseph Smith had in his possession any characters, in 1827, 1828, or 1829, drawn from the ancient Egyptian Hieratic, as given to the world by Professor Davis in 1895. But the characters exhibited by Joseph Smith to Professor Charles Anthon of New York City prior to 1830 have among them those identical in form to a number already formed and copied by us from Davis' ancient Egyptian Hieratic system of writing. This is a surprise even to us after an intermittent study of thirty years (historically) along these lines. We have an argument here stronger if possible than that made by Ignatius Donnelly, in his Atlantis, that ancient Americans were communicants with ancient Assyro-Phœnecians, because some twelve or thirteen letters of that alphabet have been found among the writings of ancient Americans. We trust, we think Mr. Donnelly is correct; for if we mistake not, the ancient Hebrew language, if not also the Greek, have letters and words derived from the ancient Phœnecian language. Its beginnings date back to Shem, and in its developments and association would gather words from neighboring dialects, including ancient Egyptian, Assyrian, Phœnecian, and from some now known only by monumental inscriptions. The letters in their original form, found by Mr. Donnelly, could have been brought to ancient America by either the Jaredites or Lehi-ites, as stated, found by the revelation of the Book of Mormon through Joseph Smith.

The early composers of languages, written languages, went to nature for signs with which to portray ideas. Nature possessed both forms and vocals—sounds; and nature teaches the same lessons, nearly, to all who go to her, when she is rightly interpreted. Both idiographs and letters represent sound and ideas, and words,—language written alphabetically, also. A divided feeling of tribes, of a divine confounding of a language might perforce produce differing signs, invented letters, and ultimately words, forming the basis of differing languages, their differing words to those using them conveying identical ideas. But spoken language was originally a divine revelation. But aside from these considerations, Mr. Donnelly's discoveries among the character-writing of ancient America is in line with our claims. It helps to forge the chain connecting ancient American archæology with ancient Hebrew.

A sufficient number of characters are here derived from The Book of the Dead, to show, by comparison, that the reformed characters in possession of Joseph Smith were derived from the ancient Egyptian phonetics. But these characters from the ancient Egyptian Hieratic are found in the Book of the Dead. They are either identical, or so nearly so, as to have been the source whence those preserved untranslated by Joseph Smith were derived. Professor Davis translated this Hieratic. What, in this case, becomes of the statement made by Professor Charles H. S. Davis when writing to Elder Davis H. Bays, saying: "A careful study of the facsimile shows that they are characters put down at random by an ignorant person—with no resemblance to anything, not even shorthand."—Doctrines and Dogmas of Mormonism, pp. 264, 265.

We leave the reader to decide in relation to the question raised here.

We further observe here that the Nephites may have so changed the original Egyptian as they possessed it in reforming it that the reformed characters might have resembled the original but little if any, many of them.

The character (see fourth line of cut) that resembles the figure 8, with the dot in the top section, is often found in the Hieratic; only a plain type of a figure 8 in our English will fully represent it.

That Egyptologists are unable to decipher ancient American reformed Egyptian, is no more argument against its verity than the argument fifty years ago was against the verity of Egyptian Hieratic. God is fortifying his great latter-day work in the minds of his obedient children.

Divine truth is "growing brighter as the days go by," to all who love truth. COLUMBUS SCOTT.

A DREAM AND THE INTERPRETATION.

On February 1, 1872, in the city of Grand Rapids, Michigan, the following dream was had by Mr. John A. Godfrey, not a member of the church. He was visiting at the home of his sister, Mary A. Brown. The dream was so remarkable, her husband, Elder J. Byron Brown, sent the dream to Bro. Joseph for the interpretation, both of which I will send to be published in the HERALD.

THE DREAM.

In his dream he stood under a roof which was fixed upon four posts, set firmly in the ground. It was night. Suddenly there appeared mellow lines of light shooting upward from the south to the zenith, and from the east to the west. These lines kept up a waving motion that lighted the whole heavens except the part in the north.

Soon after the appearance of the light, he heard a rumbling noise, which gradually increased in volume until he beheld a train of cars approaching from the east. The engine and all the cars were of a pale white color. The form of the engine was in the shape of a massive bird with long neck and half open wings, the neck and head of the bird forming the smokestack, which was discharging great clouds of smoke. The after part was in the form of an ordinary locomotive.

The cars were all uniform in appearance, and were constructed in the form of ancient riding chariots, but were of the length of modern railroad coaches, and were roofed, and each car had small black windows. The train reached in its progress from the east unto the west, and was loaded with Saints on their way to their promised land in Missouri.

He felt that Christ was near, and could see his Spirit working in the heavens and upon the earth. He beheld a great gulf running east and west. While he stood upon the northern bank, the train was moving on the southern, in a parallel direction. Standing transfixed by awe and admiration, he watched until the last car disappeared in the west.

Immediately after the disappearance of the train, he heard a great noise of men yelling and screaming, and beheld them running in fright, coming up out of the gulf. While he was casting in his mind to know the cause of their terror, he saw, as they came up over the top of the hill, that they were closely pursued by a pack of wolves.

The men were dressed in poor clothing—threadbare and much worn. They ran past him till they came to a clump of dead trees. Some were standing, while others were fallen. The men attempted to climb the standing trees, but failing to do so, they ran back to the place where he stood, whereupon he stooped down, and picking up a rock, slew the foremost of the wolves. Hurling another rock at the second wolf, he completely severed his head from his body. His head rolled away to the stump of a tree and he slew the whole pack.

He now went to the house and retired to sleep, from which he was awakened by terrific thunderings and crashings, as if both heaven and earth were being torn to pieces. Arising and going out of the house he beheld the world on fire. The main body of the fire was in the south, and its track was towards the northeast, but was spreading east by south.

Great black clouds of smoke were rolling along the earth in cylindrical form, while now and then the fire would burst out of the earth, both in the plains and in the mountains.

There was a line dividing the east from the west. He stood upon a green, grassy slope in the western division. Before him, looking southward was a large field of half-grown fruit-trees in rows thickly set together. Some entire rows had been torn up by the roots or broken down. Others were only partially destroyed, leaving some of the trees standing.

The whole northern sky, as in the fore part of his dream was shrouded in thick darkness. In the west he beheld, as it were, a new world, a sight more beautiful than words will explain. It was lighted by a soft, pleasant light, differing from anything he had ever seen. The land was rich in verdure, and the mountains were covered with green foliage and with beautiful, sweet-scented flowers.

Feeling perfectly calm, he uttered a prayer to God, saying, If this is the paradise-for the Saints, I want to come into the kingdom of God. His next thoughts were of his father and mother, and he hastened to tell them that they might go in too.

INTERPRETATION.

I am pleased with the dream your brother-in-law had. I think the meaning of it clear enough in the main.

The waving, shooting waves of light represent the clearness, yet the pleasantness of the gospel truths. They were many, reaching from the east to the west; so are the gospel truths many, and began in the east. Light moves in undulating lines. Gospel truth is active.

The cars signify the safety and the rapidity of the final accomplishment of the work of God. And the west is the destined place of building up. Being of uniform color attests the sameness of the means of grace in all ages.

The bird-like appearance of the engine indicates that there shall be a wide-spreading oversight of the gathering, and the thick volumes of smoke signify power. The after part of the engine being like ordinary ones, and the coaches being similar in length attests the fact that by the usual means of travel the Saints may travel. The ancient form of the cars shows that the gospel anciently declared is the true mode of saving people. The small, black windows show that those within can see what is without, but those without can not see within. Except a man is born of water, he can not see the kingdom. The great length of the train is indicative of the extent of the work. Being loaded with Saints is easily understood.

The fact that his feeling that Christ is near, testifies that he is with the Saints, and is also moving in the hearts of many in the world.

The gulf is the line between the good and the bad, and the dark north represents the pleasant character of the land of the south in contrast with the unredeemed land, this being dark and cold as the icy regions of the north. There is an apparent parallel-ism between the churches of the day and the Church of Christ; but the gulf lies between.

After the gathering shall have been fully accomplished, fear and sorrow like wolves shall pursue the unrepentant. The dried trees of their religious systems shall afford them no shelter, and their supposed fine clothing of sanctity shall be found coarse and poor. When they shall find that their trees fail them, they will seek to those standing securely, and as the wolves were slain so shall they be relieved who earnestly seek.

The burning of the earth is most likely prefigured by the fire of the dream. And there will be safety during the burning as in "green, grassy slopes" in the west.

The orchard will prefigure the fact that among those in apparent security, many will fall because of unfaithfulness, yet many will stand.

The obscurity of the north shows that the secrets of the Lord will remain untold till he reveals them, as the north has so far defied man's researches.

The new world will far surpass our present, even so far that we can not now comprehend it.

His calmness shows his willingness to obey, that the paradise he saw may be his.

His anxiety for his parents shows the kindly, tender nature of the gospel ties, its family relationship, the depth of its love.

CONCERNING THE BOOK OF DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS.

[The following letters and extracts will probably explain themselves. First is a letter received from a brother in the church. He incloses a clipping from the Improvement Era. This clipping follows his letter and in turn is followed by a letter from Heman C. Smith, historian of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, to whom the matter was referred.]

LETTER FROM ISAAC ELIASON.

RACE TRACK, Montana, May 19, 1906.

Editors Saints Herald: You will find inclosed herewith a clipping from the Improvement Era, organ of Young Men's Mutual Improvement Association, of the Utah Mormons, issue of May, 1906, edited by Joseph F. Smith and Edward H. Anderson.

The communication therein answered I recognize as my own. I wrote it at Blackfoot City, Idaho, to Elder O. G. Wilde of the Utah church, he previously having informed me that there were no differences between the Lamoni and Salt Lake editions of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, excepting the revelation on plural marriage, which he charged the Reorganized Church with having left out. Later I had the privilege of conversing with Elder A. J. Layland of the Reorganization upon the matter, and partly arranged for a discussion between them. It failed by reason of Elder Wilde not being able to appear on date set.

After Layland's departure, I again met Mr. Wilde and informed him that there were many revelations in their book of covenants that were not in either the Lamoni or Liverpool editions. He seemed to doubt it, and I proposed writing Elder Layland for information regarding the differences. I received answer just before leaving there. I copied the numbers, and made assertions as I was led to understand conditions to be, in which it appears from their answer that I was grossly mistaken, which probably is true at least to a certain extent.

However, they have also erred in representing me as an elder of the Reorganized Church, as I am but a lay member, and, were I required to go under the standard of measure, would probably be quite insignificant as such.

The manuscripts I had in mind were those from which the Inspired Translation was published.

Inasmuch as they have used my penciled personal letter, and seem to hold the Reorganized Church responsible for its contents, I send you this note of explanation, and await your reprimand of my actions. Also, would like further information regarding their points of argument and information given in their answer.

Yours sincerely for the truth,

ISAAC ELIASON.

EXTRACT FROM THE "IMPROVEMENT ERA."

Please answer the questions in the following letter written by an elder of the Reorganized Church to a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

"February 28, 1906.

"Dear — —: Since you were here, I wrote elder — — [of the Reorganized Church] as I told you I would. Just received answer to-day. As we are going home Saturday morning, I do not suppose we will have the pleasure of seeing you again before we go. I will give you the information I wrote for, and I trust you will not destroy this until you secure the books herein referred to, and look the matter up for yourself. I feel sure these facts will stand your closest investigation.

"In the Liverpool edition of the Doctrine and Covenants, published for Orson Pratt by S. W. Richards, No. 15, Wilton Street, Liverpool, England, in the year 1854, there are one hundred and eleven sections, or chapters. There is in the publication a chapter on marriage limiting a man to one wife. The number of the chapter or section is 109. This section is left out of later editions and in its stead is the revelation on plural marriage.

"In the Salt Lake edition, published in the year 1898 by George Q. Cannon and Sons Co., there are one hundred and thirty-six sections, one of these being credited to Brigham Young, leaving 135 being credited to Joseph Smith.

"The number of the revelations added to editions published later than 1876, as found in the 1898 edition of Salt Lake, are as follows: Nos. 2, 13, 77, 85, 108, 109, 110, 111, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 120, 121, 122, 123, 125, 126, 130, 131, 132 and 136.

"None of the above revelations are published in the Liverpool edition, nor are they in any of the Lamoni editions. There are two revelations published in the Lamoni editions that are not found in any of the Utah editions, which are credited to Joseph Smith the Martyr; they are sections 22 and 36. These revelations are regarding Inspired Translation of the Scriptures, which manuscript did not fall into the hands of Brigham Young and his followers. Otherwise the Lamoni and Liverpool editions are the same.

"There is also published in the Lamoni editions the minutes of the general assembly of the church in 1835, which I do not believe appear in the Utah editions.

"Now, dear brother, inasmuch as you have shown a kind and devoted interest in my spiritual welfare, I feel that these references and facts should be of interest to you. God has given us our reason and faculties to exercise them, not to blindly accept nor to blindly reject, but to examine all things and hold fast to that which is good.

"The holy word also teaches us that we must be able to give a reason for the hope that is within us. Unless you can give a reason acceptable to a logical brain for the testimony you bear, how can you dare in the face of God and man to stand up and declare you know it (your church) to be of God? Are you right? Are you moved by the same deceptive power which caused Brigham Young and others to add the twenty-five revelations to suit their conditions, and say they were given through Joseph Smith?

"Now —, I feel deeply interested in you, and my earnest desire is that you may learn the truth.

"As I told you before, if you can prove one assertion made by the Reorganized Church to be false, or show me wherein they are trying to smother any historical fact regarding the church, or where they have taken from or added to any of the original manuscripts, I shall be through with them.

"But in my investigation, I have found that your church has largely departed from the faith, introduced false doctrines, and I can easily see wherein comes the necessity of a reorganization.

"Your sincere well-wishing brother, ever trusting and praying that we may be led in the strait and narrow way.

The foregoing communication is a fair sample of the chicanery so often resorted to by members of the "Reorganized" church, whenever they think such tricks may be indulged in by them successfully.

It appears that the reorganite writer of this letter wishes to convey the idea that it was "deceptive power which caused Brigham Young and others to add the twenty-five revelations [which appear in later editions of the Doctrine and Covenants] to suit their conditions, and say they were given through Joseph Smith." We are surprised at the stand he takes and the ignorance he manifests of the situation, since many of these revelations and commandments were published before the Prophet's death, and have been accepted—at least as having been given to the Prophet—by the officers of the "Reorganized" church.

President Brigham Young has been unjustly accused of many things; but this is the first time we have seen credit given him for the authorship of these sections which set forth some of the grandest principles revealed in this dispensation. So foolish is the statement, and so out of harmony with the well-established facts that we shall give it but a passing notice. It is sufficient to say that among these twenty-five sections said to have been "deceitfully added" by Brigham Young and others, "to suit their conditions," we have the following: The words spoken by the angel to Joseph Smith in his father's house, September 21, 1823, (Section 2); the words of John the Baptist in the ordination of Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery to the Aaronic Priesthood, (Section 13); the key to John's revelation, (Section 77); the revelation on War, predicting the rebellion of South Carolina, (Section 87); the prayer given by revelation and offered at the dedication of the Kirtland Temple, (Section 109); the visions of the Prophet and Oliver Cowdery, wherein the keys of the various dispensations were committed unto them, including those of the salvation for the dead, (Section 110); revelation concerning Far West and the building of a temple there, (Section 115); the naming of Adam-Ondi-Ahman, (Section 116); revelations on tithing, (Sections 119 and 120); and prayers and prophecies written by the Prophet in Liberty prison, (Sections 121, 122, and 123).

Surely no sane person possessing a belief in the mission of Joseph Smith will say that these were prepared "by deceptive power by President Brigham Young and others to suit their conditions."

It is a mistake to suppose that all the revelations given to the Prophet were published before his death, or even in the later editions of the Doctrine and Covenants, for he received many revelations that never have appeared in print, and, without doubt, many which were never recorded at all.

The two revelations referred to as being published in the Lamoni editions, (Section 22 and 36,) and not appearing in the editions published by the Church, because we never had the manuscript, is an error. Both of these revelations were published by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, in their completeness long before the "Reorganized" Church came into existence. These sections, as published by the reorganites, are but fragments taken from the Book of Moses, (See Pearl of Great Price, Book of Moses, chapters 1 and 7), the original manuscript of which never was in their possession but is on file in the archives of the Church, in Salt Lake City.

The minutes of the General Assembly referred to, were published in the first edition of the Doctrine and Covenants, and in that edition only. The "Reorganized" Church has never published them, at any rate, we have never seen an edition of their Doctrine and Covenants with them in, and we have examined quite a number. The fact is that those minutes would destroy one of their pet arguments; viz., that Section six on marriage was a revelation given through the Prophet Joseph Smith. That article is not a revelation and was never considered such by the Saints. It was read by W. W. Phelps, at a conference of the Church, held August 17, 1835, and ordered printed in the Doctrine and Covenants, after the revelations and commandments had been compiled by the committee, of whom the Prophet was the chairman, and had been accepted by the vote of the several quorums and the body of the Church. It is interesting to know, in this connection, that at the time of this conference, the Prophet and Frederick G. Williams were in Michigan, and did not return until August 23,—six days after the adoption of this article on marriage, hence they had no voice in that conference, but of necessity had to acquiesce in the action of the Saints in the adoption of this article as a rule of faith, which it continued to be until the reception of the law recorded in the 132nd section of the Doctrine and Covenants.

Most certainly President "Brigham Young and others," had a far better right to eliminate this section than the "Reorganized" church had to take out the first 75 pages of the Doctrine and Covenants, known as the Lectures on Faith; and this they did in publishing their edition of 1905.

If we had the least idea that the writer of the foregoing letter was sincere, we might place before him some evidence regarding false assertions made by the "Reorganized" church, and show wherein they are trying to smother historical facts. If he will carefully read almost any issue of the official papers of that church, he may find plenty of instances of that kind for himself. However, we will give him an example: On page 16, volume 2, of the History of the Church, published by the "Reorganization," a partial account of the proceedings of January 21, 1836, in the Kirtland Temple, are given. When the compilers (Messrs. Joseph Smith and Heman C. Smith) came to that portion of the proceedings which refers to the "Twelve Apostles of the Lamb," they eliminated it. It is as follows:

And I also beheld that all the children who die before they arrive at the years of accountability are saved in the celestial kingdom of heaven. I saw the Twelve Apostles of the Lamb who are now upon the earth, who hold the keys of this last ministry, fatigued, with their clothes tattered and feet swollen, with their eyes cast downward, and Jesus standing in their midst, and they did not behold Him. The Savior looked upon them and wept.

I also beheld Elder M'Lellin in the South, standing upon a hill, surrounded by a vast multitude, preaching to them, and a lame man standing before him supported by his crutches; he threw them down at his word and leaped as a hart, by the mighty power of God. Also I saw Elder Brigham Young standing in a strange land, in the far south and west, in a desert place, upon a rock in the midst of about a dozen men of color, who appeared hostile. He was preaching to them in their own tongue, and the angel of God, standing above his head, with a drawn sword in his hand, protecting him, but he did not see it. And I finally saw the Twelve in the celestial kingdom of God.

Is not the reason why they discarded this obvious?

LETTER FROM HEMAN C. SMITH.

ELDER F. M. SMITH, Independence, Missouri.

Dear Brother: In harmony with your suggestion of recent date that we prepare something concerning the history of the revelations in this latter-day dispensation, I present the following gleaned from the history and other documents accessible.

The revelations were given at different dates from the beginning of the ministry of Joseph Smith the Seer, but no effort was made at a compilation until late in 1831. On November 1 of this year there was a preface to the Book of Commandments given by revelation. Though the Book of Commandments was never perfected, that preface occupies a place in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, Section 1, which is also Section 1 of the Utah edition. Shortly after, the Book of Commandments and Revelations was dedicated to the service of Almighty God, by prayer, by Joseph Smith. This, however, was prior to its publication. In a short time after, Oliver Cowdery was chosen to carry the revelations to Independence, Missouri, where W. W. Phelps had gone with a printing-office, for the purpose of having them published.

At the time of the dedication of this book by prayer, or soon after, a revelation was given commanding John Whitmer to accompany Oliver Cowdery to Independence with these revelations.

At a council held at Independence, Missouri, May 1, 1832, it was ordered that three thousand copies of the Book of Commandments be printed; and W. W. Phelps, Oliver Cowdery, and John Whitmer were appointed to review and prepare such revelations as shall be deemed proper for publication.

We have but little information concerning the progress of this publication for a year or more; and on July 2, 1833, the First Presidency wrote to "the brethren in Zion," from Kirtland, Ohio, giving direction concerning the shipping of the books, directing that they should be consigned to N. K. Whitney & Co., Kirtland, Ohio. This gives us to understand that it was expected that they would soon be completed. Shortly after this the trouble began in Independence, Missouri, during which the printing-office where the work was being issued was destroyed by the mob. As nearly as we can determine from the information in our possession, the book was not finished, but was being printed. In the destruction of the printing-office, they were scattered in the streets, and some printed sheets were gathered up and preserved, and a few copies are still in existence. The book, however, was not completed, nor compared with the originals at the time. A subsequent comparison disclosed the fact that there were many errors in it. These revelations were also, some of them, printed in a periodical issued from the same publishing house, known as the Evening and Morning Star. In that paper, volume 2, page 384, there is a communication concerning these as follows:

There are many typographical errors in both volumes, and especially in the last, which we shall endeavor carefully to correct, as well as principle, if we discover any. It is also proper for us to say, that in the first fourteen numbers, in the revelations, are many errors, typographical, and others, occasioned by transcribing manuscript; but as we shall have access to originals, we shall endeavor to make proper corrections.

The first fourteen numbers of this Evening and Morning Star were published at Independence, Missouri, edited by W. W. Phelps; but when the press was destroyed, the paper was transferred to Kirtland, Ohio, and edited by Oliver Cowdery, where these fourteen numbers were reprinted.

As an instance of the errors and the correction of them, we find in the first number of the original issue what is now section 17 of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants substantially as it appears in the Book of Commandments; but when reprinted at Kirtland, Ohio, it appeared substantially as it is found in the Doctrine and Covenants; and the difference is explained by Oliver Cowdery, the editor, as follows:

On the revelations we merely say, that we were not a little surprised to find the previous print so different from the original. We have given them a careful comparison, assisted by individuals whose known integrity and ability is unassailable. Thus saying we cast no reflections upon those who were intrusted with the responsibility of publishing them in Missouri, as our own labors were included in that important service to the church, and it was our unceasing endeavor to have them correspond with the copy furnished us. We believe they are now correct. If not in every word, at least in principle. For the special good of the church we have also added a few items from other revelations.—Editor of the Latter Day Saints' Messenger and Advocate, Evening and Morning Star, vol. 1, p. 16.

A still further correction was made in the third issue of the Evening and Morning Star, volume 2, page 193, and this time it was corrected to be just as it now appears in the Doctrine and Covenants. The editor, Oliver Cowdery, states:

We have again inserted the articles and covenants according to our promise in a previous number, for the benefit of our brethren abroad who have not the first number of the first volume. As there were some errors which had got into them by transcribing, we have since obtained the original copy and made the necessary corrections.—Evening and Morning Star, vol. 2, p. 196.

It would appear from these statements that the first correct publication in book form of the revelations was in the Doctrine and Covenants, which was published in 1835. To doubt this is to doubt the veracity of Oliver Cowdery, who was intrusted to take the revelations to Independence to be printed; and also that of many others who were conversant with the facts in those times.

Elder John Whitmer also, who was associated with Oliver Cowdery and Phelps in revising or preparing these revelations, states in his address when leaving the editorial chair of the Messenger and Advocate, March, 1836, as follows:

I would do injustice to my own feelings if I did not here notice still further the work of the Lord in these last days; The revelations and commandments given to us are, in my estimation, equally true with the Book of Mormon, and equally necessary for salvation. It is necessary to live by every word that proceedeth from the mouth of God: and I know that the Bible, Book of Mormon, and Book of Doctrine and Covenants of the Church of Christ of Latter Day Saints contain the revealed will of heaven. I further know that God will continue to reveal himself to his church and people, until he has gathered his elect into his fold, and prepared them to dwell in his presence.—Messenger and Advocate, vol. 2, p. 287.

To the Doctrine and Covenants, then, adopted by the General Assembly, at Kirtland, Ohio, August 17, 1835, we must look for the first authentic publication of the revelations in book form.

This work has been published many times and in several different languages. Revelations given after the first edition were added to future editions from time to time. Some of the revelations, however, which seemed to be well authenticated, did not find their way into the book until years after, some of them perhaps not at all.

But we have now but the two publications of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, one issued at Lamoni, Iowa, by the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and one issued at Salt Lake City, Utah, each purporting to give the revelations of God to the church. In the publication issued at Lamoni, aside from the communications received by the present President of the Reorganized Church, we have two communications purporting to come through Joseph Smith the Seer which are not found in the Salt Lake edition. They are sections 22 and 36.

In the clipping which you sent me I observe that the editors of the Improvement Era claim that these two were published long before they were published by the Reorganized Church, or before it came into existence. If this be true, no explanation is given as to why the publication is not now continued, in the book issued by them. It is charged further in this clipping that these sections as published by the Reorganized Church, are fragments taken from the Book of Moses.

We have taken the pains to examine these two communications as first published in Times and

Seasons, and find that these as now published in the Doctrine and Covenants are substantially the same. We have carefully proof-read them and find no differences of any consequence. In section 22 the word afterwards is now published afterward; and besides now reads beside. The word was is changed to were, which corrects the phraseology, and behold to beheld, these being all the differences we noted in this communication. (See Times and Seasons, vol. 4, p. 71.)

In section 36 we found the following changes: The word die for the word did. The word die as it appears in the Doctrine and Covenants is evidently correct; for in the Times and Seasons the sentence is as follows: "Go to this people and say unto them, Repent, lest I come out and smite them with a curse, and they did." In the sentence, "And the roar of the lion was heard out of the wilderness," the Times and Seasons has the word lion pluralized.

In the sentence reading in the Doctrine and Covenants, "And the Lord said unto Enoch, As I live, then so will I come in the last days," reads in the Times and Seasons, "And the Lord said unto Enoch, As I live, even so will I come in the last days."

A continuation of the same sentence reads in the Doctrine and Covenants: "In the days of wickedness and vengeance to fulfill the oath which I have made unto you concerning the children of Noah." In the Times and Seasons the word have is omitted, so it reads, "which I made unto you."

So you will observe that the changes are very few; and if we are publishing a fragment of the revelations now, then there were only fragments published in the time of Joseph Smith, as these revelations were published in 1843, section 22 January 16 when John Taylor was editor; and section 36 on October 1, 1843, John Taylor still editor. These as is well known were both in the days of Joseph Smith and evidently at his sanction.

Whatever the Utah people may have in addition to these we are not prepared to say; but agreeing with the original publications we are content.

The Utah Doctrine and Covenants contains several revelations purporting to have been given through Joseph Smith, the Seer, not found in the Lamoni edition. They are sections 2, 13, 77, 85, 87, 108, 109, 110, 111, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 120, 121, 122, 123, 125, 126, 129, 130, 131, 132.

Taking these up consecutively we note that section 2 is a part of the language of the angel to Joseph Smith, on the 21st of September, 1823, concerning the restoration of the priesthood.

Section 13 is the words of John the Baptist used in ordaining Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery.

Section 77 purports to be a key to John's revelation given through Joseph Smith the Seer, at Hiram, Portage County, Ohio, about the first of March, 1832. We had a manuscript of this in the office before the fire in the handwriting of Joseph Smith, and took occasion to compare this revelation as published in this Salt Lake edition Book of Doctrine and Covenants, and found many changes, some of them important. There was a question with its answer preceding the first as it appears in this Doctrine and Covenants. Another question is omitted between questions 7 and 8, and one between 8 and 9. A part of the answer to question 12 is omitted, and a part of the answer to 14 also.

We regret that we have not the manuscript now to supply these omissions; have simply noted them in margin of the book. There are so many other changes that it is not profitable or necessary to notice all. One important one is in answer to question 3, which in the Salt Lake edition of the Doctrine and Covenants reads:

"They are limited to four individual beasts, which were shown to John, to represent the glory of the classes of beings, in their destined order or sphere of creation, in the enjoyment of their eternal felicity." In the original this read, "distinct order or sphere of action," etc. Question 10 as it appears in the Salt Lake edition of the Doctrine and Covenants, was not in the original manuscript. The changes are so numerous that space will not allow us to mention all; some of them immaterial, and some more or less material. In answer to question 13 where the book reads: "after the opening of the seventh seal, before the coming of Christ," the original reads "at or just before the coming of Christ."

Section 85 is a quotation from a letter written by Joseph Smith, November 27, 1832, to the Saints of Jackson County, Missouri, concerning history and church records, etc., closing with the prediction so often published, concerning the Lord's sending one "mighty and strong," holding the scepter of power in his hands, etc.

Section 87 is the revelation on the rebellion, published in the Lamoni edition as an appendix. The remainder of these sections so far as we have been able to determine, were not published at all during the life time of Joseph Smith.

Section 108 purports to be a revelation given December 26, 1835, to Lyman Sherman.

Section 109 is the prayer supposed to have been uttered by Joseph Smith in the dedication of the Kirtland Temple, March 27, 1836. Section 110 is taken from the history of Joseph Smith, published after his death, purporting to be visions manifested to Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery, in the Kirtland Temple, April 3, 1836.

Section 111 purports to be a revelation given August 6, 1836, concerning Zion, the payment of debts, etc.

Section 113 purports to be questions answered by Joseph Smith, March, 1838, on the revelation of St. John.

Section 114 purports to be a revelation given to David W. Patten, April 17, 1838.

Section 115 is a revelation given April 26, 1838, concerning the building of the Lord's house at Far West, the name of the Church, etc.

Section 116 is a statement consisting of three lines and a fraction, which purports to have been given May 19, 1838; near Wight's Ferry, in Daviess County, Missouri, pointing out that that particular spot was where the Ancient of Days shall sit as spoken of by Daniel the prophet.

Section 117 is dated July 8, 1838, and purports to be a revelation given to William Marks and N. K. Whitney.

Section 118 is dated July 8, 1838, is addressed to the Twelve, and names John Taylor, John E. Page, Wilford Woodruff, and Willard Richards for positions in that quorum.

Section 120 is an addenda to what is section 106 in the Lamoni edition of the Doctrine and Covenants stating that the means obtained by the execution of the revelation preceding it is to be disposed of by the First Presidency, the Bishop and his council, and the High Council.

Section 121 purports to be a prayer and prophecy written by Joseph Smith in Liberty jail, March 20, 1839.

Section 122 purports to be a revelation given March, 1839, in Liberty jail.

Section 123 is also dated March, 1839, from Liberty jail, setting forth what the duty of the Saints is regarding their persecutors. It purports to be a communication from Joseph Smith, and God is spoken of in the third person.

Section 125 purports to be a revelation given March, 1841, concerning the building of the city of Zarahemla opposite Nauvoo.

Section 126 purports to be a revelation given through Joseph Smith the Seer, in the house of Elder Brigham Young, in Nauvoo, Illinois, July 9, instructing Brigham Young that he is no more required to leave his family, for his offering is acceptable to God but he shall henceforth send his word abroad and take special care of his family.

Section 129 purports to be a revelation given February 9, 1843, giving three grand keys by which good or bad angels, or spirits, may be known.

Section 130 is composed of what purports to be important items of instruction given by Joseph Smith the Prophet, April 2, 1843, in which is contained the following:

Joseph, my son, if thou livest until thou art 85 years old, thou shalt see the face of the Son of Man; therefore let this suffice, and trouble me no more on this matter. I was left thus, without being able to decide whether this coming referred to the beginning of the millennium or to some previous appearing, or whether I should die and thus see his face.

Comment on this is unnecessary. I observe only that certain things are contingent upon Joseph living to a certain age and he was left in doubt as to whether it meant he should die or not.

Section 131 purports to be remarks of the prophet Joseph, at Ramus, Illinois, May 16 and 17, 1843, on the three heavens or degrees.

Section 132 is the revelation known as the revelation on the eternity of the marriage covenant, including the plurality of wives, purporting to have been given July 12, 1843. The facts concerning this revelation have been discussed for years, and we shall not enter into the discussion further.

Some of these revelations are probably genuine; for instance the one calling John Taylor, Wilford Woodruff, John E. Page, Willard Richards to the Quorum of Twelve; for it was soon after this that these men were ordained and placed in the quorum. So there must have been some communication providing for their ordination.

We have not taken the pains to compare each of these with the record as published in the Millennial Star after the death of Joseph Smith. It is not material anyway, only as showing where differences occur that the publications are not to be relied upon as being correct.

This I believe, in brief, is about what is needed by way of the history of the revelations contained in the two editions of the Doctrine and Covenants.

In the clipping you send me I notice that the editor of the Improvement Era criticises the history compiled by Joseph Smith and Heman C. Smith, because certain things found in the publication of the history in the Millennial Star were not copied. Right here permit us to state that we were careful about including anything upon the authority of the Millennial Star. Though we did quote largely from it, we quoted only such things as we had corroborative evidence for the correctness of. When a statement depended solely upon that publication we were doubtful about the correctness of it; and though in some instances a statement may have been correct, we omitted it because of uncertainty. The wisdom of the caution used is justified by their own statement regarding the liberty taken with the history as published in the Millennial Star after the death of Joseph Smith. In the first volume of their history of the church we find the following:

The history of Joseph Smith is now before the world, and we are satisfied that a history more correct in its details than this was never published. To have it strictly correct, the greatest possible pains have been taken by the historians and clerks engaged in the work. They were eye and ear witnesses of nearly all the transactions recorded in this history, most of which were reported as they transpired, and, where they were not personally present, they have had access to those who were. Moreover, since the death of the Prophet Joseph, the history has been carefully revised under the strict inspection of President Brigham Young, and approved by him. We, therefore, hereby bear our testimony to all the world, unto whom these words shall come, that the history of Joseph Smith is true, and is one of the most authentic histories ever written.—Pages 5 and 6 of Preface.

Observe that the writings of Joseph Smith, though published as his own, were not relied upon, but the historians and clerks depended upon their own, or the knowledge of those interviewed. In addition to this, it was carefully revised under strict inspection of Brigham Young.

If there are any other items that we have omitted that you would like our assistance in looking up, we will be glad to make the effort. I remain,

Sincerely your brother in gospel bonds,

HEMAN C. SMITH.

THE INDIAN IN POLITICS.

Oklahoma will be the first American State to have at its beginning any large part of its voters of a race other than the Caucasian. The fact that Indians with full rights of citizenship are a large element in Oklahoma's population has given its organization as a State an unwonted interest. How would the Indians, there given for the first time a powerful voice in government, use their powers?

The record of Oklahoma's constitutional convention, which has just adjourned, shows that the Indians there need no tutoring in practical politics. They proved that they knew what they wanted and how to get it. They showed political efficiency at every step along the road. The Indian delegates controlled the convention, shaped its work, and made the constitution which it has submitted to the people.

The Indian communities of Oklahoma seem to have been much more alive than the white to the importance of the convention. All the newspaper correspondents agree that the Indian delegates averaged higher than the white. Most of the white communities seem to have sent to the convention men of the mediocre grade that get elected to State Legislatures in "off" years. The Indian communities sent their best men, those most highly educated and experienced in affairs.

The Indian delegates were strictly up to date in their political ideas, in some respects rather alarmingly so. The constitution they framed for the new State contains about all the "reform" ideas going. It has been well described as "a bundle of panaceas," and as "a terrible example of the mania for constitutional regulation in its most virulent form." Here is a summary of its principal provisions:

The initiative and referendum; the direct primary for all offices; prohibition of the liquor traffic; partial woman suffrage; two-cent railroad fares; railroads prohibited from owning any productive agency of a natural commodity, such as mines or forests; corporations prohibited from owning land not actually used in their business or from dealing in real estate outside of incorporated cities; "stock watering" prohibited; corporation books to be open for inspection at all times; the segregated mineral lands in the old Indian Territory to remain State property; commissions to deal with charities, labor and arbitration, insurance, railroads, agriculture, oil- and gas-wells, coal and other mines, prohibition of the marriage of negroes and whites, with definition of the term "negro"; compulsory and separate school systems; Constitution may be amended at any time by majority vote.

The last provision is one that compels admiration, in view of some of the others. It is a frank admission that the constitution makers are not under the delusion that they are so wise that their work can not be improved. It leaves the people of Oklahoma free, whenever they reach the conclusion that their Constitution regulates things altogether too much, to modify its provisions as they please with small ceremony.

The statesmanship of the Indians who made the Oklahoma Constitution would seem to savor rather strongly of blind devotion to academic theory and to have been swayed overmuch by the radical tendencies of the day. But of their political efficiency there is no doubt. Though an actual minority of the new State's population, they considered what they wanted, made up their minds, went straight after it, and got it. On the practical side of politics it is plain that these Indians are fully developed.—Public Opinion, April 27, 1907.

BRIDGE WHIST.

Away back in the dim shadows of the centuries a mind that was a veritable mountain-peak of intelligence invented the deck of playing-cards. And with this achievement there was brought into the world a heritage of trouble and tragedy that will warrant a tremendous reckoning in the final readjustment of things. The invention of playing-cards was a mathematical marvel upon which human ingenuity has not been able to improve throughout the ages, and succeeding generations of men have taken up playing-cards and laid them down at the end of a lifetime without doing more than devising new games, discovering new combinations, and discerning new problems. The cards themselves have remained practically the same except in variation as to the numbers in the suits. The Egyptians played euchre at the time of Joseph, and the Chinese game of fan-tan was a favorite method of gambling long before the Christian Era. . . .

Bridge whist is not a new game, but was played as early as the days of American colonization. That its rediscovery has inflamed the civilized world within a few years is one of those many mysteries that hang upon the history of card gambling. Besides offering somewhat varied and spectacular opportunities of setting wagers, bridge whist is an unattractive and an unscientific hazard. But it is a craze that has swept over England and America leaving ruin and degradation in its path.

The trail of bridge tragedies has been all too resourceful of terrible examples to the moralists and those who would stem the baneful influence which this game has exerted and is still exerting in society. Its devotees go to the last desperate extremes in the wild and irrational pace it sets, and to-day gambling among women is stimulated to an alarming extent because of it. Pulpit and press have been arrayed against it, but with little apparent effect. It finds its victims in high places and it too often leaves them leveled to the standard of common gamblers. It has entered homes which it has left only with the auctioneer and the casket. We in America are fortunate in that it has not taken the hold here that it has taken in England, but we know quite enough. When will it run its course? Upon the answer to this question depend the happiness, the fortunes, and the reputations of thousands.—Kansas City Journal, April 22, 1907.

A REFORM MOVEMENT IN THE SOUTH.

The greatest evils which the use of liquor could bring have been suffered extensively, in fact to a greater degree, in the South than in any other part of the country. The whole South is saddened in these later years by the knowledge that vast numbers of her many honorable families have come to utter ruin and degradation because of this evil. The lavish hospitality of former years has left a curse in the blood of later generations that has almost destroyed the aristocracy of the South. There can not be found a single Southern family of any position socially that has not reaped its harvest of sorrow and disgrace.

These things burn their facts more deeply into the hearts of women than of men, and it will not be easy to find a true Southern woman who is indifferent to this question.

The race problem is also involved. This is an unanswered problem, but there are some questions in regard to it that can be answered, and the liquor question is one of them. In the first place it must be understood that the negroes are not steady drinkers. They generally drink considerable liquor on their holidays and "play days." But I have not been able to discover one who is a daily slave to the habit, and I have been at some pains to investigate. I am told by men of wide experience among them that a negro can stop drinking and go for months without the slightest nervous inconvenience. They never have delirium tremens, although many of them on occasion will become utterly besotted for weeks with the vilest poison that Kentucky can produce. The drug habit is very prevalent among the town negroes, especially the use of cocaine. But the field hands and small renters who form the great bulk of the colored population do not drink or use cocaine except on such rare occasions as they come to town. The town negroes drink only when impulse and opportunity conjoin. In drinking they consume a larger quantity than a white man could survive, and when they combine cocaine with their liquor, as is frequently the case, they become unchained devils, absolutely fearless, irresponsible, vicious, and desperate. It is in this condition that their crimes are committed. In all the long roll of murder, vicious assault, and the like which the records of this country contain, whisky and cocaine are the original causes. Under the influence of these poisons the mildest mannered houseboy has been known to exterminate a family. Within the last three months two negroes have run amuck through the streets of Greenville and have murdered and seriously wounded a number of citizens, and in both cases the negroes were usually meek and innocent persons. It can be easily understood why it is that white men regard a drink-frenzied negro as they would a mad dog.

The better will of the South is to keep liquor out of the hands of the boys, young men, and the negroes, and the only method which seems to offer any help in this direction is through county and state prohibition.—Philip G. Davidson in the Hawk Eye.

A "SIMPLE LIFE" CHURCH.

"Simple livers" are to have a church—or a number of churches—of their own.

With an influential body of supporters behind it a society of admirers of the simple life has been formed. They expect shortly to open the first simplicitarian church in London.

The first "minister" will be Doctor Kenneth MacDonald, who is also engaged in the preparation of the official hymn-book. For this publication he has himself written over 200 "simple life" and "new thought" poems.

Whilst the "simplicitarians" will make their official beginning in the Metropolis, their program is to found settlements in rural districts, with a garden city headquarters, not unlike the Zion City of the Dowie church in its completeness, though, of course, without its corruption.

Amongst the features of the proposed settlement are carefully-prepared plans for workmen's dwellings on most original sanitary lines, and the "church" will be able to let its workmen members flats of three rooms and offices at one shilling per week, making a profit of ten per cent out of the transaction!

"The name we have chosen most thoroughly expresses our aims," said Doctor MacDonald to a Daily Dispatch representative. "It came to me as an inspiration when I was being heckled by a Midland audience. A man got up and asked me what I really called myself, and on the spur of the moment the word 'simplicitarian' slipped from me.

"Simplicity in all things, that is the essence of our belief. One of the books most in sympathy with our teaching is Ruskin's Unto This Last. We are anti-monopolists, and hold that all men and women are entitled to the inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

"It is to be a political 'church' then?"

"Decidedly not," replied Doctor MacDonald. "Of course, politics—idealistic politics—form a substantial part of our program, because I hold that everything which concerns the well-being of the people is inseparable from the true religion of the people. The 'simplicitarian' teaching is a broad Christian teaching blended with all that is sanest and noblest in social and political movements.

"The simplicitarians will abolish the doctors and teach men to seek for the cure of all their diseases within themselves. No, it is not Christian science exactly. A better designation is 'nature cures.' Members must not use drugs or patent medicines. We hold that every ailment can be cured by sunshine and water, and we claim that the medical profession, with its astounding privileges, is a gigantic 'bluff'—that the practice of medicine—as distinct from surgery—has made practically no progress since the days of the ancients.

"We are against the principle of town life, and desire to get the people settled back on the land in garden city communities. We oppose vaccination and every movement interfering with the liberty of the subject. We plead for simplicity in services for worship and in church organization, and we are pledged vegetarians.

"A very large number of well-known advanced thinkers have expressed their sympathy with the movement, and I believe the time is ripe for a sect on a far broader basis than the churches of to-day. Our services will be quite simple, a hymn—I am busily engaged on the hymn-book—a prayer for a cleanlier, less complex civilization, and an address on health betterment lines."—Manchester, England, Daily Dispatch, April 17, 1907.

Mothers' Home Column

EDITED BY FRANCES.

I Know.

I know thy sorrow, child; I know it well,
Thou need'st not try with broken voice to tell—
Just let Me lay thy head here on My breast,
And find here sweetest comfort, perfect rest!
Thou need'st not bear the burden, child, thyself,
I yearn to take it all upon Myself!
Then trust it all to Me, to-day—to-morrow—
Yes, e'en for ever, for I know thy sorrow.

Long years I planned it all for thee,
Prepared it that thou might'st find need of Me;
Without it, child, thou would'st not come to find
This place of comfort in this love of Mine.
Had'st thou no cross like this for Me to bear,
Thou would'st not feel the need of My strong care,
But in thy weakness thou did'st come to Me,
And thus, through this My plan, I have won thee.

I know thy sorrow and I love thee more,
Because for such as thee I came and bore
The wrong, the shame, the pain of Calvary,
That I might comfort give to such as thee.
So, resting here, my child, thy hand in Mine,
Thy sorrow, to My care, to-day resign,
Dread not that some new care will come to-morrow—
What does it matter—I know all thy sorrow.

And I will gladly take it all for thee,
If only thou wilt trust it all to Me;
Thou need'st not stir, but in My love lie still,
And learn the sweetness of the Father's will.
That will was only planned for the best;
So, knowing this, lie still and sweetly rest—
Trust Me. The future shall not bring to thee
But that will bring thee closer still to Me.

If the Master is Pleased.

Dear Home Column: May I come in to chat, with the hope that what I may say will be of benefit to some, and injure no one? In a past number of the HERALD was a letter written by a brother who told us of a sister that attended a meeting but did not enjoy it, among so many finely-dressed sisters. Now, for my part I would rather we all dressed in a simple manner; but we are living in a progressive age, so why not let every one wear what she can afford. When a calico dress was my best, I never envied those who wore silk, and if we wear a calico dress to meeting with the spirit of contentment, we will look just as beautiful in God's sight as our sisters who wear finer clothing. I fear we will never be a happy people while we bother about what others wear or about what they have. Rather let us try to think that our brothers and sisters have a right to wear what they can afford, and that we have the right to wear what we can afford, and though our lives have been filled with crosses and should the time come that we Tire of sowing for others to reap,

And of labor with little reward,

Let us gather burdens one by one,
And carry them to the Lord.

Then the still small voice so dear to our soul,
Will whisper, Child, be of good cheer;
You are doing the part I gave you to do;
Work on with never a fear.

Then we'll take up our task with cheerful heart,
And begin our duties anew;
If the Master is pleased with our simple part,
We will do what he wants us to do.

March 24, 1907.

He Said "No."

The great Young Men's Christian Association Convention recently held in Boston brought delegates from all parts of the world to testify to the value of the Christian religion as the highest rule of conduct for a practical life. It was natural, as the delegates met each other, for them to exchange vital experiences. The following was told by one who had traveled eight thousand miles to attend the meetings:

"My father was a rancher on a small scale in Australia. He had only a thousand sheep or so and a couple of square miles of run for pasture. He was an English emigrant of sturdy yeoman stock, and while the free life of a shepherd had taught him tolerance and kindness, he remained true in principle to the strict lessons of his early years.

"The nearest neighbors or station was ten miles away, but the ranchmen used to think nothing of riding twenty or forty miles to a centrally located farm on Saturdays to spend the night in carousal, and ride back on Sunday.

"The isolation was so depressing and the heat so exhausting that when the men came together once a week in this way, drinking and gambling seemed inevitable. In the kindled passion and excitement of these coarse pleasures they thought they might forget for a few hours the suffering and privation of their lot.

"At last it was my fathers turn to entertain. He must invite the herders of the kraals and ranches within a radius of nearly fifty miles.

"Boys,' he said to his two sons, my brother and myself, 'it's the parting of the ways. We either live as we have lived, simply, in the fear of God, minding our own business, paying our debts if we can, saving money if possible, and being cut by every man around here, or we fall into the ways of our neighbors, and drink and gamble ourselves into perdition. I am not going to break your mother's heart, and I say "No," even if they burn us down.'

"It was the critical moment of our lives. I could have fallen at my father's feet and worshiped him when he made that decision. He looked like a god—determined and invincible.

"So it came about that my brother and I divided the circuit between us, and I rode to the north and he to the south. To every ranchman this message went, 'Father invites you for Saturday and Sunday as usual. There will be no cards or liquor—only a quiet talk about old England and the welfare of the colony.'

"We waited that Saturday afternoon with trembling, not expecting a single guest. But suddenly one rode up and then another, and another, until the whole section was represented. There never had been so large a gathering. They came in curiosity and with respect.

"With mother opposite him, father said grace at table, and we boys saw tears flow down rugged cheeks. That night the men talked long about bushmen and rabbits and fences and drought, and how to stand by each other.

"The next morning, as he did every Sunday morning, father conducted prayers, this time before fifty of the roughest men I had ever seen assembled; and there was singing of hymns, broken here and there by sobs and by tears. When they parted, my father, although a recent comer, was the acknowledged leader of the community.

"That section became the most prosperous section in all the country round. And I thought if Christian courage could accomplish that, it was good enough for me to live and die by. My father's 'No' was the one thing needed to save the community, and it saved it."—Selected.

Letter Department

GLOVER, Michigan.

Editors Herald: I feel somewhat surprised myself this evening in writing to your valuable paper, for if one had told me at the supper-table that I was going to write, I would have told him he knew nothing about it, as such a thought had not entered my mind. My thoughts were to hurry and get my work done, get the children to bed, so I could retire early, as I felt somewhat tired. While washing dishes my little four-year-old tot asked me to tell her a story, so I told her one I had read in the Hope; and when she wanted another I asked one of the boys to get a Hope and read a story to sister, and as he was reading about the resurrection and ascension of Jesus, she looked up in his face and asked a number of questions, and one was, "What is an angel?" He says, "You tell her, mamma; you can explain it better than I." Well, I did the best I could, but felt my inability to explain to one so young, and found myself immediately asking God to give me wisdom and knowledge that I might give her the right understanding, as she has a great memory, and perhaps will never forget what is taught her now.

Oh, how easy to plant (little by little) gospel truth in their little minds, and it seems to me we have ample time by the time they are eight or nine years old to have the gospel taught to them thoroughly. I knew nothing of the restored gospel when I was a child but was brought up to all the light my parents had, went to Sabbath-school with other children, and enjoyed myself in that work. At the age of thirteen I was baptized, and received in full membership in the Methodist Episcopal Church, after having proved myself worthy by living faithful for six months, as the custom was. I remained in the church for seven years, living to all the light I had, when I heard the beautiful gospel story and accepted it shortly after. Then my great desire was that my husband might accept it, also. I prayed for him night and day, but he seemed to have no desire to obey, though not opposed to the work. He always seemed willing to do his part in caring for our two-day meetings and conferences, but that was not enough for me. I longed to see him obey, so I kept on praying.

I remember at the close of a conference held in the Huron Center Branch, Eastern Michigan District, about nine years ago, on Monday morning, we had a prayer-meeting, J. A. Grant and E. C. Briggs in charge. I arose to bear my testimony, and it seemed to me I was caught up in the air, so that I stood just a little above the congregation, and there with the Spirit of God resting upon me I asked the Saints to pray for my companion that he might obey the gospel. When I sat down I felt somewhat surprised to think I would ask an assembly that were nearly all strangers to him to pray for him. I felt a little worked up over it (but still knew it was the promptings of the Spirit) until evening services, when we gathered again for preaching.

The opening prayer was by E. C. Briggs. He prayed for the husband of that sister who this day had asked (in the Spirit) the prayers of the Saints. He prayed that he might obey the gospel. After meeting was closed he searched me out, in a crowded house, and told me not to be discouraged, that my husband would yet obey the truth. Those were comforting words to me for I believed them, but did not stop praying. A few years after that our daughter wanted to be baptized, but as she was young in years her father thought she would not be able to live right, and said she would better wait awhile longer, but gave his consent. She was baptized the last of March, 1902, by F. C. Smith, at Bay Port, where we then resided. In the fall of 1903, Elder J. Bailey came to Glover to give patriarchal blessings, my nephew, E. M. Wyman, acting as scribe. I felt happy and rejoiced to think we might receive a blessing. A number of Saints gathered at the home of Bro. Umphreys, and there I was told to so live that God's Spirit might rule within me, and my prayers would be answered to my peace and comfort. Before I came home that afternoon, while the Spirit was present, I asked Bro. Bailey to pray for my companion, and he said (with his face shining so brightly with the Spirit), "Your prayers will be answered." I came home rejoicing and felt the clouds were breaking away, and the time near at hand when I would have a helper in this work. In May, 1904, our youngest son wanted to be baptized, but his father thought him too young; but after a few days gave his consent, the time was set, and the Saints and friends gathered at our house to go with us to the water, when, to my joy, husband said to me, "Can you get me some clothes? I am going to be baptized." I could not express my joy as I stood at the water's edge and realized my prayers were being answered to my peace and comfort, as I saw Elder J. A. Grant lead them forth into the waters of baptism. I still had another one I desired to see in God's work. My prayers were answered in his behalf, and he was baptized in June, 1904, at the Coleman conference, by Elder Levi Phelps. Now I can say God is true to his promise.

I have a desire to so live that I may be the means in God's hands in helping to bring up our two little girls so that when they come to the years of accountability they may have the gospel thoroughly stamped in their memory; as I believe this is the right time to teach them; and I am glad that in God's work there will be a home built for homeless children where the gospel can be taught them. My prayers are not only for my own, but would love to see all mankind obey and live the gospel.

Your sister in gospel bonds,
MRS. VADA HARDER.

PLYMOUTH, Massachusetts, April 28, 1907.

Editors Herald: I esteem it a great pleasure to have the right to express my gratefulness for the message that has been brought about by the angel. I am laboring in Brockton part of the time with Saints that I can truly say appreciate the gospel message, and I for one can not enjoy this life with any greater pleasure than to stand before people that appreciate this work. I want to labor just as he wants me to labor. It is given that man can bring about much righteousness of his own free will, but when we have the Holy Spirit to attend the word which is spoken, it is worth everything else besides. I can truly say that I love to tell this gospel story—that is, when the Lord sees fit that I should tell it; and I want to do it in the spirit of meekness and love, and if I can not teach them the way of righteousness I do not want to say anything about it. It is precious after you have told the gospel story to present it in example. Oh, how we need to have this spirit of truth continually with us! I believe it is our privilege to be filled with the Spirit. We know as long as we are in this life as it is, and meeting with those forces that are at work, they will cause afflictions, but if we are patient in them, they will work for us a far more and exceeding weight of glory. We can see it is a necessity to have tribulation, for they will bring us nearer the Lord. Jesus says that in this world we shall have tribulation, but in him we shall have peace. Our great Captain has overcome the world. All that is required of you and me is to follow him, and he will lead us on to those virtues that are spoken of by the apostle Peter.

I love this work, for there is no inconsistency in it. All the parts when in place make a complete whole. Who would not want to do all he could if he understood the message? I can see why Bro. Frank's cup was running over when he saw the work misrepresented and did not have the chance to tell his side of the story. I hope and pray that I will be successful in winning souls to Christ. I see by the General Conference appointments that the apostles, Gomer Griffiths and U. W. Greene, have some of the Eastern States to canvass. I hope they will not forget Brockton and Plymouth.

ADAMSON, Indian Territory, May 3, 1907.

Editors Herald: As it has been a long time since I wrote you, I will pen a few lines. We have left Wilburton, where we lived for seventeen years, and have moved out in the woods where we discovered a fine vein of coal, so we started a town, and the railway company called the town after me.

Well, we have a fine coal-mining camp. Our coal is about five feet thick, a fine quality. Plenty of sale for coal. We need about twenty coal-miners and engineers, and a good blacksmith. We pay union scale. No strike. No trouble.

We have a good church organized here, also Sunday-school. We have had the missionaries to visit us, F. A. Smith, G. H. Hilliard, Ellis Short, Brn. Baldwin, Jackson, Bailey, John Harp, and Henson. All preached the gospel in Adamson. In the absence of our missionaries I have preached every Sabbath. The interest here is good.

Our reunion is to be held in August, lasting ten days. We expect to have a good representation of leading elders with us. Let the Saints try to come together, and have a season of rejoicing.

Any of the Saints wishing to come to Indian Territory, please write me first.

PETER ADAMSON, SR.

GREENWOOD, Missouri, April 10, 1907.

Dear Herald: I wish to say a few words. The Lord of heaven has spoken to his people on the earth in these last days. Among the many things he has called his people to do is to build a sanitarium for the benefit of those who are in need of such. The fund is growing slowly according to our Bishop's report. Shall we who are well sacrifice a little of our means to help those who are afflicted? I know a sister who was not expected to live who had saved up ten dollars and sent it to the sanitarium fund. How many are there of the fifty thousand or more members who will follow her example? The sanitarium will be built. We have the rock; it is sky-blue in color, and there is not a stone building in Kansas City or Independence that compares with it. We have the stone and have saved at least ten thousand below the market price. It gives us encouragement to help with our means. We also have enough stone for the children's home and the temple when the time comes to build that. Now, dear Saints, let us work while it is day; the night cometh when we can not work.

C. J. CARLSON.

Editors Herald: In reference to the death of my dear father, the late Bishop Thomas Taylor, I desire to express through the columns of the HERALD the sincere thanks of my husband, self, and family, to all friends at home and abroad for their kind expressions of sympathy and condolence in our sad loss. Your sister in bonds,

EMMA ROBERT.

NORTH MENTOR, Ohio, April 29, 1907.

Editors Herald: As a number of years have passed away since last writing you, and feeling we are all of one family of the household of faith, I take this opportunity of writing and letting you know what has been done in this place by chosen servants of the Master. Four years ago last fall the writer preached three discourses on the principles of the gospel, in the schoolhouse near by, to large (and seemingly appreciative) audiences. My brother-in-law, who was not of the faith, with whom I was living, being much opposed to my holding meetings, I discontinued the same.

My brother-in-law being dead, and again feeling impressed with a desire to have preaching in the neighborhood, I made arrangements for Bro. U. W. Greene to hold forth. He preached ten or more excellent sermons, those of other faiths saying they were the best they ever heard. Bro. Haynes preached two good sermons on the principles of the gospel to a small audience because a "hireling" had sounded an alarm. Bro. Eben Miller preached one sermon,—also to a small audience because Reverend Seevers of Campbellite faith told them that the Saints worshiped Joseph Smith. I heard him make that assertion. I replied to his discourse the following Sabbath and invited him to attend. He failed to come.

Last of all came Bro. A. E. Stone of Kirtland. He preached one sermon in the church where we were then holding forth. The next Sabbath I handed the local minister a notice of Elder Stone's appointment for the following Sabbath. Before making the announcement he did all he could to prejudice the people against us. The following week an article came out in the local paper stating that the church was open to all denominations except Mormons, in large headlines and in the first column, first page, with no signature. To this I replied. My communication was in small type in the last column, last page. The good book says the first shall be last and the last first. There will be a change some day. Elder Stone preached the last discourse in the schoolhouse. I see my letter is long already; but bear with me till I relate the strangest part of all. This spring they opened their Sunday-school, and appointed me as Bible class teacher. I accepted the offer. At present am trying to convince them that God manifests himself to his servants to-day the same as he did to Abraham or Joseph in Egypt, and that he is the Lord God, and changes not. (See Malachi 3: 6.)

Your brother,

I. P. TITUS.

PURCELL, Missouri, April 29, 1907.

Editors Herald: We are a small branch of isolated Saints, but have a small Sunday-school opened up (a home class) and have prayer-service after that. Sunday-school opens at three o'clock and closes at four for prayer-service. We are ready for some more good preaching by any of the elders who feel inclined to stop among us. Bro. Riley delivered twenty-nine sermons here this last winter. Closed the night before conference convened at Webb City. A great deal of good was done in behalf of the gospel truths which will be long remembered, by some of us anyway. May God's choice blessings rest upon Bro. Riley is my earnest prayer.

Dear Saints, I do desire an interest in your prayers. Four of our family have obeyed the gospel. My husband, my stepdaughter, and my daughter (John Warren's wife) were baptized last September by Bro. Riley. It is our prayer that others of our relatives may obey the commandments before it is too late. I have been in this work six years and know this gospel of Jesus Christ is the power of God unto salvation to them that believe, and by the help of my heavenly Father I am doing all I can to sow in my weakness the gospel seed. Pray for us that our labor here may not be in vain; that when we are weighed we may not be found wanting, but that we may enter in through the gates into the city, and that all of our loved ones may meet us there with all of the glorified saints.

Your sister in the one faith,

MRS. LEVINIA (CASTLEMAN) WALTER.

Extracts from Letters.

Mrs. Jane Perchie, De Lisle, Saskatchewan, Canada: "We have moved from Esmond, North Dakota, to De Lisle, Saskatchewan, Canada, forty miles southwest of Saskatoon, and would be pleased to have any of the elders call upon us, and they can make their home with us at any time, as there is a good opening for them to preach."

Miscellaneous Department

High Council.

Tri-cities Branch, Rock Island, Illinois, versus J. W. Wight et al, as a committee.

This case came on for trial by appeal of the Rock Island Branch from the action of the Kewanee District conference and committee in the matter of withholding license from John F. Adams, member of said branch; James W. Davis and Ora H. Bailey appearing for the branch; J. W. Wight for the committee.

The High Council convened at 10 o'clock a. m., Thursday, April 18, 1907, at Lamoni, Iowa, as per notice published in SAINTS' HERALD, and agreeably to notice given in conference assembled.

It appears from the evidence that J. F. Adams was a member of the Buffalo Prairie Branch and took a letter from said branch bearing date of March 24, 1889; that his name does not appear as of record as a member of any branch until by application to the Rock Island Branch, February 2, 1904, he applied to the Rock Island Branch, petitioning the officers and members of the Kewanee District to grant him a letter of removal to the Rock Island Branch. This petition was referred to the Buffalo Prairie Branch, then and subsequently existing as an organized branch. It does not appear of record that there was any action of the Buffalo Prairie Branch upon this reference.

It appears further of record that John F. Adams petitioned the Kewanee District to issue or renew to him an elder's license. This petition was not granted. Subsequently J. F. Adams by petition to the district conference, sitting at Canton, Illinois, in June, 1904, requested a reissue of his license and demanded a reason why such reissue of license was not granted. This petition was referred to the district president and missionary in charge. At the same conference the district president silenced J. F. Adams from officiating until such time as the matter was adjusted.

It does not appear of record what the report of this committee was. It appears of record that in February, 1905, a committee was appointed by the branch to ask the district conference for reconsideration of their action in reference to the renewal of license to J. F. Adams; it was then reconsidered. Conference appointed a committee to make inquiry. This committee reported that they were compelled to recommend that the request be not granted, and recommended that a court of inquiry be appointed. This recommendation was approved and the missionary in charge and district president were empowered to appoint the court. This committee reported that good and sufficient reasons existed for withholding said license, and recommended that the documents submitted in evidence be placed in the hands of the district president for further action.

This report was adopted and the recommendation concurred in. The missionary in charge gave instruction to J. F. Adams to remain silent from acting in the capacity of an elder or representing the church, stating to him that when he made proper explanation and made satisfactory arrangement concerning certain matters which were in possession of the committee, he would favor the withdrawal of the objection. This Adams promised to do, but failed and neglected to do.

On June 20, 1905, John F. Adams made a confession to the Rock Island Branch that in obtaining a divorce from his wife he did not prefer charges nor labor with her according to the law, and it is in evidence that he also confessed having obtained this divorce upon insufficient or illegal grounds, according to church law; and also that he secured membership in the Rock Island Branch by irregular proceeding. Upon this confession Adams was forgiven by vote. It appears of evidence that at the time of this action the branch numbered some eighty members; that there were present at this business-session eight or ten of the members of the branch, and that the vote cast was three for forgiveness and two against; that the business-meeting was held at the call of the president. It does not appear of evidence that any general notice was given to the branch of such call or meeting.

It appears further of record that on January 29, 1906, an effort was made to get the Rock Island Branch to request the district conference to issue an elder's license to J. F. Adams. This request was denied, but subsequently, on September 24, 1906, the branch by vote requested the district conference to grant Bro. J. F. Adams his license. A committee reported on March 18, 1907, that the matter which was referred to them, the restoration of the license of J. F. Adams, with request that their findings be reported to the Rock Island Branch, that they had made diligent inquiry and that such license should be withheld. It was then by order of the branch appealed to the High Council.

It appears of record that the Buffalo Prairie Branch is still in existence, but it does not appear that any letter of removal was granted to said Adams subsequent to 1889. Adams was divorced from his wife in April, 1902, upon the ground of desertion, and not upon scriptural grounds, but upon statutory provision. It further appears in evidence that subsequent to such obtaining of divorce, Adams alleged that his wife was guilty of criminal conduct, but that he did not make that a part of his plea for divorce; nor does it appear that he made any effort to secure union with any branch of the church from the granting of removal in 1889 until February 2, 1904.

It appears further in evidence that he contracted a number of debts amounting to a considerable sum, and when requested by the committee to comply with the rule of the church and make satisfactory arrangement regarding them, he failed to do so and refused to do so; that the committee granted sufficient time for him to make this arrangement if he saw proper, and declined to make public their reasons for refusing to grant renewal of license, and these reasons were given by the committee to J. F. Adams.

It is claimed that the action of the conference and committee in withholding said license was irregular. We can not see that this alleged irregularity affects the action of the committee consisting of the missionary in charge, J. W. Wight, Amos Berve, and F. A. Russell, from whose action the appeal is taken. It appears further in evidence that the action of the branch in forgiving Adams and accepting him into membership was also irregular.

The decision of the council is that the action of the committee be affirmed; leaving the authorities of the branch and the district to take into consideration any measures which the circumstances of the case may demand in reference to the membership of said J. F. Adams.

Done at Lamoni, Iowa, April 20, 1907.

Signed,

JOSEPH SMITH, President.
ROBT. M. ELVIN, Secretary.

Attest:

The above opinion and decision was approved by the unanimous vote of the council, upon the date last above written.

Pastoral.

To the Ministry and Membership in Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and Central and Southern Illinois; Greeting: By the action of the late General Conference, we were associated to take the active oversight of the missionary and general church-work in the above-named territory.

It will be recognized by all when the extent of the territory, the large missionary force, and the church interests in this field are considered, that it will be impossible for us to give immediate and direct attention to all the church interests in this important field; nor can we be expected to visit in person but a small portion of this field. We trust, however, always to be found where we are most needed, and to be so directed that we will be able to give the wisest advice obtainable to those with whom we are associated.

We congratulate ourselves in having coworkers in different parts of the field whom we can trust, and who will take care of the interests of the work under our supervision as well or better than we could care for them if we were present in person.

In order to facilitate our work and to have men in the different fields to whom access can be had more readily than to the ministers in charge, we have decided to appoint the following brethren as associates in charge and recommend them to you as worthy of your confidence and support:

H. O. Smith in Minnesota, and those parts of the Dakotas north and east of the Missouri River; D. R. Chambers, Nebraska, and those parts of the Dakotas south and west of the Missouri River; Eli Hayer, Western Iowa, including Gallands Grove, Little Sioux, Pottawattamie, and Fremont Districts; James McKiernan, Eastern Iowa, including Nauvoo, Des Moines, and Eastern Iowa District, and Central Illinois District; Henry Sparling, St. Louis and Southeastern Illinois Districts; A. M. Baker, Southern Missouri District and the unorganized territory in Southeastern Missouri; George Jenkins, Clinton and Spring River Districts; W. T. Bozarth, Independence Stake; W. E. Peak, state of Kansas; F. C. Keck, Nodaway, Far West, and Northeastern Missouri Districts; John Smith, Lamoni Stake.

It is well understood by all missionaries that according to the rules obtaining they are expected to report to these missionaries in charge promptly on the first days of January, March, July, and October. Please do not allow this duty to pass over a single day if possible to avoid it, so that these associate missionaries in charge may be prepared to report to us promptly on the tenth of the above mentioned months. Much difference of opinion has existed and does exist as to the necessity of reporting and what should be reported, but the consistent way is to report such items as have been required by the action of the General Conference. Nothing can be gained by asserting that our individual ideas should obtain in preference to those adopted by the body. While these rules are in force let us abide by them.

On the account of the mission fields being divided differently from what they had hitherto been, we observe that Brn. J. T. Riley and Lee Quick were appointed to labor in Southern Kansas and that part of the Spring River District in Indian Territory, thus dividing their field and placing it in two different missions. To avoid confusion and that these brethren may not be required to report to two different missionaries in charge, if agreeable to Brn. White and Luff in charge in Indian Territory, they may report their labors to them instead of to us; while Brn. R. T. Walters and W. H. Smart, appointed to Spring River District, may report to us, through Bro. George Jenkins.

All reports to ministers in charge should be addressed to
HEMAN C. SMITH,
Box 10, Lamoni, Iowa.

We trust that the Saints in general will not forget when the missionaries visit their localities that they need their sustenance in a temporal as well as spiritual way; and that the law of God provides that those who feed and clothe and give them money are to be recognized as the disciples of Christ. These brethren are not provided for by the general church treasury only in case of emergency so far as their individual expenses are concerned. Therefore as the Lord prospers you, assist them, assured that the promise of the Lord is that you shall be rewarded for so doing.

While we shall always be glad to receive communications and to keep in as close touch as possible with all the men in the field, it will be recognized that where there are ninety-four appointees exclusive of ourselves in this field, it will be impossible for us to keep in close correspondence with each one. Therefore so far as practicable let your reports and communications reach us through the brethren named above in charge of the several divisions of the field.

While the nature of our work is both defensive and aggressive, we should not be hasty in seeking discussion and controversy. Discussions are sometimes necessary under certain conditions; but if we are permitted to do our work in peace and good will we all should prefer so to do. If circumstances demand public discussions great care should be used in arranging propositions for our opponents are sometimes unscrupulous and it will be well before offering or accepting propositions to confer with those in charge that mutual understanding may obtain.

Numerous reunions are to be held during the summer and fall in this extensive field; and already invitations are reaching us to

Notice to Missionaries.

The General Sunday-school Association is still sending the Exponent and the Senior Quarterly to all missionaries laboring under General Conference appointment. And, owing to the fact that so very many of the missionaries change their addresses each year, it becomes necessary to make up a new list each year. We are now making up the new list for 1907-1908 and desire to have your mission address as also your home address. Do not think because you have been receiving the periodicals during the past that you need not renew. If we knew your address no application would be necessary, but we do not know it. Drop us a card giving both mission and home address. If you have no mission address, so state and it will be sent to the home address.

FREE "QUARTERLIES."

It may be that in your work you will find individuals who would study the Quarterly, or schools that could be organized but have not the means to purchase supplies. In such cases we shall gladly furnish the needed Quarterlies free till such time as they may be able to pay for them. Also please send us the names of parties who might be interested in the Exponent and sample copies will be sent them.

Hopeful for the advancement of the work in all its departments, we are,

Fraternally,

T. A. HOUGAS,

Superintendent General Sunday-school Association.

THE DOING OF GOOD.

The prophet Moroni is considered to be of good repute among Latter Day Saints, and we quote from his words, as found in chapter 7 and verse 9:

"And whatsoever thing persuadeth men to do good, is of me; for good cometh of none save it be of me."

This is reënforced by the teaching of Omni, in chapter 1 and verse 36.

There is a great deal of good in the world as well as a great deal of evil; and if all the good is an emanation from God, and men do good because they are incited to do it by the spirit of good which God sheds abroad in the world, it would seem to be an act of bad faith to challenge any good thing which men do as being devilish in itself, or of devilish origin.

According to the revelation in the Doctrine and Covenants, men should of their own selves seek to do good and to bring to pass much righteousness, for the power is in them. To be waiting in careless security to be commanded in all things is to be slothful servants; and for such God has no pleasant word to say. On the contrary, the lazy, the idle, the unfruitful, and the vicious are everywhere in the world condemned. It is the part of wisdom, apparently, to commend all that we may discover of good in the world around us; and if we are as earnestly seeking after that which is good as we seem to be in seeking for the evil, it is in accordance with the word itself that we should find what we seek after. "Seek and ye shall find," is as true of seeking evil as it is of seeking good; and every man should be diligently seeking after that which is good, that he may have goodly store against his time of need. If the evil of every day is sufficient for that day, it surely is folly for any to lay by borrowed evil taken from the store of to-day, and laid away for the future.

Quite enough of the evil that is in the world, and in the things of the world by which we are surrounded, comes to us without our seeking it; and when it comes to us it is hard enough to bear without our having invited it by seeking after it to bring it and its attendant co-evils to the light, to poison our own peace and the peace of others.

Elder John R. Evans is authorized to solicit subscriptions for all of the church publications in all of the branches of Lamoni Stake.

"Redemption and salvation are accomplished through obedience to law, for 'that which is governed by law is also preserved by law.'"

Many a good man has been destroyed in the promise of his usefulness by reason of an imputation of evil put upon him by some seeker after evil; who has not benefited himself, but has injured his neighbor. If he had sought the good that might have been found in the man in whom he found the evil, perchance he could have been instrumental in eliminating the evil by overcoming it with the good that may have been latent in the man.

It is certainly bad policy to think all men to be moved by bad intentions; and especially is this true of the men and the things which employ their time and talents of whom we have no knowledge by experience. And it is worse policy to seek for and assume that evil only exists in men and things, because we do not see and know what they see and know and do. "Charity thinketh no evil" is an axiom written by the apostle Paul a long time ago, and is as true now as when it was written; and he who disregards the value of its application in the affairs which occupy the time and the attention and the care of the adherents to the apostolic teaching in these last days, is missing the use of one of the most efficacious sweeteners of human life ever granted by wisdom to the Christian.

He who sees nothing but evil in the things transpiring around him in his daily life in which he is not an active and actual participant, and of which he does not have actual personal knowledge, will pursue an unfortunate course, and find himself antagonizing much that is innocent in itself, lacking the incentive of evil motive in the doing of them. The prophet Moroni, teaching on this subject, clearly states that a gift made with an improper motive in the giver, is without value and is not accepted of God to the credit of the one giving the gift. A story from the secular side of the controversy will effectively illustrate the idea. A Scotch deacon, in a Scotch church, passing the contribution-box, placed it before a well-to-do member of the congregation who had his hand in his pocket with the coin in his fingers ready for the box; as he dropped the coin in the box he noticed that it was yellow instead of white—and so did the deacon. "Hold on," said the member, "I have made a mistake, and dropped in the wrong coin." "No," said the deacon, "thee has made no mistake." And so saying he was passing on his way. "Ah! we'el, I'll get credit for it in heaven," saying it with a sigh. To this the canny deacon retorted, "Nay, thee'll not. Thee'll get credit for the shilling thee intended to give, and not for the sovereign thee did give." It was the intention which made the value of the gift; even in the church contributions.

Distrust, suspicion, dislike, hatred, and enmity— all evil qualities—are the handmaidens of mischief and evil, and follow so closely in the footsteps of each other as sometimes to be taken for the principles they represent. No upright man or woman will allow these harbingers and coworkers of evil to find lodgment within the heart, or mind; but will repulse them as decidedly as did the Divine Man when he said: "Get thee behind me, Satan; thou savorest not the things that be of God."

In a late sermon before an Independence congregation, Bro. John W. Rushton urged upon his audience that the full and proper meaning of the Savior's statement, "Seek to bring forth the kingdom of God, and establish his righteousness," must necessarily be the creation of an organized body in right ruling in doing good. That no one could offer the Lord's prayer in the spirit of the words, "Thy kingdom come," who had not so far eliminated from himself the evil which has corrupted the physical man, that he had reached by successive gradations of improvement the absolute self-control named by the apostle Peter in the first chapter of his Second Epistle. The character-painting by Bro. Rushton was one in the high lights of inspiration, and led his hearers to the inevitable conclusion that evil-thinking, evil-surmising, evil-speaking, the imputing of evil motives to others, the spirit of misunderstanding and misconstruction are but relics of the evil man which must be eliminated from the would-be citizen of Zion, the church, or the kingdom of God, by the new birth: "Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again." The man must be "regenerated," re-created, remade by a complete surrender to the will of God, in compliance with the expressed desire of the prayer: "Thy will be done on earth as in heaven."

If then, all this is requisite, men should be awake to the great privileges open to them of thinking good, seeing good, doing good, that they may be accounted as of the number to be known as the "pure in heart."

One of the offices of the Holy Spirit, the Holy Ghost, the Spirit of truth, is the leading men into the truth, "all truth." Within the legitimate province of this office work is the giving the disciples the comprehension of the true value of the things of this world. It puts all things in their relative positions of value in the life and necessities of the true Saint; aids him to measure things as they are presented to him for consideration and decision, things both spiritual and temporal, things past and things expected to come, as they are shadowed forth by events transpiring in the secular and religious circles round about him; thus informing him how to decide what his conduct should be under given circumstances. Indeed, the Spirit of truth becomes the teacher and the care-taker of the disciple's conscience, enabling him to ever answer with a "conscience void of offense." What a provision for the true disciple; and yet it is all promised in the wonderful words, "But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, even the Spirit of truth, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you"; and "he shall testify of me." See John's gospel, chapters 14 and 15; verse 26 of either chapter.

A SINGULAR DREAM.

Investigators of psychological phenomena find new material for study in Mark Twain's autobiography, now running in the North American Review. Among other experiences he relates the following dream and its fulfillment. He seems a competent witness that under certain conditions, the mind of man may be enabled to penetrate the future:

One morning, when I awoke I had been dreaming, and the dream was so vivid, so like reality, that it deceived me, and I thought it was real. In the dream I had seen Henry (Mr. Clemens' younger brother) a corpse. He lay in a metallic burial case. He was dressed in a suit of my clothing, and on his breast lay a great bouquet of flowers, mainly white roses, with a red rose in the center. The casket stood upon a couple of chairs. I dressed, and moved toward the door, thinking I would go in there and look at it, but I changed my mind. I thought I could not yet bear to meet my mother. I thought I would wait awhile and make some preparation for that ordeal. The house was on Locust street, a little above Thirteenth, and I walked to Fourteenth, and to the middle of the block beyond, before it suddenly flashed upon me that there was nothing real about this—it was only a dream. I can still feel something of a grateful upheaval of joy of that moment, and I can also feel the remnant of doubt, the suspicion that maybe it was real, after all. I returned to the house almost on a run, flew up the stairs two or three steps at a jump, and rushed into that sitting room—and was made glad again, for there was no casket there.

We made the usual eventless trip to New Orleans—no, it was not eventless, for it was on the way down that I had the fight with Mr. Brown which resulted in his requiring that I be left ashore at New Orleans. In New Orleans I always had a job. It was my privilege to watch the freight-piles from seven in the evening until seven in the morning, and get three dollars for it. It was a three-night job and occurred every thirty-five days. Henry always joined my watch about nine in the evening, when his own duties were ended, and we often walked my rounds and chatted together until midnight. This time we were to part, and so the night before the boat sailed I gave Henry some advice. I said: "In case of disaster to the boat, don't lose your head—leave that unwisdom to the passengers—they are competent—they'll attend to it. But you rush for the hurricane deck, and astern to one of the life-boats lashed after the wheel-house, and obey the mate's orders—thus you will be useful. When the boat is launched, give such help as you can in getting the women and children into it, and be sure you don't try to get into it yourself. It is summer weather, the river is only a mile wide, as a rule, and you can swim that without any trouble." Two or three days afterward the boat's boilers exploded at Ship Island, below Memphis, early one morning—and what happened afterward I have already told in Old Times on the Mis-issippi. As related there, I followed the Pennsylvania about a day later, on another boat, and we began to get news of the disaster at every port we touched, and so by the time we reached Memphis we knew all about it.

I found Henry stretched upon a mattress on the floor of a great building along with thirty or forty other scalded and wounded persons, and was promptly informed, by some indiscreet person, that he had inhaled steam; that his body was badly scalded, and that he would live but a little while; also, I was told that the physicians and nurses were giving their whole attention to persons who had a chance of being saved. They were short-handed in the matter of physicians and nurses, and Henry and such others as were considered to be fatally hurt were receiving only such attention as could be spared from time to time, from the more urgent cases. But Doctor Peyton, a fine and large-hearted old physician of great reputation in the community, gave me his sympathy and took vigorous hold of the case, and in about a week he had brought Henry around. Doctor Peyton never committed himself with prognostications which might not materialize, but at eleven o'clock one night he told me that Henry was out of danger, and would get well. Then he said: "At midnight these poor fellows lying here and there all over this place will begin to mourn and mutter and lament and make outcries, and if this commotion should disturb Henry it will be bad for him; therefore ask the physician on watch to give him an eighth of a grain of morphine, but this is not to be done unless Henry shall show signs that he is being disturbed."

Oh, well, never mind the rest of it. The physicians on watch were young fellows hardly out of the medical college, and they made a mistake—they had no way of measuring the eighth of a grain of morphine, so they guessed at it and gave him a vast quantity heaped on the end of a knife-blade, and the fatal effects were soon apparent. I think he died about dawn, I don't remember as to that. He was carried to the dead room and I went away for a while to a citizen's house and slept off some of my accumulated fatigue—and meantime something was happening. The coffins provided for the dead were of unpainted white pine, but in this instance some of the ladies of Memphis had made up a fund of $60 and bought a metallic case, and when I came back and entered the dead room Henry lay in that open case, and he was dressed in a suit of my clothing. He had borrowed it without my knowledge during our last sojourn in St. Louis; and I recognized instantly that my dream of several weeks before was here exactly reproduced, so far as these details went—and I think I missed one detail; but that one was immediately supplied, for just then an elderly lady entered the place with a large bouquet consisting mainly of white roses, and in the center of it was a red rose, and she laid it on his breast.

A CORRECTION.

The president of the Fourth Quorum of Elders sends the following correction:

In "HERALD," of April 24, in reporting the minutes of the General Conference on front page, the statement reads, "The Fourth Quorum of Elders reported, and at their request the ordination of F. G. Hedrick in the office of president of the quorum, with Earl Bailey and Charles Dillon as counselors, was approved." This evidently is in reference to the action of the First Quorum, and not the Fourth, as reported, as there was no change made in the Fourth this year.

Respectfully,

F. T. MUSSELL,
President, Fourth Quorum.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

"Rioting, bloodshed, death"—such compose the headlines of a San Francisco evening paper of this date, and conditions warrant a continuation of the same for a time. Our city's prosperity seems to have reached its zenith, and San Francisco speeds upon its downward path faster than before its "purification" by fire of a year ago.

The Saints, however, are progressing and the true spirits of love and unity is manifest more than ever. The contrast is greatly increasing between the associations of the church and those of the world. The president, Bro. J. A. Lawn, is a zealous worker and leader of the Sunday-school.

Bro. Anthony, with the assistance of Elder Davidson and others, holds forth upon the street several nights each week, doing what he can proclaiming the gospel to every creature, and distributing tracts to those who will take them. The Lord has manifested his approval of these efforts.

There are many strikes among the mechanics of the city which, together with the tie-up of all the street-railway system, make unpleasant conditions here. Attempts by strike-breakers to run the cars are resulting in much bloodshed and some deaths. "In the last days perilous times shall come." Should we hope for peace?

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

We are lining up for renewed efforts to further the cause we love; street-preaching has been started some time now and we are especially encouraged by the audience we get in our church neighborhood. Priest Haines having this work in charge, has seen fit to divide his force and operate from two points at once.

Elder J. C. Farnfield stopped over but a short while and is now on the firing-line again. Brn. John H. Lake and Gomer T. Griffiths were with us to cheer and counsel on this sacrament Sunday of May. Sunday-school attendance same morning was the largest of the year so far; we shall strive to surpass it.

We note Bro. O. B. Thomas' appointment to Cleveland during the park season; every year there have been inquiries for him from strangers as well as many friends he made when here previously. We have good reason to believe that like work of Brn. Anderson and Hanson is about to bear fruit and we may have some baptisms to report soon among those near and dear to us.

While there are some ungenerous enough to hold aloof from association with us as the body of Christ, yet still lay claim to the name of Latter Day Saint, we hope time will heal all things and that those called and put in charge of the work here may receive the undivided support of every Saint. Anything short of that is hindering the great work our Master instituted. "L. D. S." may mean "Latter Day Saint," but let us also remember, each time we think of it, that it in spirit means this: "Love, Duty, Sacrifice," and remembering, live it, prove it!

FIRST BRANCH, CHICAGO.

We are again pleased to enter your dear columns with the little breathings of our affairs, in this changeable, uncomfortable climate, at this time of the year, especially where afflictions are added to temptations.

The past General Conference has not brought us the passing missionaries as usual, and the local force have magnified their calling well in caring for the work. We do not claim to have excelled others, or done more than with a missionary, but this much is true, that available talent well used, often accomplishes more than an idle genius. Were the world a glow-worm, there had been less need of the sun.

The Religio is deserving of the highest praise for their late splendid effort in raising something like one hundred and thirty dollars, for the building fund, through an entertainment which was so successfully conducted, in the energetic selling of tickets. We are much encouraged owing to many successes of late, and, little by little, we are moving on to the end so much sought,—a little church, which we can dedicate, and pay rent to the Lord. With this end in view, we are compelled to occupy less commodious quarters than we otherwise would, believing it a sacrifice well made.

The question of one's salvation remains unsolved, until worked on the basis of experience and sacrifice. Grand is our concept of the heavenly "headquarters" so laden with the responsibility of the care of the world, answering our many prayers, looking out for our needs, the slightest of which exceeds our average effort in serving him to whom we look for so many services.

ST. JOSEPH, MISSOURI.

The Saints in this city have been experiencing an era of good and interesting meetings. A general stir and activity, a sort of reviving and refreshing influence seems to pervade our services, which is gratifying, to say the least. Recently we have had some excellent sermons from traveling brethren who have stopped over Sunday with us. Notably, Bro. Goodrich, Bro. F. M. Sheehy, and our dear

WHAT YOKES ARE FOR.

"TAKE MY YOKE UPON YOU AND LEARN OF ME."
 "MY YOKE IS EASY AND MY BURDEN IS LIGHT."

MATT. 11:29

BE YE NOT UNEQUALLY YOKED TOGETHER WITH UNBELIEVERS" II. COR. 6:14.

After the statement "Learn of me," Christ says, "Take my yoke upon you and learn of me"; why does he call it a yoke? Why, while professing to give rest, does he with the next breath whisper "burden"?

Did you ever stop to ask what a yoke is for? Is it to be a burden to the creature that wears it? It is just the opposite; it is to make its burden light. Attached to the oxen in any other way than by a yoke, the plow would be intolerable. Worked by means of a yoke, it is light. It is not meant to give pain, but to save pain.

And yet men speak of the yoke of Christ as if it were slavery, and look upon those who wear it as objects of compassion.

The wooden yoke of the Eastern peasant, He with His own hands in the carpenter-shop had probably often made. He knew the difference between a smooth yoke and a rough one, a bad fit and a good fit; the difference also it made to the creature who wore it: The rough yoke galled, and the burden was heavy; the smooth yoke caused no pain and the burden was lightly drawn.

The "burden" was not some special burden laid upon the Christian, some unique affliction they alone must bear. It was what all men bear—simply life, human life itself—the general burden of life which all must carry from the cradle to the grave. Christ saw that men took life painfully.

How to carry this burden of Life has been the whole world's problem! And here is Christ's solution: Carry it as I do. Take life as I take it. Interpret it upon my principles. Take my yoke, and learn of me; my yoke is easy, sits right upon the shoulders and therefore the burden is light.

No suggestion here that religion absolves any man from bearing burdens—that would absolve him from living, since it is life itself that is the burden. Christ's yoke is simply his secret for the alleviation of human life. His prescription for the best and happiest method of living.

It is the beautiful work of Christianity to adjust the burden of life to those who bear it, and them to it. Without doing any violence to human nature it sets it right with life, restoring those who are jaded with the fatigue and dust of the world to a new grace of living.

Christianity, as Christ taught, is the truest philosophy of life ever spoken. But let us be quite sure we mean Christ's Christianity! Other versions are caricatures or exaggerations, or short-sighted and surface-readings; for the most part their attainment is hopeless and the result wretched.

But I care not who the person is, or through what vale of tears he has passed, or is about to pass, there is a new life for him along this path. "Take my yoke upon you and learn of me."—Thoughts from Drummond.—Earnest Webbe.

Selected Poetry

Little Boy Jim.

Out of the angel land he came,
 Little Boy Jim.
 Without any clothes, not even the name
 Of Little Boy Jim;
 Left all the brightness of heavenly skies,—
 Just borrowed enough for his heart and his eyes
 And, maybe, some nectar for tears when he cries.
 Little Boy Jim.
 Plucked from the golden street a brick,
 Did Little Boy Jim Got a big angel that knew the trick,
 Cute Little Jim,
 To turn it into a heart of gold,—
 The angel scoured Heav'n to get the best mold,
 And put in a piece of his own heart, I'm told;
 For Little Jim.
 And he had it tuned in a perfect key,
 Little Boy Jim.
 To keep it in constant harmony,
 Wise boy, Jim.
 And all the time that he is away
 The Heavenly choir will sing and play,
 But he hears the echoing melody,—
 Lucky Boy Jim.
 That is the reason a part of each day
 Little Boy Jim
 Ceases his baby prattle and play,—
 The angel in him
 Is list'ning, while into his eyes will creep
 A wistful look so tender and deep,—
 The angel voices are singing—Ah sleep
 Little Boy Jim.

AN ADDRESS OF WELCOME.

An address by Elder F. G. Pitt on the occasion of the reception of new members of the High Priests' Quorum, at a meeting during the late General Conference.

F. G. PITT, PRESIDENT OF THE QUORUM OF HIGH PRIESTS.

Elder F. G. Pitt has presided over the quorum since the April conference of 1901, at which time he was chosen for that office. He began his pastoral work as long ago as 1874, during which year he was chosen priest of the branch at Plano, Illinois.

I take great pleasure this morning in extending to our new members, on behalf of the High Priests' Quorum, a hearty welcome. And when I say hearty welcome, I mean all that the words imply. I am glad also to tell you that when your names were presented, though we considered each one carefully, yet when the final vote was taken, each received our unanimous vote. I believe I am correct in this, Mr. Secretary.

I sincerely trust that your uniting with us will be mutually beneficial. That you, in consequence of your experience in gospel work, may strengthen the quorum and make its work all the more efficient. And that we, by association and help, may be able to do you good.

The object of the quorum is at least twofold: First, to assist each other and educate one another in ministerial work. Second, to stand by and protect each other in righteousness from every opposing power. All must see the importance of both these objects. In the observance of the first, the quorum has no small task to perform. It has often seemed to your speaker that it was very unfortunate that the church is not able to do more toward educating ministers than she is doing at the present time. Nearly all other churches have their theological seminaries and schools where their ministers are instructed, not only as to their work, but how best to perform it, while our ministers are taken right from the plow and workshop or desk and other avocations in life and placed in the pulpit, and over branches and districts, expected to preach, to serve as judges and many other important positions: with little instruction from the church concerning these matters, excepting what they are able to gather from the preaching of the word, the printed matter, and the teachings of the Holy Spirit. While these sources of learning are good, it must readily be seen that if there were some systematic method of teaching employed by the church it would relieve both minister and people from much embarrassment, and better results would follow. The gospel seems to provide for this very work in the school of the prophets, but until this, or something like it, is established, we shall have to do the best we can to teach ourselves. Right here is where a good part of our quorum work comes in. We can teach each other, and this seems to be our duty. The Lord says:

And I give unto you a commandment, that you shall teach one another the doctrine of the kingdom: teach ye diligently and my grace shall attend you, that you may be instructed more perfectly in theory, in principle, in doctrine, in the law of the gospel, in all things that pertain unto the kingdom of God that is expedient for you to understand: of things both in heaven and in earth, and under the earth: things which have been; things which are: things which must shortly come to pass: things which are at home: things which are abroad, the wars and the perplexities of the nations: and the judgments which are on the land: and a knowledge also of countries and of kingdoms.—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 21.

This certainly provides for an educated ministry. As a quorum we have tried to comply with this command, and our sessions have been mostly employed along educational lines, as you will observe by referring to our printed programs.

Our second object is no less important. In presenting the gospel of Christ to our fellow men we have all been made to realize the power of the enemy in opposing us. He is ever on the alert, by night and by day, to destroy us and our work if he has the chance. At the present time we do not have the opposition in the way of open attack and persecution which the church had to endure a few years ago. Now his attacks are more subtle and crafty.

It sometimes happens, too, that those who should be our friends allow themselves to be used as instruments in the hands of this enemy; unknowingly, no doubt, yet none the less effective on that account. At such times it is well to have brethren on whom we can depend for support. Let us do this, brethren, as a quorum. If one of our number is accused of wrong-doing, see to it that he is justly dealt with, and regard every man as innocent until he is proved guilty.

I suppose the duties properly belonging to our office as high priests are known to you, for nearly all of you have served as presidents of branches or of districts; in this you have been doing work along lines provided for the high priests. In describing our work the law is very plain. In contrasting our work with other quorums, it says,

The Twelve and Seventy are traveling ministers and preachers of the gospel, to persuade men to obey the truth; the high priests and elders holding the same priesthood are the standing ministers of the church, having the watchcare of the membership and nurturing and sustaining them under the direction and instruction of the presidency and the twelve.—Doctrine and Covenants 120:3.

Again in section 122, paragraph 9, two arms are portrayed, one reaching out to the world, or where there is no organization, to bring them in and organize them, the other to the membership to nourish and sustain, in the following language: "If the missionary work, first the twelve: second the seventy; in the standing ministry, the presidency, second, the high priests; third the elders, then priests, teachers, and deacons in their order."

It will be seen by this that our special work, as high priests, is to care for the membership. And though under certain conditions high priests may travel and preach as missionaries; likewise the seventy, under certain conditions, may preside over branches and districts, yet this is not their special work. It seems to require men qualified for both lines of work. One class may be compared to pioneers whose duty it is to cut down the forest, clear away the brush, build the fences, plow the ground, put in the seed, etc., then the high priest comes along and cultivates the tender plant, destroys the weeds, and protects it from the destroying elements to the extent of his power.

I fear sometimes we have been devoting more time to planting the seed than we have to nurturing the tender plant, and have been developing missionaries, more than standing ministers. If so, we have made a mistake, for one line of work is as important as the other. I remember the first garden I planted. It did not take me long to plow the ground and plant the seed, and I was about to congratulate myself with having my work done, when I discovered that as the seed began to sprout the weeds came up all around it to choke it, and it took all my spare time that entire summer to keep the weeds down and destroy the insects that seemed determined to destroy my plants. So it is in our gospel work; it often requires far more work to keep a branch in good condition, by caring for the members, than it does to preach the gospel and baptize them. A branch, like a garden, must be cultivated, and the tender plant protected from its enemies, or the sowing will amount to little.

It would seem then that our duty is plain. We should carefully study rules of government. And first of all seek to govern self. We should become familiar with the rules of order. One thing especially we should cultivate is humility. The greater our responsibility, the more humble we should be. In proportion as a man grows heady or high-minded in that proportion does he unfit himself for God's service. Let love be our ruling power, and thus cultivate the true Spirit of our Master. If we are actuated by love we will draw men to him. It will make us kind and patient. We must not expect more of people than they are able to give. Therefore do not scold or find fault. If you need to admonish, do it in kindness, and seek to encourage. Kind words of encouragement will do far more good than scolding and fault-finding. Cultivate cheerfulness and the spirit of sobriety, that the good Spirit may accompany our preaching. Here is where we need to keep in constant touch with the divine mind. We all doubtless know the worth of prayer and spiritual meditation. Let us employ it more in the future than we have in the past.

I think one may be pardoned for being a little bit proud of being associated with good men in the service of God. I certainly am very thankful that I am associated with such men as I see before me in this glorious work. There is a kind of pride that we should all exhibit. I hope I will always be too proud of my association with you to permit any act of mine to bring a reproach upon the quorum or humiliate any member of it. I appreciate your love and esteem. I believe we all feel the same toward each other, and desire to live worthy of it. May the Lord help us so to do:

A SOLILOQUY.

I am determined what to do, forasmuch as the Lord has said, Gather into the regions round about. I shall accumulate as much as possible, as soon as I am allowed to, and will then dispose of my property here, and confer with the Bishop, and, having my tithing all paid up, there will be no accounting on that score. And, further, having obtained a certificate of good report from the elders of the district in which I live, I will have complied with the law that far, and will expect no difficulty in coming to an agreement.

Meantime, while I am preparing myself for this further advancement, I will live as becometh a Saint of God. I will warn all to flee from the wrath to come. According as God gives me of his Spirit, I shall avoid giving offense, guarding well my tongue, that it stir up no strife, but shall try to keep it busy telling the gospel story. Finally, I shall try to live by every word that God has given for our instruction, that I may, with my family, enjoy peace and safety in the Zion of God.

CHRIST AND THE NEW TESTAMENT.

Matthew describes Him as a king, and we see him in his royalty; Mark presents him as a servant, surrendered to the will of God; Luke with the true genius of an artist portrays him in the matchless perfection of his human nature; while John, more than any other, enables us to touch the warm flesh of the Man of Nazareth, yet causes us to feel the thrill of Deity.

My object in preparing this article is to show if possible my position in regard to Christ and the New Testament. I know there are those who believe it to be the infallible word of God and those who do not so believe; but I feel that my own ministry is chiefly based upon the conviction that the Bible is the infallible word of God, therefore, my position may be stated thus: I believe that there is an indissoluble relation between the Christ of the catholic Christian experience, and the Bible. By the term catholic Christian experience, I mean not the consciousness of any one individual, nor the views held by any group of Christian people, but the spiritual and moral consciousness resulting from the actual victories won by Christianity during the past nineteen centuries.

The Christ of this experience is related to the Bible, as the living word is related to the written. To change the conception of the first is necessarily to change the form of the second; to change the form of the second is to change the conception of the first, or, what we do with the Christ of the catholic church, using the word catholic in its proper sense, we shall do with the Bible; and what we do with the Bible, we must ultimately do with the Christ of the catholic church.

As to the first stated:

To deny his supernatural nature is necessarily to deny the authenticity of the Bible story. To deny his infallibility is to deny that of the Bible. To deny his atonement as interpreted in the New Testament, is to account the whole Hebrew idea of approach to God by sacrifice as barbaric.

As to the second: To deny the history of the Bible, is to be without a history of Jesus. To deny the possibility of the miracles they affirm, is to deny the stories of his virgin birth and bodily resurrection.

Then regarding his relation to the New Testament, I make three statements:

1. The New Testament is the Book of Christ.
2. The Christian religion is the religion of the Christ, of the New Testament.
3. The propagation of Christianity has always depended upon the testimony of eye-witnesses, which testimony is recorded for us in the scriptures of the New Testament.

First statement.—I do not suppose that any one will challenge the accuracy of that statement (this is not before us at present); but the uniqueness, as claiming to give any detailed account of the founder of the Christian faith! If these stories be denied, what have we left? A person in history, certainly; for references are made to him in other writings which establish his historical identity. But they give us no definite information regarding his parentage, or life, or character. Profane history has done no more than recognize his actual existence, so if we take away the New Testament there yet remains the certainty of the person called Jesus, but no positive or detailed information concerning him. It is a simple but fundamental fact that the New Testament is the only literature concerning Jesus Christ. Of course, there is that marvelous ever-growing literature, which seems to be richer and richer as the years go by, which is based upon the accuracy of the New Testament records. This, however, is of no value, if we destroy the New Testament.

Let me impress this fact upon our minds by taking a survey of this wonderful book.

In the first four books, we have a presentation of the person of Jesus.

In the Acts, we have the story of early triumphs, of those who believed the story of Jesus, which the gospel narratives record.

In the Epistles we have a body of writings, in which the teaching of Jesus is elaborated and expounded.

In the Revelation we have, as its title indicates, the unveiling of the same person. Thus all through the whole subject is Christ, his person in the Gospels; his power in the Acts; his precepts in the Epistles; his program in the Revelations.

Thus, the Gospels present to us a person who can only thus be described as, "God Incarnate," an unfallen, unsinning being, fulfilling the highest ideal of manhood, the Savior of the unfit, by the way of the cross,—the Lord, not primarily by his teaching, nor by his example, but by the infinite, final miracle of his resurrection from the dead.

Whether these things are true or not, I may say,

I am not dealing with for the moment. I simply assert that these can be denied only by denying the truth of the records.

Each writer has presented to us a different aspect of the office, or nature, of Jesus.

Matthew describes him as a king, and we see him in his royalty. Mark presents him as a servant, surrendered to the will of God. As to Luke, with the true genius of an artist he portrays him in the matchless perfection of his human nature; while John enables us to touch, more than any other, the warm flesh of the man of Nazareth, yet causes us to feel the thrill of Deity.

The Gospels thus present to us a king to serve, a servant who reigns, a man fulfilling the highest ideal of life, yet one who was so humble, until the fisher of the Galilean lake could lean his head upon his bosom and listen to the beautiful yet mystic words as they fell from his lips. Such is the person outlined to us in the Gospels; and I often feel if he be no real being, so perfectly does the picture command my loyalty and worship, that I feel to say, In God's name, lead me to the man who imagined him.

In turning to the book of Acts: Luke commences this second treatise to his friend Theophilus concerning all that Jesus began to do and to teach. By this, he at least suggests that he is about to continue the story; and as we read the book we see in every page the same person as presented to us in the Gospels. The kingly Christ is incarnate in kingly men, who conquer as they go. The serving Christ is reproduced in a multitude of serving souls. The manifestation of God is continued in those who being partakers of the divine natures, show forth the excellencies of him who called them out of darkness into light.

This, then, is the story of Jesus, no longer limited as in his own words, recorded by Luke, straitened; but proceeding in power through the ever-increasing number of saints, doing the work of God (in God's own way), and teaching men to do his will.

Turning to the Epistles, we are told to-day that it is necessary to go back from Paul to Christ. This is impossible, because Paul never departed from Christ or his teaching. In all his statements there is nothing out of harmony with the presentation of his person as related in the Gospels, or the revelation of his power as given in the Acts. Of course, it is true there were many things in his writings which had apparent local reference; for instance, his instruction to the women of Corinth would be rather out of place to-day, as far as the principle is concerned, but of everything of systematic teaching in his writings may be traced to the teachings of Jesus. Thus, all the writings of Paul and Peter, of James and John, and that of Jude, are but expositions of the teaching of Jesus by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, the proof of which can be brought to light only by careful study of what is contained therein.

Turning finally to the Apocalypse, I will not attempt to give you an interpretation of that mystical book at present, knowing the importance attached to it. There is, however, a description in it which is a revelation of its wonderful value, the unveiling of Jesus Christ. All through its mystical pages there is one person manifest. He to whom we are introduced in the Gospel, whose power is revealed in the Acts, whose teaching is revealed in the Epistles, here he is seen in all his majesty and glory, full of beauty, with the many diadems upon his brow, affirming, I am Alpha and Omega; announcing: I make all things new; and to his waiting ones affirming, I come quickly.

Thus, the New Testament is the book of Christ.

In closing, let me say, The Christian religion is the religion of the Christ of the New Testament. All through these past nineteen centuries, it has steadily but surely grown, passing through many trials and difficulties; has ebbed and flowed like the incoming tide; but in spite of outside opposition, and also often internal failure, it has steadily advanced, turning sinners into saints, righting social wrongs, transforming national character, freeing slaves, uplifting womanhood, caring for the children, thus proving to the world its power to do all that Christ our Savior and Redeemer said it would do, thus standing as a living witness and testimony of its purity and divinity.

THE OLDEST FORMS OF RELIGION.

A clear, steady light of ever-increasing brilliancy is shed on the Old Testament account of the origin of religion. For centuries men have been searching to find a better account. Failure is written everywhere. Religion in theory is older than man. Jesus Christ was "the lamb slain from the foundation of the world," and it is not reasonable to suppose that God revealed to the first sinner the plan of redemption. That such is the case, we know. Christianity, then, was, or is, the oldest religion.

Religion, when simmered down to its very essence, is faith in a supreme being. With one leap we pass from Adam to Noah. The history of that period is brief, but we know that no link is missing in the chain of faith in God.

Then comes the flood. Noah and his family are saved; and to the three sons that settled in three different parts of the earth we trace the beginnings of all religions, excepting Christianity.

Shem, Japheth, and Ham were the three sons of Noah. The one hundred and fifth Psalm speaks of Jacob sojourning in "the land of Ham," which was Africa. Japheth went to the regions around Europe, and Shem settled in Asia.

The language underwent changes and nations sprang up. Sin, which the deluge had numbed but not killed, began to lift its head, and the spirit of light withdrew, leaving man to his own resources.

It is natural for man to be religious. There is no place on earth where the influence of religion is not felt.

Nimrod founds a city, Babylon; Asshur builds Ninevah. We might call these the nuclei around which gathered the two great kingdoms of the Tigris—Assyria and Babylonia.

Here are millions of people, the descendants of Noah, but they have retrograded because of wickedness. We find them religious; but their religion is the faint echo of a past Edenic harmony. Spencer, and many others, would have us believe that pagan religion is a religion of evolution. The man walking along a lonely road sees his shadow in the moonlight; this awakens the idea of a dual nature—body and spirit—which develops into the profound belief of immortality and the Great Spirit.

We earnestly question the correctness of these scientists' conclusions, and advance the thought that paganism is simply a diminution of Christianity. Hence we find the Assyrians worshiping spirits, animals, which with the better class of men, represented the unseen deities. Theirs was a somber future. The unseen world was full of demons, and living as they did on the animal plane, it is not to be wondered that the belief in a paradise of rest and purity had no place in their theology. Ana was their chief God, and we find them holding a vague idea of the trinity, tree of life, and deluge. They worshiped the sun and moon.

Egypt is the oldest kingdom of which we have a record, yet antiquarians do not agree on its age. It is easy to believe that the descendants of Ham are its principal founders. Ham was of Christian parents. This old form of religion is simply the result of abandoning God's teachings and substituting the teachings of men. The worship of animals by the Egyptians was but an afterthought, introduced by the priests. To the intelligent votary they represent the higher powers, just as the cross and image do to the Catholic. But in many a case the creature is revered more than the creator.

The idea of the future state remained the prominent feature of the Egyptian religion. The embalmed body was placed in the catacomb, and the soul began its long journey in the dim twilight, over the River of Death, towards the sun—on, on, at last to return to its preserved body, to stand on its feet a resurrected being. This belief in immortality, resurrection, supreme beings, and so many other Christian principles, is the result of divine instruction, rather than historic development.

The pyramid and obelisk erected in religion's name, distinguished great places of burial.

The religion of Phœnicia was inferior to that of Egypt, yet it had many rites and gods, worshiped the sun, offered sacrifices to Baal, had a priesthood. In its human sacrifices, and in the mothers' offering their children to the gods, one can almost catch a glimpse of the atonement of God's Son. These mother religions have produced many offsprings, to which we can refer only by name—the Fire Worshipers of Persia, Buddhism of India, Druidism of Old England, religions of the Romans and Greeks which are worthy of separate mention, and the Chinese system of worship. And we discover in all religions the golden thread of immortality, and the beliefs in one or more supreme beings. The legends of paganism go back, and, in a shadowy way, tell us of the "desire of all nations."—Jesus Christ.

THE LAWS OF HEALTH.

Man is only in part a creature of instinct. He is responsible for sin, crime, and sickness. His fever-blistered lips, palsied hand, misshapen body, are the result or consequence of a violation of the Law of Life—some one sinned or blundered. It is an unpardonable error to charge to Providence the sufferings that are the results of our own folly.

That death must overtake us all, and that sickness comes to the just as well as to the unjust, no one denies, yet it is equally certain that death and sickness are the result of a broken law; and, too, is it a fact that a vast proportion of the physical ills we suffer might be avoided by care and foresight.

God has given us brains and he expects us to use them. We are commanded to study all good books; and surely among these books are those that teach the laws of health. The great Father has manifested a most practical interest in the welfare of our bodies, telling us what to eat, when to sleep, what not to drink, and so warning us of the awful dangers that are before us. Had the Word of Wisdom been given by a celebrated specialist on dietetics many of us would prize its teachings more than we do now.

The thoughts that I present in this paper, while not original, have certainly been indelibly stamped on my mind by a tedious two years' existence in one of the largest hospitals in the world.

Whether the modern hospital is a blessing or a curse, whether it properly relieves the congestion caused by sickness, whether it is a life-saver or a life-taker, I will not express my opinion. That such an institution is a boon to the poor, may be the case,—there are two sides to the story.

We are living in the age of disease. Flesh is so corrupt that it is a victim to almost anything that falls upon it. It is the age of doctors. Compared with the past, it is the age of mortality from disease. It is the age of consumption, pneumonia, weak hearts, nervousness, insanity, and so-called optimism, which, in this case, is but another word for self-deception. Rank superstition seems to pervade everything,—religion and medicine suffering more than anything else. The analogy between the two is startling. If false religions ceased to exist, there would be thousands of silent pulpits; and if sickness vanished from our midst, thousands of physicians would be out of employment.

Colorado is becoming the nation's cemetery. After the victim of medical superstition has been dosed on copper, zinc, lead, iron, silver, gold, and hundreds of other things, till he is a physical wreck, he is sent to a warm climate—to die. Dispensing poisons in a learned, scientific manner may be dignified; and having the weight of a diploma behind the act may be persuasive, but the results are far from satisfactory. Honest men of the medical fraternity are admitting the impotency of poisons as healers of diseases. One of the leading medical journals, Medical News, in its issue of January 31, 1903, tells us that if "consumption is ever eradicated, as well as all other diseased conditions of whatever name, it must be largely accomplished by a return to the observance of the laws of life and health which we, as physicians, should of course follow and teach. For it was by various departures from the laws of our being that the multitude of diseases originated during the past ages. . . . I have been curious enough to trace out, historically, the fact that human life has been cut short, from nearly a thousand years to an average of less than fifty, through disregard of the principles of right living. As guardians of health and life, we must, if we can, not only cure diseases understandingly, but warn all under our influence to avoid the causes, . . . deleterious to life and health."

Ah, as Hamlet says, "That's the rub." How many doctors tell us how to keep well? How many give us the "ounce of preventive" which is worth "a pound of cure"? If the medical world discovered a remedy that would instantly cure every ill, who of the fraternity would place the knowledge into the hand of suffering humanity? Would it not mean take in the shingle and seek a livelihood in other channels? Hence we see that when any profession degenerates into cold-blooded commercialism, there is danger ahead; so much danger that our merciful Father has commanded the building of a sanitarium that the Saints may be protected from learned quackery.

The study of medicine is proper, but the uniting of one's self to a superstition is disastrous; the herb has its place in the healing of our bodies, but the turning of earth inside out and appropriating the metals found therein for the restoration of tissue is folly.

When we find men fearless enough to speak the convictions of their minds, the other side of the story is presented for our consideration. Take the words of Doctor Cyrus Edison, one of our leading minds on this subject:

After all has been said, it must be admitted that the proper observance of personal and public hygiene on the part of every individual belonging to the civilized world would do more to effect a reduction of the death-rate, and prolong the average duration of life, than any discoveries in the cure of diseases that at present seem within the bounds of possibility.—North American Review, January, 1892.

Elmer Lee, M. D., referring to this subject:

In the coming practice it will be possible and practicable to afford the highest forms of professional aid without the use of drugs and chemicals.—New York Tribune, November 23, 1898.

Doctor Goodhart:

The morbid sensitiveness of people in the present day is well shown by the rapidity with which they fly to medicine. The number of new drugs that are daily launched upon us is bewildering in the extreme . . . drugs are given for several other reasons, some of which are far less free from criticism. Sometimes because the patient will not be happy till he gets them; sometimes to hide our ignorance, or to mark time while we watch and wait; and then we often give drugs as an experiment in the hope that they may do good. All treatment by drugs is more or less an experiment.—The Hospital, August 3, 1901.

"Know thyself" was written in golden capitals upon the ancient temple of Delphos. Well would it be for us if the words were engraven upon our hearts. How little the average man knows about himself, is manifested by his immediately sending for a doctor when a slight cold or headache enters the home. The routine prescription (quinine, physic, etc.) is given, and the patient pays two dollars for what he might have learned in five minutes.

Case number two did not have much blood. The family physician was called in and left the bottle of "iron." After the afflicted had paid about fifty dollars (the price of two stoves) for "iron," and had lost nearly all his teeth, he in disgust threw the prescription into the fire and the iron outdoors and began to live by the Word of Wisdom. The proper food was eaten, sleep was taken in the hours set apart for the upbuilding of the body, and plenty of exercise given the body. The result was health.

Case number three: Two men had typhoid fever. They were very sick. The same doctor attended them, though no medical treatment was required. When convalescing, the one man was allowed to eat heartily of baked beans and brown bread. He died. The other man was properly nursed. He lived.

Well did the Saturday Evening Post, June 24, 1905, state:

It is curious to note the slow, steady progress of the medical profession toward reluctant belief in natural remedies. . . . Doctors ought to be preventers, not curers; advocates of fresh air and simple diet and regular sleep and exercise, not of drugs and incantations.

We are governed by laws, and any infringement of them is attended by loss of health. Not too strongly can be impressed the truth that to live in accordance with the laws of health is a duty, an obligation we owe, not to ourselves only, but to our posterity and to our Creator. Our daily acts are sowing the seeds of disease or health. We ought to know what to do.

Doctor Horton Howard, in Domestic Medicine, page 40, tells us that "no small share of the suffering and diseases of the human race have their origin in the emotions of the mind. . . . The efficacy of bread pills could be attested to by thousands, if they knew the component parts of the medicine they had taken . . . in too many cases the physician is ignorant of the powerful influence of the mind on the body, and instead of directing for the patient cheerful associations, pure air, simple diet, appropriate use of water, etc., proceeds to administer powerful drugs, and to conduct the patient through a 'regular course' of treatment. Besides the many who are speedily hurried into their graves, thousands are in this way kept upon their beds for weeks and months, suffering in mind and body, and have their constitutions weakened, and their systems tainted for life by this unnatural and poisonous process of getting well; when with proper care and attention to diet and their habits, and healthful influences on the mind, only a few days would be required for the return of the usual vigor and tone of their system."

I understand that the sentiments expressed in the foregoing paragraph are in harmony with the revelation authorizing us to build a sanitarium. We need a place where our sick can be tenderly nursed by the hands of friends; where a medicine, when needed, can be rationally administered, and where the Word of Wisdom will be honored. We can not afford to risk our sick in the hands of ignorant experimenters, who to-day will withhold all water from the fever-burning body till it is consumed by its heat, and to-morrow urge the drinking of cup after cup; who at one time will insist on the administration of mercury for countless ills of the flesh, and after the lapse of a few years and the poisoning of hundreds of victims, cry out with Professor Chapman of Pennsylvania and Doctor Graham of Edinburgh: "He who, for ordinary cause, resigns the fate of his patient to mercury, is a vile enemy to the sick." "A barbarous practice, the inconsistency, folly, and injury of which no words can sufficiently describe."

It has been said that "the great majority of mankind saturate their own death warrants with their cups and dig their graves with their teeth." Our use, or misuse, of food is responsible for half the sickness we have. Whoever introduced the common habit of "washing down" the food, is largely responsible for the weak stomachs and the decayed teeth of the present day. If you want your stomach to be strong, leave off the cup of "hot drink"; have every decayed tooth either filled or extracted; don't "bolt" your food, and don't neglect to exercise; select proper nourishment and indulge the appetite lightly.

The Lord said, "oats for the horse, wheat for man," and when we eat "oat meal porridge" three hundred sixty-five times a year, making a constant diet of horse food, we must expect the intelligent physician to say, "you have an 'oat meal stomach,' change you diet."

We must expect our bodies to be racked with rheumatic pains, headaches, kidney disease, and a score of other aches, if, contrary to Heaven's mandate, we clog our systems with fish and flesh. Meat to be used sparingly, and that in time of cold, is a teaching of the Word of Wisdom. The custom to-day is to eat too much and too fast. Disease is the result.

"Hot drinks are not for the belly." Then why are they used? Because man is a slave to habit. Tea, coffee, and cocoa are excitants rather than nutritive foods. Is it not a fact that when any part of the body is stimulated, it is weakened? There is absolutely no excuse for the continued use of tea or coffee or cocoa. Very much could be quoted on this subject, but the following from Doctor Potter's Materia Medica, page 130, will suffice:

Coffee . . . used to excess [and I maintain that when employed as other purpose than medicine, it is used to excess] it disorders digestion, and causes functional disturbances of the nervous system, shown by headache, vertigo, mental confusion, and palpitation of the heart. It first briefly stimulates the heart and raises arterial tension, but soon depresses both. Tea . . . used to excess, it powerfully affects the stability of the motor and vaso-motor nerves, the action of the heart, and the digestion function,—producing flatulent dyspepsia, tremulousness of the limbs, . . .

And yet how often do we find these drugs on the tables of Saints, placed before the children, and passed around at the social gatherings. Inspiration tells us that grains are for mild drinks. If we would be healthy, we must avoid tea, coffee, cocoa, and alcohol.

We must have plenty of pure air in our lungs. Open your doors and windows and let in life. But we must breathe. It is extremely injurious and detrimental to health to allow only the upper cells of the lungs to receive air, and the lower cells to remain inactive till the filth that accumulates results in "consumption." How can man be healthy when only 10,000 square inches of the 20,000 that constitute the lining of his lungs come in contact with pure air? Throw back the shoulders; look up (physically and spiritually), and allow nature to work. Anything that compresses the chest, liver, intestine, retards free action, and disease results. Throw away the corsets; if God intended the abdomen to have ribs he would have placed them there.

Ventilate the living-rooms, the sleeping-rooms. Let in the sunlight. Curtains! one of the curses of civilization. Man is a plant. He would wither away and die if kept in a stived and dark room. Every muscle of the body needs exercise—vigorous exercise. Medicine is no substitute. Man must walk, lift, bend,—call into action every fiber of his being, if he would be well.

The teeth require exercise. They must chew something. When we have comparatively nothing but mush for breakfast, soup for dinner, hot drink and custard for supper, in a short time the teeth begin to "melt." A decaying tooth will destroy the one beneath it and the ones on each side. Hot drinks are not for the teeth, neither are metallic picks. Thoroughly brush the teeth twice a day. A clean mouth is as essential as a clean body.

And we are commanded to keep clean. The pores of the skin must be kept open. There is nothing that will accomplish this so well as "honest sweat," and the bath of warm water with plenty of pure soap. The underclothes, after being worn awhile, contain poison which must not be absorbed by the body. Hence, the washerwoman has a most important calling, that of keeping the body healthy.

Mothers should see that the children have their weekly bath, and that just before retiring.

The Word of Wisdom tells us when to sleep. Regular hours are essential to health, and many a weak-bodied person has hastened his death by the late hours he has kept. "Retire early" means before ten o'clock, and to "rise early" is to get up before six.

If we want to have aching heads, weak stomachs, pale faces, weary minds, we know how to get them; but let us remember that the Lord has "warned and forewarned" us, and told us how to escape many, if not all, of the afflictions of the human body.

As the reader will observe, I have been more anxious to be understood than to use big words. I have scarcely more than introduced the subjects that are presented to arouse attention to this most important question of health. Let us organize a Word of Wisdom club and endeavor to lead the world physically, as we do spiritually.

May the Saints profit by all the instructions given in the Word of Truth, that they may be sanctified in body as well as in spirit, is the fervent desire of the one who submits this article for their consideration.

A LETTER FROM PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT ON RACE SUICIDE.

[After reading Doctor Cronin's article on "The doctor in the public schools," in the April number of the Review of Reviews, President Roosevelt dictated the following letter to the editor of this magazine. Owing to the wide-spread interest in the subject, the President has acceded to the editor's request that the letter be given to the public. It is perhaps only fair to Doctor Cronin to call attention to the fact that he was dealing in his article with the question of large families in some of the crowded sections of New York City. The President heartily approved of the article as a whole, but took exception to the single paragraph cited in this letter.—The editor Review of Reviews.

My Dear Doctor Shaw: You know how sincerely I believe that your magazine generally stands for moral betterment all around. I was really shocked to see in it the last paragraph but one in the article in the April magazine on "The doctor in the public school." The ordinary individual thinks so little on these questions that it is pardonable for him to think in confused fashion even on such an elementary proposition as this. But the man who affects to instruct others in matters of moral and hygienic reform must be expected to exhibit at least the rudimentary intelligence and morality necessary to prevent his saying what has been said here. The writer states clearly that it is an erroneous idea to assume that the average American family should have a larger number of healthy children than the present birth-rate shows. The vital statistics of a State like Massachusetts show that there the average native American family of native American descent has so few children that the birth-rate has fallen below the death-rate. This, of course, means race suicide, and it ought to be understood that if after a while there are no children to go to school the question of their health in school would not even be academic.

The writer's statement that "physical defects go hand in hand with a large number of children, both in the rich and the poor," is simply not true, as he could tell at a glance by looking up, for instance, the fact that athletes are most often to be found in fair-sized families. I am not speaking now of families of inordinate size, though even as to such the high standard of health and strength among the French Canadians, for instance, is astonishing, but of those of half a dozen children or thereabouts. Let him look up any serious statistics, or study any author worth reading on the subject at all, including Benjamin Franklin, and he will see that in the ordinary family of but one or two children there is apt to be lower vitality than in a family of four or five or more. All he has to do, if he doubts this, is to study the effects of the marriages with heiresses of the British nobility. The question at issue is not between having "a few perfect children" and "a dozen unkempt degenerates"; it is between having, in the average family, a number of children so small that the race diminishes, while, curiously enough, the physique in such case likewise tends to fall off, and the reasonable growth which comes when the average family is large enough to make up for the men and women who do not marry and for those who do and have no children, or but one or two. The writer quotes the statistics for Berlin. Let him study them a little more; let him study other statistics as well; let him turn to any book dealing with the subject if written by a man capable of touching upon it at all (as, for instance, let him turn to page 162 of Finot's Race Prejudice, which I happen at this moment to be reading), and he will see that in cities like Berlin the upper classes, the wealthier classes, tend to die out precisely because of the low birth-rate to which he points. The greatest problem of civilization is to be found in the fact that the well-to-do families tend to die out; there results, in consequence, a tendency to the elimination instead of the survival of the fittest; and the moral attitude which helps on this tendency is of course strengthened when it is apologized for and praised in a magazine like yours. It is not the very poor, it is not the ignorant people with large families, who tend to read such articles in magazines like the Review of Reviews; it is the upper-class people who already tend to have too few children who are reached and corrupted by such teachings.

Our people could still exist under all kinds of iniquities in government; under a debased currency, under official corruption, under the rule of a socialistic proletariat, or a wealthy oligarchy. All these things would be bad for us, but the country would still exist. But it could not continue to exist if it paid heed to the expressed or implied teachings of such articles as this. These teachings furnish excuses for every unnatural prevention of child-bearing, for every form of gross and shallow selfishness of the kind that is really the deepest reflection on, the deepest discredit to, American social life. There are countries which, and people in all countries who need to be warned against a rabbit-like indifference to consequences in raising families. The ordinary American, whether of the old native stock or the self-respecting son or daughter of immigrants, needs no such warning. He or she needs to have impressed upon his or her mind the vital lesson that all schemes about having "doctors in public schools," about kindergartens, civic associations, women's clubs, or training families up in this way or that are preposterous nonsense if there are to be no families to train; and that it is a simple mathematical proposition that, where the average family that has children at all has only three, the race at once diminishes in numbers, and if the tendency is not checked will vanish completely,—in other words, there will be race suicide. Not only the healthiest, but the highest relations in life are those of the man and the woman united on a basis of full and mutually respecting partnership and wise companionship in loving and permanent wedlock. If, through no fault of theirs, they have no children they are entitled to our deepest sympathy. If they refuse to have children sufficient in number to mean that the race goes forward and not back,* if they refuse to bring them up healthy in body and mind, then they are criminals.

Sincerely yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

A MILITANT MISSIONARY.

An instance where the command to "resist not evil," but to "overcome evil with good," was so far forgotten by a Christian missionary in the South Sea Islands that he instigated the bombardment of a native village by a British war-ship, is reported by the Melbourne Age. This act of the panic-stricken missionary is likely to stir up devilry among the natives and arouse hostility to everything the white man has to offer, remarks the Mel-

*This must mean, on an average, four among the families which are not for natural causes, childless or limited to a less number than four. Professor Edward A. Ross, of the University of Wisconsin, has put the matter concisely as follows: "The type to be standardized is not to six. The one-child or two-child ideal growing in favor with the middle class would, if popularized, hurry us to extinction."

bourne paper, and the editor of the Missionary Review says that when this act of the missionary reaches the ears of his superiors he will probably be recalled. The incident is related as follows:

"When off the Solomon Group information reached the cruiser that certain coastal natives on the island of Malaita had been making themselves troublesome to a white missionary stationed near Port Royalist. The Prometheus immediately steamed to the locality, and was boarded by a missionary attached to the Melanesian Mission. This reverend gentleman having complained that some of the coastal natives had fired on their fellow countrymen belonging to the mission, and had otherwise interrupted the mission work, the cruiser, with the missionary on board, at once proceeded to the spot supposed to be inhabited by the offenders. Very soon a village was sighted, but the natives on perceiving a war-ship deserted their houses and fled into the bush. The Prometheus thereupon dropped a few live shells from her broadsides into the village, and, satisfied that the damage they wrought would induce the islanders to show greater respect to missionaries in the future, she returned the white missionary to his home and resumed her voyage."

The Melbourne paper makes the following indignant comment on the affair:

"These are the bold facts of an incident which represents the last of a long series of almost precisely similar exploits extending back for almost half a century. They can not be claimed to reflect the slightest credit on British civilization. The commander of the Prometheus may excuse himself on the ground that he followed the law of custom, but it would be difficult to discover any other justification for his high-handed conduct. He appears to have taken the ex parte statement of the missionary as to the doings of the unfriendly natives in the light of a revealed truth. Without troubling to hear the other side; without, indeed, providing the accused with an opportunity to set up a defense, he forthwith wreaked vengeance for the missionary on the property of a number of possibly quite innocent people. . . .

"It would be absurd to suppose that the whole village community had joined in committing the crimes complained of. Some of the natives had perhaps offended; but it is quite certain that others were innocent, and it is also highly probably that these latter had no sympathy with the misdemeanants. Yet that is a circumstance which the commander of the cruiser ignored; and his shells, as indiscriminating as himself, involved the property of the innocent and possibly guilty alike in a common ruin. The injured Malaita natives inevitably look upon all white men henceforth as unjust and remorseless enemies. They will not know the individuals who wronged them, but they will resent their injuries on any members of the white race they can reach, according to their own rude precepts, by stealthy murders, robberies, and petty thefts.

"Nothing breeds injustice like injustice, more particularly in savage and untutored minds. The buccaneering expedition of the Prometheus smells rank with injustice from start to finish, and it will be bound to produce the crop of outrages which it has sown."

Of the missionary's part in it the same paper remarks:

"The Malaita affair has been rendered peculiarly shocking by the presence on board the Prometheus, at the time the native village was shelled, of the missionary whose complaints inspired the expedition. He may, it is true, not have been a party to the war-ship's indefensibly lawless punitive act. But he was present, and the fact will lend new color to the malicious charges which Britain's enemies are so fond of leveling against her ancient her colonizing processes. They say that whenever she wishes to occupy a new territory she first sends out missionaries as her political pioneers, whose mandate—backed by her powerful aid—is to force the gospel on the heathen with the Bible in one hand and a shot-gun in the other. The slander may be a hard one to substantiate, but it is equally difficult to refute, and that difficulty is sensibly enhanced when the slanderers who utter it are gratuitously furnished with such evidence as the Prometheus has assisted to place at their disposal. Let us hope in the interests of Australia and of the national and imperial repute, that it will be the final incident of its vicious and disgraceful kind."—Literary Digest, May 4, 1907.

NEAL CLUTCHES ANOTHER STRAW.

R. B. Neal, of Grayson, Kentucky, breaks forth again in the Christian Standard for April 20, 1907.

This time he has unearthed a wonderful occurrence, said to have happened at Kinderhook, Illinois, in 1843, where some plates were found by a party of men, and afterwards sent to Joseph Smith at Nauvoo, for the purpose of deciphering some alleged ancient characters engraved upon them.

Mr. Neal takes the position that the plates were prepared and hid in the mound as a hoax by certain residents of Kinderhook, Illinois, and the so-called characters were a lot of meaningless tracings. To prove his position he publishes an affidavit from one of the men who signed a statement corroborating the account of the original finding of the plates.

This witness of Mr. Neal's admits in his affidavit that he was one of those who signed a certificate attached to a statement made about the time the plates were found. In that certificate, Mr. Neal's witness joined with eight others in certifying that:

"On the 23rd day of April, 1843, while excavating a large mound in this vicinity Mr. R. Wiley took from said mound six brass plates, of a bell shape covered with ancient characters."

This same man, who certified and declared that "the six brass plates" taken from the mound were "covered with ancient characters," afterwards admits that he and Wiley made the characters on the plates. If he and Wiley made them, he certified to a falsehood when he declared in his first signed statement that the characters on the plates were ancient characters. According to his own affidavit, Mr. Neal's witness certified once to a falsehood; who is prepared to state when he stopped falsifying? And yet this man, who by his own confession is the willful maker of a lie, is brought forward as the sole witness to a transaction which Mr. Neal says "should, and will, for ever damn Joseph Smith, Jr., and his system."

What Mr. Neal's witness says may be true, but surely Reverend Neal is slightly overstepping his grounds as a professed minister of Jesus Christ, when he forgets the gospel admonition that every word should be established in the mouth of two, or more, witnesses, and substitutes in its place the unsupported testimony of one lone man, who is a self-confessed falsifier, as the main evidence upon which he proposes to "for ever damn Joseph Smith, Jr." The Kinderhook affair may have been a hoax, but before Mr. Neal succeeds in convincing unprejudiced minds that it was so, he must produce better evidence than is contained in his articles.—Evening and Morning Star, April, 1907.

INDIANS.

It is upon the comparatively plastic material of the youth who come within our educational influences that we must depend for the molding of the Indian of the future. There are about forty thousand Indian children of school age, and it is hoped that they may be so trained as to leaven powerfully the whole. In conformity with the general plan the school system has been modified and is now regulated upon the most practical lines. The primary object is to produce capable frontiersmen and their helpmates. The girls are taught the domestic arts before everything. The boys learn reading, writing, and simple arithmetic, but for the rest the effort is directed to making farmers, smiths, or wheelrights of them. This is cultivating the weakest side of the Indian, whose most pronounced deficiency is that of the practical sense. During the period of schooling every opportunity for enjoying profitable experience is extended to the youths.

Two cases may be cited as typical of the gratifying results that have been secured.

A bridge was needed to span a creek in Snohomish County, Washington, and the officials estimated the cost of it at $3,000. They were induced to allow the boys of the Tulalip School to undertake the work. It was completed by the youngsters quite satisfactorily and at a cost of $650.

During six weeks of last summer forty-nine school-boys and three adults worked in the Colorado beet-fields earning $1,672 over and above all expenses. The lads have put their money into sheep, which their relatives will look after while the boys are attending school.

Such experiences—and they have not been few in number—point to the conclusion that the problem is to be found in the school and would seem to justify the theory of education supported by the Indian Commissioner. At the same time they tend to strengthen the suspicion that it had been better for the Indian and ourselves to have allowed more extended effort to the educational agency before emancipating the adults.

However, the efforts of the Indian Office to induct the young able-bodied redskins to the field of labor have been crowned with remarkable success during the past year. Two thousand or more young men under agents of their own race were employed upon irrigation works, in mines, and on railroad construction. Their transportation home was made conditional on the performance of at least thirty days' consecutive labor. The fulfillment of this requirement taxed the Indians' staying powers severely, but hundreds of them have at the present time been steadily at work for six months or more. Every employer speaks highly of them and is well satisfied to pay them the wages of white men.

The Indian, provided he develops in the right direction, should make an ideal day laborer. He has a fine physique, is a total abstainer from liquor, cheery tractable, and conscientious. The great difficulty is to overcome in the first place his disinclination to work and then to persuade him, after having provided for to-morrow, to earn something for the needs of the next day. Secure his pledge to perform a task and he will make good his word with an admirable display of grit and honesty.

It must be understood that the men thus employed are the pick of the reservation Indians and a large proportion of them have the influence of our educational agencies. The most that can be achieved with the full-blood past middle age is to induce him to till a small section of his own land or to work in a desultory manner on an irrigation project within his reservation. Various tribes, again, display differing degrees of capacity. The Zunis, whose ancestors wrung a scanty living from a niggard soil, are underfed and dispirited, while no better laborer than the Apache can be found. Some of the most difficult and arduous of the reclamation work has been performed by the Apaches, and the Salt River project affords the significant spectacle of the survivors of Geronimo's band working to render their old home a pleasant place for the white man to live in.—The World To-day, March, 1907.

CANON NUNN AND AMUSEMENTS.

At St. Thomas's Church, Ardwick, Manchester, the anniversary school sermons were preached on Sunday, and were attended by large congregations. Canon Nunn (the rector) preached in the morning from the first lesson, Deuteronomy 4:10: "That they may learn to fear me all the days that they shall live upon the earth, and that they may teach their children." He said it was his forty-second school anniversary, and it afforded an opportunity of reviewing the past history of their Sunday-schools. Their numbers remained much the same from year to year. But it required much effort to keep up the attendance, owing to many contrary currents. The morning school was not attended as it used to be. Forty years ago they had two thirds of the children at the morning Sunday-school. Now hardly more than a third attended. The Saturday afternoon holiday was partly responsible for the change. Late shopping and Saturday amusements unfitted the people for their Sunday duties. Another hindrance was the large Sunday tram traffic. The city authorities seemed determined to make a Sunday traffic if there was none.

But the eager pursuit of amusement was the greatest hindrance to their work. Sunday bands drew many from the Sunday-schools, especially from the schools in the neighborhood of the parks. The general pursuit of pleasure had greatly increased. Duty was postponed to pleasure. Lawful amusements were too eagerly pursued, and unlawful amusements were multiplied. By unlawful amusements were meant those that tended to injure and corrupt others. They were bound to look to the welfare of others. Many of the amusements most rife amongst them tended to degrade womanhood and to debase manhood. They were plainly forbidden by the law of God. It was their duty to inquire not only "Does this amusement come within legal prohibition?" but "Is it forbidden by the fear of God?" If they could say of any gathering "The fear of God is not in this place" it was their duty to shun it. So long as persons who professed and called themselves Christians frequented doubtful places of amusement things would go from bad to worse. If the great sea of public opinion were not salted continually by Christian principles it would rapidly become corrupt. They had already reached such a depth of degradation that the common voice of humanity had been evoked to arrest the growing evils of which he spoke. Their duty was plain: "Be thou in the fear of God all the day long." That fear should follow them to their homes, their shops, their workrooms and counting-houses.

The collections for the day on behalf of the schools and the new parish room reached £41 11s. 2d.—Manchester Guardian (England) April 30, 1907.

FARM LIFE.

When the heavyweight editor can't think of anything else to write about, he discusses the time-worn problem, "How shall we keep the boys on the farm?" observes the Atchison Champion. Boys leave the farm because they don't enjoy fourteen or fifteen hours of bitter hard work every day; they don't like to get up before daylight in the morning and toil like steam engines until after dark in the evening. When a farmer lad has finished his daily work he hasn't much use for a library, and he wouldn't think of playing a tune on a concertina, and as for drilling around a billiard table, the idea would give him a brain storm.

The best way to encourage the farmer boys is to treat them as though they were human beings; let them have their sleep in the mornings; call ten hours a day's work; let them have their evenings for themselves, without a thousand heartbreaking chores to embitter their souls and make them old before their time.

Any system that robs a boy of his play hours, of the companionship of his fellows, that makes a machine of him, is wrong and brutal, and for generations the farmer boys have been victims of such a system.—Kansas City Journal, April 25, 1907.

Mothers' Home Column

EDITED BY FRANCES.

Graceland.

This week there came to our table the March Bulletin of Graceland College—a modest sheet of four pages—four small pages yet freighted with matter of intense interest to each father and mother in the church who has sons or daughters to educate. This Bulletin is full of hope and cheer regarding the future outlook of Graceland, and among other good things which that outlook promises—indeed we think we might say among the best of them—is the following from the pen of that indefatigable worker for the upbuilding of Graceland, Elder F. B. Blair, secretary of the Board of Trustees:

"INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION.

"It has long been the ambition of those having the management of the college business to add an industrial department, to include manual training, to the college work. There were two objects in view. We have full confidence that it would be a valuable addition from an educational point of view and in addition it would be developed as a Self-Help department, to permit students to meet a part or all of their living expenses by their work. We have found a large number of young people in the different branches of the church who desire to better their condition by securing an education, but are prevented by a lack of means, and yet they should be given an equal opportunity with those whose parents have means.

"The authorities of Graceland College have made a modest start along this line, though it can not be developed very largely until there is some one to give it oversight. C. B. Woodstock, a young brother from Wisconsin, who is heartily in sympathy with this work, has been secured and will take charge the coming year. The General Sunday-school Association at their late convention made a donation of one thousand dollars with which to equip a department in manual training. This will provide a complete equipment for the first three years' course and Mr. Woodstock comes to us well qualified as an instructor to carry on the work.

"There are over sixty acres in the college tract and it is intended to use the land to carry out the industrial idea. Already a start has been made in cows, pigs, and chickens, and part of the land has been plowed and will be put in crops this year.

"Our start is a small one, but most great enterprises have small beginnings. We do not anticipate all smooth sailing, but expect to meet obstacles and overcome them and finally win success, as all must admit that the cause is a worthy one.

"We erected a dormitory last year to help carry out this plan, and another one should be built this summer, and will be if the means are secured. We believe that there are a number of our people who will be interested in this movement, and desire to help push it on, and we here present to them the opportunity.

"Just write, 'Bro. Blair, here is a thousand dollars—a hundred dollars—a dollar—a horse—a cow (or anything you want to give) to help that industrial department,' and send it to me and receipt will be sent you at once. May the divine Master direct us in all our efforts for good.

"F. B. BLAIR, Secretary, Board of Trustees."

It would be a matter of interest just at this time to glance even briefly at the work which other educational institutions of our favored land have essayed along similar lines and to note the success which has crowned these efforts, and we may do this at no distant day. But just now, in order to emphasize what Bro. Blair has said in regard to this contemplated work of our college, we wish to call your attention to a recent editorial of Walter H. Page in the World's Work. This man is certainly in a position enabling him to take a broad outlook and draw therefrom impartial and just conclusions. True he is looking to our public schools to remedy the great deficiency to which he calls attention, but in the meantime why should Graceland wait? For one we are glad—most heartily glad—that those having the interests of Graceland in charge are moving out upon such lines. This is what Mr. Page says:

"THE FORGOTTEN BOY WHOM WE NOW NEED.

"One of the biggest and stubbornest facts that face us in our prosperity is the lack of skilled workmen. We are suddenly waking up to it that, with all our educational machinery, there is no part of it—except a few private schools and the bare beginnings of work in a very few public schools—that trains the young directly to earn their livings by the trades.

"There is only one way out of this absurd position. A part of the public school machinery must be adapted to trade-training, and enough of it to put a free trade-school within the reach of every boy and girl who wants it. 'Educationalists' may discuss this theory and that, till the crack of doom. This is a condition and not a theory; and the people had just as well begin to make this change, no matter what theory it violates. If teaching the trades be not 'education,' so much the worse for education. When we have to import carpenters and paperhangers and masons and the like, and when very, very few American boys have a chance to learn these trades, and when we maintain public schools to teach boys, it is time to stop the foolishness of discussion and to come to the common sense of making the schools do what is needed.

"Most of the 'education' that we offer to those who must become wage-earners not only fails to fit them for their work but tends to make them dissatisfied with it. Our high schools are designed to help business and professional men—the class which needs help least. We learned long ago that a college which was meant chiefly to train preachers would not give us good engineers, and we have been building engineering schools ever since. We are now just finding out that a high school which is meant mainly to prepare boys for college does not help boys who are going to be carpenters. Yet the apprenticeship system—except in some highly organized shops—no longer meets the demands of modern conditions. Even immigration has not supplied the deficiency. We need more skilled workmen than we have any means of getting. Private trade schools can never be numerous enough to reach the mass of the working people. They can hardly do more than point the way. We must have public schools that will prepare carpenters to build, as well as prepare others for the professions—schools in which young men and young women may get a training adapted to the work which they intend to do."

Letter Department

LAMONI, Iowa, May 4, 1907.

Editors Herald: Under instruction of the High Priests' Quorum at a regular session the 8th ult. to furnish you for publication the letter of Bro. C. H. Caton, relative to the life-work and departure of our worthy colaborer Bishop Thomas Taylor, I present it as follows:

"To High Priests' Quorum; Dear President and Brethren: It is with deep feelings of sorrow I inform you of the death of our respected brother and comrade, Bishop Thomas Taylor, of Birmingham, England, which took place March 18, 1907, in his eighty-second year.

"Thus there has gone to rest and glory one of earth's noblest sons, a man in whom every attribute of goodness it is possible to ascribe to manhood, was manifest.

"For several years the infirmities due to age have hindered him from taking an active part in the work he loved so well. In this he had the deepest sympathy of those around him as it was a great denial to him. Yet even in this it would almost seem the Lord was mindful of his people, for Bro. Taylor was so beloved by the Saints that even at the ripe old age of eighty-two we sorrow at his departure. Of him it may be truly said, He lived faithful to God and man.

"If Bro. Charles Derry is present at your meetings tell him Bro. Taylor often spoke of him and blessed the day he came to England in the name of the Reorganization.

"Bro. Taylor is gone to his rest full of sheaves for his hire, and honors for services rendered.

He was president of Birmingham Branch for thirty-one years; president of Birmingham District for eleven years; in charge of the English mission from February, 1870, to 1872, and again from 1875 to 1892, about nineteen years in all.

"Was for many years Bishop's agent; and last but not least the first bishop of the Reorganization in this country for five years.

"During all these years and services, he never made an enemy nor left a sting behind him.

"His manly bearing and kindly feeling commanded love and respect wherever he went. His very presence filled everybody with confidence.

"As a leader he had the rare quality of knowing how to guide. He ever kept in view the end desired, and by patience sought to obtain it by honorable and straightforward means.

"I have labored with him the closest connections possible for thirty-six years, and feel very acutely his death. I saw him a few hours before he died. His desire was for Rest! rest!

"What a blessing there remaineth—a rest for the people of God.

Your brother in the gospel of Christ,
"BIRMINGHAM, England. C. H. CATON."

Respectfully submitted,
ROBT. M. ELVIN, Secretary.

ONAWA, Iowa, May 6, 1907.

Editors Herald: I inclose you three dollars out of which pay up my back subscription on Sunday School Exponent, and the rest apply on subscription for Exponent, Ensign, and Autumn Leaves.

I also herewith pledge you ten dollars, payable the first day of October, 1907, for the purpose of assisting in rebuilding the HERALD Office.

It was sad news that the little issue of the "HERALD" brought us, but along with it came a double portion of the Spirit, as it were a bright and silver lining to the cloud, bidding us to be encouraged and comforted, rather than to lend ourselves to sorrow and despondency. I can truthfully say that I never read a HERALD when there seemed to be so much of God's Spirit present with me as when I read that little HERALD to our class in Sunday-school, and I can say this further that I rarely ever read the HERALD that I do not feel some degree of the Spirit with me. I tender this subscription because I know it pleases God, and that he wants me to do it.

Pray for me that I may ever be his humble servant.

Your brother in gospel bonds,
T. W. LINDSEY.

STANFORD, Montana, May 1, 1907.

Dear Herald: It has been over a year since I communicated to your precious space. I promised Saints in Canada to write through the papers, but did not find very much time to do so. Most of my time was occupied in trying to explain the gospel truth as we understand it. I visited relatives in Southern Ohio and West Virginia, who believed there was only one organization, viz: polygamists. It had been ten years since I last saw mother and brother at Dempsey, West Virginia; but of course had kept up correspondence. The report soon arose, after I arrived, that I was a Mormon's wife direct from Utah.

Well, madam gossip did more good than she anticipated. My people knew better. They could see how easily false reports could be circulated about our church, so of course they tried to reason the case. There are some honest people there who have been deceived by precepts and creeds of men. They are not satisfied with the teachings of their denominations. If Bro. James Moler sees this, he will remember the condition of those people. There were several inquiries about him among the honest. Bro. Moler left a good mark. Fifteen years has made a great change; all those who persecuted the truth then are gone, some nevermore to return—died horrible deaths—some moved away, so not one vestige of the mob remains. Soon after Bro. Moler left, two Utah elders came through, claiming to be Latter Day Saints, and baptized a Mr. Atwell and wife after night, who did not know they were deceived until I visited them last summer. Said they would be willing to be rebaptized when the opportunity was presented as they said, We do not believe in polygamy. I found some of their tracts at the homes of my relatives, which gave me an opportunity to explain the difference, and present them with literature of the Reorganization. Believe, if I could have stayed in West Virginia a year, and have done fire-side visiting, the field would be ripening for harvest when the Lord's servants visit them again. Some of my people were Methodist and Baptist ministers who said what I told them was all in the Bible, and the truth. But I was the only one of the Wood family that ever united with any other church than the Missionary Baptist Church. I told them I also united with the Baptist Church, and lived up to its teachings until I found the better way. Then my mother's people said, "You are the only one since our fore-parents came from England that ever united with any other church than the Methodist Episcopal South, except D. F. Bays. Said if I would convince them we were not Mormons; they would be willing to listen, so I think they have not a doubt now.

A brother who was stricken with paralysis last April, had been reading the Bible during his affliction. He was seriously in quest of the truth, and insisted I should remain with him and converse upon the Bible. He would invite his friends in of evenings to read and talk on the Bible; told them he had been reading the Bible for some time, and that he had come to the conclusion that there was not a church on the earth to-day that was like it should be, until I came and taught him our belief. He would say, Your belief is the only way, according to the Bible pattern. Said, It makes me sad to think of all the Wood families following each other in the Baptist Church, and to think our grandfathers spent the best of their lives in England in teaching the people that the Baptist Church was the church of Christ. He said, Now, cousins, let us stop and investigate. He requested administration and baptism; said he was willing to prove the Lord. Am sorry to say I neglected sending for God's servants. He was quite feeble, although able by the use of a crutch to walk across the room. My companion did not think he was able to be baptized, so I had to leave him; yet he was in hopes he could be administered to, and be baptized. He died the 5th of September, but requested one of our elders two hours before he died, his wife writes. Although she is a member of the Baptist Church, she believes the church I represent is the nearest right, and regrets her husband did not have the opportunity to obey it.

Soon after arriving at Straw, Montana, the government land was withdrawn from entry. We had to come out thirty-five miles north of Straw. Are located twelve miles from town. The Great Northern is building a road from Billings to Great Falls. The winter was mild and nice, excepting about two weeks of severe cold.

Almost everything excepting fuel is high. We are about thirty miles from the mountains. Can make the round trip in two days and get a load of posts, wood, or building logs free. Plenty of good coal, nearest about fifteen miles. Price three to three and one half dollars per ton at mine. Great demand for laborers of all kinds. Wages good. Several good vacant homesteads yet; if Saints wish to take land come soon, before it is too late. Soil good. Those who have taken time to dig wells, find good water from thirty to forty feet. Land lies in level benches, surrounded by mountains, which furnish abundance of fuel and building material.

Your sister,
MARY V. BRANTWAIT.

"Uncle John" Terry; also our reliable standby, and refuge in time of need (when he is near), Bro. William Lewis, who preached twice last Sunday to good-sized audiences. Our sacrament-meeting was largely attended and characterized by a good degree of God's Spirit.

Wednesday evening, May 1, the branch held the usual semi-annual election of officers; Bro. Goodrich was elected president. Our church has been undergoing some necessary alterations and additions lately which will make it more sanitary and convenient.

We had the opportunity to become acquainted with our incoming pastor, Bro. Goodrich, who came here and remained a couple of weeks after conference, and who we understand will bring his family and reside among us. He created a very favorable impression here and we will gladly welcome the family.

Our Sunday-school is progressing finely. With an efficient corps of officers, and teachers who seem devoted to their work, and a large attendance of interested students of God's word, why should we not expect and accomplish grand results? We are now preparing to celebrate "Children's Day" some time next month. Quite a number of Sunday-school pupils have been baptized of late.

The Ladies' Aid Society and the Prayer Union have decided to try uniting their forces and efforts, both meeting on the same day (Thursday) for work from nine to two, for Prayer Union from two to four.

The Religio is planning an entertainment for the near future. And so each in his own department; all working together with a will may we push the good work on.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.

A very unexpected visitor to Independence on Friday, May 3, was a snow storm. This is unusual for May weather in Jackson County, and even the old residents here do not remember a like occurrence.

Now that General Conference is over, with its interesting suspense, we are getting down to our normal condition again. Many of our workers among the young people had the privilege of attending the Conference, and their absence was most keenly felt at Religio, at one session of which there were sixteen teachers absent.

Of paramount interest to Independence Saints during the past week, was the series of discourses delivered by Bro.

J. W. Rushton, beginning Sunday evening, April 28. Much good was accomplished in more ways than one. Quite a number of visitors were present, many of whom were in attendance all during the week, as were a large number of our people. Not laying aside the educational, instructive, and eloquent side of the week's discourses, we believe we can justly concede the best result to be this: "It has helped us to think."

President Joseph Smith addressed the Saints Sunday morning, the 5th, meeting the requirements of the occasion by advancing his idea along the "ground floor line" of "practical" suggestion in his characteristic manner.

J. A. GARDNER.

LATER.—The pleasant weather to-day made possible a good attendance at all church services of which there were six including the cottage prayer-meeting held at the home of Mr. Patterson, a non-member of the church, in charge of Brn. Harry Hatty and James L. Gray. We have several visiting Saints with us to-day among whom we recognize Bro. J. W. Wight, Bro. Frank Sheehy and wife, Sr. Mark Siegfried from Nauvoo, Illinois, Sr. Hugh Smith from Argentine, Kansas, and Bro. Arthur W. Smith from St. Louis, who in returning was accompanied by his brother, Ray H. Smith, who will be employed at Flat River, Missouri. Bro. H. O. Smith leaves for his northern mission the latter part of this week, accompanied by his wife, who will visit friends and Saints at their old home, Woodbine, Iowa.

Of interest to all Saints, and particularly to those of the Independence Stake, was the laying of the corner-stone of the proposed church edifice, now being erected by the Saints of the Second Kansas City Branch. President Joseph Smith made the opening address, followed by Brn. George Harrington, W. H. Garrett, and M. H. Bond, of the stake presidency, and Bro. T. W. Chatburn of the missionary force. Prayer was offered by Bro. J. W. Wight. We hope for a speedy completion of the church, and look forward to its dedication.

Rebuilding "Herald" Office—Other Places of Business.

On April 20, 1907, at Lamoni, Iowa, in the temporary offices of First Presidency the First Presidency, General Bishopric, and Board of Publication met in joint council to consider questions which had been referred to them by the General Conference of 1907, relative to establishing other places of business than Lamoni, and the rebuilding of the HERALD Office. President Joseph Smith was elected chairman of the council and the undersigned as secretaries.

The actions of the General Conference relative to the before-mentioned matters were read, and it was decided to accept the instructions of the conference relative to these matters.

The question of rebuilding the Herald Publishing House and Book Bindery was considered and a motion prevailed by unanimous vote that the institution should be rebuilt at Lamoni, Iowa, at the earliest time practicable.

On the matter of establishing other places of business the following was unanimously adopted by the council:

"Resolved by the Quorum of the First Presidency, the Bishop and Counselors, and the Board of Publication of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints in official meeting, as provided by the Articles of Incorporation of said church, that for the purpose of further carrying on the work and business of said church as provided in its constitutional law, that a place of business of said church be established in Independence, Missouri.

"Resolved, further, that the Quorum of the First Presidency and the Presiding Bishopric of the said Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints be authorized to prepare for carrying on the necessary work at such place of business, by securing suitable and necessary offices by the erection of such buildings for this purpose as shall be deemed proper."

It was decided by proper motion that the HERALD Office building should be erected on the site, as near as practicable, of the old building, destroyed by fire January last. On separate motion it was decided that the building should be fifty feet wide, eighty feet long, two stories high, with a good basement under the entire building, to be build of brick or concrete, and as nearly fire-proof as practicable to make it.

It was unanimously decided to make such provisions as are necessary for power, heat, and lighting, by the erection of a power plant separate from, but contiguous to, the main building.

Brother Arthur Allen has been selected to have charge of the construction, and under the direction of the executive committee of the Board of Publication, will have full control thereof.

In the new building besides accommodations for the officers and employees of the publishing house, office rooms will be provided for the First Presidency and Bishopric (to be used when members of those quorums are in Lamoni), the Church Secretary, Church Historian, and the General Library.

Bishop's Agents' Notices.

I again wish to speak to the Saints of the Central Michigan District through the HERALD, as the month of May is fast passing, and we as yet have not received near enough tithes and offerings to make up the required amount for the month of May. And while in conversation with the district secretary, I learned there is something over one thousand members in the district. Now if each one would pay ten cents each per month, it would make $100.00 per month, and this would not excuse any from paying their tithing, that had more to pay, as God has made each one his own steward, and his own judge, for the word says that every one shall be judged according as their works shall be. Again, God speaking through his prophet Malachi, says to pay in to the storehouse of the Lord your tithes and offerings, that there may be meat in mine house. Try me herewith, saith the Lord; I will open the windows of heaven, and pour out a blessing upon you that there will not be room to receive it. Now, dear Saints, will you take God at his word? Will you make the sacrifice? If you will, then you will surely get the blessing, and God's work will prosper.

Now let me say to those that have not paid any tithing:

commence now. Sell a horse, a cow, a pig, a sheep, a chicken, a dozen of eggs, or some butter, and pay it as tithing. Commence now. Get your names on the Bishop's book, then you will have a treasure laid up in heaven where the thief can not steal, nor will rust corrupt. Ever praying for the redemption of Zion, I remain, your coworker in the struggle for right and truth,

E. S. WHITE,

Bishop's Agent Central Michigan District.
706 North Linn Street, BAY CITY, Michigan, Station A.

Pastoral.

To the Saints of South Dakota: Bro. L. G. Wood and the writer have been returned as missionaries to your State and we desire to cooperate with you in seeking to carry out the work the church has assigned us to perform. We can do some good without your assistance, but much more with it. We want to reach as many as possible of those not of our faith. We want to call on as many of the Saints as convenient, and encourage and enlighten them on gospel lines by private talks and public preaching. You have no branches, so it is necessary for us to be your shepherds.

Our financial obligations, though small, are very necessary, and we must depend on your generosity to supply our needs. The Lord has said in Doctrine and Covenants 83: 16: "And he who feeds you, or clothes you, or gives you money, shall in no wise lose his reward: and he that doeth not these things is not my disciple: by this you may know my disciples." As agent for the Bishop, I will receive your tithes and offerings, so will my brother acting for me.

We will need your help constantly in your faith and prayers and financial assistance, and in the autumn some special help will be needed, so lay by in store as God has prospered you, and you will hear from us in due time.

Write to us of your desires and prospects for church work and for information on things spiritual and temporal, and you shall receive a prompt reply.

Write to my home address, and I will receive it in due time.

Your brother in gospel bonds,

EDWARD RANNIE.

3318 Taylor Street, OMAHA, Neb., May 4, 1907.

To the Saints and Friends of the Southern Missouri District, and of the Southeastern Missouri territory; Greeting: Having been placed in charge of the above-named field, I address this communication to you. We want your hearty cooperation. Elders W. A. Brooner and O. E. Ensley will labor together as much as possible. Bro. Brooner is acting as district president. Saints, give him all the encouragement possible, and help to hold up his hands.

Elder James T. Davis and Joseph Ensley will be associates in the southeast territory.

Bro. Plumb and the writer will labor together most of the time. If you know of any places where an opening can be made, write me at my home address 2219 Kellet Street, Springfield, Missouri.

Remember it takes means to travel and buy clothes, and help to sustain all these laborers with your means and prayers. Please make a special effort along this line.

Remember I am acting as the Bishop's agent, and do not forget the tithing law. I will promptly receipt for all moneys received. Send to the above address.

Your colaborer,

A. M. BAKER.

To the Saints in the European Mission; Greeting: In view of the arrangements made by the Presidency for the carrying on of the work in the Mission classified as No 6, which now includes all of Great Britain and Europe and is placed under the supervision of the undersigned, we have thought it advisable that the following arrangements shall be adhered to in order to effectually accomplish the work assigned to us.

In what was heretofore known as the British Isles Mission, the work will be under the immediate supervision of J. W. Rushton; the Scandinavian and German Mission will be under the immediate supervision of Peter Anderson.

All matters requiring the attention of the missionaries in charge will in the first place be referred to the one in active oversight of the sections named.

We have arranged for the missionary work as follows: Elder W. H. Greenwood and Thos. Taylor will labor together, and for the present it is desired that they concentrate in the Sheffield District, giving especial attention to Derby, Nottingham, Sutton-in-Ashfield, and also the city of Sheffield. All matters in that part of the field are to be reported to Elder W. H. Greenwood of the Seventy. Elder William Newton will labor in London and the Southwest of England especially in Exeter and Plymouth. Brn. Thomas Jones and George Morris will labor in the two Welsh Districts, and all matters in that portion of the mission will be reported to Elder Thos. Jones until September 30. Elder G. W. Leggott will spend his time in the Manchester District, laboring according to the direction of the district president for the present.

We desire that the missionaries will prosecute the work of proselyting with care and system in tracting and, whenever practicable, open-air preaching; we do not wish any branch or district matter to be interfered with only by consultation with the mission presidents and the local authorities.

The work on the Continent will be provided for by Elder Anderson and his appointments will be presented through the Sandhedens Banner.

The quarterly report forms will be forwarded to the missionaries and the district presidents as before, with the request that especial attention be given to the prompt filling of them out, and that they be sent in to the address below promptly on the dates named, viz: July 1, October 1, January 1, and March 21.

It will be seen that we have attempted to send the missionaries wherever practicable "two by two," as the law provides, and also that we are making an effort to open the work where there is a good interest.

The Presiding Bishop has placed in the hands of the agent a sum of £50 to assist us in spreading the work in our land and we earnestly ask all the Saints in the Mission to supplement this generous assistance from the church treasury by a prompt payment of tithing and freewill offerings so that our land may have a reasonable opportunity to hear the restored gospel preached in every place where there is an opening.

Bro. Caton, the Bishop's agent, has arranged for collectors to be appointed in each branch with a view of assisting the Saints to pay whatever they feel they can do, the amount not being considered except so far as it is the conscientious proportion as given in the scriptures: "According as the Lord hath prospered you so let him give."

In conclusion, we ask for the help, prayers, and sympathy of all the Saints, and exhort each to be diligent in doing whatever little service lies to hand, so that the many littles of consecrated service to the work of God shall bring to the cause an aggregation which will be encouraging to the church and pleasing to our heavenly Father. The address of the mission will be 36 Bellbrooke Grove, Harehills Lane, Leeds, England.

Praying for the success of the church in every department we are, yours sincerely,
NEW YORK, May 10, 1907.

J. W. RUSHTON.
PETER ANDERSON.

Notice.

To the Saints in Nebraska and Those Parts of the Dakotas South and West of the Missouri River; Greeting:

In the late pastoral of Bro. W. H. Kelley and myself we appointed Bro. D. R. Chambers in charge of the above-named territory, but we subsequently received a communication from Bro. Chambers stating that in consequence of physical infirmities in his family he considered it the part of wisdom to withdraw from missionary appointment for a year and consequently had made arrangements to enter into secular pursuits.

Much to our regret we are under the necessity of releasing Bro. Chambers. We have had consultation, and agreed to appoint Bro. J. R. Sutton in charge of the above-named field. Those concerned will please take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

In behalf of the ministers in charge, HEMAN SMITH.

Jamestown, the Birthplace of Freedom.

A great many relics have been found here; old pot-hooks, beads, pieces of dishes that had apparently been brought from all parts of the world, and fragments and intact bowls of pipes which show that even the style of the church-warden has not much changed in three centuries. The prevalence of gin bottles and pipes bespeaks the fact that in a later century Jamestown became a rendezvous for men in legislative array, seldom visited by the fair sex. I took one of those old pipes—not used perhaps for centuries—and cleaned and filled it, and sat down to have a good smoke, lapsing into reverie as I looked up and down the blue waters of the stately James River, over three miles wide and eighty-five feet deep, with water enough for a man-of-war to anchor in. Off to the right was "Archer's Hope," and the famous old Pitch and Tar Swamp—with distances measured by "poles," instead of yards. Of course I bethought me that it was here that tobacco was first cultivated to any large extent, and here it was that English lasses were brought from the old country and purchased as wives for the splendid sum of one hundred and twenty pounds of tobacco. As we sat and smoked, it seemed as though we could see the old stockade built out into the river about the city, to protect the people against the ravages of the Indians; for, while Jamestown was the first English settlement, the people were unable to withstand the attacks of the Indians. In 1676, during Bacon's Rebellion, Jamestown was destroyed by fire, and twenty years later suffered a similar fate; after which the capital of the colony was removed to Williamsburg, and the state house was first called the Capitol, which is to-day the name for the stately pile at Washington, District of Columbia. The old church is being restored exactly as it was in early days of Old Virginia, and two thousand "slips" from the ivy of the tower have been potted to sell. The restored edifice will be open during the Exposition, and will appear almost exactly as it did in ancient times.

The island is three or four miles in length, and was purchased some ten years ago by Mr. Edward R. Barney, of the firm of Barney & Smith, railroad coach manufacturers, of Dayton, Ohio. Since the demise of her husband, Mrs. Barney, with her daughters, have continued to reside on the island, greatly fascinated by the historic associations of every foot of the soil which she owns. Every day new discoveries are made by the daughters, new theories advanced, and more light is constantly being thrown upon the early days of the colony.

The ruins of the old Amber House still remain, with knotted and moldering trees to remind one of the early days of the colony.—Joe Mitchell Chapple in the National Magazine for May.

Consolidated Rural Schools.

There have been organized in two or three hundred townships, or preferably in districts containing only twenty-five square miles, two or three hundred consolidated rural schools, six to ten isolated rural schools being consolidated into one, and the pupils are carried to and from school at public expense. In some of these schools the attempt to introduce instruction in agriculture and home economics is being successfully made. It is found that while the little rural schools can not afford teachers trained to instruct in agriculture and home economics, the consolidated school can afford to pay a principal and an assistant principal who are trained to teach these subjects and to give inspiration in country life generally to the rural pupils. It has been demonstrated also that the consolidated rural school can afford to build up a simple laboratory, support a small farm, develop a library, and secure other necessary equipment to use in successfully teaching agriculture and home economics. Further, it is found that teachers with specific training for country-life educational work can cooperate with the parents so that much of the home duties of the rural youth may be made far more educational as well as more interesting than heretofore. There is evident ground for the claim that consolidated rural schools and the work of the home life on the farm can be so developed under cooperation between teacher and parent as to provide far better education for our rural youth than can possibly be devised for youth while living in city homes. In the city primary schools also there is being introduced much instruction in manual training.—From "Public industrial education," by Willet M. Hays, in the American Monthly Review of Reviews for May.

Mr. Rockefeller has given $32,000,000 to education, but still the side of the scale containing the widow's mite continues to be lowest.—The Commoner.

Yellowstone Park with its scenery that surpasses the grandest sight of the old world—its clear, placid lakes—its strange boiling geysers and thundering waterfalls—its charming mountain hotels and their perfect service and appointments.

California with its grand old missions and snow-capped Sierras: its giant forests and its gentle zephyrs—its fragrant flower gardens and ceaseless lap of the grand old Pacific on its rocky shores.

The Pacific Northwest with its marvelous industrial development—its busy and beautiful cities—its thriving fruit and grain farms, peopled by a larger percentage of American born citizens than any other section of the country—its picturesque Columbia River with its magnificent cascades and great salmon fisheries.

A trip to one or all of these interesting localities will be an experience long to remember. Let me tell you all about the low rates and give you descriptive printed matter.

HE THAT ENDURETH.

In the sixteenth verse of the sixteenth chapter of Mark one may read the great promise of the gospel to the penitent sinner, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved"; in the twenty-second verse of the tenth chapter of Matthew is found the gospel promise to the baptized believer, "He that endureth to the end shall be saved."

Looked at from the other side of the waters of baptism it may seem to the candidate that the matter is fully stated in the promise first quoted; but viewed from this side, it is gradually borne in upon the Saint of God that the first promise finds its complement in the second.

The individual who accepts the first promise and acts upon it soon finds that he is placed in a position where his endurance is being tested. This test is designed not alone with a view to determine his endurance but rather to strengthen and develop it.

There are none too weak to acquire a degree of fortitude and usefulness if they will but patiently submit to the processes of Christian development; there are none so strong that they can resist the soul-destroying blight that settles upon those who persistently rebel after having enlisted to obey. Following these diverse courses, the strong and mighty perish, while the weak and poor grow and flourish as the palm-tree or as the cedar in Lebanon. Proud but rebellious Saul was a child in the hand of the aged prophet Samuel.

It might seem strange to some that the process of Christian development should include anything calculated to test endurance; why not the "flow'ry beds of ease"? Because neither mental, physical, nor spiritual vigor comes from resting upon flow'ry beds of ease. The muscle that feels the twist and strain of the oar is strengthened; the brain that studies and solves problems becomes active and powerful; the Christian character that is put to the test, that endures, resists, and achieves, becomes great, and is saved at the end of the struggle. Such a character is worth saving; and it is saved, because it has, with God's help, overcome all that would destroy it and has become in a measure like Christ, who said that all power was given into his hand.

"The touch of little hands, the aches, the joys, the gratefulness of little hearts,—how quick to forgive, how ready to kiss and make up!"

Bishop's Office

Lamoni, Iowa

Saints are not promised that they shall escape all the cares or even afflictions of life; the promise is that all these (with all other experiences) shall work together for their good. They are not promised that they shall escape all the burdens of life; the promise is that they shall be given a yoke that is easy. If there is an implement that is typical of labor that implement is the yoke. If the Master did not intend his disciples to labor after they had taken his yoke upon them he made a mistake in his choice of illustrations that was quite foreign to his judgment and to his method of discourse.

His call is to those who are weary and heavy laden and they are promised rest, often best found in congenial activity. The unprofitable burdens of sin and ignorance, of the world, the flesh, and the Devil, are to be cast aside, and in their stead is given a line of work that will bring a glorious reward.

There are many experiences that come to an individual, even in the course of a short life, that test the powers of endurance. These are of such a severe character that in the world thousands who have no hope, other than the world offers, seek relief in suicide. The new recruit to the army of the living little realizes the character of the warfare upon which he enters, almost at birth; soon, though, he finds himself fighting against temptation and sorrow and pain.

Often as an individual advances in years the tendency to become discouraged increases; how then shall one endure to the end? The answer is found in that gospel through which he first received the promise conditioned upon endurance.

James names the gospel law as the Perfect Law of Liberty. This law sets men free. "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

No man could ever be free if he were constantly threatened by evil forces that were stronger than he; and the excellency of the perfect law of liberty is seen in the fact that it makes men sufficiently strong to overcome these forces of evil, and so they are "free indeed." This desired end is accomplished by virtue of that increased spiritual energy bestowed upon those who accept Christ,—who came that we might "have life and have it more abundantly," to whom the promise is that the Spirit also shall help their infirmities, and by virtue of that process of education, the scope of which is indicated by the declaration that the individual shall be guided into all truth. God never attempts to give liberty without knowledge, for such a condition could not be maintained; nor does he propose to bestow zeal, enthusiasm, and riotous energy without bestowing the proper wisdom to guide and control.

Thus is revealed the only way in which one can hope to endure to the end. An otherwise hopeless conflict, though severe and long continued, may become more joyful as it progresses, until at last the Christian shall cheerfully face the last enemy that shall be conquered—death.

ELDER ARTHUR ALLEN.

In the missionary force are found men of many trades and professions. At times they are called upon to serve the church in other ways than as preachers. When the need arose for an experienced builder to take the oversight of the work of erecting the new HERALD publishing plant, such an individual was found in the person of Elder Arthur Allen, of Holden, Missouri.

Bro. Allen was born in London, England, March 25, 1861, and was baptized in London, Canada, December 22, 1881, by Elder John H. Lake.

He began his ministerial work May 18, 1891, when he was ordained to the office of priest. On the evening of his ordination he was elected president of the First Kansas City Branch, he having moved to Kansas City, Missouri, in 1884. He presided over that branch for eight years.

He was ordained an elder in 1891, and was ordained to the office of seventy, April 12, 1900.

Before entering the active ministry he spent twelve years in building and drafting plans for buildings.

He has gone at the work of reconstructing the HERALD Office with vim and energy. The work of excavating is about completed, material is on the grounds, and construction will soon be well under way.

GENERAL CHURCH ITEMS.

In a letter dated April 22, Bro. Gilbert J. Waller, writing from Honolulu, Hawaii, states, "I am pleased to be able to report that the outlook seems encouraging here at present. Yesterday, Sunday morning, I baptized five persons who have been attending our Sunday-school at Waikiki for some time past; more are talking of following their example. Those baptized are Hawaiians."

We are pleased to note this encouraging news from the island territory. It takes time for the sowing; and it takes time for the fruitage; we must sow with a liberal hand, and leave the growing and the harvest-times in the hand of God. We shall reap in due time if we faint not.

CURRENT EVENTS, SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS.

The public has taken considerable interest in the marriage of William Corey, the millionaire, president of the United States Steel Corporation, and Mabelle Gilman, former actress. Corey was divorced from his first wife some time ago. The marriage was solemnized May 14, the contracting parties having waited until after the witching hour of midnight in order to avoid being married on the unlucky date of the thirteenth—all of which indicates that superstition may be remembered when morality is forgotten, and that some men fear a hoo-doo more than they fear public opinion or the laws of God. The ceremony was read by the Reverend John Lewis Clark, pastor of the Bushwick Avenue Congregational Church, Brooklyn. The pastor pronounced the match one of those made in heaven and received a fee of one thousand dollars. Later the church trustees requested his resignation; he repented, changed his mind as to the exact origin of the match, divorced himself from the fee, and was forgiven.

"Abe" Ruef, former political boss of San Francisco, and general "grafter," broke down in court, May 15, and pleaded guilty to the charge of extortion. He then qualified the confession by declaring that really he was not guilty but desired to end the trial because of the agonized condition of his family. A death-bed confession, duly hedged and modified, ought never to mitigate the just penalty of transgression.

At a banquet recently given by the Cook County (Illinois) Liquor Dealers' Association, attended by two hundred saloon-keepers, Ernst Knude, president of the association, expressed this sentiment: "It is a detriment to saloon-keepers to have drunkards around." The saloon-keeper is one of the few manufacturers who are ashamed of their own finished product, yet he is thoroughly in line with all other business men when he finds the drunkard a detriment to his business.

Breaking rails have caused the majority of the railroad accidents of late. It is now discovered that the rails at present put out by manufacturers are of inferior quality. Material is used that some years ago would have been rejected. Manufacturers state that the demand for rails is so enormous that they can not take greater care and begin to supply the market. Thus the fact that so "many run to and fro" in these last days creates a condition that in itself increases the perils of the day. The Scientific American for May 18 declares, "Present conditions are intolerable. Rails have become so unreliable as to constitute a continual menace to the safety of passengers."

Judge Septimus J. Hanna, an ardent advocate of Christian Science, was advertised to lecture in the Plymouth Congregational Church, of Brooklyn, the pulpit of which was formerly occupied by Henry Ward Beecher and Lyman Abbott. Permission was granted by the trustees, but the pastor, Dwight Hillis, a noted and able minister, declared that his pulpit should not be so used. A lively discussion was precipitated, which was ended by the Christian Scientists withdrawing in the interests of peace; however, in a recently issued leaflet, they put this query to the public, "When creed meets creed, and one fears and avoids the other, which is truth and which is error?"

Professor Poiriere, of France, one of the world's most noted cancer specialists, recently died of cancer. It is the irony of fate that the disease should mark the noted specialist for its own, and should win after several years of struggle.

The opening poem in Autumn Leaves for May, entitled, "A Meditation," should have been credited to Earnest Webbe.

FAITH AND WORKS.

ELDER JAMES PYCOCK.

Reader, did you ever realize the great necessity of having "faith in God" (Mark 11:22) and in Jesus Christ, whom he sent to save the world? Paul says: "But without faith it is impossible to please him."—Hebrews 11:6.

What is faith? "Faith is the substance [assurance] of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen."—Hebrews 11:1. Hence if man has faith he will possess the assurance of things hoped for; so if he hopes for eternal life he will have the assurance of it.

Faith which does not prompt man to obey God's commandments will not give this assurance. To demonstrate faith man must do the works of God. "Faith without works is dead."—James 2:20. Jesus said: "He that believeth on me, as the scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water."—John 7:38. Such is the faith God requires of man; it is in harmony with the scriptures; it is proved by doing the works of God. Our Father does not want man to have a faith without works; such the devils have. (See James 2:19.) Man can not hope to benefit by this kind of belief, hence the great necessity of getting in possession of the faith God requires. Proper faith in God comes by hearing (see Romans 10:17) those sent of God according to the ancient pattern, who speak the words of God (see John 3:34). The acceptance of God's message through his approved servants will engender a belief in the divinity of Christ, and this belief in turn to be followed by faith in the divinity of Christ's great message. It is not enough to believe that Jesus Christ lived and died to save humanity, but there should be faith in all his words. (See John 12:47, 48.) The Jews who believed on him were admonished to continue to become "disciples indeed." (John 8:31.) They were to continue until they had obeyed all his commandments.

True faith is always demonstrated by works of righteousness. It prompts man to obey all God's commandments. The rich young man displayed his lack of faith by refusing to follow Jesus (see Mark 10:21), and many of Christ's disciples proved themselves void of the faith God required, by ceasing to continue with him (see John 6:66). They were not willing to obey all his commands, and hence were unworthy of eternal life.

Are you willing to prove your faith in Jesus Christ by obeying all his commandments? He asks you to repent of your sins (see Matthew 4:17; Mark 1:15; Luke 24:47); to be baptized by immersion in water for the remission of those sins (see Mark 1:4-11; 16:16; John 3:5; 3:23; Romans 6:4). He also requires you to have the hands of his servants laid upon you to receive the baptism of the Holy Spirit. (See Matthew 3:11; Acts 2:38; 8:17; 19:6.) These are the commandments of him who said, "If ye love me, keep my commandments."—John 14:15.

The faith God desires in man is manifested by man keeping all of Christ's precepts; and only such faith brings an assurance of eternal life. Noah's faith was proved by his building the ark; Abraham's by offering up Isaac; Job's by doing God's will in the face of opposition; Paul's by going to Damascus and there obeying God. So is any man's faith shown by his works. (See James 2:14-26.)

"If any man will do his will [keep the commandments], he shall know [have the assurance] of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself."—John 7:17.

This is having the assurance of the thing hoped for, which is eternal life. JAMES PYCOCK.

CRITICISM OF THE REVEREND MR. HAUPT VERSUS "JOSEPH SMITH DEFENDED."

Sometime during the month of September of last year I received a letter from Bro. A. L. Lightfoot, of Independence, Missouri, inclosing a manuscript tract by the Reverend William H. Haupt, rector of the Episcopal Trinity church of that place, being criticisms on my book Joseph Smith Defended. Bro. Lightfoot had given Mr. Haupt the book to read and requested him to note his objections on the margin. Finding the marginal space insufficient, he finally decided to write his objections in a tract with preface and introduction. This Bro. Lightfoot sent to me, and I immediately wrote Mr. Haupt and inquired if it was his intention to publish it, and if not would he consent to my doing so. Following is his reply:

St. Luke's Hospital, KANSAS CITY, Mo., Sept. 19, 1906.
Mr. J. W. PETERSON, Argyle, Iowa.

Dear Sir: In reply to your card I will say that the criticisms on "Joseph Smith Defended" was written while I was very ill. I had accidentally burst a blood vessel in the knee, which aggravated a tubercular affection. I have since been operated on and am now nearly well.

I have no objection to the publication to the answer in your church papers and would be pleased to have a marked copy, and the privilege of further answer if it seems necessary. The review was not undertaken with a view to publication and I am not certain now what I shall do with it. Much depends on the manner in which this is treated by yourself, Mr. Lightfoot, and some other Latter Day Saints for whom I have had copies prepared. In its present shape, without a copy of your book in hand, it is not perfectly clear to the ordinary reader.

As the criticism was written at the request of Mr. Lightfoot for his personal perusal, you must pardon what seems a hard judgment of yourself. I do not believe a Christian has any business to stir up anger, but should endeavor to make all men love each other. But sin must be rebuked wherever it is found. The earnest Christian when convicted of error, must be pained as by the caustic that burns the poison out of a wound, but he must use the healing oils of prayer and the sacraments, after he has submitted to the probing, the cutting, and the cleansing.

So, friend, take lovingly the rebukes, and hereafter handle the word of God more carefully and in all things be perfectly honest with God and man. Then though all men and even you may misjudge yourself, in the end shall you have praise of God. (See 1 Corinthians 4:1-5.)

That there may be no hard feeling created between us by a public discussion, let me ask of you to be sure of your grounds before you state them that you may not be held up to ridicule. For example: the Nago Head Fable, the Church of England and Henry the Eighth, etc. In the latter

I would produce documentary evidence of the sixth century down, including the first sentence of the Magna Charta, "The Church of England shall be free"; showing the existence of the Church of England nearly a thousand years before Henry the Eighth. So please let us have no foolishness, but loving, truthful, well-digested discussion.

Faithfully,
WM. H. HAUPT.

At various times, as I could find time, I made reply, and the latter part of the year I sent my reply to Bro. Lightfoot requesting him to secure another copy of Mr. Haupt's tract and have both it and my reply published; but when comparing my quotations with Mr. Haupt's manuscript, discovered he had revised and changed it. He handed the matter to one of the editors of the HERALD and he wrote me to the same effect. Both manuscripts were finally placed in my hands, and I find such a difference in Mr. Haupt's two manuscripts that I find it necessary to rewrite and rearrange the whole matter. I have concluded to publish his last manuscript and make my chief reply to it, noticing some things in the former one.

We could well afford, were it not for lack of time, to wait for his next revision and thus have more material with which to set him against himself, and in that way show his unreliability as a religious teacher. However, his disposition to differ from a former position may assist him to finally arrive at the truth. Such a disposition is more commendable than that of one who, in the wrong, still maintains his position for fear of being called changeable. Fear of men with many is greater than fear of God. Following is Mr. Haupt's latest. Mine will follow.
J. W. PETERSON.

"JOSEPH SMITH DEFENDED"

BY

ELDER J. W. PETERSON

Lamoni, Iowa

Answered by

THE REV. WM. HAUPT

Rector of Trinity Church

Independence, Missouri

1906

INTRODUCTION.

It is not the intention of the present writer to say anything about the moral character of Joseph Smith, nor his followers.

The system of religion established by him demands our examination. This must result in the honor or dishonor of the founder and leaders, and cause joy or sadness to the followers. We hope no anger will be aroused as we shall endeavor to "speak the truth in love."

No notorious reprobate could be used by the Devil in establishing a religious system intended to draw away the children of God from the truth. "For Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light. Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness."—2 Corinthians 11:14, 15. Jesus also said: "There shall arise false christs, and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders; insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect."—Matthew 24:24.

We are told, (1 John 4:1): "Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God: because many false prophets are gone out into the world."

"By their fruits ye shall know them." "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance."—Galatians 5:22, 23.

"The works of the flesh are manifest, which are these: Adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revelings, and such like."—Galatians 5:19-21.

The sins of the fathers are often only seen in the effects upon the children of the third and fourth generations, so the false prophet is often only detected by the lives and teachings of his followers.

THE CONTROVERSY.

In these pages we shall pass over the controversies of the three or more sects of Mormonism, only noting this fact, stated by Mr. Peterson on page 68: "Shortly after the death of Joseph Smith, Brigham Young and Co. so changed the order of the church that many, including the family of Joseph Smith, refused to follow him as a leader. . . .

"Out of a membership of perhaps 200,000, only about 10,000 accepted the changed faith under Mr. Young. Many of the remainder left in a scattered condition throughout the world, met in conference eight years after the death of Joseph Smith and effected a reorganization."

It would appear from the above and the claims of the Utah Mormons, that Brigham Young and Co. included the officials duly elected and qualified, according to the laws of the "Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints." It might be claimed that if Joseph Smith was given the Melchisedic and Aaronic Priesthood, and apostolic and prophetic authority claimed for him, that this flight of "Brighamites" was the fulfillment of Revelation 12:6-14. This interpretation is hard on the Christian world and the other branches of Latter Day Saintism.

It might be interesting to know if the "Reorganization," the "Hedrickites," etc., had any officials, ordained by Joseph Smith, to the apostolic office, the Melchisedic and Aaronic Priesthood etc., or whether it was necessary for the angel of Revelation 14:6 to "restore" the second time, "the everlasting gospel" etc. Also if ten thousand only, went with Young, how many met in the conference to reorganize. How many were with Hedrick, and what became of the rest of the two hundred thousand.

In this paragraph, we see none of the "fruits of the Spirit," but find fifteen of the seventeen "works of the flesh," manifest in the second generation of Latter Day Saintism.

TEN OBJECTIONS ANSWERED, AND "REANSWERED."

Elder Peterson, in his book, answers ten objections which he says are made to present day revelation. By whom such objections are made, is not stated. The present writer would not make them, and it is certain the catholic church has not. But, as the answers are made to prove that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God and the church of Latter Day Saints a divine institution, we shall review these answers, and thereby learn if this, or the opposite, be true.*

Objection 1. Is it not contrary to reason, to expect prophets or revelations to-day?

Mr. Peterson argues that as God is "the same, to-day, yesterday, and forever," it would be natural to expect he would deal with this generation, as with that in which our Lord lived in Jerusalem. These arguments certainly apply to the so-called "Dark Ages," the Reformation period, etc., as well as to the nineteenth century. We hold that God has had prophets, in the Bible sense of the word in all ages, and has never left himself without witnesses in the world.

The Latter Day Saints claim that the revelation to a prophet, before it becomes binding on the conscience of anyone, must pass the scrutiny of all the "quorums" of the church. The Roman church gives this authority to the Pope, the rest of the catholic church says that only an Ecumenical Council of the church may declare anything to be of the Faith, and binding upon the consciences of any. St. Paul (1 Timothy 3:15) declares "the church is the pillar and ground (stay) of the truth." False prophets in all ages have renounced the authority of the church and in every case the "works of the flesh," notably, "divisions" and fornication, (polygamy) have been manifest. The "all authority" of Christ was committed to the apostles and their successors to be exercised "always (all the time, continuously) even unto the end of the world" and therefore Joseph Smith and all who believe they have revelations should submit them to the scrutiny of the apostles, before they be read in the public congregation.

Objection 2. "It is out of harmony with the Bible to expect Prophets now."

The arguments presented are again as much in favor of a continuance of this gift in the church, as that God would renew the same, and to clinch this point, the "Elder" uses the very passage we would wish, i. e., Ephesians 4:8, 11-13. It seems strange that the "till" of this passage, is overlooked by the Mormons, Irvingites, Byramites, Dowieites, etc. Not only had Christ given apostles, prophets, etc., to the church in the beginning, but that always "continuously"—without a break—they should do "the work of the ministry" to "the edifying of the body of Christ," "till" "we all come in the unity of the faith and unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ and the consummation of all things." This being true, before we read the Latter Day Revelations, it were better to read the writings of the immediate successors of the apostles of our Lord, i. e., The Apostolic, the Antenicene, Postnicene Fathers, and Doctors of the church whose works excell the writings of Joseph Smith and the Book of Mormon, as the brightness of the sun excels that of the moon.

Objection 3. "We have the word of God and therefore do not need prophets now."

Elder Peterson argues that prophets are needed to preserve unity and that the lack has caused all the divisions of Christendom. While we agree that prophets in the sense of Spirit-inspired preachers are necessary to the proper understanding of God's word, we contend that "God has set *"Catholic" is used throughout this article in its ancient historic meaning and not in the Roman or Protestant sense. By "Catholic Church" we mean to embrace all of the historic churches of the Greek, the Romans, and Anglican communions.

some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets," etc. (1 Corinthians 12:28) and that wherever this order has been reversed, not only have the followers of the prophet left the fellowship of the apostles, but have lost the unity of the faith and their "heresy" has been manifest to all, by their breaking up into sects. Examples; Anabaptists, Calvinists, Lutheran, Methodist, Mormons, Dowieites, etc.

To the apostles was the "all authority" given and the unity of the disciples was manifest as long as they "continued steadfastly in the apostle's doctrines and fellowship."

The "Spirit of truth" was given "that he may abide with you (the apostles) forever" (John 14:16). The apostles imparted the gift of the Holy Spirit by the laying on of hands (see Hebrews 6:1-3; Acts 8:14; Acts 19:1-7), with prayer. Upon fit persons they also laid hands conferring some of the authority given them when Christ said "all power is given unto me in heaven and in earth," "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you," "Go ye therefore teach all nations; Preach the gospel to every creature," teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and, lo, I am with you alway [in every age and clime], even unto the end of the world." How was this possible if the apostolic order and authority ceased for 1260, or even 8 years? Must we contradict these and other plain scriptures in order to make Revelation 14:6, 7, etc., mean more than they plainly declare? Rather "let God be true and every man a liar;" yea, "though we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you, than that which we have preached, let him be accursed."—Galatians 1:8.

Objection 4. "The Bible contains all that God ever intended to give for man's instruction."

Before taking up Elder Peterson's answer, let us note the following truths:

"The faith once [for all time] delivered to the Saints" was a perfect faith, was full and complete. The Bible is the text-book given by inspiration to the church. Not one book is written to a heathen nation or man, but, as we see in Luke 1:1-4, to persons having had thorough instructions or catechizing as the Greek says. Neither is any "prophecy of the scripture of any private interpretation" (2 Peter 1:20.) For in them "are some things hard to be understood, which the unlearned and unstable wrest as they do also, the other scriptures unto their own destruction." (2 Peter 3:16).

Therefore Christ instructed (for three years) and ordained them (his apostles), who in turn taught their followers "to do all things which he commanded them" (Matthew 28:20), and ordained their successors in the various offices, and in this way are still fulfilling the commission "to every creature" and "nation," by the inspiration of the Spirit of Truth who abides with the church, the body of Christ, "the fullness of him that filleth all in all." (Ephesians 1:23.) The Head continues with "his body the church," "unto the end of the world," "so that the word we preach is his, who has made us ministers of the reconciliation"—(2 Corinthians 5:18-20), filling the outward visible signs of the Sacraments, we administer with the inward spiritual grace he has promised, making them effacious in the saving of precious souls for whom he died. On page 110 Elder Peterson makes several citations of Holy Scripture from which he draws the following unwarranted conclusion:

1. "In the twenty-ninth chapter of Isaiah is mention of a book which was to come out of the ground in the last days."

2. "In the thirty-seventh chapter of Ezekiel is mention of the stick of Ephraim as well as the stick of Judah: (the Bible).

3. "In the last of Daniel is mention of a book to be revealed at the time of the end."

Take your Bible and examine for yourself Isaiah 29:1. "Woe to Ariel, to Ariel, the city where David dwelt! Add ye year to year; let them kill the sacrifices. (2) Yet I will distress Ariel, and there shall be heaviness and sorrow, and it shall be unto me as Ariel. (3) And I will camp against thee round about, and will lay siege against thee with a mount, and will raise forts against thee. (4) And thou shalt be brought down, and thou shalt speak out of the ground, and thy speech shall be low out of the dust, and thy voice shall be as one that hath a familiar spirit, out of the ground, and thy speech shall whisper out of the dust."

It is evident to any one having only a slight knowledge of grammar that "thou" who speaks out of the ground, etc., is Ariel, the city where David dwelt, that is Jerusalem, and has no reference to "a book." But speaking of the enemies of Ariel, the prophet in the fifth verse says: "The multitude shall be small dust, and the multitude of the terrible ones as chaff that passeth away" at an instant, suddenly and in verses 6:7 and 8, he likens them to a dream or nightmare, that disappears when one awakens. "So shall the multitude of all the nations be, that fight against Mount Zion," showing that Ariel is Mount Zion, the city of David, or Jerusalem. The ninth verse begins a new paragraph and indicates a new subject. In this paragraph is deplored the blindness of the people. "For the Lord hath poured out upon you the spirit of deep sleep, and hath closed your eyes, the prophets and your rulers, [the heads, Revised Version] the seers hath he covered, and the vision of all, [that is, "All vision" says the Revised Version] is become to you as [like unto,—here begins a parable] a book that is sealed, which men deliver to one that is learned, saying, Read this, I pray thee, and he saith, I can not, for it is sealed, and the book is delivered to him that is not learned saying, Read this, I pray thee, and he saith, I am not learned."

Note, nothing is said in this parable of a book coming out of the ground.

This thirteenth verse tells why God will do a marvelous work among this people already mentioned, and in the fourteenth verse, tells what this marvelous work is, namely. "The wisdom of their wise men shall perish and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid."

The seventeenth verse foretells returning prosperity to the Holy Land and in the eighteenth verse says "And in that day, shall the deaf hear the words of the book, and the eyes of the blind shall see out of obscurity." In the recapitulation on page 183 Elder Peterson says:

Isaiah 29, first to last:

"A marvelous work was to come forth."

"An unlearned man would begin it."

"Lebanon was to flourish again."

"It was to be only a little while before Lebanon's blessing."

In chapter seven, he tries to prove that the unlearned man was Joseph Smith, and the book which he says was to come forth out of the ground, was the "Book of Mormon," which Smith claimed to "bring forth out of the ground" in New York State. But note: First, no book is said to come out of the ground. 2. The book of the parable in verses 9, 10, and 11, is said to be delivered to both the learned and the unlearned. 3. The unlearned began nothing more nor less than the learned man, namely: to excuse himself from reading the book. 4. The ground mentioned in this chapter, instead of being a hill in New York State is "Ariel, the city where David dwelt," "Mount Zion, the city of David," that is Jerusalem in Asia.

The teaching in the eleventh verse, is that the Jews would become so careless and indifferent, that the Bible and all visions and revelations would be like unto a sealed book, whose contents would be unknown and when urged to study it, the learned would excuse himself and likewise the unlearned, and both would continue in their ignorance. But, "if any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine" by the aid of the Holy Spirit whom the Father giveth to them that ask him.

Ezekiel, thirty-seventh chapter, plainly has no reference to the Bible from the Jews and a revelation from America.

The chapter foretells the reunion of the ten tribes (Ephraim) and Judah.

Daniel 12. The "Elder" says there is mention of a book to be revealed at the "time of the end."

Two books are mentioned in this chapter;

1. The "Book of Life," in which are recorded the names of "the people that shall be delivered" from the graves. (Verses 1 to 3.)

2. The book of the prophecy of Daniel which he is told to seal until "the time of the end." Certainly no reference to such a book as the Book of Mormon, here.

Objection 5. "God pronounces a curse upon any one who will add anything after the last chapter of revelations."

We agree with the Elder that Revelations 22:18 refers only to the book of Revelation, and that John, himself, wrote his epistles and his gospel after this was written. Man may "add unto" or "take away from the words of the book of this prophecy." First by inserting or omitting words, second by attaching a false meaning to them, as is done by the Elder and his collaborators in the case of Revelation 12:6 and Revelation 14:6, 7, etc. If the curse of God falls upon one thus dealing with the words of this book, will it not also in like offence with other portions of God's words, therefore man should be careful not to thus endanger his own salvation and that of others by wrongly "dividing the word of truth."

Objection 6.—"The Bible says the gifts of the Spirit were to be done away and a more excellent way was to be established."

This objection is supposed to be based on 1 Corinthians 12:31. Remember, we are not defending these so-called objections, but we object to the method of interpretation of God's word used by the Elder in destroying these men of straw. In many cases the Elder gives the Catholic interpretation, and we coincide with him. The twelfth chapter of 1 Corinthians shows how the one God worketh in the one "body of Christ which is his church," by the one Spirit. This body, though composed of many members, is one in Christ. Each member of the body has its office, and as the eye has the gift of seeing and the nose of smelling, and not one member all the gifts, and thereby independent of the other members; so in the body of Christ, the member is given the gift by the Holy Spirit according to the position in which God has set him in the church. Therefore all are not apostles, all are not prophets, neither are all workers of miracles nor have all the gifts of tongues, these several gifts being conferred only on those who have need of them. But certain gifts are essential to every member of the human body, these essential gifts are the sevenfold gifts enumerated in Isaiah 11:2, "Wisdom, understanding, counsel, strength, true godliness and holy fear," and the fruits of Galatians 5:22 the chief thing, without which, all other gifts are of no value, is love. This is the lesson of chapter 13. So also our Lord taught. (See John 14:15.) The disciple of Christ is to be known by it (see John 13:25). St. John says in 1 John 3:19, "Hereby we know we are of the truth and shall assure our hearts before him." It is not recorded that all the apostles were workers of miracles, and we learn from Christ, Matthew 24:24, that not all workers of miracles, etc., are prophets and apostles of Christ.

Objection 7. "We have advanced in science, literature, and art, why not in the gospel of Christ?"

Elder Peterson answers: "Because one is perfect and emanating from a perfect Being, was always perfect, the other is more or less imperfectly discovered by man. To outgrow, the 'perfect law of the Lord,' the 'everlasting gospel' (Revelation 14:6) is to outgrow perfection and become imperfect."

Which side is he on here? Science is systematized knowledge of any subject. Example, geology: The rocks are the same to-day as in the days of Moses, but man's knowledge of them and their formation has increased, each generation building upon the achievements of its predecessors.

So in literature and art. Truth is eternal but God's revelation of the truth has been gradual. Christ even said to his apostles, "I have many things to say unto you but ye can not bear them now." But when the Spirit of Truth was come, he led them into all truth, so that finally there was full revelation of "the faith once for all delivered to the saints." But each individual must, because of his own imperfections, have an imperfect knowledge of that faith, and gradually grow in grace and knowledge so that, while the Church has the perfect faith and unchangeable, the individual must revise his statement of it as the scientist has had to revise his theories to conform to his increased knowledge. The faith delivered to the apostles was perfect and we do not presume to understand it better than they did. Christ made a perfect atonement for the sin of the whole world, and the Holy Spirit descended upon the Church to abide in it forever. But the Holy Spirit operates upon each individual, applying the benefits of Calvary's cross, and bestowing the gifts necessary to the work or office of that individual, and inspiring him with the truths of that one faith as he grows in grace and knowledge. Thus the "everlasting gospel" is revealed to all who see to know God.

The Revelation is perfect; only man is imperfect and needs the aid of the Holy Spirit to understand it. He should not expect a direct revelation of the faith instantaneously given, but should learn from the revelations of the past by the aid of the ever present Spirit of Truth.

Objection 8.—"The scriptures were able to make Timothy wise unto salvation, why not us?"

It is not only true that Timothy knew nothing of the New Testament, but also that none of the twelve or their successors, for nearly four hundred years, possessed a full copy of the same, or had, perhaps read all of the books.

The Holy Catholic Church is not only responsible for settling the canon of the New Testament, but for the preservation of the same unto this day. The Anglo-Catholic communion recommends the study of the "Deutero canonical" books of the Old Testament (apocrypha) and the writings of the Fathers of the Church but she declares only the canonical book to be the Word of God, and that these "Holy Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation, so that whatever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man, that it should be believed—as an article of faith or be thought requisite and necessary to salvation." The Catholic Church is not pledged to reject a present day revelation that will stand the test of the church's scrutiny. All through the ages, sects have arisen, claiming later revelations, whereby they set aside the Scriptures and denounced the Catholic Church. In every case they split upon the rock of polygamy, or free love, with the exception of the Irvingites, and the Dowicites still in doubt.

Objection 9.—If ever made is disposed of by three short sentences by the Elder and we pass it by.

Objection 10.—Is based upon 1 Corinthians 13: 3-10.

Much of the controversy might be avoided if the words prophet and prophecy were understood. Confusion is created by giving the same meaning to the words in every place. See prophet in Cruden's Concordance: "The verb propheta, to prophesy, is of great extent. Sometimes it signifies to foretell, what is to come; at other times to be inspired to speak, from God. It is said (Exodus 7:1) "Aaron, thy brother, shall be thy prophet," that is, shall explain and interpret thy sentiments and commands to Pharaoh and the people. The apostle Paul (Titus 1:12) quoting a profane poet, calls him a prophet, because pagans thought their poets inspired by the gods. As prophets at the time they were transported by the motions of God's spirit, were sometimes agitated in a violent manner; these motions were called prophesyings, which persons exhibited who were filled with good or evil spirit example. Saul, 1 Samuel 18:10. To prophesy is also put for to make or sing psalms or songs of praise to God. (See 1 Samuel 10: 5, 6; 1 Chronicles 25:1.) This term is also used by St. Paul for explaining scripture or speaking to the church in public. (See 1 Corinthians 14: 1, 3, 4.)

While it is understood that "the prophet like unto" Moses, was Christ, and that John the Baptist was the "Elias which was to come," yet it is a common opinion that another great prophet shall arise among the Jews, who shall have characteristics of both Moses and Elijah, and shall lead the children of Israel from the north country, etc., and settle them again in the Holy Land, after which they shall be led to accept Christ and Joel 2: 28 will again be fulfilled. The "north country" is Russia where five-eighths of all the Jews live under conditions worse than Egypt. The Isles of the Sea are the British Isles, and the west country is the United States, these being second and third in order of Jewish population.

ONE WHO OVERCAME.

A SYNOPSIS OF THE FUNERAL SERMON OF SR. CAROLYN B. JARVIS, AT BURLINGTON, IOWA, MAY 8, 1907, BY ELDER ELBERT A. SMITH.

He that is our God is the God of salvation; and unto God the Lord belong the issues from death.—Psalm 68: 20.

He knoweth the way that I take: when he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold.—Job 23: 10.

I trust that those who are here to-day will not be too exacting or critical, because the task that I have before me is a difficult one. Sr. Carolyn was a close personal friend. She was one of the little flock over which I watched as pastor for a number of years. They were as one family and our sympathy and affection went out to them all, perhaps more especially to those who were in distress; and surely the hand of affliction rested heavily at times upon our sister. A harder heart than mine would have bled for her on many occasions.

Her mother was superintendent of the Sunday-school at this place when I came here four years ago. Soon she was taken away by the hand of death, and her loss was sorely felt; but the daughter, in this very room, pledged herself to take her mother's place so far as possible. The school elected her superintendent, and in various other ways she became an active worker. Thus in church work we were required to labor together, and we did so without ever the least hint of friction. Then when her health began to fail and dark clouds settled over her she often came to me for advice or comfort; and as her spiritual adviser I helped her as best I could. And so, though the task may seem hard, God having ordered it so, I would not have it otherwise than that I should preach at this time, because I have gained an insight into the character, the point of view, and the ambitions of this sister that another might not have.

In the sixty-eighth Psalm I read the following text: "He that is our God is the God of salvation; and unto God the Lord belong the issues from death."

Our very presence here on this occasion is an evidence of a certain enlightenment and a certain belief in the immortality of the soul. Among all the lower creatures the dead are cast out and forgotten. But we meet to commit to earth all that is earthly and to God the spirit that he gave. That is an evidence of a certain faith and an evidence also that we have not entirely forgotten the place that was ours when we were created just a little lower than the angels and were crowned with glory and light.

Life is uncertain. Change and decay are ever in evidence. During the past four years three members of this family, representing three generations, have been called to enter "the low green doorway." We are told in this text that our God is a God of salvation. We are told that the issues of death rest with him. I pity the man who comes into the presence of death without a belief in that statement. Lord Kelvin, the English scientist, has said that at the beginning of life God has reserved a place for his own appearing. That means that science can not explain the ever recurring miracle of birth. It is equally true that God has reserved a place for his own appearing at death. We see a constant procession of people coming into the light, but we can not penetrate the gloom from which they have emerged; we see them climb the hill and then pass down into the valley, but we can not penetrate the darkness into which they go.

"Will the dead live again?" That is the question that breaking hearts send up at each new graveside. It can never be answered, worlds without end, unless God shall answer it. And to-day we have his answer in the statement that he is a God of salvation and that the issues from death are in his hands.

Oh, if there are those here who doubt that statement, I would to God that they would fling aside their vain philosophies and go to the author and source of all light and receive the answer that shall satisfy them.

I find another text that, considered in connection with the life of this our sister, seems almost as though it came direct to us from the mouth of the divine Being for our comfort on this occasion. In Job 23:10 we read, "But he knoweth the way that I take: when he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold."

It is not usual in a funeral discourse that our elders dwell long upon the life or character of the departed, but I shall break that rule to-day because there is a lesson to be learned thereby.

Friends lament this death as untimely and regard the life just ended as all too brief; but we are told that life is not measured by moments but by heart throbs. What is it to live? To live is to think, to feel, to prepare for the inevitable change that should lead to a higher plane of existence. Our sister led an active life: she studied, she thought, she felt, she prepared herself for the higher life. Let us save our pity for one who has existed fifty, sixty, seventy, or a hundred years and has wasted the time of his probation.

It was within the past four or five years that Sr. Carolyn became thoroughly aroused to the need of serving God and became actively enlisted under the banner of Christ; and I know that since that date she has crucified all the ambitions and worldly ideals that she had previously cherished; and she made remarkable progress in the development of those Christian graces that we are told insure us an abundant entrance into the kingdom of God. That is what we all desire—an abundant, unquestioned entrance.

In times of despondency she may have regarded her life as a failure; but I regard it as a victory. And I will recount one incident in her life that will be instructive to all who may hear. She related it at one of our midweek prayer-meetings.

It was while she was severely afflicted that, one night, being unable to sleep, she arose and came into this room where her body now reposes, and engaged in very earnest prayer. While so doing the Spirit rested upon her in a way that she had never experienced. It showed her faults to her, and afterward she confessed them and asked forgiveness of some to whom she thought she had caused offense. The Spirit in a single hour can show one his faults and inspire him to reform in a way that can not be done by a preacher in a multitude of sermons. But the vital point of the experience was this: at that time she lifted her hands to God and made this covenant, "Take me, Lord, and use me. Whether I live or die I place myself in thy hands without reservation."

For ages man has been engaged in warfare and his constant effort has been to invent means by which he could strike his enemy at a distance. The sling shot, the bow, the rifled cannon are designed to increase man's power by enabling him to strike at a distance. But all the time man's worst enemy has been near at hand. He is so close that he can not be met with carnal weapons. Many have taken cities; but only a few have risen to the greatness of ruling their own spirits.

Christ, however, won the victory of all time, when in the garden, alone, and at night, he conquered himself and was able to say, "Not my will but thine be done."

It is no small thing that this girl won a similar victory,—alone, in sickness, and at night. She committed herself to God, with whom are the issues from death. Her sufferings are past and they are of minor importance when we consider that God knew the path that she took and that when he had tried her she came forth as gold. Nothing, we are persuaded, stands between her soul and God. True, she had her faults, as we all have; but she learned what they were and she was trying to overcome them.

God will never turn his back on the man or woman who knows his or her faults and is trying to overcome them.

Any life, however brief, is a victory if it rises to the height where the individual comes to recognize the Lord as the supreme ruler in all affairs, both great and small. That was where our fathers failed in the beginning, and only by learning that lesson of complete obedience can man ever get back to his lost estate.

Naturally one might inquire how it is possible to overcome all the difficulties that beset the pathway of life. The answer is found in 1 John 5:5: "Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?" Here we find enunciated the fundamental fact upon which the Christian church rests and upon which rests the success of every member thereof. Take away the fact that Christ was the Son of God and we destroy the church. Take away the fact that God is in the heavens and that Christ came to earth as his ambassador and son and there are no facts left worthy of our consideration. Better in such an event that we die speedily and escape from scenes and activities having no general design and no ultimate hope.

Belief in Christ as well as love for Christ must include obedience to him, for he has said, "He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me: and he that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him."

Turning back to the question of overcoming, in the verse immediately preceding the one quoted a moment ago, we read, "For whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world."

He that believes in Christ and keeps his commandments overcomes this world and is born into the kingdom of God. Directly in line with this thought of being born of God we cite you to the words of Christ as addressed to Nicodemus, "Except a man be born again, he can not see the kingdom of God." Yes, he put it even more plainly than that, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he can not enter the kingdom of God."

Acting upon this statement our sister followed Christ himself into the waters of baptism and thereby laid hold upon two precious promises: first, the promise that Christ would be with her; second, the promise of the resurrection.

Nothing can prevail against those who have Christ with them. If God be for us, who can be against us? The Hebrew children in the fiery furnace, Daniel in the lion's den, the disciples in the storm-tossed boat on the Sea of Galilee, all were witnesses of his power to overcome all opposition.

Whether the wrath of the storm-tossed sea,
Or demons, or men, or whatever it be,
No waters can swallow the ship where lies
The Master of ocean and earth and skies.

The second promise to which we have referred is found in the sixth chapter of the Roman letter: "Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection."

This is a wonderful promise, and, taken in connection with the promises recorded in the book of Revelation and elsewhere outlining the resurrection, the millennial reign, and the coming of the new earth, it inspires one with an appreciative realization of what it will mean to have been a faithful follower of the one who overcame all things.

That which makes it all possible is faith—a consistent faith that weds profession with practice. One of the ancient prophets (Alma, in the Book of Mormon) has compared the word of God, or faith in the word of God, to a seed. Christ did the same. The illustration is splendid. A seed is the concentration of vitality and power. The secret of life reposes therein. Inconceivable energy is wrapped therein.

Let me use an illustration that is founded on fact. At least I have good evidence that it is so founded.

A certain German countess in Hanover, Germany, was an ardent skeptic. She cherished an especial antipathy toward the doctrine of the resurrection. When she died she left minute directions for burial. An immense granite slab covered her grave. Granite slabs were placed on each side and at the head and at the foot. All were clamped together with heavy iron clamps. On the monument these words were engraved in German, "This for ever bought grave may never be opened."

Thus she hoped to continue preaching her doctrine of doubt even after she was dead. But a little seed had fallen upon the grave and it grew up through the crevices between the slabs and became a tree. It burst the iron clamps and shouldered the granite rocks away. A little seed was stronger than infidelity.

Those who cherish faith in God have laid hold upon a mighty power and it will open their graves and give them part in the resurrection of the just. Our God is a God of salvation and with him are the issues from death.

HAS A BOY MORE LICENSE THAN A GIRL?

It does not concern you to know what I think in this matter, or me what you think. The question is not, "Does the world give a boy more license than a girl, or does it contenance the sowing of wild oats by young men?" It is "Has he, according to the moral law of God, a right to desecrate himself without being disgraced, and be forgiven on the plea of wild oats and reap a reward equal to his sisters who have kept the straight and narrow path of virtue and purity in all things?"

When God placed Adam and Eve in the garden of Eden, he did not say, Eve, this is the tree of the knowledge of good and evil; of this you must not eat, but Adam can eat of it if he gets hungry or can not find anything else mean to do, because you see he is a man with a stronger nature than thine and he must be fed and satisfied. So let the boy sow his wild oats, Eve, and if you are a good girl, you may some day be worthy to become his wife, after he has had his fling, grown tired of himself and the world, grown cross and morbid and sour because there is nothing more that is new and bad for him to do. After he has dissipated to his heart's content, then you may make a home for him and darn his socks and keep him looking half way respectable, whether he wants to or not. But, Eve, remember, don't eat any of this fruit.

Did he say this? No.

"And the Lord took the man, and put him in the garden of Eden to dress it and keep it. And the Lord commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die. And the Lord God said, It is not good that the man shall be alone: I will make him an help meet for him." So you see Eve was not there to receive the command, for she was not yet created; but I suppose Adam must have told her, for she told the serpent all she knew about it. Christ himself recognized this evil and rebuked the scribes and Pharisees when they brought before him a woman taken in sin: "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her," and the old libertines were convicted by their own consciences and went out one by one, and the woman stood before him alone and he said, "Neither do I condemn thee; go, and sin no more." He did not say, Take her, and punish her, stone her, she is a bad woman. Of course you men and all have sown your wild oats, but this woman has no right to make that plea, because—well, she is a woman and she ought to have behaved herself.

No, Christ challenged the man to speak who had not sinned, and condemned not the woman whom they sought to kill, after they had destroyed her virtue. Young man, what have you to be proud of to have sown your wild oats, and what does it profit you to use the license given by the world which was never set with the seal of God and will never witness the divine autograph? As you sow, so shall you reap.

Remember that ahead of you somewhere in the unveiled future—it may be near, it may be far—there stands a woman pure and good, with outstretched arms to welcome you to a love as near divine as mortal will ever know. She stands to offer herself a living sacrifice at the altar of your love and hers. She stands, keeping herself for thee and thee alone; to comfort through sickness and through trials as long as life shall last.

What have you to offer her? God grant that you may be as pure and chaste as she, that you will not have to offer her a smoldering fire of wine-quenched youth, or ask her to embark upon the tide of life already running toward the sea of death. Remember there are yet your children's arms to twine about your neck, and little lives to wrap so closely around your heart that if it be pure, as it should be, will fill you with a sweet, true love which only those who have tasted know. As you stand, young man, full of the life and talent that Nature and Nature's God have bestowed upon you, as you stand upon the threshold of your lives to work out your own destiny and look forward to the unborn nation of which you must be the fathers, as you would wish this nation to be great and good, as you would wish your sweethearts to be good and true, as you would wish your wives to be true and pure, as you would wish your sons and daughters to be pure and free, be all this thyself, and leave to them a legacy which the wealth of gold can never buy, nor the storms of life destroy, a legacy of physical, moral, and mental strength inherited from their fathers. Remember that in the great day when you shall stand before the judgment-bar of God to be judged according to the deeds done here in the body, no question of sex will arise, and as the recording angel opens the great book at the mottled page of your life's history there will be no one to say, "The sins of thy youth are forgiven thee, they were but wild oats." WILL R. BOZARTH.

THE MYSTERY OF GODLINESS.

For God speaketh once, yea twice, yet man perceiveth it not. In a dream, in a vision of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men, in slumberings upon the bed; then he openeth the ears of men, and sealeth their instruction, that he may withdraw man from his purpose, and hide pride from men.—Job 33: 14-17.

Life in its most familiar, every-day commonness is fraught with deepest mystery.

Dame Mystery drapes her veil 'twixt our inquiring vision and the practical mainspring of life and all the forces that surround us. Our wise men and sages penetrate the mysteries of nature to a limited extent, and wrest wonderful gems from the treasure-vaults of science, but there always comes a halt and some firm decree seems to say: Thus far and no farther.

As we face the heavy fold of that drapery which screens us from a broad and thorough knowledge of things as they are on our shores of time, and as they are to be on the shores of eternity we then begin to realize how very little we know. It is then, and not until then that our feet touch the threshold of the door of progress. When we flatter ourselves on our own self-sufficiency, it is but beating about in a circle, "each to-morrow" finding us no "farther than to-day." The secrets of God, of the earth and the power by which it was made, the secrets of the means which sustain the universe, the purposes of God in all the creation, all these (what a happy thought!) may be revealed to man in God's own time and way, if we but pursue the correct course, the royal highway of life.

Other paths wend their uneven ways through marshes of superstition, and breaks of ignorance, to the barren hills of disappointment.

True, the royal path, the way of holiness, the way of godliness, has its weary stretches and rugged, toilsome incline; no promise has ever been made that all this journey shall be fragrant with roses.

"Must I be borne to Paradise,
On flowery beds of ease,
While others fought to win the prize,
And sailed through bloody seas?"

But ah, the earnest of the promised possession! With what sweetness the soul feasts, as the Holy Spirit at times lifts the curtain to give a glimpse of beautiful, broad, unexplored fields, stretching afar and away, where truth embraces truth, intelligence devours mystery, shadows flee away, waves of love and peace sweep throughout, and the name of all is "Limitless." These joys we naturally aspire to obtain. The one course which eventually leads there begins with a belief in a supreme Architect, an all-wise Creator, infinite in virtue, wisdom, and power—faith in God, and in his Son, Jesus Christ, who has been revealed to the world under the claim that his mission was to give the thread end which will unravel the very mysteries that have ever puzzled the brains of men, the mystery of how to obtain endless life—eternal life. And like the easy, clear, natural, and practical fact that two and two are four, and that a knowledge of the simple multiplication table qualifies one for the solving of deeper problems in arithmetic, even so the plain application of the simple rules of life which the Son of God gave to the world will lead man along and qualify him for the mastery of vital problems which can be solved in no other way and before which the wisdom of the world stands baffled. So the first simple rule is faith in God, in Christ, and in his rule of life—the gospel; second, a penitent spirit for past wrong-doing; third, the performance of a simple rite which some reject because they can not understand the reason why it should be required. When the rite of baptism is rejected it is positive proof of a lack of faith in God and in his wisdom to know what is best for man.

The same is true of the rejection of any other rule, command, or admonition of God. It proves a lack of faith, and without faith it is impossible to please him, hence impossible to make progress in divine life. All things work on the principle of cause to effect, even in the spiritual realm, and as the effect of a shaft of lightning driven through a dense fog is to jar and condense that vapor to drops of rain, and the effect of a sweeping wind is to cause the boughs of the trees to nod and beckon, even so the effect of a humble, contrite spirit is that the chords of that soul will be attuned to the melodies of divine grace.

Humility is the underlying principle upon which all the development of godliness in man must rest. The lack of it to man is what lack of sails would be to a sailing vessel: there being nothing for the moving force to operate upon, the craft is adrift, not because there is no power in the air to carry her to port, but because she does not use the force at hand.

What could tend more toward the breaking of a haughty spirit (which is enmity to God) and the development of pure humility, than to be led down into the water of baptism to make a covenant to serve God? Here, then, is one good reason for so doing—development of humility.

Work with God and in unison with his forces and those natural powers will carry us to the goal of ultimate salvation. Work against God and with the forces which have long been arrayed against him, and we batter out our life against crags of vain allurements, and will share in the wretched defeat which awaits Satan and his helpers.

The swimmer battling in the stream for his life displays poor tactics to wear his strength away in an effort to force himself against the strong current to the shore; but by changing his course and working with the current he wins the shore in safety.

The great current of life tends to help us on to salvation, provided we are wise enough to equip ourselves to utilize all the forces for good which are sweeping ever onward.

Christ's simple rule of life having been followed to the baptism of water, the next step is to have his authorized servants exercise another rite which has been commanded and is not without its share of mystery, the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost.

The purpose of this is that God may open the understanding to things pertaining to godliness, give power to think more correctly on these things, to comprehend more fully the things of a spiritual nature, to know concerning the work of God, and to know that we do know. The operation of the Spirit thus far, however, even though it come in such a degree as to give tongues and prophecy, can no more equip one with the strong and sturdy character desired to be eventually gained, than the mere donning of the armor could make an experienced soldier of a tender youth. The first surge of life-sap through the sprout from the acorn will not produce a sturdy oak, but the process steadily repeated will.

Question, now, direct to you, if you are of the number who have gone thus far on the road marked out by Christ: Since receiving that first exhilarating spiritual life surge, has anything checked the flow? Fortunate indeed the Saint (if there be one) who can answer.

The extremely delicate structure of the avenue which carries that holy influence to the soul seems to make obstructions all too frequent. We clear them on one line, and a clog is on another. Pride, lack of humility, impatience, selfishness, envy, strife, faultfinding, evil-speaking, are in evidence; and then, as if our own faults were not enough, we let the faults of others act as a hindrance, and say, If it were not for the wrong-doing of Bro. A or Sr. B, I could do very differently. All these take their turn as effectual obstructions to the very flow of inspiration which must finally flow untrammelled in order to make of us all that we should be.

Following our introduction to the fundamental principles of the plan which is to lift men from ignorance and superstition to knowledge, power, and salvation, we become aware that the strongest forces with which we have to do are spiritual. We need now to study the operation of these two forces, the good and the evil, as carefully as a mariner studies his compass. We see that the latter is deceptive in all its operations and will counterfeit the former at every opportunity. Its purpose is to darken the mind and contaminate the life with evil, that the Holy Spirit can not enter nor dwell there. Its whisperings are full of flattery and tend to make the individual self-sufficient, arrogant, and full of conceit; this influence will enter in uninvited and remain until dislodged by the practice of virtue, holiness, and prayer. Sham and pretense to do good are worse than emptiness, and furnish a rich soil for the thrift of the obnoxious weed of evil which saps the life of the soul. Genuine thoroughness in open and in secret, in darkness and in daylight, is the only coin whose ring will be clear enough to pass the final counting counters.

The evil spirit makes the mind sullen and subtle with hate or inflamed with excitement. On the other hand the contrast of the good spirit is that it comes by invitation in prayer, when the temple is sufficiently cleansed to receive it. It is conducive to humility; is long-suffering, kind, and easy to be entreated, causing the individual to love even his enemies and seek to do them good; is calm, gentle, and considerate.

Then come the special gifts of the Spirit: Prophecy, tongues, interpretation, discerning of spirits, dreams, visions, etc., which are all wrapped in mystery at first, but which may be proved to the careful student of them to be just as legitimate workings of cause to effect as sunshine and moisture effecting a growth in vegetation.

Revelation and prophecy are a quickening of the intelligence and a making manifest, which is the result of a certain condition of the mind and body, and is as natural under those conditions as for thirsty ground to drink water. And until those conditions obtain, God himself, in all his power, could not reveal his mysteries to that unprepared mind; for in so doing he would violate his own perfect and inflexible laws.

The matter of spiritual dreams and visions is another important means which God has used to convey intelligence, and is worthy of our careful consideration. Elihu says: "For God speaketh once, yea twice, yet man perceiveth it not. In a dream, in a vision of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men, in slumberings upon the bed; then he openeth the ears of men, and sealeth their instruction."

This in connection with other scripture which shows that some of the most important revelations to man in all the history of the past have been given through the means of dreams, makes this a matter of no small importance to us.

Just why the Spirit should indicate a matter by mystic symbols and hidden omens, instead of showing it plainly, may be another mystery for a time, but such is the case; and so an image represented kingdoms, and fat and lean kine represented years of plenty and of famine. The key to this mystery is found in the fact that God never captures a man and fills him with instructions independent of the efforts of the man. He sends him a dream, the purpose of which is to stimulate thought.

By thinking over that, praying over it, or taking it to some spiritual-minded person for interpretation, the effort put forth to know makes the person more worthy; and thus, by man coöperating with God, truth is evolved in the mind by the simple means of a dream. Proof of the correctness of this principle is found in Doctrine and Covenants 9:3, where the Lord tells Oliver Cowdery in connection with the principle of revelation: "Behold, you have not understood; you have supposed that I would give it unto you, when you took no thought, save it was to ask me; but, behold, I say unto you, that you must study it out in your mind; then you must ask me if it be right, and if it be right, I will cause that your bosom shall burn within you," etc.

Elihu's statement that God would show a man once, yea twice, and yet man perceive it not, proves that man's slothfulness and failure to exercise his mind in studying it out may rob him of the knowledge which God would give him, but can not, because of his own carelessness and unworthiness. It is as necessary for conditions of the mind and body to be right before the Holy Spirit can operate upon the mind, as it is for the frosts of winter to give way before the blossoms burst. It is a fixed, practical, and reasonable proposition either way, and the sooner men learn this solid fact and go at the obtaining of the knowledge necessary to obtain salvation in as practical and business-like manner as they do their daily business, the better it will be for them.

There is an element connected with the daily pursuits of ordinary life, when the mind is filled with business cares, incidental to the perpetuity of our existence, which is not conducive to a high degree of spiritual exaltation. Hence the necessity of meeting together in quiet worship and reflection;

also the need of a hallowed building for a "school of the prophets," quiet and apart from the bustle of the world, where the Spirit may be met by appointment in holy communion. This is a dire necessity to-day. When all the faculties are at rest from the cares of the day, when the mind is quiet and at ease, the conditions are better for the operation of the Spirit. Hence dreams and visions of the night, and "then he opens the ears of men and sealeth their instruction."

The very fact that our spirits are fettered in these mortal, sin-inclined bodies, is an effectual bar to full communion with God. This is the curse of banishment which the race is under since Adam. Hence, at a certain stage of righteous development, it is but natural that men have been translated to a state of immortality. When our change shall have come, which is brought about by the course of nature, our communion with God will be untrammelled by the unfavorable condition of the flesh and the blood.

The Spirit will then flow through the veins, and by the power of Christ through the gospel, man will be brought back into the presence of God in a better condition than could have been possible were it not for the fall, and the experience gained during the separation from God. While we wait for our change, it is our business to practice virtue and holiness, to put in a stroke against the evil power and its effects, at every opportunity. And it is our privilege to mollify the severity of our estrangement from God by washings and fastings for sufficient lengths of time that the exuberance of mortality may give place to spirit communion; which will feed and fortify and make strong for the victory.

WHAT SHALL WE SACRIFICE?

What shall we sacrifice for the good of the church, both for the missionary work and the publishing department? is a question that sometimes enters our minds.

To sacrifice is to give up something we desire to have for ourselves. To sacrifice our lawful desires would not be a proper sacrifice. To sacrifice the education of our children for our own or some one else's gain would be wrong.

In order to accomplish God's work there is no need to sacrifice our rightful desires. There are a great many unnecessary desires that we can sacrifice. There is a great deal of money spent for expensive and showy clothing, larger homes and furnishings than we need, many things that are ornamental and not useful.

We are often extravagant and wasteful at our tables, we serve too many sumptuous dinners that are expensive and unhealthful, and especially so for the missionary; many are in broken health now because of the habit of feeding like savages instead of like civilized beings.

A waste of two dollars per member is a grand total of one hundred thousand dollars for the entire church.

If we want to do any sacrificing, it will be well for us to commence on those useless things, and there will be no need to ask members to sacrifice any good desires that if carried out will be of benefit to them.

THE BIBLE OF THE FUTURE.

ITHACA, New York, May 11.—The Bible of the future will again contain all of the sacred books that have been eliminated from it by a critical process in the ancient synagogues and the early Christian church," said Professor Nathaniel Schmidt, of the department of Semitic Languages and Oriental History of Cornell University, in an interview with the World correspondent to-day. Professor Schmidt was formerly a clergyman, but for many years has been at the head of the department he now presides over at Cornell and is regarded as one of the most profound scholars and thinkers in Ithaca. He had made long and searching studies of the Scriptures, has traveled for years in Palestine and Asia Minor, and has a reputation for his knowledge of Hebrew and Biblical literature as well as the literature of all the other religions of the world.

"These books," declared Professor Schmidt, "were at one time in the Bible. Some of them are now in the Catholic Bible, but they have been removed from the latter-day Protestant Bible. They are mostly inaccessible to the general public, but were wisely read in the synagogues and the early church. I mean, for example, such books as the Book of Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sarach, the Wisdom of Solomon, Judith, Tobit, the Books of the Maccabees, as well as the Psalter of Solomon, the Apocalypses of Enoch, Baruch, and Ezra. These books will be restored to their place in the canonical Scriptures."

Professor Schmidt then gave his reasons for this view. "The reasons that led to their rejection," declared Professor Schmidt, "do not exist to-day. In the early days whatever was objectionable to the doctrines of one church was discarded by it and thrown aside." He pointed out that the Protestant church discarded the Apocalypses because it objected to some of the doctrines they taught, for instance, salvation through good works. The Catholic Church likewise, and so did the rabbis of the Hebrew church.

"At the present time, however," declared Professor Schmidt, "we are glad to have every scrap of writing that throws light on the religious life of the Hebrew and early Christian church.

"The Bible of the future, moreover, will have to be constantly translated. This will be necessitated by the continued study of the text, by fresh discoveries of texts, and by the continued examination of critics. It will also become necessary to accompany each translation by introductions and notes to explain the age, composition, and character of each work and the obscure references in those works. Without such notes the ordinary reader can not get the knowledge of the books."—New York World.

METHODIST PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD.

Considerable discussion and some misunderstanding have been caused by the plea for prayers for the dead which appears in Doctor Levi Gilbert's recent book on The Hereafter and Heaven. In our issue for April 20 we noticed a rather caustic criticism of it by the Central Christian Advocate (Methodist, Kansas City), which hinted that Doctor Gilbert would like to see Methodism "have closer kinship to Rome, to paganism, to 'eternal hope.'" An examination of Doctor Gilbert's own words, however, shows that his idea is a very moderate one. His suggestion of prayers for the dead apparently goes no further than to recommend that we pray for their "progress in the heavenly life." "Is there any bar," he asks, "put upon the promptings of our hearts to breathe out loving, trustful supplication for them as of old?" To quote from his book:

"We are as far as possible from committing ourselves to the Roman Catholic practice of paying priests for masses for the purpose of the souls of the dead. Around that practice a vast amount of superstition has gathered, and not a little ecclesiastical avarice and extortion. Protestants are accustomed to do their own praying. They do not hire ministers to present by proxy their holiest aspirations to the Almighty. If they shall speak to the Lord concerning their dead it will be the utterance of their own hearts and not a formal and ritual-mass by another only remotely concerned.

"Is it claimed that definite supplication for the dead is ruled out by the theology which teaches that it is utterly useless and unavailing since it could effect nothing—since the dead are in a fixed condition of joy and have all consummation of blessings? We may well pause to question it. Is it not reasonable to believe that in heaven itself there are gradations of happiness, possible growth into larger and fuller bliss, ever-advancing progress toward the perfection which is in God? Is it rational to suppose that our dead are to maintain a flat, stationary condition of dead-level in that land of vast opportunity? Was not Tennyson right in describing the life of the future as

"Eternal process moving on,
From state to state the spirit walks?"

And, if so, can we suppress our fondest wish that our departed ones may advance by sure steps through the circuits of their orbits, unto 'a higher height, a deeper deep'? Yea, does there not lie, latent and unexpressed, a real prayer at the heart of all love? And, as we love the holy dead, must not our love breathe out a petition for their constant and increasing advancement in the happiness and holiness of heaven?"

Other Methodist organs take a position of less violent opposition than that shown by the writer in the Central Christian Advocate. The Northwestern Christian Advocate (Chicago) remarks that Doctor Gilbert "has but stated the positions of the devoutly critical temper on subjects concerning which there must always be a margin of doubt and uncertainty." The California Christian Advocate (San Francisco) takes a cautious view. Thus:

"The history of the church shows that unfortunately human nature has up to this time been too weak to bear such spiritual realism. Soon as prayer for the dead becomes legalized, then offering and sacrifice quickly follow, and the faith of the church degenerates into superstition. We regret that the limitations of human nature are such that the face of God and the whole future world must be heavily veiled. As a working force in the Christian church we can not recommend prayers for the dead."

Catholic papers have noticed the question very widely and have seen in the speculations of their Methodist brethren an indication of a return to the older standards of faith. The Monitor (Newark, New Jersey) remarks that "Catholic doctrines and practices that a few years ago were greeted as blasphemous or unscriptural are now regarded with favor which scarcely seeks to conceal itself." The writer ranks the present Methodist controversy with what he declares are signs that Protestantism is looking with more favor upon the practice of articular confession and the honor attributed to the Blessed Virgin. The Catholic Standard and Times (Philadelphia) remarks:

"The new question is, 'Shall Methodists pray for the dead?' The obvious answer is that they shall if they will. But if they do they may cease to be good Methodists, but may in time become good Catholics."

The Pittsburg Observer adds:

"If our Methodist brethren study the question with unprejudiced minds and a sincere desire to accept truth, however unpalatable it may be to them at first, they, too, will recognize the sweet and consoling reasonableness of the practice."—Literary Digest, May 11, 1907.

MATCHES.

Chicago Chronicle: What used to be called "Lucifer matches" have become obsolete. They had a coating of sulphur which caused the unpleasant odor conventionally attributed to the Devil and his abode and hence their name, for the fashionable title of the Devil is Lucifer.

As a matter of fact, however, the matches called Lucifer matches or devil matches, had far less of the Devil in them than the more modern sort, which were free from sulphur and bad smells, but were far more explosive, treacherous, and dangerous.

Many things go by contraries in this world, and as the harmless matches were called devil matches it was natural that the dangerous sort should be called parlor matches.

These reflections have been suggested by the report from Sterling, Illinois, that a most estimable woman living there, no longer ago than last Friday lost her life by stepping on a parlor match. The blazing head of the match flew into her clothing and set it on fire so that in spite of everything that could be done she was fatally burned. Yet there was nothing singular about it, for so many women have lost their lives in the same way that it may be called a common occurrence.

The evils of parlor matches are not confined to fatal accidents. They have often put out people's eyes and burned down their houses and in various other ways established their title to the name not of parlor matches but of devil matches.—Selected.

INCREASING INTEMPERANCE.

An interesting article in a recent issue of the American Grocer furnishes food for thought in the contemplation of national intemperance. It appears that the consumption of alcoholic beverages in the United States reached high-water mark last year, amounting to over 1,800,000,000 gallons, or about twenty-two gallons for each person, including babies. The consumption of beer alone was nearly 1,700,000,000 gallons, or twenty gallons per capita. "As all of the population are not users of beer," says the Grocer, "it is probable that those who consume malt liquor each use every year from 75 to 100 gallons." The cost to the American people of liquors used last year was in excess of $1,667,000,000. The Grocer comments upon this startling fact as follows:

"The country was amazed when the Fifty-eighth Congress appropriated nearly one billion dollars for the various branches of the United States Government, while the people do not wince at spending nearly one and one-half billion dollars every year for alcoholic beverages.

"That sum is one-fifth the total value of all the farm products of the nation, estimated by Secretary of Agriculture Wilson at $7,000,000,000.

"The nation's liquor bill is $1,450,000,000; its corn crop of 3,000,000,000 bushels is valued at $1,167,000,000.

"The liquor bill is double the value of the wheat crop; more than twice the value of the yield of cotton, or more than the combined value of all the wheat and cotton grown in the United States.

"The liquor bill is two and one-half times greater than the value of the hay crop."

It will be seen that the Grocer confines itself to the purely financial side of this great question. Nothing is said of the indirect cost to the people which the drink habit entails—the crime, poverty, litigation expense, and misery which are the outgrowth of it. When it is considered that, after all, these are the principal evils resulting from the use of intoxicants and that the money expended might well be spared if legitimately spent, it will be seen to what huge proportions the national evil has grown. It may be that a realization of these facts has something to do with the increase of temperance sentiment the country over. That increase is certainly to be accounted for on rational grounds.—Des Moines Capital, May 15, 1907.

THE APOSTOLIC FAITH MOVEMENT.

SANTA ROSA, April 25.—Ministers of churches in this pretty, tree-shaded city are counting the members of their respective flocks as carefully as a housewife counts her silver spoons. Meanwhile the gowns of the straying sisterhood are brushing pew dust from the Pentecost Mission on Fifth Street, and the ears of the brethren, who have likewise wandered from the fold, are being filled with a babel of voices speaking all languages, according to converts, never heard upon land or sea. The new religious cult called the "Apostolic Faith" packs the shabby little chapel nightly to its creaking doors.

"The gift of tongues—give us the gift of tongues!" is the cry of converts. They declare that to "receive the baptism of the Holy Ghost is to be cured of any disease, and also to be inspired with a speaking knowledge of several foreign languages in which to spread the new gospel of all nations."

To an accompaniment of moans and prayerful protestations which often enliven the "inquiry room," the devotions are prolonged until early morning hours, for the worshipers are loth to go homeward until the last sinner has been saved. One of the men has related this experience:

"After some four hours had passed I began to speak in other tongues. The dear Lord had taken my jaws and vocal organs and moved them in his own peculiar manner, as was witnessed by those present."

Asked how the speeches were interpreted, there being no Chinese, Esquimaux, Persian, or other linguistic scholars present, a convert replied that the power to interpret was bestowed along with the power to speak "the tongues."

The women declare that miracles of healing are being performed in Santa Rosa by the ordained leaders. Nothing, from a cancer to a broken leg, is impossible of cure. If the afflicted person can not come to the divine healer, he or she will bless a handkerchief and forward it, to be "laid on" in lieu of the laying-on of hands. Among the healers is Henry Prentiss, a student of the Scriptures, and a ready speaker, and Mrs. Florence Crawford.

Children are being baptized with the Holy Ghost. The leaders deny any affiliation with the sect of "Holy Rollers." They say:

"We teach against Theosophy, Christian Science, Magnetic Healing, spiritualism, hypnotism, and all works of the Devil."—San Francisco Examiner.

EDITED BY FRANCES.

The Angel's Gift.

An angel stood by a cradle side

Where lay a child in the flush of sleeping,
And softly the watchful angel sighed,

"What gift shall I give to this young life's keeping?"

"The gift of gold? It will drag him down,
Perchance to the world and its lower level.
The gift of pleasure? A soulless clown
Is he who knows but the feast and revel.

"The gift of fame? It is passing bright,
As over the pathway in youth it flashes,
But the fame dies out ere the hush of night,
And leaves but a handful of whitening ashes.

"Ah, child!" and the angel smiling, spoke,
"That thou mayest taste of the joy of living
One single blessing I dare invoke:

God grant thou shalt cherish the gift of giving!"

Dear Sisters: The other morning while clearing out the nooks and corners I came upon a bundle of old letters and feeling unusually depressed and discouraged one letter from a very dear friend appealed to me very strongly and seemed almost like a message from the other world, as the frail, sweet Lilly was transplanted to the better world soon after writing this.

It was such a strength and comfort to me I thought it might help others; and I am satisfied I will not be committing a breach of faith, for I know she would consent if she thought any one would be benefited thereby.

The letter was written by Sr. Lilly Eden, dated Mount Eden, Australia, April 12, 1889:

"Dear Addie: I received your letter last Saturday and then meant to answer it immediately so to be sure not to miss the returning mail, but each day since something has hindered. Yet I am hopeful of getting this mailed in time. When one misses a mail it seems so long till the next.

"By referring to yours I find it was written on January 3, so as time may work many changes I trust since you wrote things have taken on a brighter hue. I can fully sympathize with you in all your trials, having experienced many such gloomy times myself when all has seemed dark and uncertain so I have not known how to act—ah! yes, when I had not the comfort and hope of the gospel to sustain me. Such trouble I have had since, having been very similarly situated to yourself. But though sorrow and pain have been keenly felt, the sharpness has been naught in comparison, and my experience now would advise, when such times come, to stand still and wait till our kind and merciful Father disperses the clouds and gives us light that we may step forth unhesitatingly and fearlessly and take up the duty made plain to us. So long as we are in doubt let the present duty be faithfully discharged and we will find that all things work together for good to them that love God.

"Do not fear that the God who has watched over you until now and granted you blessings and testimonies so that you are assured of his loving care for you, will desert you in the hour of need. He can and will direct in temporal as well as spiritual things. Sometimes the way seems hard, and we know not why we are thus tried; but be sure there is a refining, a purifying influence at work. There is so much of dross of the baser metal in these natures of ours that must be removed ere the finer, purer sort can shine out with the clearness that it should.

"Dear Addie, I do not mean to preach to you. I know you have those near you who could help you better than I; but I have felt led to give these thoughts as experiences of my own."

Here the letter verges into a more private channel. How little she knew that those words would prove such a help and comfort after so many years, and would instill a new hope and a greater desire to be more patient, and do my duty as near as I know it, and trust the Lord to work the changes in this own good time.

Lift the Latch.

"I was visiting," said Arnot, "among my people in the wynds and closes of Edinburgh. I stood away back and looked up at the high houses to see whether Betty Gordon, an aged saint of God, was at home. I knew that she was at home by this sign: that her little flowerpots were out upon the window sill, that the blind was up. I knew Betty was in, for when she went away she carefully took in the flowerpots and pulled down the blinds.

"I knew that she was poor and needy, but she trusted God; and I was so glad that somebody had given me some money that morning to give to the poor. I put aside Betty's rent for a month in my pocket and went into the close, climbed up the winding stairs to Betty's door. At first I knocked softly, but there was no answer. Then I pulled the bell, but there was no answer. Then I knocked louder, but there was no answer. At last I said, 'Betty forgot to pull down the blind, and she has gone out, leaving her flowerpots there. What a pity! Then I went down the stairs.

"The next morning I went back and knocked at the door. After a little waiting Betty came and opened it.

"'Oh,' she said, 'is it you, Mr. Arnot? I am so glad to see you! Come in!' There were tears in her eyes, and a look of care.

"I said, 'Betty, woman, what are you crying for?'

"'Oh,' she said, 'Mr. Arnot, I am so afraid of the landlord. He came yesterday and I had not the rent, and I dinna open the door, and now I am afraid of his coming; for he is a hard man.'

"'Betty, what time did he come yesterday?'

"'He came between eleven and twelve o'clock,' she said. 'It was twenty-five minutes to twelve.'

"'Well,' I said, 'it was na the landlord; it was I, and I brought to you, Betty, this money to pay your rent.'

"She looked at me, and said, 'Oh, was it you? Did you bring me that money to pay my rent, and I kept the door shut against you, and I would not let you in? And I heard your ringing, and I said "That is the landlord; I wish he would go away." And it was my ain meenister. It was my ain Lord who had sent ye as His messenger, and I would na let ye in.'"

That is just like some sinners. When Jesus is knocking at their hearts they treat him as if he were a hard landlord, and will not let him in. Oh, let me beseech of you, receive the Savior.—Current Anecdotes.

Letter Department

REHOBATH, Massachusetts.

Dear Herald: This is the first letter I have written for over three months, being under the doctor's care for nearly that length of time. I had a fall on the ice and broke and sprained my wrist. The doctor called it a very bad break and sprain. It is improving slowly, but I can not use it to any advantage yet. I am an isolated one, but my faith is firm and strong in the Lord, and my trust is in him daily. I ask the prayers of the Prayer Union in my behalf that I may be healed of my afflictions.

Your sister in the one faith,

ARDELIA M. CLARK.

WHEELING, West Virginia, May 13, 1907.

Editors Herald: While renewing my subscription for HERALD and Autumn Leaves, I will jot a few lines from this part of God's heritage. Our meetings of late have been above the ordinary. We have been blessed with a good degree of God's Spirit, and admonished through prophecy to adhere to duties devolving upon us as members and officers. The Saints, many of whom have undergone severe trials, are faithful and joyful in the conflict.

Willard Thomas, the nine-year-old son of Sr. Lydia Thomas, is sorely afflicted with abscess on his limbs and back. His condition is pitiful. Although having been in this condition for nine months, his mother is still hopeful for his recovery. We would humbly solicit your prayers in his behalf, that, if consistent to the divine will of God, health might be restored to his frail being.

Six precious souls were inducted into the fold here recently. My only brother and his wife were among the number. I will be expressing it mildly when I say that I am thrice happy.

Elders Paul Hanson and D. A. Anderson labored here with success during January of this year. One has been baptized as a result of their efforts. Others have been benefited.

Our worthy branch president, O. J. Tary, and the writer have labored at McClainsville, Ohio, recently. Some are to be baptized on our return. The gospel is slowly but surely finding its way to the honest in heart.

Elder James Craig of Glen Easton occupied at our chapel last night. We are pleased, and welcome gladly the return of J. A. Becker of Germany to the district again. We often think of past associations with him.

The flood which visited our city last March crept up into our church about five feet, and damaged our seats badly. It will take about forty dollars to repair them. We have no complaint to make. It might have been worse.

Your brother in gospel bonds,

LOUIS A. SERIG.

CANTON, Ohio, May 15, 1907.

Dear Herald: I thought I would let you know that I am still laboring to build up Christ's kingdom here in Canton. I troubled the water again last Sunday, baptizing two noble souls from Alliance, Ohio. They came twenty miles to hear me preach two Sundays, and were baptized. I think they will be a good help to the work. We are having Sabbath-school and preaching every Sunday. I am laboring as well as I can under the circumstances. Love and best wishes to one and all of the Saints.

Your brother in gospel bonds,

ISAAC TRUE.

MAPLE CITY, Michigan (?) May 8, 1907.

Dear Herald: It is with pleasure that I renew my subscription for the HERALD. I do not like to do without it. It is soul-reviving to read the letters and sermons. I have belonged to the church ten or eleven years, and I would not give it for all the world. I belonged to the Methodist Church twenty-seven years, and read the Bible through once, and half through again, and then knew but little about it. I could not understand it; but I thank the Lord that I ever heard this beautiful gospel and obeyed it. We have had a number of elders here to preach. My family were all baptized by Elder Francis Smith, that were baptized. He did a great deal of good here. He was the first elder who preached here. Bro. W. D. Ellis was here almost three weeks this winter, and did lots of good. Some are investigating, and I think some will be baptized before long.

MRS. MARTHA NEPHEW.

WAMSLEY, Ohio, May 9, 1907.

Editors Herald: I take pleasure in writing a few lines; for if I can talk or write, or do anything that may be of benefit, I will gladly do so. I can not feel satisfied to sit down with folded hands, knowing this is an individual work. The words of the Savior come to me: "Ye are the light of the world." Our life, our works, our example should reflect light, and the example we set before the world should be worthy of imitation.

Jesus said if we would not forsake even father and mother we could not be his disciples. Then let us all renew our covenant with the Lord and forsake all worldly pleasure; for if we are not led by the Spirit of God we are not in possession of the Spirit; and if we have not the Spirit of Christ we are none of his (see Romans 8:9).

We are also told in Romans 8:14 that as many as are led by the Spirit of God are the sons of God. May God help us to lay aside the sin that doth so easily beset us, and let us show to the world that we are what we profess to be. If we are the light of the world our daily walk should correspond with our profession. If we keep the commandments God will help us. We should shun the very appearance of evil. We must deny ourselves worldly pleasures, for Jesus said he has chosen us out of the world, for we are not of the world.

We find in Luke that he who putteth his hands to the plow and looks back is not fit for the kingdom of heaven. So may we endure to the end, and obtain the reward!

Satan sets forth cunning devices to draw people after him. Even when in heaven he set forth a theory that drew the third part of the hosts of heaven after him, so we must watch as well as pray. Satan will say to the young, There is no harm in the play-party. Dear Saints, would you like to come out of the play-party and meet the Savior? Who shall be able to stand? Those who keep the commandments.

Dear young Saints, as one who loves your souls, let me ask you to stand firm (only a few more days compared to eternity) till the Savior comes to earth to begin his reign of a thousand years. I know you all want to have part in the first resurrection and not be left to sleep on. May we all heed the warning, is the desire of

Your brother in the one faith,

J. T. MITCHELL.

NORTH FREEDOM, Wisconsin, May 11, 1907.

Dear Herald: I am still in the faith. The gospel was restored by the angel of the Lord, and will continue to roll forth notwithstanding the fact that Satan is trying with all his might to overthrow the gospel message, knowing that his time is short. In my experience of nearly forty years in the church, I have never seen the time that there was so much misrepresentation as at present, both in and out of the church. When will the people learn wisdom and get their hearts right before the Lord?

I am determined to hold fast to the rod of iron, as God shall give me strength. To this end I ask an interest in your prayers, that I may be able to stand. There are not Saints enough here to hold meetings, and it keeps one constantly on the watch. May the Lord hasten the time that Zion shall be redeemed is my prayer.

In gospel bonds,

FRANK HACKETT.

Extracts from Letters.

James O. Coshow, Lloyd, New Mexico: "I wish to know if there are any Saints at or near this place, either in organized branches, or scattered. Would be pleased to have the elders visit Bro. Berry and Bro. and Sr. Evans, at Mountain, Missouri, which place I left last March to come to this place. May the Lord's blessing be with all."

News From Branches

MALAD, IDAHO.

We have seen no obituary in the church papers of our esteemed brother and branch president, Elder William John, who departed this life at his home near Malad City, Idaho, January 22, 1907, after a brief illness. A wife and six children were left to mourn the loss of a true husband and father, also two sisters and an aged father await the summons of the reaper. Bro. John was born at Morristown, Glamorganshire, Wales, the 24th of February, 1853, and with his wife was baptized into the Reorganized Church by Elder John R. Evans at Samaria, Idaho, January 21, 1889. For the past eight years he acted most of the time as president of the Malad Branch.

The calling away of Bro. John left Priest E. T. Richards in charge of the branch, which duty he is trying to discharge as he does all else that he undertakes.

An increase in the attendance and interest at Sabbath-school, and the interest reported in the Sunday afternoon and Thursday evening prayer-services was encouraging to see and hear of.

The attendance and interest at the preaching-services the 12th inst. was pleasing. Bro. Elias Richards, branch teacher and Bishop's agent, says the Saints are preparing to pay their tithes, and the gifts are manifested.

Bro. William Jones who was, when a child, so miraculously saved from death under the administration of Bro. David H. Smith, tells us that he again received a great blessing when administered to last fall, and that last January their infant child was miraculously healed to the entire convincing of his wife, not in the church, and others, that it was the Lord's doing.

While the Lord has smiled upon them in a measure with spiritual and financial blessings, Cupid has been busy and Sr. Ann Evans has been bereft of two daughters, Srs. Alice and Anna.

FIRST KANSAS CITY BRANCH.

On the 2d of May we had a regular January snow-storm with a freeze at night which killed much of the fruit and berries; but while the outer man was somewhat interfered with, the inner man rejoiced with the good things that come through obedience to the gospel.

We have had a number of the missionaries visit us, also our stake officers, who fed our souls in a manner which caused us to rejoice. On last Sunday afternoon most of our members attended the ceremony of laying the corner-stone of the new church of the Second Kansas City Branch; the day was a little windy, but otherwise was beautiful, and the gathering was immense.

May 13 we held our regular branch business-meeting. The following brethren were chosen to serve us for the next six months: Elder D. F. Winn, H. Sandy, M. Leeton, and Seth Sandy.

Our Sunday-school and Religio are making nice progress in the educating of the young for usefulness in time to come.

With very little exception, perfect harmony prevails with all the members of our branch, and all love to let their light shine in this great city.

F. C. WARNKY.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.

An item of interest to the church and to Independence Stake in particular was the dedication of the church at the Chelsea Park Branch, President Joseph Smith preaching the sermon.

Among the new-comers of last week we were pleased to greet Bro. Thompson and Bro. George Webber, both from Canada; also Sr. Brown and Sr. Moyer visiting us from St. Louis; also Sr. Mayme Hilliard from New Orleans.

A strong effort is being made to help in a material way the young men and boys of Independence. To get this idea into tangible form, a mass-meeting has been proposed for next Tuesday evening at the court-house at which Mayor Prewitt will preside. All interested are cordially invited to come. Our Religio president, Bro. William Pitt, is the originator of the movement. We wish it success on account of the worthy object it has in view.

Saints and friends of the principals will be interested in learning of the marriage of Bro. G. H. Hilliard and Sr. Annie Williamson, which took place on Wednesday evening of last week.

All of our auxiliary societies are progressing nicely and are "making good" along their respective lines.

J. A. GARDNER.

Pastoral.

To All Concerned in Mission No. 3: Having been returned to the above field it is thought best to arrange as follows: Each minister to make quarterly and annual reports direct to the minister in general charge. To have local supervision otherwise: J. J. Cornish, Northern, Western, Central, and Eastern Districts, Michigan; S. W. L. Scott, Southern Michigan and Northern Indiana District; C. E. Harpe, Southern Indiana District; F. M. Cooper, Northeastern Illinois District; Amos Berve, Kewanee, Illinois, District; W. P. Robinson, Northern Wisconsin District, and J. O. Dutton, Southern Wisconsin District. These brethren will please keep the minister in general charge posted as to conditions from time to time. We certainly feel gratified in being associated with you for another year, and trust that the associations of the two years just past are but prophecies of the future. Being collaborators together with God may we each strive to do our part of this copartnership as faithfully as we know he will perform his. May the coming year be fraught with blessings from on high as the manifestations of divine approval. Bickerings, fault-finding, and their ilk are but the agencies of Satan, and instruments that manifest spiritual degeneracy.

LAMONI, Iowa, May 17, 1907.

Your collaborer,
J. W. WIGHT.

Having been appointed assistant in charge of Oklahoma and Indian Territory, I desire to take this opportunity of expressing a few suggestions and requests to the missionaries and Saints, that we all may work together for the good cause we represent.

R. M. Maloney, Seiling, Oklahoma, is at present district president of Oklahoma, which will require his labor in all parts of Oklahoma.

Hubert Case, Piedmont, Oklahoma, is Bishop's agent of Oklahoma. This will require extensive traveling on his part.

S. W. Simmons, Holdenville, Indian Territory, James E. Yates, Seiling, Oklahoma, and William Davis, will labor in that part known as the Indian Territory, and eastern part of Oklahoma when necessary.

A. M. Chase, Freedom, Woodward County, R. F. D. No. 1, in Western Oklahoma until October 1.

J. T. Riley, Fairland, Indian Territory, and Lee Quick, Mapleton, Kansas, R. F. D. No. 1, as they were appointed, Southern Kansas, and Territory, and will report all their labors to me.

James H. Baker, of Beaver, Oklahoma, as his appointment reads, Northwestern Oklahoma.

Please mail your reports promptly on the first days of July, October, January, and March.

Will the Saints please take notice, those that want preaching in their part will write at once to some of the above addresses that have been appointed to your part of the field. Note will be made of your wants, and we will get to you as soon as possible. Write at once; do not put it off. We want to get over the field this year and do as much as possible and we need your assistance.

I would like to remind you that the missionaries have to be fed and clothed and have traveling expenses. This is supposed to come from those where they are laboring. Some have done exceedingly well, and we have no fault to find with them. The Lord says in Doctrine and Covenants 83:16: He that does this, "shall in no wise lose his reward: and he that doeth not these things is not my disciple; by this you may know my disciples."

We have two reunions this year in Oklahoma; one in the west part, the other in the east. We would like to see all the Saints of Oklahoma attend one of these. The one in the west will be in July, the other in August.

We trust we may all work in harmony, and that we may have the good Spirit to guide. Home address will reach me any time. I am as ever,

Your collaborer,

W. M. AYLOR.

INDEPENDENCE, Mo., 410 S. River Boulevard, May 12, 1907.

Having been appointed associate minister in charge of Minnesota and the Dakotas, and having been requested by the Twelve to so arrange the men in the field that they may travel "two and two," I have, after due consideration, concluded to request the brethren under my charge to labor as follows:

Brn. H. A. McCoy and Birch Whiting in northern and eastern, and Brn. A. L. Whiteaker and J. W. Smith in southern and western Minnesota. Brn. J. E. Wildermuth and Leonard Houghton in eastern, and Brn. William Sparling and George Day in western North Dakota. Brn. LeRoy Wood and Edward Rannie in that part of South Dakota lying north and east of the Missouri River.

Bro. Sparling's duties as Bishop's agent will necessitate his visiting all of the North Dakota District at times, so this arrangement, so far as he is concerned, can not be fully carried out; but we request that it be observed so far as is practicable.

Those brethren laboring along the line between the States do not need to draw the line too closely, but, where there is a need for it, may labor on either side when near the line.

I will be in the field by the first of June, or soon after, and will hold myself in readiness to respond to calls for preaching wherever there may be need for my services.

H. O. SMITH, Associate Minister in Charge.

INDEPENDENCE, Missouri, May 15, 1907.

To the Ministry, Saints, and Friends of the "Western Mission," comprising Colorado, Wyoming, New Mexico, Arizona, California, Utah, Montana, Idaho, Oregon, Washington, Mexico, British Columbia, and Hawaii Territory; Greeting:

Having been appointed in charge of this field for this conference year, we desire and solicit the hearty cooperation of all the ministry both general and local, to push the work intrusted to our care; and we hope that all members will see to it that they do all they can to assist in this work. The membership should remember that the missionaries will need their support both moral and financial, as they are not supposed to call on the Bishop for aid unless it becomes absolutely necessary; you will see that it will be necessary to help them along, as occasion may require, from time to time, in a financial way; the ministry should be careful not to waste the means given for the work of the gospel.

In regard to debates, consultation should be had with the ministers in charge before entering upon any debate of importance. Of course in emergencies we expect the missionaries to use their best judgment and all the help divine they can get, and never let the work suffer.

We have assigned the missionaries to the separate parts of the mission and associated them together, "two by two," so far as practicable at this time, and hope that the brethren will strive to work together as best they can for the pushing of the work, get out of old beaten trails, so far as possible, that we may spread the work so far as lies in us this year.

The following are the assignments: F. J. Chatburn and A. J. Layland in the Spokane District; S. D. Condit and A. A. Baker in Western Oregon; C. E. Crumley and A. Carmichael in Central and Southern California; C. W. Earle and J. B. Carmichael in Central California District; J. D. Curtis and F. A. Russell, in Colorado, Wyoming, and New Mexico; G. W. Thorburn and John Davis, in Seattle and British Columbia District; L. G. Holloway and Edgar Smith, in Montana; N. C. Enge and Amos Moore, in Eastern and Central Oregon; I. M. Smith and J. F. Petre, Colorado, Wyoming, and New Mexico; C. A. Parkin and John Hommes, Northern California; G. J. Waller and Edward Ingham, Hawaii Territory; F. J. Curtis and Alvin Knisley, Utah; T. J. Sheldon and J. E. Vanderwood, Utah; J. D. Stead, J. H. Condit, and E. B. Morgan, in Idaho and Western Wyoming; E. A. Davis and Amos Chase, in Utah; W. S. Pender and F. M. Weld, in Arizona and Southern California; Columbus Scott and E. F. Shupe, in Colorado, Wyoming, and New Mexico; Alonzo Jones and T. W. Williams, Southern California District; J. M. Terry, Northern California District, Oakland and San Francisco objective points; William Johnson, Seattle and British Columbia District; T. W. Chatburn, Spokane District, Spokane City objective point; Gomer Reese, Northern Utah; E. C. Briggs, in Utah; E. Keeler, Oregon and Western Washington. Brn. James Kemp and J. W. Morgan have been superannuated and will labor in Colorado as their health will permit in the vicinity where they live.

The brethren are requested to report promptly as before on the first of July, October, January, and March, the one on the 1st of March to be an annual report. We will send blanks as soon as we can get them out.

You can send your reports direct to the minister in charge; direct to their home address until further notice.

We would like to keep in as close touch with the missionaries as possible, so we will know the conditions in the field and especially where anything of a new or special character arises.

A letter addressed to F. A. Smith, Lamoni, Iowa, will always reach him and as soon as he can do so, he will publish a field address. Bro. F. M. Sheehy will publish his home address as soon as he gets his affairs in shape to do so. For the present address him at Independence, Missouri.

After the 25th of May, a letter addressed to F. A. Smith, Salt Lake City, Utah, (general delivery,) will reach him for some time at least.

F. M. SHEEHY,
FRED. A. SMITH,

Associate Ministers in Charge.

To the Saints of the Clinton and Spring River Districts; Greeting: Having been placed in charge of the above districts, I ask for your cooperation that we may labor together with an eye single to the glory of God and the salvation of the souls of men. If the Saints who are not living in branches will secure places to hold meetings in their neighborhood, I with my brethren appointed to your district will come and assist you in getting the angel's message before the people, thus fulfilling the commandment: "Behold, I sent you out to testify and warn the people, and it becometh every man who hath been warned, to warn his neighbor; therefore, they are left without excuse, and their sins are upon their own heads."

The missionaries appointed to labor in this part of the mission will report to me on the first day of July, October, January, and March. We wish to congratulate the Saints for their hearty support of last year, and ask that you continue the same this year, and let each one see how much we can do to forward this great work, and remember that the work is God's and not ours, and that we are only his servants to carry on his work here among the children of men, and that we must answer to him in that day of reckoning.

Do not forget, you who are interested in getting a tent for the Clinton District, that the committee is in need of your help financially to get the tent. You who have not given any aid to so purchase can do so by sending it to Elder J. W. Paxton or me to our address, Holden, Missouri. We shall get into the Spring River District as soon as permissible. Let the watchword be "Onward and Upward."

Report of the Library Commission.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO BRANCH AND RELIGIO PRESIDENTS, AND SUNDAY-SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS.

At the Fifty-fourth General Conference of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, which convened at Lamoni, Iowa, on Friday, April 6, 1907, upon recommendation of the "First Presidency" a Library Committee was appointed to meet with similar committees, appointed by the "General Sunday-School Association," and "Zion's Religio Literary Society."

The purpose of these committees was to formulate ways and means by which the library departments of the three separate organizations could be brought together under one general head, thereby avoiding the duplicating of effort in the establishing of libraries in the branches, districts, stakes, and in general organizations.

This Joint Committee chose three General Officers: E. A. Blakeslee, from the church; E. H. Fisher, from the Sunday-School; and S. A. Burgess, from the Religio, and appointed them a Library Commission, with full power to put into operation, as soon as practicable, the plans for the consolidation of the library interests of the church.

It has been the experience of those engaged in library work in the different departments of the church, that the library departments of the branch, Sunday-school, and Religio have in many places worked at cross purposes and to great disadvantages, by reason of having three separate libraries.

The object of this movement is for the betterment of this department by the consolidation and unification of all our library interests, thus doing away with unnecessary duplications, either in the selection of books or in the election of officers, and the bringing of the local libraries into closer touch with the general library of the church.

In harmony with the foregoing, the Commission urges that in every branch, the church, Sunday-school, and Religio each call a separate business-meeting, and choose, on account of his special fitness or adaptability for the library work, one committeeman, and these three appointees constitute the Library Board, having full power and authority to appoint a librarian and his assistants, to raise money, to purchase books, and to do such work as will further the library interests in the local branch.

At the meeting of the district organization of these societies, they will select a library committeeman from each of these societies. These three shall act as a library board for the district, and appoint a librarian and assistants, who shall look after the general library interests of the districts, and receive the reports from the local boards.

Lists of books will be sent to the branches with prices and instructions as to where they can be purchased.

It is desired by the Library Commission that reports be sent in from branches as soon as any definite work is done towards the consolidation of the library interests. If we can be of any service to you in settling any difficulties that may arise, we shall be pleased to hear from you.

All communications should be addressed to the secretary, E. H. Fisher, 100 Sycamore Street, Somerville, Massachusetts.

Daughters of Zion Leaflets.

We have now on hand quite a number of complete sets of the series of readings entitled, "Our Boys," that have been issued during the past year by the Daughters of Zion, which we are offering at the following rate:

We will send ten complete sets of these leaflets to one address for forty cents.

These readings are of such an excellent character, that they ought to be in every family, and the low price at which we offer them will enable those who desire to assist in spreading these excellent teachings to do so at a very little cost and trouble. By sending to me forty cents you can get ten sets which you can distribute to ten different families who may not otherwise have the opportunity of reading them. Let us receive your orders at once.

We will continue to publish the monthly readings in leaflet form, as heretofore, and hope to receive many new orders for them.

The June number will be the discourse of Brother Elbert A. Smith, which was delivered at the evening session of the Daughters of Zion during the General Conference, and we especially desire that every Saint should have the opportunity of reading it. These leaflets will be furnished at the rate of 10 each month for one year for fifty cents, or 25 each month for one year for $1.20. MRS. B. C. SMITH.

FEEDING THE ELDER.

"Mother, the preacher is coming."
"Mercy, what will we have for dinner!"

It is a wise provision that makes the elder dependent upon the whole church for his family support and upon the individual member (as a rule) for the particular next meal which is so much upon the minds of rich and poor alike. It is a blessing to both parties. When we go about it properly it is a great pleasure to minister to the temporal needs of those who minister to our spiritual needs; we can thus make some sort of return and give some expression to our affection. On the other hand the sense of dependence will keep the minister from that feeling of arrogance sometimes developed in those who draw large salaries and live in sumptuous homes of their own ordering. And all the time it brings both parties together in the most intimate association when as guest and host they break bread and eat salt together and are thus obligated to each other by bonds recognized by the most lowly races.

Care must be exercised, however, that this mutual interchange does not become a burden to either party. It must have been a great pleasure to our Master to dine in the home of Mary and Martha. It must have been a great blessing to the two sisters to prepare the meal for their Lord or for the humblest of his disciples. Yet there was one little flaw in the felicity of the occasion: Martha was inclined to make the work of preparation so elaborate that it appeared a burden and the mind of her guest was disquieted thereby. Some have censured Mary and said that she was indolent and shirked her share of duty and did all the visiting while her sister did the work. We do not know as to that. We were not there and neither were those who make that statement. But the Master was there and he commended Mary and pointed out a better way for Martha than to be so much "troubled" about so "many things."

There seems to be a mistaken notion that no dinner is prepared to go into the ministry unless well fortified with yellow-legged chicken or roast beef, with the other usual staples, with pie, cake, pudding, sauce, and other good things, intended to

"When we put our shoulders to the wheel, as it is so often expressed, we must do so simultaneously with others; and we must all urge the chariot forward in one general direction, and that must be the direction in which our God is marching on."

But Faith, fanatic Faith, once wedded fast sustain life, but the over-abundance of which encourages dyspepsia and early dissolution.

Now such a meal may be all right at times, when one is very hungry and has had considerable physical exercise, but the eldership does not sail well when its cargo is thus replenished three or even two times each day.

The preparation of all these viands may occupy time which the elder would rather spend in conversation. He sits in the parlor and studies the wall paper while the rattle of dishes salutes his ears and sundry savory odors his nostrils. Then if he does full justice to the meal he feels like sinking into a condition of sodden lethargy rather than engage in conversation on religious topics. Or perhaps if the material is not at hand to furnish such an elaborate bill of fare the host hesitates to invite the elder to lodge with him; when in truth the elder would much prefer plain fare and shelter for the night to no food and an uncertain outlook for sleep.

We believe that we can speak for the elders when we say that almost without exception they will be content with the ordinary food of the family that entertains them—just such as is provided for the family seven days in the week. But we know human nature well: it is natural for people to wish to “put the best foot forward” when company is expected—about all we can do is to implore them to not put it too far forward, so that the other foot will not catch up until the elder has been gone two or three days.

Mark Twain once said that Americans were the biggest liars in the world. He said that a guest would be seated at the table with the remark, “You are welcome, if you can put up for one meal with what we have every day”; and if the guest should happen in unannounced a week later he would find the family subsisting on the scraps of that grand spread. He may have overstated the case. He is not famous for his strict veracity; but almost every arrow of wit is feathered with truth, or it would not fly far.

It should be remembered that the work of the elder is largely mental work and that he goes at times from one heavily loaded table to another, so he should not be unduly and repeatedly urged to eat more, until he fears to refuse lest he shall offend. Remember that when he preaches a little of everything in one discourse you rather dislike the spiritual fare thus provided you. Yet it is impossible for the mind to dwell continuously and alertly upon one subject when the stomach is somewhat in the condition of the great sheet that Peter saw let down from heaven, except that sundry creations not dreamed of in Peter's day are included in the list.

The preacher of course needs food, but what he craves and needs above all else is a welcome,—to be made at home in your home in lieu of the home that he has left in order to preach to you and to others.

A whole-hearted welcome will sweeten the blackest loaf and soften the hardest bed; while a grudging welcome will embitter the gift, the giver, and the unfortunate recipient.

It is the warm heart that sanctifies the cup of cold water.

On the other hand, having tasted true hospitality, the elder must do his best to make a proper return. His friend has doffed the armor and lifted the helmet and taken him into his castle. He is a trusted and honored member of the family circle. If he does aught to betray that trust, to break up that home circle, woe be to him.

He should make few exactions, only such as the state of his health may compel, and no fault-finding or meddling. He should teach the gospel in act and word. He is not sent out to criticise the church or its institutions, to unduly enlarge upon unfortunate conditions elsewhere, or to find fault with conditions or with men in and of the church. If evils exist, there is a time to explain them and to essay their removal; but that place is not out on the frontier. The missionary is sent out to make converts and not to weaken the faith of converts that some other man has made at considerable expense and labor. The United States regulars are out on the frontier for business and they do not spend their time picking flaws in the Declaration of Independence or in finding fault with comrades and commanders. They get right after the enemy.

If the soldiers in the army of the Lord will get right after the enemy they will be kept tolerably busy; and at the proper time, when they rally back to the council chambers, they may discuss the weak points in our defense, if there are such.

Thus by prayer and thought the minister may be enabled as the Master was to say with effect when leaving a hospitable home, “Peace be to this house.” And the householder will actually feel that a man of God has sojourned there and has left a holy, spiritual, uplifting spirit there that will be felt for days after his departure.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

GENERAL CHURCH ITEMS.

The history and claims of the Book of Mormon are explained by Bro. A. A. Reams in the Des Moines Register and Leader for May 19.

It is reported that a recent fire in the building in which the offices of the Presidency and Presiding

Bishopric at Independence are located for a time threatened those offices, but the blaze was quickly overcome by the city fire department. The smoke caused a little inconvenience, but no further damage resulted.

Apostle U. W. Greene writes that his health is rapidly improving; notably so during the past three weeks. The church in general will be gratified to learn this news as the state of Bro. Greene's health has been a matter of considerable concern.

CURRENT EVENTS, SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS.

A great warrior's view of his own profession must be of interest; so also the policy of a great nation as outlined by one of its statesmen. During the course of his visit to America, while delivering an address at a banquet in New York City, General Kuroki gave such an expression of his own opinion of his own profession and such an outline of his nation's policy, in the following words:

"The Japanese people love peace. They fought for peace. My nation wants peace in which to develop the opportunities that are hers. We have no other desire. The profession which I have the misfortune to follow is noble only because sometimes it is necessary to establish conditions in which peace may be maintained, and in which the arts of peace may flourish."

Peace also has her heroes. The commissioners of the Carnegie fund have awarded twenty-one hero medals. Six of the twenty-one men thus honored bear the inconsequential name of Smith. Six in twenty-one is a good average, made more conspicuous by the fact that not a Brown or a Jones appears on the list. All six of the Smiths thus decorated reside in the little state of Rhode Island. When the commission proceeds to examine some of the larger States we may look for astonishing results.

The suit against the trustees of the Christian Science Church to secure an accounting of Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy's property opened at Concord, New Hampshire, May 23. The experiences of Mrs. Eddy, John Alexander Dowie, Sandford, Joseph F. Smith, and other modern church leaders remind us that few of the disciples of former days accumulated fortunes that became a bone of legal contention. The seamless coat for which lots were cast is the nearest approach to such an estate; and it in itself is a standing rebuke to the swollen fortunes of some church-builders of to-day.

The Chicago Tribune has conducted a campaign of inquiry and reaches the conclusion that Chicago society women are economical in the matter of dress, as most of them consider five thousand dollars sufficient to decently clothe a modest woman for one year. It would be of interest to turn to the files of the Daily Babylonian of 600 B. C. and compare statistics.

Press reports regarding a proposed change in Presbyterian Church organization are as follows:

"COLUMBUS, Ohio, May 20.—After a spirited discussion, during which it was charged an attempt was being made to build up a Catholic hierarchy, the Presbyterian General Assembly to-day adopted the report of the special committee on administrative agencies referring to the presbyteries, and four overtures relating to changes in the form of government of the church which provide for the establishment of an executive committee by the presbyteries, synods, and general assembly, of which the moderators of the respective organizations shall be the head.

"If the majority of the presbyteries approve of these overtures the committee will report to the great general assembly a plan for an executive commission of the general assembly.

"The recommendation for the establishment of executive commissions was vigorously opposed, Reverend Doctor Doremus, of Michigan, declaring it was an attempt to set up a Catholic hierarchy, and Reverend Doctor Alexander T. Kerr, of Pennsylvania, denouncing it as born of the spirit of oligarchy and a blow at the basic principles of the church. The proposition found warm supporters, however, and a strong defense was made of it by the chairman of the committee, Reverend Doctor Moffatt, president of Washington and Jefferson University. He declared the proposed change in the form of government was in perfect harmony with the principles of the church. It did not mean a concentration of power, but rather an execution of power."

THOSE PHOTOGRAPHS.

The Editors have received photographs from a number of the ministry, but not nearly all have responded to their call. Why not send your photograph to-day? We need it to place on file. Address the HERALD Editors, Lamoni, Iowa.

"How often we hear the elders say that when they go to preach in a branch where the members of the church are living as they should, they experience a freedom in preaching that they can not in places where those who should be lights to the world are living careless and unworthy lives. It is not the word preached, but the word practiced that carries the full weight of its truth to a criticising world."

FRANKLY QUESTIONED FRANKLY ANSWERED.

What is the difference between "proof" and "revelation"?

If you desire merely a definition of words, I should refer you to the dictionary. But I assume that you want something else; that you want my idea of the difference between the kind of evidence on which we depend for scientific conclusions and that on which religious faith rests. Is it the same? I do not think so. What is the difference? That is what in this letter I will try to tell you.

When from certain observed phenomena we deduce certain conclusions, the conclusions are said to be proved. Harry K. Thaw is accused of murder. It is necessary for his defense that it be proved that he was insane when he shot Stanford White. Certain observed phenomena are testified to; and from these phenomena the counsel for the defense draw the conclusion of his insanity. If they succeed to the satisfaction of the jury, the conclusion is said to be proved.

Revelation is unveiling. It is the discovery or uncovering of a before hidden experience in the soul. The Psalmist writes:

Bless Jehovah, O my soul!
 And forget not all his benefits.
 Who forgiveth all thine iniquities;
 Who healeth all thy diseases;
 Who redeemeth thy life from destruction;
 Who crowneth thee with loving-kindness and tender mercies;
 Who satisfieth thine age with good,
 So that thy youth is renewed like the eagle.

This is not a conclusion which he draws from certain observed phenomena. It is an uncovering or revealing of certain experiences of which he is conscious. He has felt the burden of remorse for wrongs which he has perpetrated; and the burden has been lifted off from him. He has realized his own weakness, his own inadequacy to meet temptations which have confronted him; and he has also realized a strange, inexplicable power which has enabled him to meet and overcome them. He has been awakened to the consciousness that some course which he was pursuing would end in his ruin; and as though a mysterious hand was reached out to arrest him, he has been stayed, and so saved from self-destruction. He has been called to some kingly mission quite too great for his natural abilities; and he has entered upon this with forboding to find a coronation of strength not his own, by which he has been enabled to fulfill that mission. In his old age he has found himself looking forward to the unknown world which is drawing daily nearer to him, not with fear, hardly with awe, rather with a great exhilaration, a hope transcending all the hopes of his youth. And he reveals or unveils to us this inward experience of his soul.

Religion is the life of God in the soul of man. Revelation is the unveiling of that life to others. The Bible is a revelation, or, to speak more accurately, contains a revelation, because it unveils God as an experience in the consciousness of men. The laws in the Bible are written by prophets who have realized what Kant calls the "categorical imperative" within themselves and have interpreted it in such specific commands as those that call for reverence toward God, hours saved from drudgery and dedicated for the higher life, respect for parents, and regard for the rights of one's neighbor. Theodore Parker as a boy crossing the Boston Common picked up a stone to throw at a bird. A voice within him seemed to tell him not to throw the stone. He dropped it and ran home to tell his mother, who explained to him that it was the voice of God, always to be obeyed. The law against cruelty to animals was not proved to him; it was revealed in him. The history in the Bible is written by men who perceived in the life of the nation what Matthew Arnold has called "a power not ourselves that makes for righteousness." The existence of this power was not proved to them as something external to themselves; they were conscious of it as a power working within themselves. It was not a hypothesis demonstrated; it was an experience unveiled. The poetry in the Bible, like all poetry, is the unveiling of a life of truth and beauty in the phenomena of nature which the brute can not and the dullard does not see; but, unlike much other poetry, it discerns in this truth and beauty a manifestation of the same spirit of grace and power that dwells within the soul and gives it power of vision.

Prove it. You can not prove it, any more than you can prove the beauty of a Brahms symphony to one who prefers a coon song, or the grandeur of Niagara to one who can see in it only an instrument for creating salable electric power. God is not proved. He is perceived; he is experienced within the soul.

This revealing of one's own inner experience has often power to awaken a like experience in others.

Mr. H. E. Krehbiel has written a book entitled How to Listen to Music. Most men do not know how to listen to music; they do not know how to see a picture; they do not know how to see the world. But they possess a dormant capacity which the brute does not possess. It can be awakened in them. When this power, before asleep, has been awakened in them, then the truth, the beauty, the life, is revealed to them. It is revealed to them because it is revealed in them. The soul is like a torch—dark, but with a capacity to be lighted. When it is touched by some other soul aflame with divine life, it catches the fire and flames up with the same life.

Says Professor Huxley:

As there are Pascals and Mozarts, Newtons and Raffaellos, in whom the innate faculty for science or art seems to need but a touch to spring into full vigor, and through whom the human race obtains new possibilities of knowledge and new conceptions of beauty; so there have been men of moral genius, to whom we owe ideals of duty and visions of moral perfection which ordinary mankind could never have attained; though, happily for them, they can feel the beauty of a vision which lay beyond the reach of their dull imaginations, and count life well spent in shipping some faint image of it in the actual world.

This is the Bible. It is a library of religious experience. It reveals or unveils the spiritual life of those who wrote its various books. In so doing it kindles a like experience in the reader. This power to awaken in the soul of the reader the same life which was in the soul of the writer is what gives the Bible its value and makes it in both senses a revelation: an unveiling to the soul of spiritual life because an unveiling of that life within the soul.

Jesus Christ is thus a supreme revelation of God. He had a consciousness of God. It was his supreme, abiding, dominating consciousness. "I am in my Father, and my Father in me," he said. He also said that we were to be in them as they were to be in each other. He reveals or unveils God to us because he reveals or unveils God within us. He enables us to see the picture which before was unseen, to hear the music which before was unheard. God was always within us, speaking to us, but we did not hear him. When we learn from Christ how to listen, then we begin to hear. To believe in Abraham Lincoln is not to believe that he was born at a particular time or place, nor even that he was constitutionally elected president of the United States. It is to believe that what he was trying to do ought to be done, and that he was trying to do it in the right spirit. To believe in Christ is not to believe that he was born at a particular time or place, or in a particular manner. It is not to believe in any theory which the church or the doctors of the church may have formed as to his metaphysical relation to the Father. It is to believe in him. It is to see the divine life, the life of the living God in the soul of a living man, revealed or unveiled in him, to see in him a supreme object of reverence, loyalty, and affection. Christ asked the young man, "Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, even God." The young man could not answer the question. He was speechless. He did not know why he had called Christ good. To believe in Christ is to know and to be able to answer that question. It is to say: I know no one so good as thou art; no one who so awakens my reverence and inspires my ambition; no one whose approval I so desire, whose life I so wish to imitate, whose spirit I so eagerly long to make my own.

This is my personal faith in Christ. I care very little about theories concerning his Person or his metaphysical relation to the Infinite. He is to me the revealing or unveiling of God. To revere him is the highest worship; to do his work in his spirit is the highest life; to love him and be approved by him is the highest ambition.—Lyman Abbott, in the Outlook, May 18, 1907.

THE CREATION GROANING.

ELDER W. E. LARUE.

"Though this earthly pilgrimage may be as the darkness of the darkest night, surely light, joy, and unspeakable rejoicing shall come in the dawning of the new creation."

That this present world is held in the "bondage of corruption" and is everywhere cursed with the evidences of sin is manifestly true. The apostle Paul says, "For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now."—Romans 8: 22. Every cyclone, earthquake, tidal-wave, flood, volcanic eruption, or other manifestation of the power of Nature in a confused state, testifies to the support of the above statement.

Paul further says, "Even we ourselves groan within ourselves," and also, "We that are in this tabernacle do groan being burdened." Every pain, sorrow, or suffering of humanity bears witness to us of the fact. It is far better for us to deal with realities as facts, and this will often assist us to see the wisdom of being reconciled to things as they are. In this world we will have tribulation; we will not escape entirely from some of sin's destroying power; if we are not made a victim in one way it will surely not fail to reach us in another. When sin is finished it "bringeth forth death." Sin is in the food which we eat, the air which we breathe, and the water which we drink; and however cautious and vigilant one may be there is no escape from the consequences.

Sin is disorder, disarrangement, the transgression of law. There is much of the results of sin in evidence, under whose grievous burdens humanity groans in suffering and distress, for the cause of which they are in no sense responsible. The tender, helpless infant, whose heart is as innocent and pure as the holiest angel; the aged saint, whose heart may be clean and his spirit right in the sight of God and man, are not immune and may under some burden be made to groan in suffering, agony, and pain. Some of the greatest sorrow and deepest grief is caused us, not for the endurance of our own sins, but because of the sins of others. If a son or daughter is drawn from virtue's path and overcome in sin, either one does not suffer the consequences alone; all the relatives and friends are driven to grief and mental trial because of his or her waywardness.

The cause of our happiness to-day may change and become the burden of our sorrow on to-morrow.

We can not prevent the work of sin; storms, wrecks, war, pestilence, destruction, devastation in all their horrors will come. Strifes, tumults, dishonesty, deceit, perplexities, and defeat are sure to exist. Riots may come and mobs may howl, and yet the burden may be relieved but never taken away. Legislators may legislate and law-makers make laws to the very best of their ability, which indeed may remedy old conditions, but the subtle forces of sin will soon produce another wound to be healed. Inequality, deprivation of human rights, jeopardized liberty, oppression, tyranny, and selfishness, illustrating man's inhumanity and cruelty, will continue to make their countless millions mourn. Add to these things, pride, haughtiness, aristocracy, and caste, class distinction, and religious prejudice, and you will behold the undeniable works of the Devil and manifestation of sin.

Take for example the San Francisco earthquake, the Johnstown flood, the tidal-wave destruction of Galveston, or the volcanic eruptions of Mt. Vesuvius and Mont Pelee. Many people have declared that they surely believed that God caused these manifestations of power, with all their destruction of life and property, for the purpose of converting sinners and making saints. Such opinion as this originates in superstitious fear rather than in reason and deep reflection. The cause of these things is not because of the wickedness of the people who inhabit these particular places. The absurd idea that God would destroy the lives of hundreds of innocent children just for the purpose of frightening people to repentance is too shallow for any purpose. The scripture says, "The goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance," not the fright and terror of his power.

What do professed disciples amount to—usually—who are scared, frightened, and terrified until they turn to religion as their only consolation? The sailor in the storm makes many vows which are forgotten in calms. How many Saints have been made because of the San Francisco earthquake? Can we find one? God does not design and do work the results of which so manifestly fail of accomplishment. The Savior warned his disciples that when they should see such things as earthquakes, sea and waves roaring, distress of nations with perplexity, fearful sights, wars and rumors of wars, famines and commotions, that they should "be not terrified." And Peter in his epistle to the saints warned them, who may have been made to suffer the sorrows of life as we do, that they should "think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing had happened unto you." And further than this, he says, "let them that suffer . . . commit the keeping of their souls to him in well doing as unto a faithful Creator."

When we behold some faithful and worthy Saint harassed about with bitter trials, or stricken down with some loathsome disease, from which there is no relief but death, do we not think that it is strange indeed? When we hear of a worthy brother minister struck to death by a shaft of lightning while preaching in the pulpit, are we not appalled? When we behold the destruction of fire, how that it burns Bibles as well as novels; our Herald Publishing House as well as other publishing houses; do we not marvel at these things? Surely we do, and where is the solution? It is contained in this thought, expressed by Paul, creation and humanity groaning! groaning! waiting for the redemption and restoration to original and right conditions.

God promises that man shall inherit his portion where he shall no more be burdened with sorrow, pain, or distress; he shall have his body redeemed from the sin-cursed conditions with which it is now surrounded. In like manner the earth shall be redeemed and be restored to its original estate—this the dream of prophets and the hope of the saints,

By taking these views he will not "charge God foolishly," by thinking that he is unkind to us when we suffer a "thorn in the flesh," as did Paul.

We will not be separated from the love of God by anything unless it is by a deficient understanding.

We may make shipwreck of material progress, but we never need, unless we so elect, to make shipwreck of our faith in God. The deception of false brethren; the sneer and scorn of religious prejudice and persecution; to be bereft of earthly possessions and be made to suffer cold, hunger, and the lack of real necessities of life; to live amidst perils on land and sea; to dwell amongst wicked, lustful, deceitful, and unreasonable men; all these things are in evidence; and yet, the faithful disciple must persevere. He must not faint nor grow weary. He must not allow even death to separate him from the love of God, for death is the last enemy of man which God shall destroy. While in mortality we are sold in sin, we are held in the bondage of corruption, and from this condition we are to be delivered. God wants his people to endure with patience and fortitude. Christ was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. He suffered all that we shall suffer, and left us an example that we should follow his steps. When Christ suffered he did not revolt nor rebel; he "committed himself to him that judgeth righteously," and said, "Not my will, but thine, be done." John, the Revelator, saw in a spiritual vision a great multitude of God's redeemed people adorned in white robes,—emblems of purity,—and of them he says, These are they which came out of great tribulation. And they shall be before the throne of God, and God shall dwell among them. No more hunger, nor thirst, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes. Though this earthly pilgrimage may be as the darkness of the darkest night, surely light, joy, and unspeakable rejoicing shall come in the dawning of the morning of the new creation.

GATHERING.

"But it must needs be done in mine own way."

It is evident from this statement of the Lord that man can not accomplish the gathering or bring forth the good God has designed for his children in their own way.

And of the gathering I wish to speak more especially, for the Father says: "Inasmuch as they [who gather] bring forth fruit and works meet for my kingdom, they shall dwell thereon; they shall build, and another shall not inherit it." From these statements we discover that there are some principles necessary to be observed leading up to the preparation for profitable and satisfactory occupancy in that land in which Zion is to obtain.

The Lord says, "Let not your gathering be in haste, nor by flight; but let all things be prepared before you." Not after you have arrived! But

ELDER A. H. PARSONS.

Elder A. H. Parsons was born February 8, 1857. As a boy it was his ambition to become a preacher, and he used to gather up the empty chairs in his parental home and preach to them. He states that at times since entering upon the active ministry that experience has been of value to him. While a young man he united with the Quakers, and in 1877 was set apart as a minister and preached his first sermon in a sod schoolhouse in Jewell County, Kansas. He continued preaching for about three years, when at the close of a very successful series of meetings, he was visited by his uncle, Elder Alma Kent, who brought him the restored gospel. They took the Bible and argued the question most of the time for four days and nights and at the end of a careful investigation following this visit he was baptized. Subsequently he was called to the ministry and was ordained an elder. He was ordained to the office of seventy in 1886, and to the office of high priest in 1900. In 1901 he was ordained first counselor to the president of the High Priests' Quorum; and in 1902 he was ordained first counselor to Bishop Roderick May, of the Independence Stake. Among other labors, he at one time presided over the Philadelphia Branch for seven years. He has also presided over the Kirtland and Boston Branches.

before you go. There is quite a difference in having everything in readiness and having to get ready after getting there. If it were possible for man to go to heaven without having to get ready, there would be more applicants at the door than what there are, no doubt. Our Father says, "Let all the churches gather together all their moneys; let these things be done in their time, be not in haste; and observe to have all things prepared before you, [not afterwards]. And let honorable men be appointed, even wise men, and send them [not yourselves as so many have done, in trying to gather in their own way] to purchase these lands, and every church in the eastern [and we could say now, west, north, and south] countries when they are built up, if they will hearken unto this counsel, they may buy lands and gather together upon them, and in this way they may establish a Zion." If that is the only way by which Zion can be established; what benefit can accrue to us by gathering otherwise?

Obedience is said to be better and more pleasing to our Father, than sacrifices; but how many of us are willing to observe this law?

How many times I have had Saints to say to me, The land is too high in Missouri; poor Saints can never think of getting themselves homes there.

Giants there!

That was the case when the Lord sought to lead the children of Israel into the promised land. Shall we be as foolish as they? While we confess that prices are high, yet we might ask who are contributing to maintain these conditions? Is it not apparent to every one who will stop and think for a few moments, that it is he who is gathering in his own way? When we keep dropping in one or two at a time, it is natural for the people to think that we are going to take this country, and our necessity is their opportunity, and the result is we are forced to step to their music whether we like it or not. If the word of God had found a greater place in our movements, we would have avoided arousing this suspicion, and saved money enough to help the church to procure homes for many of the unfortunate brethren and sisters.

As one of the bishopric of the Independence Stake I have observed that this promiscuous gathering has largely had to do with raising prices on farm lands as well as town property; and especially is this true in the county of Johnson at Knob Noster and Holden. This evil can not be removed until we conform to the good Father's plan, in act as well as theory.

The inhabitants of this country are about the same as those you find elsewhere, they know when they have a soft snap; can you blame them for making the best use of their opportunities? I have observed that some of the Saints who are resident here can not withstand the temptation of speculation; and will help their unfortunate brother to recognize his folly in having come unprepared. This, we feel to thank God, is the exception to the rule. If Saints will prey upon one another, what can we expect of the world? Hence we hear the thundering voice of Jehovah from Mount Sinai, "The spirit of speculation, the exhibition of greed for gain is unseemly in the Saints and officers of the church, and should be avoided." And as we read, how oft we think how befitting that is for Bro. So and So, when we need the essence of truth it bears at work in our own soul.

Another feature touching the gathering that I think would be well to give some thought to is according to the law "every man that cometh up to Zion must lay all things before the bishop in Zion." How many come and say, Why, we never heard of that before; yet it is in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants. Question, Will ignorance excuse us in the day of final accounts? If it will then we ought to be excused now. And if we can be excused from the operation and execution of law, then what good is law to man? And further, if that law is perfect, and by it man is to perfect himself, is it not evident that it will be by knowing and applying that law as the discipline of his or her life that will produce perfection in act and work? We are not excused from the execution of our national or state laws by the reason that we did not know them.

It is stated that those who go up to Zion shall take with them a "certificate from the judge or bishop in this part [where we live, if there is one, if not from an agent or the presiding elder] of the vineyard unto the bishop in Zion, rendereth every man acceptable, and answereth all things for an inheritance and to be received as a wise steward and as a faithful laborer; otherwise he shall not be accepted of the bishop in Zion." It would make us feel as though we had gotten into the wrong pew, to say it mildly, if the Bishop would execute the law and say, Parsons, the law is against you; you're not acceptable here! He is the judge here, and if we can not pass muster here before this tribunal, what will be our prospects for the future?

Now the Lord says it must be done in mine own way; if that be true, then is it not worth our time to make an earnest and careful inquiry as to our duty in these matters? This promiscuous gathering will bring disaster and many heartaches as the result, sooner or later. Why not make an effort to avoid some of these disasters?

You may ask me, What makes you think that way? I will answer, "If my people observe not this law, to keep it holy, and by this law sanctify the land of Zion unto me, that my statutes and my judgments may be kept thereon, that it may be most holy, behold, verily I say unto you, it shall not be a land of Zion unto you."

If we keep not the law by which we are to be prepared and made ready to come to Zion, is it probable that we will become very enthusiastic after our arrival in observing that which governs those in a gathered condition.

After years of thought and study along these lines I do not believe there can be too much said on this matter by way of instruction, when given in the right spirit, which I trust will appear and forcefully be felt as these lines may be read. "Ye shall live by every word which proceedeth forth out of the mouth of God; for he will give unto the faithful, line upon line, precept upon precept; and I will try you and prove you herewith"; if we do not those things as he has designed, we then have no claim upon him for help in time of need, hence he has proved us unworthy of his favor. One of the objects of gathering is to establish a city of refuge, a place of safety. If this is to obtain, we must rid ourselves of every selfish desire, and love our neighbor as ourselves, and "do unto our neighbor as we would have him do to us," instead "of doing our neighbor before he gets a chance to do us."

Individually we must contribute to this Zionistic condition, and it makes no difference where we may live; there we must be felt for the betterment of man, by living pure and holy lives.

A few have come here and found fault with the soil: too much hardpan or too stony; not enough rain or too much; roads not so good as in some parts, and various other excuses. I presume the Lord knew it, and more than that, long ago, hence he said he would try us.

Occasionally one will say, "Well, I thought I would come and see if I would like Zion!" I wonder if we are going to like heaven.

The Lord said, "Assemble yourselves together, according to my commandments, in this land which is the land of Missouri, which is the land which I [not man] have appointed and consecrated for the gathering of my Saints." The question necessary to be settled before we start for Zion is, Are we saints not only in theory but in practice? If not, there is but little use of coming.

The Almighty knew just as well when he selected this section of country what composed its formation as he does now, and if he had thought wise he would have made a different location; but we read that "Zion shall not be moved," though "her children shall be scattered."

There never was a better time to have made the change than in the dark and cloudy day; but he was satisfied, and why not his children?

Zion has not been redeemed as yet, and it will of necessity take all the energy of the faithful ones to accomplish her redemption. The question was once asked, "Who shall abide in my holy hill"; it was beautifully answered through the latter-day

Seer, "the willing and obedient shall eat the good of the land of Zion in these last days; and the rebellious shall be cut off out of the land of Zion, and shall be sent away."

The proposition then presents itself to us in this form, To which of these classes do we belong?

It is a fact that we can have just as much Zion as we live for in the locality where our lot is cast. Locality will not change habits or disposition; it is accomplished only by close discipline bringing our desires under the government of the laws of Zion in all her beauty. "Zion is the pure in heart." If you have not this you can not obtain it in Missouri in any other way than you can in any other part of the world.

Now these are some of the facts that we will meet sometime in our experience; and I trust that I have said it in that way that may help those who are looking this way to read up and make special inquiry of those whose right it is to advise in these matters. Praying and laboring for the redemption of Zion, I remain,

In gospel bonds,

THE LATTER DAY DISPENSATION.

Here we find a mixture of truth and error that needs sifting. Here also is the real point of controversy between Latter Day Saintism and the Catholic Church. The Catholic contends that the church which Christ established was to continue until he came again and that the Christian dispensation is the last. The Latter Day Saint says the primitive church of Christ was temporarily to do a work and then Christ and the Holy Spirit were driven out of the world, God withdrawing all authority from the Christian ministry, and all grace from the Catholic sacraments; so that from the second century on, it was the "synagogue of Satan," etc.

We will examine the passages of scripture by which the Latter Day Saint tries to establish his position.

Ephesians 1: 9, 10, Revised Version: "Making known unto us the mystery of his will according to his good pleasure which he purposed in him unto a dispensation of the fullness of the times to sum up all things in Christ." This is but a part of a very long sentence concerning a very long period of time beginning "before the foundation of the world" (verse 3); and reaching "until the redemption of God's own possession unto the praise of his glory" (verse 14).

Let us examine it carefully and see if it can be made to prove "a latter-day dispensation—a work Joseph Smith was chosen to begin."

The epistle to the Ephesians has been called "the epistle concerning the Holy Catholic Church," for in it St. Paul shows how the "middle wall of partition" was broken down, Christ reconciling both Jew and Gentile unto God by the cross, making the Gentiles "fellow citizens with the saints and of the household of God, being built upon the foundation of the apostle and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone, in whom the building being fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord." —Ephesians 2: 19-22.

Christ is declared to "be the head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all." (Ephesians 1: 22-23.) St. Paul says that in this dispensation of the grace of God (Ephesians 3: 2), "I was made a minister" (Ephesians 3: 7). He declares in Ephesians 4: 4, "There is one body, one Spirit, one hope, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of us all." Before his ascension, Christ gave some apostles, etc., for the work of the ministry, etc., till we all come in the unity of the faith, etc., unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ. After warning against being "tossed to and fro and carried about by every wind of doctrine by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive," he adds: "But speaking the truth in love, grow up into him, in all things which is the head even Christ from whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, etc., maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love."

Chapter 5, verses 23, 25, 26, 29, and 30. "Christ is the head of the church, and he is the Savior of the body." "Christ also loved the church and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, that he might present it unto himself a glorious church not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blemish." "The Lord loved the church for we are members of his body, of his flesh and of his bones." Thus is the church of Christ described. Surely, if we believe this is God's description of the relation of Christ and his church, nothing can make us believe his love and sacrifice and care for his own flesh and bones were all in vain, and that this church was destroyed and another and better established in the nineteenth century. We shall have further proof that Christ's church could not be destroyed, but let us proceed to examine Elder Peterson's arguments. We have seen from the review of this epistle the "dispensation of the fullness of the times" does not refer to a gathering of the Jews in the holy land, but a gathering of all men into one body, the church, which is called Catholic, because it is for all men in all ages and climes.

Acts 3: 20, 21: "Whom the heavens must receive until the time of the restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."

Mr. Peterson would have us believe this restitution has to do with the material prosperity of Palestine, but notice it says restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets. Only some of the prophets speak of the second return of the Jews to Jerusalem but all speak of salvation, redemption, atonement, etc., by which the result of the fall of man is done away. Man is restored. When Christ comes again, man will be resurrected and there will be the restitution of all things, the heaven receives him till the time of the restitution, not till after. When he comes, then begins the time here spoken of.

Malachi 3: 1-4: We admit that this was only partially fulfilled at the first advent, and we look for a second coming when "He [Christ] shall purify the sons of Levi and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness."

Malachi 4: 5 and Matthew 17: 11-13. I think no one questions that Elias shall come and prepare the way for the second advent of Christ. To connect Elijah, Elias, and John the Baptist of the above passages with Joseph Smith, would only be allowable, if he had been "Elijah the restorer," or in the manner Elder Peterson does if he were the Christ. Many have thought Joseph Smith was preparing to make this latter claim when he was killed.

JOSEPH SMITH'S ORDINATION.

In the account given of the ordination of Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery we have an ordination by the messenger by the laying of his hands on unbaptized persons. Then one of these unbaptized persons baptized the other, who in turn baptized his baptizer. Then as if recognizing the invalidity of the messenger's ordination, they proceed to reordain one another to the Aaronic priesthood, (contrary to the law of God when he instituted the same) this priesthood is conferred upon men who are not of the tribe of Levi, "that the sons of Levi may yet offer an offering unto the Lord in righteousness." Whether this was by causing the sons of Levi to become jealous of their rights, we are not told. This quotation from Malachi 3: 1-4 surely implies more than the elder contends for. Had the messenger been the Lord and Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery sons of Levi, one might say the passage was partially fulfilled, or had it been John the Baptist as they claimed, and he had baptized Joseph as the Christ there would have been some fulfillment, but Joseph says the messenger was John the Baptist and Cowdery says it was an angel. As angels and men are a different order in the creation, they contradict one another. (Pp) As Christ's second coming is to be with all the glory of heaven, the shout of the archangel, and the sound of the trumpet awakening the dead. So likewise we are led to believe the coming of John the Baptist or Elias will be in the power and spirit of Elijah. There is no scripture to lead us to think he would appear unto two men only.

Zechariah 2: 2-4. No version of this scripture that I have been able to find says that a young man was to make the proclamation because of instruction from an angel. There is nothing between this young man and Joseph Smith, except that they are both young, and Joseph claims an angel visited him also.

Isaiah 11: 11-12. If the author had had no intention to deceive, he could have saved composition by quoting the preceding verse. "And in that day there shall be a root of Jesse which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek; and his rest shall be glorious. And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall set his hand a second time to recover the remnant, etc., and he shall set up an ensign for the nations and assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather the dispersed of Judah." The ensign, then, instead of being a new church is the root of Jesse, that is, Christ, that he shall be accepted by the Jews after their restoration, has always been the teaching of Christians.

Make this ensign mean the church if you wish, then read the epistles to the Ephesians and Corinthians and learn again that Christ has but one body, into which he will gather both Gentiles and Jews.

These texts say no more about it being started anew, than they do of reforming, restoring, or reorganizing it. By its very nature as the body of Christ, it has the power within itself to grow, renew its strength, cast off disease and deceased members affected by parasites, "crept in unawares." If this ensign means the Latter Day Saint church, it must have a large membership of converted Jews. The Anglican branch of the Catholic Church has almost as many Jews in it as the total membership of the "Reorganization." One of these, Bishop Schereschewsky, an apostle to the Chinese, translated the Bible for that people, which translation is used by missionaries of every denomination.

Isaiah 5: 26-28. This sentence says nothing about "horses with wheels." Ask any school-teacher to read verses 26 to 30 and give you the antecedent of "their" in this last clause of verse 28, as well as in all the other clauses, and you will find that in every case, these plural pronouns have nations and not horses as the antecedent subject.

It does not say this ensign shall be "afar off, at the end of the earth," but it says "he will left up an ensign to the nations [which are] from afar, from the ends of the earth."

This ensign (the root of Jesse) was lifted up on the cross at Jerusalem, and has been carried "unto the nations from far."

And (Romans 10:18) I say, "have they not heard? Yea, verily their sound went out into all the earth and their word unto the ends of the earth."

Elder Peterson boasts that the Latter Day Saint church is the only American church. Unfortunately for a number of sects, they must admit their American origin. The "Methodist Episcopal," "the United Brethren in Christ" the "Church of Christ," the Christian, the "Church of the Living God," are a few of about the same age as the three Latter Day Saint sects, and all claim to be a restoration of primitive Christianity. While I glory in being an American, the church which can claim my allegiance, must show its authority in unbroken succession from the King at Jerusalem, 33 A. D.

Isaiah 18:1. From Elder Peterson's interpretation of this passage we are surprised to learn that "vessels of bul-rushes" were steamboats, and must conclude that Egypt is ahead of us again, for Moses' mother put him in a steamboat and here it was he first met Pharaoh's daughter.

Draw a straight line on the map or globe from Jerusalem across "the rivers of Ethiopia" according to the elder's suggestion and see where you land. Only on the returning line, on the other side of the globe will you touch any possession of the United States of America. Yet Mr. Peterson makes this passage read: In the land of America, and the nation of the United States, God would in our time set up his church. Isaiah 2:2: "In the last days the kingdom composing the house of God will be established [set up] in the highest [top] civilized nations [mountains], and shall be exalted above the lower nations." This wonderful translation is made by the aid of Daniel 2:35, 44 and "latter day inspiration." By such manipulation of texts anything can be proved, and if one has such a right, why not another? Such handling of God's word is sacrilege. Although this were not bad enough, the elder proceeds on page 169 to quote Daniel 2:28-44, and says, "From the above we learn that in the latter days, a divine kingdom or church was to be set up, this latter-day kingdom was not to be thrown down nor given to another people. It could have no reference to the primitive church of Jesus Christ, as some think, for that was thrown down; the entire flock was destroyed (Acts 20:29). They turned away their ears from the truth (2 Timothy 4:4). Only a little while was the light with them (St. John 12:35). The kingdom was taken by force with violent hands (Matthew 11:12). Jesus said, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof (Matthew 21:43).

Take the passages in any order you please, read the contexts, and you convict the elder of lying and misrepresentation. Let us begin with the last and end with his first text.

Matthew 21:43: To whom is Jesus speaking? This is the closing verse of his answer to the chief priests and elders. "By what authority doest thou these things" (verse 23). He addressed Jews. The church was not yet established.

Matthew 11:12: From the days of John the Baptist till now, "the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." Till now, 32 A. D. When Jesus was speaking nearly a year before he said to Peter: "Upon this rock will I build my church and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."

The church, being not yet built, the passage could have no reference to it.

St. John 12:35: "Then Jesus said unto them, Yet a little while is the light with you." The previous verse tells us this was in answer to the question of "the people." "We have heard out of the law; Christ abideth forever, and how sayeth thou, the Son of Man must be lifted up? Who is this Son of Man?" The words were spoken to Jewish unbelievers before the church was established and therefore have no reference to "the primitive church of Jesus Christ."

2 Timothy 4:4: "And they shall turn away their ears from the truth." Who? Some of the church of Ephesus, of whom these words were written. Of this same congregation St. Paul spake in Acts 20:29, "shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock." Even if this meant that some of the devil's ministers should become elders of this flock and completely destroy it, only a small part of the church of Christ would be destroyed.

But until the time of the Turkish conquest, this city was one of the strongholds of the primitive church of Jesus Christ, and therefore the text refers to the intention of the wolves not to spare the flock, not their ability to completely destroy it. Can you believe the writer of page 169 of Elder Peterson's book, and they who follow this method of interpretation, are honest men? If they deliberately deceive in one place will they not in all that suits their case? As we have shown he has falsely handled the word of God throughout the book. Every elder and bishop with whom I have spoken in this matter has defended him, following the same line of texts, with the same strained interpretations.

"By their fruits ye shall know them." If I had never doubted the mission of Joseph Smith before, I should be compelled to do so now. Any system of religion that must resort to such methods to prove its position, can not be of the God of truth. Please read again the last paragraph of my introduction.

THE SO-CALLED REVELATION.

There is nothing in the prophecies of Joseph Smith quoted in this book, that any common man might not have foretold. In fact many school histories quote similar prophecies concerning slavery and its results from such men as Washington, Jefferson, Patrick Henry, George Mason, Peyton Rudolph, James Madison, etc.

The Book of Mormon has no literary, ethical, or devotional merit to commend it even to a place with the writings of the so-called dark ages. For example the Spirit of God is charged with compelling Nephi to kill his drunken uncle, in order that Nephi might steal the family records, which were of such little value as not to have been preserved with the writings of this same Nephi, who is named as the author of the first two books of the "American Bible." "By their fruits ye shall know them." "Thus saith the Lord: I sent him not, and he hath caused you to trust in a lie."

Jeremiah 29:31. "Behold I am against them that cause my people to err by their lies and by their lightness, yet I sent them not nor commanded them."—Jeremiah 23:32. "Hear now, the Lord hath not sent thee, but thou makest this people to trust in a lie."—Jeremiah 28:15.

"Who changed the truth of God into a lie."—Romans 1:25. "There shall in no wise enter into it [new Jerusalem] he that maketh a lie."—Revelation 21:27. "For without, are dogs, etc., and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie."—Revelation 22:15.

CONCLUSION.

How careful therefore we ought to be that we proclaim only the truth in such a way that it be not misconstrued into a lie, for we not only endanger the eternal happiness of those we may mislead, but most certainly bring the curse of God upon our own souls, for he declares, "His blood will I require at thy hands." "Latter Day Saintism" offers nothing upon which hangs the salvation of a soul, or that was ordained of God to build up the Christian character, that the "One Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church" has not always offered to the seeker after God. To one acquainted with the writings of the ancient, medieval, and modern Fathers and Doctors of the church, the Book of Mormon and these latter-day revelations are as hay and stubble; therefore, he who would know the truth will save himself from error and waste of time by turning to the Bible as his only safe text-book and the Catholic church, "the pillar and ground of the truth" (1 Timothy 3:15) as the only divinely appointed teacher.

This certifies that I have read the above copy of my article and made such correction as appeared necessary, and declare the same to be as I have written it.

NO CHANCE FOR THE BOY.

"Mothers would save themselves many bitter tears, and fathers would be spared many heart-aches, if the homes were only made as free to the boys as to the girls."

This startling declaration was made by Reverend Daniel McGurk in a sermon at the Grand Avenue Methodist Episcopal church last night. The address was the first of a series, all of which touch closely the family relations, to be given at the evening services of this church. Reverend Mr. McGurk's sermon last night was on "Bimetallism in morals," and proved to be a strong plea for equal representation for the boys in their own homes.

"It may not be known," said Doctor McGurk, "when there was first a divergence in moral standards for men and women, one binding the women and the other unbinding the men. But from my own study and observation I am prepared to state to-day that the responsibility begins in the home. Unfair discrimination against the man begins in the home among the children.

"The girl in the household gets the best of everything; the best room is hers, the closest attention, the most favors. If she has guests, she entertains them in the parlor, while the brother must perforce take his friends to the wood-pile or the barn. The girl has the right-of-way at home as many nights of the week as she wants it, while the best the boy can do is to get out on a street-corner under the electric lights, and let his moral nature go to the devil as fast as it can.

"The result is that the boy early learns he is not expected to be so careful in his conduct as his sister must be, and as he grows into manhood he believes the double standard a thing of divine appointment.

"It is slander upon mankind and an insult to the boy to say he can not live by the same high standard as his sister. Moreover, it is futile to spend so much care upon rearing the girls to lives of purity and influence, and then allow them to be married to men who have not been so reared. Eighty per cent of the young men of to-day are unfit to marry."—Kansas City Journal, May 20, 1907.

THE FALLEN PASTOR OF A FALLEN PEOPLE.

The Right Reverend Frederick Burgess, bishop of Long Island in the Protestant Episcopal Church, has delivered the most terrible arraignment of New York fashionable society ever uttered by a person of his dignity and authority.

He said to the millionaire congregation of St. George's, Hempstead, Long Island, in effect:

"Your sinning pastor is no better and no worse than you!"

Now, as nearly everybody knows, the pastor in question had committed one of the most disgraceful offenses known to civilized society. A minister of the gospel, a professional exponent of religion and morality, a married man, he had eloped with a seventeen-year-old orphan girl who had been committed to his care by her dead father.

If the Reverend Jere Knode Cooke reflects the morality of St. George's, Hempstead, then how hopelessly low must that morality be. Yet we have the authority of Bishop Burgess that the priest "took his color" from the congregation, and the Bishop is a conservative, aristocratic man, accustomed to speak only after weighing his words well and undoubtedly with full knowledge of the facts.

The Bishop's words have caused terror, consternation, indignation, and disgust among the congregation, according to their susceptibilities or their sense of guilt.

At the moment the Bishop uttered his most stinging words, strong emotion was evident upon the faces of many of the congregation. Some started up as if they were about to leave the church as a protest against such rudeness, but sank back into their chairs on a moment's thought, because to have gone out would have looked like a confession of guilt.

Never was a congregation including the most fashionable and the richest people of New York so assailed.

"You say and you expect that the men who preach the gospel of Christ crucified shall be leaders," thundered the Bishop.

"Yes, they ought to be! But you will find that in all times and in all places, from the very beginning of things, the color of the priest has been taken from the people to whom he ministers. The most hopeful man will become a pessimist if he associates with cynics, the most enthusiastic will grow cold without encouragement. As it is with the priests so it is with the people."

The Bishop urged his millionaire congregation to examine their consciences and find out if they were really any better than the Reverend Jere Knode Cooke.

"Search deep down in your hearts," he cried, "go down to their springs and see if there is not something hidden there which you could not let into the free light and air and not lose your self-respect. Let us take the occasion of this tragedy to make this search. Openness is the final test of all virtue.

"Ask yourself if there is anything dark or crooked in your business.

"Say to your conscience, is there any cruelty or sensuality in my home life? Have I any unkind feelings or hatred for my neighbors? Have I contracted any moral debts I can never pay?

"Am I leading a double life? No one has the right to put a question to any man. He can only ask his conscience, and if that conscience answers any of these questions in the affirmative cut off the sin. Cut it off if it costs you a limb. Better blindness, better to go through life limbless than go down to hell, with sin upon you.

"Now, have you been true to your church? The church has never known such a day as the present. She has never been assailed so bitterly before, with infidelity on one hand and immorality on the other.

"Dark and fearful is the arraignment that can be made of society—the society which you spell with a big S."—American Examiner.

Mothers' Home Column

June Reading for Daughters of Zion.

THE POWER OF EXAMPLE IN THE HOME.

Sermon by Elbert A. Smith, on the occasion of the Daughters of Zion meeting, at Lamoni, Iowa, April 10, 1907.

(Reported by Belle Robinson James.)

The subject assigned me to-night is the power of example in the home; and I find in 2 Kings 20: 15, a text that is well suited to the subject: "What have they seen in thine house?"

The subject that has been given me is one that appeals to me. It is simple and plain; yet it is imminent and important. I never could see the advantage of mounting on wings of oratory and flying away after some abstract ideal when there were so many every-day problems right at our door that were demanding a common-sense elucidation.

The language of my text was used on an occasion when delegates were sent from Babylon to visit King Hezekiah, and Hezekiah, instead of showing them the peculiar treasures that had been confined to the care of the Israelites, took them into his house and showed them his treasures of gold and silver and precious stones. Then the prophet of God came to him and said, "What have they seen in thine house?"

This text may be used to illustrate the thought that those not familiar with our faith come into our homes and it is our duty that they see there some evidences of the peculiar treasures that have been confided to our care; and instead, sometimes, we try to show them the very same treasures that the world has in greater abundance than we can ever hope to possess.

But to-night I wish to limit my attention to the thought that it applies to those in our immediate household; and that if our example is a subject of consideration by outsiders (who always would rather see what a man does than hear what he says), how much more important it is as affecting those under our own immediate care, our children, those who, unlike the world, have no other ideals with which to contrast our ideals. They look at what we do with unformed judgments, and our influence, therefore, is of greater weight with them than it is with any one else.

Example is always a greater teacher than precept, and there is no place in the world where example is more weighty than at home; consequently in the home we have the best field for the exercise of the best method of teaching. Man finds in his own home a supreme opportunity as a teacher.

Now I believe that in every line of activity a few facts are of more value than many theories; and I presume that in the training of children and in the building of homes we shall find no exception to that rule. In fact those of us who have children to train dare not publicly announce very many theories of child-training, lest some presumptuous individual from over the line somewhere shall say, "Show us a concrete example of the value of your theories in the person of your own child"; and we all know how prone the average boy is to do at the most inopportune times that which will ruin the reputation of his father as a promulgator of theories of child-training. Most of us, as fathers and mothers, or children, are in the experimental stage, and not until the end shall the experiment be determined, and then "he that endures to the end shall be saved."

We have not many model fathers and mothers; we have not many model children, unless we shall accept the definition of the word model that I noticed in the Philistine for April. It was stated there that a certain lady had been congratulated that she was possessed of a model husband. She felt greatly pleased with that congratulation until in an evil hour it occurred to her that she should look up the definition of the word model and find out what a model husband was, and there she read: "Model,—A small imitation of the genuine article."

We do not want many model fathers and mothers nor many model children, if this is the definition that we shall accept—we want the real fathers and mothers and the real children.

There is a commandment in the scriptures that is as follows: "Honor thy father and thy mother." This has been taught very frequently, and sometimes we have neglected to add the further thought that the father and mother, if they would be honored, must be honorable, and that they can not command honor unless they shall live honorably. There is that in the heart of the average child that is prone to honor father and mother, to set them up on a pinnacle. The average little boy when he goes out on the street tells all his companions, "My papa can whip your papa—My papa knows more than your papa," and he has him on a pinnacle.

For some reason unknown to me, I was denied a father's care, and no one knows what that means unless he has experienced it; but I always had this satisfaction, that though the immediate presence of my father was denied me, there was nothing in his life and nothing in his character that did not permit me to set him on a pinnacle higher than I ever accorded to any other living man; and I believe that it is in the average child that he would rather cherish the ideal of his father and see him in his grave than to see him dishonored.

Now we hear a great deal about the parable of the prodigal son, and it is a powerful and concise illustration from life; but I wish that we had somewhere a parable of the prodigal father and the prodigal mother equally forceful and concise. We have preached this parable of the prodigal son to the rising generation and have neglected to teach the duty of the older ones. In some of the reform schools where from Sunday to Sunday representatives of various denominations come and take their turns in preaching, they have taught the parable of the prodigal son until when the inmates see a preacher coming, they say, "There comes another prodigal son."

Now I believe that if we would command honor, we must be honorable; if we would command obedience we must be obedient to higher law; and in the type of Abraham and his son as they went up upon the mountain to make the sacrifice is seen the type of obedience in the home. We are told that they went "both together,"—the father obedient to God, and the son obedient to the father. And I believe that in the history of that nation we have a wonderful example as to the means by which we shall command obedience.

We go back to the days of Abraham and we find that his son was so obedient that although capable of making a resistance, he permitted himself to be bound and placed upon the altar of sacrifice. Why? Because God says something like this: "I know that Abraham will hearken to my voice and he will command his children after him." He will first listen to my voice and then he will command his children after him. We go a little farther down and we come to the case of David. Do we find his son obedient? No, because David himself was disobedient to God. And I believe that though one was a shepherd dwelling in a tent and the other a king on his throne, we would rather be the shepherd than to be the king on the throne and have the rebel for a son.

It has been suggested that we should emphasize at least three things that may properly be taught by example; that is, that we can teach a proper conversation in the home, a proper observation of the Sabbath day, and a proper courtesy on the part of our children. Now I think that I have laid the foundation for the thought that we can not expect our children to be proper in their conversation unless we ourselves set the example; that we can not expect them to observe the Sabbath day—we can not expect them to be courteous unless we ourselves enforce our teachings by our example.

I remember not many days ago hearing one of the elders telling about the first time he ever heard his little boy swear. The little boy, possibly three or four years old, came into the room and swore, and the father at this evidence of the first contact of his little child with contamination, was so overcome that he wept. In due time he succeeded in breaking that child of that habit, but do you suppose that he ever could have broken the child if he himself had set the example of using improper language? That child would have been in the position of one young man with whom I am personally acquainted, who when he entered this church gave up the habit of drinking. The father, seeking to excuse himself, said to the boy, "I always did teach you not to drink." The boy replied, "You did not; you told me it was wrong, but you yourself drank, and while you thought you were teaching me by word, your example was the teacher that I followed."

This philosophy, that something is good for the father that is bad for the son, or permissible to the mother that is harmful to the daughter, is a philosophy that may appeal to those who are seeking to hide behind an excuse, but it is not the philosophy that appeals to the child. It does not influence him. It does not have the sanction of his intelligence.

We can not compel courtesy. There is only one way in which courtesy can obtain and that is when it is the outward flower of an inward feeling of love or kindness and affection. It is true that we may train our child to smile and bow and be like the Frenchman who will smile and bow and listen attentively, the while he is despising you, or perhaps hating you; but there is only one true courtesy, and that comes from the indwelling spirit of gentleness, nobility, and kindness in the heart; and we can not make our children or any one else courteous unless we shall, by example and precept, get that spirit into them.

I am told that there were two lawyers who were constantly quarrelling before the bar, and their wrangling reached such a stage upon one occasion that one of them knocked the other one down; and standing over his prostrate form, he said, "I will compel you to be a gentleman"; the other, prone but unconquered, answered, "You can not do it. I defy you." We can not make men gentlemen unless it is in them—we can not force these qualities on any one, and least of all, let me tell you, can we force them on a little child that comes to us with all the independence of spirit that has never been crushed out by the yoke of bondage.

Now I say that there is only one successful way in which we can hope to influence our children for right, and God help us, using that as best we can, even then the chances are that inherited evils or the encroachments of the adversary will crush and destroy the very one on whom we have lavished our hearts' affections and the strength of our lives.

I believe the average man, if he see a little child, a little boy or girl, drowning, would risk his own life to save that child; yet it is a peculiar condition of the human mind that sometimes the very individual who would do that, seeing that little boy or girl in safety, will teach them those things that will bring a ruin that is ten times worse than though the child died the way we first named.

With the Master, human language was an instrument of precision, and from his lips there came wonderful promises; from the same lips there came those predictions of the terrible disasters that would come upon those who were disobedient. And he, recognizing that every man must yield to the judgment that shall be passed upon him for the example that he has set before those who are innocent, declared that that man who shall offend one of those little ones that believe on him, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck and that he were cast into the depths of the sea.

I have heard it stated in another way by a certain divine who declared that no boy goes to hell except he take some man with him. That man is the man who has taught him or else by neglect permitted him to be taught the way that took him there.

There are various dreams that come into the life of the average individual; various aspirations, from the time when he first begins to look into the future. The little boy is planning what he will do when he becomes a man. The young man goes out and his heart is drawn to the one who is fair above all others. And later, dreams come to the father who watches his little boy as he goes about his play; or to the mother who looks upon the form of her little daughter as she rocks it in the cradle, there come those dreams that displace personal ambition, and they are higher in that they center all their affection upon another and they ask absolutely nothing in return; it is a free gift. Then we begin to plan for the future of our boy; we want him to be manly. We begin to plan for the future of our girl; we want her to be womanly. But let me tell you, that there is no father (however much he may desire his dreams to come true) who has the right in the sight of God to ask that those dreams shall ever be fulfilled unless he is willing to set before that son the example that he wishes him to make the pattern of his life. There is no mother who has the right to ask God to grant her dreams to come true unless she is willing to set in her home the example that she wishes that her daughter might make the pattern of her life.

You know that it is said that we shall learn from babes and children; and possibly the central thought of the address that I am attempting to make to-night is one that I have learned from my own boy. A few days ago, while I was going about my work outdoors, the little boy was following me around wherever I went and asking questions. One question after another was asked as I moved to and fro, and I answered them until I became slightly impatient. I turned and looked at him, and he immediately, wishing to make terms, said, "Papa, if you will tell me everything that I don't know, I will tell you everything that you don't know." And from him I got the central thought of this discourse. Because on a certain occasion, when I sat in my chair reading in the house, he came past and with a stick he struck me across the face without provocation; evidently it was one of those impulses that seize children and can not be explained. He never did such a thing before or since. It was so unexpected that I was taken by surprise and without thought I reached forth and gave him a slap on the head that disturbed his equilibrium. He drew back in surprise and astonishment. I was glad that he was surprised. I think that no individual has occasion to regret giving a just punishment, and it ought to be administered when needed; but I believe that when we give to those little ones a blow, an unjust punishment, that we ought to go to God and ask forgiveness for it; and I was glad that he was surprised, because if he shall live I do not wish him to remember many of those circumstances, and if he shall die, God grant that I shall not have to remember many of them. You know that sometimes we bury those who are near and dear to us; but we can not bury the regrets that live after they have gone.

I say that he drew back in surprise, and immediately, as parents will who are in the wrong, I began to apologize in a shamefaced way, and I said, "Come, let us reason together," he replied, not in an impertinent way, but rather in an injured tone, "You better reason with yourself."

That should be a rule in all our work; we must first reason with ourselves.

Now before I close, let me give a little plea for the home. I believe that the home ought to be the place of love, and that love ought to be the mainspring to actuate every move. I believe that love is the light of every life. You know the poet has said:

"The night has a thousand eyes,
The day but one;
Yet the light of the whole day dies
At the setting of the sun.

"The mind has a thousand eyes,
The heart but one,
Yet the light of the whole life dies,
When love is done."

I like Webster's definition of the home, the third definition that he gives. He says that the home is the "abiding-place of the affections." You know that we heard it explained here to-day that Lamoni may be the chief place of business of the church—minus the business. Now some people regard the home as an abiding-place of the affections—minus the affections. They want to designate it as the chief place of the affections, but lavish ten times as much affection somewhere else where they may incorporate.

I believe that the home, so far as the affections of the family are concerned, ought to be the headquarters of the family; it ought to be the chief abiding-place of the affections, and be recognized by God and man as such.

I thank you for your attention.

Under Another Flag.

Editors Herald: From the unique city of Denver, at the very foot of the fairy Rockies, in view (from my chair) of the snow-capped peaks, far from my Zion-home, and farther still from my native field, once more I address you after a few more months have stolen away, leaving behind them the many changes of fortune and misfortune. Indeed it is a change to be here—a new country, a new climate, and heading for a new people. Formerly it was from "over the border" that we communed with you; soon it will be, it seems, from "over the mountains." For in two or three days we take our departure, via Colorado Springs, for the famous city of Salt Lake, our definite field assignment yet to be made.

In the latter part of March we took our departure from what had become quite a battle-ground to us, the city of Saskatoon. Calling and preaching at Winnipeg, and previously at Denholm, enroute, we made our way to General Conference, via St. Paul and Des Moines, staying over night at the latter place, through failure in connection, with the friendly family of Elder J. F. Mintun. At Winnipeg we had a very pleasant renewal of association with the dear brethren, and with Elder Dorsett who was occupying there as a missionary. The Saints expected that I would return, but I must say for some reason I bade them good-bye with contrary expectations. And the present situation confirms my expectations. I hope that God is in it, that I am where I am as a result of his unmistakable and unerring interposition. I do hope that he has moved upon the authorities who have the field assigning to conduct and to attend to.

Henceforth I shall not speak encouragingly of the Saints going to the Canadian northwest. Neither have I for some time past. And when I shall speak of that land I shall put out the rough side as well as the smooth. There is only one place to which we are authorized to encourage the Saints to gather—Zion. The plan is a divine one, the order is from heaven. Saints directed otherwise are liable to be misdirected, and he who lends his energies to any other cause, in any other direction, is defeating the purpose of this great latter-day work. He is diverting the children of the kingdom from the obtaining and the maintenance of their inheritances. It may be said that there are great financial and speculative opportunities up there. Very well, but will there ever be a time when there will not be booms and opportunities for money-making somewhere? And shall we wait till the last opening, the last chance, is exhausted before we begin to encourage the Saints to heed the invariable admonition of the Master all the way from New York State, from the inceptive stages of the church, to Independence, Missouri? "But," some one says, "we are not to gather in haste." Who said we should? If we are not to gather in haste, neither are we to retard the gathering.

Only last night a brother was telling me that not long ago he passed through the Southern Missouri region, and he says there is an abundance of land there very suitable to fruit-raising that can be purchased for from two dollars to five dollars an acre. That is all I know about it. The brother is in a position to know, and I have no reason to doubt his statement. He thinks it is a grand opportunity for the Saints to go in there and plant orchards and establish canning-factories. In any case, in any move, my counsel to the Saints is to consult those whom God has installed in office for that purpose.

Following General Conference, which proved to be very educational, we went home to Kansas City, where many good hearts and loved ones were in waiting. While there we baptized five, solemnized our first marriage ceremony in Uncle Sam's dominion, administered to many, preached several times, and, ere departure for our field, moved to 1037 West Maple Avenue, Independence, Missouri, our present address.

Leaving home on the 10th instant for our remote field we had a brief but very enjoyable stop-over at Omaha, by invitation, subsisting heartily at the home of Elder Schaffer and companion, where we were made welcome and happy. By the courtesy of Elder Rannie, missionary to the north, our inviter-in-chief, we saw the modernized buildings, rode the cars, visited the park, eased his table, had a good time. Here in Denver we repose in the comfortable up-stairs room of Elder Everett, whose wife refuses to give me a quarter if I put her name in the paper, so I will leave it out. We have visited the State capitol here, and also the mint. From the tower of the former we descried the far-famed Pike's Peak, lifting its white and haughty crest into the heavens, so that it is visible some eighty or ninety miles away. In the same building we saw among the collection of exhibits in the museum department, quite a number of the Gadianton robbers, some entirely or partially wrapped in feather cloth, some as sheer skeletons. As we looked upon them we thought of their deeds of plunder, their acts of violence, their thefts and disturbances, of their dishonest livelihood, of the distresses, losses, and privations they put their brethren to from time to time, especially when the latter forgot their God and became lifted up in the pride of their hearts. They sustained to the Nephites a similar relationship to what the Philistines in ancient Canaan sustained to Israel.

We visited the mint to-day, and when we looked upon the bushels of silver passing through its various stages, from melting and molding into bars to coining and stamping, we could not help but think that it was the greatest "money-making enterprise" we had ever seen. And so it goes.

Having no prescience of what the year will bring forth we begin to wonder deeply what the harvest will be. I am resigned to be faithful, to try hard to do all I can, and hope and pray for the success of others. Good feeling and true love to all my brethren in my old field and my old country.

Pray for me, will you, whom I have helped.

Editors Herald: I am happy to say that I am a living witness of the blessings of this glorious work. Although I have many faults, and my steps have slipped many times, I somehow regain my footing and make a stronger resolution to strive on to perfection. I am weak and have many trials, but God has said he would have a tried people, so if I must endure my trials to prove my faith in Him who does all things well I am willing to bear my burdens. God's will be done, not mine. It may be also that I may help to bear the trials and burdens of others. May God help us all, especially those that are as weak as I, to struggle on along the road to perfection and eternal bliss. Oh, let us all live so that others may see our good works and be led to glorify God. May each of us cast in our mite and not be found idle in this glorious cause. Let us cast our bread upon the waters. Let us try to lead the sinner on the road to heaven. Remember if we help to save one from the wild to-day our reward is great. Dear Saints, I do know that it pays us to live the life of a true saint. God's ways are worth finding out, and if we obey him with a sincere heart and contrite spirit he will bless us.

I must tell you of a testimony that will go with me to my grave: This is the testimony that led me to be a Latter Day Saint for which I can truly say I thank my God. When I was a child twelve years old, my mother and two brothers were taken down sick with the measles and came very near dying. My father was hardly able to be up at the time and his faith for a time wavered; he said to me, "My poor child, what shall we do? What can I do if you are taken sick too?" I told him to fear not, that God was going to take care of us and that I was not going to get sick. He sent for the elders, Brn. Darman and Brancin Louis, and they administered to all the sick ones and the fever left them immediately. My father felt better before they had quit praying, and my mother requested them to administer to me. They did so and they said that I would never take the measles. I never have taken them yet. I am thankful that God saw fit to heal us through the administration of his disciples, and I sincerely pray God to bless Brn. Darman and Brancin in every good undertaking. If we do not enjoy God's blessings, it is because we do not live for them.

Dear Saints, let us go on in the good work

"With a heart for any fate;
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait."

God will guide us safely till the tempest passes by.

Editors Herald: For the benefit of the brethren who anticipate coming to the exposition, will say the prices for rooms and board are the highest I ever saw. Prices for beds run from one dollar to three dollars per night. Furnished rooms are from five dollars to ten dollars a week for one person. I am here with my gasoline lamps and bed-spring machine and expect to stay during the exposition, so if any of the Saints coming here will let me know I will help the best I can by way of information. The buildings at the grounds are not one third finished yet, and some will not be until the first of July. The naval display, though, is a grand sight; there are over fifty war-vessels here now. Norfolk is beautifully situated and is bound to make a coming large city, having now about seventy-five thousand people. Work is plenty and carpenters are getting four dollars and a half now for eight hours. Plasterers get from five to seven dollars a day.

Editors Herald: I write, thinking that some of the Saints would like to hear from this place, as I have not seen anything in your columns from here. I have belonged to the church for nearly seventeen years, and I thank God that I ever heard the restored gospel. The desire of my heart is to obtain more of the Spirit of Christ, and gain wisdom and knowledge.

We have our trials in life; but we have the promise that Christ will always be with us, even to the end of the world. I have been sick for the last two years and two months, not able to help my family; but through it all I have tried to be patient. I ask the prayers of the Saints that I may be healed and have health and strength, if it be the will of my heavenly Father.

I feel like repeating these verses:

"Jesus, Savior of the world,
Friend and brother true,
May I thy gentle Spirit have
All my journey through.

"Without thy help I can not bear
My puny earthly cross;
But by thy help I boldly dare,
And count this world but dross."

Editor Herald: Kindly state to the readers of the HERALD, that owing to the sickness of my wife, I was obliged to curtail my visit in the States, and consequently cancel the appointments which I had made to visit several places and preach. I hope the Saints will excuse me, as under the circumstances I could do nothing else but return to my home having been absent since January 16.

On behalf of Bro. Leggott and myself we offer to the Saints who have so kindly ministered to our necessity and those who extended to us invitations to visit our sincere thanks, both of us having deeply appreciated the many manifestations of hospitality and kindness which have been exhibited in every place we were privileged to visit. We are now traveling on the Pennsylvania Railroad toward the city of New York, and there we expect to meet with Bro. Newton, and, all being well, we sail on Saturday morning at 6 o'clock for Liverpool, per the steamship Umbria.

Praying that God will abundantly prosper the cause of Zion,
Yours sincerely

News From Branches

SEATTLE, WASHINGTON.

Since February 14, the date of last writing, two promising young men, Mark F. Hinton and L. F. Beaty, were baptized by the writer.

Sr. Bertha Emslie, who was so near death's silent portals while visiting her former home in Des Moines, Iowa, has returned and once more resumes her place in the aid society, Prayer Union, and as secretary of the Sunday-school. Her bright and happy countenance and her words of faith and cheer are an inspiration.

Others to arrive of late are Sr. (Mother) Wheeler, of Chicago; Bro. Cushman; Sr. Alice E. Garrett, of Independence; Bro. and Sr. W. A. Inslee, of South Boardman, Michigan, and their family.

Sr. Clark and her husband are always found at Religio, Sunday-school, church, and prayer-meeting. He is not yet a member of the church. Here is an object-lesson; a man among men. What a vast difference from many, many other so-called men, both in and out of the church. The grouch, who is conspicuous by his eternal absence, and who kicks at every effort his faithful companion puts forth to live according to her covenant with God—the ax of God's unerring judgment will surely follow this biped.

But we have lost a few workers, also. We sent Sr. Blanche Henderson as a delegate to the General Conference and there is no prospect of her immediate return, as our former young missionary, tall and manly, has persuaded her to change her name to Mrs. Leonard G. Holloway. Just before her trip east, an ice-cream social was held in her honor at the home of Sr. D. W. Davis, where many presents, in the form of a linen shower, were proof of the high esteem in which she is held. We wish them God-speed and hope the Saints will accept these credentials wherever her lot may be cast, for here is a heroine (see Matthew 19: 29), walking deliberately in the way of truth in the face of bitter opposition.

We regret having to lose most of our old missionaries. May God bless them in their new fields of labor, and in your prayers do not forget the little branch of Seattle. The new missionaries we welcome, and are ready to work with them.

Bro. William Johnson, the worthy yet humble district president, passed through on his way home in Nanaimo, British Columbia, from General Conference. We congratulate ourselves and our brother that the Lord has honored him to the office of high priest.

A peculiar incident, worthy of mention, happened when the Prayer Union could agree on no day but May 2 to visit Sr. Hester Sykes, who lives one mile in the timber, north of the car line of Ballard; six of them went and found it was her seventy-first birthday. It is these little visits that encourage the feeble and lonely. Go and do likewise and you will be blessed.

Bro. A. B. McCulloch passed away on Sunday, May 5, in a hospital at Tacoma, and was buried the 12th in Everett, his home. Elder F. W. Holman preached the funeral-sermon. The writer spoke in Tacoma that day, while Elder D. W. Davis held forth in Seattle.

At our semi-annual election, April 3, all the officers were reelected.

The new directory gives Seattle 241,550 population; 120 churches and church societies; 1,200 manufacturing establishments; 5 daily newspapers, and 60 weekly and monthly periodicals.

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

Good interest has been manifest at all services during the past month. The preaching-services have been indeed strengthening and elevating. The calm and peaceful influence of the Spirit was felt at the prayer-services. Our sacrament-service was much enjoyed by all who were in attendance.

Bro. John Zahnd, our Sunday-school superintendent, having, with his wife, left the city on account of business affairs, leaves the school in charge of the assistant, Bro. J. J. Billinsky, who has been conducting the school in a creditable manner.

Religio work is progressing nicely.

The little babe of Bro. and Sr. Voitz of Cheltenham was taken to the paradise of God this month, being ill only a few hours.

The visitors with us this month were Bro. Jordon of Kansas City, and Bro. and Sr. Welch of Troy, Missouri.

E. M. PATTERSON.

Convention Minutes.

SOUTH SEA ISLANDS.—The representatives of the different Sunday-schools in these islands met in convention April 5, 1907, at Tarona. Tapu superintendent, with Sr. Burton as assistant, presiding. After organization was effected, reports were read from the superintendent telling of the work done by him during the year, then from Sr. Burton mentioning that this was the eighth time she had met with them in Sunday-school convention. She commended them for keeping alive the Sunday-school work in spite of the disadvantages under which they had labored, in the loss of books, division of schools, and other discouragements, occasioned by the tidal wave, during her absence in America. She informed them of the new lesson-books ready for distribution, and of the mimeograph, the gift of the General Sunday-school Association in America to them; also offered several suggestions for the improvement of the Sunday-school during the coming year. One was that steps be taken to procure more Bibles for use in the local schools; another was that they appoint a superintendent over each of the two divisions of this mission, to look after the interests of the Sunday-school. She also urged them to make this a banner year in the Sunday-school work. Reports were read from several schools, but owing to the fact that many schools did not report, and the books of others were lost in the storm, nothing like a complete statistical report can be had at this time. The resolution to appoint a superintendent over the two divisions of the mission was adopted by vote. Bro. Lake was appointed for the division of Fakarava, and Tane for Tahiti. A vote of thanks was extended to the General Association in America for the mimeograph. Election of officers resulted in the choice of Marere for superintendent, Sr. Burton as first assistant, Sr. Lake as second assistant, Taaroa as secretary, Sr. Lake as secretary to America. The afternoon session was given up to the Oaqa or "Rejoicing." This is the time of times during the convention, the business-session is of slight importance in comparison. The Saints both young and old have been preparing for this occasion for a long time, both in wearing apparel, and in learning their parts, so it was a gay crowd that filled the house at 1 o'clock, several white people and native outsiders being among the number. One particularly bright spot was the sisters of the Tarona Branch; twenty-seven of them had bright red dresses on, with white and red hats. The exercises consisted of singing and scripture-reciting. At the close the children gave their offering, amounting to $8.90 Chili money ($4.05). Convention adjourned to meet again April 5, 1908, at Tarona, Tahiti. Alberta Lake, secretary.

The Bishopric.

NOTICE OF APPOINTMENT OF BISHOP'S AGENT.

Northwestern Nebraska and Black Hills. The Saints and friends of the Northwestern Nebraska and Black Hills District will please take notice that by reason of the change of fields of labor of Bro. R. O. Self, appointment has been duly made of Bro. R. O. Mengel, Belmont, Nebraska, as Bishop's agent for the above named territory. It is earnestly hoped that the Saints and friends of Northwestern Nebraska and Black Hills District will remember and assist the agent in his work so that if he is unable to travel over the large field over which he is agent that each one may communicate with him at his address at Belmont.

Special thanks of the Bishopric are also tendered Bro. R. O. Self for his faithful services as Bishop's agent in this territory in the past.

Trusting that the Lord may bless and guide and direct Bro. Mengel, the agent, and also each member and friend of the cause, I am, in behalf of the Bishopric, INDEPENDENCE, Missouri, May 21, 1907.

Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, District. The Saints and friends of the Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, District please take notice that after correspondence with Brn. O. J. Tary and L. D. Ullom touching change of agents for this district the matter of any change for the present has been deferred. Bro L. D. Ullom will continue as agent of the Pittsburg District. Please notice his address, 4014 Woodland Street, Wheeling, West Virginia. At the present time the business and circumstances of Bro. O. J. Tary are such that he can not give time and attention to this work. We trust the Saints will continue to aid and sustain Bro. L. D. Ullom in his faithful work as agent as in the past. As soon as it is practicable one of the members of the general Bishopric will visit the district and travel among the branches assisting as best we can the agent.

Trusting the Lord will bless and guide those who labor and patiently wait, I am, in behalf of the Bishopric,

Very respectfully yours,

Pastoral.

To the Saints in Nebraska and South Dakota, West of the Missouri River; Greeting: Having been placed in charge of the missionary work in the above named territory, I address you these few lines. Altogether there are ten missionaries to labor in this vast territory, and that the greatest amount of good may accrue to the work, it demands that we labor together in love, and try with all our mind and strength to assist in whatever way we can to help the missionary plant the banner of the gospel of salvation permanently, that the efforts made may not be in vain; for it is an easy matter to say to the missionary, Come, preach in our town or neighborhood; but another thing sometimes to see that the missionary is given the proper assistance and encouragement to stay right by the work thus begun, and thereby make his efforts a permanent establishment of the church there.

And I would say to the missionaries, Try to concentrate your work as much as possible in those places where the liberty is given in the presentation of the word. You may be assured Christ has a people there. So continue the efforts in such places, and do not try to cover too much of the field; for it is both a loss of time and expensive, and generally means a great loss to the work, so far as permanent growth is concerned. And another thing: Where two brethren may be traveling together, and may have effected an opening, and one of the two seems to be given much the better audience, and the people seem to understand that certain brother's manner of presenting the gospel so much better, I should advise that all due respect be shown the people and their preference, and the brother thus favored stay right by the people; for the other brother may move on to another place, and there he may find the tables turned, and he be preferred above any one else.

And in respect to assisting the work financially, dear Saints, remember the Lord said, many years ago, that "this is a day of the tithing of my people." And we urge that you remember the sanitarium, especially, in your giving; for such an institution is needed so badly in the church.

In gospel bonds,

J. R. SUTTON.

To the Saints of St. Louis and Southeastern Illinois Districts: Greeting: As I see by the HERALD I am placed in charge of the above-named districts, I shall not only need the cooperation of the missionary force, but of all the Saints as well. I would like to hear from all scattered Saints who desire to have preaching in their neighborhoods. With the help of Saints many new openings may be made. See to it that you give the missionaries all the assistance you can, for they need your help in many ways; and I hope to hear of all the local ministers doing all they can. Sometimes local ministers can obtain an opening where others not acquainted could not. Let all labor together unitedly. All local ministers should report their labors to district president, and he report all sermons and baptisms to me each quarter, so that those in charge may obtain as complete a report as possible of the work done.

I am glad to note we have able missionaries as collaborators and as soon as practicable desire the permanent address of each; and as I am not acquainted with the needs of the Southeastern Illinois District, I shall have to depend upon the missionaries and local brethren for help in this regard.

My mission address will be, care of W. C. Carl Planing Mill Co., East St. Louis, Illinois. HENRY SPARLING.
SPRINGFIELD, Missouri, May 15, 1907.

Dear Brethren and Saints of Western Iowa District, Over Which I Have Been Appointed Again by Brn. W. H. Kelley and Heman C. Smith: The year's work is before us, and I trust we may unitedly labor for the advancement of the cause of Christ, as we all have our duties to perform; and as we shall labor together, we can expect to be blessed of the Lord.

To those who are appointed as missionaries I wish to say, Please be prompt in reporting to me by the 1st of July, October, January, and March. Last year some of the reports for March were two or three weeks late. These reports are required to reach our missionary in charge by the 10th of the above named months. Brethren, please do not forget the request, as it is my duty as well as yours. May the good Lord bless us.

My address will be Lamoni, Iowa. Any one who wishes to write may reach me there. Yours in the work,
EAGLE GROVE, Iowa, May 20, 1907. ELI HAYER.

Died.

NEILL.—David Neill was born November 1, 1845, in Down, Patrick County, Ireland. He came to America in 1873. Was married to Miss Rosa Rising, February 14, 1884. Of them were born five sons and three daughters. He was baptized by Alvin Knisley June 19, 1904. Died May 1, 1907, of cancer of the bowels. He leaves his wife, five sons, three daughters, and two brothers to mourn his sudden death. Funeral-services in charge of E. E. Williamson, assisted by W. J. Fisher.

TURNER.—Elder James Turner at Deloit, Iowa, May 13, 1907, after four days' illness. He was born in Scotland County, Missouri, October 9, 1840, and served in the Civil War. He united with the church February 10, 1877. He leaves wife and seven children to mourn their loss. He was president of the Deloit Branch at the time of his death, and was faithfully filling that position, being much interested in the young people, and making a special effort in their behalf. J. M. Baker of Sioux City, Iowa, preached the funeral discourse.

JARVIS.—Carolyn B. Jarvis, the oldest daughter of Harry E. and Cecilia A. Jarvis, was born in Burlington, Iowa, August 19, 1878, and died in Chicago May 2, 1907, aged 28 years, 8 months, and 13 days. Carolyn graduated from the Burlington high school in 1899, and the following fall entered the State University at Iowa City, from which she graduated in 1903, standing among the highest in her class. The following fall she became a member of the faculty of Graceland College, where she remained until the death of her mother, in March, 1904. She became a member of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints at an early age; and the experiences of her school life served only to confirm her in her faith. At one time Carolyn sustained a severe injury by reason of a fall from a hammock, the rope giving away; but, unfortunately, the gravity of the injury was not understood at the time. This, in connection with too close application to her studies, affected her health; and during the latter part of her first year at the State University, she had a severe attack of nervous prostration, necessitating taking her out of school for the remainder of the term; and she was taken to Chicago for an operation which it was supposed would relieve her. She improved considerably; and it was thought safe for her to continue her studies the following fall, with the injunction to be very careful not to exceed her strength. But she was an enthusiastic and ambitious student, and had always striven to do everything well; and she overworked, so that, when she graduated, the condition of her health was quite precarious. However, with careful attention, she improved so that she was able to follow her desire to become a teacher; and up to the death of her mother, she gave promise of gradually becoming reasonably well in health. But that shock intensified her physical ailments, so that her health was soon very seriously impaired. She complained of almost intolerable pains in her body and head. The physicians who were consulted, and who were made acquainted with her condition, did not, unfortunately, correctly diagnose the case, and, notwithstanding her statements, they said that she was practically in fair health, and that her troubles were all imaginary. This began to prey upon her mind, and caused her to feel very despondent, and hopeless of recovery. This condition of suffering continued for over two years. About two months ago, she was taken to Chicago and examined by two osteopaths, one of them a very skillful surgeon; and they at once informed the family that her trouble was a physical one, and that a comparatively simple surgical operation would in all probability restore her to health. This operation, after a brief period of general treatment, was held on Saturday, April 27, and by Sunday morning she was completely herself in every way. The awful pains in her head and body which had been torturing her for so long had left her, and she thenceforward had to endure only the comparatively slight pain from the operation. She made speedy progress towards recovery, and was practically over the effects of the operation itself by Thursday morning, and everything was most hopeful. But the intense nervous strain to which she had been subjected for nearly three years had so exhausted her vitality that on Thursday morning she suffered a nervous collapse, and died at thirty-five minutes after three that afternoon. From the time she became conscious after the operation until within a few hours of her death, the days were happy ones to her. Her father and sister were permitted to be with her almost constantly, and all rejoiced together in the return of the bright cheerfulness that was so characteristic of her disposition. Being relieved from the torturing pain, and having the assurance that, if she lived, she would probably be well, she planned, with all her natural animation, to take up again the work and the enjoyment of life, and with stronger purpose than ever to seek to make herself useful in the world. "I'm going to work in earnest," she said. "It will be in a very quiet way. I shall not say much about it—not so much as I used to—but I'll work—and be so glad of the chance." She said: "I think I shall teach"—but she added, "if I live." It was not God's will that she should live and she was called to labor in a higher realm. The funeral-services occurred May 8, Elder Elbert A. Smith preaching the discourse.

The June Housekeeper.

All the world loves a wedding, to paraphrase, and the Housekeeper for June is full of all sorts of hints for that most important occasion. "Phyllis, her golden wedding" is a delightful poem by John Kendrick Bangs; "On the training of a husband," by Emily Ruth Calvin, ought to be read by both man and maid as the secrets are applicable for both; and there are special hints for the wedding breakfast by Mary Foster Snider and for the wedding dinner by Elizabeth W. Morrison. In fiction the number is particularly strong. "The gift," by J. J. Bell, the author of Wee MacGregor, is a story above the average. "In the sweet of the year," by L. M. Montgomery, is a delightful love story of the old-fashioned kind. A rollicking Irish story is "The curse of King O'Brien," by Arthur Upson. "Duff Daggett, street Arab," by Owen Kildare is continued. The many helpful departments are not neglected and include in the list, home cookery, household hints, architectural suggestions, entertaining, fashions, floriculture, and the children's departments. The Housekeeper Corporation, Minneapolis, Minnesota. Sixty cents a year.

Marriage as We Make It.

Sometimes it would seem as if marriages that are not made for love hold better than those which are; since the mutual expectations are less, so also are the disappointments.

People must change; but if they can not change together, if the love they had when they were young does not mellow into a habit of warm affection as they grow older, then at least let them consider first their obligations to one another, and bring all the pity, all the forbearance, all the kindness possible to the contemplation of their compact before they break it. If it were so worth while—worth anything—then, is it worth nothing now? Is there not something to be built on a foundation that promised happiness?

Since people can not in general be induced to think long before they enter the married state, they might at least be brought up to make the best of it afterward. Boys and girls might easily be educated more than they are now with the view of making them better husbands and wives, better householders and housekeepers, better fathers and mothers, better comrades to one another. Then, if love struck them like a bolt from the blue, they would still be able to go about their businesses with some faint idea of what those businesses were going to be, and, if they had made mistakes, to bear the consequence of those mistakes just as long as there was dignity in endurance—and perhaps a little longer. —Caroline Duer, in the Delineator for June.

The Movable Feast of Easter.

Just why Easter Sunday is a movable date is an often asked question. It is answered in The Housekeeper for April. Easter Sunday is the great movable feast of the church year. When it is fixed the other movable dates of the church readily fall into place. Easter can not happen earlier than March 22 nor later than April 25, but between these extremes it has a range of thirty-five days on which to occur. To explain how this range was given I would first remind my readers of what, of course, every one knows, i. e., that Easter Sunday is observed to commemorate the raising of Christ from the dead. When this commemorative practice began, about the close of the first century after Christ died, the records showing the exact dates of crucifixion and resurrection had been lost, but it was known that the Savior was crucified during Passover week. The Christians of the Asiatic churches, therefore, kept the fourteenth of the month Nisan, the day on which the Jewish Passover began, as the resurrection day, but the Western churches more accurately kept the anniversary on the Sunday following the first Passover day. The difference in custom caused a most bitter controversy between the Eastern and Western churches, which was at last settled in 325 A. D. by a decision of the Church Council at Nice. This declared that Easter Sunday should be observed on the first Sunday after the full moon occurring on or next after the 21st of March. Should this full moon fall on a Sunday, the Sunday after is Easter Sunday. This arrangement was adopted because March 21 is very near the date of the vernal equinox, and a tradition existed that this equinox had occurred immediately before the crucifixion. It is not possible to state the exact frequency with which this date falls in March. It occurs thus fifteen times within the first half of the twentieth century. It may be noted that this day falls on its extreme dates, March 22 and April 25, only at very long intervals. In 1886 Easter fell upon its latest date which has not occurred before in the nineteenth century, and will not occur again until 1943. The last time Easter fell upon its earliest date was in 1818, and this did not happen again during the nineteenth century, and will not happen at all during the twentieth. Turning back over the record of a thousand years we find Easter has occurred on its latest date once in every century with one exception, that is, in 1734, 1666, 1546, 1451, 1204, 1109, 1014, and 919. Its earliest date has fallen in 1761, 1693, 1598, 1573, 1478, 1383, 1136, 1041, and 946, the thirteenth century being passed over this time instead of the fourteenth. These facts are difficult to keep in mind, but are very curious.

The Marital Unrest.

In the time of our great-grandmothers and grandmothers nobody thought of dissolving the marriage tie. A woman's career was marriage, and having once embarked upon it she never considered going back.

But in these days debate is rampant, and so many persons have "considered going back" that one wonders what slight reciprocal affection induced them ever to advance at all. Probably it was not affection, but attraction, which depends upon outward and visible signs rather than inward and spiritual graces, and can cause the most unlikely and unblendable characters to find each other irresistibly charming. And while they are finding each other charming, marriage is so easy! Since the beginning of the world, admonition and advice have done very little toward the curbing of passion, and obstacles have only served to excite it.

And it is not too much to say that most young people, if left to form their own characters, with little in the way of responsibility forced upon them and a great deal in the way of comfort and pleasure at their right hand, will form rather self-indulgent characters, which, rushing rapturously into matrimony, as it were into the seventh heaven, are exceedingly chagrined to find how much self-denial is demanded of them when they get there. Nobody has explained to them what marriage, and the companionship of it, really means, nor what a fund of tact and tenderness, forbearance, good-will, and gentle judgment one must have to tide over the hard places that come, at times, to even the most loving couples.—Caroline Duer, in the June Delineator.

Sea Moss Jelly.

Wash two ounces of the moss which can be purchased at the druggist's, and then soak it in one pint of water; when soft, strain through a cheese-cloth bag and add to the clear liquid one half pint of orange juice and one-fourth pint of lemon juice; stir in enough sugar to suit the taste as some like this jelly tart and others sweet. Pour the liquid in egg cups, filling only two-thirds full, and then place in a cool closet until it stiffens. Serve in the cups and place a spoonful of whipped cream, colored green, on top of each cup.—Housekeeper, March, 1907.

Ginger Cookies.

One pint of molasses, one pint of lard, one teacupful of sugar previously rolled, two eggs, two tablespoonfuls of ginger, one tablespoonful of soda dissolved in two tablespoonfuls of vinegar. Use sufficient sifted flour to make a stiff dough. Bake in a hot oven.—Housekeeper, March, 1907.

Meat Substitutes.

DRIED BEAN ROAST.

Soak one and a half cupfuls of navy beans in warm water for twelve hours, pour off the water, cover with fresh, to which a pinch of baking soda has been added. Boil fifteen minutes. Drain. Cover again with water; add two slices of onion, salt, and cook until perfectly tender. Rub through a sieve; thicken with a little crisp toasted bread that has been run through the meat chopper, season with pepper, one teaspoonful of thyme, shape into a loaf and bake twenty minutes. Serve with the roast, tomato or mushroom sauce. If preferred the bean mixture may be made into small cakes and fried.

A vegetable stock may be made from beans. Soak as usual. To one large cupful of navy beans add three slices of turnip, two carrots, two sticks of celery, eight peppercorns, a bay leaf, salt and two cloves. If a brown stock is desired, toss the beans in butter until well browned. Strain and before serving add a little catsup.

For bean slices the beans when cooked tender may be drained and pressed through a sieve. Then pack in a baking-powder can. Slice and serve with a French dressing. Lima beans are also delicious cooked thoroughly, chilled, and served with a simple dressing or tossed in butter and served hot.

BLACK BEAN SOUP.

Soak one pint of black beans all night. In the morning drain and pour over two quarts of water. When nearly done, add four cloves, four allspice berries, one-quarter of a finger of stick cinnamon, one half teaspoonful of celery seed, one tablespoonful each of carrot and turnip chopped fine. When tender rub through a colander, then through a sieve. Thicken and serve with sliced lemon and sliced hard boiled eggs.—Clara Cochrane Cody, in Housekeeper, for March, 1907.

Jam Combinations.

Prunes and oranges make a good combination for jam. Get the large sized prunes if possible, wash them thoroughly in both hot and cold water, then cut from the pit. Put the fruit through a meat chopper. To each cupful of chopped prunes take a cupful of cut orange. Put in a grated rind of one half of the orange used, then peel and cut them in small pieces. Good California prunes will sweeten themselves, but with the oranges they will require some sugar. A large tablespoonful of sugar to each cupful of orange will be sufficient if the oranges are fairly sweet ones. To two cupfuls of prunes add one half cupful of water. Stir all well together and stand on the back of the range in a tightly covered kettle or crock. Do not let it get too hot, but it may remain at a simmering heat half a day or longer with frequent stirrings and mashings, when it will be ready to pack in the jars.

Another combination which finds favor is prunes with rhubarb. Use freshly stewed rhubarb in the same proportion as the orange but with the addition of more sugar. If you are so fortunate as to have the crimson winter rhubarb in your market, the season will be prolonged and it will give you a delicious jam.—Housekeeper, March, 1907.

Life hath quicksands,—life hath snares!—Longfellow.

The Rise of the Hobo.

To most of us, doubtless, the word "hobo" is a derisive term for wandering vagabond. But your true "hobo" boasts that it is to such as he that we owe our network of railroads and the garnering of our harvests. A wanderer he admits himself to be; but he says that the object of his wandering is neither loots nor alms, but work. And now he is organizing to demand recognition as a useful and abused member of society. The nucleus of this organization has been established through the disinterested efforts of J. Eads How, grandson of the engineer James B. Eads, who is distinguished as the builder of the Eads bridge across the Mississippi. Several years ago the press of the country told of Mr. How's opinion that his inherited fortune was tainted because unearned, and of his determination, therefore, to turn it over to social uses. Since that time he has become a sympathetic fellow among the "hoboes"—one of them and not a patron over them,—and has labored incessantly at building up in the larger cities what seems destined to become a continental chain of clubs or headquarters where the "hobo" may apply for work, where he may find temporary assistance necessary to save him from vagrancy when opportunities for work are not readily obtained, and where employers may look for emergent help. Mr. How's first venture is in his home city of St. Louis. Here he has established a club for the purpose of bringing together "the unorganized workers in St. Louis and other centers," in order "to utilize unused land and employ idle labor, to cooperate for mutual benefit, to work with persons and organizations who desire to better social conditions, to furnish medical and legal aid to the unfortunate, to educate the public mind to the right collective ownership in production and distribution," and "to bring about a higher intellectual, moral, and spiritual development of the masses." Plans are already on foot to establish a similar club in Chicago in connection with the one in St. Louis.—The Public, April 13, 1907.

The President's Views on the Small Family.

There are countries which, and people in all countries who, need to be warned against a rabbit-like indifference to consequences in raising families. The ordinary American whether of the old native stock or the self-respecting son or daughter of immigrants, needs no such warning. He or she needs to have impressed upon his or her mind the vital lesson that all schemes about having "doctors in public schools," about kindergartens, civic associations, women's clubs, and training families up in this way or that are preposterous nonsense if there are to be no families to train; and that it is a simple mathematical proposition that, where the average family that has children at all has only three, the race at once diminishes in numbers, and if the tendency is not checked will vanish completely,—in other words, there will be race suicide. Not only the healthiest, but the highest, relations in life are those of the man and the woman united on a basis of full and mutually respecting partnership and wise companionship in loving and permanent wedlock. If, through no fault of theirs, they have no children they are entitled to our deepest sympathy. If they refuse to have children sufficient in number to mean that the race goes forward and not back, if they refuse to bring them up healthy in body and mind, then they are criminals.—From "A letter from President Roosevelt on race suicide," in the American Monthly Review of Reviews for May.

Marine Ices.

Whip three egg whites to a stiff dry froth. Make a syrup of half a cupful of sugar and one fourth cupful of water, letting it boil until a little dropped in cold water can be rolled into a ball; then pour this hot syrup onto the egg whites, beating constantly until the mixture is cool; then add a teaspoonful of vanilla flavoring to which add a few drops of orange extract and a few drops of green vegetable coloring. Then add the whip from one pint of cream and freeze as for ice cream.—Housekeeper, March, 1907.

Ginger Snaps.

One egg, one cupful of sugar, one cupful of molasses, one tablespoonful of ground ginger, one tablespoonful of vinegar, one teaspoonful of soda. Dissolve soda in vinegar. Use sufficient flour to roll, and bake in a quick oven.—Housekeeper, March, 1907.

MAN'S SOCIAL NATURE.

For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself.—Romans 14: 7.

Man is by nature social. He is, as the naturalist would say, a "gregarious animal"; though possibly some gregarious animals would object to being classed with some men.

One of the most severe punishments that can be devised is solitary confinement. One who voluntarily isolates himself and becomes a hermit is a living curiosity and usually such an individual is mentally deranged or morally perverted.

So strong is this desire for comradeship that if one be born like Helen Keller, deaf, dumb, and blind, he will still find some way to break through the triple wall and communicate with his fellows. Though man may sink to such a low plane of savagery that his home is a cave and his weapon a club he will still be found surrounded by his tribe or community. It is neither good, safe, nor natural for him to live alone.

One does not "get into society"; he is born into society, and it is absolutely impossible for him to so live his life that it will not affect others.

Sometimes we use the term society in a very limited sense. We speak about society, and "getting into society" as though society were some particular group of men and women; and at times in the popular phraseology we limit the number of individuals in that group to the "four hundred." We even refer to that group as the "best society," which is a severe reflection upon all those outside that limited circle and a still more severe reflection upon our own judgment.

The idea seems to be that when a man is removed far enough from the taint of honest toil, when he possesses a mansion, an evening dress suit, a valet, a butler, and a coachman, when he can sue and be sued for divorce, then he is in society and may be considered a society leader; though he may be on a lower plane morally than the individual who dwelt in a cave and carried a big stick.

We know of no "good" society that is not composed of good men and women. Society is everywhere and every one is in society; and the "best society" is composed of the best men and women, whether they be rich or poor, in large cities or in small communities.

There is pleasure in the intercourse of kindred spirits, and that pleasure appeals first to individuals as the great object to be attained in every social function. In fact many people never cherish any other aim in society than the pursuit of pleasure. But as the individual progresses he begins to realize that certain duties devolve upon him; that pleasure is mingled with duty. Yes, even in the world there are many who realize that it is their duty to so live that society shall be better because they have lived in it. These individuals are referred to in the word of God as "the honorable men of the earth." If such men realize their responsibility, how much more should it be realized by church-members, who have received instruction, and who are supposed to prepare themselves for a place in the best society of all time, the general assembly of the First Born, gathered out of every generation and every nation.

God recognizes man's social proclivities and arranges for their development in the church. While it is our duty to pray alone, that does not suffice—we are commanded to forsake not "the assembling of ourselves together." The prayer-meeting is referred to as the "social" meeting because there is a commingling of kindred spirits; and man meets not only man but God as well.

"Blest be the tie that binds
Our hearts in Christian love;
The fellowship of kindred minds
Is like to that above."

Even at the preaching-meeting a little opportunity is afforded for social intercourse of another, yet necessary type. This is more especially true of the smaller branches where every member is familiar with every other member. The buzz of conversation before and after the service may annoy some; but there is another side to the question: these few Saints are far scattered and possibly this is almost their only opportunity to get together and visit as brothers and sisters. They have fought the fight alone in the world for a week and now they are for a few brief moments united with their comrades. So long as this conversation does not become boisterous it seems preferable to oppressive silence, cold stares, distant bows, and the rustle of silks that are swept aside to avoid contact with common fabrics.

In the smaller gatherings where it is possible it is a good custom for every one to shake hands with every one else present at least once on Sunday; and let this include nonmembers, whoever else may be overlooked.

One elder relates one particular occasion while he was pastor of a little congregation; a sister came to him after most of the congregation had departed and said, "My husband has been waiting an hour to shake hands with you and he won't go until he does shake hands." He was not a member of the church, and he was far from being religiously inclined, yet he had come to value that habitual handshake. The first hold obtained on him was a hold on his hand; and it was not a bad hold either, because eventually through it he was led into the waters of baptism.

Other opportunities for social intercourse are afforded by the Religio and Sunday-school sessions; and where it is possible for the Saints to get together oftener, at socials, parties, or picnics. The Saints should so conduct themselves that at any of these gatherings their influence may be one of peace and good, not of strife or jealousy. "Peace be to this house" was the benediction that the disciples left when departing from any home, yet too often now individuals in departing leave some "bone of contention" to be gnawed on after the other refreshments are digested and forgotten.

In our homes too there is an opportunity to entertain and come into pleasant contact with others. But here let us define one duty that is placed upon us by divine law. The Master says, "When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, neither thy kinsmen, nor thy rich members; . . . but when thou makest a feast call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind."—Luke 14:12, 13. We preach the literal interpretation of the word; but do we often obey this very plain and literal commandment? God wants us to break down the social lines erected by wealth or favoritism, and in line with this commandment touching our duty in the home is that one touching our duty in the church, that we shall not discriminate between the man who is clad in rags and the man who wears a robe and has a ring on his finger.

It is the duty of Saints to be thoughtful, considerate, and courteous, with the true courtesy that springs from a refined spirit and is far above its counterfeit which may be learned in any school of manners.

In fact we come now to the greatest social duty of the individual. Though we lay considerable stress on the duty of doing, and properly so, there is a still higher duty, and that is the duty of being. What a man does depends upon what he is. We are told that Zion is the pure in heart. The Saints are to be identified primarily by what they are and secondarily by what they do, though of course the judgment of men is directed primarily toward the latter, until the individual is possessed of the spirit of discernment and like God is able to look at men and see them as they are. So Christ lays stress upon that change which must come in character and declares that a man must be born again. He must become pure and then his deeds will be pure.

If a man will be an upright, honest, clean, religious member of society, all his other social duties will be properly looked after.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

ELDER KNISLEY INTERVIEWED.

The Salt Lake Tribune for May 28 contains an interview with Elder Alvin Knisley, newly arrived in that field, that we presume will be of interest to HERALD readers. Elder Knisley is quoted as follows:

"Our people are strenuous in repudiation of the title of Mormon as a name for our church or for us as a people," said the Reverend Mr. Knisley. "Origin is one of the points of divergence," continued he. "The church was organized in 1830; in 1844 Joseph Smith, whom we all look back to as the prophet, was assassinated. The Doctrine and Covenants, or revelations contained in them made provision for the appointment by Mr. Smith of his successor in the event of his being taken away. We hold that the appointment or designation had been made and that the one designated or blessed for that office was the eldest son, whose name also is Joseph Smith, and who now resides at Independence, Missouri, to which place our people repaired in the early thirties, from where they were expelled by mob violence in 1833.

"At the time of the death of Joseph Smith, Brigham Young was president of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles; was shrewd, aggressive, bold, if not audacious. Taking advantage of his prestige, power and rare talents, he assumed the leadership, and, by a percentage of the original number, was thus indorsed and took his following in the latter forties to the valleys of the Great Salt Lake. But a few years later some of the original members who refused to affiliate with Young and his coadjutors began to take steps in the direction of reorganization, and rallied around the old standard under which the main body subsisted from 1830 to 1844. In 1860 the church became more permanently organized by the acceptance of Joseph Smith, commonly called young Joseph, of the church presidency, who was duly installed therein by ordination. The growth from that time to this has been gradual. We now have about 50,000 members, and publish nine church papers.

"The matters of polygamy, Adam-God worship, and blood atonement, characteristics of the Utah Mormon church, which most decidedly differentiate it from our church, are, after all, only incidental to the main issue, which is preëminently the question of succession. Who succeeded Joseph Smith, the martyr; Brigham Young, or the martyr's son? Had the Mormon church here never distinguished itself by any such accretions as aforesaid we would, nevertheless, feel under obligations to repudiate it, doing so on the grounds of authority. For, although they may have maintained the doctrine and organization of the original church intact, we would view their administration equally inefficient because of deficiency in authority. The church of Jesus Christ, in order to be acceptable to him, must be right as to its power as well as to its form. The form of the Utah church without power, even though beyond complaint, would be no better off than the hundreds of human forms that have no resemblance to the genuine pattern.

"We have always held ourselves ready to canvass these issues; we are ready now when the opportunity offers to open the columns of our official paper to their investigation, if the same articles may be allowed space in the Deseret News.

"We regard the Utah Mormon church as having made changes beyond what we have enumerated in the temple services and in organization. Their temples are inaccessible to the outside world; ours are not. They build temples without specific command or revelation; we do not. We hold that for erection of every such edifice, there must be a specific direction from the Almighty. The endowments we regard as an extraordinary bestowment of the Holy Ghost and of power, and that secret oaths and covenants and the peculiar undergarmenting of ourselves in anyway in relation thereto are altogether foreign to that feature of the original church. Other changes in organization I will not take time to comment on.

"There is a marked difference between their Doctrines and Covenants and the one we use. The last purported revelation in theirs was given by Brigham Young in 1847, prior to their setting out across the plains. Our book contains a series of documentary revelations given from 1861 all the way up to one year ago. There is one thing evident in this connection; that if the head of the Reorganized Church is the recipient of such manifestations on behalf of our people he must be the legitimate successor of his father, and the church he represents must be the continuation of the original to the exclusion of every other. If he is not the recipient of any such revelations as he has given to the church, then he is guilty as far as blasphemy is concerned, of all that has been charged upon his father. An association with him could not fail to make any one incredulous of the latter conclusion—that his revelations are concocted merely to deceive.

"It will not do for the Utah church to represent that the occasion for the manifestation has ceased to exist, because we have the three standard books, or because all pertaining to the building up of the church and the kingdom of God was given through Joseph Smith, the Seer. Such a conclusion is most illogical and fallacious and has a more cogent refutation than may be found in the philosophic reasoning on the subject by Orson Pratt in his works, no longer published by Mormons. Many of the revelations given through the martyred Seer are exceedingly circumstantial in their nature, and it is easily conceivable how circumstances may arise again to evoke these divine manifestations.

APOSTASY ROBS UTAH CHURCH.

"The facts of the case are, apostasy has deprived this Western church of the spirit of revelation, has robbed it of the gifts, blessings and powers resident in the early church, and now in the reorganization. Finding themselves destitute of these things they have been exhausting their ingenuity to account for the changes and to explain the cessations. Like the apostates from the primitive church established in the days of Jesus finding themselves destitute of what their forefathers enjoyed, and which perhaps they had enjoyed, they concluded that they had become so advanced, so con-veniened in the possession and command of the many revelations that had been given, that those things no longer were needed. Hence they have been acting upon their own finite power and judgment.

"Probably the majority of them are honest. We have for them no unkindness, no epithets, and intend no unnecessary harshness. We come to call them back to the old paths; we want them to swell our ranks; to receive the ordinances by authority."

Mr. Knisley told of a visit he made to a Mormon lady at Melfort, in the Province of Saskatchewan, Canada, under the misapprehension that she was a member of his church. After it transpired that each was mistaken in the other's religion, Mr. Knisley asked the lady if her husband was a Mormon. "No, he don't like Brigham Young and polygamy," was her reply.

Following the direct quotation from Elder Knisley, the Tribune makes the following statements regarding the work of Elder E. C. Briggs:

Mr. Knisley is associated here for a time with Elder E. C. Briggs, who was in the Quorum of the Twelve for many years and is now a patriarch. Elder Briggs at one time was practically the only missionary the Reorganized Church had here. He crossed the plains to Salt Lake in 1863 and propagated a successful campaign among the Mormon people, and has had a prominent connection with the Reorganization, the history of which can not be written without the use of his name. His physical vigor is not impaired to any great extent at the age of seventy-two years.

Elder Briggs called on Brigham Young in person in the early days here, requesting permission to occupy one of the places of worship here. He was peremptorily told by Young: "Wherever I have any influence not a door shall be opened to you, and I do not want any of your preaching here. You shall not have a meal of victuals in this territory only as a beggar wherever I have any influence."—Salt Lake Tribune, May 28, 1907.

GENERAL CHURCH ITEMS.

Elder E. Ingham writes from Honolulu as follows:

"I have recently completed another tract for the Asiatics, the manuscript of which Bro. Waller has forwarded to President Joseph Smith. I hope we shall be able to interest these people in our work.

"Health conditions are bad here at present. The dreaded bubonic plague is again asserting itself to the consternation of the health authorities who thought that it was under control. If it becomes epidemic here business will be seriously affected and great hardship ensue to many. We shall endeavor to 'stand in holy places and be not moved.'

"The contract to build our church-building was recently awarded, and ground was yesterday broken on the lot on which it is to be constructed. The completion of this structure will mark an important event in the history of our work here, as we have struggled along a good many years in rented halls. The privilege of conducting services under our own church roof will be indeed appreciated by the Saints here."

Elder T. W. Chatburn writes that there will not be many "jots by the wayside" for some time. He has purchased a typewriter and is learning to use it. He says, "Last night I went up and brought the critter home; and I am now trying to write my first letter on it. I could write a dozen letters with my pen while I have been pounding this animal, or at least while I have been hunting the keys."

The Editors look on with approving sympathy. They love to see the typewriter habit grow. As the era of good penmanship sinks into oblivion the rise of the typewriter comes as a happy boon to editors, compositors, proof-readers, and other "dear friends" and "kind readers."

CURRENT EVENTS, SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS.

Mrs. William McKinley, widow of the late President McKinley, passed to her reward May 26. The devotion of President McKinley to his invalid wife was a touching and beautiful characteristic of his life; lonely has been her waiting since his departure.

If the report of the Salt Lake Tribune be correct, President Joseph F. Smith, of the Utah church, recently delivered a rather novel funeral discourse. It was on the occasion of the funeral of Mrs. George E. Woolley, of Forest Dale. Flowers were sent in abundance and the speaker complained that the money should have been spent otherwise. Songs were sung and he complained that they were not church hymns. He recounted the number of his own wives and children and advised the bereaved husband to search out another helpmeet.

The following clipping is of interest:

The national amity between the United States and Great Britain continues to increase, and corroborative of the expanding sentiment is an incident which will shortly be observed in a pretty exchange between the "First Lady in the Land," now living in the White House, and the Queen of England. Emulating Betsy Ross, of Revolution memory, who made the first flag of the United States of America, Mrs. Roosevelt, wife of the President, complying with a request made by Edward W. Matthews, formerly a chaplain in the British Navy, has promised to furnish an American flag to drape the bust of Admiral Lord Nelson to be presented to the Naval Academy by direction of King Edward. On the other hand, Queen Alexandra will make with her own hands a British flag to be used upon the same occasion and in connection with the American flag.

Of course there is nothing extraordinary in this act between the two leading women of the new and old worlds, but at the same time there is a decidedly friendly and altogether assuring intent accompanying it, and one that will have its effect for good among the people of the greatest countries on the globe. There is urgent necessity for the observance of every possible official and individual courtesy between them, and not a single sound argument against it.—Deseret News, April 23, 1907.

The Straight Road

REPENTANCE.

ELDER J. A. TANNER.

Bro. Tanner was born March 22, 1866, in St. Louis, Missouri. He was baptized at Lucas, Iowa, October 5, 1879. His ministerial work began when he was ordained a priest May 22, 1892. He was ordained to the office of elder November 12, 1893, to the office of high priest June 17, 1900, and became a member of the Standing High Council of the church, April 14, 1903.

One prophecy connected with his life's work is worthy of note. When he was blessed as a child, Elder William Giddens, of St. Louis, who officiated, prophesied concerning him that he should live and should yet preach the gospel in St. Louis. He is to-day located as pastor in that city.

The scriptures teach that Christ came to save the world, and that he presented a means called the gospel composed of fundamental principles (see Hebrews 6:1, 2). The apostle Paul, in Romans 1:16, says of the gospel, "It is the power of God unto salvation." Then any one of the principles of the gospel is a part of the whole power to save, hence there is power in the principle of repentance, as it is included in the scriptures cited. That it is a Bible doctrine and was taught in New Testament times, is proved by the following scriptures:

John did baptize in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins.—Mark 1:4.

Now after that John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, and saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye, and believe the gospel.—Mark 1:14, 15.

Then Peter said unto them, Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost.—Acts 2:38.

Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord.—Acts 3:19.

Repent therefore of this thy wickedness, and pray God, if perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee.—Acts 8:22.

What is repentance? A fleeing from evil, ceasing to do wrong, turning face about and walking away from evil. Note the following: "Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil."—Isaiah 1:16.

It is also a manifestation of sorrowfulness, not of feeling sorry merely because some one knows one has sinned, but of sorrow because it is wrong to sin, and therefore displeases God. One would be a worldly repentance; the other a godly repentance.

Note the following from Paul in 2 Corinthians 7:9, 10:

Now I rejoice, not that ye were made sorry, but that ye sorrowed to repentance: for ye were made sorry after a godly manner, that ye might receive damage by us in nothing. For godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of, but the sorrow of the world worketh death.

Repentance is a restitution, or righting the wrong done so far as lies in the power of the individual so to do. If one should lie, steal, do violence to his neighbor, defraud, deceive, bear false witness, or be guilty of any of the sins catalogued in the scriptures, he should repent and manifest it by making restitution. Read carefully the instruction given to Moses, in Leviticus 6:1-6; also see Luke 19:8.

Repentance worketh reformation. See the result in the case of Saul who persecuted the saints (see Acts 9:20, 21); note the result of those converted on Pentecost day (see Acts 2:37-47).

What are the blessings of repentance?

1. Joy. Doing right by righting the wrong not only brings joy to the repentant individual, but "there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth." (Jesus in Luke 15:10.)

2. Happiness. Does not the knowledge of doing the right thing, ceasing to do evil, making restitution, bring one happiness? Would not the fact of one having caused joy in the presence of the angels of God make him happy? We think so.

Then a principle of the doctrine of Christ that will do what is set forth herein must have wonderful power in it. Hence we repeat: "Repent and believe the gospel" (Jesus), "and work out a godly repentance unto salvation" (Paul).

CRITICISM OF THE REVEREND MR. HAUPT VERSUS
"JOSEPH SMITH DEFENDED."—NO. 3.

ELDER J. W. PETERSON.

"Elder Haupt's education and training as a minister of the established church of England has been along the line of 'Apostolic Succession,' while ours has been to the contrary. We are glad therefore to meet in open conflict. Here must and doubtless will be the final conflict of churches. We agree with our opponent that it is the real point of controversy, not only between the Catholic and Latter Day Saint Churches, but between all churches."

The reader will have noticed in previous HERALDS that Reverend Haupt in his reply to my position in Joseph Smith Defended passed over the first one hundred pages and made his attack mostly on my replies to certain answers to objections against present revelation. Another line of argument by which Mr. Haupt proposes to destroy the supposed errors of the Latter Day Saints is his effort to prove that his church has continued its existence since Christ, and thus leave no room for a restoration. His effort in that direction is legitimate, but he does not stick to his text very well, and his arguments are insufficient.

In my book I touched but slightly on the subject of the apostasy of the primitive church, but that little was sufficient to attract his special attention. His education and training as a minister in the established church of England has been along the line of "Apostolic Succession," while ours has been to the contrary. We are glad therefore to meet in open conflict. Here must and doubtless will be the final conflict of churches. We agree with our opponent that it is the real point of controversy, not only between the Catholic and the Latter Day Saint Churches, but between all churches. If the authority has existed in the world since the days of the first apostles, then the Latter Day Saints are void of that authority. If there has been a departure from the truth, then all classes of Catholics (so called) are cut off and the way is clear for a restoration of that truth again from heaven. If the Latter Day Saints have that truth, and the authority to administer it, as I fully demonstrated in my book, then all others must seek for it where it exists.

It is not surprising that the stated position of the Latter Day Saints on the restoration of the gospel should call forth a reply from either branch of the Catholic Church, striking as it does, and justly too, at the very heart of their institutions.

REPLY TO MR. HAUPT'S "INTRODUCTION."

Mr. Haupt says, "It is not the intention of the present writer to say anything about the moral character of Joseph Smith and his followers." It will be well for the reader to keep this point in view, as we will have occasion to call attention to his failure again and again and show that Mr. Haupt did not carry out his good desires. A similar expression to be remembered closely follows the above where he says: "We hope no anger will be aroused as we shall endeavor to 'speak the truth in love.'" We regret that Mr. Haupt departed so sadly from his intention and descended from his high plane to refer to Joseph Smith as a "false prophet," "a minister of Satan," and exhibiting the "works of the flesh," including "adultery and fornication," and to the writer as "dishonest" and "a deceiver." Of this we will have more to say as we approach those expressions further along. In nearly every paragraph of his introduction he begs the point he is yet to prove, and one he utterly fails in, when he does attempt it. Such expressions as the above in the very introduction of his tract to cater to public prejudice and turn his readers against the Latter Day Saints and their literature do not manifest any great amount of fairness. Why the need of thus prejudicing the minds of his readers? Why not give them a fair and unprejudiced hearing? Is he afraid to do that? It would seem so. He knows very well that he can not prove the charges he makes against Joseph Smith, and so he must throw some dust in the air before he begins to operate. His introduction is at the wrong end of his pamphlet; it should have been his conclusions, and then we could have examined the proofs upon which they rested. In so doing he would not have prejudiced the minds of his readers. Every thrust and insinuation in his introduction is unkind and hence unchristian. They are untrue and unscriptural, and breathe the spirit of the false accuser.

The introduction is so out of harmony with the balance of his writings that it is hard to refrain from thinking that, after writing his tract, he was conscious of his failure and that consciousness begat a spirit of accusation which he could not refrain from exhibiting in his introduction. If he did not discern what spirit was leading him on to contradict himself, he should beware lest it lead him into more serious difficulty.

REPLY TO THE CONTROVERSY.

On page 3 of his former writing referring to the Brighamites, Josephites, and Hedrickites, Mr. Haupt says: "Which is the original church is a matter of debate among those who believe Joseph Smith was a prophet of God." What of it? Every time the matter has been discussed or tested, our position has been maintained. We could return the compliment by saying: "Which is the church in succession is a matter of dispute among the various Catholic churches themselves." Mr. Haupt, however, cuts the life-line of his own church when he says, "by its very nature as Christ's body, it has the power within to grow, to renew its strength and cast off disease and diseased members affected by parasites crept in unawares." According to that admission, Rome had the authority to sever his line of succession, which we shall show presently his church can only trace through Rome, however hard he may try to trace it elsewhere.

True some have gone out from us, but that only affects themselves; they must look to that. They have never as yet been able to establish their claims to succession, either by law, gospel, or gifts of the Spirit. The Hedrickites, as Mr. Haupt well knows, hold the Temple Lot merely by right of peaceable possession and not by succession. They lost completely on the latter point.

Passing over the first one hundred pages of my book Mr. Haupt begins his reply to certain ten objections to present revelation which I answered, not that he thinks any of the ten are Catholic objections as he says, but my replies seem to indicate "that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God and the Latter Day Saint Church a divine institution demanding our allegiance"; and as that strikes through his pet theory, and the heart of his own institution, he essays to reply, although what he writes is more in the nature of stating what he believes, than a reply to the doctrine of present revelation. As many texts that I used fatally weaken his doctrine of succession, he doubtless felt to redeem them if possible. Whether or not he has succeeded will appear as we proceed. We are ready to notice his supposed truth and let it strike the so-called error as vividly as possible. But after the flash and the roar, he will find the so-called error a Gibraltar, and his supposed truth a broken reed. If he did not think any of the ten objections I answered were Catholic ones, why did he not give us some that are? We are ready to answer any objection to present-day revelation from God which Mr. Haupt or others may offer.

On page 3 of his revised tract, after quoting from page 68 a part of a historic reference in my book on this point he says: "It would appear from the above and the claims of the Utah Mormons, that Brigham Young and Co., included the officials duly elected and qualified according to the laws of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints." What of it? It does not necessarily follow that men once in the truth and duly authorized to represent the truth can not forsake it and lose their authority. Brigham Young and Co. were authorized to do certain things, but they were not authorized to do certain other things diametrically opposed to the "laws of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints" and the gospel of our Lord. When, shortly after the death of Joseph Smith, as soon as the leading officials could get together, Elder Sidney Rigdon, the remaining one of the three presidents of the church, after consultation with proper authorities, called a conference to meet August 8, 1844, Brigham Young assumed full control of that conference, a thing repugnant to justice, common honor, and courtesy. If no other act of his life than this had occurred it would have proved him a transgressor of the law of the Latter Day Saints founded on justice and courtesy, but that was only the beginning of a long list of unchristian acts. Had Elder Rigdon maintained his position and in righteousness properly and meekly asserted his right till Joseph Smith's successor was properly installed, the writer would here claim that with him and his followers the true church could be found; but he, like Brigham Young, stepped out of his place, climbed up in "Moses' seat" without divine invitation, when at a conference held in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, April, 1845, he assumed to occupy as "president of the church made vacant by the death of Joseph Smith." Like Brigham Young and Co., Sidney Rigdon was "duly elected and qualified to do certain things," but not to act as president of the church.

At the conference of August 8, 1844, where Brigham Young assumed control, the following question was voted on: "All in favor of supporting the Twelve [only of whom Brigham Young was then president] in their calling signify it by the uplifted hands." The vote was unanimous.

April 27, 1845, Orson Hyde, one of the Twelve, stated in a public lecture that the original vote on this point was: "All in favor of supporting the Twelve in their calling." However sadly Mr. Hyde suffered himself to forsake the right, does not affect the truth of the matter. On the 15th of August, 1844, in an "Epistle of the Twelve," they made this statement in speaking of Joseph Smith: "Let no man presume for a moment that his place will be filled by another; for remember he stands in his own place and always will; and the Twelve Apostles of this dispensation stand in their place and always will." Shortly after this, September 2, John Taylor, editor of the church paper, changed the meaning of this vote to read, "that the Twelve should preside over the whole church," whereas the original motion said nothing about presiding. Acting on this false publication not only Brigham Young but the Twelve, or so many as would, about eight or nine of them, left the place to which they had been "duly elected and qualified" and climbed "up in Moses' seat."

On that memorable day of August 8, 1844, Brigham Young said: "So long as we remain as we are the heavenly head is in constant coöperation with us and if you go out of that course God will have nothing to do with you . . . no man can stand at our head except God reveals it from the heavens." In this matter Brigham stated the law and order of the church, notwithstanding he was within that hour a usurper pure and simple. But let us see how he kept the faith. On the 5th of December, 1847, at the house of Orson Hyde, a "grand council was held [from this event comes the name Council Bluffs], and Elder Hyde moved that Brigham Young be president of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints." Thus in two years and a half the man who said "no man can stand at the head except God reveals it from the heavens," suffered himself to be nominated by a man who had said the "Twelve should be supported in their calling," and that too in his own house. This nomination was supported by five others of the Twelve who were also pledged to the same thought, that the Twelve should "act in their own calling." Eighteen days after that an epistle was sent out from Winter Quarters, near where Omaha, Nebraska, now stands, written by Willard Richards, clerk of the Quorum of Twelve Apostles, in behalf of the quorum which contained these words: "And we now, having it in contemplation soon to reorganize the church according to the original pattern, with a first presidency," etc. Here is a public deception; for they had already claimed the First Presidency. The next day, December 24, a conference of one thousand members assembled and the action of choosing Brigham Young as president of the church was confirmed. Mr. Young did not have a majority vote of his own quorum unless he voted for himself, and only a thousand persons out of two hundred thousand indorsed it. In July following, these wanderers in the wilderness and wanderers from the "law" of the Church of Jesus Christ, after reorganizing, reached the Salt Lake Valley, and on the 6th of August seven of the Twelve were rebaptized, reconfirmed, and reordained by Brigham Young. The next day fifty-five others were rebaptized and reconfirmed. The next day, August 8, "the entire membership" were rebaptized and reconfirmed.

These are a few of the many steps taken by these men who once had been "duly elected and qualified according to the laws of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints," to administer its laws, but who so sadly misrepresented it. Five years later they indorsed polygamy and went from bad to worse, fulfilling 1 Timothy 4: 1-3: "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron; forbidding to marry [leaving out the words of the translators]; to abstain from meats," etc. If Mr. Haupt is no better acquainted with the first apostasy, as would seem to be the case, than he is with the one in the "latter times," he is to be excused for aiding in the continuation of that old apostasy, the Catholic Church. There seems to be a spot in his ecclesiastical vision so that when looking at former-day saintism or Latter Day Saintism he fails to see that law, truth, and justice must go hand in hand with divine authority to make it effectual unto salvation. As we shall presently show, the Episcopal Church, like the Utah Mormons, departed from the true faith. Like the Mormons, too, he has a most difficult task to trace his line of succession.

Continuing, Mr. Haupt says: "It might be claimed that if Joseph Smith was given the Melchisedec and Aaronic priesthoods, and apostolic and prophetic authority claimed for him, that this flight of Brighamites was the fulfillment of Revelation 12: 6-14." Many things "might be claimed," but I know of no one making such claim for this text. Mr. Haupt wrote me one time and inquired if the Utah Mormons applied this text to themselves and I answered I thought not. Mr. Haupt seems to indorse this view so we will call his attention to the seventeenth verse and see how it will apply: "And the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and love the testimony of Jesus Christ." If the Reorganization is that remnant, then Reverend Haupt is aiding the dragon in making war on us. But why is he so anxious to get rid of this text? His effort to misapply it shows his fears. The facts in the case are that it is one of the strongest texts in the scripture against his doctrine of apostolic succession. In that text the New Testament church is represented as a woman fleeing into a wilderness away from the face of the "dragon, that old serpent which is the devil" (verse 14). The expression, "from the face of the serpent," the very Reverend Doctor H. Alford, Doctor W. M. L. DeWette, Doctor Frederick Dusterdieck, and Doctor Henry Ewald, according to Eyre and Spotteswoode's Variorum edition of the Bible in London, make to read, "nourished away safe from the face of the serpent." There is no place in the world where the Devil may not go, and therefore the church was taken away from the world for "a time and times and a half a time." So away goes Mr. Haupt's theory of apostolic succession. No wonder he would like to saddle the text on the Mormons. "This interpretation is hard on the Christian world and the other branches of Latter Day Saintism," says Mr. Haupt. We fail to see how it is hard on the other branches of Latter Day Saintism when it would prove that they "keep the commandments of God and have the testimony of Jesus Christ." When the church went into the wilderness in the early centuries such remnants as existed in Britain in fifth and sixth centuries were attacked by the dragon and overcome by him. (See chapter 13, verses 5 and 6.) We will have more to say on this point, historically, later on.

Mr. Haupt next makes the following statement: "It might be interesting to know if the 'Reorganization,' the 'Hedrickites,' etc., had any officials, ordained by Joseph Smith, to the apostolic office, the Melchisedec and Aaronic priesthood, etc., or whether it was necessary for the angel of Revelation 14: 6 to 'restore' the second time 'the everlasting gospel,' etc." With Reverend Haupt, we, too, think it an interesting point and we answer, there were hundreds of such parties and many yet living, and we are gathering in the lost sheep each year. The Reorganization is the only faction that accepts the original members in full fellowship and officials at par. Among others that formed the Reorganization were a number of local branches that have kept their organizations intact and their membership inviolate. Above all was the promised seed appointed and designated by revelation to be his father's successor. He only of all leaders came in harmony with the law of the church, ancient and modern. Of the ancient rule we quote from Euse-bis' Ecclesiastical History, page 37: "The Lord imparted the gifts of knowledge to James the Just, [his nearest male relative] to John and Peter after his resurrection, these delivered it to the rest of the apostles and they to the seventy." Pages 31, 64, 75, and 82 show James the Lord's brother to be at the head. In the 15th of Acts James passes sentence on the apostles' disputed question. (See verses 13 and 19.) After James, succeeded Simeon the Lord's cousin, and this because Jesus and James died childless. Later we find when a persecution arose against the church the relatives of the Lord were first sought and questioned by the Emperor. Finding nothing against them they were released and Eusebius says: "Thus delivered they ruled the churches both as witnesses and relatives of the Lord."—Page 92. As late as 211 A. D. their presiding bishops, whom we call presidents now, were made such by relatives both to himself and others. The word of the Lord to Latter Day Saints, and one that Brigham Young and Co. flagrantly traduced, reads as follows: "The president of the church . . . is appointed by revelation . . . and it is his privilege to be assisted by two other presidents appointed after the same manner that he himself was appointed."—Doctrine and Covenants 99: 6. Again: "John . . . filled with the spirit of Elias; which John I have sent unto you my servants Joseph Smith, Jr., and Oliver Cowdery, to ordain you unto this first priesthood which you have received, that you might be called and ordained even as Aaron: and also as Elijah unto whom I have committed the keys of the powers of turning the hearts of the fathers to the children and the hearts of the children to the fathers, that the whole earth might not be smitten with a curse; and also with Joseph, and Jacob and Isaac and Abraham your fathers; by whom the promise remain."

Joseph and Oliver received the priesthood through the lineage of their fathers as they of old from father to son where one was worthy, otherwise to the nearest relative if worthy and in the faith. This is a most excellent rule to disarm usurpers and aspirants.

Again: "For this anointing have I put upon his [Joseph Smith's] head, that his blessing shall also be put upon the head [or first] of his posterity after him; and as I said unto Abraham, concerning the kindreds of the earth, even so I say unto my servant Joseph, In thee, and in thy seed, shall the kindred of the earth be blessed."—Doctrine and Covenants 107: 18.

No matter what the reader may think of present revelation, one thing is true, Brigham Young and Co. are apostates from the Latter Day Saint faith in both theory and practice. In the language of Reverend Haupt in his letter to me: "Let us have no foolishness but . . . well digested discussion." But to answer more fully the question as to how many of the officials of the old church came into the Reorganization, we quote from Judge Sherman in the Kirtland Temple suit. "After the departure of said fragment for Utah a large number of the officials and membership of the original church . . . reorganized, etc., . . . and was organized pursuant to the constitution, laws, and usages of said original church." Mr. Haupt's question as to what number went with what claimed to be the original church is immaterial. The fact to be ascertained is, What number kept the faith. His intimation that numbers count is a boomerang and comes back at him in the comparison of the Roman Catholic numbers and those of the Church of England.

NEGLECTED OPPORTUNITIES.

To-day is ours; to-morrow, with all its hopes, its sorrows, its joys, its opportunities, may not be ours. The present is filled with opportunities and can be used as we will; the past is otherwise. We can not say to a certain day that we now see was filled with occasions for well doing, "Come back, that I may make different use of the time allotted me." The past can not be recalled; the future may not come; the only time is now.

Yet as we think over this subject, we believe in a sense both the past and the future are ours. We will think of the future first. To-morrow is bound to come to us either here or in a different world, and is thus ours. What it will be depends upon the use we make of to-day. God gives us opportunities; we use or refuse them and are either the gainers or losers. The ones used may give to us strength, wisdom, knowledge, clearer vision of God's wonderful works, and thus establish a surer foundation for the building of to-morrow, whether it be here or in another sphere of life. If neglected, we do not know what our loss may be; but at some time there will come a realizing sense that there has been loss, and though we can not measure it, there will be on the other hand the thought that we can not measure the good that these neglected opportunities might have done for us if used wisely and well. We take with us into the future all that has become a part of ourselves, all that has formed such a part of our life that it has developed character in us.

God does not compel us to make use of the opportunities that are in our pathway. We must decide for ourselves, and thus modify them by whichever word we prefer: "used" or "neglected," and abide the results that follow a wise using or a sad neglecting. We find many times when it seems the right time, the right place for saying a word for the Master and doing good for others. Blessed be those persons who have the intuition telling them when is an opportune time for doing a certain work in the Master's cause, and then have the courage to do it.

While we have been thinking of the future and planning to make use of the present so that the future will be brighter, so that our lives will be stronger and nobler, we have left the past and have not given it its place. The past is as inseparably linked with the present as the present is with the future. Shall we lose sight of it then? By no means. The only thing is to be sure that we are looking at it with the right kind of glasses, not those that will distort our vision, not those that will magnify too much or make things too small. Be sure that we have them adjusted right, and it might be well to remember that "thy word shall be a lamp unto my feet, a light unto my pathway."

In looking at the past opportunities we will need to be wise, and where can we find wisdom except in that all-powerful source, the One of whom James says, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not."

The past is not ours to the extent that we can recall it and make use of its neglected opportunities; it is ours to the extent that we can recall it and let it teach us lessons of how to make use of the present. If we allow this retrospective to discourage us, we had better not go back to the past. If we can call up yesterday and by carefully examining it find the used and the unused opportunities, and let them both strengthen us for greater earnestness in our work to-day and give greater strength for the duties of to-morrow, it will pay us to adjust our glasses properly and then look carefully.

I determined the first of the year, not as a New Year's resolution but because it happened to come to me at that time, to try to see what lessons I could learn each day of this present year. I have been surprised that I did not see them before, for they have been scattered all along the way. One week especially I remember was so filled with them that I was actually surprised and asked myself the question, "How does this come? Have there been no lessons in life's great school for me during the last few weeks?" I began to investigate and I found there were. I had not seen them before. Perhaps I had not had the right kind of glasses on for by looking back I saw an opportunity here and there that had not become mine or a part of myself by using it. Neglected was the word written over many of the lessons. I have endeavored to write "Reclaimed and Used" to that extent that I have seen the opportunities, have seen the lessons and tried to make them be a helper for improving the present. They can never be fully reclaimed, but that fact will not need to discourage us but rather encourage us that the past opportunities could be linked with those of the present so that "neglected" will not appear so often in the future.

The opportunities that we use will be a help to us in working out our own salvation, and if we wish to work out our own, we will have to help others work out theirs. The ones that we neglect will not help us or any one else either; they are lost.

God helps those who help themselves, is as true as can be. We help ourselves by making use of the means God has given us. These means are the golden opportunities that meet us during all the days and years allotted to us here. If we use them he helps us to see more and more. If we neglect them we do not see them after a while, for our spiritual vision becomes distorted. Let me urge you all to use your opportunities; look for the lessons along life's pathway, and you may be led to exclaim, as one of old, "Whereas I was blind, now I see."

IS IT WISE TO DO IT?

CONCERNING THE SALE OF MINING STOCK.

Having the spiritual and temporal welfare of the Saints at heart I thought to suggest a word of warning relating to the purchasing of mining stock, knowing that quite a number have wasted their hard-earned savings by making such investments.

In the main this stock is gold, silver, or lead, and usually in the far-off Arizona, Mexico, Nevada, or some place where the purchaser knows but little of the real conditions, and often the one offering such stock knows little or nothing at all about the real value; and in some instances they are so wrought upon by the spirit of prospective, quick speculation they have had no hesitancy in making the most alluring statements of what seems to them a very direct route to a great reservoir of hidden wealth which can be had by just subscribing for a few dollars' worth of this stock.

Often the wonderful benefits that would accrue to you in that you could very soon be relieved from any embarrassment that had or was likely to overtake you, such as securing homes, the paying off of mortgages, helping to build up Zion, etc., is all very vividly placed before you; and while some, perhaps, have been fortunate in mining investments, the greater part never hear of their investments after made, unless it is by a circular letter telling what they are just about to do and that large dividends will soon be coming, but just now they are in need of a few more dollars which they ask you to furnish if possible, and at the earliest moment.

The promoters of these mining schemes, in the main, are men who care nothing for the interest of the poor. They control the business if it is worth controlling, draw large salaries, and thus the hard earnings of the laboring men and women are often swept away by the single stroke of the pen, or, if the property is of value, by the quick manipulation of stock so small holders are swallowed up.

Many of the stocks that are offered have no valuation at all and never had; merely the taking of a worthless mining claim, digging a shaft, and a company organizing to sell stock and agents appointed to go before the people with their flaming printed matter in which they give a high-sounding title to their mine, and all things being ready the company proceed to receive the people's money and it mattereth not whether it is from rich or poor, saint or sinner. We can take care of it; only let it come.

Now do not understand that we believe all mines to be worthless, as there are many good mines, but their stock is not generally for sale.

Neither do I say that all who offer for sale mining stocks are dishonest, but they are often so affected by the spirit of speculation that they are swallowed up in this alluring delusion and when unrest and dissatisfaction comes to their victims they are told that in time it will be all right and thus they endeavor to calm their fears.

On May 18 there was the greatest decline in mining stock that was ever known in one day, crushing out the small holders and the common people as though they were straws before a raging tempest.

I have had widows and hard-working people admit their mistake in wasting their meager earnings, but alas, too late.

Why not remember the word of the Lord as given through his servant in which we have been advised that "the spirit of speculation, the exhibition of greed for gain is unseemly in the Saints and officers of the church, and should be avoided. It has the appearance of evil"?

Will we heed the counsel?

We should not be dilatory or slack in our temporal affairs, but move along in the scope of legitimate channels.

Do not be deceived by being told that the Lord will open up the way for the redemption of Zion by buying mining stock of those that are entirely worldly and who own and control whatever worth there is in their enterprise and manage it for their own interests.

Oh, no, the temporal interests of the work will not be greatly enhanced that way, but rather hindered.

If all the money that has been invested in worthless mining stocks had been turned into the treasury of the Lord's house a considerable number of poor Saints could have been assisted in obtaining homes; the sanitarium and children's home could have been built, the Lord's work honored, and confidence strengthened.

Let us be children of the light by honoring the law of Christ, and thus avoid such snares and pitfalls which will redound to our hurt.

Your brother,
ELLIS SHORT.

A REMARKABLE EXPERIENCE.

PERRY, IOWA, May 22.—Not dead or dying as reported, but with clenched jaws, paralyzed tongue, and helpless limbs, and much of the time in a mysterious trance, Prudence Van Gilder, a pretty twenty-year-old music-teacher, lies in a white little room in her Perry home and tells in deaf and dumb signs of being transported to heaven. She has been unable to speak or to move more than her fingers since the 26th of April, when she fell unconscious on the floor of a branch mission conducted by Mrs. Scott M. Ladd of Des Moines, wife of the judge of the supreme court.

Miss Van Gilder, who has been coming twice a week to the city for lessons at the Enna Conservatory of Music, fell under the spell of the mission at Fifth and Monroe, but was not seized by any special "manifestations" until April 26, when her little nephew at Highland Park caught fire from some burning grass and was burned to death before her eyes. She was awake without rest several days and nights, and then returned to Perry, accompanied by Mrs. Ladd, who conducted her to the Perry mission [of the Pentecostal" movement] to pray for the dead child. After a few minutes Miss Van Gilder fell unconscious and could not be roused. She was carried bodily to her home, where hundreds of people from all over the State have visited her. Mrs. Ladd has gone to her every few days.

Three physicians—Doctor Shyke, an osteopath; Doctor Bowen, a magnetic healer, and a regular physician of the town—were called in. They examined Miss Van Gilder and decided that there is no physical reason for the manifestation. They were discharged. The family and the girl, strangely enough, do not wish her released. She laughs constantly, says she is very happy and is miraculously cured of all physical ailments that have troubled her for many years. . . .

Miss Van Gilder has partially recovered in the last few days and her tongue is less stiff. She speaks with the strange whine of those with cleft palates, supplemented with deaf and dumb signs, remembered from school days and interpreted by her sister, Mrs. R. C. McKean, who seems to understand the expression of the girl's face.

"I am so happy; I feel so well." she spelled out to the reporter, who could talk deaf mute language with her. "I want to tell people.

"I have been to heaven and Christ is coming. This is a warning. I don't want to speak till God releases me.

"My first vision was a row of great rugged crosses marked with my new name—I can't speak it in world language. The crosses looked heavy till I lifted one, and then it grew light—angels helped me.

"Then I saw throngs of riders on white horses with golden banners, coming over the hills of heaven as far as eye could see. I saw twelve trees with twelve kinds of strange beautiful fruit hanging in great pink and purple clusters. I ate something like an apple and was healed. I have never known the Bible well, but now I know whole chapters with the interpretation.

"Then I was teaching the Bible to groups of dirty, kinky-haired savages in smelly, gaudy rags half covering them—they were unpleasant; teaching them was one of the crosses. I have never sung much, but I shall sing as soon as God releases me. This is the power of Pentecost. I can't talk in strange tongues, but I can understand African. I saw the river of life, and now I can never die."—Des Moines Capital, May 22, 1907.

CUSTOMS OF THE DUNKARDS.

Los Angeles News: "If I then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet." This statement attributed to the Savior by John, in verse 14 of chapter 13 of his gospel, is the foundation for one of the peculiar and interesting ceremonies of the Dunkards or German Baptist brethren, the world's conference of which will begin in the Temple Auditorium next Tuesday.

Feet-washing is one of the ordinances of the church. The ceremony is introduced by the singing of a hymn, after which the bishop or elder in charge of the meeting reads a chapter, or that portion of the chapter in which the command is given. On closing the book he remarks; "We will now follow the example of our Lord and Savior." The washing then begins. The brethren are congregated on one side of the church or room and the sisters on the other. The woman and man nearest the platform step into the aisle and gird themselves with towels. Taking basins they proceed, the man to wash the feet of the men, and the woman the feet of the sisters. As fast as the feet of a brother or sister are washed, the one to whom that service has been rendered takes the towel and basin and performs the service for the next one. Thus it passes until all have been served. On rising from the task the one performing the service kisses the one administered to.

The service precedes the partaking of the Lord's supper. Here again the ceremony is peculiar, as compared with the practice of other denominations.

Instead of the bread and wine sacrament, there is a full meal served, including boiled lamb, served in its broth, in which the bread is dipped in imitation of the "sop" told of in the Scriptures. After the meal there is sung a hymn, a portion of scripture is read, and the hand of fellowship is extended. The sisters salute each other with a holy kiss. Then another hymn is sung, the communicants kneel and unleavened bread and unfermented wine are served. Men and women receive the sacrament separately. That is, they are grouped separately, and the bread served the women is broken by the deacons, while that partaken of by the men is broken by themselves and passed to each other.

Dunkard preachers are selected by the congregation. They are selected for life, or until removed for good cause, and serve without pay, consequently most preachers follow some ordinary vocation in connection with their work for the church.

To-day, the Committee of Forty is in session. The work of the coming conference is mapped out; the moderator and reading and writing clerks are being selected. Applications are being entertained from various districts for the next conference to be held within their precincts, and other business matters are being looked after. The most important work of the conference will be accomplished before the body meets. The Committee of Forty transacts most of the business, and makes most of the appointments previous to the opening of the conference. When that body is in session, the committee renders its report and the conference ratifies its work, or rejects it, according to circumstances. It is unusual for the conference to discountenance the acts of the committee.

Religious meetings is the great object of the world's conference, and these meetings begin tomorrow and will continue until June 7. Business matters are incidental, and are transacted only because necessary. Here will be gained inspiration and zeal which will be taken by those present to all parts of the world, and the several thousand visitors will act as leaven to infuse new life into the denomination throughout the length and breadth of the land.—Register and Leader, May, 1907.

PLYMOUTH'S EMBARRASSMENT.

Plymouth Congregational Church of Brooklyn, the church of Henry Ward Beecher, Lyman Abbott, and Newell Dwight Hillis, is literally split into two warring factions over the renting of the pulpit to the Christian Science Church for a lecture by Judge Septimus J. Hanna, one of the most ardent followers of Mrs. Eddy. The board of trustees has unahimously given consent, entering into a formal contract. The pastor, Doctor Hillis, has announced his opposition, and at a meeting of the church a unanimous vote was taken against the proposed occupancy of the Beecher-Abbott-Hillis pulpit by any disciple of the Eddy cult.

Doctor Hillis explains his own position by saying: "Plymouth church stands for a personal God and the Christian Scientists do not believe in a personal God. Mr. Beecher and Lyman Abbott always stood for a personal God and I stand for the same thing, and, of course, the church which I have the honor to serve stands for a personal God."

In another statement he says that he has no objection to a Christian Scientist using the pulpit as a lecture platform to speak on patriotism, on hospitals, on the American family, on the working people, on the rights of childhood, on art, science, music, literature, or any other constructive subject calculated to promote the interests of the people of the republic. "Should he speak on any of these subjects," Doctor Hillis says, "I will not only welcome him, but gladly listen and buy a ticket. What I object to is the destructive attack upon everything the church loves." Taking up the situation from another viewpoint Doctor Hillis continues: "No consent from the board of trustees of the mother church-building in Boston could by any possibility lead me to go to that church and attack anything that Judge Hanna loves, in a building dedicated to Mrs. Eddy." He demands the same consideration for himself and the things in which his people believe in the church dedicated to their God.

Notwithstanding the opposition of pastor and church body, the trustees persist in holding to the original contract and announce the lecture will be given as advertised. They explain their position by claiming that a considerable portion of the annual income of the church is derived from rental for miscellaneous lectures. This is denied by Doctor Hillis, who claims that of the twenty-five thousand dollar income of the church last year only a few hundred dollars, possibly four or five, resulted from rentals.

While the discussion rages within the church, the Christian Scientists, as may be imagined, are relishing the situation, because of its advertising features. If Judge Hanna is permitted to lecture in Plymouth church he will be greeted by such an audience as has not assembled in Brooklyn for many years, for which the agitation will be mainly responsible. In the meantime there is another phase to the situation, on which the Brooklyn Eagle comments. "The practical lesson to be drawn from the incident," it says, "is that church societies should not give too much freedom to trustees. A little thought might have suggested to the trustees that the opening of Plymouth as a theater for the exposition of the theories upon which Christian people have chosen to divide with more or less vehemence would be a policy of unique and perilous imprudence." The Eagle believes that some good may come out of the whole affair, first in the inside management of churches, and second, in the erection of a suitable hall for such occasions without recourse to the church edifices.—Register and Leader, May 16, 1907.

UNAPPRECIATED NEGRO PREACHERS.

The negro preacher has not received the credit due him, thinks a religious organ of that race, for his effectual encouragement of patience and endurance among his people, thus promoting peace and harmony. It is difficult to divine, remarks the National Baptist Union (Nashville), "what would be the status or the limit of racial feeling throughout the Southland were it not for the constant appeals of the negro preachers to their people to sacrifice the spirit of revenge, promote law, dispense justice, and to look to God for the correction of evils which they sometimes painfully endure." The writer of the editorial in question goes on to say:

"The negro race has passed through some trying periods during recent years; and, as a natural consequence, there has been much of restlessness and discontent among them. The less thoughtful and more indiscreet element in the race has emphasized the old doctrine of 'forbearance ceasing to be a virtue.' In pursuit of this theory, they would have introduced a new order of things but for the fact that admonitions to peace have been most frequent and earnest on the part of the minister of the negro churches. Whatever irregularities the negro ministers have had or may now have, they should be given credit for one valuable piece of work that they have always been willing to accomplish—that is, the admonishing of the people to the observance of peace; to live peaceably with all men, and to do good to their neighbors. This is equally true of the learned and the uncultured negro minister. Each has recognized the necessity for admonishing his people to be sober, discreet, patient, and forgiving; and each in turn has been rewarded with the fruits of his labors. We venture the assertion that negro preachers admonish their people more frequently to patience, meekness, gentleness, and Christian charity, without regard to race or previous conditions, etc., than do the preachers of any other race or nationality on the continent. It is sometimes urged that their meekness grows out of their weakness. If this were true these admonitions would hardly be given with such a degree of uniformity. Whatever motive may impel them to render such service the fact remains that it is service of the most valuable character and that which should evoke the highest commendation by all who desire to see the races prosperous and happy."—Literary Digest, May 11, 1907.

Selected Poetry

A Song of the Countryside.

O you of the restless city, tossed on its heaving tide,
Kinsfolk and friends we greet you, we of the countryside,
We of the peaceful valley, you of the turbulent mart,
Though our pathways lie asunder yet are we one in heart.

O you of the clamorous city, for you the seed we sow,
For you our garnered harvest when the ripened grain falls low,
Our rosy-fruited orchards, our flocks on a hundred hills,
The plow that breaks our furrows, the wheel that turns our mills.

O you of the toiling city, what gifts beside have we?
The sturdy strength of our forests for your ships that dare the sea,
The breath of our wayside hedgerows blown sweet along your track,
Our winds that lift your smoke-pall and bring God's sunshine back.

O you of the thronging city, our kinsfolk scattered wide,
Treasure yet richer we give you, we of the countryside;
From the rock-cliffs of New England to the broad slopes of the West

We give you our sons and daughters, our dearest gift and best!—Blanch Tennor Heath.

Foolish Little Maiden.

A foolish little maiden bought a foolish little bonnet,
With a ribbon and a feather and a bit of lace upon it;
And that the other maidens of the little town might know it,
She thought she'd go to meeting the next Sunday just to show it.
But though the little bonnet was scarce larger than a dime,
The getting of it settled proved to be a work of time;

So when 'twas fairly tied, all the bells had stopped their ringing,
 And when she came to the meeting sure enough the folks were singing.
 So the foolish little maiden stood and waited at the door,
 And she shook her ruffles out behind and smoothed them down before.
 "Hallelujah! Hallelujah!" sang the choir above her head.
 "Hardly knew you! Hardly knew you!" were the words she thought they said.
 This made the little maiden feel so very, very cross
 That she gave her little mouth a twist, her little head a toss;
 For she thought the very hymn they sang was all about her bonnet,
 With the ribbon and the feather and the bit of lace upon it.
 And she would not wait to listen to the sermon or the prayers,
 But pattered down the silent street and hurried up the stairs
 Till she reached her little bureau, and in a handbox on it
 Had hidden safe from critic's eye her foolish little bonnet.
 Which proves, my little maidens, that each of you will find
 In every Sunday service but an echo of your mind;
 And the little head that's filled with silly little airs
 Will never get a blessing from sermon or from prayers.

The Bird and the Baby.

The hour was dull and cheerless,
 And our souls were as sad as the day;
 We had talked of the unknown haven,
 And the loved who had gone away.
 It came with the softest flutter,
 A tiny, brilliant form,
 So near we could feel it tremble
 In the sunbeams long and warm.
 How it pulsed with soundless music,
 And flashed surprises sweet,
 From the drooping, swinging blue-bells,
 A cluster near our feet.
 We held our breath to watch it,
 When the light of the western sun
 Touched the gleaming throat of crimson
 A moment—the bird was gone.
 In my neighbor's cottage yonder
 Lived a babe, oh, marvel sweet!
 From the cooing lips, and laughing eyes,
 To the dimpled, pink-toed feet.
 That was yester-morn, this noon-time
 A marble casket rests,
 Robed in the baby's garments,
 By loving hands caressed.
 One moment, O bird, and baby soul,
 You catch life's sunniest ray;
 The next, we are broken, helpless,
 For lo! you are gone away.

VIDA E. SMITH.

Temptation, S ruggle, and Victory.

One beautiful moonlight night, when sleep would not come to one weary, ill, nervous sufferer, after days, weeks, yes, and years of keenest suffering, when the sick heart would almost give up in despair of ever again regaining health and happiness, the tempter came at the silent midnight watch, when all nature and human companions were at rest, and whispered: "Why not end this suffering and these sleepless nights now? Does it not take much more courage to live the life of suffering you live than to end it all? What have you to live for? Only to suffer on; for you can do no good. No one needs you. You are only a burden to yourself as well as to others. Yes, I know your loved ones are so kind, good, and tender of you, and gladly do all they can. No money, no labor is spared for your comfort. Still it is a burden, even if they do not feel it so; and it will be a relief to them as well as to yourself when the end comes. I know how the poor, weary heart and brain long, oh, so intensely, for rest, and for the so-much-needed sleep that will not come. Why then should you feel it a sin to end this useless, suffering life now, instead of wearing it out in bearing still more? Surely if there is a God he can not care for you, or why spare your life when so near the crossing, and when down in the valley and shadow, only to let you die by torture,—such a slow, fearful death, filled with long, weary days and sleepless nights when it seems reason will flee? They tell you 'whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth,' but could or would you punish a loved one as he has permitted you to be chastened? It's no use. You can not stand this much longer. Better death even by your own hand than the madhouse. And the end can come so easily, and without pain. Why hesitate?"

But as the voice of the tempter ceased, the glorious old moonlight that the sufferer loved so well, and that had been her companion on so many weary nights—as well as happy nights in the far-away past—flooded the room and called her, and she followed its lead, out into the silvery light where in happier days in the far-away past she had stood with loved ones, now gone from her, and watched and loved its clear, soothing light, where now she so often sits and dreams of them; and it seems to-night these dear ones can look down in her weary, tempted heart, and pity and comfort through the weakness and the fearful struggle.

She sees the sainted mother who for years bore her own fearful suffering day after day without a murmur till the end came, then gladly entered her rest. Could she meet that pained look on this dear face, if she fell when tempted? Could she meet the darling pure angel boy, her only son, who in all his innocent young life thought mamma had no faults,—could she look into those pure, trusting eyes and say, "I came uninvited"? God forbid!

Then another loved, white face, with reproachful, pleading eyes, comes up before her, and as if in a dream she hears a dear voice repeat these words:

"He chose this path for thee.
 No feeble chance or hard relentless fate;
 But love, his love hath placed thy footsteps here.
 He knew the way was rough and desolate,
 Knew how thy heart would often sink with fear,
 Yet how tenderly he whispered, 'Child, I see
 This path is best for thee.'

"He chose this path for thee.
 What needst thou more this sweeter truth to know,
 That along these strange bewildering ways,
 O'er rocky steep and where dark rivers flow,
 His loving arms will bear thee all thy days?
 A few more days and thou shalt see
 This path is best for thee."

A sob told even the tempter that God and the loved ones had won, and on her knees in the moonlight, with only God's eyes to see, the sufferer poured out a plea for forgiveness for ever letting the evil tempter creep into her heart, and for doubting the dear Father who had been so much to her in all her suffering, and whom, never before, even when down in the valley and shadow of death, had she for one moment doubted, and who had stood by her side through it all. She also sent up a prayer of thanksgiving that the Father had not let her be tempted more than she was able to bear. But as Jesus had been tempted and had come out victorious, so had God given her strength to resist the tempter. And thank God for the victory.

PRISCILLA.

[In connection with the above touching experience of Sr. Laura Brunson, we publish the following which may be found useful. We have not tried it; but the Lord tells us that alcohol (or strong drink) is for bathing the body, and very many of us know that sea-salt is an excellent ingredient for the bath.—EDITOR.]

MEDICINAL BATHS.

Two summers ago, I learned of the soothing, restful properties contained in a certain medicinal bath, told to me by the physician who had labored faithfully for many weeks to bring me to a better state of health.

To be sure, I had improved in many ways, but nervously worn from long neglect of self, there had come a day of reckoning, and, as many a woman can testify, a shattered nervous system seldom recovers in a rapid manner. There are long months of "feeling continually tired," restless, sleepless nights, and that dread foreboding of something dreadful to come, though everything may seem at peace about her. Nerves! Ah, me! What were they ever made for?

The following simple medicinal bath, that came like a flash to the mind of our good doctor one day, if not a cure, was, at least, a great relief to me.

"Please write while I dictate," said Doctor H—. And I wrote:

Take of sea-salt four ounces; spirits of ammonia, two ounces; spirits of camphor, two ounces, and of pure alcohol, eight ounces, and sufficient hot, soft water to make a full quart of the liquid.

Dissolve the sea-salt in the hot water, and let stand until cool.

Pour into the alcohol the spirits of ammonia and camphor, and mix them well by a thorough shaking. Add, then, the salt water, and again shake well, and bottle for use. Keep tightly corked.

Keep in the sleeping-room, or somewhere near at hand, a soft sponge, a bottle of the liquid, and a saucer, and, when tired, nervous, and "blue," do not be tempted to neglect this bath, but make the extra effort needed to wet over the whole body with the fluid, and finish with a vigorous rubbing with a soft crash or Turkish towel.

Rub until the skin glows with a reddish tone; slip quickly into a fresh, clean gown, and then just try to lie awake. You can not do it, I'll warrant. At least I never can.

Some months ago, through the columns of a paper, I made known this favorite bath of mine, and, shortly after, there came to me a letter from a woman, saying: "My husband has been in delicate health for years, and at time he nearly loses his mind because of sleeplessness night after night. I prepared that bath for him, and every night I bathe and rub him well, and he sleeps now like a tired child."

Hoping that this bath of nerve-strengthening power may bring sleep and comfort to many another world-weary friend, I send it forth again, trusting that I may be doing unto others as I would that others should do by me.—Nellie Hawks.

Letter Department

DERBY, Indiana, May 15, 1907.

Editors Herald: Having been appointed as a missionary to Southern Indiana, just as soon as I could arrange affairs at home, and learn of some place to go in the new field (to me), I bade my wife and babies good-bye as cheerfully as I could, and May 6 started for Derby, Indiana, arriving on the boat at ten o'clock at night Wednesday, the 8th, where I received a cordial welcome from Bro. John Davis, who keeps the hotel at that place.

The next day I was called on to officiate at the funeral of the little daughter of Mr. and Mrs. R. N. Baggerly, Virginia Eveline, an only child. Bad weather prevented any further services until the next Sunday, when I began preaching in the Cummings Schoolhouse, and am having nice, attentive congregations.

Yesterday Bro. David Baggerly and I rode to Millstone where we officiated at the funeral of Elder James McKinney, president of the Millstone Branch, who had passed away the day before, May 13, after a lingering illness with the dread disease consumption. He was baptized about six years ago by Elder J. E. Porter. He was soon after ordained a teacher. Two years ago he was ordained to the office of elder. He leaves a wife and two children, all members of the church. He had a large circle of friends, as was seen by the large congregation that attended his funeral.

We are here to work for the advancement or growth of the grand latter-day work, and in as sweet harmony with all concerned as we possibly can, anxious on our part to labor where any good can be done, and where those having oversight of the field would have us operate. Any letters addressed to Springerton, White County, Illinois, R. F. D. 2, will be forwarded to me here or where I may be in this field. I am anxious to learn where missionary work is needed, and want to get acquainted especially with Saints in this field. After next Sunday, for a week or ten days, I will be with the Millstone Saints. My address while there will be Cannerton, Perry County, Indiana, where I will wait for instruction where to go next.

In gospel bonds,

F. L. SAWLEY.

STAPLES, Minnesota, May 16, 1907.

Editors Herald: I am still struggling on in the Master's service, sometimes in the sunshine of success and cheer, and sometimes under the cloud of discouragement. But so long as I can feel the cheering influence of the divine Spirit leading on, and at times crowning my labors with success, I hope not to falter by the wayside.

Another year in gospel service has been begun. The record of another year's labor has been closed, never to be opened till that great day shall come. Thirteen years have thus gone by. Ten in active mission service, and what shall the harvest be? I fear there will not be lacking some tares in life's harvest.

At the present Bro. George Day and I have the use of a vacant Baptist church in this city, and have been trying to tell the gospel story to those who came; but as usual as soon as the gospel note is sounded, the enemy is on picket ready to sound the cry "Mormon." However, notwithstanding the chilling breeze, and nearly two days of snow-storm, we have had a few out to our meetings, and feel that our labor has not been in vain.

Previously we were holding meetings about ten miles north of here, near Esterly Post-office, where we had comparatively good attendance and interest, and have hopes that in due time the seed sown will bear fruit in the Master's kingdom. The writer is to return there soon and perform a marriage ceremony. On April 10 at the home of the bride's parents (Bro. and Sr. Lurette Whiting) occurred the pretty wedding of Sr. Irene Whiting, whom so many knew to be a faithful Sunday-school and Religio worker, and Bro. John Rotzien. Sr. Irene is greatly missed in the Clitherall Branch, as a willing worker wherever her hands found labor to do in the Master's service.

Another interesting event not really of the same character was the baptism a few weeks ago of Bro. Frank Whiting and his wife Elsie. Both are true descendants of latter-day Israel, and will be pillars of strength in the church in due time.

We must not fail to mention the serious sorrow that has been in the home of our brother and sister the past few months and in behalf of whom I wish to ask all Saints who know the worth of prayer, to pray. Their little son nine years old, a merry, bright little fellow, last January after a siege of sickness began taking convulsions, increasing in number till having as high as thirty-four in one day. Through prayer we believe he has received help, but he has not entirely recovered, but still lingers a poor little sufferer, almost a living skeleton.

I expect to start for North Dakota, my mission field, soon. Will be glad to meet many of the Saints and others there, whom I, by years of association, have learned to love.

As one among the laborers of the Lord I ask the assistance of the Saints that we all may labor together in love for the accomplishment of the work intrusted to all. My home address is Clitherall, Minnesota.

Your brother in gospel bonds,

LEONARD HOUGHTON.

HUNTER, Desoto Parish, Louisiana, May 15, 1907.

Dear Herald: We can not do without you and the Hope as you are all the preaching we have or have had in eighteen years. My children have never heard any other preaching or seen any of the Saints except me. I hope some day an elder will come here, so my children can be baptized.

MRS. M. E. BUNYARD.

ROCKVILLE, Missouri, May 19, 1907.

Editors Herald: I have to-day organized a Sunday-school here with twelve numbers. I have been holding meeting here a week. Four have given their names for baptism. Expect to administer that ordinance this afternoon.

In bonds,

A. C. SILVERS.

BELLAIRE, Illinois, May 15, 1907.

Editors Herald: It often makes me rejoice when reading of the good done by our missionaries and the ministry in this land. We have a great many persecutions to undergo, and we know that the best way is to live the life of a saint. I am interested in the work of Christ, and ask all the Saints to pray that we may carry it on successfully.

We have not had any preaching here since Bro. F. M. Slover was here. I esteem it a great pleasure to have the right to express my gratefulness for the message that has been brought about by the angel. I feel impressed to say that if we all put forth a united effort, and become devoted to the accomplishment of the work that is intrusted to all, not only by our prayers and faith, but also by our means, God will generously love and support us.

Brn. R. T. Walters and F. M. Slover were at Casey, Illinois, in September, 1906, preaching a few days, getting a few quite interested in the angel's message. I believe if the work is properly followed up that good will result therefrom. There are some friends who will look after the wants of missionaries. I mention this place in particular, so that whoever is sent to this field may know of this opening.

Bro. David Smith was at Bellaire this winter and preached rousing, good sermons for us. We would welcome his return any time, and also others.

Children of God, there is work, there is labor to do.

MARY A. FERGUSON.

LANKIN, North Dakota, May 27, 1907.

Dear Herald: Fearing some of you might think, from our long silence, that we were altogether frozen up in this northern clime, I pen a few lines to let you know that through the blessing and kindness of our heavenly Father we are still alive and battling for the truth. The outlook from a human standpoint has been and still is somewhat discouraging; but we try to remember the thought expressed by others, "Effort" is ours; "Results" belong to God; and so breathing an inward prayer to him we obtain strength and press forward. I had the pleasure of leading one humble soul into the waters of baptism, Sr. Clum, wife of Bro. E. H. Clum, formerly of Lamoni. This is another instance of how the good seed of the gospel will sometimes sprout and bring forth fruit after many years.

I was lately called upon to conduct memorial exercises over a twin child of Bro. and Sr. Langton of Lawton, a beautiful flower lent to brighten the home for but a brief season. It is hard to part with them. Such dispensations of providence ought to make us feel that we have a greater interest "over there." May God help us to live so we shall meet the little innocent lambs.

There are some sick around here we are praying for and administering to, endeavoring to exercise "faith." By direction of missionary in charge, Bro. Day and I are expected to labor together in the west half of the State. I would like the scattered Saints to communicate with us as soon as possible. We desire as much as possible to make new openings, so please do not hesitate. Though you may have a sod house and limited accommodations, remember that both of us are old pioneers and have been there before, and what we lack we do not mind being shown how.

Please bear in mind the reunion at Bantry commencing Saturday, July 6. Come on foot, by wagon, or train; only get there. And do not forget your pocketbooks. Remember what was said last year about a new tent. It is coming. Address all correspondence, and send all tithing to my home address, Sherwood, North Dakota. Praying the blessing of God upon our united efforts, I am, as ever,

Your servant in the gospel,

WM. SPARLING.

OOLAGAH, Indian Territory, May 24, 1907.

Editors Herald: I have baptized eight adults since coming here, and others are almost ready to unite with us. They have a fine Sunday-school organized here, Bro. William Resser superintendent. The Sunday-school is about two months old, and is in a flourishing condition. Saints number nineteen now. Bright prospects for a branch to be raised up here. I am enjoying the best of liberty in preaching. I shall go to my field the fore part of June.

Dear Saints in Spring River District, who have kindly cared for me for about nine years so that I have not lacked for anything, I bid you all adieu.

Respectfully,

F. C. KECK.

CUCAMONGA, California, May 14, 1907.

Editors Herald: I wish to relate a dream I had this winter. I will state first that a lady moved in as my neighbor. She was a Utah Mormon. I called on her and we soon brought up the difference of the churches. I found her an honest, good woman. We had many talks; among them I suggested that we both pray and ask God to make it plain. The only answer she received was the strong impression to investigate, and this dream was given to me. I would like to hear from some of you the interpretation. It came to me, but I should like to hear it from some others.

I thought I was in a city with some of my friends. My clothing was very beautiful. I left them and went a block to catch a car I wanted and upon arriving there the scene changes to the country. I still went on until there was no road to travel. It was in fields and back yards until I came to a place where filth was running, and I could not cross because of my beautiful clothing. While hesitating about going, some power lifted me up over everything into a room where a lady was waiting dressed in black. She held in her hand the half of a breakfast-food box. Pouring the contents through her fingers, she says, "See what beautiful food." I looked and it was the most beautiful grain I ever saw. She went on saying, "This is the food that the Utah elders,—Mormon elders,—that go two by two are preparing for the people to eat." I took one more careful look, and with sorrow I beheld what she could not see. Fine glass was mixed all through it, but one could not see without very careful notice. I awoke. This has been a great help and strength to me. Hoping it may help others, I remain,

Your sister in Christ,

Editors Herald: I inclose Houston Post containing account of Elder "Parham's" decline from leadership in the "Apostolic Movement" at Houston and other prominent strongholds. Although his proselyting by "unknown tongues" drew from the ruins of Dowieism, he failed to profit by the mistakes of its deposed leader. The clipping follows:

"Reverend Charles F. Parham's announced retirement from the leadership of the Apostolic Faith movement has created factions in the ranks and now a serious split is threatened. The opposing forces, who demanded the former leader's retirement on charges that he was guilty of "conduct not becoming a minister," remain firm in their original indictment, declare that they will not recognize the ministry of Parham, and call on the various missions throughout the State to refuse him recognition. Others there are who claim that the charges against him are a persecution; that if they be true, as asserted, that they do not amount to sin, for the religious leader is a prophet of God and can not be guilty of sin; they charge the others with jealousy and with falling away from sound doctrine, and threaten those who reject Parham as placing themselves in danger of divine judgment. . . .

"We bear no malice toward Brother Parham," said Mr. Dowling [judge in committee meeting that tried Parham]. 'It is simply to protect the movement from degeneracy through degenerate practice of those representing it that we have been compelled to do what we have done. It was no hearsay evidence upon which we took the action. We had clear cut and definite testimony, proving beyond the shadow of doubt. He absolutely refused to come before the committee. He would answer none of the charges made, saying that he didn't propose to be tried by anybody.

"And in addition to the first hand testimony we had letters in which the accused clearly admitted the charges. There was no question of the validity of the charges, there was no question in our minds, and when he absolutely refused to offer any defense or appear before the committee at all, we could not do other than what we did.'

"In the last issue of the Apostolic Faith, the official organ of the movement, a full review of the case and its development appears, and to this Mr. Dowling made reference. He cited the two following telegrams:

"(Carothers to Parham, from Chicago to Los Angeles, November 25, 1906.)

"In view of the S. N. H. experience at League City and older cases same nature, you ought to retire to ministry of prayer. Combination of cases known only to me, so retirement wipes out stain. Alternative—inevitable, hopeless failure of world prospect. (That is, of the Zion movement uniting with the Apostolic Faith movement.) Wire "accepted" or "rejected" only to Ray at Zion City.'

"(Parham to Carothers in reply, November 27, 1906.)

"Mr. Ray Davis, Zion City, Illinois.

"Los Angeles, California, November 27, 1906.—Owing to fact that my position projector of Apostolic movement is misunderstood, many rumors afloat, I resign from such office, to devote myself to private ministry and prayer. Letter of explanation follows. Chas. F. Parham.'

"The trouble came after this, it is claimed, when Parham persisted in preaching and teaching in the name of the Apostolic Faith movement. Some representatives of the various Texas missions were then called to meet in Orchard, where Mr. Parham was holding a meeting, and a regular trial was entered upon. It was this meeting that Mr. Parham refused to attend, according to Dowling's statement, the charges against him were heard, he was adjudged guilty and the action as stated before was taken against him."—Houston Daily Post, May 22, 1907.

In my mission, some of Parham's followers have acknowledged the restored gospel, while many opposed us, holding out that "great is Parham, the Apostolic Faith projector."

From Wales.

Editors Herald: Just a word to testify that the Lord God of Israel is still working in little Wales. Am pleased to say that our land is yielding her increase in the work of our Father. I have been permitted to bring the following five into the fold: Bro. Paul Ellis was brought in at Aberaman. We hope he may prove himself as Paul of old. Young Sr. Edith Roberts of Aberaman, who is continuing faithful to the commandments of the Master under favorable circumstances, having no other young sister in the mission. Bro. Pugsley of Aberaman mission, who was brought to the fold under favorable circumstances, having been shown the true church through a vision by the inspirational power of God. Am pleased to state that he has proved worthy to the mission, and we look forward to see him an instrument in God's hands, as he was a local preacher with the Independents at Capcach previous to coming into the church. Bro. Picton of Teurbiwceiber has been brought into the fold through the instrumentality of Bro. Mann of Teurbiwceiber, and having been convinced of the truth of the gospel, and the power of God, by the preaching of Bro. Jenkins of Perth, Bro. Picton having been a member with the Baptists for about fifteen years. He has got so much interested since coming into this church, April, 1907, that he has been surprised at the power of God who has led him to search since coming in, and he has told me that he has received more knowledge of God in two months than during the previous fifteen years with the Baptists, and I feel very proud to be honored to go down into the waters of baptism with them, and I think they will be a credit to the church. I have also rebaptized Bro. Roper of Aberaman, and hope he may prove faithful to the end of his days.

I may say that I have had profitable meetings at Aberaman, which is mostly fortnightly. I may say that Teurbwceiber is also my field of battle, I have had meetings there twice with good results, and I hope very shortly to have the flag of the Master hoisted there.

I have been asked to come out to America, and feel very sorry to state that I can not comply with the request just now, having found so much work here to do. On one occasion I was sent for to Sr. Evan's of Aberaman, she being very low at the time, and indeed the doctor had given her up. Bro. Case came with me and we administered to her, and the power of God came with such force that she felt benefited immediately, and we are pleased to say that she has been continually improving from that very hour, and now she has come to perfect health. On another occasion I was called by telegram to Sr. Jane Aberaman, she being very low with anæmia, or weakness of the blood. I administered to her, and am pleased to say she is recovering, and my prayer is that she will soon recover by the power of the divine Doctor. I am pleased to know that my brother, Reese Jenkins, has been called to the mission field, and sincerely hope that by the power of God he may be the means of bringing many souls to the gospel of Christ, trusting that the Saints will support him in his calling.

Your obedient servant in the gospel of Christ,

JOHN G. JENKINS.

From Over the Mountains.

Editors Herald: From the far-famed city of Salt Lake, almost surrounded by mountains, green foliage, and laughing streamlets, I talk to you this time, over seven hundred miles from Denver.

After preaching twice to the Denver Saints on the 19th, I left them on the morning of the 20th for Colorado Springs. Was kindly met at the depot by Elder J. W. Morgan, who when satisfied of my determination to continue my journey hitherward on the day following, after we had plentifully eaten at his welcome table, very courteously took me around to the feasting of my eyes on what I had for years known only by print and stereoscopic views. I quaffed the mineral water, drank at the soda springs, looked admiringly on Pike's Peak, saw the pioneer Pike's monument, gazed with wonder and amazement on the Garden of the Gods. There we beheld the majesty of towering rocks, Balanced Rock, Steamboat Rock, and the Kissing Camels.

The enchantment of this rare scenery made hours pass without notice. Meeting was appointed for the night, the writer to speak. We found the time unconsciously near; we had to hasten. Missing supper we reached the nice little church in time to do our part, before a strange audience, though the service was already opened by Bro. Clarke, their president.

Next day pulling away from a day's association with these brethren, who certainly have an enviable climate, a most sanitary habitation of retirers and consumptive resorters, nearly six thousand feet elevation, we continued our journey, coming by Pueblo, passing through the Royal Gorge where the mountains have seemingly parted to admit human traffic and where the solid rocks on either side tower to a height of thousands of feet, winding through canyon after canyon for hundreds of miles, threading tunnels, going up grade and down grade, crawling along the precipice again, where to have missed our footing would have hurled us to a dazzling depth below, we reached this peculiar city on the noon of the 22d. We found Bro. E. C. Briggs, who has been here since last fall, vital as usual and anxiously looking forward to the arrival of others of the swift messengers. Have been associated with him thus far. With interest I have listened to his accounts of his experiences when he came here in 1863 after a long, tedious trip across the plains; of the disadvantages under which he sought to recover those who had been obscured from the truth in the dark and cloudy day, of how he called on Brigham Young in person and was threatened by that tyrant.

I have visited some of the noted Mormon scenery. Some of it one can enter and some of it one has to behold from without. I have seen Beehive House, built by Brigham, now occupied by Joseph F. Smith. It is the White House of Mormondon. I saw Amelia's Palace, Eagle Gate, the temple and tabernacle, the endowment house, the assembly hall, etc.

Last Sunday I preached twice in our church. In the afternoon I attended the tabernacle service, heard Apostles Richards and Lyman (president of the Twelve) preach, saw several leading men including two of the Presidency. I heard the big organ shake the tabernacle, heard the choir sing that took second prize at the world's fair; and was sorry indeed that all this fine display was not devoted to a worthier cause. In the information bureau, after service, I saw many Mormon relics and the pictures of many of their leaders. Saw in person the grandson of Parley P. Pratt, also the son of Orson Pratt. I saw Hyrum Smith's watch, the watch of John Taylor that was struck by a bullet in Carthage Jail; other articles of rarity that have been handed down. We saw the monument of Brigham Young, who stands with his back towards the temple and his hand toward the bank.

Two or three of the finest private residences are here I ever saw in any city, not owned, however, by Mormons. The city claims about seventy-five thousand population, about a third of whom are Mormons. You can calculate, therefore, that about every other person you meet on the street believes in a general way in the Book of Mormon and Joseph Smith. The city is beautifully laid out; with its wide streets and rows of trees on either side affording lodgment to thousands of timid warblers who make the air perfectly resonant as they blend their notes with the prattles of merry children beneath; with its crystal waters flowing down from the mountains to refresh the air and delight the beholder.

Bro. Briggs and the writer had a very pleasant call on the grandson of Samuel H. Smith, brother of the Martyr. His wife is one of our members, and he is not a full-fledged Mormon. A standing invitation exists to come again. Oh! if only we can reach this people. Between them and us stand their leaders.

Yesterday's Tribune had a very fair write-up on my Sunday evening's talk, and to-day's Tribune, as I see this morning, has about a column and three fourths devoted to an interview between a reporter and the writer yesterday, at his request, in which he wrote dictation at length. But the Tribune is an anti-Mormon paper. If we could only get in the Deseret News where we could come in more general and more certain contact with the Mormon people who were overcome in the dark and cloudy day!

Of the missionary force, Bro. Vanderwood is here, Bro. E. A. Davis has arrived, and Bro. F. A. Smith is expected daily. May it be that the time has arrived for that to be done which we have long looked forward to, when these people would be recovered, when a trend of events and the Spirit of the Lord would make it so plain that the Reorganization is the succession of the original church that the honest of heart will with little difficulty perceive it.

Permit me to say to our ministry abroad that they can get free copies of a book consisting of extracts from the testimony in the Smoot investigation (containing the important parts and perhaps all that is needed) by addressing The Gentile Information Bureau, Herald Building, Salt Lake City, Utah, and asking for such book. ALVIN KNISLEY.

804 Park Avenue, May 28.

Extracts from Letters.

Elvonia Westfaul, Orange Grove, Mississippi: "I inclose a notice of the death of my father who died April 25. I am the oldest daughter of seven children. Father would have become a member of the church if an elder had come at the right time, for he believed the latter-day work. Mother has been a member five years; was baptized by Elder W. L. Booker. Father had been sick about fifteen months from heart trouble and other diseases. Pray for mamma and us."

L. L. Gott, Central City, Illinois. "Bro. F. L. Sawley came to this city March 13 and preached a series of nineteen sermons, sowing the good seed, and some are investigating. Bro. Morris and Henson have also been here during the month of May and preached a number of times. I desire to be active; I am not satisfied to sit down with folded hands, knowing that this is an individual work. The teachings of the Savior come to me, when he said if we would not forsake even father and mother we could not be his disciples. Let us renew our covenant with the Lord, and forsake all worldly pleasure."

News From Branches

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

We have been favored in hearing a patriotic address of deep spiritual significance from U. W. Greene, of the Twelve, his first attempt at much speaking since his recent illness; the theme appropriate to this Memorial Day was regarding this land choice above all others; and how God's hand has ever been evident in keeping it whole and free, when evil forces have assailed its safety. "In union is strength," the wisdom of which the Saints should appreciate and exemplify as a people.

The local street-services have suffered by reason of unfavorable weather, but it has been made good to us in the interest aroused; one of the sisters of playing and solo ability has volunteered to use the Billhorn organ in this campaign. As a result we noted in the audience of a hundred or more a far greater percentage of listeners of the gentler sex. We try to have plenty of good local advertising matter to pass around.

On one occasion we found the crowd was immediately taken over by advocates of some "Free-and-Easy Route to Heaven," but as a visiting brother had once done the same maneuver to them we do not complain, only look for the "survival of the fittest."

"Ladies' aid" held a social on the evening of the 16th to demonstrate their work and get people acquainted with their plan of conservative buying and purchase of necessary things through them. Many went home carrying various-shaped bundles, containing aprons, waists, caps, sleeves, shoe-polish, gas-mantles, soap, flavoring, chocolate, etc. Bro. and Sr. Calhoun let their home for the occasion: the proceeds go toward paying church debt. Other features were a Zion's Praises quartet and an ice-cream parlor, each very sweet in its way.

BURLINGTON, IOWA.

Sunday, May 19, ushered in a new period of history for the Burlington Branch, for it was Bro. Charles Fry's first day with us as pastor of the flock. Bro. Elbert A. Smith, who was with us the Sunday previous, remarked that he would like to be here to usher the new incumbent into his duties, as he

(Bro. Smith) had introduced Bro. Reiste, and had also been here to see him off, but it later appeared that almost no introduction was needed,—in fact we believe that an outsider would scarcely have been aware of the fact that there was a new pastor. The day was enjoyed by all, as we feel that the rest of the year will be,—and we hope more than the year.

We are all busy now, making preparations for the district conference, which is to meet here on the 15th and 16th of June, the conventions being on Friday, the 14th. Plans for the Friday evening program are progressing fairly well, and we hope to have a good attendance, and a pleasant and profitable time during all the session.

Sr. Fry arrived Sunday afternoon, with her two little sons, and will probably, in a few days, occupy the home which is to become the center of interest to the Burlington Branch. It is to be hoped that their stay in Burlington will prove to be of mutual enjoyment.

Our religio president, Sr. Edith Jarvis, is expecting to be separated from her work for a considerable time this summer, as she is planning a trip to California and Washington, to visit her brother and friends.

ETHEL A. LACEY.

LAMONI, IOWA.

Sunday was a beautiful day, and the services were largely attended. The stake bishopric occupied the morning hour at the chapel, D. A. Anderson in the evening. Bishop E. L. Kelley spoke at Liberty Home and C. J. Spurlock at the Saints' Home. The attendance at Sunday-school was 530.

The rite of baptism was administered to three at the Home pond Sunday morning, the confirmation occurring at the afternoon social service.

The following brethren labored locally Sunday: D. A. Anderson at Wyan, at 3:30; D. C. White at the Boyer School-house, S. D. Shippy at Ellston, and J. S. Snively at Andover.

Conference Minutes.

MANCHESTER.—Business-sessions of our annual conference were held in the North Manchester Branch meetinghouse Collyhurst Road. Sunday services were held in the Vestry Hall, Hulme Town Hall, Stretford Road. Convened Saturday, March 30, at 6 p. m., Henry Greenwood in the chair. Elder W. H. Greenwood (of the Seventy) was by vote associated with the district presidency in having charge of the conference sessions. Official communications. A letter from Bro. Caton, Birmingham, who is acting as Bishop's agent in the British Isles, was read to the body. Resolved, "that this letter be read at each service to-morrow, Sunday." Resolved further, "that the president of the district have power to appoint temporarily a collector for the Bishop's agent at to-morrow's service." Elders reporting: H. Greenwood, J. Dewsnup, J. W. Taylor, T. Brien, J. Bailey, F. Naden, G. Towers, F. Bruton, D. Hope, W. Spargo, W. Worth, C. H. Hassall, W. R. Armstrong, S. F. Mather, J. Foden, T. J. Elliott, N. J. Weate, J. Harper, J. Spargo, J. Schofield, J. S. Grundy, J. Dewsnup, Jr., E. Nixon, C. H. Barton, Priest J. W. Green. Branch spiritual reports: South Manchester Branch, North Manchester Branch, East Manchester Branch, North East Manchester Branch, South Salford, Farnworth, Wigan, Warrington, Stockport, Eccles. The following extract is made from the district president's report with his consent: "Personally I have striven to fulfill the duties of my office to the best of my ability. I have visited all the branches in the district once or twice in each quarter. Some of the branches are doing well, others not so well, but in all there is great room for improvement, and I would strongly urge my brethren, the presidents of branches, that they pay more strict attention to the visitation of the members in their homes, by the priest or priests of their respective branches, and that they counsel with their officers, and thus beget a spirit of unity and confidence among themselves that will spread to the membership, thereby making them feel as one in the work of the Lord." At the Sunday afternoon fellowship meeting, some stirring testimonies were borne towards the middle and close of the meeting. Monday, April 1, we assembled in the North Manchester meeting-room at 9.30 a. m. The district Sunday-school superintendent, Elder S. F. Mather, gave his report verbally. Schools in fair condition; more solid work being done in some of them than hitherto. District secretary's report: We have ten branches within the district, with a total membership of 454; including 1 patriarch, 2 high priests, 29 elders, 18 priests, 8 teachers, 13 deacons. There have been 35 baptisms during the year. Secretary reported having sent the statistical report for the year 1906 to Bro. Stebbins; posted it on March 11. District financial secretary, Elder N. J. Weate, reported: Report referred to the standing committee of auditors. The letter or report of Elder C. H. Hassall in which our brother asked to be released from all appointments on account of infirmity was considered. The letter was again read by the secretary. Bro. Hassall was given permission to speak. He said that the letter was plain and he need not add anything thereto. The district president spoke on the matter, and a motion prevailed that "The matter be left in the hands of the district president." Zion's Religio Society's report was presented verbally by Elder N. J. Weate. Organization is still intact, but no meetings are held at present. Auditors reported financial secretary's account correct. Auditors' report was adopted. In consequence of an interest having been created in Denton and Hyde, it was "Resolved, that provision be made in the forthcoming rota plan to supply the above mentioned places." This was discussed for some time when the following was put to the house and prevailed: "Resolved, that the question re the opening out of mission work in the districts of Hyde and Denton be placed in the hands of the district presidency for their disposal." The rota plan was now considered. Elder J. W. Taylor explained the same. Resolved that the rota plan as explained be received and adopted. Resolved that branch priests who take exception to their branch presidents going on the plan be left off. Resolved that a line be placed on the plan asking brethren who are on the plan, if they can not fulfill their appointments to let the branch president (where they are due) know. W. R. Armstrong handed in the following notice of motion: "I beg to give notice that I shall move (D. V.) at our next conference that in future we hold three quarterly reunions and one annual conference for business." Signed also by W. Worth. Resolved that the question of the advisability of holding a Sunday-school demonstration this year be placed in the hands of the district presidency and the district Sunday-school superintendent, they to report to the branches as early as possible. The district secretary here tendered his resignation, giving his reasons for so doing. It was resolved "that Bro. Brien's resignation be received with regret, and we give him our best thanks for his faithful services of the past." Bro. Brien tendered the resignation of his assistant, A. E. Gayter, who was not present, thus leaving the new secretary free to choose his assistant. W. Worth of Stockport, was elected secretary. He nominated as his assistant H. W. Preston who was elected. Election of officers: "Resolved that we reelect the remaining officers of the district." This was carried unanimously. A suitable letter was ordered to be sent to Sr. Ada Green thanking her for her efforts in regard to the Manchester district fund; a sum of five pounds was turned over to the fund as the result of a concert which the sister got up. Resolved that the presidency of the district be a committee to draw up a letter of condolence to be sent to the relatives of our late bishop, Bro. Thomas Taylor, of Birmingham. A vote of condolence was passed with Sr. Berry (who was present) on her recent bereavement through the death of her sister, Sr. Sharrocks. A letter of condolence was ordered to be sent to the husband of the late Sr. Sharrocks. A vote of thanks was accorded to Elder John Foden and choir for their efforts in rendering some anthems during the Sunday services. Bro. Foden was reelected district chorister. W. R. Armstrong was reelected as district auditor for the ensuing two years. General, mission, and local authorities of the church were sustained by vote. William Worth, secretary.

To Saints and Friends of Far West, Nodaway, and Southeastern Missouri Districts; Greeting: Having been placed in charge of the above named field, I address this communication to you. The brethren of the missionary force will labor in their fields as appointed by the Twelve. We want the hearty coöperation of the Saints. Please remember that it takes means to travel, therefore help to sustain the brethren with your means and prayers. We would like all the local ministry to help. In the early rise of this church nearly all that held the priesthood worked. Let us follow the admonition of the apostle James, chapter 3, verses 6 to 8, in regard to that unruly member, the tongue. I shall get around over the districts as soon as I can.

Send me reports not later than the first of July, October, January, and March.

Those wanting preaching, let us know. We want to open as many new places as possible. Your colaborer, 629 North Main Street, NEVADA, Mo. F. C. KECK.

To the Saints and Friends of the Northeastern Illinois District; Greeting: Having been appointed to supervise and direct, in a measure, the missionary interests of the district for the current conference year, we solicit the coöperation of all interested in the success of the Lord's work in this field.

Though our missionary force is limited, it is expected that all opportunities for missionary effort will be utilized to the limit of our capabilities.

There are times when the local church interests can be best conserved by the aid of counsel and advice of the traveling ministry; and it is not infrequent when missionary interests demand the hearty support and coöperation of the local church workers. Harmony and concert of action are essential to the exhibition of the spirit of our heavenly Master. The aim of all should be to move forward in touch with the entire interests of the work. "To be workers together with God," is vital to the success of one and all.

My address is, Box 314, Plano, Illinois.

F. M. COOPER, District Missionary in Charge.

To the Saints of the Utah District; Greeting: Feeling an effort should be put forth by all lovers of truth and more especially by those who have obtained like precious faith, for the carrying into effect of the plans that have been made and arranged for the coming year's work in our immediate district, consider it prudent to address an epistle to the Saints requesting them to aid and encourage the standard-bearers of Israel, by assisting them not only with your moral support but also in a financial way, that the work may roll forward.

And that the work be not hindered we again call attention to the fact that "tithes" and "offerings" are a part of the work that must not be neglected; remember "the Lord loveth a cheerful giver."

The missionary's wife, who is not so fortunate as some of our sisters as to have an income from their husbands' labors, is placed in a critical condition if the Saints fail to bring that which rightly belongs to the Lord into his storehouse.

We feel to congratulate the Saints of Utah for their hearty support in the past year, but in so doing we must again solicit their hearty and unceasing support for the work here until we are summoned home, to reap the reward of our labors:

"Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."—Galatians 6:7. If we sow the good seeds of faith, hope, and charity, we can expect to receive the same in return, "pressed down" and "running over." So also if we impart of our substance for the work of the Master, and for the support of those who have sacrificed a husband and father for the work's sake, we shall in no wise lose our reward, but will secure the smiling providence of God upon us, and in the day of accounting will "receive double" for all our work.

Then as followers of the meek and lowly Nazarene, let us rally one and all to the support of truth, and every one act in his office and calling. He that is called to preach let him preach, and he that has been called to the business side of life, let him perform his duties by presenting his tithes and offerings to the Lord.

The undersigned is prepared to receive and receipt for tithes and offerings until official changes are made; so let us hear from you one and all.

J. E. VANDERWOOD.

PLEASANT GROVE, Utah, May 29, 1907.

Fourth Quorum of Priests.

Dear Brethren: It becomes our duty as presiding officers of the Fourth Quorum of Priests to issue this pastoral letter. We are now entering upon another conference year of faithful service to our Captain, Jesus the Christ. Are we all keeping step with the gospel band? Are we all ready to be placed on picket duty or on the firing-line, go where duty calls us to go, and do what duty requires us to do? Are we ready for the dress-parade—or clean who bear the vessels of the Lord? Do we go from house to house in the Spirit of the Master with a message of love and peace, to raise the fallen, if any there are, and to teach those who have been newly born into the kingdom the duties they owe to God and their fellow men?

The Captain has said: "The blood of this generation will I require at your hands." Therefore it behooves us, one and all, to be at our Master's business. Let us see to it that in this coming year, and when the time shall come to submit our annual report, it will be said of the Fourth Quorum of Priests that by our faith we had a good report.

We do not wish to find fault with those who have done faithful service. God forbid! But we do find fault with those of our number who failed to send in their reports. Out of forty-eight members only thirty reported. This does not make the showing for the quorum that we should have.

The presidency of the quorum desires that each member report his labors at least once every three months. By this system we will keep in touch with each other, exchange ideas, instruct one another pertaining to our duties, and keep step with the good old gospel band—mark time to the Spirit of the Master who is continually admonishing his people to "come up higher." Then let us put on the whole armor of our God, that when we are called upon to give an account for our stewardship we will hear the plaudit: Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, now I will make thee ruler over many.

Ever praying for the welfare of the Fourth Quorum of Priests, and the church in general, we are,

In bonds of peace,

GEORGE EDWARDS, President.

R. F. HILL, First Counselor,.

W. B. TORRANCE, Second Counselor.

Telephoning Without Wires.

After almost a year of constant experiment on radio-telephony Doctor De Forest has reached the conclusion that wireless telephony on a practical and commercial scale has been realized.

The practical development of this invention now has progressed so far that sounds produced in Doctor De Forest's laboratory in New York City have been heard not only at other laboratories, several miles distant, but distinctly at Quarantine, twelve miles, on board the steamer Bermudian. In fact, Doctor De Forest has been informed by numerous amateurs in New York City and Brooklyn that their apparatus has frequently responded to the waves corresponding to music sent out from his transmitter. It might be said here by way of explanation that modern wireless telegraph systems employ almost exclusively for long distance work a telephone to receive the signals. This instrument is one of the most sensitive means of detecting the presence of an electric current or any variation in its intensity or frequency. Consequently, if an experimenter is listening for the click, click, corresponding to the wireless signals sent out at some transmitter station, and hears instead music or the human voice, he must know that his apparatus is responding not to the dots and dashes of the Morse alphabet, but to waves in unison with the original sound waves appropriate to the sound. Now, in wireless telegraphy we do not change the frequency of electric waves, but we produce and interrupt them at such frequency as we desire in order to form our dots and dashes. In wireless telephony we have a similar condition, and while we can not vary the frequency of the waves yet we can vary their amplitude or intensity as we please. Our ability to do this very rapidly, in fact as rapidly as the vibrations of the human voice or other sound, makes wireless telephony possible, as receivers have been devised sufficiently sensitive to respond to these waves and to translate them into varying electric currents which produce corresponding vibrations in the diaphragm of a telephone receiver and thus produce sound that is audible to the human ear.—From "Wireless telephony by the De Forest system," by Herbert T. Wade, in the American Monthly Review of Reviews for June.

Current Literature for June.

"Current Literature," a well-known literary man recently remarked, "is not a magazine, but a liberal education." The characterization may be aptly applied to the June number in which this remarkable electric news-magazine surpasses even itself. "Taft," the "Moyer Haywood Incident," and "The breakdown of American institutions," are brilliantly discussed. The unselfishness of Governor Hughes and the Egotism of Queen Wilhelmina, Sovereign Lady of The Hague, are brought out in brisk personal articles, while a character sketch of Cardinal Merry del Val, "the Pope's Loeb," is equally instructive and amusing. That Literary Sphinx, Henry James, is taken up, likewise in another article the new philosophy of "pragmatism," preached by the novelist's brother, Professor William James. "How Mrs. Eddy won out" and "The immorality of our prison system" vary with articles on vital philosophical problems stripped of their obtuseness by the editorial touch. The same may be said of the scientific articles which embrace the whole circle of human knowledge, including such questions as "Is there such a thing as insanity?" and "Are the lines on Mars optical delusions?" Drama and Music are particularly well represented. The play reprinted this time is "The road to yesterday," a fantasy of reincarnation, a stimulating and delightful product of native dramatic art. "The democracy of music achieved by invention," suggests musical possibilities undreamed of in Bellamy's "Looking Backward." "The golden age of vaudeville," and "Julia Marlowe's victorious invasion of England," crystallize striking events in the dramatic history of America. Readers of "Recent Fiction and the Critics," will not be in doubt as to what novels the opinion of the whole English speaking world has singled out as worth reading. Of the poetry department it has been remarked that on perusing it one feels the approach of a renaissance of verse.

A Famous Newspaper Man.

William E. Curtis, the famous correspondent of the Chicago Record-Herald, writes a two-column letter for his paper every day in the year without intermission. His powers of sustained work are as great a marvel as his faculty of always making his matter interesting.

Probably no other newspaper correspondent in the country is read regularly and eagerly by so many thousands of men and women as Mr. Curtis. Mr. Curtis has traveled several times around the world, visiting every country under the sun, and writing a larger number of brilliant and interesting letters of travel than were ever before produced by a single hand. Many of these have later been reprinted in book form. One of his latest expeditions for the Record-Herald was through Mexico, resulting in a series of letters as entertaining as those he wrote a few years ago from India, Turkey, and the Holy Land. His forthcoming letters from Ireland, Russia, and Germany will rival in importance and interest any of his previous contributions.

Beginning his career in Chicago as a reporter in 1872, Mr. Curtis rapidly rose to be managing editor. He resigned that position to accept a government appointment as secretary of the South American commission. So brilliantly did he perform the duties of this office that James G. Blaine, Secretary of State, placed him at the head of the Bureau of American Republics. At the world's fair in Chicago he distinguished himself as the executive head of the Latin-American department. He is a member of almost every learned society in Washington and of many in Europe. It is not strange that the Record-Herald prints Mr. Curtis' letter every day in the first column of the front page and that nothing but a California earthquake can displace it from that station of honor.

We also pay interest on time deposit certificates. A number of the brethren are living here, others are looking forward to this location as a future home, and late revelation and admonition foreshadow coming events, adding materially to our spiritual holdings necessary to signs of the times, and in this connection our Board of Directors propose to safeguard the financial interests of the Saints by offering to them a depository proof against graft, greed, or calamity governed by a kindred feeling born of the interest we have in common. It is not popular men, large capital, heavy deposits, National or State laws, that offer absolute security to depositors, but directors and officers progressive and conservative, possessed of the virtue of true manhood shorn of all political ambition, with no taste for frenzied finance or mining speculation and no inclination to furnish funds for others in that line. ### CHURCH-LEADERS AND TITHE-PAYERS.

"As I live, saith the Lord, in the manner ye execute this matter, so shall ye be judged in the day of judgment."

Though the head of the church that he organized, Jesus Christ lived and died a poor man. He never fleeced the flock. Other men carried the bag and expended the money. Not every church-builder has seen fit to follow his example.

Every religious leader who possesses any influence of moment gathers followers who are engaged in the secular affairs of life and can not devote their time directly to the advancement of the spiritual matters that are to be fostered by their organization. So they adopt the age-old custom of placing the proceeds of their secular labors upon the altar to be converted in due time into the sermons or books they fain would preach or write but can not or into the institutions that they would build but can not.

The fact that they have consecrated hard-earned money argues their sincerity. The man or men to whom is intrusted the handling of this money bear a grave responsibility. If it is misused they rob their fellows on the one hand and God on the other.

To prevent even the possibility of such an occurrence, those who enter in any way into such a transaction should insist that an accounting be had. It should be made easily possible for the people to ascertain the amounts received; the amounts expended, and the channels of expenditure. It ought to be the rule, too, that means, drawn mainly from people of moderate wealth, at times from people in very straightened circumstances, be not used to further swell the fortunes of one who is already wealthy, even though he may be a spiritual leader and may take refuge under the plea that the laborer is worthy of his hire.

In view of the fact that Mrs. Eddy, John Alexander Dowie, Brigham Young, and others have amassed princely fortunes while posing as spiritual leaders and true followers of the carpenter's Son argues the need of such rules. Whether they were honest or dishonest we do not say; but this much is clear, when they assumed complete control of the finances of their institutions they thereby acquired a despotic power that was not right. When they asked others to sacrifice in the interests of the cause while they themselves further augmented their own private fortunes, they did that which was not right.

The position of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints has ever been open and honorable. Between the years 1830 and 1844, which mark first the organization of the church and second the death of Joseph Smith, no man or set of men attained to a position of wealth or power at the expense of the lay membership. Joseph Smith himself lived and died a poor man, sharing the vicissitudes of his brethren as became a follower of Christ—this notwithstanding the fact that he stood at the head of a great church numbering many thousands of adherents and might well have diverted the yearly stream of tithes and offerings to his own advantage. The grinding poverty that came to his widow and children as a result of that policy was ten times more precious than any legacy that might have been left them as a result of questionable methods.

After his death, there obtained conditions among the factions, notably among that faction led by Brigham Young, that were notoriously the reverse of the just rules mentioned in the beginning of this article.

We glean from no enemies of this faction, but from the words of Brigham Young himself, who during the first year of his rule over a poor people in a desert land coined more wealth than Joseph Smith possessed at any time in his life.

"Before I had been one year in this place, the wealthiest man who came from the mines, Father Rhodes, with seventeen thousand dollars, could not buy the possessions I [Brigham Young] had made in one year. It will not begin to do it."—Millennial Star, vol 13, p. 18.

The fact that when he died he left over a million dollars to his heirs is significant.

His present successor, Joseph F. Smith, is reputed to be a millionaire. Certain it is that he figures as president, director, or stockholder in a surprising number of prominent business concerns in Utah.

The policy of that church is and has been to return no itemized report of money received and expended. At their late general conference the church was informed that they had paid more tithes during the past year than during any preceding year. How much or how little the amount is was not stated.

To give and not to question; to get and not report: that seems to be the rule.

Whether or not these men are honest in their use of the people's money we do not know; the contention is that under the present rule no one can know. If they are honest, the system is unfair to them, because it places them where they may be unjustly suspected; in any case it is unfair to the tithe-payers.

Being constantly pressed as to the source of his opulence, Joseph F. Smith made the following statement at their late general conference:

Before I sit down I would like to make another statement. Our enemies have been publishing to the world that the Presidency of the church and the leading officers are consuming the tithes of the people. Now, I am going to tell you a little secret, and it is this: There is not one of the general authorities in the church that draws one dollar from the tithes of the people for his own use. Well, you may say, how do they live? I will give you the key: The church helped to support in its infancy the sugar industry in this country, and it has some means invested in that enterprise. The church helped to establish Z. C. M. I., and it has a little interest in that, and in some other institutions which pay dividends. In other words, tithing funds were invested in these institutions, which give employment to many, for which the trustee-in-trust holds stock certificates, which are worth more to-day than what was given for them; and the dividends from these investments more than pay for the support of the general authorities of the church. So we do not use one dollar of your tithing. I thought I would like to tell you that much, so that when you hear men talking about Joseph F. Smith and his associates consuming the tithes of the people you can throw it back into their teeth that they do not use a dollar of the tithing for their support. I would like our "friends," if I might be permitted to use a vulgar expression, to "put that in their pipe and smoke it." (Laughter.)—Improvement Era, May, 1907.

The laborer who gave ten dollars to help spread the gospel abroad did not give it to be invested in beet-sugar factories the dividends of which were to support men whose fortunes already exceeded his own by many fold. Nor are his rights and the rights of his colaborers fully recognized by the grudging admission that such has been done, while no statement as to the amount so invested and the profits thus resulting is given.

Well knowing the abuses that had obtained and that would continue the Lord spoke to the Reorganization early in its history upon the subject of church finances. The revelation was one of the very first to come through "Young Joseph," and its teachings marked the Reorganization as being at least thus far in strict line of succession with the church formed in 1830; yes, and with the church during the days of Christ when it was considered a shame for men to make merchandise of the work of saving souls. The following is the revelation:

In order to place the church in a position to carry on the promulgation of the gospel, and as a means of fulfilling the law, the twelve will take measures in connection with the bishop, to execute the law of tithing; and let them before God see to it, that the temporal means so obtained is truly used for the purposes of the church, and not as a weapon of power in the hands of one man for the oppression of others, or for the purposes of self-aggrandizement by any one, be he whomsoever he may be. As I live, saith the Lord, in the manner ye execute this matter, so shall ye be judged in the day of judgment.

This safe and wise rule is the true basis of church finance: First, the gathering of means by the biblical system of tithing. Second, its honest and open disbursement along the lines intended by the members of the church when they toiled and prayed and sacrificed that they might have the means withal to help advance the work.

Under the operation of this rule, it has never been possible for any man or set of men to accumulate wealth at the expense of the church. The financial records of the church are open to the yearly inspection of a board of auditors appointed by the church members, and yearly the report of moneys received and expended is made public to be scanned by those who choose.

No man is required to crucify his common sense every time he pays a dollar in tithing.

E. A. SMITH.

GENERAL CHURCH ITEMS.

Almost every day one notes in contemporaneous literature some new proof of the divinity of the Book of Mormon. Mr. James M. Hutchings, an ardent pedestrian, writes in the "Walking Club" department of Good Health for June, describing a recent visit to the cliff-dwellings of Colorado. Of the ancient Cliff-dwellers he says: "The hair on nearly all the mummies found in the cliff ruins is soft, fine, and generally from brown to blonde in color, and the skulls resemble a white man's."

A reorganization of the Decatur County (Iowa) Historical Society was effected at Leon, Iowa, June 1, at a meeting called by President F. M. Smith. Elder Heman C. Smith was elected secretary of the permanent organization. The books and documents of the society will be kept in the library at Leon.

Elders S. M. Reiste and C. E. Willey report seven baptisms at Ottumwa, Iowa, June 3.

CURRENT EVENTS, SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS.

The whirlwind began to reap its annual harvest June 8, when parts of Indiana, Kentucky, and Illinois were visited by heavy tornadoes which damaged several towns and destroyed about thirty lives.

If men live long enough they forget and forgive past differences; probably if they die ere that happy event they do not carry the quarrel over the border, because it is to be supposed that marvelously new scenes will loom high in the foreground to the exclusion of past events. Recently three companies of the original "Johnny Rebs," armed with weapons once used against the United States Government, marched through the streets of Washington, following the stars and stripes, and deposited their weapons and furled flags of the Confederacy in the president's office. Scores of Union soldiers cheered them as they passed and smiled to catch the echo of the famous "rebel yell." The intense bitterness engendered by the great Civil War was forgotten. Time had done its work.

Press reports of a religious gathering in a Pennsylvania city are as follows: "Reading, Pennsylvania, May 19.—Washing of feet and the giving of the 'holy kiss' were two of the features of the love-feast of the German Baptist Brethren of eastern Pennsylvania last night. There was such kissing as is seldom seen in a church. The Reverend A. L. Grater, of Norristown, leaned over and kissed the Reverend D. P. Zienler, of Royers-Ford, who, in turn, passed the kiss along the line through the entire congregation, the last man in turn kissing Grater.

"The sisters also kissed on the side of the church occupied by them. At least two hundred and fifty people exchanged kisses.

"The Reverend A. L. P. Martin, of Harrisburg, explained: 'We are taught in the New Testament that Christ instituted feet washing. Some say: "You are old fogies for washing feet, because it is not necessary." The actual act of washing feet may not benefit those whose hearts are impure, but we believe the command of Christ is upon us, and it is of more spiritual significance than many people are willing to admit.'"

The New York World contains the following account of a sermon by Reverend Berry, president of the Epworth League: "Philadelphia, May 19.—Bishop Joseph F. Berry, of the Methodist Church of Buffalo, in a sermon here to-day declared Methodists must modify their strictures on card-playing and dancing. Bishop Berry is president of the Epworth League."

Not only are doctors of divinity urging modified treatment of sin, but doctors of medicine are calling for reforms in the treatments of disease. We note the following from the Chicago Tribune, June 9:

"LONDON, June 8.—The king's favorite physician, Sir Frederick Treves, frequently has startled the united kingdom by his frank utterances or bright paradoxes. It was he who called the crowd of 'nurses' who flocked to South Africa out of love for sensational advertising 'the plague of women.' In speaking yesterday at the opening of an isolation hospital he observed that the time was not far distant when the bottles on doctors' shelves would be reduced to a small number, and that resort would be had to simple living, suitable diet, plenty of sunshine, and fresh air. He looked forward to the time when people would leave off the extraordinary habit of taking medicine when sick, and referred to the new discoveries in bacteriological science and the great results achieved in the reduction of the mortality of infectious diseases."

Science knows no friends. Wolfram Fuchs, one of the first to labor in developing the X-ray, died in Chicago recently as a result of X-ray burns received during the course of some experiments two years ago.

Archbishop Ireland in his memorial address at St. Paul, Minnesota, in addressing Grand Army of the Republic men, and enlisted men from Ft. Snelling, decried the horrors of war, yet declared that noble war was preferable to ignoble peace. It is to be noted, however, that all wars are noble to those who engage therein.

THE HIGH PRIESTS' QUORUM.

SUGGESTIONS FOR IMPROVEMENT.

(Read before the High Priests' Quorum during the late General Conference.)

The writer has not much to present upon this subject; and possibly those ideas presented may not be of real benefit to the quorum. However, we will suggest the following thoughts:

We may improve ourselves as a quorum by improving individually, thus adding to the sum total of the strength of the quorum as it now exists; and we may further improve by the accession of new members whose ability, worth, and past work commend them to our notice as suitable recruits.

A larger, stronger quorum, with better equipped members, should be our aim.

Taking up the thought of personal improvement first, we may suggest that it is to be obtained along the line suggested in the commandment that every man shall learn his own duty. As high priests we can improve our usefulness in our special line of work by a careful study of those laws governing in branches and districts, so that in the execution of them we may be correct in our procedure and always be found within our constitutional rights. We may further improve by a study of the scriptures and all else that will help to increase our power as public speakers or private instructors. This may well include study and observation of other successful workers and of human nature, so that we may fit ourselves for pastoral work, which brings us in close touch with many phases of human nature, and calls for the constant exercise of good judgment. We must add to this the habit of prayer and spiritual exercise, without which the best informed and most able man will certainly fail as a minister of this restored gospel.

Three of the Twelve in reporting their missions report an urgent need of presiding officers for districts and branches. We should do all in our power to meet this demand, which one of them describes as a positive dearth.

If there is any truth at all in the charge sometimes made that the high priests are not equal to the opportunities offered them, we should do what we can to improve and meet the needs of the hour; if there is no truth in it, then we should establish a record for ability that will for ever discredit the charge.

In regard to building up the quorum numerically, we may say this: In our opinion there is an urgent need of recruits from the ranks of young men. They will help the quorum considerably right now, and to an inestimable extent in future years, when they have acquired experience.

The average age of the quorum is too high—about fifty-six years, if we are correctly informed. There are not enough young men in the quorum coming on to take the places of the aged.

We should follow the example of the Seven Presidents of Seventy, who are constantly on the watch for able men to fill the ranks of the Seventy.

If we find a man who is not a member of the quorum, who is doing well, we have direct evidence that he is qualified for membership, and we have at least indirect evidence that God wants him in the particular quorum whose members are supposed to be the best adapted to pastoral work. We should carefully consider the case of such a man, and unless very serious objections are found, we should see that he is recommended for membership.

The fact (if it be a fact) that in the past high priests have not been properly recognized in their calling should not be urged as an objection against ordaining other high priests. We must build up the quorum until it becomes a power that can not be ignored. We must put it in such condition that if the appointing powers are in search of presiding officers they must of necessity turn to the High Priests' Quorum to find what they want.

As to the question of programs, I have no criticism to pass upon the plan at present pursued. It seems satisfactory and profitable so far as I have been able to observe.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

The foregoing paper was read before the quorum, and by them I was instructed to present it to the HERALD for publication.

Respectfully submitted,

ROBT. M. ELVIN, Secretary.

THE "REORGANIZATION."

Lately there has been growing upon me a great respect for that word Reorganization. Time was when I viewed it as a superlative appellation to an already lengthy title; and as a new acquaintance with this work I sometimes found a little difficulty in getting the sections in their proper order; the "press" gets mixed in like manner as I have many times noticed, and but recently our people were distinguished from the Brighamites by the term Reorganizers in a local press notice.

Now, I want to bring that word into a proper focus before you. It may not be a very smooth, flowing article of speech, but nevertheless it has a world of meaning attached in its relation to our work. It will carry you back past the little nucleus of which Bro. E. C. Briggs loves to tell us, after the shame of the Brighamite apostasy had left the bleeding and wounded church suffering in silence like the poor maimed creature of the thicket; it will carry you back beyond the earlier little company in New York State, and Joseph and Oliver's human trials and divine encouragements to set this work upon its mission; back beyond the early days when plain men carried a simple message among the hills of Palestine to free men from a rock-ribbed theology; back past him who came in the zenith of time to show that there was a path where human feet could travel bringing the soul in safety past death; back past that great travail of a bonded nation who, between bitter experiences and divine counsel, gained majesty—and lost it; back past the group that stood on Ararat and viewed the water-baptized world as some day a proportionate few shall stand and see it baptized by fire; back even to that day when a great central intelligence communed upon the evidence of his labors, and seeing all things therein in their divinely organized state, pronounced them "very good." And perceiving this, and the evil that disorganized that perfect condition, we shall be better able to comprehend the significance of this work of the Reorganization.

pointing as it does to the millennial period soon to come.

That it should at all be necessary to reorganize conditions for man's peace and happiness admits that disorder exists. Let us then view these disorderly things and see how closely they sit at our own hearthstones; for whatsoever things are not conducive to our welfare as workers for the restored order of things should be weeded out. We recognize at once the necessity of a restored gospel as of primary importance and sing,

"Thank the Lord for the plan he has given
That will render us pure as a child:
That will change this cold world into heaven
By his [gospel]...so holy and mild."

Repeating the lines of warning against "the rocks on the shore," we note that the most dangerous rocks are below the surface and we pray the privilege of noting some here and there as we pass; and if they look harsh, remember, please, it is not their beauty but their danger we need to know most!

The purpose of this restored gospel is to reclaim us and to wean us from the thralldom of the world and its false standard of life, where custom has usurped the place of reason! Our new liberty should emancipate us, till all the world should desire the same blessings we exemplify, yet how few "go on to perfection." Custom and formality still dictate, and reason is slurred over; from the cradle to the grave the same rule governs, but must give way before the purpose of the Reorganization.

How very human we are when death has crept into our circle: how we bow meekly to the absurd demands of fashion as it blatantly displays our sorrow to an uncaring, morbid, sordid world, piling up cost (and debt oftentimes) that were better spent for the living, for in our grief and humiliation is our judgment taken away—who would dare protest the fifty dollars demanded for the ten-dollar sweatshop casket, or affront the "faithful" friends—who turn up at marriages and funerals if at none other times—by not providing "carriages," though we may never have been so privileged ourselves in life; then, too, we are assailed at this dark hour by the "floral tribute" sympathizing salesman, and the family is expected to expend five dollars each for a two-dollar emblem, possibly with a slaughtered pigeon attached "beautifully indicative of the Spirit!" increasing the cost of course. The entire lot necessitating another carriage to convey them to the graveyard.

I have seen such as this even among Saints; seen it swallowing up the benefits of an insurance—"a wise provision for those left dependent"—whose premium was many years kept up under sacrifice and privation. Beside such the law of tithing gains new beauty. I have seen the crowded, stuffy, gossipy congregation in their mourning uniforms, and have been forced to reflect with a sigh of relief that the world has indeed need of all this gloomy and incongruous formality for the object it mourns has passed out of its hands at last, and it has but a poor shell to make mock form over even to the long "respectful" string of carriages and the granite block of no use to any one but the mason's bank account.

I have seen other and simpler, where the bereaved had learned a great new truth in their trial and its knowledge shone out through the showers of the countenance, and those who came to mourn felt cheered and comforted instead; so it ever should be, and oft is, thank God, with Saints.

But "let the dead bury the dead"; we turn our thoughts to those whom we have with us this little while: some may be persuaded to view these hindrances to our "perfection" in their proper light and thus be watchful, to be "... Faithful to our mission,

And crush each error low;
Keep back no words of knowledge
That human minds should know!"

Many of these errors come to us in childhood, and we never get far from them, hence the necessity of becoming a child again, discarding this world-wisdom and in simplicity of mind allowing the wisdom that is from above to take possession of our being, else we shall not be able to even see the kingdom now being reorganized, which we are to seek first and then help establish in its righteousness. When we are conforming to the ways of the world out of sheer custom we are oftentimes aiding and abetting that which is in direct opposition to the work of reorganization which God is carrying out under a well-defined plan.

Those things nearest to us then will be the things most affected because of their influence on us or our confidence in them. You or I could not walk ten feet in safety with our eyes shut; yet I see, daily, a blind man who delivers papers on a city route. I know a man who is fretful and out of sorts without his pipe; its corn-cob bowl blots out a good portion of the landscape to him and stands in the way of his seeing God properly, just as if you held your thumb before your eye when talking to a friend.

So sometimes in church I try to see the speaker and there obtrudes upon my vision dead birds and stolen feathers and the furry coats of tortured animals! What a cry they would raise were they not in the bondage of death! Let us read here a moment from Moroni's forecast of these latter days:

Behold the Lord hath shown unto me great and marvelous things concerning that which must shortly come at that day when these things shall come forth among you: . . . There are none, save a few only, who do not lift themselves up in the pride of their hearts, unto the wearing of very fine apparel. . . . Why do ye adorn yourselves with that which hath no life, and yet suffer the hungry, and the needy, and the naked, and the sick, and the afflicted to pass by you, and notice them not?—Mormon 4: 4 (page 497).

But the demand of "hats off" at the play will be heeded long before the admonition to discard feathers at spiritual gatherings. I am grieved at this. "Things" "which hath no life" in them forestall my interest because I like to see every facial expression of the speaker. What an uninspiring house he must face! And if even a sparrow's fall is kept account of in the divine economy, it would seem that the bird killed on its nest for its bridal plumes, and the starving little ones left, have some claim upon the compassion of the Saints if not on more fashionable church-goers. This adornment also sets a wrong example for the children, Zion's "hope." I have sorrowed in Sunday-school at the incongruity of a hat upon the rostrum bearing these mother-murdered aigrettes whose present possessor was leading baby voices to sing: "Happy little birds of praise are we," etc.

Do you not see how the beauty of the song lesson was being stifled by the ocular example before them?—and so it goes. I do not blame, but should not we be more careful? If the person who wears these plumes is accounted a criminal in certain States, and both President of country and President of church speak against this unlovely practice, is it not time the little "hopes" of Zion saw the difference between their mothers, sisters, and teachers, and "the ladies outside"?

I would plead for simplicity in dress because I see too often a wrong standard followed, not because the "dressy" ones are sometimes negligent of financial duties, but because even in their rights they are making it hard for their hard-working sister, who has a family to keep looking nice, causing discouragement and trial to her though they be the very best and dearest of sisters (this, too, is from real life).

Observance of these things teach us the sublime lesson of sacrifice, parting with only selfish pleasures, eliminating those things that do not do us so much good after all, and yet make life far better all about us. Now, are we working for the reorganization, getting back to God and happiness?

Custom dictates how we shall pinch and contort our bodies, injure our feet and hands, and choke ourselves with "correct" (!) collars, how we shall impose upon the long-suffering of our stomachs, and stifle our lungs, to keep "in the pace." The Lord is good enough under the plan of reorganization to counsel us against this "wearing-out" process which Satan is operating against the Saints and humanity in general, but do we heed the counsel? No, we have not the time to study it! Satan sees to that. Woe to the minister who "shuns to declare" it; he offends these little ones.

So we forsake the green trees and fields that God formed for us, and build house to house and suffer the curse thereof, the great "white plague." No more do we understand what we eat, and why we eat; but fancy rules and doctors "alleviate" the effects left by each other's treatment. We feed the baby on stall-fed cows' milk, and ourselves on "chicken" that never used its feet since it was a few weeks old, but has been kept in a dark pigeon-hole and fed with a "squirt-gun" every day till market-fat. This the wholesale way of supplying a demand; do we help to create it? Why do we complain when we suffer, if our perverted appetites cause suffering and distress all about us?

These things are told because they are things which shorten our lives and usefulness—rocks below the surface!

Look at men of old and their great ages, compare with the short span allotted to man to-day; just as we gain wisdom by our experiences we are ready to pass over. No more do the young seek counsel of the old, "honoring their father and their mother that their days may be long," in like manner. But here we see in the Reorganization the patriarchal order for this very purpose restored that by their example and admonition we may have our days lengthened and made vigorous till succeeding generations may live out long lives of usefulness and happiness, while the careless and wicked bring about their own extinction, as a species of mankind, in course of time. It is the inevitable.

Our duty then as Saints is to abide the law of this great Reorganization, this more abundant life, of which the divine Reorganizer of his Father's kingdom, Jesus the Christ, came to teach us, from whom great rivers of living water flow out to whomsoever will drink, absorb, and be refreshed.

"As it was in the days of Noe . . . eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage"—this must indicate a specific time. Such things were ever going on since Adam, so that time is now—judged by the late food scandals, our national liquor bill, and divorce court records—unprecedented in the annals of man! "A time of surfeiting," yes, everything carried to the very limit, the rush and struggle of this age of commercialism whose wage-slaves feeling they are getting the worst of it fly to the other extreme for their pleasure; the factory girl to the Sunday dance and the laborer to his "good time." No wonder God has set about this great Reorganization marking the latter days.

I heard two mechanics commenting on a great automobile works just erected—said one with pride, "That's a model factory, they say; the most complete and modern shop of the kind in the world."

The other replied with bitterness: "Man! that's not a shop, but a fortress! Don't you see in all the length of that building there is not a window, just an iron grated door? See the barbed wire on the walls. I tell you they're prepared for trouble down there, that's the model they follow!"

This means labor troubles, strikes, civil war, and why? Because graft and selfishness rule, and man has little confidence in his brother at large. What is the remedy? Some say the Golden Rule—an intuitive recognition of the Reorganized way (or church) of Jesus Christ, which is destined to bring us, according to the wise old monitors of all ages, the prophets, to that condition of peace and security, such as God placed man first in, "where none shall hurt or destroy," or "make afraid"; and every living creature shall sing aloud in their joy of that great, full, and complete REORGANIZATION at last effected for all. Amen. ERNEST WEBBE.

CRITICISM OF THE REVEREND MR. HAUPT VERSUS "JOSEPH SMITH DEFENDED."—NO. 4.

We will next take up the ten objections before referred to, and answer Reverend Haupt's replies.

Objection No. 1. "It is unreasonable to expect prophets or revelations now."

To that I replied:

"It is not unreasonable for: God is just the same to-day as formerly. His ear is not dull. His mouth is not dumb. His love for man is not abated. He loves his younger children as much as the older ones. He is no respecter of persons. We need his Spirit to guide us in the religious confusion of to-day. His Spirit will have the same effect on us to-day as of olden time. We can not say that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost—by revelation. We need prophets now to settle disputed questions. . . . Any one of the above statements is a sufficient answer to the above objection and taken altogether they form a strong case that we have yet to see answered."

Mr. Haupt does not attempt an answer to the above statements, but says: "Mr. Peterson's arguments apply as much to the 'Dark Ages' as to this age. God being the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, he has never left himself without witness. In a certain sense he has had prophets alway, and his will has been revealed to the righteous in all ages."

We fail to see wherein our argument was in favor of prophets during the "Dark Ages" neither are we willing to accept his conclusions from the text he quotes which shows the unchangeability of Christ. For Christ and the Father may be and doubtless are unchangeable, yet were not able in certain ages of the world to find a prophet who would be faithful to declare the divine word against the apostate church, nor was there a people who would receive his message. Indeed it is with extreme difficulty in this age of religious freedom that people can be persuaded to hear his prophet, much less when the dominant church anathematized and put to the rack all heretics. We admit that God was willing to reveal himself all along, but the people would not listen. Mr. Haupt's argument can hold good only when he proves that the church kept the faith, or would permit others to do so. It is not a question of God's willingness or unwillingness, but the faithfulness of the church. Concerning the faithfulness of the church the reader will notice Mr. Haupt seldom mentions it but glides by and around it very carefully every time he approaches it. This is a very prominent point to bear in mind.

As to prophets in a Bible sense, there has not existed in the Episcopal Church, in a thousand years and more, a real true prophet as in Bible times. Amos prophesied of a time when, "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord God, that I will send a famine in the land, not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord: and they shall wander from sea to sea, and from the north even to the east, they shall run to and fro to seek the word of the Lord, and shall not find it."—Amos 8: 11, 12. We repeat the last clause, "and shall not find it." But Mr. Haupt says "there were prophets alway. And God has never left himself without witness." This prophecy was either fulfilled before or since Christ and in either case relieves Mr. Haupt of his inflated interpretation of Hebrews 13: 8: "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever." He would argue from this text that there has been an accepted church in the world ever since the days of Christ. But that text proves just as clearly that there must have been a church all the while before Christ, provided we put his construction on it. In speaking of the work of Joseph Smith, Mr. Haupt says, "He should have presented his new revelation to the ancient people of God for their inspection," meaning as the ancient people of God the Catholic Church. Using his own ground against himself we would say in this connection, When, therefore, Jesus came, he should have appeared to one or more of the Jewish churches, and presented his new revelation for the inspection of the ancient people of God." Will Mr. Haupt tell us that baptism and confirmation in the church of the ancient people of God, the Pharisees or the Sadducees, were acceptable to God? If so, why did not Jesus apply to them to administer the rite of baptism to himself? If not, then before Christ came the "ancient people of God" had lost divine authority. If during the "yesterday" of this text it was possible for the church which Moses established in the wilderness to lose her authority and be ignored of Christ, then, during the "to-day" and "for ever" could not the same thing have occurred among the Gentiles, and the "ancient people of God" be rejected? So much so that in 1830 he found none of the sects acceptable with him, but ignored them all? This text does not prove Mr. Haupt's position but very materially weakens it, if we allow his interpretation. The text proves only the unchangeability of Christ, but says nothing whatever of the unchangeability of the church. Mr. Haupt, therefore, inflates this text and reads into it what is not there, and which, if there, would destroy his own argument. Let Mr. Haupt present proof that the church has continued in the faith, and then let us examine that faith in the light of scripture. Mr. Haupt's advice is good just here: "A man should therefore be careful not to thus endanger his own salvation and that of others by wrongly dividing the word of truth."

In Mr. Haupt's revision his language differs from the original, but the thought is the same. Not knowing that his writing would be criticised, his first writing is more plain and less diplomatic than his revision. As he is the author of both, we are justified in replying to both. Other things as they appeared in his former tract under objection No. 1 are replied to elsewhere.

Objection No. 2. "It is out of harmony with the Bible to expect prophets from God now."

The substance of my reply to this objection was, the Comforter which Jesus promised was the spirit of revelation and prophecy (see St. John 16: 13; and Revelation 19: 10), and if received in this age would reveal God's will to its recipients and make prophets of some of them. I then proved that a number of prophets lived in New Testament times and are mentioned by name therein. Afterward I proved from history that there were prophets in the church of Jesus Christ for several hundreds of years. I ended my argument by quoting Ephesians 4: 8, 11-13. "When he ascended up on high . . . he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ: till we all come in the unity of the faith."

Mr. Haupt's reply was: "Again the argument is as much in favor of the continuance of the gift of prophecy, as that God would renew it."

My answer to his former criticism of a similar character, holds good here too. His conclusions are jumped at, and a good long jump at that. For what God desired the church to become was one thing, and what they became is quite another. Mr. Haupt's argument seems all the while to show what the Lord wanted the church to be, and ours has been to show that it failed. This text does not indicate that the church would remain in the faith during all time to come. Paul merely mentioned the order of God whereby he proposed to bring the church in the unity of the faith and it can not and will not be accomplished in any other way, hence our need of prophets now. Not only in this matter did man go contrary to God's will, but it is a common fault of the creature. All of God's laws are fixed, whether natural or spiritual. Our attitude toward them differs in each individual case and collectively as well. Take the force of electricity: it has been the same from the beginning, but for hundreds of years men did not know of its existence. But because that force is eternal and perpetual one would hardly argue that the church of God was to continue. The same might be said of heat and cold; light and darkness; sound, air, etc. Man can use these forces to his great advantage, but he does not always do so. The forces that pertain to our spiritual natures are also immutable and unchangeable; but man does not always honor the conditions. It is folly, then, for one to spend so much time in harping on the unchangeability of God and his law when the real point is, Did the church keep the faith? It has not been proved that she did, and the lack of the gifts of the Spirit in the churches which claim to have done so prove their claims untrue. "The proof of the pudding is in the eating of it." Jesus' promise to be with certain men always was on the condition that they taught all things which he had taught them.

In this connection Mr. Haupt says again: "It seems strange that the 'till' of this passage (Ephesians 4:13) is overlooked by Mormons, Irvingites, Byramites, Dowieites, etc. Not only had Christ at the beginning given apostles, prophets, etc., to the church, but that without a break they should continue 'till' we all come in the unity of the faith," etc.

"Without a break." Why did he find it necessary to add that to the apostle's words unless he saw that the text did not prove his point without it? I wonder if he remembers what he said in another place about adding to the Bible, when commenting on Revelation 22:18? I can not answer for the Mormons, Irvingites, or others, but as for the Latter Day Saints of the Reorganization, I think many of them have noticed the word "till." "Till we all come to the unity of the faith." We; who? The church, certainly. Paul used the word we, first person, and not you, second person, or they, third person. Apostles, prophets, and all the officers, together with "helps, governments, and diversity of tongues," were placed in the church to bring men to the unity of the faith, and to "the measure of the fullness of the stature of Christ." But schism soon arose. Antichrist entered in. Grievous wolves drew away disciples after them. They turned away from the truth and heaped to themselves false teachers. And thus failing to come to a unity of the faith or to arrive at the measure of the stature of Christ, they failed to honor the conditions of the spiritual code. They failed to teach all things which their Master had commanded them, and no longer continuing in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship they fell away from God and rejected the order of God against themselves. God's offer to bring them to a unity of the faith was rejected and their own way set up with a pope and other unscriptural officers at the head. Perhaps a few in England did not depart so soon, but in time were amalgamated with Rome and were with her rejected, so that to-day we must return and accept the divine order. The authority having been lost through transgression, it was necessary to restore it again from heaven. God will continue to insist on the divine plan being accepted "till" he develops a people who will arrive at "the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ."

Mr. Haupt's rendering of this text is strained, unscriptural, and impossible. Wonder if he ever noticed that the apostles and prophets and all their quondam successors and all that he claims for them, did not, will not, and can not, bring the whole world into the faith? That was not what Paul meant. The church will never in this world be catholic, and less so toward the end. Therefore to make this passage teach a theory so out of harmony with reason, history, and fact, Mr. Haupt calls "sacrilegious." Catholic means universal, and the church has never been that. The term is a misnomer and more especially when applied to the Church of England, "by law established" (the law of the land, not the law of God). The term "Holy Catholic" is worse yet, as holiness has never been universal. The bride should be called after the name of the bridegroom, "Jesus Christ," and not assume a strange name.

Mr. Haupt continues, "If this be true, [that prophets, etc., were to continue without a break,] then before present-day revelation and writings can be forced upon the ancient people of God these Latter Day Saints should read the writings of the apostolic Fathers and Doctors of the church which excel the writings of Joseph Smith, including the Book of Mormon, as the glory of the sun excels that of the moon."

Latter Day Saints are not trying to "force" their faith on the Episcopal Church if they are who he means by "the ancient people of God." The Christian service to their Master to be effectual must be voluntary in all its parts. A religion of coercion is not the religion of Christ. Until the Church of England ceases to coerce their infants in baptism, their charge of "force" against others comes with poor grace.

"Should read the writings of the apostolic Fathers," etc. Indeed! How does he know that Latter Day Saints do not read them? That sounds considerably like, "I am learned, but you are not." We freely confess that we put more dependence in the Bible than in those writings, and it would be better if some modern Doctors (D. Ds.) would put less faith in man and more in God. (See Jeremiah 17:5.)

"The writings of the apostolic Fathers excel the writings of Joseph Smith." What he intended to say was, he "thought" those writings excelled, etc. At least that is what he should have said. Mr.

Haupt is not the literary judge for others. But if he knows no more of the authorship of those writings than he knows of the authorship of the Book of Mormon, his knowledge is exceedingly faulty. He says, "the writings of Joseph Smith, including the Book of Mormon." But Joseph Smith was not the author of the Book of Mormon. His claim was that even the translating of it was done through the urim and thummim. How does it come that Mr. Haupt did not accept the story that Solomon Spalding or Sidney Rigdon wrote it? We credit him with good judgment in evading that error. In his revised writing he says, "The writings of Joseph Smith and the Book of Mormon." Glad he is improving.

Objection No. 3. "We have the word of God and therefore do not need prophets now."

The substance of my reply was:

We have in the Bible only a history of the word of God. We need the word direct to us. If God will not speak now it robs him of his love, makes him changeable, and forbids the full operation of the Holy Spirit. Though we have the New Testament, we do not agree as to its meaning. Why will not God direct men as literally as of old? Why will he not speak to them? Where is the man who would deny the exercise of God's love and kindness in answering literally the consistent prayer of searchers after truth? If there ever was a time when we needed prophets it is now when the religious world has been thrown into such a conglomeration of beliefs as it has not seen since its creation. It is a great lesson to onlookers if others can not see their folly in trying to limit God's love and the gifts of the Holy Ghost, many times fighting each other and at the same time claiming that each is a branch of the great tree of truth. A kingdom divided against itself is not the kingdom of God. Positively no two churches can differ and both be right.

To these conclusions Mr. Haupt replied:

"The author argues that prophets are needed and that the loss of the prophetic office has caused all the divisions."

No, sir, my argument was that the loss of inspiration and revelation had left men in darkness to fight against each other and oppose the love of God. The loss of the prophetic office is one thing and the loss of revelation may be another. To be sure there could be no prophet without revelation, but there could be revelation without a prophet.

But Mr. Haupt says, "if the office ceased it must have been because God ceased to send prophets."

May it not have been because there were no prophets to send and no people to receive their message? The dominant church claimed that unless they presented their "new revelation to the ancient people of God for their inspection," they were heretics and ought to be killed. They claimed all power and all authority, the canon of scripture had been closed, their doctrines were called infallible, and their church Catholic. Where was there any room for a prophet to come and correct their errors and add a few more chapters of revelation? It was the fault of the people, the dominant church, and not the decree of God. So before and all along, Mr. Haupt fails to see or to concede that there is another party to consider when we speak of an apostasy, and that party was the church. When we speak of an apostasy, of a failure, of departing from the faith, of cessation of prophets and the gifts of the Holy Spirit, he tries to turn the matter and make it appear that it could apply only to God. He seems unwilling to concede even another side to the question. Is he afraid to do so or is he blinded and can not see it? Many times a man gets so deep in a groove that he can not see what is outside of it. Let him show that the church did not depart from the faith, that they have throughout nineteen centuries taught all things that Jesus commanded them, that they have all the officers intact; that they enjoy the favor of God, and have the full operation of the Holy Ghost.

"AND STILL THEY TRUST IN A REFUGE OF LIES."

In volume 54, number 16, page 326 of the HERALD, is to be found an article under the above caption; and having been associated with the writer of that article at the time he was corresponding with the Deseret News Book Store, regarding the latest addition of their Doctrine and Covenants, and having a personal knowledge of the facts in the case, I pen this article to serve as an appendix to the one above referred to.

The wise man has said: "A false witness shall not be unpunished, and he that speaketh lies shall not escape."—Proverbs 19: 5. Whenever an individual undertakes to maintain his ground or position by resorting to falsehood, that moment he lays a snare in which to catch himself, and we have a case in point where the above is verified. By referring to the Proceedings before the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the United States Senate in the Matter of the Protests Against the Right of Honorable Reed Smoot, a Senator from Utah, to retain his seat, pages 291 and 336, volume 1, we find Joseph F. Smith declaring under oath that the reason why the Manifesto had not been printed in their Doctrine and Covenants was that it was an oversight, and that he would use his influence to have it published in the next edition, and an edition having been published in the latter part of the summer of 1906, called forth the article above referred to. Of course they were very careful to remove the date line of the late edition so that the public would be at sea in deciding as to whether the undated issue is of a recent date or whether it had been published for some time.

But the text which declares, "He that speaketh lies shall not escape," is brought to bear forcibly upon the case in point, when we find they have made another oversight, in that they have published the Doctrine and Covenants, with the concordance to it, in one volume; and while they have been very careful to omit the date line in the Doctrine and Covenants, the concordance bears date of 1906; and it does not require very much intelligence to know they were both published at the same time, when they are bound in one volume.

And besides that, we have seen on sale at their book stores at Salt Lake City and Ogden an edition of the Doctrine and Covenants published by Heber J. Grant in Liverpool, England, and bearing date of 1906, and it does not contain the Manifesto either.

So we are forced to conclude that Joseph F. Smith has wilfully falsified and caught himself in his own trap, or else he is losing his influence greatly among his followers and coloborers.

How long shall this state of affairs exist, and the people uphold their leaders in this kind of deception? Is it not time that those who love truth were awakening to the awful situation their leaders are plunging them into by their system of blind and unquestioning obedience?

Of General Interest

THREE GLIMPSES OF FIFTEEN CENTS.

Three small cottages, exactly alike, stood in the glaring heat of an August sun. Toward them walked three tired young workmen, carrying dinner pails.

As Workman Number One turned in at the first cottage, a tired mother face brightened at the sound of his footsteps. Gently she put aside four clinging little hands and hurried to the door to greet papa with a kiss.

Papa gave her a peck on the cheek, in return, growled something indefinite at the babies, dropped heavily into the one rocking-chair, and sent the elder baby after a glass of water, while the second toddler brought his slippers.

The wife stood longingly at his side brushing the damp hair from his forehead. If only he had drawn her down into his lap and cuddled her for one brief moment, all the dark cares of the day would have dropped from her shoulders like a heavy mantle.

He lighted his pipe and buried himself in the evening paper until supper was served. Rested and refreshed, he sauntered around to the nearest bar-room, where he paid fifteen cents for a mug of superfluous beer and the social privilege of crackling jokes with his mates until bed-time.

Meanwhile the babies slept. The little mother sat alone in the long twilight, and no one but God saw her tears.

As Workman Number Two opened his door, a loving smile searched out a frowsy young wife and a sickly babe. He kissed them both, dropping fifteen cents into the frowsy one's lap.

"Thank the Lord," said she. "I feel as if I'd die if I couldn't git away from this squallin' kid onct in a while. You take her, an' I'll git ready right away. The girls is expectin' me. She's cried the hull blessed day."

The father took the fretful little one and gave her a cool bath. Then he spread a quilt in the shade of a tiny back porch, laid the babe upon it, and fanned her to sleep.

The frowsy one hurried into her cheap finery, topped her enormous "pompadour" with a flowered hat, waved a soiled glove at her husband, and left for her outing with "the girls."

A glass of soda-water and a ticket to a ten-cent show disposed of the fifteen cents.

Late in the evening she returned to the untidy home, more than ever discontented with the responsibilities of married life and motherhood.

Workman Number Three was waylaid on his own doorstep by two small brigands who grabbed him by both knees; but his laughing first kiss was for the little wife.

"Have you had a hard day, darling?" The day had been unusually hard with the heat, the ironing, and the care of two lively boys; but all at once the memory of its weariness left her mind.

"It seemed hard before you came, dearest; it doesn't seem so now." He swung both youngsters to his broad shoulders.

"I'll get cleaned up and dress the kiddies, while you put some bread and milk and cookies in the dinner pail. We'll have our supper in the park!"

The youngsters gave a squeal of delight. "But,

John, you've lunched once to-day; you——" He interrupted her gaily—

"It will cost fifteen cents to ride three miles, eat supper by the cool waters of the lake, visit the animals"—another squeal from the youngsters—"and listen to the music—three and three fourths cents apiece. Isn't that cheap enough? At bedtime I'll put you and the babies on the car, and I'll walk home. Come, kiddies, a race for the bathroom!"

In the cool of the evening two happy boys and a little mother with a glorified expression boarded the car and waved their little hands to a strong young workman who swung away in the moonlight as if he might beat them home.—The Public.

THE TRAGEDY OF A LIFE.

Theodore Tilton, who lies dead in the seclusion of his obscure home in Paris, represents all that is mortal of a once brilliant and happy man. In the midst of his country-wide fame, he was stricken a mortal blow by that most deadly foe of human happiness, domestic infidelity. The wife whom he had cherished, confessed herself untrue to him and named his dearest friend and benefactor as a party to the wrong. From that day, Tilton's fame waned, and he sank lower and lower in the world's regard until it lost sight of him, buried amid the life of a foreign city, and only became aware of his continued mortal existence when the announcement of his serious illness was made.

The story of the Beecher-Tilton case is of well-known history among the older people of this generation. Tilton was an ambitious young graduate of a business college. Beecher took interest in him and employed him as stenographer. The personal relations between the two became intimate, and when Tilton fell in love with the girl who was to become his wife, Beecher gave him his aid and ultimately performed the marriage ceremony. Mrs. Tilton was a charming and brilliant woman, and her home was the mecca of many prominent thinkers and writers. Beecher became a frequent caller.

Meanwhile Tilton had risen to fame as a lawyer and lecturer. His great platform effort, "The Problem of Life," contained, however, no remedy for the insidious wrong that was creeping into his own. One day Mrs. Tilton confessed the wrong she had done him, and he brought suit against his erstwhile friend and benefactor, now the despoiler, he believed, of his home. The trial was one of the sensations of that generation. It was the topic of every tongue. No home was so well guarded that its slimy details did not enter for discussion. The case ended in a mistrial. The jury could not agree, and Tilton, too heartsick and weary to go farther with the matter, abandoned it and soon left the country, never to reappear in public life. His wayward wife died, and the man whom he and the world believed had wrecked his life also passed to his reward. The stain of the accusation remained with Beecher till his dying day, and it still mars his memory. The shadow that fell across the brilliant career of Tilton eventually blotted him from the world, and athwart the tablet that will mark his grave it will always lie, a grim symbol of a human tragedy.—Hawk Eye, May 28.

WEIGHT OF LONDON FOG.

At a recent meeting of the Coal Smoke Abatement Society in London, Sir Frederick Treves, the famous physician, said that in a three days' fog in Manchester it was calculated that for every square mile there were one and a half hundredweights of sulphuric acid, and thirteen hundredweights of soot. A similar examination in Chelsea revealed that for every square mile there were six tons of soot. The lung of a young child was the color of a fine tinted pink—pink on the surface, and pink right through. The lung of an adult, especially if he lived in a big city, was dingy blue—thundercloud blue, marked with lines of blue patches and streaks, a color which permeated the inner depths of the organ. That was absolutely due to dirt and soot. Sir Frederick declared he could say from what he had seen of the lungs of dead persons in London that they were absolutely black on the surface and down to their depths. "In London," said Sir Frederick, "fogs killed people, not by scores and hundreds, but by thousands. During the great fog of 1880 the death rate in the metropolis in one week rose from twenty-seven to the thousand of population to forty-eight."—Kansas City Journal, May, 1907.

GET-RICH-QUICK BUSINESS; INCLUDING MINING STOCKS.

Anent the get-rich-quick schemes of all sorts that are being promoted by eloquent chaps and voluminous advertising, it may be remarked that in this age of concrete self-seeking there are not many people possessed of sure enough fortunes which they are earnestly seeking to unload and bestow upon absolute strangers or even their best friends. Of course, there have been angels in disguise going around to bless people; but there is no well-verified instance where that sort of celestial visitant was revealed in the form of a promoter of mining schemes or oil stock companies. There are very many philanthropists in the world, but they almost always overflow with beneficence and do not ask the recipients to pour out a little cash to start the fountain to their bounties.

So when one is asked to subscribe or pay money to get in on the ground floor of some syndicate he may be sure that the enterprise is in the experimental stage, or a matter of speculation, lacking the element of certainty.

Sure-thing fortunes do not go begging in these days of plethoric bank deposits, and when one goes fishing in the sea of speculation, with hook and line well baited with glittering coin, remember that there are millions of small fish for every whale. So do not be disappointed if your catch is small fry, and you may be thankful to get the worth of your bait.—Selected.

SLAUGHTER IN WAR AND PEACE.

We have before us the casualty lists of that greatest of all fields of carnage—the railroads of the United States. Lest the gentle reader should object to our phraseology, calling it sensational, we ask his attention to the Interstate Commerce Commission statistics of deaths and injuries for the last three months of 1906, which opens with the following statement: "The number of persons killed in train accidents during the months of October, November, and December, 1906, as shown in reports made by the railroad companies to the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the 'accident law' of March 3, 1901, was 474, and of injured 4,940. Accidents of other kinds, including those sustained by employees while at work, and by passengers in getting on and off the cars, etc., bring the total number of casualties up to 20,944 (1,430 killed and 19,514 injured)."

At the above rate, the total number of people killed on the railroads in twelve months would be 5,720, and the total number injured 78,056, or a total of 83,766 casualties in a single year. If we remember rightly, this is more than twice as many as were killed on the British side during all the years of the Boer War; while the total number of injured exceeds the total number that were wounded by bullet and shell. But such wars as the South African trouble come intermittently and with decreasing frequency, whereas the casualties of peace are with us always and increase with the passing of the years.

The deaths and injuries on our railroads, appalling in number though they be, represent after all but a fraction of the total number of casualties occurring every year in the prosecution of the so-called arts of peace. The mine, the quarry, the smelting furnace, the mill, the machine-shop, all present an annual death and casualty roll which, according to the most eminent authority on the subject in this country, Doctor Josiah Strong, is placed at the stupendous figure of 525,000. The railway accidents and their appalling results are more in the public eye than other disasters, for the reason that practically every citizen travels on the railroads, and that the government collects and publishes the statistics of deaths and injuries. But the grim facts regarding the frequency of deaths and injuries in pursuits other than those identified with railroading are just as real, just as shocking, and every whit as disgraceful to our national good name as those relating to the railroads.

Now, on the basis of over half a million industrial accidents in the United States in a single year, it may be stated that one person out of every one hundred and fifty is sacrificed in a greater or less degree, ranging from a slight injury to death itself, in the task of carrying on our great industrial works. And the pity and shame of it all is that a large proportion of this pain and death is easily preventable. Two things are necessary: first, the public must be awakened to the realization of the disgrace which such a condition of things puts upon the nation, and to a realization of the vast amount of personal loss and suffering which these figures represent; and secondly, they must be taught that, by the enactment of proper ordinances governing the safety of life and limb, and the provision of proper devices of a mechanical kind, it would be possible, in a very few years, to reduce the casualty list by probably not less than fifty per cent.

But after all is said and done, it is a question whether the cause of this ghastly sacrifice is not to be found in our national disregard for the sanctity of human life. It is not in the least exaggerating the question to say that there is greater concern shown in the more advanced European countries over the accidental death of a single individual than is displayed in this country over the death of a dozen people by accident. It is certain that until we have learned "how much a man is better than a sheep," and have acquired a decent regard for the sanctity and dignity of life, we are not likely to make much headway in the provision of means for the prevention of accidents. One of the best ways to promote a proper understanding on this subject would be to pass laws making it obligatory upon the part of all great industrial concerns to report every accident, big or little, to a commission which was qualified to gather such statistics. These statistics should be regularly made public, and should form the subject of persistent comment by the press, in the pulpit, upon the lecture platform, and by means of systematized pamphlet distribution.

We can conceive of no other philanthropic movement that would be so worthy of the use of the name and the millions of such of our capitalists as are of humanitarian bent as this. If the prevention of the comparatively small and intermittent slaughter of war is worthy of a peace palace in Europe, and of a peace congress in the United States to which representatives are invited from the four corners of the earth, surely the abolition of the "carnage of peace," whose victims outnumber those of war immeasurably, should command an even larger liberality and an effort more sustained.—Scientific American, June 1, 1907.

THE ONE-RAIL CAR.

Those who scoff at the inventor who springs far ahead of his times in daring and ingenuity are not those who have read scientific history carefully or even observingly. The past hundred years is full of many illustrations of the aptness of the old adage, "He laughs best who laughs last," as applied to American genius. The field of invention is fairly crowded with testimony to this fact. Wireless telegraphy, perhaps, has furnished the most recent and significant illustration. People indulged the idea as a good-natured and harmless vagary, fit to amuse the credulous but wholly preposterous in reality. Yet the idea and the man triumphed and put their deriders to scorn.

To the average mind the possibility that a train of cars may be run on one rail, retaining its balance no matter how unequally loaded and operating in perfect safety at a speed of from one hundred and fifty to two hundred miles an hour, is too remote for practical consideration. Yet the world is confronted by just such a possibility as this, which, if worked out successfully, must revolutionize present transportation methods and make obsolete the present double-rail system.

Louis Brennan, the inventor of the mono-rail car, has recently made an exhibition of the merits of his car before the Royal Society of England. The results were astonishing. The car, which may be propelled by either steam, oil, gas, or electricity, met every requirement claimed for it by the inventor. Running on a single wire rope, it ran backward and forward maintaining a perfect equilibrium. The car is balanced by the application of two gyroscopes, the workings of which are kept secret by Mr. Brennan. The gyroscope consists of a single flywheel, the axis of which can turn in any direction. When fixed to a moving body it resists change of direction and serves to balance any object placed on a pivot. Attendants at the exhibition assert that when pushed on one side the car immediately resists and balances itself. When loaded with an unequal weight on the right side, that side goes up while the left hand side goes down. It is the old principle of the boy's top applied to transportation.

It does not require any great depth of mind to realize what this invention means to the transportation world. Swaying and jolting are done away with, the present rate of speed doubled, insuperable difficulties inseparable from the double rail system smoothed out, the cost of railroad construction more than cut in two, and accidents minimized, for the inventor claims that it would be impossible for a train of mono-rail cars to jump the track. This is in all respects the most startling departure in the scientific history of the past half century. It will not do to sneer at it because it looks impossible of fulfillment. It will be better to wait and laugh with the inventor.—Exchange.

"Auf Wiedersehen."

(Read at the alumni banquet of the Lamoni high school, June 3, 1907.)

Where Iowa's hills lift up with joy
To springtime's surging wind,
A feast is spread 'neath Iowa stars,
A feast for flesh and mind.
And comes, as sure as comes the toast,
The uninvited banquet ghost.

His name, Farewell, in sad, sad tones,
How sink the happy hearts.
Another comes, sweet phantom she,
Lo! yonder ghost departs.
An angel kind to mortal men,
The Germans call "Auf Wiedersehen."

The friendliest friend at every feast,
Love's ever welcome guest;
She hovers near the festive board,
And smiles this glad behest
'Tween hearts of many, hearts of twain,
Low whispered, "Till we meet again."

Oh, jolly class of Nineteen-seven,
In scarlet and in black,
Her message read whene'er you pause,
In mem'ry looking back,
Where parting care-free maids and men,
You pledged you, "Till we meet again."

Oh, may it be 'mid scenes as fair,
With hearts as true and pure,
As those who heard our gentle "Come,"
And promptly answered "Sure."
To tell of "Now," you'll linger "Then,"
And hear the echo—"meet again."

Some may go far—what matter that,
The sun on years may rise;
Forms may grow bent, brows wise, heads gray;
The same glad loving eyes
Will smile across the toil and pain,
Rememb'ring, "Till we meet again."

And if you wear fame's laurel wreath,
Or sit in some high place;

Come back to our alumni feast,
And let us see your face.
Stand, rich or poor, or grand or plain,
Friends parted, "Till we meet again."

Come pledge a toast, let the water pure
Touch lips of maid and youth;
We drink to tears or sad farewell
But this eternal truth;
We live our years by one nor ten,
But only "Till we meet again."

Night's purple shadows hold us fast,
Night's brooding beauty keep
Her mystic watch. Good-night! good-night!
While every feaster sleeps,
Stand angels, with love-driven pen,
Recording, "Till we meet again."

Father Hear My Prayer.

O Father, hear my pleading, on bended knee I pray
That thou wilt keep me safely upon this Sabbath day;
While angels sing their carols to thee in heaven above,
I pray that I may, like them, sing only of thy love.

Father, lend to me thine ear.
Father, hear my prayer.

Oh, thou who hearest all our woes, take heed then unto me,
For not a sparrow falleth, but has been seen by thee.
Oh, watch my erring footsteps, a little while, I pray,
And from the snares of evil, oh, keep me now, this day

Father, lend to me thine ear.
Father, hear my prayer.

Be still, my heart, thy trembling cease, for we have entered bliss;

For thou hast whispered to me, What love our Father's is.
Take thou this blest assurance, the while I breathe a prayer,

That God, who gave, shall have us forever in his care.

Father, lend to me thine ear.
Father, hear my prayer.

Just an Accident.

Many scenes and incidents connected with the burning of our publishing plant are still fresh in the memory of the Saints living in Lamoni. This is especially true of the meeting in which subscriptions for its rebuilding were called for.

We have all read and some of us have many times wondered at the faith of the poor widow whose mite as it lay covered, hidden and obscure from human sight by the gold of the rich men, was not hidden or unnoticed by the penetrating eyes of the infinite One standing near—wondered at her faith, for small as was the amount, it was all she had—all her living and in the eyes of the Master it outweighed all the gold cast in.

"When the Son of man cometh shall he find faith on the earth?" We have often thought of this question and to you who have done the same we commend the following as an answer. It is one of the many of those incidents to which we have referred, and while we withhold the name we give the incident in the words of the one most nearly concerned, who says:

"How many times in my life I have felt like saying, 'Oh, that I were a millionaire!' I see so many ways in which money could be used to aid the distressed, the aged, and the infirm, and to spread the gospel of glad tidings. How many times have I wished for money more than sufficient to supply the daily needs.

"With these feelings I wended my way to the church on Sunday morning where the mass-meeting was to be held by the citizens of Lamoni to consider the raising of funds for the rebuilding of the HERALD Office. As I sat in the crowded room and listened to the speeches which were made, my courage, hope, and faith were renewed, and I believed with those who spoke, that only a united effort, and hearts willing to sacrifice, were necessary to accomplish the object for which this meeting was held. How my heart swelled within my bosom as I heard the names of some read out with their accompanying small donations, and I said, 'Surely the Lord loveth a cheerful giver.' I had said over and over again that I wished I had some money, for it seemed that the need was so great; and I had cast about in my mind to see where one small silver dollar could be spared, yet, alas, I did not have it. But now with the overflowing of the spirit of love and hope filling my heart, as every other heart around me, I could not withhold the promise, trusting in God to help me fulfill it. And in this case, as in many another, I proved the Lord able to help in our extreme need, and that it only needs willingness, and an effort on our part, and faith to trust the Lord to do this. Not forty-eight hours had passed after I had put my name down for one dollar before a good sister came to me and asked me to do some work for her for which she would pay me one dollar, and it was a kind of work that I am not in the habit of doing outside of my home. Think you not that the Lord did his part in providing the one dollar subscribed? He surely did, and if in this case, why not in all like cases? And if in all like cases, why not put forth the effort? Why lack the means to build the HERALD Office, the children's home, the sanitarium? Why lack the means to send forth the messengers with the gospel of peace to the ends of the earth? Yes, why? Let every heart ask the question, Why? and when we have decided that the reason is, that we, his chosen people, have not willing hearts and the faith required to put forth sufficient effort, let us go to work and see if we cannot do something to bring about this willingness upon our part, and see if the Lord will not prove to our entire satisfaction that it is better to lay up our treasures in the needed work of the gospel and so hasten the day when his "kingdom shall come," and his "will be done on earth as it is in heaven." Let us prove how much better it is to do this, than it is to use our means for the unnecessary things which perish with the using. If the children of Israel could have seen the great blessings which they were missing by their disobedience, think you they would have wandered forty years in the wilderness? Did you ever think that we are doing the same thing? Is not our lack of faith and love keeping us from enjoying the grand privileges that are ours? Why, oh why, will we not put forth the effort that is necessary on our part, and prove the promises to his chosen Israel in these the latter days? Can we not draw a lesson from the experiences growing out of the burning of the HERALD Office? Could we in Lamoni have thought that we could have raised fourteen thousand dollars for the sanitarium, orphan's home, college, etc? Did some great calamity have to come upon us to make us willing? Must we be whipped into obedience? If this amount could be raised in this place, what about the many places throughout the church? Can not we have the necessary equipment for the bettering of the gospel work, and have it now?

"Let us awake, not only to our duty, but to our privileges, and prove that the Lord's arm is not shortened, that he can not save. The great question is, how we dare to withhold that which the Lord has intrusted to our keeping. If we give, it must be with loving service to assure us love in return. If we withhold, it must be to our eternal loss. May we all learn lessons from the things which we suffer, and each one profit by them."

The things of the past—do we venerate them too much, or is it not rather that we regard the living present with eyes which are too critical? The sister who has here poured out her heart, as it were, before you, like the one of whom we read, is also a widow. Jesus has not told us of that other one whether she was strong and well, or whether, like this one of whom we write, she was delicate in form and frail in health. But surely the lesson is the same, and oh, what it should speak to each heart! Provision has been made for rebuilding our publishing house, but is there money to meet all needful expense which the building will incur? If not are we awake to the privilege God is offering us? Nor is the publishing plant all which at this time God is requiring at our hands. The sanitarium is unbuilt, the children's home is not established, Graceland is crippled in its broader sphere of usefulness because of need of a few more dollars, and everywhere the "harvest ripe unto the sickle" is bending ungathered, and why? Is it not because we hold on to that which is intrusted to us as stewards—hold to it calling it our own—and refuse to obey God's beautiful law of equality? "When the Son of man cometh will he find faith on the earth?"

Prayer Union.

A sister of Kewanee, Illinois, desires the sisters of the Prayer Union, and Saints, to pray for her husband, who is afflicted with rheumatism, that if it be the Lord's will, he may be healed of his afflictions, and be enabled to do his daily work.

E. N. Beach, 411 East Griffin Avenue, Canon City, Colorado, asks the prayers of the Saints for the recovery of himself and companion from severe afflictions.

Letter Department

TRYON, Nebraska.

Dear Herald: It is with gratitude for the help and comfort that I get from your help-laden pages that I try to add my mite. I am pleased to see so much on living righteously. For while the doctrine we believe and teach is grand and beautiful, what does it amount to, to us, unless we adorn it with meek and Christlike lives?

We tell the world that this is the grandest doctrine, the pure and perfect gospel, the best ever taught on earth, or to that effect, then with questioning minds they look to see what it has done for us. What do we see? Christians that will stand every test laid down in this beautiful gospel? Christians who love one another? Christians who visit the fatherless and widows in their afflictions and keep themselves unspotted from the world? Not always; though I believe there are many. And if there are many, why can not the rest of us? What is to hinder each individual from living as pure a life as another? We have many excuses we make to ourselves and sometimes to our friends; but are they excuses God will accept? Did he not say "There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man: but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able"? When we say we tried but could not keep from doing wrong, do we not, according to the word of God, add a lie to our other wrong-doing? Could you worship a God who would punish you for breaking a law given by him, that you could not obey? Sometimes we may sin ignorantly, then of course we are excusable, if we have meant to do God's will. But when we knowingly do a wrong thing, is it not a fact that we prefer the wrong to the right at that instant? I know when I transgress that no one but myself is to blame, though some one may be to blame for the temptation. I alone am to blame for yielding. It is good for us to be tried or God would not have permitted it to be so.

Again we may look on some form of sin as not amounting to much. One will say unkind words, another will use words bordering on profanity, another in some form of worldliness as dancing, theater-going, etc., saying or thinking that God will surely not bar him from heaven for a little thing like that. Of course I do not say that he will; but everything like that is a step in the wrong direction, and barring the fact that one step may lead to another, each little act in the wrong direction may be more far-reaching than one thinks in its influence on weak persons. Then, too, does one feel repaid for yielding to temptation? I for one do not. I never realize that I transgress without a wish that I had not done so. All the pleasure or satisfaction I get is marred. First, by the thought that God is displeased; second, by a loss of self-respect; then, by the thought of what others may think of me and the church. Therefore, by the grace of God I intend to try to live better, so that God may be pleased, I may keep my self-respect, and the church may receive no discredit on my account. And may I be ever ready to help others to be better, slow to judge unjustly, and quick to perceive the good in others! With only kindest feelings for the HERALD and all the Saints,

Your sister in the faith,
(Mrs.) BLANCHE E. CLINE.

DES MOINES, Iowa, June 3, 1907.

Dear Herald: The district conference convened at Boone last week, beginning on Thursday evening with a Religio session, and Sunday-school and Religio work on Friday. The missionaries of the district were all present, except Elder J. S. Roth, who has gone to Colorado in hopes of benefiting his health. Representatives from over the district were present from Nevada, Des Moines, Collins, Baxter, Fraser, State Center, Rhodes, and other places.

Several sessions of the conference have been held since a session was held at Boone, and all of the Saints were glad to met with the Saints there; for the welcome they extend is warm in every way. The district tent was staked there during the week preceding conference and the preaching-services were held in the tent.

The Religio session was full of interest and shows progress in this line of work. The Sunday-school work was shown to be in good condition over the district, and much interest was manifested in the normal work presented by the district superintendent. A good sized class enrolled for this work during the conference and thus a good beginning has been made.

The district reunion will again be held at Rhodes the last week in August. The missionary work will be earnestly prosecuted during the summer, the tent being in use all the time; and the missionaries report more calls for preaching than they are able to fill.

The library work which has been recommended by the General Library Commission was heartily indorsed by the Religio the Sunday-school, and the conference. The district has in mind some library work in the near future, and it will be carried on in harmony with the recommendations of the commission.

The conference and conventions were pleasant, peaceful, profitable, and enjoyable in every way, all returning to their homes desiring to labor in the Master's vineyard more earnestly than ever. Apostle W. H. Kelley was heartily welcomed in the district; for it had been thirty years since he had been in the district before, so that he was a stranger to almost every one here, only to those whom he had met outside of the district.

The work in the city of Des Moines is progressing and greater efforts will be made to carry it forward during the year. During the year thus far five have been baptized and six received by letter.

Yours respectfully,
A. A. REAMS.

1050 College Ave., MEMPHIS, Tenn., June 3, 1907.

Editors Herald: My companion and I are now located at above address; if any of the Saints and friends have relatives in or near Memphis, or anywhere; whom they would be pleased to have us call on, if they will send me their names and addresses I will be anxious to visit them.

D. E. TUCKER.

WILBURTON, Indian Territory, June 1, 1907.

Editors Herald: I am rejoicing in the gospel work as in days of yore. The past month has been a busy month for me in the gospel work. While waiting for my railroad permit I accompanied Bro. A. M. Baker to Niangua and held a few meetings which were well attended. From there I went to Haileyville, where I succeeded in getting a few interested by visiting them in their homes, and trusting the seed sown may at some time in the future be gathered.

I came to Wilburton for over Sunday; but finding two or three here that are interested have been here the past week preaching each night but one. I had planned to go to Sawyer, Indian Territory, where I held a debate two years ago with J. E. Potts of the Missionary Baptist faith, but learned he never came back there to preach again, and had gone back into the hills to make a living some other way, and many others had moved to other parts. I decided to go down to DeQueen, Arkansas. I have found the Saints encouraged and striving to overcome in life, and we have again been privileged to rejoice together in the gospel. My mission address until further notice will be Mena, Arkansas. Any Saints living in Western Arkansas wishing meetings please take notice, as I would be pleased to hear from you, and will come to your aid as opportunity presents.

CHARLES E. IRWIN.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, June 6, 1907.

Editors Herald: This morning finds me in Cleveland, preparing to start for Youngston, Ohio. It is a beautiful morning, the sun is shining bright, and we are glad to say that we certainly feel the effect for good. We feel our health is improving; have been encouraged since coming to Cleveland, also at Toledo. It would be difficult indeed to mingle with so pure a people and not catch the inspiration flowing out from them lending cheer and comfort to the afflicted missionaries.

Bro. Ebeling is here, and we wish to ask the Saints of this district to remember him in their devotions. We are pleased to hear of the improvement in the condition of Bro. U. W. Greene's health.

We want to ask the attention of the branch presidents to the necessity of reporting July 1. Please, brother, remember this, for our and the work's sake. We expect to visit Sharon, Pennsylvania, and Akron, Ohio, and also New Philadelphia, before returning home. During July we expect to visit Bryan, Ohio, and perhaps Euniapolis.

Of course this depends on our health. If the Lord so wills we expect to meet at these points; but twice before this season we had arranged as above, and twice have been disappointed. We are well this time, and if the Lord so wills we shall succeed. Saints here in Cleveland are in excellent condition, and we hope that all the other Saints are enjoying the blessings of peace as we find it here.

We have not had any lack of spiritual blessings since the General Conference that we could enter any complaint to the Lord. We trust that every member of the district may enjoy the inspiration flowing out from the General Conference, as we feel it. Our district reunion convenes August 2 with the Akron Saints, as per notice in the HERALD already sent. We trust every member of the district will try to be there and enjoy the good influence we are anticipating on that occasion. Come with the view of doing good and get good in return.

Toledo seems to be in quite a good condition; have a nice hall waiting for Bro. Elvin, and Bro. Thomas is expected here in Cleveland. Saints in Toledo and Cleveland, remember us in your devotions, and may the richest of God's blessings attend every member of the district.

Your brother hopefully in Christ.

G. A. SMITH.

PISGAH, Iowa, June 4, 1907.

Editors Herald: We find plenty to do, but not all is sunshine and flowers. But the saddest thing that has occurred in these parts was the death by fire, on Saturday afternoon, May 25, of the wife and three children of Mr. Lee Chapman, who lives about seven miles east of this place. Mr. Chapman being busy with farm work, Sr. Chapman went to town to do some trading, and among other things she bought some kerosene (or supposed that she had kerosene; but it is thought that she had gasoline). On reaching home in the evening, being in a hurry to build a fire, she put some cobs in the stove and poured some oil on the cobs from the jug she brought home, set the jug on the floor, stepped to the shelf near by, got a match, and lighted the cobs. An explosion occurred, and the flash went from the stove to the jug, and the contents were blown all over the room. Three of the children were in the kitchen with their mother, and the mother and three children were fatally burned. There are three other children in the family; but they were in an adjoining room, and escaped with but little harm. The funeral-service was conducted in the Saints' church at Pisgah on Monday, the 27th, at eleven o'clock by the branch president. It was a sad scene, with four caskets before us at one time. Our church-building was not half large enough to hold the people. The town was draped in mourning; and the business houses were all closed.

The work here is moving along slowly. Our Sunday school is prospering under the supervision of Brn. A. J. Smith and Frank Runkle. They have a number of able and trust-worthy teachers as helps. Two more were added to the branch by baptism May 19. The Saints as a rule are cheerful and hopeful.

In gospel bonds,

JOSEPH LANE.

BAY CITY, Illinois, June 3, 1907.

Dear Herald: I came to Southern Illinois about the middle of May. Have found some very good people, and many that are religiously inclined. But our work is so new here in this State that the people are wonderfully surprised when they hear our claims.

I have been preaching in a Christian church for several nights. Some seem to be very much interested, and some are seeking signs, while others say they do not know what to do or think about it. It seems a little strange that people should be so far behind in those things and live in the home State of Latter Day Saints, and in a State where the work has been so powerfully maintained. There seems to be but one fragment of the old church names or doctrines that remains with the people of this country, and that is the name of Joseph Smith, or, as they call him, "Old Joe Smith."

I labored to show them the proper way in which Joseph Smith was connected with this work; but I know that with many of them it will be a vain effort. But there are some honest-hearted people here. I have been here over a week and see the need of another elder very much; but it has been my lot to labor alone nearly all the time I have been in the ministry. If any of the brethren want to find me they may write me at Bay City, Illinois.

I think there is a good work that can be done here; but it will take time and patience to do it. When I had preached six sermons on the first principles and apostasy, they liked it; but when I touched upon the restoration and showed the prophetic mission of Joseph Smith, some of them went back on me, or my preaching; nevertheless the good Lord blessed me in the presentation of his word. There will be two Campbellite preachers here next Sunday. Do not know just how we will turn out, but will trust the work to the Lord. The people want me to stay, and I shall stay till over next Sunday. They think I will have a fair showing. If I had another elder here with whom to counsel I would be better satisfied. We have not proclaimed that the law of two by two is better than one by one simply because the Lord taught it; but we have also found it to be better by experience. But I will trust the Lord in the defense of his work, and for the victory in all things.

Yours in bonds,
S. H. FIELDS.

WOODBINE, Iowa, June 7, 1907.

Saints' Herald: Will the HERALD kindly permit us, as a family, to express our gratitude for the deep sympathy and brotherly love expressed by so many of our brethren and sisters in their letters of condolence, on the occasion of our beloved but departed wife and mother? And will the dear friends accept this, our feeble expression of gratitude for the deep and earnest love manifest in their efforts to comfort and cheer our bereaved hearts? Be assured, dear brethren and sisters, that although we do not write you each personally, we do appreciate your loving words of comfort, confidence, and esteem, and pray that we may ever be worthy of the same. The pangs of grief at the departure of our loved one were as nothing in comparison to the pains that wrung our hearts as we witnessed her paroxysms of pain and suffering during the long period of her illness. She had long and earnestly prayed for that rest that God has prepared for his Saints, and suffered and died in the blessed assurance that it would be hers to enjoy; hence our grief at her departure was assuaged, because our hearts were assured that the promise of God to his children is yea and amen.

We remain, gratefully, your brothers and sisters in the gospel of Christ,
CHARLES DERRY and FAMILY.

Conditions in San Francisco.

Editors Herald: We are having trying times in our city. We were hardly safe on our way toward restoration from the effects of our late calamity, when we were appalled by the reports of graft among our city officials. Under the tireless efforts of some of our law-abiding citizens, they are mostly now under indictment for the crime. Nearly all our supervisors are under the ban. Our mayor, E. E. Schmitz, is now approaching trial. Quite a number of our millionaires have been indicted—and the end is not yet. Even our chief of police has been placed among the guilty ones, by indictment. To add to our trials, came quite a number of strikes among the laboring people. The laundry workers were among the first, which very much inconvenienced many. Then the brewery drivers and packers struck. This annoyed some people. After this the telephone operators went out. This almost stopped the telephone service in our city. For several days the "phones" were idle, and now after several weeks the service is still very poor, as only non-union, inexperienced help can be had.

Then to make matters still worse, the conductors and motormen on our street-cars went on a strike. For several days not a car moved. All street railroad work stopped. We were compelled to resort to all kinds of means of travel. Every kind of vehicle imaginable was pressed into service, and thousands of men, women, and children were compelled to walk. Soon the company by employing "strike-breakers," began to run a few cars under very difficult circumstances, and have been increasing the number of cars daily until now, when they are running a large number again. There has been much fighting and rioting, many people injured, and several deaths. The strike is not yet settled, although a month has already passed. There are now eighty thousand idle people in our city, on account of it. How do they live? what is their future? are all-important questions at present. The iron workers, about eight thousand, have now been out one month also.

Personally I am quite isolated. I am assistant commander of the Ingleside Camp of refugees, located about six miles from home, away out near the ocean beach. When I go home I must walk—which I do about twice a week. I have not been able to attend any of our church-services for over a month, nor have I seen any of the Saints during that time. The walking is too much for me, and I do not care to brave riding in the cars yet. But we are hoping for better facilities soon. I suppose the branch has kept up the meetings, as quite a few of the members live within walking distance of the hall; but I am among those living very far away, and am quite closely confined to camp work. We had supposed that this branch of relief would have ended this spring, but it still continues, and we still have six hundred and twenty-two people in our care in this camp. But the work is being quite rapidly wound up now. With love to all,

Yours in bonds,
GEORGE S. LINCOLN.

Extracts from Letters.

Joseph Arber, Henderson, Iowa: "The conference of this district, which was held at Henderson May 25 and 26, passed off pleasantly, although not so largely attended as usual, owing to the weather being cold and wet. I preached twice for the Saints here again last Sunday. Leave to-morrow for Red Oak. Shall be pleased to hear from any in the district as to prospects for an opening. Our field and home address is 1311 West Walnut Street, Independence, Missouri."

C. W. Forney, Thurman, Iowa: "Will you please make it known to your subscribers that the undersigned has several volumes of THE SAINTS' HERALD and Zion's Ensign which he would be glad to send to any one desiring them, provided the costs of transmission are paid by the parties receiving the papers. The volumes are almost entirely complete and in good condition."

There is no death! What seems so is transition;
This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life elysian,
Whose portal we call Death.—Longfellow.

News From Branches

CHATHAM, ONTARIO.

Elder R. C. Russell, whom the Saints of Chatham had long looked for, commenced a series of mission services on April 14 under favorable circumstances; was well advertised by appropriate cards announcing thirteen special subjects and also daily advertised in our two city newspapers, which brought large and interested congregations nightly to hear one of the most instructive, interesting, and eloquent speakers in Canada Mission, who does not preach smooth things to please but strikes out hard from the shoulder at error and hews to the line and lets the chips fall where they may. It is the fearless man that counts and brings people to a proper understanding, and converts into God's kingdom, that man receives the applause and approval of all honest thinking men, and the smiles and approbation and favor of God. A synopsis of his many excellent sermons was written up daily in the Planet and News, which papers are generous and favorable to the Saints of Chatham, a privilege we enjoy here of being recognized by the press and having access to the same, for which we are thankful.

The services concluded on the 29th of April with twenty-three baptisms and much good accomplished. He returned by special request May 25 and revived the Religio and induced thirty-one new members to join the society and take interest in that important auxiliary from which God will choose his servants to go forth and proclaim his truths to every nation, kindred, and tongue, as a witness prior to the coming of Christ.

Services were conducted until the 30th of May and eight more baptized, which means during the two months mentioned thirty-one were baptized by Elder Russell and seven by the writer, making a total of thirty-eight new members for the Chatham Branch. This speaks very favorably of the work and faithful efforts of the Chatham Saints, and they are gaining more in favor and recognition every day by the citizens of this place. My prayer is that the Saints may continue to work earnestly and faithfully and keep up the spirit of investigation that the honest in heart may be led into God's church and kingdom.

A social evening was given by the Religio society Friday, May 31. Elder Russell made a capable chairman and addressed the audience for half an hour on the history of ancient America down to the restoration of the gospel, which was appreciated by those present from all denominations. The church was crowded to the doors, and many could not gain admission for want of space. The best talent in the city took part and an enjoyable and profitable evening was spent.

Elder Russell left the next morning to join the excursion from Toronto to Cummorah's hill. He has the good will and respect of the Saints and citizens of Chatham, for they find in him an honest and jealous worker, not out for vain-glory nor for the mastery, but coming in the spirit of the gospel which says, "It is written."

Elder Russell has baptized one at Arthur, one at Lindsay Branch, sixteen at Wabash, and thirty-one at Chatham, forty-nine in two months.

Bishop's Agents' Notices.

To the Saints of Southern Nebraska; Greeting: I take this means of informing you of the financial need of our district. The Bishop requires us to raise one hundred and twenty-two dollars a month as the stipulated allowance for the missionaries' families. This is a greater amount than we have ever been required to raise before. In order that we may not fail it is necessary that we be prompt and faithful in this part of the work. We can not afford to be negligent and thereby invite failure. We are abundantly able to meet the requirement if each will do his part as God has, and does, prosper him. We have a membership of eight hundred in the district. An average of two dollars a year from each will meet the demand, and while many are poor, and some are young, and therefore unable to contribute, surely there are enough who are strong and prosperous who ought to find pleasure in contributing of their means to much more than overcome the disability resting against those who are unable to contribute.

In the month just closed we have received a little less than forty dollars, or less than one third of the amount needed. Do not pass this by unheeded. It will be impossible for the Bishop's agent to pay out moneys unless they are first contributed. Please bear this in mind, and let each consider the personal responsibility resting upon him. I shall be pleased to receipt for any amount sent to me at Peru, Nebraska, Box 143. C. H. PORTER, Bishop's Agent.
PERU, Nebraska, June 3, 1907.

Saints of Central Michigan District please take notice that we have moved to a farm, and hereafter my home address will be Standish, Michigan, R. F. D. 2, and my city address 305 North Henry Street, Bay City, Michigan, Station A.
E. S. WHITE, Bishop's Agent.

To the Saints of the Massachusetts District; Greeting: As I have been appointed to labor in the state of Maine for this conference year, and I will not be able to get among you as in the past, I request you to send your tithes, offerings, and consecrations to Bro. M. C. Fisher, 104 Sycamore Street, Winter Hill, Massachusetts, who will receipt for all moneys forwarded to him, and you will be credited for the same. Bro. Fisher and G. H. Gates will get among you all they can during the year, and either will receipt for what you have to hand over to the Master.

I trust my collectors in every branch will be alive to their duties in this important part of our work. Keep before the Saints continually the needs of the work and the importance of this duty. Make this year one of sacrifice, for we need all your tithes, all your offerings, all your sacrifices or consecrations, that the work of the Lord may be carried on and the law of God honored. Remember the missionary who labors among you, or passes your way. Remember what the Lord says in Doctrine and Covenants 83:16: "Whoso receiveth you receiveth me, and the same will feed you, and clothe you, and give you money. And he who feeds you, or clothes you, or gives you money, shall in no wise lose his reward; and he that doeth not these things is not my disciple: by this you may know my disciples."

Do not leave this duty to the "other fellow" to do, but remember it means you whom God is blessing with temporal blessings. The riches of the Holy Spirit will be with those who observe to do all things whatsoever we are commanded to do. "The liberal soul shall be made fat."

When there are special needs for assisting the poor in your branches, notify me at once, and we will see that no worthy Saint shall go hungry or naked; but their needs shall be met as the law of God provides.

Let not prosperity cause you to partake of the indifference which is so manifest in the world towards the poor and the less fortunate, but cultivate a tender heart towards those who are poor and needy among you, lest they get discouraged and fall by the way. Visit them, share some of your good things with them, learn what it means to love your neighbor as yourself, by a faithful application of that command to your own life. Share some of the sunshine of your life with those whose life is shaded with poverty and hardship. "Then shall your light spring forth as the morning, and thy health shall spring forth speedily; and thy righteousness shall go before thee; the glory of the Lord shall be thy rearward. . . . If thou draw out thy soul to the hungry and satisfy the afflicted soul."

Do not think that your debt to the Lord as tithing when paid covers your duty to your neighbor. When thou doest thine alms let not thy right hand know what thy left hand is doing—or the reverse. It means the same. That thy alms may be in secret. If as a church we would be the light of the world, a city set upon a hill which can not be hid, we must work along these lines of duty. Then the light, the glory of God will dawn upon us and remain with us.

Let our district, as the district of Macedonia in Paul's day, be foremost among the Saints for their liberality, as recorded in 2 Corinthians, chapter 8. I write to stir up your minds by way of remembrance, that heaven's richest blessings may abide with you.

Address me for the present at my home address, as all mail will be forwarded. 107 North Street, Medford Hillside, Massachusetts.

Let all come who can, and make the reunions as they grow in number grow more helpful to us. Warren McElwain, secretary reunion and district, Lansford, North Dakota, June 3, 1907.

To the Members of the Branches of the Southern California District: At present everything looks flattering for one of the best reunions ever held in this part of the State. At our last reunion, it was not until the members got together shoulder to shoulder that the Spirit came to us, and the resultant happiness of the session ensued. It is the hope of this committee that every member of this association, every member of each branch in the Southern District, every Latter Day Saint in Southern California will make an unusual effort to be present at our next reunion, and that each will come with the determination to cast aside at that time all matters worldly, all strife and differences of opinion of whatever character, and work as a unit that we may attain the end we so earnestly desire—the omnipresent Spirit of the Most High at every session. The date of reunion is August 16 to 26 inclusive. The site selected by your committee for the reunion is "Seal Gardens," located just outside the city limits of Los Angeles on the Long Beach line of the Pacific Electric railway, it being conceded by all of us that it is the most convenient for all to reach as well as the best adapted for camping purposes, there being plenty of shade, good water, plenty of room, an auditorium already completed, and everything admirably adapted for the purpose of this committee. There will be no houses upon the grounds, except the main auditorium, and it will be necessary for all who come, aside from those living in Los Angeles, to dwell in tents. Rental prices are as follows: Tents, 10x12, $2.50; tents, 12x14, $3; three quarter beds, complete with mattresses and springs, 75 cents. Chairs, 10 cents. Tents will be put up and taken down by owner. The regular round trip ticket rate from Los Angeles is 15c but books of tickets may be purchased by members living in the city and by those of the Saints who may stop there during the session at the following rates: Ten-ride tickets (five round trips), 70 cents. This ticket is good only for the passage of the party buying the ticket. Thirty-ride ticket (fifteen round trips), $2. This ticket may be used by one or more members of the same family, a coupon being torn out for each member of the family. Every one coming with the intention of camping must bring with him bedding and such other small articles as will contribute to his personal comfort. So far as we can learn there will be no lack at the coming reunion of workers for the cause of the Master, and we believe that when the members of the church glance at the array of names we here present, they will see even greater cause of their getting ready to attend. We have the assurance that we will have with us President R. C. Evans, Bishop E. L. Kelley, Fred A. Smith and F. M. Sheehy of the Twelve, as well as our old stand-bys, T. W. Williams, Charles E. Crumley, Albert Carmichael, and Alonzo Jones, together with the elder recently appointed by the late conference to missionary work in the Southern California-Arizona District. This committee hopes that each member of each branch will constitute himself a committee of one to boom the reunion from now until it convenes. Interest your neighbor and come yourself; that each member who contemplates attending will notify Bro. William Crumley, 107½ North Main Street, Los Angeles, not later than three weeks before the date of the reunion (August 16), stating the size of tent desired, the number of beds wanted, the number of chairs wanted, and also if possible remit to him the amount to cover the articles desired to be rented, so that he may pay for the same when the equipment is ordered placed on the grounds. This is important: please do not overlook it; that aged Saints who desire to attend the reunion will write to the committee in care of Bro. Crumley, stating when and by what train they will arrive in Los Angeles, that we may see they are met, if that is desired. Inquiries from any of the Saints relative to any of the details will be gladly answered. The arrangements of Bro. Peter Kufman, to care for the inner man are well under way, and report of his plans will be made before the reunion convenes, if desired, but do not worry about that—you will be well fed and taken care of, both physically and spiritually. Ed C. Thomas, chairman; Wm. Crumley, secretary, reunion committee.

PETTER.—At Fall River, Massachusetts, Amanda M. Petter. Died April 1, 1907. Was born December 31, 1844, at Westport, Massachusetts. Baptized April 13, 1897, by T. W. Smith. She was loved by all who knew her, and leaves many friends to mourn her departure. Sermon by John E. Roger-son.

DERRY.—Eliza Herbert, daughter of John and Mary Herbert, was born on or about the first of August, 1831, at Castle Eaton, Wiltshire, England. Emigrated with her father and sister to the United States in March, 1854. Was married to Charles Derry on the 28th day of October, 1854. United with the Reorganized church early in 1861. Upon her marriage to Charles Derry she was called upon to assume the care of two motherless babes, one of whom was at the point of death; but who, through God's blessing and her loving care survived, and still lives to bless her memory.

In after-years, in the providence of God, she was privileged to have the care of two more sweet and tender babes, and rear them to a true and noble womanhood. While not loud in her profession of religion, she was true to her God, faithful to her husband, and ever watchful over the best interests, both of body and mind of the children committed to her care. In a word, it can be as truly said of her as of one of old, "She hath done what she could." She and her companion walked together in love for nearly fifty-three years, until in the providence of God, she was called to the haven of rest, at one o'clock on the morning of Friday, May 31, 1907. She was loved by all who knew her. She leaves her husband, the four children committed to her care, three grandsons, three granddaughters, and five great-grandchildren, and a numerous host of loving friends to mourn their loss, who truly mourn, yet not without hope, because of her abiding faith in God and Christ. Death had no terrors for her; but she earnestly desired to depart and "be with Christ," realizing that through the great sacrifice he had made, her redemption was made sure; and this assurance came to her through obedience to his gospel.

The funeral services were conducted and the sermon delivered by her brother and friend in Christ, Charles E. Butterworth, from the words of Christ, "She hath done what she could." The bereaved desire to acknowledge the loving kindness of the Saints in Woodbine in aiding them to care for their loved one while she lingered in affliction so long, and then in the hour of her departure, till the moment when all of her that was earthly was hidden from their tearful gaze. May God in his mercy reward them for their love.

Article 3. Suggestions for the Speaker.

What to say and what not to say.

Don't Say: I know a party who will buy the lot. Say: I know a person who will buy the lot. Note.—"Party" is a legal term, and should not be used in the sense of "person."

Don't Say: I would if I was her, or I would if I was him. Say: I should if I were she, or I should if I were he. Note that "should" in the first person is the correct form to indicate simple subjunctive futurity. Note that "were" is correct, for the reason that the subjunctive mode, and not the indicative, is required.

Don't Say: It is twenty minutes to five. Say: It is twenty minutes of five. Note.—"Of," and not "to," is required to show the proper relation.

Don't Say: I expect that you did. Say: I suppose that you did. Note.—One can not expect anything in the past.

Don't Say: I live in Yonkers, or I live in Kenwood. Say: I live at Yonkers, or I live at Kenwood. Note.—One lives in New York or in Chicago, but at Yonkers or at Kenwood; that is one lives in a large city, but at a small place.

Common Errors of the Careless Speaker.

"He don't" and "don't he."

"She don't" and "don't she."

"It don't" and "don't it."

These errors are of common occurrence and are generally made by persons who should know better.

The person who uses the expression "I think he don't," would be astonished to hear the response "I beg to differ with you, but I think he do." If it is proper to say, "he don't," it is certainly equally proper to say "he do," for "don't" is the abbreviated form of "do not." The conjugation runs, "I do not," "you do not," "he does not," consequently the contracted forms are "I don't," "you don't," "he doesn't." So let us eschew "he don't" in the future, and say either "he does not," or what is perfectly permissible in easy utterance, "he doesn't."

Whenever I speak of this particular error, the response that generally greets my ears is, "Isn't it strange that so many well-educated people make that mistake? It must be that when one uses that expression he don't think of what he is saying. I never use it."

"It ain't" is another unpardonable error. It sometimes seems as if other mistakes might be overlooked if one would refrain from "it don't" and "it ain't." "Ain't" is a loose contraction of "am not," but not of "is not."

"I am not," "you are not," "he is not," is the proper conjugation, the contracted forms being "I'm not," "you're not" or "you aren't," "he's not," or "he isn't," not "he ain't."

Some persons who endeavor to be correct eschew contractions altogether, but there is no good reason why one should not use contractions if one will use the proper ones. To refrain from using them has a tendency to lend a pedantic air to one's speech. In dignified utterance before large assemblies one has less license, but in conversational utterances, contractions are permissible.

Peace Congress a Memorable Gathering.

The Peace Congress, held in New York City during April, was indeed a world event, and Mr. Andrew Carnegie richly deserved the high honors there bestowed upon him. In heart, soul and fortune, Mr. Carnegie is consecrated to one of the loftiest missions allotted to men. The Peace Congress was a memorable gathering, with an influence far-reaching—in fact, it was one of the most noted international events ever held outside of the City of Washington. It did much to impress the American people with the broad-gauged ideals of peace as a practical business proposition for this age. It brought to mind the dreams of Cobden, whose life was devoted to effort for the prevention of war and destruction, and to furtherance of the science that will lead to the general happiness of mankind, and make this life of ours a pattern for the happiness of another life. One of the books that largely influenced the life and thought of Cobden was none other than Benjamin Franklin's "Essays."—Joe Mitchell Chapple, in "Affairs at Washington," National Magazine for June.

OFFICIAL PUBLICATION OF THE REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS

Editorial

THE COURSE OF HONOR.

At the inception of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints it was "regularly organized and established agreeably to the laws of our country"; and the fact of such organization was duly published to the world, in a section of the first authentic book of rules, faith, and doctrine ever compiled and published by the church. This compilation of declared beliefs and regulations was adopted by the church in "solemn assembly" August 17, 1835; and has been included in every edition of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants issued by the church, or any division of it, until the year of 1876, when the church in Utah, under the presidency of Brigham Young, published an edition from which one of the organic laws of the church was taken out, and a rule of faith and practice entirely subversive of and in direct opposition to the one so eliminated was introduced and published in its stead. It will be the object of this article to show that the church organized April 6, in the year 1830, as stated in the historical statement authorized and ordered to be published by that "solemn assembly" of August 17, 1835, was under the most solemn obligation to observe the laws of the country and to conduct themselves in accordance with those laws, and that there has not been an authoritative repeal of any portion of those rules and regulations by which the members of that church or any division of it has been relieved of the obligation to continue to observe the laws of our country.

The church was organized in the state of New York, at the time of the organization, and ever since, a sovereign state of the United States; and always up to the death of Joseph and Hyrum Smith (in June, 1844,) the church existed and its eldership preached, taught the principles of the gospel according to the New Testament of the King James version of the Bible, told the story of the coming of the angel and the revelation of the Book of Mormon, made and baptized converts, and built up congregations and organized them into separate branches of the church, all within the organized States and Territories of the United States and agreeably to the laws of the same. In not a single State or organized Territory of the United States was there a statute

"If you were to bring from the grave some old inhabitant of Pompeii and show him the dark side of New York, he would look wearily up into your face and tell you that they did all these things in his day, only perhaps a little more heartily and vivaciously than we do now. If you were to call up some ancient Babylonian and lead him through these scenes of vice and shame, he would assure you that it is old to him, and not half so interesting as it was in the open life of Babylon."

enactment or law which permitted a man to marry and live with more wives than one, or to live in a condition of concubinage.

In the formative period of the church revelations were received from the Lord containing provisions for the guidance and government of the members in their spiritual and temporal affairs, all having consideration of and relation to the laws of the country.

Among the first of these revelations is one given in February, 1831, in which is found the following:

"Ye shall observe the laws which ye have received, and be faithful. And ye shall hereafter receive church covenants, such as shall be sufficient to establish you, both here, and in the New Jerusalem."

It is a material fact, of which those in and those out of the church must take knowledge, that the teaching of the revelation known as the "new covenant, even the Book of Mormon," and the teaching of the direct revelations to the church itself, show clearly that the United States, in territory and in its institutional government, was selected as designed of God for the express purpose of the origination and establishing of the church. Hence, it must follow that all the rules and governmental regulations which would be given to the church for the guidance and control of the propagandizing forces of the church, for the purpose of preaching, teaching, and expounding the doctrines, faiths, and beliefs of the church, and for making of converts, gathering them into congregations, organizing them into branches, and establishing a grand general organization known as the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, would and must be enacted, established, published, and observed by the church as an organization, and by the membership as integral portions of such organization, with direct reference to the Constitution of the United States and the laws enacted by the Congress and the several States of the Union under it; and that at no time, in no place, and under no circumstances would there be given revelations containing commandments requiring spiritual or temporal conduct involving disregard of or breaking of the laws of the land.

This view must be taken, for the reason that the prophecies of the Old Testament point to the Western Hemisphere as the place where certain things declared by the prophets must take place. Besides this, it must be taken for granted that the divine mind in which the design of planting the work of the church in America, and under the national institutions there prevailing, knew the legal and economical conditions which would be existing there at the time when the work would begin and continue unto the end of its accomplishment. Anything short of this conclusion would impugn the inspiration of the prophets, attack the character of the Great Designer as lacking the qualification of foreknowledge, and cast a cloud of doubt upon the wisdom of the council in which the determination to redeem the fallen race was made and the plan of procedure decided upon.

Seen in the light of the foregoing reasoning, the imperative nature of the revelations enjoining obedience to the national and State laws, and the possible duration of the period in which such obedience would be required, assume their due importance in relation to the divine design itself and the proceedings permissive and mandatory by which the design was to be carried into effect.

What laws had been received by the church at the time covered in the quotation, "Ye shall observe the laws ye have received"?

1. The "elders, priests and teachers . . . shall teach the principles of my gospel which are in the Bible and the Book of Mormon, in the which is the fullness of the gospel."
2. "Thou shalt not kill."
3. "He that killeth shall die."
4. "Thou shalt not steal."
5. "He that stealeth and will not repent, shall be cast out."
6. "Thou shalt not lie."
7. "He that lieth and will not repent, shall be cast out."
8. "Thou shalt love thy wife with all thy heart."
9. Thou shalt "cleave unto her and none else."
10. "Thou shalt not commit adultery."
11. "Thou shalt not speak evil of thy neighbor, nor do him any harm."
12. "Thou knowest my laws concerning these things are given in my scriptures; he that sinneth and repenteth not, shall be cast out."
13. "Thou shalt take the things which thou hast received, which have been given unto thee in my scriptures for a law, to be my law, to govern my church."
14. "He that doth according to these things, shall be saved, and he that doeth them not shall be damned, if he continues."

All these provisions of law and rules of personal conduct were given in the second year of the organization of the church and were adopted by the church in the solemn assembly of August 17, 1835. There is no ambiguity in any one of them. Each one of them is clear and definite, whether permissive, prohibitive, or mandatory. Thou shalt; thou shalt not; if thou doest according to these, thou shalt be saved; if thou doest not according to these, thou shalt be damned, is the absolute tenor of them, every one.

It is further provided in the same revelation to the church that if any persons among them should kill, rob, steal, lie, or be guilty of any wrong-doing which by the law of the land was a misdemeanor or a crime, such persons should "be delivered up to the law of the land." This should be done especially in cases of killing, robbing, stealing, or lying, in which injury to the life, person, property, or character of others resulted.

In these provisions it is easily seen that the safeguarding of the lives, persons, property, and characters of the citizens of the country was delegated to the executives of the civil government under the legislative enactments of the nation and the state.

The question legitimately may be asked, How long was it intended that this regard for and obedience to the laws of the land should continue? If this can be definitely ascertained from the revelations and commandments of the Lord to the church, it will determine very clearly the course of honor which a man should pursue in order to be accounted an honorable man in the sight of both God and man.

That this question as to the duration of the obligation imposed upon the members of the church, the kingdom of God upon the earth, in which they are required to observe and keep the laws of the land, the statutes of the secular law, is a legitimate one, is apparent, because of developments which have occurred in the history of the church in which it has been stated that revelation was received permitting or commanding the acceptance of dogma and practice quite the opposite of the already accepted faith, doctrine, and practice of the church, and which required the ignoring of the rules of the church in regard to observing statute enactments, and involved those who carried the new dogma and practice into effect in a direct breaking of the laws they were pledged to keep by the fundamental principles and the spirit of their organization. Hence, it is right to ask the question; and it is right to answer it.

In August of the same year, 1831, in which the revelation containing the commandments, which are herein cited and numbered 1 to 14, there was a commandment given by revelation, which definitely fixes the period during which the church and its membership were to observe and keep the laws of the land.

"Let no man break the laws of the land, for he that keepeth the laws of God hath no need to break the laws of the land; wherefore be subject to the powers that be, until he reigns whose right it is to reign, and subdues all enemies under his feet.

Behold, the laws which ye have received from my hand are the laws of the church, and in this light ye shall hold them forth. Behold, here is wisdom."

By the foregoing commandment every person belonging to the church is forbidden to break any portion of the laws of the land. Indeed, every man is informed, clearly and specifically, that the man who keeps the laws of God has no need to break the laws enacted by the legislative bodies of the people, the laws of the land. All are enjoined to be subject to the powers that are set for the enforcement of the laws. And this subjection is set to continue until he who has been ordained to "rule and reign in righteousness" shall come and establish his kingdom of peace from the "rivers to the ends of the earth." And, further, it seems most remarkable that the Lord should have added to the force of the commands given in the revelation these significant words, "Behold, here is wisdom." It inevitably follows as a proper and logical deduction that any course which might be pursued by any body of the people of the church, no matter how many or how few, which would be in disregard of or in opposition to the things commanded in the revelation, would be not only unlawful and contrary to the will and command of God, but would be a course of folly, as the Lord counts foolishness, that which is opposed to divine wisdom. Could it have been possible for the Lord to have given the church a clearer, stricter, and a more positive commandment expressive of his will as to the course of honor the church and its membership should pursue? The answer is clear and comprehensive: He could not.

At least one of the prominent advocates of polygamy in America has affirmed that "the eternity of the marriage covenant was revealed to the prophet Joseph in 1831."

In saying this, the prominent apologist for wrong-doing under the guise of religion has unintentionally stated the truth against himself and his associates in the desecration of the laws of God and man. The "eternity" of the principle upon which the domestic relation in marriage between the sexes is based was established by divine revelation at the opening of the latter-day dispensation in the following terse terms: "There shall not any man among you have save it be one wife, and concubines he shall have none." This was the first revelation on the general subject of marriage that the church received through the "prophet Joseph," and was in 1829 and 1830. It was followed in 1831, by a revelation and commandment so sweeping in its nature and wide in its scope that it embraces time and as a sequence eternity; because it reveals the unchangeable character of God, and as a consequence the undeviating and unchanging nature of his laws and commandments to the church.

1. "Marriage is ordained of God unto man."
2. "Wherefore it is lawful that he should have one wife."
3. "And they twain shall be one flesh."
4. "And all this that the earth might answer the end of its creation."
5. "And that it might be filled with the measure of man."
6. "According to his creation before the world was made."—Revelation, March, 1831, Doctrine and Covenants 49:3.

The foregoing is divided into periods for the purpose of emphasis, and clearness of understanding. There are six definite propositions in the foregoing statement from the revelation of 1831. Taken with the interpretation of their meaning given by the band of the officers and membership of the church which composed that first "solemn assembly" held August 17, 1835, the eternal nature of the institution of marriage, both as to the relative number of either sex lawfully forming one bond and the duration of the period in which the provision of two in the "one flesh" companionship was to continue is unmistakably stated. This rendition is: "May God add his blessings and keep you to fulfill your covenants from henceforth and for ever. Amen."

According to what has just been stated in the two preceding paragraphs the institution of marriage was designed of God before the world was made. It was designed for the purpose of filling the earth with the measure, the kind and number of man, male and female, as the earth could receive and maintain in answering the end of its creation. It was designed that the earth should fill the measure of its creation; the purpose intended by divine wisdom for the occupation and continuation of the human race. To carry this design and purpose into effect, man was created male and female, to occupy, subdue, multiply, and replenish the earth. In order that this might be done in compliance with divine wisdom, and the earth be filled with a "godly seed," such as the prophet Malachi has stated God sought when he made man, the same divine wisdom established the institution of marriage with certain provisions, permissive and restrictive, fixing the number between whom a bond could be entered into and be within the spirit and genius of the institution. This number was restricted to two, one of either sex; and this restriction was established by both precept and example; the precept being found in the enactment, "It is lawful that he should have one wife"; the example in the creation of the first pair, Adam and Eve, and placing them upon the earth, with the restrictive statement, "they shall be one flesh," as found in Genesis; and, "they twain shall be one flesh," as found in Matthew and in Mark; and as found in the revelation from which the foregoing statements of August, 1831, as expressing the will of God regarding the attitude of the members of the church, including the officials in the priesthood, towards the institutions and laws of the government, it is not difficult to discover the binding nature of the command, "Let no man break the laws of the land." And as God has in a most remarkable way in many of the cases in which he has given commands assigned the reasons why the commands should be observed that men should not obey blindly, so in this instance the reason is given: "for he that keepeth the laws of God hath no need to break the laws of the land."

Can any honorable man so far set aside the persistently claimed unchangeable character of God as to assume, with any degree of reasonableness, that at some time after the giving of the above cited command with the reason assigned, the God who gave the command would give another, the complying with which would at once put those doing so in direct antagonism to the laws of the land and cause them to break the laws which he had commanded them to keep and obey? Surely not.

JOSEPH SMITH,
For the Presidency.

Done at Independence, Missouri, May 13, 1907.

AN INCOMPETENT WITNESS.

When President Joseph F. Smith, presiding over the Utah Mormon church, states that he knows that his father, Hyrum Smith, was a polygamist, and had lived with another woman other than his own (Joseph F. Smith's) mother, as a wife, such statement is subject to challenge; for the reason, that he was born November 13, 1838, and his father Hyrum Smith was killed June 27, 1844; at which date his son Joseph F. would be but five and one half years of age.

It is not at all likely that Hyrum Smith admitted his infant son of that tender age into his confidence in a transaction which made him a party to the existence of a condition of things which he emphatically denied publicly in the official organ of the church, in its issue March 15, 1844, only three months and twelve days before his tragic death. (See Times and Seasons, vol. 5, p. 474.)

It is pertinent to suggest that at the time when Joseph F. Smith affirms that "to his knowledge" his father Hyrum Smith was the husband of more than one wife, the said Hyrum Smith was living in the state of Illinois; and if he so had more than one wife he was a criminal before the law and was liable to prosecution and punishment for bigamy, or for "living in a state of lewd and lascivious cohabitation," and it is not likely that he would let his son know that he was thus a law-breaker.

Joseph Smith, the uncle of Joseph F. Smith, denounced polygamy in February, 1844. (See Times and Seasons, vol. 5, p. 423.)

This Joseph F. Smith, president of the Utah Mormon church, must know that neither son nor daughter was born to his father, Hyrum Smith, by any woman, except Jerusha Barden, the mother of John Smith, the patriarch of the Utah church, the older half brother of the president, and Mary Fielding, his own mother; and these two were the legal wives of Hyrum Smith, the last named having been married to him after the death of the first named. None were born in polygamy. This is a fact, as yet unaccounted for by this witness, who testifies of personal knowledge under such peculiar circumstances. Is he anxious to prove his father to be a dishonest man and a liar? He is an unreliable witness in the case.

CORRECTION.

If people made no mistakes, they would never know the stings of regret, the agony of remorse, the pleasure of acknowledging an error, nor the satisfaction which follows "making things right."

In our editorial, HERALD for May 15, we gave a quotation as a basis of our argument, giving Moroni 7: 9 as the place where the quotation would be found. This reference was wrong. The quotation is from Ether 1: 94, large edition.

Bro. Joseph R. Lambert, seeking to verify the quotation for the sake of examining the contexts, discovered our mistake, and called our attention to it; for which we assure him we are thankful; as the wrong reference would continue to be a source of trouble to those who might choose to read the contexts, for which we would be sorry. So, we acknowledge our error, and ask the readers of the HERALD to take this as an apology for making it. It does not matter how the error was made; it was a bit of carelessness anyway, and needed to be corrected. The teaching of the quotation and that of the reference we gave are alike; the sense nearly the same; and we commend both to the HERALD readers.

RECOLLECTIONS OF NAUVOO.

Julius Chambers in Brooklyn Eagle: To prove that polygamy was not the corner-stone of Mormonism, a Gentile banker at Salt Lake City tells me that the "Church of Latter Day Saints" never has grown so rapidly as since the action of Congress making the practice of polygamy a felony. This thoroughly observant and traveled man is warm in his defense of the Mormons, as a people. His dealings with them, financially, are large. The only reason he asks me to withhold his name is because he does not want to be open to an imputation of talking to secure patrons.

A Protestant church member himself, he sees many excellent features in the Mormon church of the present time.

The polygamous features of Mormonism were engrafted upon the church by Brigham Young. My authority for this statement is no less a person than the widow of Joseph Smith, founder of the sect and finder of the alleged tablets containing the "Book of Mormon." To me it is a pretty bit of memory. Let us talk about it:

In the summer of 1872 I was paddling down the Mississippi in a canoe, built for the trip at Troy, New York. At the nightfall of a July evening, after a long day's work, I saw on the Illinois shore, upon a fine bluff, a red brick building that indicated a town of more than village size. Making a landing, I climbed to the top of the plateau and learned that the building that had attracted my attention was the only hotel in the place. What was much more important, I was told that the town was Nauvoo, for six years (1840 to 1846) the seat of Mormonism.

When I applied at the office for supper I was received by an elderly woman. My eye-memory of the face and the figure of the distinguished old lady is quite distinct. She was tall, for her sex; her hair was gray, not white, and was combed straight over her temples. Her face was thin; her nose lean, aquiline, and pointed. Her mouth was small; her chin was badly shaped and protruded; her eyes were very noticeable, although their color can not be recalled. They were gray or blue, in all likelihood. I also remember her hands, which were small and had well-cared-for nails. Of course, all these characteristics were not noticed the first meeting, but were the result of studious observation that evening and during an hour passed in her interesting company next morning—because I remained at Nauvoo for the night.

This lady was the widow of Joseph Smith, only wife of the first prophet of Mormonism, killed at Carthage, not many miles distant. Smith was an editor, and his kind of religion he printed in his newspaper, the Nauvoo Expositor, [Times and Seasons] did not suit the people of that part of Illinois.

Mrs. Smith was a sincere believer in her husband's faith, but she took the earliest occasion to say that she did not believe in polygamy. She denounced the practice as "vile and infamous." She said it had "blighted and dishonored a beautiful doctrine that came direct from an angel of God, inscribed upon plates of gold."

The dear old woman put me to shame with her dignified forbearance when I asked if she ever had seen those plates, or the miraculous pair of spectacles, known in Mormon history as "Urim and Thummim." She had not; but they veritably existed. Had I seen the "Tables of Stone" that Moses received? Did I doubt the miracles of the Savior? Faith was comprised in the acceptance of things not seen, she said to me.

We talked long into the evening, for this aged woman appeared glad to see even a boy from the great east, which to her mind embodied the activities of the western world. She asked me a thousand questions, many of which I could not answer; not because they required a knowledge of science, art, or literature to reply to them, but for the reason that they were along lines outside of my personal experience. She appeared to know very little about the literature of the time and to care nothing about it. I remember she had read several of Dickens' novels. But her waking hours were largely passed seated in a tall-backed rocking-chair, near the edge of the bluff, with her eyes fixed upon the majestic Mississippi before her; after darkness fell she turned her vision down the river, toward the flickering lights of Keokuk, on the Iowa shore.

She was a picture of a fine woman, stranded on the lee-shore of age, amid surroundings with which she was entirely out of sympathy and among people who did not appreciate her intellect or her innate refinement. I believe she had a husband about the place, a native to the soil; but the pride of living she felt was not as his spouse.

What earthly honor and renown she claimed was solely as "the widow of Joseph Smith, a sincere believer, a devout man, and a loving husband." Thus did she speak of the dead Prophet to me.

My last sight of this venerable woman occurred next forenoon, as she stood upon the bluff in front of the red hotel and waved her hand when I headed for the center of the broad stream to get into deep water on the Keokuk rapids.

And now, my Salt Lake friend assures me Mormonism is gaining in converts more rapidly than ever before in its history.

May it not be possible that a return to the original doctrine of "Joseph the true prophet" will cause the "Church of Latter Day Saints" to thrive, at least as lustily as the "Church of Christ, Scientist"?—Register and Leader, (Des Moines, Iowa,) June 13, 1907.

GENERAL CHURCH ITEMS.

The June number of one of our widely-read eastern magazines, Human Life, contains an article from the pen of Elder W. E. LaRue, entitled, "The Two Joseph Smiths." Pictures of Joseph Smith, president of the Reorganization, and Joseph F. Smith, president of the church in Utah, appear side by side and the distinction is made in a way that will be remembered.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat, June 10, contains an account of the history of the Book of Mormon, together with the announcement that Elder J. A. Tanner will deliver a series of sermons on that subject before the Religio society of that city. The same paper of a little earlier date contained Bro. Tanner's picture and mention of his work in St. Louis.

From a copy of the Vinton County, Ohio, Republican, of June 6, we discover that Lamoni is not the only place where children of the Saints graduate with honors. Gard H. and Rothlee Hammond, sons of Bro. A. B. Kirkendall, of McArthur, Ohio, are among the graduates of the McArthur high schools; the first named with a paper affirming "Agitation, the instrument of reform"; the second, a well-received exhortation to "Keep stepping." Both efforts are given excellent notice in the local journal. We congratulate Judge Kirkendall on the good record of his sons. May their after-lives show the good choice of the faith of their father, and their reward be assured.

On Wednesday of last week Graceland College graduated a class of seventeen. Hon. Edwin A. Nye, editor of the Des Moines Daily News, delivered the address. His address was well received and was one of the best ever heard in Lamoni. The program as carried out during commencement week has been reported in the Lamoni Branch news.

The following press report is of interest:

"ROCHESTER, New York, June 1.—A pilgrimage of Mormons from Canada and other points arrived in Palmyra to-day on a visit to Mormon Hill. The purchase of Mormon Hill is contemplated by the Mormon church of Salt Lake, and some sort of memorial monument or building erected on the spot where they believe the gold plates of the 'Book of Mormon' were found."

CURRENT EVENTS, SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS.

Mr. R. W. Peck, a British subject and a prominent Methodist, is in America endeavoring to enlist the Methodist Church in a scheme intended to better the social condition of its members. His plan includes some of the ideas put in practice by the Salvation Army and some institutional churches and consists of four definite lines, namely: oversight of emigration, to include a welcome for the Methodist emigrant to this land; a savings or loan bank, to provide temporary relief to worthy members who are in financial difficulty; an employment agency; and last, a system of old-age pensions.

Mayor Schmitz of San Francisco has been convicted of extortion and will probably be sentenced to San Quentin for a term of years.

It is reported that the Church of England in Canada finds it difficult to secure a sufficient supply of ministers for work on the frontier, and at the request of the Bishop of Saskatchewan, lay members are being sent out to work. About forty young men have been sent out, each equipped with a horse, a tent, and a supply of provisions.

The Kansas City Journal of June 10 gravely reports a shower of fish said to have occurred at Independence, Missouri, during a heavy rainstorm, Sunday, June 9. Mountain trout fell in abundance and many of the good citizens enjoyed a square meal of fish. Some "doubting Thomas" seems to have challenged the story and the Journal of June 13 goes into details in a way intended to silence the most skeptical. Not only did mountain trout fall but one jelly fish was discovered and also one large fish that was evidently a cod, as it had a strong salty taste when cooked—we suspected the presence of a cod when the first report came out.

The Chicago Inter Ocean tells of a new church yell recently invented and voiced by members of the Methodist and Christian denominations. It combines the picturesqueness of the college yell with the fervor of the savage warwhoop and is well calculated to make the Devil tremble. Our only criticism is that like some creeds and some conversions it starts out well with Faith and Hope but ends in inarticulate, imbecile, meaningless "Rah, Roo, Ree." We quote:

"WAUKEE, Iowa, June 13.—Religious enthusiasm in this community, unable to find vent in the 'amens' and pious ejaculations of a former generation, has resulted in the evolving of a church yell, which has been introduced at a revival here, and which promises to be adopted permanently as an expression of religious fervor.

"Here it is:

Faith, hope, char-i-ty;
Noblest Christian graces three;
We will ever practice thee;
Hallelujah, Rah, Roo, Ree.

"An evangelist named Burch is responsible for this new slogan of holy enthusiasm, and both Methodist and Christian denominations can be heard giving the yell with a will some time during every religious service."

JUST A WORD ABOUT REPENTANCE.

Repentance is the most important work the wicked world can do. The wickedness and deformity of the human family can be seen on our right and left, and everywhere we go. Great destruction and punishment will come upon the wicked and ungodly, and the only escape for any of us is to live right, to change from wrong to the right, to be good, and to do good. To cease to do evil, and learn to do well, is true repentance.

Cease to do evil; learn to do well.—Isaiah 1:16, 17. Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts: and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon. For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts.—Isaiah 55:7-9.

True repentance will lead us to God's ways, and to give up man's ways.

The times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent: because he hath appointed a day, in which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead.—Acts 17: 30, 31. I tell you . . . except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.—Jesus Christ, in Luke 13: 5. Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is unto you, and your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call.—Acts 2: 38, 39. And we are his witnesses of these things; and so is also the Holy Ghost, whom God hath given to them to obey him.—Acts 5: 32.

OBSERVATIONS.

ELDER T. W. WILLIAMS.

There is an indefinable yearning for something beyond that which we now possess. To desire is to obtain—when men are honest before God. Is it not barely possible that one of the needs all along the line is confidence? . . . We must have confidence in God, in the church and her institutions, and in her loyal representatives. To destroy confidence is to commit spiritual homicide as well as suicide.

I attended the late General Conference. It proved an educational treat. My faith remains unshaken in the ultimate triumph and vindication of the truth. We were again reminded that "all men are human." Humanity in the limelight oftentimes discovers God behind the cloud.

The fact that men hold adverse opinions in no sense impairs their mutual service to the body. Honest difference of opinion safeguards any institution. Men can not express their opinion freely in Russia: as a result of this reign of tyranny the people grope in mental and spiritual darkness.

The clashing of ideas and the ultimate dominancy of the truth hath made America what it is to-day.

Catholicism and Utah Mormonism represent the centralization of power and the conformity of the many to the opinions and dictation of a few. Our church stands for the widest research and the conformity of the few to the decision of the many.

The zealot reasons, if at all, by induction. The scientist makes deductive reasoning his strong bower. We employ both.

To my mind there was more of God in the honest clash of ideas reflected in our late General Conference than could possibly be expressed in a prearranged program carried out in a perfunctory way.

There is no room for discouragement among us. A good man is never permanently injured by unwise or impertinent criticism. He is and should be helped by honest suggestion and friendly counsel. May we always remember that we are brethren, our aim identical, our service mutual.

I can not force back the conviction developed from contact with many others from various parts of the compass, that there is something lacking in the church! There is an indefinable yearning for something beyond that which we now possess. To desire is to obtain—when men are honest before God.

Is it not barely possible that one of the needs all along the line is confidence? Surely no institution can long survive if confidence is gone!

We must have confidence in God, in the church and her institutions, and in her loyal representatives. To destroy confidence is to commit spiritual homicide as well as suicide.

Surely none of us have lost faith in God! He still rules and he overrules. He very frequently circumvents our folly, and through the process of denial effects a development otherwise impossible.

Let us maintain confidence. No word or act of ours should serve to shake the confidence of the weakest in God. Infidelity is rife in the land. There is already enough in the world to perplex, bewilder, and confuse. We should not accentuate this.

Why need we bother our minds about abstruse questions and unsolvable problems? Why discuss vague and visionary doctrines? It is enough for us to deal with the problems immediately demanding our action, and defer the analysis of dogmas and tenets which are conjectural until some future time. It seems plausible that wherein God desires us to know he has revealed sufficient; his failure to disclose implies that it is for some wise provision upon his part. Speculation and theoretical assumption has or should have no place in this latter-day work.

We have so many sublime truths, so plain and simple and so capable of complete substantiation, that it seems ill-advised to waste time, and oftentimes try patience in discussing things for which there is no warrant in the standard works of the church.

Again, there are other doctrines that are undoubtedly true which we can make an unwise use of: the origin of man and his pre-existence, the physical resurrection, the millennial reign, and the future state of man, are questions which no Latter Day Saint can well discard, and yet they are fraught with perplexities and mystifying features. In dealing with them we can afford to generalize and pass on awaiting the further revelations of the Almighty to make them plain. It would be much better if we would spend our energy in calling men to present duty and service. It is not what we are going to be, but what we are; not what we are going to do but what we are doing now that counts. It is not what I am going to get, but what I contribute which determines my worth to society.

The pages of history are filled with the record of blood, murder, carnage, cruelty, and indescribable torture inflicted in the name of religion over questions which could not be solved, and did not even relate to this life at all. I maintain that a man can be saved and know practically nothing about the "origin of man," or the truth or falsity of his individual preëxistence. Neither is it essential to salvation for a man to be able to minutely elucidate the nature and character of the life to come. His salvation is surely dependent, however, on his proper disposition of the questions which relate to this life. These are simple, explicit, and capable of demonstration.

Our slogan for seventy-seven years has been, "Faith alone will not save you," "We are rewarded according to our works." Though we may fondly cherish the thought of prenatal individuality, and likewise anticipate an existence after this life is over, yet after all it is not this which saves us. We must conform our life to the divine pattern, and harmonize our actions with the law relating to present service.

We need no "knockers" in the church. There is no place for pessimist or calamitist. In saying this I do not wish to be understood as advocating blind subserviency and tacit submission to those above us—far from that; but breeding discord and undermining the influence of others never brings about desired reform.

Is there wrong or injustice in the church? Are some of the men we trust failing in service to the body? Then apply the divine remedy.

We owe it to ourselves and to the church, whose servants we are, to see that there is no iniquity in the church, and to bring wrong-doers to justice. Let me again emphasize the fact that if there is iniquity in the church, and I am knowing to the fact, it is my duty—not privilege but absolute duty—to take the necessary steps to correct it. Failing in this I become a party to the wrong.

If you think there is a man holding office in the branch, whether president or associate officer, who is unfitted for the office from any cause, then have the courage of your convictions; do the manly part and openly express yourself accordingly; and in an honorable, frank manner do your best to place a better man in his place. But do not play the coward, vote for him when election time comes, and then in a covert, suggestive way do all you can to slur, insinuate, and hamper the man after he is legitimately chosen.

Do you know of any general church official who is not doing right, or is failing in fulfilling the service due the body, or who is unfitted to occupy this lofty and exalted position? Then go to the General Conference, or if you can not go, enter your protest with the proper official, and do all you can legitimately to have him displaced.

But before you even go this far, it would be your duty to go to this brother and acquaint him with your objections, thus affording him an opportunity to rectify. This is equally true in branch, district, or mission.

We can not establish confidence by coercive methods. It is folly to attempt harmony by abridging the rights of free speech, whether by tongue or pen. I verily believe if the ministry of this church, one and all, will put their ear to the ground and catch, comprehend, and retain the message coming up from the rank and file of the general body, they can better shape their service to make it both profitable and educational to the body.

Is there individual or collective criticism on the part of the membership of a branch, district, or mission, as to the action or policy of its president? He surely can not afford to ignore it; neither is it policy for him to cry, "Persecution!" It is more than probable that the objectionable feature can be corrected to conform to others' views without any moral sacrifice.

No public man can afford to resent the courteous criticism of his peers or to ignore the sentiment obtaining among them. To maintain confidence in the church it behooves every servant of the body to see to it that every act of his is conducive thereto. All of our acts relating to the body should be open so that no occasion may exist for distrust or suspicion. Secrecy is no part of this gospel work. It is dangerous to our welfare and progress to rest upon our laurels, or to feel that inasmuch as we are God's children and this his church, he will bring it through somehow, and we be all right in the end. This is a delusion! God works through human instrumentality. It is as possible, aye, probable, that the Reorganization may fail of its purpose as the organizations of the past have done. Our safety lies in hewing to the line and executing all of God's plans. We are not called upon to become apologists for the Almighty. It is not pleasing to him for us to seek to do his will after the ways of the world.

The duty of the hour is to apply here and now the law of God relating to the present time, leaving the things appertaining to the life to come to the disposal of the Almighty.

CRITICISM OF THE REVEREND MR. HAUPT VERSUS "JOSEPH SMITH DEFENDED."—NO. 5.

Says Mr. Haupt: "To the apostles Christ had said, 'All power is given me in heaven and in earth.' 'As my father has sent me so send I you.'" Mr. Haupt has the wrong text first. Two texts are here grouped to prove one point. Here is a case of wrongly dividing the word of God. Mr. Haupt would say: "A man should be careful not to thus endanger his own salvation and that of others by wrongly dividing the word of truth." Up to this point he has been very careful to give references, but somehow he failed to do so here. The last quotation is used to prove that Jesus transferred to the eleven the power he possessed, whereas the language was spoken at another time when nothing at all was said of power. Jesus did not say that he gave to the eleven all power as the Father had given it to him. In such case he would have been void of it himself, and could not have sent them into all the world a month later. He based his right to send them at that time on the fact that he still had all power. Taken singly and in their proper connection they do not even hint at transferred authority. In proof of that fact he continued to command them through the Holy Ghost after his ascension. (See Acts 1:2.) When he ascended on high he gave some apostles, etc. (See Ephesians 4:8.) Through the Revelator he continued to command and direct the churches, many years after his resurrection and many years after he had commissioned his apostles as recorded in Matthew 28; all of which proves very clearly he had not delegated that authority to the church. If the church held that right and authority in 96 A. D., Jesus would not have assumed it. He then and does yet retain that power and authority so that to-day if any prophet, apostle, or minister has any divine authority he must obtain it from Christ, and not the church, and much less from the Bible. Hence the need of present revelation. Our defense is for the rights of the Master, and we are not willing that any church, not even the Latter Day Saint Church, should rob him of his rights. Alas for the egotism of man that he should imagine to sit "in the temple of God" and show himself to be God and assume the right to authorize ministers in his stead, close the canon of scripture, and interpret the word which they did not give and of which they were not the authors.

As if to atone for the mistake that he had just made, Mr. Haupt says: "The unity of the disciples was manifest as long as they 'continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship.'" "

In one sense it was the apostles' doctrine, but in the real sense it was the doctrine of Christ. "If we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another." But, "whosoever transgresseth, and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God." (2 John 9.) The real point at issue is, Did the disciples continue in that doctrine? No matter what their claim to divine authority or apostolic succession, the true test is the doctrine of Christ.

Mr. Haupt's next objection is: "First apostles, secondarily prophets' (1 Corinthians 12:28); whenever this divine order was changed, not only the followers of the prophet left the fellowship of the apostles, but have lost the unity of the faith and their heresy has been manifest to all, by their own divisions into sects. Examples: Ana-Baptists, 50. Presbyterians, 20. Lutherans, 17. Methodists, 25. Mormons, 3."

What a sad admission here for a clergyman of the Established Church of England claiming succession from "the king at Jerusalem, 33 A. D." Where does he place his own church when he says the fifty Ana-Baptist sects left "the unity of the Faith and the fellowship of the apostles?" Does he not know that they did not leave the fellowship of the Church of England? The Roman Catholics would not want a clearer admission than this. Did the Presbyterians leave the fellowship of the Episcopalians? Did the Lutherans leave the faith of the Anglican church? And pray tell how the three classes of Mormons left the fellowship of either branch of the Catholic church, or lost the unity of the faith of either? If the mere fact of not being of one faith is fatal, what of the many Catholic sects, some of which are, the Hellenic Catholic, the Greek Catholic, the Holy Catholic, the Roman Catholic, and last of all the Christian Catholic? If reversing the divine order, as stated by Mr. Haupt, caused the divisions and loss of apostolic fellowship, is the Episcopal Church able to show apostles at the head and prophets next? In fact, are they able to show either one in a true Bible sense? But did he state the divine order correctly? We think we can show that he did not. Did Paul mean that apostles should be superior to prophets, or did he mean that apostles were placed in the church first in point of time? That is, were apostles or prophets set in the church first? Apostles were the first sent out as ministers and propagandists of the gospel economy. Afterward we learn by reading the New Testament that there were prophets in the church. In the very text of which Mr. Haupt quotes a part, there is evidence of that fact. "And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healing, helps, governments, diversities of tongues."

The words after that and then are adverbs of time, also the word first. The word thirdly can also legitimately be made to apply to time, and that leaves us only the word secondarily to harmonize with the others or else each of the others must be made to harmonize with it in the sense Mr. Haupt would use it. To make it more plain, each one of these expressions must, without fail, refer either to time or to position. The words after that and then can not possibly be made to apply to position, while the others can more easily be made to apply to time. Of course Mr. Haupt will make his fight on the word secondarily, but it is not sound reason to tie to one point when there are four or five other points in the same verse against it. That would be willful blindness. The history of the case as we have intimated strengthens my position, as apostles were the first officers which Jesus set in the church. Latter Day Saints are not committed to the belief that the prophets mentioned in the above verse are the presiding prophet; in fact to no office at all, but to those exercising the gift of prophecy. As in the same verse it refers to the "gifts of healing," and the "diversities of tongues." Paul was merely mentioning the development of the church as it developed from one stage to another in its formative period. This being the order of the development of the primitive church it is no proof of official position in the church.

Mr. Haupt's charge of heresy and the reasons he assigns are not well taken, but if they were they reflect fatally on his own sect. The "church in the wilderness" in Moses' day also had prophets, twelve apostles, seventies, elders, etc.; Moses was the chief but not the only prophet. In Christ's day he was the great prophet like unto Moses, and was in the church before apostles or other officers and in that position was succeeded by James his brother. That was the divine order. But 1 Corinthians 12: 24 says nothing of order or official position.

Mr. Haupt next quotes St. John 14: 16: "The spirit of truth was given that he may 'abide with you [the apostles] for ever.'" His explanation inclosed in brackets limits the promise to the apostles. Clearly and positively there is no provision here for their successors, and even if there were the promise thus explained does not reach to them. If it could be made to appear in the third person (spoken of) instead of the second (spoken to) yet the Church of England is void of apostles in a scriptural sense. We are of the opinion that this was a personal conversation between Jesus and his apostles. The promise of the Spirit of faith was personal, and assured them that whether in life or in death they were entitled to it even "for ever." This is a substantial proof of the immortality of man. This text does not indicate an unbroken line of apostles, "for ever," as Mr. Haupt would have it do.

"The apostles," says Mr. Haupt, "imparted the gift of the Holy Spirit by the laying on of hands with prayer." But the Bible says it was given "through" not "by" the laying on of hands. (Acts 8: 18.) That made man the medium through which God bestowed the Spirit. Man could not give it.

Again Mr. Haupt says: "Upon fit persons they also laid hands conferring the authority and power given them by our Lord, so that in their successors continues the great commission, 'Go ye therefore and teach all nations'—'preach the gospel to every creature,'—'teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you and lo I am with you alway [all the time] even unto the end of the world.'" We looked in vain for a Bible reference after the first and second commas. We could not find even a quotation mark. One would think that so important a point should have at least a little divine sanction. There is no proof that the apostles conferred their authority on others. Divine authority must come from God and not man. Every succeeding apostle or other minister must receive it as they received it. Witness the call of Paul and Barnabas, also others whom Jesus set in the church, "when he ascended up on high." The great commission was no greater to those men than it will be to every other true apostle. The Magna Charta of Catholicism in all its divisions and subdivisions reaching even to her Protestant daughters, unfortunately for them all, robs them of divine authority for it was spoken in the second person and not the third; it was spoken to the original apostles and not to others. Others even in this day must receive it as they received it, hence the need of present revelation.

If it be argued that those eleven men could not perform all the work mentioned in the commission and therefore their successors must do it, our reply is, the same argument that shows that they could not do that work also loses its force in their successors for they could not and did not reach every creature and their quondam successors have not yet succeeded in reaching one half the population of the world. A recent computation states that eight and one half millions now living have never seen the Bible. For that reason the interpretation of Catholicism is wrong and much read into this text that was not intended by the Master to be there at all. But the clear meaning was that no nation and no creature were exempt. This view of it is strengthened when we remember that "the Jews had no dealings with the Samaritans." They believed that "salvation was of the Jews," and it was not for some time that one of the chief apostles was told "What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common." "And they of the circumcision which believed were astonished, as many as came with Peter, because that on the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost."—Acts 10:15, 45. Peter learned "of a truth . . . that God is no respecter of persons: but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him." (Verses 34, 35.) The disciples also "when they heard these things, held their peace, and glorified God, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life." (11:18.) The idea that the Gentiles were as precious in God's sight as the Jews was therefore doubted for some time and even caused some discussion in the church at first. To prepare them against that error Jesus had told them that the gospel was for all the world and to every creature; but they were slow to learn his meaning. They put too little dependence on it, as others to-day put too much stress on it.

"Alway even unto the end of the world." Here is the hub of Catholicism. From this radiate all its points. To this run all its doctrines. If, however, it means all that Mr. Haupt claims for it, he will have great difficulty to prove his succession outside of Rome, and greater yet through her. Even though he could prove a line of undoubted succession, his impossible task would be to prove that the Episcopal Church has not "transgressed," but has abided "in the doctrine of Christ." In reality we ought not to spend much time on the doctrine of succession, as there is nothing in it after all, as the true test is the doctrine of Christ. From the fact that no church can show that they have kept the faith unchanged since Christ, shows that the idea of succession was not what Jesus indicated, for he would not have falsely foretold something that has not occurred. From the further fact that a restoration is so often spoken of in the Bible and that restoration is here, proves the Catholic rendering of this text fallacious. What, therefore, could Jesus have meant by, "Alway even unto the end of the world"? Evidently the same thing as when he promised the Comforter to be with them for ever. The language in each case is specific and not generic. Paul explains it in this language: "For I am persuaded, that neither death nor life . . . shall be able to separate us from the love of God."—Romans 8:38, 39. He would be with them "alway even unto the end of the world."

Strange, strange, indeed, that all classes of successionists do not notice to whom this language was addressed. No clearer case of perverting the truth can be found in all Christendom. Men of talent and education traducing one of the most simple and fundamental rules of grammar so as to apply to themselves language and promises made to eleven men nineteen hundred years ago. Surely "darkness has covered the earth and gross darkness the people." Men would not risk a dollar in business on a contract so old and made to other men, and yet they will risk their eternal salvation on such a one. What awful consequences will follow such a mistake at the judgment! Thousands of honest souls deceived by a misapplication of scripture, and a bold violation of the most common rules of the their own language!

Mr. Haupt says: "How was this possible if the apostolic order and authority ceased for fifteen hundred, fifty, or even eight years?"

I have shown that the texts he uses do not mean all he claims for them and therefore his conclusions are unwarranted. God's purposes were no more disturbed by an apostasy since Christ than they were before Christ. A church can exist during its formative period for a time without apostles. It was some time before Jesus placed apostles in the primitive church. The same was true of the early church and also of the Reorganization. I presume what he means by eight years is the time between the partial apostasy under Brigham Young and the Reorganization. I think we have sufficiently answered that above.

Coupled to the foregoing statement is: "Must we contradict these and other plain scriptures in order to make Revelation 14:6,7 mean more than it says?"

We do not contradict them, neither do we accept his inflated interpretation of them. If we accept his rendering to prove a succession of authority and gospel truth then Revelation 14:6,7 can not mean anything. We can ask with considerable more propriety, Must we exclude Revelation 14:6,7 entirely, in order to accept his interpretation and then at the last fail to find the church in true succession, because it does not exist? Notice his answer to my first statement. "Because the angel comes with the everlasting gospel is no more proof that the gospel has been lost and is about to be restored than that John wrote because Matthew's account had been destroyed." But the cases are not parallel. One would be the work of man while the other is of God. The work of man is finite while that of God is infinite. That system of faith that believes the Lord will make the mistake of sending us something we already have, and have been in possession of for nineteen hundred years, is hard pressed for Bible interpretation.

My position on this point was:

"Just before the judgment an angel is to fly with the gospel to be preached on earth. . . . and to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people. We naturally inquire, Why should an angel bring the gospel from heaven when it has been on earth continuously since the days of Jesus, as some believe? This question reveals the weakness of those faiths which claim a succession since Christ, for it would be folly to bring us something that we were already in possession of. On the contrary, if the gospel was to be restored to every nation, kindred tongue, and people, then it had been taken away and did not during that time (the Dark Ages) exist in its fullness in all this broad earth anywhere. It is certain that there was to be a restoration of the gospel after the year 96 A. D., and that too by an angel." Mr. Haupt did not attempt to move my position but says I "make it mean more than it says." He was careful not to show where.

"The everlasting gospel," says Mr. Haupt, "is that which was preached by Jesus, Peter, Paul, and the church continuously to this day."

That Jesus, Peter, Paul, and the early church preached the everlasting gospel we admit; but that it was preached "continuously to this day" is the point yet to be proved. If it be argued that the word everlasting indicates that fact, then we urge the following objections:

1. It must have existed before Christ continuously as well as since, hence no need of the primitive church of Christ as the Jewish church was the "pillar and ground of the truth," and any other would be an innovation. Christ should have appeared "to the ancient people of God and presented his new revelation to them for inspection."

2. Such interpretation contradicts the facts of history both before and since Christ.

3. Under that rendering, it admits of an apostasy from the everlasting gospel before Christ, but there could be none since.

Such are the contradictions and weaknesses that interpretation will lead us into. It should be avoided and a more reasonable one accepted that agrees with the facts.

It is no new thing that the church should depart from the faith. "Early in the morning" of the world's history, again in the "third," the "sixth," the "ninth," and last of all the "eleventh" hour, there were dispensations of truth from heaven to man (Matthew 20:1-7), and between these times the church rejected the counsel of God against themselves.

When the householder of Matthew 21:33-41 desired the rent of his vineyard, he sent at three separate times his servants to secure it. That is, early in the morning, the third, and the sixth hours; but they beat one and killed another. Again he sent other servants, and last of all his son, and they "killed the heir," and seized on the inheritance. Rome killed the Son and finally seized the church. But Jesus said the vineyard was to be "let out unto other husbandmen." This was to be in the eleventh hour. Human nature being the same since Christ as before, we could expect "history to repeat itself." Men could as easily depart from the truth since Christ as before and in either case affect the "everlasting gospel." Mr. Haupt's argument proves too much for him.

Closely connected with his former statement Mr. Haupt says: "For though we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you let him be accursed." "Let God be true and every man a liar." God's word does not contradict itself."

The passage in Galatians just quoted, is the very one we could wish used to prove his church rejected, from the fact that they do not teach what Paul taught, as we are proving in this writing, page after page. In their very first effort to follow Christ they miss the mark in their two baptisms, the one of the water and the other of the Spirit. The water baptism is by immersion for the remission of sins, the other imparts prophecy, tongues, and the interpretation as well as the other gifts. Another point wherein they are at variance with Paul is in the following: "Well; because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest by faith. Be not highminded, but fear: for if God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he also spare not thee. Behold, therefore, the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness, if thou continue in his goodness: otherwise thou also shalt be cut off." Paul here shows very plainly that there had been one apostasy—the Jews had been cut off, and as plainly shows the possibility of the Gentiles being cut off unless they abide in his goodness. But Mr. Haupt does not admit in the least of such a possibility. Hear him: "More evidence can be produced to prove that Christ's church can not be overcome." Paul argues the possibility of a failure. Mr. Haupt the reverse. If we were so minded we could hand back his thrust, "Let God be true and every man a liar." God's word does not contradict itself." But we will simply say, Paul and Mr. Haupt differ. J. W. PETERSON.

FASTING.

The fact that, as a church, we believe in fasting is made evident from time to time by published requests that the members fast for the attainment of some special blessing. That this is an important principle need not be argued, but do we realize how very important it is as a means of obtaining blessings?

Examples are numerous in the scriptures of holy men fasting. In the early days, and on down to Christ, our pattern, and from his time to our day, the principle extends. David speaks of being "weak with fasting." (Psalm 109:24.) Paul tells of "fasting often," and of ordaining elders after "prayer with fasting." Moses, after forty days in the mount with God, when he "did neither eat bread nor drink water," came down and found Israel committing grievous sin against the Lord. In anguish of soul he "fell down before the Lord as at the first, forty days and forty nights I did neither eat bread nor drink water because of all your sins." (Deuteronomy 9:18.) Think of the blessings that came to Israel at this time, when the Lord in his fierce anger was ready to destroy them, but through the fasting and prayers of the faithful man of God his anger was turned away. What a grand type of the love of our great Mediator is here furnished by the sacrificing love and forbearance of Moses, standing between a justly offended God and his sinning brethren.

Our Savior prepared for his ministry by a season of prayer and fasting alone in the wilderness; and upon one occasion his disciples had the importance of fasting forcibly illustrated when they were called upon to cast out a deaf and dumb spirit and they could not, and Jesus, when questioned as to the reason of their failure, explained: "This kind can come forth by nothing but by prayer and fasting." There is something in this instance for us to think about.

While fasting is understood to mean abstinence from food, either partially or entirely, for a time, that we may receive a desired blessing, yet it has a deep significance if we fast truly unto the Lord; not going about thinking complacently of the great sacrifice we are making, but rather making our offering cheerfully, happy in the thought that we are availing ourselves of one means by which we may aid in giving our spiritual nature the ascendancy over the carnal. Every time we fast in this spirit, we really gain a little in overcoming self; so that though we may fast solely for the benefit of others, we can not miss receiving a blessing ourselves. Is not this a grand principle? and ought we not to make frequent uses of this means of spiritual advancement?

Some are too weak in body to do very much fasting, but the writer truly believes—and with good reason—that it is acceptable to our Father who "knoweth our frame," if such should only partially abstain or give up some favorite food for a time. It is the spirit of self-denial and prayer that counts more than the mere act of going without food. Again, fasting is beneficial physically, if engaged in wisely. Reason would suggest that when the body is more or less weakened through being deprived of the usual amount of nourishment, the digestive organs should not be loaded with too hearty a meal; but we are apt to imagine that because our system has been deprived of a meal or two, we must make that up when we break our fast. The better way would be to come to the meal still in possession of the spirit of self-denial which we have been striving to cultivate, and to eat sparingly. It is really surprising how little food will restore the strength because the digestive organs have had a rest, and consequently can appropriate the food more readily and completely if a small amount is taken—that is, reasonably small, and we will feel invigorated and refreshed. On the contrary, if we partake too heartily the weakened organs may rebel at the task, and we will feel worse than before, and conclude that fasting does not agree with us. It is possible, of course, that some are so constituted that they can not fast without injury. If so, they need sympathy, not blame; but let us who are able not fail to avail ourselves of the help that surely comes in response to sincere prayer with fasting. Fast in spirit; fast unto the Lord; and likewise eat unto the Lord. So shall a blessing come, both spiritual and physical.

"Since Christ died, emperors have ruled, carved out great empires, done everything for themselves, and their names are forgotten or fading away.

"Since Christ died, generals with courage and genius and murder have written their names as high as they could on the wall of fame. But they are forgotten, or soon will be forgotten. Those that work for themselves are forgotten by the world. Those that work for others are remembered.

TEMPERANCE IN THE SOUTH.

The liquor press view with alarm the changing attitude of the South toward temperance. The religious journals and the organs of the Prohibition Party and the Women's Christian Temperance Union are correspondingly elated, while the daily papers generally share their attitude though in varying degrees of enthusiasm. "The South is to-day," says the New York Tribune, "the section of the country which is doing most to lift the curse of intemperance and to combat the crimes which flow from indulgence to liquor." From time to time we have noted in these pages many movements of importance in this Southern crusade. Now there appears in the Christian Advocate (Nashville) a summary of the various steps taken successfully to restrict the trade in intoxicants. After describing the old way of the saloon, this paper continues:

"Now how wonderfully changed are the conditions! It seems scarcely the same land—this broad, prosperous, smiling one, above which the star of temperance glows with such promise. By careful estimate it is shown that fully one half of the counties of the States that lie south of Mason and Dixon's line are prohibition counties. Best of all, in most of them it is prohibition that really prohibits. Mississippi takes the lead. In ninety per cent of her territory liquor has been voted out, and the unvarying vigilance of her people keeps it so. All but five of the seventy-seven counties of Mississippi are prohibition counties. In all the others high license prevails. It costs one thousand dollars a year tax to open a saloon in some, and in others one thousand five hundred dollars. In Jackson, the capital and the home of Bishop Galloway, not a saloon is to be found. . . .

"In Arkansas fifty-nine of the seventy-three counties have declared for prohibition, while in a large percentage of the remaining counties local option prevails.

"Of the one hundred and one counties in Virginia, seventy-four of them have voted out whisky. Others will no doubt soon follow this example and set themselves free of the rum curse.

"A most astounding showing is made by the prohibition forces in Kentucky, the very name of which has for years been synonymous with intemperance. The time is still fresh in memory when whisky flowed like water in Kentucky. The State boasted of its fine horses, fine whisky, and fine women. Now ninety-six of Kentucky's one hundred and seventeen counties have declared for prohibition, while in several others the prohibition sentiment is growing stronger every day. . . .

"A remarkable record has been won by the Prohibitionists in Georgia. Eighty-five per cent of the territory of that State is now under temperance rule. The saloon flourishes in but few of the larger towns and cities. Tennessee is a close second on this roll of honor, if she has not recently won first place. In only eight or nine of her larger cities and towns is the sale of liquor allowed. Strong prohibition forces are at work to secure legislative enactment tending to a general statutory provision whereby whisky will be banished from the entire State.

"Texas, too, is fast coming over into the prohibition column. Out of her two hundred and twenty-four counties, one hundred and forty-seven are now in the prohibition ranks. That others will steadily follow is a foregone conclusion.

"The dispensary system, after a test of twelve years in South Carolina, has proved anything else than the 'stepping-stone' to prohibition, as was predicted by its supporters. With the dispensary closed, renewed struggle will now be made by the prohibition forces throughout the State to gain control of the whisky evil, and it is believed that they will succeed."—Literary Digest, June 1, 1907.

FROM WHENCE THE POWER?

It is very difficult for us, in our undemonstrative life, to comprehend the experiences described in the book of Acts as to the converts who were "filled with the Spirit." But we seem to see apostolic times come down to us when we read the accounts of the extraordinary revival in the Methodist and Presbyterian churches of Korea. One man was making confessions of a sinful life:

"When he finished speaking he flung himself upon the floor in great agony and begged for mercy. The scene that followed was indescribable. Men were stricken to the floor all over the church as if hurled there by a thunderbolt. They writhed upon the floor and cried out for mercy in great agony of remorse. So great was the distress in every direction that no one could turn either to this one or that one to give aid; indeed, the only aid that they seemed to want was the privilege of rising to their feet and confessing their sins."

Another man made confession of a certain sin:

"He was stricken to the floor and wallowed there as if tortured. Later he arose to his feet and continued a moment with his confession, when he was again hurled to the floor. He lay there some time unconscious. Our physician spent a few moments over him and some of the brethren gathered at his side, but directly retired leaving the man in the hands of God. Soon he recovered and again attempted to get to his feet, and two of the brethren ren supported him, but he was unable to continue his confession that day. At this meeting others were in as deep distress as he, and the church floor was covered with the slain of the Lord, and their agony for their sins is indescribable. On one occasion, a man beat the floor till he left the marks of his bloody fist on the boards, and appeared utterly unconscious of what he had done. The sobs and groans of the penitents could be heard at a great distance from the church and the repetition of such scenes filled the city with wonder and fear. During a number of the meetings many outsiders came in, some to mock and jeer, but among them were those who were also overwhelmed with the rest."

Koreans are generally regarded as of a very impassive temperament, and this outbreak has astonished the missionaries, but they accept it as from God, just as they have been inclined to accept the Korean idea that demons take possession of people there as they did of the people in the time of our Lord. The experiences are of both psychological and religious interest and importance, and help us to interpret New Testament language.—The Independent, June 6, 1907.

INFIDELITY AND THE NEW THEOLOGY IN WEDLOCK.

The theological position of the Reverend R. J. Campbell [author of the "new theology" that has stirred England] has become so anomalous that he has been claimed as yoke-fellow by many and various professors of creeds. Now it is Mr. Robert Blatchford, editor of the Clarion (London), who declares: "Mr. Campbell is a Christian minister and I am an infidel editor; and the difference between his religion and mine is too small to argue about. But I sail under the Jolly Roger." The "New Theology," asserts Mr. Blatchford, is "God and My Neighbor" (his own book) "with the soft pedal on." It is, continues the exuberant Mr. Blatchford, "Thomas Paine in a white tie, . . . the Ingersoll fist muffled in a boxing-glove." The editor of the Clarion, avowing himself "an agnostic socialist," confesses himself "naturally pleased" with Mr. Campbell's book, and hopes "every Christian in the Empire will read it, and will read God and My Neighbor immediately after it." The "conjunction," he says, "will prove surprising," and he goes on to indicate some of the ways thereof:

"Mr. Campbell believes—I think—in the immortality of the soul. I express no opinion on that subject, as I have no data.

"Mr. Campbell calls nature God. I call nature nature.

"Mr. Campbell thinks we ought to have some form of supernatural religion, and that we ought to associate with Christ. I prefer a religion of humanity without idolatry.

"Mr. Campbell thinks Jesus the most perfect man that ever lived. I think there have been many men as good, and some better. But beyond those differences I think I may venture to say that there is nothing Mr. Campbell believes that I deny, and nothing I believe that he denies. Beyond those differences I am as much a Christian as is the Reverend R. J. Campbell, and the Reverend R. J. Campbell is as much an infidel as the editor of the Clarion.

"Mr. Campbell rejects the doctrines of the fall and the atonement. He denies the divinity of Christ, the virgin birth, and the resurrection. He denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible and he rejects the idea of divine punishment and an everlasting hell. So do I.

"Mr. Campbell abandons the orthodox theory of sin, and says that selfishness is sin, and that unselfishness is morality and salvation. So do I.

"Mr. Campbell meets me more than half way on the subject of determinism, and will, I believe, come the other half when he has thoroughly mastered the problem.

"These are bold assertions, and perhaps Mr. Campbell may think them too sweeping; but the proof is easy.

"The best proof is a comparison of 'The New Theology' with my 'infidel' books."—Literary Digest, June 8, 1907.

"The Least of These."

She had little of earthly beauty,
She had less of earthly lore;
She climbed by a path so narrow,
Such wearisome burdens bore!
And she came, with heart a-tremble,
To the warder at heaven's door.

And said, "There were hearts of heroes";
She said, "There were hands of might;
I had only my little children,
That called to me day and night;
I could only soothe their sorrows,
Their childish hearts make light."

And she bowed her head in silence,
She hid her face in shame;
When, out from a blaze of glory,

A form majestic came;
And sweeter than all heaven's music,
Lo, some one called her name!

"Dear heart, that hath self forgotten,
That never its own has sought.
Who keepeth the weak from falling
To the King hath jewels brought,
Lo, what thou hast done for the children,
For the Lord himself has wrought!"

Summer Gathering for Winter's Need.

This is the title of a small booklet by J. K. Miller, D. D., from which we select the following. They are gems of thought, which we feel must commend themselves to each thoughtful parent who reads them. And is there a parent who is not thoughtful? One who does not at some time in serious mood ask himself the question: What am I doing to equip my child for resisting the many temptations of life which he is sure to encounter upon its untried highway? I am responsible for his being here. God granted his life because of my desire that he should be. How am I meeting this responsibility? I ought to do more for him than my parents did for me, but am I doing it?

If perchance any one who may read this is constrained to answer in the negative, then to such a one we commend the following—but not alone to him but to each one who reads. And if among those who read both the poem and the quotation there should be found some weary, overburdened mother—some mother who, in the midst of her serving, may more than once have wiped away the unbidden tear caused by the thought of how her life was circumscribed by the constant recurrence of the daily round of petty cares—cares which held out insistent hands—hands not to be turned aside though the heart was longing for freedom, if this should be, we repeat, then may they be enabled to realize how trivial is all else in comparison—of how little worth when this is left undone:

"Yet," says Doctor Miller, "there is another sense in which, even in our spiritual life, we may gather in summer for winter's use. For example, in times of quietness and security we may store in our hearts the resources we shall need to draw upon for meeting temptation. Childhood and early youth, in a true Christian home, are sheltered in a large measure from stern assaults and conflicts. The atmosphere is kindly and genial. The influences are helpful. There is a mother's bosom to hide in. There is a father's hand to lead and protect. The family altar, with its daily worship, which brings all together in prayer, holds all the household close to God's feet. The sin of the world outside washes the very threshold, the spray of its tides dashing against the windows; yet within the sacred walls there is a holy life, unperturbed, unstained, loving, gentle, and true. The child that grows up amid such influences and in a home like that pictured with such beauty in the Cotter's Saturday Night is sheltered from the temptations that make the world without so perilous a place in which to live. This period is the summer of life to those who are blessed with its privileges.

"But the winter comes. No young person can live always in such shelter. There is a time, earlier or later, when the children must go out of the sweet, safe home to face the temptations and conflicts of the world. It is possible, however, in the days of quiet in the home so to gather spiritual resources in the heart that in the conflicts and temptations of the after-days the life shall be safe.

"When men build a great ship to go upon the sea, they pile away in its keel tremendous reserves of strength—stanch ribs, immense beams and stays, and heavy plates of steel. What does it all mean? There is no need for such strength now. If the ship were to sail only in some peaceful river, or even on the ocean in its quiet days, it would be foolish expenditure at such cost to put such strength in her frame. But the builders are preparing the vessel for the wildest storms that she may ever have to face on the sea. They are building her, not for ordinary sailing in smooth waters, but for the fury of the most terrific tempest.

"So human lives should be built in the home, in the days of happy youth; not merely for the sweet experiences of the sheltered home itself, with its love, gentleness, and peace, but to meet the sternest buffetings and the sorest testings that any possible future may bring. Principles should be fixed in the heart so firmly that nothing can ever swerve the life from them. Habits should be so wrought into the conduct that nothing can ever change them. Conscience should be so trained that it shall do its duty with inexorable fidelity in the sorest stress of temptation.

"We know how it was, for example, with Daniel and his young Hebrew friends. They had been brought up in godly homes, where they were taught the word of God with great faithfulness. There they had gathered into their souls rich stores of divine truth which had been wrought into materials for noble character—reverence for God, courage, strength, wisdom, and all needful moral qualities. In their early manhood, when they were scarcely more than boys, they were carried away into a strange land, among heathen people. There they were exposed to peculiar trials. But they resisted every temptation and stood the severest test. It was because in their childhood hours, away back in the quiet days of early training and discipline, they had gathered reserves of moral strength and courage in their hearts.

"The same thing has occurred thousands of times since Daniel's day and is continually occurring. Young people go out from their sweet homes of love and prayer and obedience into a world of spiritual enmity and antagonism, where they encounter all forms of subtle temptation. Yet they pass unharmed through all these insidious dangers because in the summer days they have gathered into their souls the qualities of character which make them invincible.

"We have a suggestion here of the responsibility of parents and teachers and others who have to do with the education and training of children and young people. Their sacred work must be well done if the lives they send out into the world are to be prepared not only for the largest usefulness but for stanchness, stability, and incorruptibility of character. In the summer of childhood and early youth the gathering and storing must be done largely by others, not by the persons themselves. This puts a tremendous responsibility on those who must do this work and furnishes a mighty motive for diligence and faithfulness. They should teach truth with conscientious carefulness. They should train mind and heart with all wisdom. They should seek the most perfect discipline of character in those they are training. They know not in what circumstances these lives shall be placed in after-years, through what experiences they shall pass, what solemn and delicate duties shall be put into their hands, in what positions responsibility and trust they shall be called to stand, what vital interest may sometimes depend on their wisdom, fidelity, and strength.

"Men said the old smith was foolishly careful as he wrought on the great chain he was making in his dingy shop in the heart of the great city. But he heeded not their words and only wrought with greater painstaking. Link after link he fashioned and at last the chain was finished and carried away. In time it lay coiled on the deck of a great ship which sped back and forth on the ocean. There seemed no use for it, for the great anchor was never needed and the chain lay there uncoiled. So years passed. But one night there was a terrible storm and the ship was in sore peril of being hurled upon the rocks. Anchor after anchor was dropped, but none of them availed. The chains were broken like threads. At last the mighty sheet anchor was cast into the sea and the old chain was quickly uncoiled and run out until it grew taut. All watched to see if it would bear the awful strain. It sang in the wild storm as the vessel's weight surged upon it. It was a moment of intense anxiety. The ship with its cargo of a thousand lives depended upon this one chain. What now if the old smith had wrought carelessly even on one link of this chain! But he had put honesty and truth and invincible strength into every part of it, and it stood the test, holding the ship in safety until the storm was over and the morning came.

"Those who in home or school or college train a young life know not for what momentous responsibilities they are fashioning it. But they should do their work so well that never in any circumstances shall the life fail through ignorance, through weakness, through lack of truth. It is theirs now in the life's summer to store away in it the reserve of wisdom, of strength, of faith, of love, of endurance, which it may need. Should the life break or fail in the testings of future years, because of the inadequacy of its early furnishing, the mistakes of its training and the imperfectness of its discipline, it will be the fault, not of the person who fails, but of those who were unfaithful as parents or teachers.

"There are several ways in which this lesson may be applied. One is in preparation for meeting temptation. In one of Holman Hunt's pictures he shows Jesus in the carpenter's shop at Nazareth. It was in his early youth. Along the side of the shop is a little case containing a collection of ancient rolls. The artist would represent our Lord as having the books of the Bible in the shop where he worked at his trade, the suggestion being that in his resting moments he turned often to them to read and ponder their words. Thus he stored the sacred truths in his memory. No doubt this was his custom. He studied his father's words diligently until his heart was full of them. Then when he went out from his quiet home and the tempter came to him, he had but to bring out a divine promise, a word of scripture, as one who would draw an arrow from a full quiver, and with it repel the enemy.

"The young people should take the lesson. Now life is easy to them. Home's shelter is over them. Home's love shields them. By and by they must meet temptation in some of its insidious forms. In these bright, sunny days they should gather into their lives stores of moral and spiritual strength from which to draw when they go forth to encounter the world's fierce temptations. Memory should then be filled with the words of God. The great essential principles of Christianity should be so established in their minds that no assaults of scepticism can ever make them doubt. The fundamental laws of morality should be firmly fixed in their consciences as the inflexible rule of conduct from which nothing can ever cause them to depart. Their habits of spiritual life should be so wrought into the very texture of their being that they will carry their religion with them out into the world as they carry the features of their face or their throbbing heart. Into the ship of their life, their character, they should pile massive strength which no wrathful energy of life can ever possibly overcome. Gathering in summer they shall not want in winter."

Humble men often shrink from positions of responsibility from a sense of unworthiness and liability, but, after all, the best evidence that any man can have that a certain work is his allotment, is the call of God and his brethren.—Christian Standard.

Editors Herald: Having just read the article, "Laws of health," by Ralph W. Farrell, I heartily indorse the movement to organize a Word of Wisdom club in our eating and drinking, also wisdom in dress. We should be the "salt of the earth." Salt is a saving power, but if it has lost its savor it is of no use to man. We should take the lead in all movements to elevate mankind. If we will but keep our eyes open and watch as well as pray, we shall see that we are needed as a "light to the world, a city that is set upon a hill that can not be hid." We should arise in the strength that God has given us, cultivate the talents intrusted to us, and by keeping the Word of Wisdom we have the promise of receiving hidden treasures of wisdom and knowledge, also great strength, so much so that we could "run and not be weary, walk and not faint," and that the destroying angel would pass us by and not destroy us. In other words we would be pleasing in our heavenly Father's sight, and he would prosper us in health, wealth, happiness, and long life. Then it is for our own good we obey the Lord in keeping the Word of Wisdom.

I have just been reading a little booklet entitled Guide to Autology, by Doctor E. R. Moras, M. D., Chicago, Illinois. He is a graduate of Harvard University Medical School, also from the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Chicago, Professor of Obstetrics, College of Physicians and Surgeons, and a member of the Chicago Medical Society, so if there is anything in title he surely has a show of knowing something about the human system. Autology is to know thyself. Autopathy is to cure thyself. From the quotations I have read it is a grand book, and should be read by all. He has torn away from the drug system, and turns to nature for remedies for all ills. He says, Learn to work out your brain and body's salvation as you do your dollars and cents. That we are as plants—need the air, sunshine,—live and survive on the same. As plants that are from the earth, the air, water, that our food and drink are responsible for all our sickness, and the ignorance on our part of not knowing that health is so easy to obtain.

Can not we arise and shine as we are commanded of God? and take the lead in such movements as this? We have the great God of heaven and earth as our counsel and guide in all matters of importance? Let us move forward in the discharge of our duty, do as he had told us, build our sanitarium, show to the world that God is the great physician through the Lord Jesus Christ of both soul and body. Then, and not until then, will the world come to learn of Zion. We must move forward, do all we are commanded. Light is springing up in various places. Babylon has been trembling. Many good and honest ones are longing for a place of safety, but know not where to go. It is to us God has intrusted his work in the kingdom on earth. What are we doing more than the world? Let us talk gospel, act, and live it. No matter what others may do our enemies will flee. Zion will be redeemed, and that blessed day we all long for will be insured. Ever living and working for Zion's cause I remain,
Your sister,
LIZZIE BAGGERLY.

Editors Herald: I, this afternoon, feel impressed to write to the dear old HERALD. I just wish to correct some misunderstanding in regard to my becoming a Latter Day Saint. I, at one time, belonged to the Brighamite church and had many friends—that is, I thought they were friends, but when I found out what they believed, and the doctrine they taught, I was God-fearing enough to come out and say, "I can not be one with you any longer," and I now wish to tell the reason I left them. I do not want any one to get the wrong idea of the matter. I suppose some think I was over-persuaded to join the Reorganized Church; but all who think that please read this, and they will find that I was persuaded, but not by man nor any set of men. I have not as yet found such in our church. They preach the gospel to all, and we have our privilege to accept or reject. I have found good, honest men in the Reorganized Church. They do not preach one thing and practice another.

I came into the church through my own good will. I investigated Mormonism, and found that it would not stand investigation, so I denounced it and united myself with a church that could stand criticism. I wish now to tell my reason for taking the step I have. I am honest and want to do the right thing, and I do not feel like supporting a man or any set of men in their wickedness. Now think for one moment. The prophet, seer and revelator of the Mormon church before the Senate Committee in Washington, himself declared that he was living in open violation of both the laws of God and man, and intended to do so and suffer the consequences. We are told in the Scriptures that "an open confession is good for the soul," but when a man comes out and says that he is living in open violation to God and intends to do so, that confession will not be good for his soul; but he will have to stand before his God and give an account for such blasphemy. I do not want any one to think that I had to be persuaded to come out of such evil. I can not nor will not support such wickedness.

I will refer you to some of Joseph F. Smith's errors while he was in Washington before the Senate committee. He stated there that it was only a short while after he went into polygamy that his first wife left him. Now I will ask you, reader, to get the pamphlet Blood Atonement and the Origin of Plural Marriage, published by Joseph F. Smith, Jr. On page 71 you will find it claimed that it was long after he had taken his second wife that his first wife left him. Now can any one tell me when and where he told the truth? We surely will have to admit that one of these statements is untrue. "A faithful witness will not lie; but a false witness will utter lies."—Proverbs 14:6. "A righteous man hateth lying, but a wicked man is loathsome and cometh to shame."—Proverbs 12:5. Judge for yourself. Yes, the tree is known by its fruit. A man living with five wives to-day, claiming to be living in open violation both of the laws of God and of man, and intends to do so and suffer the consequences! "Yes, yes, double shame!" this is the chorus. I can not nor will not support such in their wickedness.

The Utah elders will go out in the world pretending to represent Christ and the Father, but when we get here we find out who the father is. They do just what the prophet Joseph said they should not do, come telling us that there is not only one God but many, and that Adam is our god and the only god we have to do with; and when the humble servants of God come telling us that we have not the fullness of the gospel, then they will say that the old Josephites are picking their religion to pieces. But if all honest hearts will search, they will find out that the so-called religion is already torn down and so badly scattered that if all the good points were put together I think that the evils practiced would overbalance. But as we are told that truth is mighty and will prevail, truth would come to the front and crush that evil; it is not because the Josephites are an enemy to the Utah people, but they have the truth, the plan of life and salvation and want to show them where they have been led astray. I know that it is not every one that will be saved in the kingdom of God; but one thing I know, and that is, the man or woman who keeps the commandments of God will be saved, but he has not commanded us to support any man in his wickedness.

Now to the elders in Alabama, I have relatives in south Alabama that have been led astray by the Utah elders, and if it should be convenient would like the elders to call and see them. They live at a little place called High Hill, near Mt. Pleasant, Alabama. Ask for G. W. Murphy.

Now may this work roll forth and fill the whole earth. I ask the prayers of all the Saints, and my prayers will be for the people of the Lord.

Your sincere sister in the cause of truth,

A. C. GRAHAM.

BOZEMAN, Montana, June 8, 1907.

Editors Herald: Since my last communication to your columns, I have labored in many different places. Leaving Montana in the early part of February, I passed down through Idaho, stopping at Blackfoot for a few days, and then going on to Eight Mile, where the district conference was held on the 23d and 24th. Here I found a thriving branch of Saints striving to do all they can to keep the banner of King Immanuel before the people. I enjoyed the conference and association of the Saints during my stay there. While in Blackfoot I spoke a few times to the Saints, and found them laboring under discouraging conditions, surrounded as they are with people not friendly to the cause of Christ, and only a few in number. It seems almost impossible to do much. I sympathize with many of the Saints in the West; isolated as they are it is no wonder that they give up in despair.

From Eight Mile I went to Salt Lake City, stopping on the way at Ogden, also a few hours in Pocatello, Idaho.

I attended the Utah District conference, and while there studied the Mormon situation from a close view-point. Some lessons received while there, I shall not soon forget. I could discover the power that held thousands of honest people under the bond of priestcraft. It is a deplorable condition when a few men can rule and domineer hundreds of people who are bright, intelligent people in many ways. From the reports of the missionary force in that field, we are led to believe that a brighter day is dawning for those poor, benighted people in Utah. May the day speedily come when the honest in heart may hear the glorious gospel, and throw off the error that will prove to be a successful one in that mission; and my prayer is that our labors there may be blessed in separating truth from error, and bringing many souls to a knowledge of the truth.

From Salt Lake City I went direct home, stopping over night in St. Joseph, Missouri, where I enjoyed the hospitality of Bro. Don. Kinnamon, arriving at home on March 16. Here I remained until May 20 when I started for my field of labor, the Montana District.

I noticed while in General Conference that the church was advancing in many ways. While there were some things that we could improve upon, yet in the main we are becoming more united, and our leading quorums are standing firmly united together on important questions coming before them.

Since my return to the field, I have labored in Reese Creek, where we had a flourishing branch at one time, but only a few now remain to carry on the work. While there I was called to preach the funeral-sermon of a Miss Elizabeth Brown, who was not a member of our church. We tried to show the justice of the infinite One in providing for every son and daughter of Adam's posterity, and think good was effected as a result of our talk.

I was also invited by the ladies' aid society of the Christian Church in Bozeman to define the difference between our people and the Salt Lake Mormons, which invitation was gladly accepted, and in a thirty-minute speech we tried to set clearly but briefly the difference before them. There seems to be a chance to open up the work in many new localities, and before the year is out I hope to report some good being done out here in the Rockies.

Our district conference convenes in Deer Lodge on the 22d and 23d of this month. We hope to have a good attendance and trust the Saints will make an effort to be present. We are expecting Bro. Edgar Smith, our colaborer, and are wondering why we have not heard from him. Ever praying for the cause of Zion, I remain,

Your brother in bonds,

L. G. HOLLOWAY.

DEFIANCE, Ohio, June 9, 1907.

Editors Herald: The HERALD is a very welcome guest every week, and I could not afford to be without it, more especially since we moved to this place, as there is no branch here, and I have not yet been able to find any Saints here. So we have to be satisfied with our Sabbath-school home class, and the preaching we get through our paper but I hope that our missionaries will soon find an entrance here, and have great success; at least I am praying for it and hope to see it fulfilled in the near future. We are only three Saints in our family—my wife, one daughter, and myself, but hope soon to add another daughter to the fold.

Defiance is a nice little place with between eleven and twelve thousand inhabitants, and as all the different denominations seem to be represented, the true church certainly ought to be.

In gospel bonds,

O. TANDBERG.

HOLDEN, Missouri, June 2, 1907.

Editors Herald: Before starting for my mission field, which is in Ohio, I have a few words to write for the HERALD. In a day or two I shall be leaving home, perhaps for nine or ten months, and in consulting my feelings I find that it is harder for me to say farewell to loved ones at home than when I first entered the ministry, and yet my love for the Lord's work has not decreased. My valuation of my parents' interest in my early welfare increases with the years, and I am loath to leave their presence.

When a child my mind was so filled with the thought of the existence of God that I bowed before him frequently when alone, and desired him to manifest himself to me, that I might serve him aright. Frequently I found myself in communion with the Lord; ideals of right-living rose before me; in dealing with me the Lord was merciful, longsuffering, and kind, and I learned to love his ways. Holiness I found belonged to the Lord.

At the age of sixteen years I united with the church, was ordained a priest when eighteen, and in two years devoted my whole time to the ministry. Knowing what conflicts, mental and spiritual, the young have in their early religious experiences I have been made glad to see many of the youth in the church showing an interest in things that bear the seal of the Lord. It is eminently proper and pleasing to God that every member of the church be a faithful disciple of the master of men; this the young should keep in mind as well as those in the noon-day of life and those advanced in years.

The Lord is good to all in the multiplicity of his blessing; we have hope beyond the tomb, death does not end all. Yet God oftentimes is not given our supreme consideration; we allow things that are transitory, that which glitters and perishes, to receive our chief thought, and then we wonder sometimes why God's ear appears to be a little dull. Every nation that has turned its attention away from the Lord and found chief delight in the riches of the earth, has gone down to destruction. Think of the Egyptians, the Babylonians, the Romans, and other great peoples—as with nations, so it has been, and shall be, with individuals. The principle holds good. What a great mistake, and very illogical is it, to center the affections upon what, without God, could not exist; nevertheless many are “lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God.”

As Zion's light begins to brighten, let us be happy, and trust in the Lord in those things he asks of us. God is strong; the great seas testify of his power, the earth declares his wisdom, the heavens his majesty. God's work seems to be to make known to men his existence and character; that men may become like him, and partake of his glory. What a tremendous truth for the consciousness of man, in his unregenerated state, to be awakened to a knowledge of the existence of God! Sad is the state of one to whom has come this knowledge, if he be careless as to whether his ways are right before the Lord. Such a person is moving downward, not toward the Lord.

There is in the church of God, power; every child of God, by reason of being a part of the church, has, or should have, in his possession a part of his power. We have a right to stir up this divine element and at an opportune time if occasion calls for it, roar, if need be, like a lion in the forest, inside or out of the church. We are charged with sending forth the word of the Lord, first to the Gentiles, and then to the Jews. The world is our mission-field. Quite large it is. So there is a vast field for us to enter in upon—a field which, many years ago, was whitening to the harvest. Perhaps many of the young that are now putting forth an effort to serve the Lord will be called upon to assist in the great harvest day, the noon-time of which, if not its eventide has come.

Having traveled somewhat outside of my home country, I keenly perceive that “the harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few,” and that we should “pray the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth laborers into his harvest.”

About all that Elder D. E. Tucker and myself could do in New Zealand was to pack off rubbish; our church was almost unknown; we were confounded with the dominant church of Utah, and their evils were laid at our door; about all that any one can do in a new, especially a foreign field, is to clear the way for the building up of the kingdom of God. Clearing a site for a building is not unimportant work; nor is it a matter of small import to prepare the way of the Lord. Now and again good reports come to me from that far-off land, and I shall be glad when the work of the Lord moves with rapid strides, and the people of that country learn of the existence on earth of the church of God, which has come to us and filled us with effulgent glory.

Palestine, too, awaits the coming of representatives of this church as I walked about on the city walls and through the streets of Jerusalem, meditating on these things, tears trickled down my cheeks, and I rejoiced that the time was near when the angel's message would be sounded in the city, and my soul broke forth in praise to the Lord.

Then there are fields in South America, Japan, Europe, and in other countries where, with a united effort on the part of the church, there could be messengers of the Lord gathering sheaves. Great is the work that lies before us; the bugle calls; let us now move on to victory.

I trust that in the performance of my part in the great work of the Master, and in the conflict of life, I shall be humble, diligent, and careful in all that I do, that my work finally shall pass the inspection of God, whose eye is quick to see what has been well done—men shall be “rewarded according to their works.”

PAUL M. HANSON,

News From Branches

PERTH, WEST AUSTRALIA.

When I came to Perth a little over two years ago, there were then but three families of Saints, namely, those of Henry Broadway, W. Clark, and J. H. Manning, the head of one of the families, Bro. Clark, being absent working in the country. Two meetings were then held, but very shortly afterwards the few Saints of Perth (about eight altogether) commenced to hold meetings at the home of Bro. Manning at Luderville, one of the suburbs of Perth, prayer- and testimony-meeting being the order of the day.

After some months our numbers were increased by the arrival of Bro. and Sr. Davies from Melbourne, Victoria, and shortly after their arrival we were greatly blessed of the Lord and strengthened by the ministrations of Elder Paul M. Hanson, who sojourned with us one month on his homeward journey. We took advantage of the presence of the elder and held meetings in one of the local halls. We also held meetings on the street. During his stay in West Australia, Bro. Hanson visited Mr. and Mrs. Robinson of East Fremantle, Mrs. Robinson being the daughter of Bro. Francis White who was baptized in the days of Joseph the Seer. The ultimate result of that visit was that the family and fold of God was strengthened by the addition of two noble, precious souls. Bro. and Sr. Robinson have since had the gratification of seeing five of their children and several of their grandchildren unite with the church. Bro. and Sr. Mills, then Mr. and Mrs. Mills, having kindly offered the use of their house to Saints, the meetings were held in their home close to the Luderville Railway station, good attendance and fair interest being manifested.

In the course of events Bro. E. H. Davies was ordained to the office of priest under the hands of Elder Broadway, and he ministered to the spiritual needs of the Saints until the crowning joy of our times, the advent of Apostle C. A. Butterworth, who before his return to the eastern States ordained Bro. J. H. Manning to the office of priest, Bro. Alma Robinson to the office of deacon, and organized the first branch of the church in the western portion of the Continent of Australia. We have had many happy spiritual times since then, and trust to have many more such. We number about thirty Saints and have a few regular visitors. Hold services every Sunday afternoon at Bro. Mills' house, and street-meetings Sunday evenings in Perth to fair crowds and fair interest.

One, Bro. Buffington was recently baptized as a result of the efforts on the street. Said brother is over seventy years of age, and has never been a member of any church, but has had the witness of the Spirit that he has found the truth.

The branch holds prayer- and testimony-meeting every Tuesday evening, while a Sunday-school has been running some time. Just a week ago a Religio was formed and all who have attended testify to the blessings already received through the same. We desire to affiliate with the Religio society who meet in convention from time to time, but as I have forgotten the method of procedure, I must ask those interested and in authority to send instruction. I know we should have a charter as fortunately for myself I was permitted to be a charter member of the Zion's Religio-Literary society organized by Bro. J. W. Wight in Richmond, Victoria. The Religio has, according to the general custom, undertaken the study of the Book of Mormon, so if the general officers of the Religio can send any matter or information which will help us along that line of study, will be grateful and send along sufficient to cover expense incurred.

I have been about seven years in the church during which I have seen the Melbourne Central Branch, now Richmond, and the Perth Branch organized, being a member of each at its inception, while the Adelaide Branch with Elder J. H. N. Jones at its head has been organized between times, and I may add between places, Perth being distant from Melbourne over one thousand miles. These last two branches have been organized in fulfillment of a revelation given in the former by a sister under the inspiration of the Spirit, telling of some who would be moved out by the Lord in order that they might be instruments to assist in the formation of branches in other parts of the country.

The work has taken shape in New Zealand, while Brisbane, Queensland, has been strengthened. There seems also to be strong reasons to believe that a branch of the church will again be established in Geelong, Victoria. The whole of these and the progress of the work generally, seems to me a strong testimony of the fulfillment of Daniel's interpretation of King Nebuchadnezzar's dream wherein the king saw the stone cut out of the mountain without hands, this representing the kingdom which was never to be destroyed, but was to roll until it filled the whole earth.

All the Saints here are pleased with the splendid recovery made by the HERALD. We could ill afford to lose so great an evangelist, so great a medium of exchange of thought. It is truly pleasant to be able to read in the pages of the "silent missionary" of the doings, of the thoughts of those we have met and who have passed on. It keeps them fresh in our memories, and through its pages we are enabled to feel indeed the close relationship of brotherhood and sisterhood, of those we have not seen, but whose thoughts we have so often read. May it, having risen like the fabled phenix, from its ashes, continue to go forth and spread comfort and cheer to the Saints until the time comes when its services will be no longer required.

GEORGE W. MILLARD.

"Marmion," Bennet Street, PERTH, West Australia.

CHICAGO ITEMS.

Monday night, June 3, our regular branch business-meeting was held, for the election of branch officers, and other business. Bro. J. W. Wight was present, and occupied the chair. All branch officers were sustained in their former order.

It having been the intimation of the Spirit to many and on different occasions that the kind Father had named Bro. Harry Passman for the priesthood, on motion of Bro. Mead the matter was taken up and discussed, all agreeing, and the brother after ascertaining that all were agreed, gave consent to be ordained to the office of priest. He was accordingly ordained at once. Bro. Passman is of the seed of Abraham, and no doubt one designated therein, to be brought to the knowledge of Jesus Christ, by the Book of Mormon. Bro. Passman, however, had been affiliated with the belief in Christ, but never giving his whole heart to the Master, till that wonderful personage was so vividly burned into his heart by the inspiring pages of the book so "wonderful." To-day, the first Sabbath after his ordination, Bro. Passman occupied the stand, with remarkable liberty.

Bro. Mead announced that those interested in the study of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants would meet at the hall for organization and arrangements. This ought to take the form of a priesthood meeting with open doors and free floor, as the writer recalls being so profitably done by St. Joseph Branch. It is a fact too true to be jested with, that many of the Saints, including many of the local priesthood, know nothing more about the Book of Doctrine and Covenants than to have a general idea of what it contains. This ought not to be. Thanks to the Religio for bringing the Book of Mormon to the attention of the "passive" few, and for better acquainting the "studious" with that portion of God's word which to too many, does not seem so important as the Bible, wafted to them by every wind of tradition.

So let us all now sing, "Awake Saints, awake," and rally to the support of the Religio, and everywhere "brighten up" in our Doctrine and Covenants "lore," for therein are we told that Zion can not be redeemed, except upon the principle of the law of the celestial kingdom; and nowhere is this law taught so plainly, and so definitely, as in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants.

J. H. CAMP.

2270 West 25th Street, June 9.

BUFFALO, NEW YORK.

The work here I am pleased to say is in a fairly good condition, it being in its infancy at this place, Bro. Pitt having labored here for a short time getting the work started; and to-day quite a few that have never heard of the restored gospel before are coming to our meetings quite regularly and good interest is shown by all. So far as the Saints are concerned, I must say they have as fine a body to start with as you would wish to meet, and if they continue in the same spirit as they have started, I predict that you will hear from them in the future in a way that will be well pleasing.

J. C. FARNFIELD.

DES MOINES.

Several from the city attended the district conventions and conference which met at Boone the first week in June.

Apostle W. H. Kelley was in the city June 3 on his way home to Lamoni from the conference at Boone.

Arrangements for the children's day service are all being made, but a change in the former custom is being made and the service will be held in the park on a week-day.

The Seventh Day Adventist people held their annual state campmeeting in this city May 30 to June 9. It was estimated that eight thousand people attended the meeting. On the closing day fifty-five persons were received into the church, the baptismal service being at the river, two elders administrating the rite.

The Sunday-school on June 9 approved the recommendations of the Library Commission, and made provision for a local representative of the school to meet a like representative from the branch and the Religio.

Bishop Kelly of Independence, Missouri, was with us one Sunday in May and was gladly welcomed by the Saints. Also Elder Allen, in charge of the rebuilding of the Herald Publishing House plant, was with us one Sunday recently.

An effort will be made to organize a class in the new normal work in the Sunday-school here, and we expect to see a large class take up the work.

A. A. REAMS.

June 12.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.

All of the auxiliary departments of the Independence Branch are "working." Our reception committee is not only doing its work among the Saints at the Sunday services, but, by systematic effort, is working continuously through the week in creating and maintaining the social side of our branch affairs.

An effort is being made by the Religio to replace the gas fixtures in the church basement with electric lights, and we hope soon to see the latter installed, as the additional light is much needed, especially by the Religio classes.

Both Religio and Sunday-school workers are at this time intensely interested in starting the "normal work." One class meets Thursday evening, and the other Sunday morning, and next Friday evening a class will be organized in the Religio; thus three opportunities will be afforded for class work along this line for those who are interested.

Children's day for the Sunday-school is due here at an early date and our committees are all busily engaged in preparing the programs and arranging the accompanying details, etc.

J. A. GARDNER.

KEOKUK, IOWA.

Last Sunday was a happy day at Keokuk, although it was very stormy. Five were baptized by the writer, and several more expressed themselves that they soon would follow. We have been laboring and praying for this.

Keokuk Branch is flourishing just now. We received three new members at our last business-meeting. Also a sister with her family has moved here from Wilber, Nebraska. I am informed she is a good worker.

The confirmation-meeting took place at the chapel during a heavy rain-storm. The Spirit was present and the writer felt blessed in his calling.

Our Sunday-school is progressing nicely. We saw several new faces the last few Sundays. But how could it be otherwise? Show me a set of active teachers and I will show you an active Sunday-school.

Our children's day was celebrated last Sunday. It was a success.

A. C. ANDERSON.

June 10.

LAMONI, IOWA.

The Lamoni Saints had a rare treat on Wednesday of last week in the Graceland College commencement address, delivered by the Honorable Edwin A. Nye, editor of the Des Moines Daily News. His address, "Seein' Things, or the point of View," was handled in a masterly and an edifying manner.

The Saints everywhere will no doubt be glad to learn that the brick work on the new HERALD Office building has begun. The first brick was laid Monday morning by Bro. Harry Hatty, of Independence, Missouri, who is foreman of the brick-laying crew. Brn. R. M. Maloney of Oklahoma, Will Toddy, and A. B. Austin, of Independence, and Richard Judson, of Lamoni, are assisting with the brick work.

Heman C. Smith was the speaker at the chapel Sunday morning, R. M. Maloney in the evening. John Spaulding spoke at the Saints' Home, J. R. Lambert at Liberty Home, R. M. Elvin occupied at the Wion school-house at three, Elbert A. Smith at Greenville at four, Moroni Traxler at Andover in the evening, James E. Kelley at Oland morning and evening, and John Smith at Evergreen, morning and evening.

The conference of the Eastern Michigan District will convene at Flint, in the Armory, June 29 and 30. Religio and Sunday-school convention June 28. President R. C. Evans and Apostle J. W. Wight are both expected to be present. George M. Shippy, 2054 Tenth Street, Port Huron, Michigan.

Conference of the Southeastern Illinois District will convene with Tunnelhill Branch, on the fourth Saturday, the twenty-second day of June, 1907. All officials please take notice and get all reports to me by that time. Let us have a good representation from all the branches. P. G. McMahon, clerk.

Convention Notices.

Convention of the Religio society and the Sunday-school association of Eastern Michigan District, will convene at Flint, Michigan, Friday, June 28, 1907, Religio convention beginning at 9.30 a. m., standard time, Sunday-school at 1.30 p. m. A joint prayer-meeting will be held at 8.30 a. m. We trust all will be interested in this department of the work, and also as many as can kindly prepare for a part in the program for the evening. Emma Hale Whitford, secretary.

Reunion Notices.

The next session of the Eastern Reunion Association will be held July 27, 1907, at Highland Lake station, Massachusetts. This lake is on the Midland Division of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, about twenty-five miles from Providence (53 cents), forty from Fall River (80 cents), and twenty-one from Boston (45 cents). It is in the midst of a beautiful pine grove. The depot is situated on one side of the lake within three minutes' walk of our grove, making it very handy for all baggage and passenger traffic; plenty of lumber, wood, and ice within five hundred feet of our camp, and everything seems to be favorable for a very profitable time. Arrangements have already been made for teaming, storage, milk, lumber, etc., and I see no reason why we can not have as good a time here as at any place we have ever been located. In many ways, it is an ideal spot although it does not afford salt water privileges. Rates on board, tents, etc., will probably be same as in past. M. C. Fisher, chairman.

Western Oklahoma reunion will begin July 12 at Richmond in the southeast corner of Woodward County, about thirty-five miles from Woodward, and nearly the same distance from the railroad on the east. Brn. I. N. White, W. M. Aylor, A. M. Chase, and others are expected to be present. Any of these brethren coming to Canton, please notify Bro. George Steele, of the committee, Seiling, Oklahoma, when they will arrive, and arrangements will be made to meet them, or they may come out on the mail hack for a dollar to Seiling. Every possible convenience for the comfort and enjoyment of the Saints who attend, will be arranged for. In this connection a coöperative boarding-table will be established. There is economy in this method. Saves time and toil to the sisters, liberating to enjoy the services more closely, and it is a saving in expense. By the sacrifice in labor of some faithful committeemen in our past reunions, this method has always proved a success. Cost of meals has been about six cents per meal which speaks for itself, considering the fact that an abundance of good, wholesome food was served—no attempt at fancy dishes however. Owing to advance in commodities, rate may be just a trifle more this year; but it would be more to board separately as well. Small children not counted at full fare. Provisions of various kinds may be turned over to the committee at a just price, and applied on board. We urge the Saints of the western part, especially, not to miss this opportunity of ten days in a pleasant camp, partaking of spiritual blessing through the ministrations of the pure gospel, which is the power of God to save. Let no small hindrance keep you away. Come, not only to partake, but prepared by a prayerful contrite spirit to be used of God in blessing others. Come! Yours in the faith, James E. Yates, assistant to the district president.

Notices.

Married.

SMITH-YINGLING.—At the home of the bride's father, Bro. A. L. Yingling, 909 West Waldo Avenue, Independence, Missouri, May 29, 1907, President Joseph Smith officiating, Bro. Lewis Alvin Smith and Edna, eldest daughter of Bro. Yingling, pledged themselves to each other in the bonds of wedlock, according to the rules of the sacred rite of the Church of Christ, and the laws of the State. The ceremony was very simple and yet beautiful in its sedateness and solemnity; and was performed in the presence of a company of the friends and neighbors of the families of the contracting parties; who enjoyed the occasion, and gave the young couple the encouragement of their earnest wishes for their continued happiness in the new relationship. Both are residents of Independence, and will be at home at the number on Waldo Avenue, given above.

Chance to Write for the Paper.

Who has not at times had ideas which he or she would like to see in some newspaper? Many a good thought has slumbered in the brain of the thinker because of the difficulties and rebuffs which are always supposed to lie in the path to the editorial sanctum. The Chicago Record-Herald, however, welcomes such ideas and has a page in its Sunday issue called "The battle ground of modern thought," which is devoted exclusively to letters from its readers. The best articles received each week are carefully edited and printed over the writers' names. The amount of really valuable matter that finds its way into the department is remarkable and is proof that the ability to write well and entertainingly is not confined to professional writers. The only restriction the Record-Herald put upon writers for this interesting page is that articles must be of a controversial nature and devoted to the discussion of some current topic.

LEGITIMATE BUSINESS.

It seems to us that there ought to be a halt called upon the indiscriminate attacks upon all classes of business, made by extremists both in the church and among citizens of the world.

The prayer of the Savior for his disciples was, not that they should be taken out of the world, but that they should be kept from the evils of the world. As a disciple, we reiterate that prayer with all our heart; and while we do so we can not help but see that there is a just discrimination which should be made between what is right and justifiable in business, and what is wrong and unjustifiable.

There is absolutely no labor, employment, or business in which men may engage for the benefit of themselves or others which is right in itself but what may be made injurious by improper methods the result of ignorance, or by wrong and evil methods the result of cupidity and the unrestrained lust for gain. It is nowhere said that money is in itself evil; but it is said that "the love of money is the root of all evil." The proper use of money is everywhere commanded or commended in all the standard books of the church; and in all the works of all the writers on the economic and socialistic conditions existent in the world, from Job to the latest epistle on "frenzied finance."

Even Jesus in warning his disciples against the undue consideration to be taken concerning the things of this world after which the Gentiles sought, said; "For your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things." Then came the injunction, "Seek ye first to build up the kingdom of God and establish his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

As all manner of theft and robbery by which men accumulate the things of this world are forbidden by direct commandment through revelation to the Saints, it follows that provident and foreseeing means must be employed by them in order to sustain themselves in the world and put themselves into condition to do those things which God has commanded them.

There is just now a fierce and persistent fusilade of assumption and argument against what some leading mind has designated as "predatory wealth."

"The great Architect has placed the phenomena of birth and death under the veil at the two extremities of our earthly career. The one produces the inconceivable gift of life, which the other is ever ready to devour."

"When we fly at obstacles we must endeavor to make the point of our impact such that it will not interfere with others whose zeal, integrity, and wisdom equal our own."

This term means nothing more and nothing less than that class of personal or associated accumulation of marketable goods, wares, and merchandise, moneys, or lands, or their equivalents in exchange paper of the commercial world, which is the result of improper, wrong, unjustifiable, or evil methods of business transactions. These improper or evil methods of business prey upon the honest, striving, laboring, consuming classes, who by their small but persistent contributions made for the purpose of supplying their daily necessities, swell the enormous aggregations of the fortunes of the millionaires. It is because of this absorbing traffic in the things which our heavenly Father knoweth we have need, that these accumulations are called "predatory wealth"; the result of preying on the necessities of the people.

None should more certainly or more positively condemn the improper and wicked methods employed in conducting business, by the men of the world, or the men of the church, than the Saints themselves. And while this is true, as a matter of fact, whatever the extremists outside the pales of the church may do, there should be none found in the church so wild and unwise in their extreme views as to condemn all classes of business carried on by men of the world, and incidentally by men in the church, because some of the various kinds of business being pursued have been made the ways and means of robbing the people by selfish and dishonest methods.

The church undoubtedly has the right to guard its membership from the imposition of men prosecuting wild, improvident, and visionary schemes called "business propositions" promising great returns for small investments; promoted by irresponsible persons, in which business propositions there is no real basis of honest business. But while the church has this right and may very properly exercise it, neither the church as a body nor individuals of it can justifiably condemn men of the world or members of the church for engaging in the legitimate pursuit and prosecution of business enterprises, the prospective results of which are to be derived from the use of money, or property as capital, the employment of labor as a means of development, the oversight of forethought and business experience, as investments for success.

Of the classes of business ventures which lately have come in for rather more than their full share of denunciation, associations, incorporations, banks, railroads, speculations in grains and stocks on the "board of trade," coal, copper, gold, and other mining, and creative manufacturing of various sorts may be named.

It is very certain that the Saints and their dependencies must have fuel of some sort, or their fires will go out and chill and desolation will ensue. Prospecting for coal deposits is a legitimate business venture. Somebody must have what is called, in enterprising circles, "sand" enough to go first in putting energy and capital into an effort to "find" coal deposits. If he finds these, he is justified in endeavoring to enlist others with him in developing the "mine"; that is, digging the shaft, or drift, to reach the deposit, putting in the necessary plant of machinery for getting the coal out and into market, if he has not the necessary funds to do all this within his own resources. Such men and such enterprises we are not warranted in condemning because coal-mines have failed and men have lost investments in them.

There is another side to this. The man, or company of men, who with a view to speculative venture "promote" a coal-mine, locating that mine where coal is not known to exist and selling the stock to others upon improper representations, pursue an improper method, and it is not a legitimate business, but purely speculative; and such should be condemned. But, because such things are being done in the coal-mining industry, causing loss of money and confidence, is it wise, right, or just to indiscriminately attack the industry, and throw discredit upon all who may have been or may be now engaged in legitimate coal-mining as a business? We say, No!

There may be any number of copper, silver, lead, zinc, and gold-mining schemes afloat in the speculative "Wall Streets" of the world of finance. But this by no means asserts or proves that there are no real mines of copper, tin, or gold and silver existent, into which men may put their time, energies, and moneys, for the purpose of putting the ores from those mines upon the market as business ventures. Why should we assert directly, or by implication, that all who are engaged in promoting the developing of mining ventures, or absolutely operating the mines themselves, are swindlers, money sharks, or other hard names we may choose to employ to show our disapproval of the disreputable ways men have used and may use again to deceive the people by illusory and visionary schemes to acquire wealth, using speculative mining stocks as a means to do it with?

"Joseph's Land" is blessed beyond other lands with "treasures of the everlasting hills," for the "precious things under the earth," for "the things put forth by the moon," the "things put forth by the sun," and a great variety of similar representatives of natural wealth. Has it not occurred to some of those who are condemning all mining enterprises and those engaging in them, that when a temple is built the metals, ziff, copper, lead, zinc, brass, iron, steel, silver, gold, platinum, or other metallic substances entering into its stability or ornamentation, the fire-clay, terra-cotta, and fine clays out of which the vessels for the use of the building will be made, must be mined from the earth, "the treasures of the everlasting hills," or purchased from the Gentile communities with which Zion may be surrounded? In the one case, the Saints as a body, or enterprising men from among them, must essay the ventures, advance the capital (the labor agitator's red flag), and employ the forces who delve in the fastnesses of the mountains, search its canyons, pry into its fissures and its leads, and bring all these "necessary" things from their hidden sources, giving employment and food to the thousands of willing workers, or the supplies of the mined and smelted products must be purchased with the modicum of the garnered stores of the poor of the Lord's people. Which is the wiser, the more sensible course? Those who rashly assail all mining projects as being illegitimate ought to withhold their too harsh denunciations, for the reason that God has placed these treasures in the hills of this favored land to be used in righteousness by his people; and his people are entitled to the privilege of "going after them" in honest and legitimate ways.

To throw discredit upon honest endeavors to develop industrial, mercantile, mining, and other trades and business ventures, is to stifle the energies of the men of business spirit, and cripple the resources whence the speedy realization of the "good time coming" might receive inception and impetus and be carried to completion. Is it wise to do this? Honest men engaged in lawful callings, and doing business in legitimate ways by proper methods and for righteous purposes, grow sensitive and discouraged when implications of dishonesty and deceitfulness are cast upon them by those who might be benefited by the efforts which they denounce.

It is vain for us to decry the apparent dilatoriness of public servants of whom much enterprise is expected, when by our suspicions and innuendoes of wrong-doing, or the influences of speculation, we cast reflections of dishonesty and evil motive upon those who seek earnestly to be of service to their fellow men, as well as themselves.

In what we have written we have in no sense intended to defend improper kinds of business, nor evil and fraudulent business methods; but have intended to suggest a halt in the indiscriminate denunciation of legitimate business enterprises, because forsooth there have been and may be again evil-minded men who counterfeit business enterprises, by evil practices, for the purpose of robbing their fellow men. It is just as sensible to denounce the use of meat, because men become gluttons.

JOSEPH SMITH.

AN APOLOGY.

In the HERALD for December 17, 1902, there was an editorial published under the caption of, "As to space in the HERALD."

In the statement and argument of that editorial, a stricture was passed upon a writer, a member of the Denver, Colorado, Branch, who wrote in reference to a communication sent to the HERALD, which did not find place in the paper. To this stricture the brother at Denver took exception, being offended thereby. He has sought to have the Board of Publication adjust the matter; but as the Editor was the writer of the editorial which gave offense, the board has declined to take any further steps than to call the attention of the Editor to the article which gave offense, at the suggestion of the offended brother, and ask him for an action.

The correspondence upon the affair, so far as we are informed, was lost in the burning of the HERALD Office, except a letter or two passing since the fire; thus preventing a review of anything except the editorial itself. From this, however, we are quite willing to make all the reparation which a just demand would require. There is nothing in the editorial which would require a retraction, as the Editor understands the letter and the spirit of it; but, as the matter therein contained gave offense to the brother at Denver, and possibly to others there interested with him, we hereby apologize to him, and them, trusting that the spirit of good will apparently broken by the offense given may secure the pardon offenses need when acknowledged.

MELCHISEDEC PRIESTHOOD - ORDINATION.

One of the articles of the Epitome of Faith published by us, reads thus: "We believe that a man must be called of God, and ordained by the laying on of hands of those who have authority from God to entitle him to preach the gospel and administer in the ordinances thereof."

This has been a cardinal belief of the church from its inception; and has been accepted by the Reorganized Church as a matter of fact, and of vital necessity as a part of the practice of the church, in the calling and ordaining of those authorized to represent the organization known as the church of the divine Master upon the earth, and to administer among men officially for the redemption of the race.

We have never known a refutation of this rule in the practice of the church, since our acquaintance with it. It is the rule of the church that all those called to office in the church must be called by revelation; in some way the equivalent of the calling of Aaron by the prophet Moses; and we are not aware that the rule has been ignored. It may be that there has been an instance or so in which the rule apparently may have been carelessly overlooked; but inquiry would have shown that it had been ascertained that the person ordained had been called, and the fact recognized by the church through its officers at the time the ordination took place. Especially is this true in regard to the Melchisedec order of the priesthood.

Priesthood is delegated authority to act in the name of Jesus Christ through the ministration of the Spirit, calling and qualifying men to act in the ordinances of the gospel, through the administration of which men through obedience may be saved. The laying on of hands is the outward and visible token by which the church, the body of Christ, gives evidence of the recognition of the call of the man to Christ's ministry through the choice of the people and the setting apart by ordination performed by the officers, in which they confer upon the one so ordained the right to act in the office named on behalf of the church, according to the gifts and callings of God unto him, by virtue of the Holy Ghost in those who ordain.

We are asked, "Can a man be ordained to the Melchisedec priesthood without a revelation from God?"

We answer, that it would be possible for a man to receive the outward form of an ordination; but, unless the church in assembly where the ordination should take place, whether branch, district, or conference, had some assurance that the man was called of God to represent the divine authority, when they vote to lay the official hands of the church upon him, the ordination would prove to be unavailing, and no benefit would come to the church or the man. No such ordination should be made. Whom God calls the church should not hesitate to accept, choose, and ordain to the office to which they are called. "Many are called, but few are chosen"; for what reason we do not know, or affirm. It is possible for humanity to err in either direction, be too slow to acknowledge by choice those whom God has called, or too swift to accept those whom human wisdom seems to find of apparent value to the work.

Apostles have been chosen apparently under the ministration of the Spirit of "wisdom and revelation." Witness the choosing of Matthias, upon whom "the lot fell." (Acts 1:26.) Again, the Spirit said, "Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them."—Acts 13:2.

The choosing of the first apostles in the church in these last days is on this wise, as we understand. The Lord by revelation stated that there were others besides Oliver Cowdery and David Whitmer, who were called to preach the gospel, and these others were to be chosen and called apostles, "even twelve."

These were to be chosen from those who had "a desire to take upon them" the name of Christ, "with full purpose of heart"; and for this reason they were "called to go into all the world to preach" the "gospel to every creature." Oliver Cowdery and David Whitmer were appointed to "search these men" out from among the disciples; and when they had so sought them out by "the Spirit of wisdom and revelation" they were chosen and ordained; and the Lord went with them confirming their ministry by signs following, and the conferring of the Holy Spirit on those who were baptized by them.

A similar method was employed in an exigency occurring in the Reorganized Church. All these examples but prove that the principle adopted by the church that men are to be called by revelation to the offices in the priesthood, and be ordained by the laying on of hands, is sound, in accord with the Lord's will, and should be followed in our practice.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Does the New Testament teach that no one is qualified to become an apostle, unless he shall have seen Jesus Christ in person?

We know of no such teaching. We are aware that it is contended that because those disciples whom Jesus chose as his apostles during his ministry were apparently chosen from those who had personally seen, heard, and believed on his teaching, none others could be qualified, or chosen to represent him as his apostles. But this seems to be taken from inferential evidence only, and not from any specific teaching to that effect.

It is very clear, from the teaching found in the gospel according to St. John, that Jesus sought to impress upon his followers that if they fully believed on him to the keeping of his words they should be qualified to do the work he had called men to, though they had not seen, nor known him personally in the flesh; and that the works which he did they should do also, because he should go to his Father. In that chapter he made the promise which has not yet been abrogated nor disqualified. "He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me: and he that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him."—John 14:21.

Any one to whom Jesus has been manifested as the Son of God, is qualified to be called as an apostle to testify of him and his gospel, though he has never seen Jesus personally in the flesh; he has seen him, by the manifestation of the Father, through the Spirit, by which he knows Jesus Christ to be the Son of God just as certainly, and as obviously, as Peter did when he gave utterance to that impassioned affirmation: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." The answer of Jesus to this reply of Peter's fixes, for ever, the fact that the man of any nation, of any land, who through obedience to the gospel receives the testimony that Jesus is the Christ, is qualified to testify of him, and may be called as "one sent," an apostle of the Lamb. That answer was and yet is, "Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona; for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven."—Matthew 16: 16, 17.

"Jesus answered and said unto him, If a man love me, he will keep my words; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him."—John 14: 23.

Those who make the argument that a man to be qualified to be an apostle must see, or have seen, Jesus Christ in the flesh personally, forget to give Jesus credit for honesty in the keeping of his promises to the race. To this class of men the words of Jesus, "And, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world, Amen," mean nothing. Such men deny the august import of the last testimony of the Son of God found in the last chapters of both Matthew and Mark.

Is a priest, or any higher officer, properly qualified to bless the bread and wine at a sacrament-meeting, when he thinks he is himself unworthy to partake of the emblems, if administered by another officer?

Decidedly not. If an officer authorized by his office to administer the sacrament, for any cause feels that he is disqualified from partaking of the elements, the bread and the wine used in the rite, he is disqualified from administering the rite to others, and ought not to officiate. If presiding, he should ask another officer to take charge and administer, for the sake of consistency, and to honor the Master who said, Except ye eat and drink worthily, ye eat and drink condemnation to yourselves.

Will children dying before attaining to the years of accountability, be subjected to trial, through being tempted by the Devil?

It would appear very strange that the class of children of whom the Lord said, "Their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven"; and, "Except ye become as a little child, ye can in no case inherit the kingdom of God," should be subjected to the temptations to which a life in the flesh must, or may, pass through. But, as we are not aware of any specific statement of scripture which fixes the condition of children of the class referred to, as being liable to be tempted by the Devil in the world to come, we content ourselves by the saying, that we do not so believe, and will not until it be shown.

Is it the duty of a teacher to travel fifteen to twenty miles to preach? or is it his duty to make official visits? Which of the two does his office require: preaching on such subjects as the condition of children after death, and other like subjects? or to make official visits?

It is the duty of the teacher to preach, as he may have opportunity, or as the Spirit may lead; but he is not required to travel, only as he may find time and opportunity, and willingness. He is to be a standing minister to the church; a visiting and comforting officer to those who are striving to become faithful and perfect in their callings; but a monitor and an accuser against the evil-doer and disturber of the peace. So that we may answer the questions, Yes, in both instances; he is both a preacher and a visiting officer, as opportunity and inclination may offer or necessity demand.

Will all people that are saved be saved by obedience?

Yes; that is, all who are sufficiently intelligent to hear, believe, and obey. "As by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous."—Romans 5: 19.

It is fair to presume that those of defective intellect, deprived of the proper use of their better judgment by injury, normal or abnormal, will be saved, so far as earth life is concerned, and be permitted to develop under the good conditions to prevail in the other world. Children who die before the age of accountability are of this class, and hence we believe that they will be progressive in the millennial reign. A good many do not so believe; and we do not know what the consensus of the opinion among the eldership may be; and so do not answer for the church, which has not spoken on the topic that we are aware of.

THOSE PHOTOGRAPHS.

The HERALD Editors still desire photographs of the elders. One brother, "down in Arkansas," sends in his photo and writes,

"It may be none of my biz,
What you want with my phiz; but here it is."

This may not be the offspring of the true spirit of poesy, but it expresses humility and an accommodating spirit that may well be emulated by others.

GENERAL CHURCH ITEMS.

The Book of Doctrine and Covenants sells for a nominal price, yet some of its teachings are worth something on a cash basis when written out and signed by a physician. We quote from the Ohio State Journal, June 14: "A Chicago physician charged a rich man $6,000 for a prescription, and it was the shortest prescription on record. It was as follows: "Stop smoking," and the rich man paid the bill and followed the directions and fully recovered from a condition of ill-health that would have soon landed him in the grave. There it is, price $6,000—worth that to any man who has surrendered himself to the slavery of tobacco. This man was dying. This prescription saved his life. He had enough self-respect left to make himself feel that his life was worth $6,000, especially as he had a great deal of money."

Work on the new HERALD Office building is progressing satisfactorily. By the time this issue appears the walls of the first story will have been completed and work will have been commenced on the second story. The foundation of the powerhouse, which is separate from the main building, is completed. The new office will be one of which the church may well be proud.

The recent tour of the Canadian Saints to the Hill Cumorah was an interesting event and is well written up by one of the participants.

THE FATE OF PROPHETS.

The statements of scripture, and especially those of the Lord Jesus Christ, indicate that prophets are held in high esteem by the Lord; and special blessings are promised to those who recognize them and accept their message, while those who reject them are held under condemnation for their rejection. This is suggestive that special care and investigation should be used before one assumes to either receive or reject. If to receive the message of the true prophet sent of God is attendant with such consequences for good, corresponding consequences of evil are to be expected if one is imposed upon by a deceiver in the name of a prophet.

The declaration of the Master is:

He that receiveth you receiveth me, and he that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me. He that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet shall receive a prophet's reward; and he that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man shall receive a righteous man's reward.—Matthew 10: 40, 41.

Notwithstanding the great blessings offered to those who accept a prophet sent of the Lord, the Master states that it would be very common to reject them, especially in the country where they are best known. His language as found in Luke 4: 24 is as follows:

"Verily I say unto you, no prophet is accepted in his own country."

It follows, therefore, that if a man claiming to be a prophet is rejected by his neighbors and those who are expected to know most about him, it is not conclusive evidence that he is wrong.

It is further indicated by the words of the Lord Jesus Christ, that it would be quite common for prophets to be persecuted and put to death. He says:

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! because ye build the tombs of the prophets, and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous, and say, If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets.

Wherefore ye be witnesses unto yourselves, that ye are the children of them which killed the prophets. Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers. Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell? Wherefore, behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes: and some of them ye shall kill and crucify; and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues, and persecute them from city to city: That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar. Verily I say unto you, All these things shall come upon this generation. O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!—Matthew 23: 29-37.

This language conveys the idea that it had been the disposition of the people prior to the coming of Christ to persecute even unto death the prophets of the Lord. It also indicates that it would be the disposition of the people to conclude that if they had had the opportunity they would have done better than their fathers in this regard. In this they would deceive themselves; for the disposition of the people in all generations according to the language of the Master would be to shed the blood of the prophets. Two instances are given in the above quotation, that of the shedding of the blood of Abel and the prophet Zacharias, and the inference is clear that there were many others whose blood would be required at their hands.

Turning back to the history of the Israelites as contained in the Scriptures we find confirmation of this statement. In 2 Chronicles 24: 20, 21, we find a statement in regard to the killing of Zachariah as referred to in the above quotation from the Lord Jesus. The language is as follows:

And the Spirit of God came upon Zechariah the son of Jehoiada the priest, which stood above the people, and said unto them, Thus saith God, Why transgress ye the commandments of the Lord, that ye can not prosper? because ye have forsaken the Lord, he hath also forsaken you. And they conspired against him, and stoned him with stones at the commandment of the king in the court of the house of the Lord.

In Nehemiah 9: 26, speaking of the people of Israel, we find the following language, indicating that it was quite a common thing for the people at that time to slay those who came in the name of the Lord:

Nevertheless they were disobedient, and rebelled against thee, and cast thy law behind their backs, and slew thy prophets which testified against them to turn them to thee; and they wrought great provocations.

In Jeremiah we find the following language purporting to be the language of the Lord: "In vain have I smitten your children; they receive no correction; your own sword hath devoured your prophets, like a destroying lion."

Further evidence is not necessary to show that prophets were not popular in any age of the world among the people. In connection with this take the case of John the Baptist, of whom the Lord said a greater prophet had not been born of woman. His life paid the penalty for rebuking a ruler for his iniquity.

Take also the case of all the apostles chosen by the Lord Jesus Christ as his special ambassadors. We are informed that each of them met death by violence except John, and it is said by some historians that his life was attempted by his being boiled in a vat of oil; but his life was preserved.

Stephen, improperly called the first martyr, was stoned to death. This evil work was not always at the hands of willfully wicked men; but the Lord himself said that the time would come when they that kill you will think they are doing God's service.

In the case of the apostle Paul, before his conversion he was delivering men up to death; he afterwards tells us that he lived with a clear conscience toward God in his persecution of the saints. It is not a question of honesty or sincerity upon the part of the persecutors. They may be and in many instances are honest, devoted, pious people. To establish the character of the persecutor for strict religious scruples is not enough to condemn the persecuted. The fact of their being persecuted and put to death is not enough to establish their guilt. And even the Lord Jesus Christ was not only put to death by his enemies, but it had the form of a legal execution, being condemned by the authorities of the law and his execution ordered.

The fact, then, that Joseph Smith, who came in this generation, was rejected by his neighbors, spoken evil of, and his life placed in peril from time to time, and his blood finally shed at Carthage, Illinois, is not sufficient to establish the contention that he was a bad man. It does not necessarily follow from this that he was what he professed to be; but wise men will investigate and determine according to the test given in the word of God whether he was true or false. That test is, "By their fruits ye shall know them." The fruits of a prophet are not to be determined by the reputation he may have among his neighbors or friends. His reputation is the creature of others; it is the opinion of others expressed; and to judge a prophet or any one else by his reputation is not to judge him by his own works, but by the works of another. To judge him properly his inner life, known best to those most intimate with him, must be considered. In fact this is the only safe test. Even if we undertake to judge him by that we must take into consideration our own fallibility of judgment, and our liability to misunderstand the words and acts of another. A prophet nor any one else can be finally judged until he appears before one of infallible judgment. Any conclusion that we may come to may be erroneous. Then we should be careful with all inquiry and humility and love for all concerned.

We can safely accept whatever is good and noble, and tends to the elevation of mankind; and if the mission of an individual claiming to be a prophet from God has that tendency upon those who receive it, then his mission is a success. His judgment at the hands of his fellow creatures, even though that judgment may be rendered in sincerity, and lead to a punishment executed according to his supposed deserts, bringing him to an untimely death, the procedure may be wrong, the conclusion erroneous, and the consequence a mistake to be visited upon the heads of the judges and executors.

The general fate of prophets has been to be misunderstood, maltreated, and in many instances slain for their testimony. All should, therefore, be slow to decide, and slow to act, do nothing in the heat of anger or in prejudice, but let all their actions be in love toward those affected by the action. This is the only safe course to pursue. Any other, though it may be supposed to reflect upon some one else, will reflect upon the actor.

JOSEPH SMITH COMPARED WITH THE REFORMERS.

ELDER CHARLES FRY.

The reformed institutions of the learned reformers have since been reformed, and new reforms are being urged. The church restored through the instrumentality of Joseph Smith, the unlearned boy, has no need of reform, nor is any contemplated.

Comparisons are made by showing differences and similarities. Of the latter there are very, very few (if any) with Joseph Smith and the Reformers, hence we shall be under the necessity of showing the differences.

Let us note some points pertaining to the Reformers:

1. They all were men of learning.
2. They all were men of experience.
3. They all were ordained ministers in the churches they tried to reform, with the possible exception of Henry VIII of England, (if he may be called a reformer).
4. They all commenced their work because of being dissatisfied or disaffected with the church to which they belonged.
5. Nearly all succeeded in bringing into existence a new church distinct from the one to which they formerly belonged.
6. They did not receive their authority for establishing the new churches from the old one.
7. None of them claimed to have received direction or authority from God for the establishment of new churches.

Let us quote also some of the features pertaining to Joseph Smith and his work.

1. He was unlearned.
2. He was young and without experience.
3. He was not a minister of any church nor even a member.
4. He did not begin his work because of being disaffected with any other church, but by command of God.

5. He brought into existence a new church—distinct from any other in the world.

6. He received no authority from the world neither did he assume it, but received it from heaven by the ministration of angels.

Since it is claimed that Joseph Smith restored the church of Christ, and that the Reformers reformed the church of Christ, it might appear that the difference was merely between a restoration and a reformation, but is it so?

Did the one really restore, and did the other really reform the church?

If the church of Christ existed in the time of the Reformers it did not need reforming. If the church that did exist needed reforming it was not the church of Christ. If the church of Christ did not exist it could not be reformed, only restored. The very name reformer is inconsistent with the work of Christ and his church and no man has ever been authorized of God to change or reform in the least that which he has established. The scriptures condemn any effort along that line. The great preacher said, "Whatsoever God doeth, it shall be for ever; nothing can be put to it, nor anything taken from it, and God doeth it, that men should fear before him."—Ecclesiastes 3:14. God's work is perfect and any attempt at reformation by man will make it imperfect. If the church that existed in the time of the Reformers needed reforming it was because men had tampered with it previously and changed it, in which case it ceased to be the church of Christ, and no amount of reforming by men could ever bring a corrupted church back to perfection. God would have to restore it.

A restoration is not only consistent, but the scriptures actually tell us that after a time of apostasy, in which the church established by Christ would be corrupted and rejected of him, there would come a restoration of the gospel and kingdom. Any effort tending to a restoration must originate with God and not with man.

Joseph Smith was a restorer in the true sense of the word. His movement did not originate with him, but with God. The Lord appeared to him and gave him directions and authorized him to proceed, and the Lord gave him power to do what he nor any other man could have done of himself. Under the light and power which continued to come, the gospel in its ancient purity and power was restored, the church and kingdom of God was established again after the ancient pattern, and men were authorized through the ordinances and power of God to preach the gospel, administer in its ordinances, and build up the kingdom.

Joseph Smith's work was not of this world, he did not receive his inspiration from men, nor was he prompted to do his work because of being disaffected with what already existed. The reformed institutions of the learned reformers have since been reformed, and new reforms are still being urged. The church restored through the instrumentality of Joseph Smith—the unlearned boy—has had no need of reformation, nor is any contemplated.

Reformation is of man and can not endure.

Restoration is of God and will endure for ever.

CANADA SAINTS VISIT PALMYRA.

It is not often that physical, intellectual, and spiritual enjoyment are associated and combined to the degree that obtained during the recent pilgrimage of the Canadian Saints to that spot whose memories enshrine it in our heart of hearts, viz.; "Cumorah's lonely hill."

The inception of the idea, it is almost needless to relate, originated in the active brain and fertile resources of President R. C. Evans. But the suggestion once evolved and announced was taken up with the characteristic zeal and energy and enthusiasm of the Canadian Saints and friends to an extent which made its complete success a foregone conclusion.

Arrangements were promptly entered into with the Richlieu & Ontario Steam Navigation Company, by which the journey across Lake Ontario, and the railway fare from Charlotte to Palmyra, via the Lakeshore Railroad, was agreed to for the very reasonable sum of three dollars and thirty-eight cents each "for the round trip," as they say in this country.

Promptly at half past three on Saturday, June 1, the steamer Kingston left Yonge Street wharf, with about one hundred and thirty Saints and friends on board, amidst warm and brotherly greeting with Saints hailing from London, Hamilton, and other localities; although the major portion of the passengers were certainly from Toronto. The six hours' journey across Lake Ontario was pleasantly beguiled by the singing of hymns, under the leadership of Elder George Henley, and some admirable recitations by Elder John Shields, Sr. Eva Milligan, Sr. Marjorie Swainson, of Toronto, and others diversified the proceedings; also two nice solos by President R. C. Evans.

The saloon piano, upon which our young Bro. and Sr. Buschlen gave us some excellent selections, was a very useful assistant and adjunct to the lively and spiritual hymns sung during the voyage over.

At about half past nine in the evening, the lights of Coney Island, on the American shore of the lake, came into view, and a very pretty sight indeed was witnessed in the blending of the many and parti-colored lights of the islands. In perhaps a quarter of an hour we landed at Charlotte, New York. (This word, though familiar enough to my many English readers, is not pronounced as they are accustomed to hear it, but with the accent on the penultimate syllable, like the French Chalotte.)

Here we at once embarked per special train to Palmyra, New York, which station was reached somewhere in the neighborhood of midnight. Here, in spite of the prompt exertions of President Evans, and a committee, it was practicably impossible to procure hotel or other sleeping accommodations for all, so an adjournment was made to the railway car, kindly placed at our disposal by the railway authorities; and, as the majority certainly had come prepared to "make the best of things," this little contretemps did not trouble us much.

Sunday morning the sun dawned upon the quaint, pretty, and old-world-looking town of Palmyra, the very name of which inscribed upon the little railway station awoke in our breasts pleasing anticipations of scenes and associations which we were all happily destined to realize ere that same sun should sink below the horizon to the west.

After an enjoyable breakfast we commenced our four-mile journey to Cumorah in conveyances hired at a price per head, which was certainly, to say the very least of it, extremely moderate and reasonable.

After a most enjoyable ride through some beautiful country scenery, we arrived at the destination of our pilgrimage, Cumorah Hill. Here a moderately stiff climb awaited us; but the scene from the hilltop amply repaid exertions of that nature. Here,—like the disciples of old,—we "sat down upon the grass," and presently when the services commenced by the singing of that memorable hymn,

"Book of Mormon hid for ages,
On Cumorah's lonely hill,"

(which had to our mind seemed never so sweet before), the entire audience felt the presence of the Spirit of the Lord in "great power, and in much assurance." In many cases our emotion was too deep for words, and the unaccustomed tear gave mute evidence of depths of feeling.

After an earnest intercessory prayer by Elder Archie McLean, the president of the Toronto Branch, another hymn was sung, when our respected President R. C. Evans entered upon a masterly and eloquent disquisition of the chain of events which had culminated in the present enjoyable and profitable gathering upon the sacred hill of the angelic message to our beloved prophet Joseph Smith. As the speaker took up, in earnest and feeling tones, the sad, yet stirring vicissitudes of that mountain's history, in the dim ages of the distant past, he was followed by that large audience with close and absorbing attention; undoubtedly deepened and emphasized by the fact that we were all of us (and the large majority for the first time in our lives) eye-witnesses of the scenes hallowed and made sacred by such accessories and such world-renowned history. Here, also, kneeling upon the very spot rendered doubly sacred as the exact place where were discovered the original plates deposited by Moroni, Elder George Buschlen was ordained, under the hands of President R. C. Evans and Elder A. E. Mortimer, to the sacred office of a high priest.

The sacrament of the Lord's supper was then administered under the hands of Elders R. C. Russell and Frederick Gregory, during which, at the president's invitation and suggestion, the Saints entered upon a most spiritual and solemn prayer-meeting.

After the adjournment for lunch, many there present dispersed into the adjacent woods to collect flowers and ferns, or other little mementoes of Cumorah, not knowing whether in the varied vicissitudes of this life our feet would ever again tread that hallowed ground. After perhaps an hour or an hour and a half's rest the return journey was commenced, when, after a half hour's ride, at the gate of a large and old-fashioned, but substantial residence, we were bidden to alight, and at the invitation of its gentlemanly proprietor and his fair partner, we were permitted the great pleasure of gathering under the very tree made sacred by the angel's first appearance to the latter-day prophet, of beholding the very rooms where the second and third angelic visits were made, also the lower room, in which was contained the brick fireplace behind which the golden plates were concealed to hide them from the cupidity or curiosity of those who would in any event have either stolen or destroyed them.

The proprietor of the residence, an elderly but remarkably active gentleman, kindly gave us, as each party in turn visited the clean and nicely-furnished apartments, the assurance that, with the exception of the new paintwork, everything is precisely as it was in the time of the former proprietors of the house and farm, viz., the family of Joseph Smith, Sr., and his excellent lady.

The Saints on departing gave this gentleman (whose name I omitted to mention is Mr. W. A. Chapman), and his respected partner and family, three hearty cheers for their kindly hospitality toward us during our visit.

Prior to our departure Elder R. C. Evans pointed out several interesting landmarks here, redolent of the history of the "early thirties," such as the spring which was once open to the sky, but which now is roofed in and forms part of a stable, in which we found several fine horses, and the beautiful, clear waters of whose well we were kindly permitted to sample for ourselves. President R. C. Evans also showed us the stream in which, early in 1830, the baptisms were performed, with other small but interesting landmarks, which we were extremely happy to know that the present proprietor is determined shall not be disarranged or disturbed.

It was well on toward six o'clock, and the people felt that to reach our distant destination it was necessary to embark in the conveyances without delay further than was involved in the collection of our fares (only fifty cents each for the entire journey there and back to Palmyra).

Arriving once more at the latter place, one more halt was made, viz., at the First National Bank of Palmyra, whose president, the Honorable Pliny T. Sexton, exhibited to us the first proof-sheets of the Book of Mormon, accompanied by some well-chosen words of introduction and explanation. Here we were much gratified by the kind and friendly bearing and demeanor of many of Palmyra's prominent citizens, who flocked in also to view the book, and seemed interested and impressed.

When at length we reached Charlotte Station, tired but gratified, we were somewhat taken aback on learning that a telegram from the owners of the steamship Kingston to our respected president, conveyed the unwelcome intelligence that that vessel having met with an accident would not arrive to embark our party till at least six o'clock the next morning.

A futile attempt was then made by our president to secure beds for all, but the hotel accommodations being extremely limited (as Charlotte is only a small and thinly populated village), the president announced that perhaps it would be best for each to endeavor to procure accommodations for himself, which was done, though many of our men folks perambulated the wharf and landing-stages all night so that the ladies and the more elderly people of our number might obtain their much-needed rest and sleep at the hotels.

At half past twelve in the afternoon, instead of six in the morning the deep siren or horn of a large steamer saluted our ears, and needless to say the satisfaction was general when we beheld, as she came nearer, the name "Kingston" in large letters upon the steamer's paddle-boxes.

The journey home, which was commenced at three o'clock, was enlivened by some excellent recitations contributed by Elder Shields and several of the young ladies of our party. Speeches were made by President R. C. Evans, Elder A. E. Mortimer, James Pycok, Frederick Gregory, and Clark Russell, who made a most able and efficient director of the concert, and chairman. I ought to add that a young man belonging to the ship's staff kindly rendered us an admirable selection upon the piano.

Arriving at Yonge Street wharf, Toronto, at about a quarter after eight, we closed a journey which will long live in our remembrance, for its pleasing memories, its hallowed associations, and its spiritual recollections.

Perhaps I can not more fittingly or more appropriately conclude this dispatch than by quoting the concluding paragraph of a most able and interesting article in the Wayne County Journal, published at Palmyra, New York, and dated June 6, 1907. Alluding to our visit there, the editor concludes with these words:

Certainly, the bearing of the entire congregation in the face of all the troubles that they met with upon their tour was such as will make a favorable impression upon all who came in contact with them; and these same troubles can not fail to make their pilgrimage a most memorable one in their respective experiences.

The Rochester, New York, Herald, of June 3, also contained a well-written and picturesque description of our journey and its varied experiences.

CRITICISM OF THE REVEREND MR. HAUPT VERSUS "JOSEPH SMITH DEFENDED."—NO. 6.

"The Bible contains all that God ever intended to give for man's instruction."

To this objection I made answer as follows:

"Those who urge this objection are not of that class who are best acquainted with what is in the book itself, for in the twenty-ninth chapter of Isaiah is mention of a book that was to come out of the ground in the last days. In the thirty-seventh chapter of Ezekiel is mention of the stick of Ephraim as well as the stick of Judah (the Bible). In the last of Daniel is mention of a book that was to be revealed at the time of the end. Besides these references to what was to be, there are twenty-four or more books mentioned in the Bible which are not in it now." I then gave many references to these books and ended by saying: "There are in the Bible the names of many prophets and prophetesses, yet not one of their prophecies."

Mr. Haupt stated the following as a partial reply:

"Before taking up Mr. Peterson's answer let us note the following truths: The Bible is only the text-book given by inspiration to the church. Not one book is written to a heathen nation, city, or man, but as we see in Luke 1:1-4, to persons having previous instruction and been made members of the body of Christ which is his church."

If that be true, then the Bible should have been kept as a text-book in the church and not carried to the heathen nor yet to those out of Christ in our own country. Very few I think will accept Mr. Haupt's statement as being orthodox. How does he know to whom many of the books of the Bible were written? For instance: Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Songs of Solomon, Daniel, Obadiah, Jonah, Nahum, Matthew, Mark, John, and the last of the Revelation. In many of these books is a positive denial of Mr. Haupt's statement and the very reference he gives furnishes no proof at all that Theopholis was a member of the church. On the contrary if he had been it is hardly probable that he had not heard repeatedly of the things that Luke wrote and been "assured" of them. Luke's address, "Most excellent Theopholis," and "O Theopholis," indicate that he was not addressing one of the brethren, but one of the rulers of the land. Hunt where you will in any of Luke's writings and you will not find that or a similar expression used when addressing or speaking of any of the brethren in the church, even including the apostles. The expression, "That thou might know the certainty of those things wherein thou hast been instructed," doubtless had reference to the writings of others.

The Lord evidently intended the Bible not only as a text-book to the church, but the "sword of the Spirit" in all the world and to every creature.

"Neither is any prophecy of the scripture of any private interpretation," says Mr. Haupt, with which we agree. But who shall interpret it? Mr. Haupt and his class I believe say, "The church." We say with the poet:

"God is his own interpreter
And he will make it plain."

A multiplicity of private opinions can never be anything else but private.

A multiplicity of human opinions can never be anything else but human.

A multiplicity of fallible opinions can never be anything else but fallible.

Only God or Christ or the Holy Spirit can be infallible.

St. James has said: "If any of you lack wisdom let him ask of God, [not the church] . . . and it shall be given him." Jesus said: "When he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth." See also Ephesians 1:17, 18, and such texts as, "Then opened he their understanding that they might understand the scriptures"; and, "No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost." This being the work of the Trinity, will a church try to usurp their rights and prerogatives? Again we plead for the rights of the Master, and are not willing that any church should rob him of his rights, or come between God and the people.

Continuing his assertion Mr. Haupt says: "Therefore Christ (for three years) instructed, and ordained his apostles, who in turn taught their followers 'to do all things' which Christ 'had commanded them,' (Matthew 28:20), and ordained their successors in the various offices, and in this way are even still fulfilling the commission 'to every creature' and 'nation' by the inspiration of truth who abides with the church which is his body the fullness of him that filleth all in all."

The apostles may have ordained their successors but they did not call them nor bestow upon them priesthood. Had the church continued to teach and obey all things that Jesus had said unto the eleven she might yet have been in such favor with God that he would yet favor her with divinely-appointed officers instead of leaving them to "heap to themselves teachers" to turn them "unto fables."

That the Spirit abides with the Episcopal Church as Mr. Haupt intimates is in the opinion of the writer a matter that can be settled by asking a few questions. Do they obtain knowledge and wisdom direct as a result of the operation of the Holy Ghost? Is their faith an inspiration or a result of tradition and human instruction? Are their sick healed by the Spirit of God and the laying on of hands according to the promise of the Lord and the teaching of Paul? Do they work miracles as a gift of that "one spirit"? Do they prophesy as did prophets of old as a result of inspiration? Do they discern the nature and character of the various spirits operating among the children of men, and can they detect the bad, all as a result of the gift of the Holy Ghost? Do they speak in languages which they have never known, while under the power of the Holy Ghost, as on Pentecost? And when thus spoken do they interpret it into their own language as a result of the operation of the Spirit of God? "The proof of the pudding is in the eating of it."

Miraculous manifestations are not the only sign of the presence and baptism of the Holy Spirit, but if not received now as then there has been a change in a changeless being. All the manifestations of the Spirit must be in their proper place and used for the proper purpose or there will be a hole in the doctrine of Christ. We do not intimate that all miraculous power is of God. Far from it. The Devil is very profuse in distributing his miracles. They must be associated with the truth and used to "confirm" members in that truth and not going before to make believers.

"The head continues with his body, the church unto the end of the world," says Mr. Haupt. If that be a fact the head would govern the body and not the body the head. He would interpret the scripture, call their ministry and infuse the life necessary to bear the fruits above mentioned. Let us see the results and not mere passages of scripture.

Mr. Haupt says: "So that the word we preach is his." But is it? Is sprinkling a little water on converts and calling it baptism, his word? Is baptism of unbelievers (infants) his, and more especially when they are only sprinkled? Is it his word to preach that the canon of scripture is now full?

Further he says: "Who has given unto us the ministry of reconciliation." But where is the proof of it, or is only an assertion insisted on. Surely, the baptism of the Spirit does not follow them as in Bible times.

Mr. Haupt seems little inclined to notice my answer to this objection, number four. He seems little inclined to offer proofs to show that God desired to close the canon of scripture fifteen hundred years ago. After a long preamble, he concludes to notice three texts of scripture I quoted to prove that the Bible did not contain a full record of all of God's word. Those texts were Isaiah 29:1-24, Ezekiel 37:16-20, and Daniel 12:44. I did not quote the last as applying to the Book of Mormon in any way, so when he says, "But there is no mention of such a book as the Book of Mormon to be revealed at the time of the end," he is only beating the air. I used it to show that at the time of the end some words of Daniel would be revealed, hence the Bible did not contain all that had been written for man's instruction. But as to both the other references we believe they have direct reference to the Book of Mormon.

CLAIMS OF THE BOOK OF MORMON.

Before noticing these scriptural references it will be necessary to notice what the Book of Mormon is and what it is not, so that we will be able to see whether or not the texts apply.

The Book of Mormon is not a new Bible. It does not contradict the Bible. It teaches complete obedience to Christ and his gospel. Its doctrines are faultless. It is not the writing of Solomon Spalding. It is not the writings of Joseph Smith. It is not a modern production. It was written many hundreds of years ago on the American continent by the ancestors of the American Indians, and others, who came from Jerusalem and crossed the Pacific Ocean six hundred years before Christ. A part of it was written by a colony who came from the Tower of Babel and became extinct before the second colony of which we have spoken came from Jerusalem. The book gives an account of their religion (which agrees with the Bible), their wars, governments, etc. It gives an account of Christ's visit to the ancient Americans when he had ended his work in Palestine, thus fulfilling the promise of Jesus to the Jews: "And other sheep I have [present tense] which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd."—St. John 10: 16.

That a great and once enlightened people have occupied this continent in ages past no one will deny. That they lived and perished without a knowledge of God no Bible-believer can admit, for he has made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, . . . that they should seek the Lord. (See Acts 17: 26, 27.) That they wrote their history is quite probable. That the Book of Mormon is that history is a demonstrated fact, proved by archæology and the Bible. Let us notice some of these Bible texts, Isaiah 29: Space will hardly admit of reprinting three pages of Mr. Haupt's deductions from this chapter; but I think we can extract all the points and get them in smaller compass and not do violence to his arguments. They are:

1. Ariel, the city where David dwelt, Jerusalem, and Zion are the same place, and that out of that city, and not a hill in New York, Ariel should speak out of the ground.

2. The ninth to thirteenth verses are another paragraph, and therefore the book mentioned therein has no connection with the speech and voice out of the ground spoken of in the previous paragraph.

Summing up his deductions he puts them under the heading: "But Note," and numbers them 1, 2, 3, and 4, but which we will number 3, 4, 5, and 6, as we have noticed two points and already marked them for reference.

3. "No book is said to come out of the ground."

4. "The book is said to be delivered to both the learned and unlearned man," and,

5. "Neither one of them began to do anything but to excuse himself for reading it."

6. "The teaching of the eleventh verse can only apply to America in the broad sense in which truth is truth the world over and that truth is, that to a careless and indifferent people, the Scriptures become a sealed book, and such are ever ready to excuse themselves from its study, so that a learned man says it is sealed and the unlearned says I do not read well enough to understand it."

Mr. Haupt is therefore committed to the belief that the book here mentioned is the "Scriptures," while Latter Day Saints are committed to the belief that it refers to the Book of Mormon.

Reply:

1. The word as in the latter part of the second verse introduces a comparison. Ariel is spoken of and something compared "as Ariel." "It shall be unto me as Ariel." We can not agree with Mr. Haupt therefore that all these terms refer to the same place. They do not refer to the same thing either. The thing that was to be unto the Lord as Ariel was the special thing under discussion or prophesied of. Ariel means "The lion of God" (see margin), and the work that was to be as the lion of the Lord "of the" city where David dwelt (see margin again) was to be camped against with a "mount" and besieged until they would be brought down and should "speak out of the ground" and "whisper out of the dust." The word mount here is prophetic, and as in other places in the prophets means nation. This will appear further along when we come to consider Isaiah 2: 2 and Daniel 2: 35. How nicely the above prophecy fits the account in the Book of Mormon of the colony of Jews of the city where David dwelt who came to America and were afterward divided, the wicked against the righteous, for a thousand years until the righteous were destroyed and their words have whispered unto us out of the dust and spoken out of the ground in the Book of Mormon, as one that has a "familiar" spirit, or in other words, of similar spirit and import as the work of God on the eastern continent.

2. I need not remind Mr. Haupt that paragraphing was not necessarily the work of inspiration; and even if it was, a new paragraph need not entirely dismiss the old. Entire new matter may be introduced by a paragraph, but it is not always so. Sometimes a new paragraph may explain something in a number of paragraphs preceding as this chapter will show further along. A book is mentioned in the third paragraph (verse 11), and referred to again in the fifth paragraph (verse 18). It does not therefore follow that because a new paragraph is introduced at verse 9 the book of verse 11 is not the speech out of the ground, for "the vision" of it all is "a book."

3. Certainly the chief matter in this chapter from first to last is a book and is the speech out of the ground.

4. Mr. Haupt is wrong when he says the book is delivered to both the learned and the unlearned man. Only the words of the book are delivered to the learned, but the book itself to the unlearned man. (See verses 11 and 12.) That is not true of the Bible; for the unlearned are no more in possession of it than he learned. How will Mr. Haupt make this to apply using the term man as he does in the generic sense and not specific? We will notice further along that this language is in the singular number, "learned man" and "unlearned man," which would make it specific and not generic.

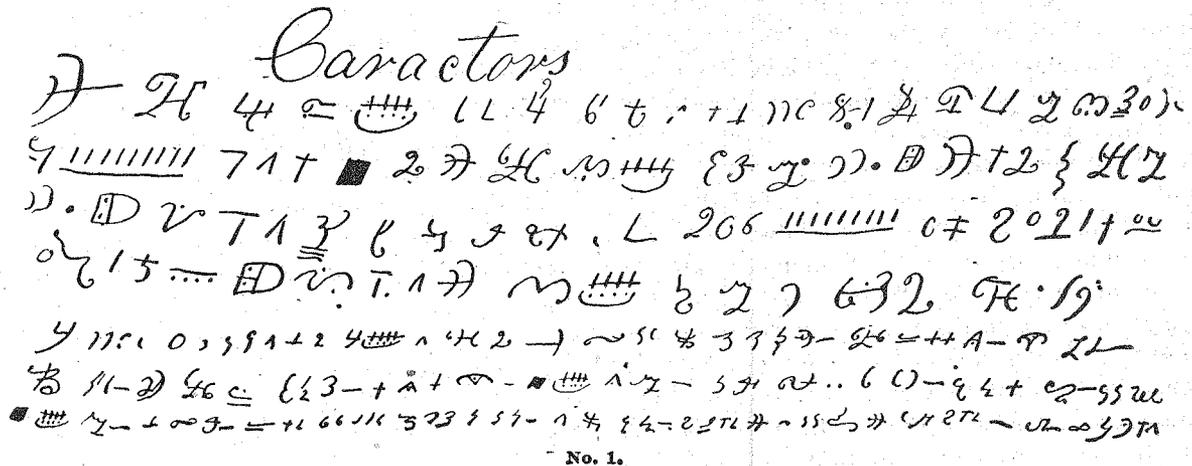

When Joseph Smith received the ancient records, obtaining them in the very dust of the ground, he transcribes some of the hieroglyphics and by the use of the Urim and Thummim found with them, translated the words into English and sent both, by Mr. Martin Harris to the city of New York where he called on Professor Charles Anthon, a linguist of that city. Following is a photograph copy of that paper:

those which were not yet translated, and he said that they were Egyptian, Chaldaic, Assyriac, and Arabic, and he said that they were the true characters. He gave me a certificate certifying to the people of Palmyra that they were true characters, and that the translation of such of them as had been translated was also correct. I took the certificate and put it in my pocket, and was just leaving the house, when Mr. Anthon called me back, and asked me how the young man found out that there were gold plates in the place where he found them. I answered that an angel of God had revealed it unto him.

"He then said to me, 'Let me see that certificate.' I accordingly took it out of my pocket and gave it to him, when he took it and tore it to pieces, saying that there was no such thing now as ministering of angels, and that if I would bring the plates to him, he would translate them. I informed him that part of the plates were sealed, and that I was forbidden to bring them. He replied, "I can not read a sealed book."— Church History, vol. 1, p. 19.

Mr. Harris afterward became estranged in a certain sense from the church, yet never wavered from his statement as given here.

Mr. Anthon also corroborates Mr. Harris' statement although his aim was to contradict it. How

These characters with others and their translation was sent to New York the account of which is as follows:

By this timely aid was I enabled to reach the place of my destination in Pennsylvania, and immediately after my arrival there I commenced copying the characters of the plates. I copied a considerable number of them, and by means of the Urim and Thummim I translated some of them, which I did between the time I arrived at the house of my wife's father in the month of December, and the February following (1828).

Sometime in this month of February the aforementioned Mr. Martin Harris came to our place, got the characters which I had drawn off the plates, and started with them to the city of New York. For what took place relative to him and the characters, I refer to his own account of the circumstances as he related them to me after his return, which was as follows: "I went to the city of New York and presented the characters which had been translated, with the translation thereof, to Professor Anthon, a gentleman celebrated for his literary attainments. Professor Anthon stated that the translation was correct, more so than any he had before seen translated from the Egyptian. I then showed him many times we have seen parties so anxious to testify for their friends that they overdo it and before they are through give away the case of their friends. Such were the facts in this case. In a letter of 1834 Mr. Anthon describes the paper presented to him by Mr. Harris as follows:

This paper, in question, was in fact a singular scroll. It consisted of all kinds of crooked characters, disposed in columns, and had evidently been prepared by some one who had before him at the time a book containing various alphabets, Greek and Hebrew letters, crosses, and flourishes. Roman letters inverted and placed sideways, were arranged and placed in perpendicular columns; and the whole ended in a rude delineation of a circle, divided into various compartments, decked with various strange marks and evidently copied after the Mexican Calendar, given by Humbolt, but copied in such a way as not to betray the source whence it was derived.

If the reader will take the characters (the unlearned man spelled them "Caractors") and hold the columns perpendicular with the word "Caractors" on the left, he will see that Mr. Anthon's description of it was not so bad, to be given several years after having seen it, and that, too, only once. But in 1841 in answer to a letter from an Episcopalian minister he published in the Church Record the following:

The characters were arranged in columns, like the Chinese mode of writing, and presented the most singular medley that I ever beheld. Greek, Hebrew, and all sorts of letters, more or less distorted, either through unskillfulness or from actual designs, were intermingled with sundry delineations of half moons, stars and other natural objects, and the whole ended in a rude representation of the Mexican zodiac.

A careful study of this paper and the statements of Mr. Anthon will reveal the fact that he had remembered it in general. We think, however, that Mr. Anthon or any one else will have hard work to find any Greek letters on that paper. Mr. Anthon, it will be seen, says nothing about his certificate which he gave to Mr. Harris. If he gave him none why did he not at this time deny it? It will be noticed that the two men do not agree as to the kind of writing that was on the paper, but it must be remembered that Mr. Anthon is writing several years after the event and with a view to refute what was said "by the Mormons," as he called them. On this point his testimony is shown to be faulty, as there does not appear any Greek letters on the paper. Latter Day Saints are not dependent on the memory of either men, however. Mr. Harris was unacquainted with ancient languages and may have failed to correctly note what Mr. Anthon said, thinking to reply on the certificate; but when that was torn up he may have failed to remember exactly what had been said and perhaps was nonplussed at the attitude of the Professor as well, but the point we want to make is that Mr. Anthon did say that he "could not read a sealed book." One paper is still in existence and will speak for itself as to the kind of characters on it.

Here we have a literal fulfillment of this text. Mr. Haupt's rendition will not do, for the book of this text is not delivered to the learned, the Bible is, and the unlearned are no more in possession of the Bible than the learned.

5. Mr. Haupt does not state the facts of verse 11 when he says, "The learned man said it is sealed." The facts are he will say "I can not" read it. Not that he was too "careless and indifferent" to try. He could not for it was "sealed." Neither is it true the unlearned will say, "I do not read well enough to understand it," for they understand it, quite as well as the learned. If it were otherwise the book would be a failure and dependent on man. Observation proves that the learned differ more widely in the interpretation of the Scripture than the unlearned.

6. Mr. Haupt says the ground from which the "speech" was to come was "Jerusalem." Isaiah does not say where it was. In verse four the word ground is used twice, and the word dust is also used the same number of times. In neither instance does it restrict it to Jerusalem. So Mr. Haupt should guess again.

We notice the following points in this chapter all in favor of the Book of Mormon.

1. The lion of God, i. e., the strength of God's work.

2. Of the city of David, i. e., from Jerusalem.

3. As Ariel; i. e., a companion.

4. That compared as Ariel to be camped against and besieged with a mount; i. e., a nation. (See Daniel 2: 35 and Isaiah 2, discussed further along.)

5. Ariel from Jerusalem thus brought low would speak out of the ground and whisper out of the dust. The Book of Mormon fits this description even though it does whisper out of American dust.

6. Though a multitude of "strangers" and "terrible ones" yet they should "pass away at an instant suddenly." The great ancient American civilization has passed away and archæology and the Book of Mormon says it was done suddenly.

7. All that "fight against" and that "distress her" shall pass away as a dream.

So shall the multitude of all the nations be that fight against Mount Zion—the mount or lion of God, from Jerusalem. The American Indians are only a dreamy remembrance of what they once were when about 420 A. D. they slew in a few weeks a whole civilized nation, as recorded in the Book of Mormon.

8. To be visited of the Lord with thunder, earthquake, great noise, storm, tempest, and fire!

In the old books of the Peruvians and Aztecs there was a very clear account of just such a catastrophe. The traditions of the inhabitants of Central and South America were also to the same effect, as given to the world in the writings of Humbolt, Catherwood, and Stephens, Short, Baldwin, Prescott, Charnay, Bancroft, and other writers on American archæology. So severe, runs the account, that part of the western continent was sunk in the depths of the sea. The Book of Mormon account of it at the time when "the Lord of hosts visited" his sheep on this continent, is as follows:

And it came to pass in the thirty and fourth year, in the first month, and the fourth day of the month there arose a great storm, such an one as never had been known in all the land; and here was also a great and terrible tempest; and there was terrible thunder, insomuch that it did shake the whole earth as if it was about to divide asunder; and there were exceeding sharp lightnings, such as never had been known in all the land. And the city of Zarahemla did take fire; and the city of Moroni did sink into the depths of the sea, and the inhabitants thereof were drowned; and the earth was carried up upon the city of Moroniha, that in the place of the city thereof, there became a great mountain; and there was a great and terrible destruction in the land southward. But behold, there was a more great and terrible destruction in the land northward: for behold, the whole face of the land was changed, because of the tempests, and the whirlwinds, and the thunderings, and the lightnings, and the exceeding great quaking of the whole earth; and the highways were broken up, and the level roads were spoiled, and many smooth places became rough, and many great and notable cities were sunk, and many were burned, and many were shook till the buildings thereof had fallen to the earth, and the inhabitants thereof were slain, and the places were left desolate; and there were some cities which remained; but the damage thereof was exceedingly great, and there were many in them who were saints; and there were some who were carried away in the whirlwind; and whither they went, no man knoweth, save they know that they were carried away; and thus the face of the whole earth became deformed, because of the tempests, and the thundering, and the lightning, and the quaking of the earth. And behold, the rocks were rent in twain; they were broken up upon the face of the whole earth, insomuch that they were found in broken fragments, and in seams, and in cracks, upon the face of the land.—Pages 437, 438.

Surely here is a literal fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy.

9. Their rulers, prophets, and seers covered. (See verse 10.) Until the Book of Mormon came forth, the rulers, prophets of the lion of God on the western continent, were unknown. A profound mystery covered ancient America.

10. The wisdom of it all is a book sealed to the learned. The language of the ancient Americans was and is yet sealed to the learned. Especially was this true of the learned man to whom the words of the Book of Mormon were delivered.

11. The words of a book and not the book itself is delivered to one (singular number) that is learned. This in no way fits the Bible, but is strictly true of the Book of Mormon as we have seen.

12. He saith, I can not read it; for it is sealed. Mr. Anthon said to Mr. Harris, "I can not read a sealed book." The Bible was never called a sealed book.

13. The book is delivered to him that is not learned. The original plates of the Book of Mormon were delivered to Joseph Smith; but he was not well enough read in ancient languages to read it. The man mentioned in this verse is singular and not plural as Mr. Haupt would have it read.

14. "Wherefore" and "forasmuch" as the fear of the people toward God was directed by the "precepts of men," the Lord proposed to do "a marvelous work and a wonder." Bringing to light the history of ancient America and Christ's visit to his "other sheep" on the western continent, is indeed a marvel and a wonder. The precepts of men doubtless refers to sprinkling for baptism, sprinkling infants, appointing god-fathers and god-mothers, etc., etc.

15. The marvelous work was to excel the wisdom of the wise and the understanding of the prudent. This the Book of Mormon does, over and above all the works on ancient America and American archæology. While their writings reveal many facts concerning that ancient people and their civilization, the Book of Mormon stated those and other facts before the spade of the archæologist revealed them. It excels all their works and gives the origin and ending of the people who overspread the Americas in ages past.

16. Verses 14 and 15 intimate that the marvelous work would be set against secret works of darkness. The Book of Mormon is especially opposed to that kind of work. They were on this continent frequently beset with a thieving band "who sallied forth at night to plunder and steal."

17. The Lord informs the world in verse 17 that this marvelous work and a wonder, the coming forth of the book and the speech out of the ground, the matters mentioned in this chapter, were to occur only a little while before the restoration of Palestine. Palestine has been restored since the middle of the nineteenth century. While the Book of Mormon spake out of the ground not half a generation before, the Bible was born many hundred years too soon. Guess again, Mr. Haupt.

18. A new paragraph and the book still the thing under discussion.

19. The deaf shall hear the words of the book. This is true of many in the Reorganization. The father of the writer, living in Independence, was unable to read when first he saw the Book of Mormon. He had recently come from Denmark when both his parents died leaving him an orphan in a strange land among those who spoke a strange language, a boy of twelve. The opportunities of an education were denied him by force of circumstances. But after hearing a few pages of the Book of Mormon read, he became so interested that he could scarcely wait for my mother to do her work and resume its reading, and picking up the book soon began to read it. That was, as near as I can remember, in 1878. Though he can read well to this day, especially church papers and the word of God, it is with extreme difficulty that he can spell more than the most common words. To his son, that was a strong testimony of the power of God in connection with the Book of Mormon.

20. The blind to see out of obscurity and out of darkness. Even the blind have been made to read the Book of Mormon, of which there are several instances in the church, and in that reading have been led out of darkness and into light.

21. The meek to increase their joy in the Lord. The Latter Day Saint faith and the Book of Mormon, do not destroy true religion, but help the honest truth-seekers to increase their joy in the Lord.

22. To rejoice in the Holy One of Israel. This the Book of Mormon does for its believers. It enlarges their idea of Christ when they behold his works on the western continent, and his love and care still for man.

23. Terrible ones and scorners and those that watch for iniquity to be cut off, as well as those who lay a snare for him that reproveth, and make him an offender for a word, and turn aside the just for a thing of naught. These things the Book of Mormon is especially plain on, and lays bare the deception of men in these matters. If space would permit we would like to quote here some of those passages, but we must forbear.

24. Jacob (Israel) not now to wax pale. Since the coming forth of the Book of Mormon, the Jews (a part of Israel) have been more highly favored than for nearly two thousand years before.

25. Shall fear the God of Israel. The coming forth of the book mentioned in this chapter was to be interwoven with the Jewish movement. The Bible came too soon. The prophecy that Israel shall fear the God of Israel, is in harmony with many other prophecies, both in the Book of Mormon and in the Bible.

26. Shall learn doctrine. The Book of Mormon is especially plain on doctrine. Hear what it says about baptism:

Again the Lord [Jesus] called others, and said unto them likewise, and he gave unto them to baptize. And he said unto them, On this wise shall ye baptize; and there shall be no disputations among you. Verily I say unto you, that whoso repenteth of his sins through your words, and desireth to be baptized in my name, on this wise shall ye baptize them. Behold, ye shall go down and stand in the water, and in my name shall ye baptize them. And now behold, these are the words which ye shall say, calling them by name, saying: Having authority given me of Jesus Christ I baptize you in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen. And then shall ye immerse them in the water, and come forth again out of the water.—Page 444.

Again page 540:

“Little children can not repent; wherefore it is awful wickedness to deny the pure mercies of God unto them, for they are all alive in him because of his mercy. And he that saith that little children need baptism, denieth the mercies of Christ, and setteth at naught the atonement of him and the power of his redemption . . . For the power of redemption cometh on all they that have no law; wherefore, he that is not condemned, or he that is under no condemnation, can not repent; and unto such baptism availeth nothing. But it is mockery before God, denying the mercies of Christ, and the power of his Holy Spirit, and putting trust in dead works.”

Accept the Book of Mormon and the doctrine is settled the world over.

27. They that murmur shall learn doctrine. One could justly murmur at the translators of “King James’” translation, who transferred a Greek word into our English and gave it an English terminus rather than translate it “immersion,” but “they that murmur shall learn doctrine.” We are confident, therefore, that the twenty-ninth chapter of Isaiah refers to the Book of Mormon and not to the Bible.

Ezekiel 37:16-22:

Moreover, thou son of man, take thee one stick, and write upon it, For Judah, and for the children of Israel his companions; then take another stick, and write upon it, For Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and for all the house of Israel his companions: and join them one to another into one stick; and they shall become one in thine hand. And when the children of thy people shall speak unto thee, saying, Wilt thou not show us what thou meanest by these? say unto them, thus saith the Lord God; Behold, I will take the stick of Joseph, which is in the hand of Ephraim, and the tribes of Israel his fellows, and will put them with him, even with the stick of Judah, and make them one stick, and they shall be one in mine hand. And the sticks whereon thou writest shall be in thine hand before their eyes. And say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land and I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all: and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all.”

Mr. Haupt does not say much about this text, only it “foretells the reunion of Judah and Ephraim, representing the two kingdoms of Israel.” Mr. Haupt will have hard work to locate the children of Ephraim according to his theory as they became mixed among the nations. Latter Day Saints believe that all Israel will be gathered, including Ephraim, who must first be gathered out by the gospel. Like Mr. Haupt, we also believe this text foretells the return of Israel, and in connection therewith the union of two writings. Will Mr. Haupt tell us what these writings are? Will he locate the stick of Joseph? This language was of course prophetic and represents much in a little. The writers of the New Testament were with one or two exceptions of Judah. The writers of the Book of Mormon were of the descent of Joseph. According to the Book of Mormon and many latter-day prophecies and revelations a great many of the Latter Day Saints are of Ephraim. In this we have the New Testament as the stick of Judah and the Book of Mormon as the stick of Joseph in the hand of Ephraim, brought together at the time when the Lord commenced his preparation to “take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone,” and “gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land." The joining of those two sticks was the token of that work. The return has now begun and is well under way. It is too late now to look for the fulfillment of that prophecy. Mr. Haupt did not think it best to give any very extended explanation of this text, so we will now leave it till he does.

So much, then, for the Book of Mormon. There are other Bible texts referring to it, but at present we only discuss these two referred to by myself, and objected to by Mr. Haupt. We would be glad to discuss the others, but space forbids.

FROM THE REALMS OF EVIL SPIRITS.

DES MOINES, Iowa, June 17.—Mrs. Scott M. Ladd, wife of Justice Ladd of the Iowa Supreme Court, was arrested here to-night for disturbing the peace at the peculiar religious services over which she presides.

At the religious services which Mrs. Ladd has been conducting the devotees writhe on the floor like epileptics, leap into the air, chatter, scream, gnash their teeth, or beat themselves over the head.

Staid religious circles of Des Moines have been profoundly shocked by the revelations concerning this peculiar religion.

Aroused to the necessity for action by rumors of neglect of children and inhuman practices, Probation Officers Lillian Mathews, Doctor W. A. Guild, and the Reverend Boynton Gage of the Highland Park Presbyterian church attended a meeting at Mrs. Ladd's mission at Fifth and Monroe Streets yesterday.

Two hundred persons were packed in the low-ceilinged mission room. The heat was intolerable. Shouts and cries deafened the religionists. Five persons lay at full length on the floor and beat themselves and uttered gibberish.

Smiling serenely, the wife of Justice Ladd sat back and watched the proceedings. At her feet was stretched out ten-year-old Earl Miller. He was livid. His hands twitched and he seemed as one stricken in epilepsy.

The sounds of chattering and gnashing of teeth came from the floor where Miss Ethel Wallace lay at full length. The women around her fell back as she sprang to her feet. With her hair disheveled and her face contorted as if in pain, she rushed straight at the "skeptics," where Doctor Guild sat. She seemed about to scratch his face. She began vertical jumps that increased in speed and height. With her muscles tense, she sprang higher and higher, all the time uttering strange, unintelligible gibberish with a volubility that defied the listeners. This lasted for three or four minutes. She seemed in terrible anger and evidently was rebuking the doctor for his temerity.

"Judgment, judgment on him!" cried some one, and the crowd seemed about to make things warm for the doctor. Then the girl weakened and sank back on the ground. Water was poured into her mouth, she was fanned, and the "power" left her limp and helpless and breathing fast. When she awoke she admitted, "I am a physical wreck."—The Chicago Daily Tribune, June 18, 1907.

With Mrs. Ladd and her lieutenant the meetings opened with what they called a song-service. This consists of weird chanting of songs, which soon have a peculiar effect upon the converts, and their nervous system is placed at such a high tension that they begin to twitch and throw themselves to the floor, wallow there for a time and then seem to drop in a semiconscious condition, and when awake are claimed to be endowed with the "power of the tongue," and give out strange and uninterpretable mutterings, said to be heard and repeated from the mouth of God.

In explaining the condition in which the victims appear to be Doctor Guild said: "It is what we would call a religious mania. It is a sort of hypnotism, self-induced. This is contagious and can be easily acquired. This is what happens at the mission. I saw two young ladies there who were quiet and in perfect physical and mental condition, kneel before Mrs. Ladd and as that woman placed her hands upon their heads she began her tremblings from head to foot. This was soon inducted into the system of the girls and before long they were in a pitiable condition.

"Of course the poor children imitate their elders. They are excited and worked up into a state of hysteria that threatens their reason. Then in this deplorable state no one is allowed to comfort them for they claim it to be 'the power of God.' All this is dangerous to the nervous system and should be brought to an immediate end," he said.

Thursday morning the Ministerial Association will meet in special session at the Y. M. C. A. to consider the matter. Doctor Guild will be present and place before the organization the entire condition of affairs. It is probable that a special committee will be appointed to pass upon the authenticity of the alleged miracles and perhaps to issue an ecclesiastical statement in regard to this new religion.

It is said that Mrs. Ladd when cleared of her own case will immediately file counter charges against Gage.—The Des Moines Register and Leader, June 18, 1907.

Mothers' Home Column

Notice.

The Readings for the Daughters of Zion locals are printed each month in leaflet form and can be procured, at the following rates, from Mrs. B. C. Smith, 214 South Spring Street, Independence, Missouri. Ten copies each month for one year, fifty cents; Twenty-five copies each month for one year, one dollar and twenty cents. Fifty copies each month for one year, one dollar and eighty cents.

Dear Sisters: Ever since the close of the General Conference I have been wanting to write to you something of the work that is before us for the present year; but things that I need not mention here have kept me from doing so until now. Perhaps some of you have wondered at my long silence, considering the efforts that have been made by the society in the past, and the success that has thus far attended them, and have been looking to learn what is expected of us for the future.

We are all gratified to know that there is now enough money raised to begin the children's home, and that arrangements have been made so that as soon as the Bishopric is satisfied that conditions are all favorable, the work can be begun; and that time does not seem to be far in the future.

But since so much has been accomplished, we must not think that our work is ended. When the Advisory Board first presented this work to the Daughters of Zion, as a work for them to assume, they had in mind, not only the building of a home but of helping to provide a continuous fund for its support; so, sisters and friends everywhere, having secured the approval of the Bishop, in behalf of our purpose, the Advisory Board now asks you to go to work to gather up the fragments for this fund. And as the work progresses, we hope to be able to suggest to you from time to time different ways in which you can help in this noble work.

There will be a constantly increasing demand, after the home is opened, for supplies of all kinds, and no doubt many opportunities to show our gratitude to our heavenly Father for the blessings of home and home comforts that we enjoy, will be afforded us, in helping the homeless little ones. Do not put off this work, but begin right now to save a nickle here, and a dime there, and so on, and lay them away to be sent in to our treasurer by and by; that at the close of this conference year we may have a good sum to turn over to the Bishop for this purpose, that would not otherwise have come into his hands.

Mrs. B. C. SMITH, President of Advisory Board.

EXAMPLE IN CONVERSATION.

It is no new thing to observe that we have not a member that needs to be more carefully guarded than the tongue. There is no way in our every-day life, perhaps, in which we impress ourselves upon those around us more than by our remarks, our talk. It has been said that you can not tell what a man is until he opens his mouth. People may, on occasions, say what they do not mean, but it is pretty hard for any one to keep up a continual deception. As a rule the conversation is a pretty sure index of the mind and heart. "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," the wise One said. Persons often try to excuse themselves by telling us that they do not mean what they say. I know one individual who frequently resorts to this plea to defend himself. Being so well acquainted with him, however, I know that he deceives himself to a great extent. He voices himself more than he realizes, although he has other faculties that make him ashamed of himself after he has spoken. He has been advised that if he does mean better than he expresses himself, the more reason why he should consider before he opens his mouth, and learn to govern his tongue, so as to do justice to himself.

We are judged by what we say. We impress or influence our associates by that which they hear fall from our lips. It is our duty to ourselves and to others to let our conversation be the expression of the best sentiments we have. A boy will form his ideas largely from hearing his father talk. "Look for the almighty dollar: remember that when you have money you have friends," was a motto that was preached by one father. Is it strange that that man's son to-day makes everything else subordinate to money-getting; that he counts money the chief thing in life? His father is reaping of the harvest he has sown, too, for the son now criticises his father severely for the attention he gives to his church, and the father laments his son's perversity when that young man tells his parent, "You would be better off if you let religion alone." President Roosevelt has called attention to some things along the line of our topic. "It is common honesty that a man shall not take a bribe," he observes, "but how lightly bribe-taking is talked about by fathers who do not apply the ethics of the home to the processes of political life."

To get down to a homely consideration of the question, what sort of a husband would the boy be expected to make who is used to hearing his father speak disrespectfully to his mother and vent his ill humor in mean, cutting sayings to her; who scolds and growls at her when anything does not just suit him? What effect is it likely to have on the mind and character of the daughter who seldom hears her mother talk about anything but cooking, scrubbing, gossip, or fashion?

Imagine a condition in which there were no language, no conversation. If children were born and grew up never hearing a word spoken, what would the result be? We may not be able to say, fully, but reasoning from comparisons, we conclude that they would be mental dwarfs, or worse, having no thoughts, no emotions beyond those which their physical necessities forced upon them. We see at once that speech is the most important instrument human creatures possess. It is the means by which we develop from mental babes to reasoning, understanding men and women. The mind of the child grows. His soul feeds upon what he hears. Character is shaped, principles are instilled by the conversation a child listens to in his home. Habits are formed there that no books or schools can change. It has been often observed that children coming from illiterate homes do not acquire the practice of grammatical expression by going to school. I know a girl who was a bright student, and was graduated from high school and advanced normal with fine grades, yet to meet her and converse with her, you would never guess it. Another example comes to mind—a girl who greatly surprised me, at the beginning of our acquaintance, by telling me how little schooling she had ever had. "But you use such good language," I said, "and your literary information—how is it?"

"Oh, that is because father and mother speak properly, and I suppose we were led to like books from hearing them discussed so much in our home," she answered.

The home is a school, one way or the other, and it may be made the greatest of schools, according to the conversation that is heard there. A quick-witted girl in the first year of high school came in one day with an animated account of a discussion that had come up in her class. Surprise was expressed at the material she introduced in her argument. "Where did you get it—you have not read it?" she was asked. "Hearing you and papa talk," was the cool, matter of fact answer. Nothing has more to do with influencing the mental attitude of the child than the everyday talk he hears at home. Conversation, more than anything else, goes to make the atmosphere of the home. In the atmosphere of the home taste is cultivated, interests are born, and the mind receives bent and scope. Intelligent children who are accustomed to hearing ennobling subjects discussed as they grow up are not likely to contribute to the ranks of those men and women who are satisfied with commonplaces and never look above or beyond their own half-acre. I met one of these poor, barren-minded persons recently. She could not entertain herself for half an hour. She was quite a chatterer, but she wearied you with the narrowness of her range. She was not a brainless young person by any means. Hers was a mind with a band around it, figuratively speaking. She had never been led out in the broad, free avenues of thought and imagination. She had been directed to the groveling and given no uplift of soul or outlook of view. Such young men and women come from homes where they never hear of anything but hogs, cattle, or crops, if the father is a farmer, or theaters, fashion, and pink teas, if the mother is a society woman.

If you took every other privilege away from a child but that of listening to what he heard in his home, that would be enough to determine the child's breeding. The child who hears comments passed upon everybody and everything, and belittling, uncharitable remarks made about personal peculiarities or little mistakes, who hears his parents speak of people as Tom, Dick, and Harry—such a child will be unfitted for easy companionship with men and women of cultivation.

If I were asked to name the most influential factor in home life in its effect upon the whole make-up of the child, mental, moral, and spiritual, as well as upon the disposition and manner, I think I should say the conversation. Watch that. Make it what it should be in purity, kindness, and moral rectitude, and as uplifting and outreaching, intellectually and spiritually, as the ability lies with you to do.

LOUISE PALFREY.

Questions on July Reading.

Why should the tongue be carefully guarded? Is it true that one is ever misrepresented by his own words? As a rule, of what are our words an index? Is it noble to make a practice of saying "I didn't mean what I said?" What may be the effect of such a habit upon an individual and upon his friends? What should be done to correct it? Can we estimate the extent to which we impress or influence others by our words? What then is our duty in regard to our conversation? If the father makes the dollar prominent in his conversation, what will be the effect upon his son? Are children apt to imitate the tones of their parents whether disrespectful or considerate, harsh or tender? Are we necessarily made grovelling by giving attention to the needs of our bodies, the sewing, the cooking, and the cleaning? Should these things absorb our whole thought? May we not express an interest in our neighbors without allowing our conversation to degenerate into gossip? What should be the standard of a mother's conversation? How does language assist in our development? Do children profit by an example of correct speaking in the home? What should be the attitude in the home in regard to slang? How is it possible to broaden the interest of children by the conversation in the home? Is undue familiarity sometimes shown in addressing older people by their given names? Does this have a tendency to foster irreverence? What should be the home example in regard to this? Should it be difficult to make the home conversation pure and kind? With proper care, can it not also be made intellectually and spiritually uplifting?

Program for July Meetings.

A Request for Prayers.

Dear Saints: I desire your prayers for my hearing, and the healing of the drum of my ear. The drum of my ear is slightly torn, and I have been troubled with risings on the drum for nearly two years. I have been benefited by administrations, and my hearing is better at times. I have been treated by an ear specialist, and he tells me there is no cure for my ear.

I would like those who can, to fast and pray the afternoon of the first Sunday in July, which is the 7th of July, that my hearing might be restored, and for the healing of the inner part of my ear.

I will also be administered to on that date.

Your sister in the one faith,

2130 J Street, SACRAMENTO, Cal., PAULINE NAPIER.

Bogard-Case Debate.

All arrangements for debate were agreed upon between F. A. Smith and Ben M. Bogard of Little Rock, Arkansas.

F. A. Smith appointed Hubert Case to represent the Saints, and Bogard represented the Missionary Baptists. The usual church propositions were discussed, with the Saints in the lead. We had as much prejudice to meet as I ever met in my life. Here is where Bro. H. E. Moler met Hicks a year ago. Hicks was a vile, abusive, and unfair debater, and said so many mean things about our people that the other people were bitter.

Our debate began March 5 in the Methodist church at Avery, Texas, with Reverend Goode (Methodist) as chairman, and J. F. Grimes as my moderator, and one Mr. Hubbard as moderator for Bogard.

Taking the lead in the debate we outlined the church, in faith, doctrine, organization, and practice. Bogard tried to offset our arguments by repeated statements against the continuation of Bible ordinances, organization, practice, etc., and he proved to be an expert at story-telling, to make the people laugh. He tried to prove Joseph Smith to be a polygamist, but was fair enough to state that the Reorganization never did teach or practice polygamy. He was a Greek and Hebrew scholar; but when he tried to prove that Mark 16 was a fraud and ought not to be in the Bible, I saw an opportunity to show the people he was either no Greek scholar, or else he was trying to deceive them. Wilson's Greek Emphatic Diaglot came in good play, and I won a fine point on him.

He used the Utah Doctrine and Covenants and Book of Mormon; but I raised a point of order on him which the chairman sustained, and ruled the Utah Doctrine and Covenants out; and then he claimed that we had changed the Doctrine and Covenants, and the Saints' Doctrine and Covenants was not the same as the 1835 edition. He spent one whole half-hour speech on that point, and urged five points of difference; but when I spoke again and proved by reading the two that they were just the same, though chapters were differently arranged in the book, he was again put in a very embarrassing position before the people.

He offered me one thousand dollars for the 1835 edition of the Doctrine and Covenants; but when I took him up at his offer, he refused to stand by his word, and proved himself to be a bluffer. Once he offered me ten dollars to prove that his leaders ever taught and practiced polygamy, which I gladly accepted, reading from Baptist history to prove it. He also said he would quit the debate and let his brethren ride him out of town on a rail; and when I read it from their own records, one of his brethren offered to furnish the rail.

Bogard was more honorable than any of their men I had ever met before. He is a fluent speaker, and tries to keep the good will of his hearers. He tried to prove Baptist succession from the days of John the Baptist to the present time; but I showed the people that even his own history was against his position, proving it fallacious.

Elder Bogard was a little shy about demanding a miracle until the debate was closing, while I was making the closing speech with only about two minutes remaining. He then arose and offered me one dollar to speak in tongues. I reminded him of his bluffs that had failed him every time, and that should I speak for him he would be a disbeliever still; but to prove my point I demanded the money put in the hands of the chairman, which he did, and as I spoke in an unknown tongue to all present, the crowd cheered, and I had proved my point.

He was then very anxious I should speak in Greek; but I reminded the gentleman that he had demanded an unknown tongue, and was again cheered. I then demanded the dollar; but he refused again, thus proving that his word was unreliable, and that signs were not to make believers; for he was still an unbeliever. My hearers understood that I was familiar with other than the English language which I made use of to prove my opponent's position an untenable one.

Bogard denied that they had any missionaries in India, when I read the minutes of the conference of missionaries there which indorsed polygamy; but I wrote to Dallas, Texas, and got the names of their missionaries there from their own publishing house, and several of their ministers.

Bro. Grimes did well as moderator. He also made one speech for me when my voice was bad on account of a cold. He did fine.

Mr. Goode proved himself to be a gentleman as chairman. We made many friends to our cause there, in fact made the name of Latter Day Saint honorable, and left the few Saints there feeling well in the good work of the Lord.

Hopefully in the conflict,

PIEDMONT, Oklahoma, June 13, 1907.

News From Branches

FORT MADISON, IOWA.

The work in Ft. Madison is moving along nicely at present. All are anxious to do their part. I say "all"—I mean all the workers. Ft. Madison, as other places, has a few members who seem to be in the background; however, we have a few who are not afraid to take hold of the burden.

During the winter we purchased a hall building (a building once erected for saloon purposes, but which we have used for four or five years to hold meetings in) and have converted it into a beautiful little church, the work on which is nearly complete. We have some little painting to do yet, then we are ready to invite our friends to our place of worship, and especially the brethren, "ye missionaries." But do not understand we could not receive visiting brethren and sisters at any time.

We have added considerable to our burden by way of church-building, and have made a debt of about two hundred and fifty dollars, which is great for us, being only a few to carry it. Our financial resources are limited to a very few, all of whom are poor in this world's goods and dependent upon the public for a livelihood, being wage-earners.

The work was begun here by Bro. F. M. Weid in February, 1897, and followed up by Brn. Snively, J. R. Evans, James McKiernan, and others. Since that time there have been many hindering causes to mar the peace of the Saints, but thanks be to Him who rules all things well, we have been enabled to surmount our difficulties inasmuch as we have walked uprightly before God.

The past two years there has been considerable work done here by Brn. Peterson, Siegfried, McKiernan, Willey, Anderson, and last, but not least, Bro. Rieste. Also Bro. Heman C. Smith was with us a few days about a year and a half ago.

Ft. Madison has many needs; but our greatest need is a standing minister (an elder), who could put his entire time to the work. The work is principally in charge of two brethren, a teacher and a deacon, who are doing all they can to promote the cause. We have no organized branch here, but are a part of the Montrose Branch, but being about twelve miles from Montrose we do not get much assistance from there. Bro. George P. Lambert comes once a month (the first Sunday) and preaches for us at eleven o'clock, and administers the sacrament at two o'clock. Our other regular services are, Sunday-school at a quarter after nine, and preaching at eight in the evening; and when the church is in shape, prayer-meeting Wednesday evening at eight o'clock.

DENVER, COLORADO.

The writer returned from the Arkansas valley two weeks ago to find Elder Columbus Scott in the city, and ready for business. We are glad to be associated with him this conference year.

While the writer has made a trip to Raton, New Mexico, and one to Loveland, Colorado, in the past two weeks, Bro. Scott has been busy in this city, doing house-to-house work, and preaching as opportunity has presented. There is a good feeling among the Saints, and they are anxious to have the gospel preached; so we have been trying to arrange for a more extended work. We first made application to the fire and police board for a permit to put up the gospel tent in different part of the city, but were refused, with the excuse that all tents in the fire limits were being ordered down. The next move was for a permit to preach on the streets, but we were informed that all religious representatives were to be excluded from holding services on the streets, except possibly the Salvation Army. The excuse for this procedure is that there are so many fakes asking for street favors that in order to keep them off the streets, they have to exclude religious bodies also. Pretty thin, we think. Bro. Scott and the writer, not willing to give up yet, called on the mayor to see if the order could not be countermanded, but received a refusal from him also. Now we have taken the matter up with one of the daily papers, and they have promised to do what they can for us. And all this in the Queen City of the Plains. We wonder if we are in the United States. Whether we are or not, we are in the fight to the finish, if it takes all summer.

There is good attendance at preaching-services, and the Sunday-school and Religio are forging to the front, and we propose to let the people of Denver know that we are here to stay.

Three were baptized lately. Elders J. D. White and E. B. Morgan are in the city for a few days, as they journey to their fields of labor.

At a special business-meeting called for the purpose, Brn. M. E. McConley and J. B. Barrett were ordained priests.

KANSAS CITY, MISSOURI.

Our preachers for the month have been Brn. D. F. Winn, H. Sandy, T. C. Kelley, and A. J. Koeler.

On last Sunday we had Religio rally day. Quite a good, instructive program was rendered. Our attendance was not as large as was looked for.

On next Sunday it is announced that the stake presidency will be with us all day; also hold meeting on Monday evening.

F. C. WARNKY.

TORONTO, ONTARIO.

The account of our recent visit to Palmyra and Cumorah's Hill will be found in another column; it therefore merely remains to add that the varied accessories in connection with Toronto Branch are in full order and activity, as usual, and that the services are well attended; particularly those of the Sunday evenings, when Elder A. E. Mortimer so ably and efficiently dispenses the "bread of life," as conveyed in the angelic gospel message.

There will be a picnic on Saturday afternoon the 15th inst., at High Park, arranged by the East End Mission, in connection with Toronto Branch; also an ice-cream social under the chairmanship of our esteemed President R. C. Evans, is announced for the evening of Thursday the 20th of June, at which songs and recitations will be rendered. The social will be held in the basement of the new church, and is under the patronage and management of the Toronto ladies' auxiliary society. Any American friends, or others of your numerous readers who may contemplate visiting Toronto and inspecting our new church, are hereby earnestly invited, and we believe that their trip to Toronto and its pleasant lake shore will be one to be generally appreciated.

F. R. TUBB.

LAMONI, IOWA.

Elbert A. Smith was the speaker at the chapel Sunday morning. Moroni Traxler occupying in the evening. C. I. Carpenter spoke at the Saints' Home, Fred Turnbull at Liberty Home. The following Sunday labor is reported from the adjacent branches and appointments: R. M. Maloney, of Oklahoma, at Andover, H. A. Stebbins at Pleasanton, A. S. Cochran at Jack Wood's and Greenville, J. E. Kelley at the Wion schoolhouse, W. H. Kephart and C. J. Peters at the Downey schoolhouse, J. F. Garver at the Thompson schoolhouse and Evergreen, J. S. Snively at Pawnee. Elders Kephart and Peters baptized one at the Downey schoolhouse, and Elder Snively five at Pawnee.

The Lamoni Stake conference was held at Centerville, Iowa, Saturday and Sunday. The business of the conference was in charge of the president of the stake and the missionary in charge. Upon the recommendation of the stake high council, the resignation of H. A. Stebbins from that council was accepted, and the appointment of Moroni Traxler to fill the vacancy was approved. The Evergreen Branch recommended the following ordinations, which had been favorably passed on by the high council: James Martin, Sr., priest, Roy Young and Willie Shakespeare, teachers, James Martin, Jr., Deacon. The Cleveland Branch likewise recommended J. N. Hooper for the office of elder. All these recommendations were approved. Bro. Hooper was ordained at the conference, the other ordinations being referred to the stake president.

The conference adjourned to convene at Lamoni in October, time being left to the stake president.

Corrections.

In J. W. Peterson's article, on page 571, by oversight the introductory sentence, "Objection No. 4," was omitted; on page 573, third line from bottom of first column, read from instead of for; on page 576, eighteenth line from top of first column, read slain instead of saints.

In the conference minutes of the Western Maine district of recent date, in the district treasurer's report, the amount on hand at last report should read $5.54, instead of $15.54. [It was correctly reported in the minutes; the error was made in printing.] W. A. Small, clerk.

Among the leading editorials by Mr. Flower are the following: "Some counts in the people's bill of grievances against the corporations," "The London municipal election," "The saturnalia of bribery and corrupt practices in San Francisco," "How the cost of living greatly exceeds the increase of wages," and "A further word on Christian Science." There are also three admirable departments in which Mr. Ralph Albertson, of the Board of Associate Editors of the Arena, presents a comprehensive digest of the news of the movements for Public-Ownership, for Direct-Legislation and for voluntary Coöperation. The Arena is more than ever a magazine that wide-awake and progressive people will find indispensable.

An Ideal All-around Newspaper.

Probably no other newspaper in the United States can show so brilliant an array of special features suited to the tastes and needs of every member of the family as the Chicago Record-Herald. Its regular daily and Sunday features include the letters of William E. Curtis and Walter Wellman, besides the special dispatches from the great centers. Next in importance comes the Record-Herald's unparalleled foreign news service, embracing its own special cables and those of the New York Herald, World, Journal of Commerce and Associated Press. Its pages devoted to commercial and financial news of all kinds are unsurpassed in scope and accuracy. Among other noteworthy features are its popular sporting page, its sound editorials, Kiser's humorous "Alternating currents," the lively "Stories of the street and town," the railroad and insurance columns, music and drama, society and clubs, daily reviews of the latest books, the continued story, the "Woman beautiful" department, the daily fashion article, "Meals for a day," news of the lakes, etc., besides a complete array of local and domestic news—all uniting to give the people of Chicago and the Northwest a complete and interesting all-around newspaper.

The Sunday Magazine of the Record-Herald is an artistic and literary triumph. Famous authors and illustrators, fine paper and presswork, combine to make it the rival of the great independent periodicals and a distinct departure in Sunday journalism.

AN INVITATION AND A PROMISE.

Come thou with us, and we will do thee good.—Numbers 10:29.

Since 1830 as a church we have been inviting people to come with us. Our motive in so doing has been impugned; but we can truly say that it has always been with the desire to do good to those who would accept the invitation.

The impression seemed to gain ground soon after the organization of the Latter Day Saint Church that it had come to destroy the Bible, Christianity, and everything good. Yet the aim of the restoration was the very reverse of that, as is shown by a revelation given to Joseph Smith as early as July, 1828, wherein God says of the restored gospel, "Behold, I do not bring it to destroy that which they have received, but to build it up."

No man can truly say that we have ever urged him to surrender one principle of truth in order to enter this church; but on the contrary individuals have been urged to accept additional truths that had not previously been a part of their creeds. Does one believe in faith and repentance? He is urged to go on and accept baptism of water and of the Spirit. Does one believe that God used to bless men wonderfully? He is asked to go on and believe that God still blesses men wonderfully. In no case is he urged to relinquish his faith in any fact, Biblical or otherwise.

We realize full well that only as we foster the good already in men and bestow other good upon them are we justified in issuing the invitation, "Come thou with us."

The text quoted above is an invitation and a promise. It was Moses who addressed these words to certain of his relatives while he was leading the children of Israel toward the promised land. His words have a general application because they voice the sentiment of the gospel in all ages—an invitation and a promise.

True, the gospel comes with commandments, yet God compels no one to accept it; the spirit of it is an invitation. Come! Come! Come! has been the gospel call since the world began.

Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.—Matthew 11:28.

"A man may say, 'I have delivered my message; my duty is done.' But his duty is not done, if it be true that by a great deal of careful thought he might have made the delivery of his message more convincing and soul-stirring."

If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink.—John 7: 37.

And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely.—Revelation 22: 17.

“Come thou with us.” Observe that this invitation must come from a people who are themselves prepared to go the road over which they invite others to walk. There are many who are ready to say, Go and do good; there are fewer who are prepared to say, Come with us and do good.

No man has a right to insist that another shall go over the road that he himself will not take. In fact it is useless to invite others to embark on any more or less arduous undertaking unless they see that we are actively engaged therein.

Every one who issues an invitation attempts to make it attractive, to give it a certain compelling force. This is recognized even by those engaged in a bad cause. Brewers and distillers put color, sparkle, zest into their liquors; and the saloon-keeper supplies music, mirrors, and pictures. Thus the invitation to come in and drink is many times multiplied in force and power.

Should not the people of God give equal thought to the problem of making their invitation attractive and compelling? True, the passerby may not ultimately be lost because we have in a half-hearted way given him the best invitation ever sent forth; but we may be lost because of that half-heartedness.

While God forces no man to come, he does persuade, and his Spirit appeals to the one invited. Christ said, “If I be lifted up, I will draw all men unto me.”

He is the one who Isaiah said should stand for an ensign to the people. (See Isaiah 11: 10.) The first man who ever tied a piece of cloth to a pole and erected it as an ensign did so that all who sympathized with him in his cause might rally around him. Just so Christ was lifted up as an ensign and all people who desire to engage in the work that he represents must rally around him. He is himself an invitation and a call.

All ye inhabitants of the world, and dwellers on the earth, see ye, when he lifteth up an ensign on the mountains; and when he bloweth a trumpet, hear ye.—Isaiah 18: 3.

The sound of the trumpet is another invitation to rally. So from Genesis to Revelation the idea is often repeated in many ways, but it is always the ever-recurring idea of assembling, of rallying, of gathering, of cohesion.

Not only does the gospel call go to people with a spiritual attraction or drawing that in the end shall condemn many who have resisted it; but it also goes with a definitely stated reason for its acceptance. Possibly the idea is expressed in our text, “Come thou with us, and we will do thee good.”

This appeal might be thought to be on a level with most earthly appeals which go direct to man's selfishness with the statement, “You will get something out of it.” To an extent it does; but the gospel goes far beyond that in that it invites the man to place himself where he can serve others. Good is promised him, but immediately upon his accepting the invitation he becomes one of those who are issuing the invitation and who are extending good to others.

You stand outside and hear the call, Come in, we will do you good; you enter, and immediately, if you have really understood the invitation, you become one of those who are calling others to enter. In a moment you have ceased to be exclusively a beneficiary and have become a benefactor.

Some may inquire, How will you do us good? We reply that we will do you good in the best possible way: by teaching you without deviation that gospel that will transform your character. Men fancy that when one leaves them money, houses, lands, or other donations he has done them good; but all these are transitory and as often as otherwise they bring a train of evil results. Christ gave no silver or gold, no houses or lands, he endowed no colleges, and builded no libraries, yet he was the greatest benefactor of all time. He gave the people that which the libraries and colleges could not give. It is that which we present to others, confident that it will do them good. Who shall deny it?

It is time that men paused in the work of building fine structures, breeding fine stock, painting fine pictures, and writing fine books, to realize that the human soul is the only eternal thing within their reach upon which to bestow labor with a view to beautifying it.

The work of the church is to urge men to aspire to the highest, to work for a transformed life and character. Individuals will not attain to such a condition in a moment, but will do so by obedience to a series of divine truths set forth in the gospel economy.

The churches have made themselves the interpreters of this series of truths; but as a church we have attempted as nearly as possible to present these truths as found in the word of God, believing them to be in great measure sufficiently plain to interpret themselves. For instance: “He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved,” is a plain statement of fact, and regarding it, we urge people to avoid any spirit or policy of evasion, confident that if they will not evade the issue the true interpretation will come home to them. They will not linger on the bank down which their Master stepped unhesitatingly to claim the right of baptism.

Whatever others may do, we feel determined to present without addition and without curtailing that series of truths outlined in the word of God that has to do especially with the regeneration of individuals; consequently we feel entirely free to say, "Come thou with us," and we have such confidence in the efficacy of those truths that we do not hesitate to add, "We will do thee good."

Moses prefaced his invitation with the statement, "We are journeying unto the place which the Lord said, I will give it you." We also can repeat that statement. Some hesitated then because they considered it humiliating to ally themselves with such a people; and some will hesitate now. Yet as surely as God lives we can say again the words with which Moses closed his invitation, "The Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel."

God has spoken to Israel in these last days and has said, "Fear not little flock, it is the Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Why? Because we cherish the laws by which Christ said men should enter his kingdom; and without obedience thereto he said that they could not even see the kingdom.

Come thou with us. ELBERT A. SMITH.

PLOW FACTORY AT INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.

Seventy-four years ago the membership of the church who had located at Independence, Missouri, were forced to move out of the city and the county, by lawlessness, of course; and five years afterwards the whole body of believers was "expelled from the State." Sixty-three years ago, June twenty-seventh, Joseph and Hyrum Smith were murdered in Carthage jail, Hancock County, Illinois. Sixty-three years thereafter, at Independence, the Danielson Plow Company, of Logan, Cache County, Utah, broke ground for the establishing of a plow and other farm implements manufacturing plant. The ceremony attending we give below from the Kansas City Times, thinking that we might in our version give it unnecessary coloring:

The occasion was the breaking of ground for the factory to be erected by the Danielson Plow company of Logan, Utah. A feature of the demonstration was that W. G. Danielson, a Utah Mormon, president of the company and inventor of the implements that are to be manufactured, held the handles of the plow with which the ground was to be broken and the implement was pulled several times across the factory site by about twenty-five of these residents of Independence with Mayor Prewitt in the lead. They pulled it by means of long ropes attached to the plow.

The ground at that particular place consists of stiff clay and the plow pulled heavily. "Driver" Danielson, however, did not lose patience and "cuss" and belabor the hind legs of his improvised team. On the contrary only an occasional cluck or "Git up, there!" was needed to keep them going at the desired speed; and if they wavered to the right or left a "gee" or "haw" brought them into line again.

This unique ceremony was preceded by speech-making. S. O. Bennion, president of the Central States Mission of the Utah Mormon church, in Independence, who is also vice-president of the plow company, was master of ceremonies. B. F. Cummings, editor of Liahona, a new Mormon magazine, led in prayer. Elder Bennion and Mr. Danielson told of the plans and purposes of the company to build a big industry in Independence. Brief addresses were then made by Mayor Prewitt, M. G. Wood, W. Z. Hickman, William Southern, Jr., A. M. Ott, Bernard Zick, and others.

In a buggy in the outskirts of the crowd of about one hundred persons were Joseph Smith, president of the Reorganized Latter Day Saints' Church, and R. B. Trowbridge, an official member of the same sect. Elder Bennion called on President Smith for a few remarks. The relations between the Latter Day Saints and the Utah Mormons are not as friendly as they might be. An international struggle for the ascendancy is going on between these rival sects. But President Smith responded that he was ready to welcome to Independence all persons who would obey the laws and make good citizens.—Times, June 28, 1907.

It was purely a business affair, participated in by business men for a business purpose, the planting a business enterprise in the midst of a thriving community of law-abiding citizens, to engage in the manufacture of articles of utility for use in all agricultural districts. The mayor, J. Allen Prewitt, and the other business men with him, gave the enterprise a hearty welcome, and a wish for its success. The only religious element entering into the exercises was an opening prayer by the editor of the Mormon paper published at Independence, the Liahona.

We were present with other citizens, and, being requested to make a few remarks, did so without prejudice; for what citizen of any city wishing it prosperous increase, would hesitate to approve a welcome to business men, made by the leading business citizens, in a business way? All that the public, all that citizens of any class can ask is that those carrying an enterprise of the kind forward, their agents and employees, shall be sober, industrious, and law-abiding, no matter what their profession of religious belief may be.

The fact that the ceremony of breaking ground for this plow factory at Independence, occurred on the anniversary of the death of the Martyrs Joseph and Hyrum Smith, may have been an accident, so far as intention was concerned. President Bennion, the chairman and leading spirit of the occasion, assured us, however, that so far as the business men of the company present were concerned, the idea of it being the anniversary had not occurred to them. It might have been in the mind of the editor of Liahona, but of that he could not say. He was of the opinion, however, that the fixing of the day of the ceremony for the date of the anniversary was not intentional.

There were members of the three branches, Utah Mormons, Reorganized Church, and the Church of Christ, present with the host of other citizens who came out to witness the ceremonies.

GENERAL CHURCH ITEMS.

Graceland College management are sending out a circular letter asking the receiver of it to send them the name of any young man or woman of his acquaintance, or within his knowledge, who may be intending to attend a college for the coming year, or who might be likely to attend if proper inducements in the way of opportunities should be offered to such scholar. It is a good idea, and we hope that the brethren, traveling and local, will interest themselves in making a personal canvass of their acquaintances and find out and report to the management at once, that circulars and the catalogue of the contemplated year's work may be sent without delay. It is desired that the attendance at Graceland may be largely increased this coming term. Every elder at home or abroad wants the college to be put on a paying footing. This can be done only by increasing the membership of its classes; and this can be aided greatly in the way the management has instituted.

We are requested to mention the fact that the time of the Northern California reunion is changed to August 30, to continue until September 8. The reunion will be held at Irvington, Alameda County.

CURRENT EVENTS, SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS.

By treaty agreement China was bound to pay the United States Government twenty-four million dollars as indemnity for losses incurred during the Boxer uprising. The United States Government now proposes to waive its claims for over thirteen million dollars of this amount. The relief thus afforded China is considerable, as the interest on this amount during the thirty-nine years of payment agreed upon would have been a large sum, in addition to the amount named.

The second international peace conference opened at the Hague June 22. Representatives from forty-seven countries were present. Some advancement toward peace is noted in the fact that the delegates dispensed with military uniforms and decorations.

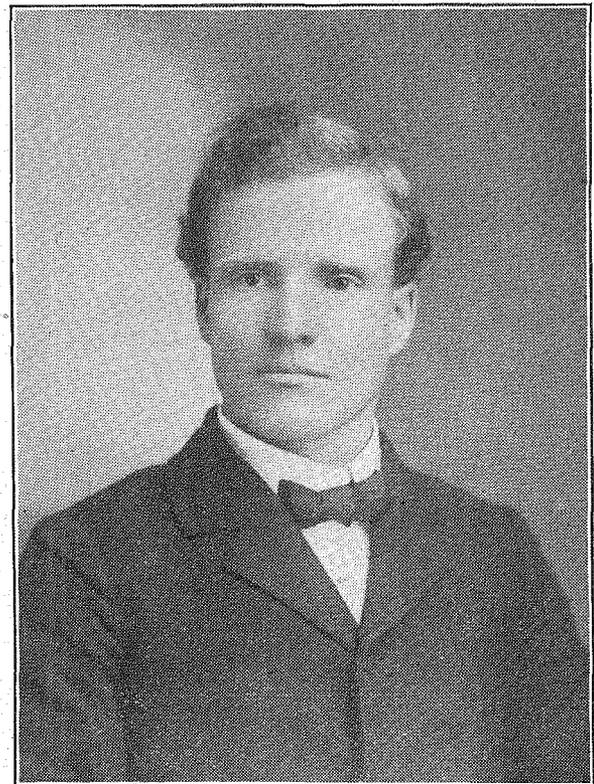

Doctor T. B. Hyslop, superintendent of the Royal Hospital, London, suggests the following cure for the wide-spread nervous disorders of the age: "As an alienist and one whose whole life has been concerned with the sufferings of the mind, I would state that of all hygienic measures to counteract disturbed sleep, depressed spirits, and all the miserable sequels of a distressed mind, I would undoubtedly give the first place to the simple habit of prayer. Let there be a habit of mighty communion, not as a mendicant or repeater of words adapted to the tongue of a sage, but as a humble individual who submerges or asserts his individuality as an integral part of a greater whole. Such a habit does more to clean the spirit and strengthen the soul to overcome mere incidental emotionalism than any other therapeutic agent known to me.

The fact that the French people have largely abandoned the custom of wine-drinking in favor of the more plebian beer-drinking, and the further fact that much of the wine used is simply a vile concoction labled wine, has worked such a hardship upon the grape-growers of that land that they have risen in revolt against the government, angry because it does nothing to afford them relief. Serious riots were suppressed by military force.

The Straight Road

ONE BAPTISM.

ELDER E. E. LONG.

One Lord, one faith, one baptism.—Ephesians 4: 5.

There has been much strife and contention among Christian people as to the meaning of the above text of scripture, or that portion of it relating to baptism.

Some claim that it has reference to water baptism alone; others contend the reference is only to the Holy Ghost. Both classes of contestants appeal to the sacred word for proof. It is evident one class must be wrong; both may be. The apostle Paul in enumerating the principles of the gospel of Christ uses the word baptisms.

Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection; not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God, of the doctrine of baptisms.—Hebrews 6: 1, 2.

This "doctrine of baptisms" was taught by Peter on the day of Pentecost when he told the people: "Be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost."—Acts 2: 38.

John the Baptist referred to this promise of the "gift of the Holy Ghost" as a "baptism" (see Luke 3: 16), and some have thought that it was to supersede the baptism in water; but, as noted, Paul speaks of the "doctrine of baptisms," evidently including both. This is in beautiful harmony with the instruction of Jesus to Nicodemus: "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he can not enter into the kingdom of God."—John 3: 5.

Are we not justified, then, in saying that it requires both water baptism and the baptism of the Holy Spirit to constitute the "doctrine of baptisms" spoken of by Paul?

Jesus said again, "But he that entereth in by the door is the shepherd of the sheep. To him the porter openeth."—John 10: 2, 3. Jesus is himself the "Shepherd." John the Baptist was the "porter" that opened the "door" when he baptized the Savior in the river Jordan. The Holy Spirit was given to Him, as promised to the people by Peter, after his immersion, as a "seal of adoption." (Romans 8: 15; Ephesians 1: 13, 14.)

When a building is erected, an aperture is made in the wall, and it is called a "door." Into the aperture is fitted a frame or barrier of boards by which the entrance into the building is closed. This frame or barrier is also called a "door." These two "doors" constitute the complete door.

So we have in water baptism the "aperture" or entrance into the kingdom of God and in the "baptism of the Holy Ghost" the "closure" or "seal of pardon." "Water baptism" alone will not save a soul; yet one can not obtain the baptism of the Spirit without it. So it takes the two to make the "one."

Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he can not enter into the kingdom of God.—John 3: 5.

Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost.—Acts 2:38.

Paul understood it as Peter did; and when he found certain disciples at Ephesus, after properly instructing them in the gospel, the record says:

When they heard this, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. And when Paul had laid his hands on them, the Holy Ghost came upon them; and they spake with tongues, and prophesied.—Acts 19: 5, 6.

Thus did Deity place his unmistakable seal upon the holy ordinance when properly honored and complied with.

Reader, if you want the approval of the Lord and the assurance that you are a child of God, "Go thou and do likewise."

Said Jesus: "If any man will do his [God's] will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself."—John 7: 17.

REVELATION: THROUGH WHOM MAY IT COME?

The reception of revelation from the divine Being has ever been, and now is, one of the distinctive doctrines of the church of God. It imposes on the ministers and people of the church one of the gravest and most important responsibilities that has ever been placed upon mortal man! In the fear of God, and with a deep consciousness of our weakness and needs, this responsibility should be assumed and discharged.

How can we properly acquit ourselves as members of the church of Jesus Christ, in this important duty, except as God shall be with us, to help and to bless? The people, "the common people," whom God and his servants always recognize, and never ignore, perform, or should perform, an important part in this work. No room here for blind credulity, unwarranted skepticism, intrigue, or dictation upon the part of the priest, or rebellion upon the part of the people.

The greater part of our coreligionists refuse to believe in the doctrine of present revelation, hence refuse to assume some of the gravest responsibilities which result from our profession of the Christian religion. It is not the leading purpose of this article to prove this doctrine to be true, and operative among the people of God, in all ages, but it may not be amiss to affirm the following facts:

1. The sacred history, contained in the Bible, proves the doctrine to be true. According to this history, which covers a period of over four thousand years, there never was a people who secured the knowledge of God without direct revelation. Can we be saved without the true knowledge of the true God? (See John 17: 3.)

2. It is supported and taught by many of the statements of the word, both doctrinal and prophetic. (See Matthew 11: 27; Acts 17: 22-27; Matthew 7: 7-11; Joel 2: 28, 29; Jeremiah 16: 14-16; Ezekiel 20: 33-38.)

3. The promise and office-work of the Holy Spirit necessitate the doctrine to be true. (See John 14:15-18, 26; 15:26; 16:13-15; 1 Corinthians 2:11-16; 12:3.)

As all who are obedient to God are entitled to the Spirit of promise, so, likewise, are they entitled to revelation from God, as their individual needs and work may require, God being the judge. Our part is to exercise true faith; his part, to give as he may see fit, little or much, or to withhold. He is the only one who knows, fully and accurately, what our real needs are; therefore, we should always "have faith in God."

Nevertheless, we may understand that if all are entitled to divine aid (including revelation when necessary), according to their needs and the work they are called to do, some will need more than others. And, furthermore, as all are required to labor for the benefit of the common cause, each one may present what he receives from the Lord to the people of the church, in some capacity, standing in his own place, or office, and attending to the peculiar duties which belong to his office and calling. By common consent, the privilege is accorded to each member of the church to present the word of the Lord to the people, by revelation, tongues, or prophecy.

In this church we have a graded ministry. Consistently and necessarily, (speaking of them collectively,) their prerogatives are greater than those of the laity. But as there is a gradation of authority, responsibility, and duty, from the office of deacon to that of the president of the church, so, likewise, there is a gradation of privilege and prerogative. Therefore, if there are any who stand next to the first presidency, whose field is the world, and whose duty it is "to build up the church and regulate all the affairs of the same, in all nations," it is their privilege and right to stand next to them in giving the word of God to the people. All this, without any breach in the order which characterizes the works of God. In all legitimate work belonging to the first presidency, they will be helpers, not opposers.

Can any one reject this view, and at the same time read and believe what was done by the first apostles of the Lamb, as recorded in the New Testament scriptures? What about the revelations of Paul? Do you say that they are binding on us because we have accepted them in General Conference capacity?

Our indorsement of the sacred books of the church, in September, 1878, did not and could not change the character of what was written in the books. If it was true and divine after our action, it was just as true and divine before. Our action was simply a recognition, or expression of willingness, upon our part, to be governed by the things written in the books.

In the second place, this recognition, though not formal, existed and was demonstrated, in a very practical way, from the beginning of the establishment of the restored church.

In the third place, the authority and value of the things contained in the Bible were declared by higher and better authority than that of a General Conference, as early as 1831:

Thou shalt take the things which thou hast received, which have been given unto thee in my scriptures for a law, to be my law, to govern my church; and he that doth according to these things, shall be saved, and he that doeth them not shall be damned, if he continues.—Doctrine and Covenants 42:16.

This was given before the new translation was made, and seems to show the estimate of the divine Being upon the things contained in the Bible, as given through Jesus Christ, the apostles, and prophets.

If it still be said, that notwithstanding the truth and divinity of that which may come to us, we are under no obligation to pay attention to it, unless it comes through the prophet and has been indorsed by the church, our answer is, that, as stated, this is not correct. It is only correct in a certain and limited sense. That no member of the church can be compelled to accept or observe any communication, as divine, contrary to his own judgment, is true, unless it has first been indorsed by the church; but if it commends itself to us as divine, by the rules which God has given to try purported revelations, then we are morally bound to accept and obey it, as much so as if it were indorsed by a hundred General Assemblies of the church! What! Under no obligation to obey a revelation from heaven, unless it comes to us through the president of the church! Think of it! And we call ourselves the children of God!

The sense in which we are required to accept any document which has been indorsed by the body, whether we believe it or not, (as I see it,) is to honor it as the sentiment of the body, both as representatives and members, so long as we act as ministers of the church, or hold membership therein.

Doctrine and Covenants 27:2 and 43:1, 2, teach that the president of the church is to receive revelations and commandments which are to govern the church as laws, but these passages do not teach that no other one may give revelation to the people of the church. The first passage cited teaches that Oliver Cowdery could give revelation to the church, even by commandment, when spoken, but not written; and that he could write to the church the mind and will of God "by wisdom"; that is, he could not present written revelations to the church, as laws, but nevertheless, we can not but believe that had he presented to the church, in writing, that which God gave him by wisdom, though it should have been ever so instructive and corrective in its character, its rejection, anywhere and everywhere, would have resulted in individual darkness and condemnation.

The president of the church is the Moses man, and the only one authorized to receive revelations and commandments for law unto the church, provided the conditions are spiritually normal. The president, with his two counselors, constitute the leading quorum of the church. They are high priests, but not the only high priests whom God has set in his church; they are apostles and prophets, but not the only ones who have been placed in the church by divine authority. They are simply chief apostles, prophets, and high priests. The twelve are apostles, and so are the seventy. And at the risk of being called heterodox on this point, I will affirm that the patriarchs are prophets, in the church and to the church, and may upon any proper occasion, by the inspiration and wisdom of God, deliver to the people a corrective and instructive message from heaven.

That the president of the church, and his counselors, for that matter, may deliver divine messages in like manner, in addition to their other extraordinary prerogatives, is freely granted. I know of nothing in our theory or practice to prevent this, though the messages may never have gone before any quorum of the church. Read Doctrine and Covenants, section 121, and you will be convinced that this has been our practice. This section shows that three different communications were presented in open conference, by President Joseph Smith, and action had in harmony with them, though they had never been considered by any quorum of the church. One of these was presented in the midst of a heated discussion over the Chicago Mission. So, if our claim be admitted to be correct, there is no interference with any privilege or duty of the first presidency.

The first Moses man of whom we read in the good book, was Moses; and then, as now, there were some good-meaning people who thought no one should be permitted to speak in the name of the Lord, but he:

And there ran a young man, and told Moses, and said, Eldad and Medad do prophesy in the camp. And Joshua the son of Nunn, the servant of Moses, one of his young men, answered and said, My lord Moses, forbid them. And Moses said unto him, Enviest thou for my sake? would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his Spirit upon them.—Numbers 11: 27-29.

We all ought to be able to commend these words of Moses, as a grand expression by a grand man.

In the TRUE LATTER DAY SAINTS' HERALD for April 15, and May 1, 1869, appears an article under the caption of "Who may receive revelation?" from the pen of Elder W. W. Blair. Elder Blair, in this article, was evidently defending what he understood to be the position of the Reorganized Church. His positions are important and forcible, because they are in harmony with the word. I quote a few passages for the benefit of those who do not have the HERALDS of these dates at hand. After reading quotations from the Book of Mormon and Doctrine and Covenants, Elder Blair says:

Surely, here is unmistakable evidence that God will reveal his word to others than the President of the church, as claimed by some.—Volume 15, p. 230.

Having shown that all the Saints may receive the testimonies and revelations of God through the Holy Spirit, we now propose to show that all the officers in the church may receive revelations touching their especial and respective duties, and also for others.

Some would pervert the word of God, and gladly make the people believe that none can receive revelations and commandments, for the government of the church in any sense, but the president of the church.—Page 232.

By these last two quotations we learn that the commandments upon which the church was organized, came to Joseph and Oliver; and that the ordination of both to be elders and apostles, was administered under each other's hands; and this, as before shown, was by the direct command of God to both of them, when neither of them was president of the church or priesthood. Now, if all this could be done in 1830, and before, why not similar revelations and ordinations be had in 1852-3, in the reorganization of the church?

The general, standing law, was to be given by and through the president and seer of the church, but special commands may come, as we have before seen, through others, especially when there is no active president, or when it is so we can not apply to him.—Page 233.

Quoting the Doctrine and Covenants, and the reputed words of the Seer concerning the duties of the twelve apostles, Elder Blair adds this comment:

Their revelations were to shape their decisions, and their decisions thus made, were to remain "as items of doctrine and covenants," hence their revelations were to affect, and help to shape, the government of the church.—Page 263.

After quoting largely from the sacred books of the church, the following explanations are given:

But the successor, thus called and qualified, would not have the exclusive right to receive revelations and commandments for the church, only so far as relates to the general, universal law. If so, God would change his mode of governing his people, from what it has been in all time past. The President of the church is unlimited in his privileges of receiving revelations for the church, but his privileges do not exclude others, only so far as relates to the general law and covenants by which the church is to be governed. This I trust we have shown clearly, especially in the first two divisions of this article.

Joseph the Martyr, in his church history, defines, as we have seen before, the privileges of the members, and officers, in regard to this subject. He further says, Millennial Star, volume 14, page 38: "Bro. Hiram Page had got in his possession a certain stone, by which he had obtained certain revelations concerning the upbuilding of Zion, the order of the church, etc., all of which were entirely at variance with the order of God's house, as laid down in the New Testament, as well as our late revelations." Joseph then inquired of the Lord concerning the matter, and the answer was, "No one shall be appointed to receive commandments and revelations in this church, excepting my servant, Joseph, Jr., for he receiveth them even as Moses." This renders it plain that it was the general law.—Page 265.

Elder Blair concludes by giving the following summary:

1. That it is the privilege and duty of all the Saints, to have the revelations and testimonies of the Holy Spirit.

2nd. That it is the privileges and duty of the officers of the church, to have the revelations of the Spirit, in regard to their callings and duties.

3d. That it is the exclusive privilege of the president of the church to receive the standing law for the government of the church.

4. That it is contrary to the economy of God for any one in the church, to receive revelations for the authoritative instruction or counsel of those above them in authority.

5th. That the word of the Lord has, in some cases, been given through the lesser to the higher, for their learning and edification, if not strictly mandatory. (See Acts 21:4, and also the 14:29-31, of 1 Corinthians, seems to contemplate the same or similar.)

6th. That prophets and teachers have received commandments through the Spirit to ordain men to the office of apostles, and send them away on their mission. (See Acts 13:1-4.)

7th. That Aaronic priests have received a commandment from God to ordain each other to the office of an elder, and to the apostleship, in the Melchisedek priesthood. (See Millennial Star, vol. 14, p. 20; Doctrine and Covenants 19: (46) 3; 17: (2) 1.

Therefore, the calling and ordination of apostles in 1853, in the Reorganization, (which calling and ordination was by command of the Holy Ghost, through H. H. Deam, a high priest, ordained in the days of the first Joseph,) was not without precedent, but was after the pattern of the calling and ordination of Joseph, Oliver, Paul, and Barnabas. All these callings and ordinations were extraordinary, but the circumstances in each case fully justified it; and the Holy Spirit, which always bears witness of the truth, is a witness to these things.—Page 266.

I trust this effort, imperfect as it may be, will start renewed thought upon a very important subject to all true Saints; and while I have implicit confidence in the order of the kingdom of God, as it has come to us in the great restoration, I have no confidence in those interpretations which make the word conflict with itself, and deprive us of the privileges and rights which have been vouchsafed unto us in the revelations of God.

I close with two quotations, the first of which often appears in our HERALD, but the second not so often:

Wherefore, now let every man learn his duty, and to act in the office in which he is appointed, in all diligence. He that is slothful shall not be counted worthy to stand, and he that learns not his duty and shows himself not approved, shall not be counted worthy to stand. Even so. Amen.—Doctrine and Covenants 104:44.

Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his Spirit upon them.—Numbers 11:29.

CRITICISM OF THE REVEREND MR. HAUPT VERSUS "JOSEPH SMITH DEFENDED."—NO. 7.

Objection No. 5. "God pronounces a curse upon any one who will add anything after the last chapter of Revelation."

To that I replied, "The book here spoken of (Revelation 22:18) is the book of Revelation, for the New Testament was not then compiled, and some of it was not then written. John himself wrote First, Second, and Third John after he wrote the Book of Revelation. Nothing was to be added to it. But nothing is said about God speaking after that. The whole matter hinges on the word man. Man is forbidden to add, but God may add when he pleases. God has the right to speak through whomsoever he chooses. This text does not forbid it."

Mr. Haupt replies: "We agree with Elder Peterson that Revelation 22:18 refers only to the Book of Revelation.

"Man may 'add unto' or 'take away from the words of the book of this prophecy,'

"1. By inserting or omitting words.

"2. By attaching false meaning to them as Mr. Peterson does in the case of Revelation 14:6, or by explaining away the proper meaning. If the curse of God falls upon one thus dealing with the words of this book, does it not with like offenses with other parts of God's word?"

My argument was that this text was not a valid objection to the doctrine of present revelation. Mr. Haupt does not move that point, but somehow Revelation 14:6, 7 worries him. We have already noticed this text; and have proved that he himself was the guilty party, in attaching a false meaning to it. While we think it is wrong to attach a false meaning to any part of the Bible, yet that was not our Savior's meaning in the text under consideration. But if it was his meaning, I have not attached a false meaning to the text, nor has Mr. Haupt attempted to show that I did. Until he does, we are under no further obligation to notice it. What we have said stands until disproved. Mr. Haupt refers to this text in another place, so we will notice it again.

Objection No. 6. "The Bible says the gifts of the Spirit were to be done away and a more excellent way was to be established."

Mr. Haupt says: "I question any Christian making this or any of the ten objections, except the third, fourth, fifth, and tenth. We have to deal with the proposition set up in knocking down these men of straw."

Like Mr. Haupt we too question that any Christian would urge not only those but any of the ten objections to present revelation, but the believers in them thought they were Christian. This sixth objection has been frequently answered by writers in our church papers. If Mr. Haupt thinks I set up a man of straw he might come to a different conclusion after a short correspondence with Clark Braden and those of his sect. John Wesley came near fathering it on the Church of England in his day, in his sermon number 94, entitled "The more excellent way." Throughout that sermon he is replying to the Established Church. In it he says: "It does not appear that these extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost were common in the church for more than two or three centuries . . . the cause was not [notice Mr. Haupt] as has been vulgarly supposed, because there was no more occasion for them because all the world had become Christian. . . ." It is an old objection, Mr. Haupt, even urged in John Wesley's day and charged upon his religious neighbors as being a "vulgar" objection. The charge of a "man of straw" is unkind and untrue. If Mr. Haupt had been called upon to answer this objection nearly every month in the year, as Latter Day Saints have, he would not think I manufactured a man of straw. While I have answered these ten, together with other objections many times, I have answered this sixth more than the others; for that reason I gave more than sixteen pages in reply; six pages more than to the other nine.

Mr. Haupt's answer is not very clear. If I get his meaning, he argues that the gifts of the Spirit mentioned in 1 Corinthians 12, are not for the members but for the officers of the church, while the gifts mentioned in Isaiah 11:2, "are essential to every Christian." If this is true then the officers only are entitled to the gifts of 1 Corinthians 12, while every Christian is entitled to the others mentioned. The fact that the sisters spoke in prophecy (see Acts 21:9) and men spoke in tongues and prophecied as soon as they received the Holy Ghost, and before there was time for an ordination, shows that those gifts were not restricted to officials. If I have thus understood Mr. Haupt correctly, then we have another case of Haupt vs. the Scriptures.

The closing paragraph of Mr. Haupt's reply on this point is: "It is not recorded that all the apostles were workers of miracles." But they were all given that power. (See Luke 9:1, 2.) Perhaps Mr. Haupt is paving the way here for his powerless apostles. Let us glance back a few lines. First prove apostles and prophets are entitled to those special gifts and then excuse them for not exercising their rights and powers.

This is strengthened by his statement in his revised tract, page 15: "So in the body of Christ, the member is given the gift by the Holy Spirit according to the position in which God has set him in the church." But Paul said these gifts of the Spirit were "given to every man [not merely every officer] to profit withal." Mr. Haupt continues, "Therefore all are not apostles, all are not prophets, neither are workers of miracles, nor have all the gift of tongues, these several gifts being conferred only on those who have need of them. But certain gifts are essential to every member," etc. I believe this is the position of Adventists and Dowieites and others. Herein is shown the difference between the true and untrue. One restricts the gifts of prophecy, tongues, and other of the ninefold gifts to one or more of the officers, while the other makes no such restriction, leaving God to bestow on each member or officer a gift or gifts "as it pleases him." Moses wished that all of God's people were prophets, and the history on this point shows that the officers were by no means the only ones who received the gifts of the Holy Spirit spoken of in 1 Corinthians 12. We are justified in saying that the Episcopal Church has drifted from the truth. One way to detect the truth is that it is democratic, while error is more or less despotic.

Objection No. 7. "We have advanced in science, literature, and art. Why not in the gospel of Christ?"

I answered this objection as follows: "Because one is perfect, and, emanating from a perfect being, was always perfect, the other is more or less imperfectly discovered by man. To outgrow the perfect law of the Lord, the everlasting gospel, is to outgrow perfection and become imperfect. And that is what the sectarian world, it occurs to us, has been doing for centuries. Outgrowing perfection."

The last two sentences were not quoted by Mr. Haupt, and then he asks "Which side is he on here?" The last sentences, which he left out, show which side I am on. Up to this time we have noticed only a few efforts at garbling quotations, and we have given him the benefit of the doubt, but here is a clear case of it.

Continuing he says, "He has with his sect been arguing the necessity of further revelation because without it we can not have a perfect knowledge of God." That is still our claim and from the fact that we argue the perfection of the gospel plan does not put us on the other side. From the early centuries till now Catholicism has outgrown the perfect way, and changed and changed to suit its purpose. One point in the perfect law was: Baptism by immersion for the remission of sins to penitent believers. But they outgrew that perfection and practiced sprinkling instead, and not always to believers but sometimes to infants. Do you see, now, Mr. Haupt, which side I am on? But Mr. Haupt himself teaches that further revelation is necessary in order to have a perfect knowledge of God. He appears to be on our side, notwithstanding he would close the canon of scripture. Hear him: "But to the righteous, Christ gives the Holy Spirit to reveal the truth, so that if any man will do his will he shall know of the doctrine."

He misrepresents us again when he continues to state what he says is the doctrine of my "sect." "The former revelation was insufficient and therefore imperfect." Here his sword is turned with the handle toward me, as he claims "the Spirit will reveal the truth to the righteous." Was the former revelation therefore insufficient? We do not claim the "former revelation" was insufficient in former times. But we do not possess in the Bible all they had, as I have shown in "objection 4." Our position is that revelation must be personal and not second-handed in order to give us a knowledge of God. The history of a revelation to the ancients is not a revelation to us. The commission to the original apostles, or the call to others, does not authorize us to act in their stead. The election of a mayor in Independence will not authorize Mr. Haupt to fulfill the duties of that office when the mayor dies.

Again he says: "The Holy Ghost descended upon the church to abide with it for ever, [we looked in vain for a Bible reference], but the Holy Ghost operates upon each individual, applying the benefits of Calvary's cross (the atonement) and bestowing the gift necessary to the work or office of that individual and inspiring them with truths of that one faith as he grows in grace and knowledge. Thus the everlasting gospel is revealed to all who seek to know God. The revelation is perfect, only man is imperfect and needs the aid of the Holy Spirit to understand it." Which side is he on now? Was the "former revelation" insufficient?

For the reason that "man is imperfect" and the church abode not in the truth, therefore God rejected the priestcraft of Catholicism and restored the priesthood of God.

We have not claimed that God changed, that Christ changed, that the Holy Ghost changed, that truth changed; but that the church changed her doctrine and polity, and broke the line of communication to the divine throne, thereby losing divine favor and authority, and that it has been reopened in latter days. When we said "the gospel is perfect, and, emanating from a perfect being, was always perfect," how did that place us out of harmony with the thought that the church abode in the truth?

Again we quote Mr. Haupt as saying: "The faith once delivered to the apostles was perfect and we do not pretend to understand it better than the apostles did." Does he intimate the Latter Day Saints do pretend to understand it better than the apostles did? If so he is wide of the truth of the matter, but a man who receives a knowledge of it by revelation ought to understand it as well; at least well enough to be rooted and grounded in the faith. The faith was not once delivered to the apostles as stated by Mr. Haupt; at least not to them alone, but as stated by Jude, "once delivered to the saints."

Mr. Haupt says further: "Christ made an atonement for all the world." Did that include original sin? Did he take away the sin of the world? (See St. John 1:29.) If so, why baptize infants?

Mr. Haupt inserted in his revision on explanatory clause when quoting Jude: "The faith once [for all time] delivered to the saints." Why did he insert that clause? Was not the text plain without it? Did he not feel that he needed to put that in to prove his point? No such thought is contained in that or any other text. In fact as we have shown many texts show a latter-day restoration of the faith.

Mr. Haupt adds to his revised manuscript this thought: "The revelation is perfect, only man is imperfect and needs the aid of the Holy Spirit to understand it. He should not expect a direct revelation of the faith instantaneously given, but should learn from the revelations of the past by the aid of the ever-present Holy Spirit." Why not "instantaneously given"? Has God changed? Is Jesus Christ the same to-day? Has the Holy Spirit lost some of its power? Are his younger children not so precious in his sight as those of other ages? True, the Spirit may give one an understanding of the word; but that is not all that is needed. To illustrate my meaning: If I get a letter purporting to be from a friend I have never seen and making me exceeding bright promises, I may understand every word of it; but the principal thing is, is there such a friend? Did he write it? Is he able to fulfill his promises?

The Bible claims to come from God through many changes and translations, with some additions, and many subtractions. What one desires is not only to understand it, but to know if there is a God, if he has written or caused to be written, the Bible, and is he able to fulfill his promises. This only can be obtained by revelation, and it is promised to every man. "He that doeth the will of my father which is in heaven shall know of the doctrine." "His Spirit beareth witness with our spirits that we are the children of God."

Objection No. 8. "The scriptures were able to make Timothy wise unto salvation; then why not us?"

My reply to that question was: "But it must be remembered that Timothy did not know anything of the New Testament, for the best of all reasons, it was not then in existence. Then, shall we say that the New Testament is unnecessary, seeing that it was written mostly after that time? If the New Testament did not destroy or change the plan of salvation, would anything that God would give to-day destroy or change it? Certainly not, it would but confirm it. If the Old Testament made men "wise unto salvation," then, the Old and New combined would make men wiser still to meet the increased objections of that time. To meet the great flood of infidelity of to-day it would not make us less wise to further instruct us and prepare us for their attacks."

As a partial reply to the above Mr. Haupt wrote: "It is not only true that Timothy knew nothing of the New Testament, but also none of the twelve or their successors for nearly four hundred years possessed a copy of the same or had even read all the books."

This statement strengthens my position and even answers the objection of some, that, "The miraculous gifts of the Spirit ceased with the death of the first apostles as the church then had the written word." They did not have the written word or at least they did not have access to it for hundreds of years. Thus another objection of our opponents, we have permitted our friend Mr. Haupt to answer. Thanks for the assistance.

But we next approach a point with regard to the canon of scripture that is little if any less important than the "hub" of this controversy, "succession." If "succession" is the hub, then the canon of scripture is the tire. Of this matter Mr. Haupt says: "The Catholic Church is responsible for setting the canon of the New Testament." I am glad Mr. Haupt did not try to place the responsibility with God, for that would have been sacrilegious. God had nothing whatever to do with that act; yet strange to say, it is one in which both the Catholic and the Protestant world put great faith, and in which they put great trust. What authority did the Catholic Church have for "setting the canon of the New Testament"? By the way, was the Established Church of England a part of Rome at that time? Think of a church virtually saying to the Almighty: We have closed the canon of your scripture, and you will not be under the necessity of speaking any more. And if you reject us and speak to others outside of our compact we will kill them as heretics if we can, and anathematize them whether or no. Such are the conclusions and such the result of such a daring act, as history and present observation show. But think, seriously think, a church that would dare do such a thing, still claiming to abide in the vine, still claiming to have kept the faith, still claiming to be the church in legal succession! By what process of reasoning can a man holding such a position still argue for the perpetuity of prophets and revelation? Let us quote him once more on this point. "Not only had Christ given apostles and prophets to the church at the beginning, but that without a break they would continue till we are come in the unity of the faith, etc. . . . when he will come and time will be no more." And yet the canon of Scripture be closed! It must be that he has a different kind of prophet from those of Bible times. Under objection No. 10 we will be able to show that such is the case.

Mr. Haupt says further: "But the church catholic is not pledged to reject a present-day revelation that will stand the test of the church's scrutiny." Isn't it? I thought they had set the canon of scripture! What a contradictory faith!

The epitomized article of the Latter Day Saint faith on this point is: "We believe that in the Bible is contained the word of God so far as it is translated correctly. We believe the canon of scripture is not full, but that God, by his Spirit, will continue to reveal his word to man until the end of time."

All truth is harmonious, and God can not in one age contradict what he gave in another, so that the Bible is a guide to us against deception. Anything not agreeing with that where it is correctly translated will be wrong. But when did he say the canon was full and the world to hear no more from him? Chapter and verse, please.

Mr. Haupt's belief on this point is stated as follows: "The Holy Scriptures containeth all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man, that it should be believed as an article of faith or be thought necessary and requisite to salvation." Which system of faith is in harmony with itself and which is contradictory? Which faith is in harmony with God's way in the past? Which faith reverences God, and which puts Him and Christ out of the church? Which faith stops, or tries to stop, the mouth of God, and which says, "Speak, Lord, and let thy servant hear"?

Mr. Haupt next insinuates that Latter Day Saints practice polygamy, and "set aside the scriptures": "All through the ages, sects have arisen claiming later revelation, whereby they set aside the scriptures and denounce the Catholic Church. In every case they split upon the subject of polygamy, with the exception of the Irvingites, the newer sects of Adventists, and Dowieites still to be heard from."

True, some who departed from the faith, sooner or later, practiced polygamy in some form. I think some charge King Henry VIII with even a worse crime than that, and however hard the Episcopal Church may try to trace their origin back of that, their task is extremely difficult, and in the opinion of the writer can not be done. True, in the early Christian centuries true Christianity existed in England; but in the latter part of the sixth century became amalgamated with the Roman church. Of this point we will have more to say in another place.

Because some went out from us and went into polygamy, is no more against us, however, than it is against the primitive church of Christ, because of the practices of the Nicolaitans. Those alone must be held to the error who practice or condone it. Because some went away from us, and, settling in the valleys of the Rocky Mountains, practiced polygamy (or polygamy) does not cut out the faithful who remained true to virtue. It does cause us, however, to be "evil spoken of" by the evil-minded. (See 2 Peter 2: 2.) As Mr. Haupt only excludes the "Adventist and Dowieites of the newer sects" from the doctrine of polygamy and setting aside the Holy Scriptures, he includes in that charge the Reorganized Church of Latter Day Saints. He knows we do neither. If Mr. Haupt and his class believed the scriptures more and the writings of the "apostolic fathers" and "doctors of the church" less, he would have little cause for throwing stones at others for setting aside the Holy Scriptures. But he says sects thus springing off have "denounced the Catholic Church." I believe that is the very same charge Rome urges against the Church of England. Suppose all Catholicism to be wrong, how could they ever be set right if she will not accept any correction that does not come through her corrupt channel?

Objection No. 9. "I can not accept any prophet who does not die in Jerusalem, for Jesus said: 'It can not be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem.'"

My reply to the above was: "By turning to this text (see Luke 13: 33) it will be seen that Jesus spoke this of the ancient prophets, for he, himself, did not die in Jerusalem. Neither did Paul, or Jude, or the Revelator. They prophesied and yet they all died outside of that city." Of this Mr. Haupt says: "As Mr. Peterson gives but three sentences to this so-called objection, we pass it by as too foolish to notice." Thank you for calling it a foolish objection. We considered it that from the first, but had a little more respect to our neighbor's opinion.

In his revision Mr. Haupt says: "Objection No. 9, if ever made, is disposed of by three short sentences by the elders and we pass it by." We are not willing to pass it so easily, at least the insinuation that I made up the objection of my imagination. How does he know what objections I have heard? At least three separate times in my life I have heard that objection. His insinuation shows how he jumps at conclusions with no proof at all.

Objection No. 10. "Based on 1 Corinthians

13: 8-10, this objection is, in the future from Paul's letter, 'prophecies were to fail and tongues to cease.'"

My argument was that the perfect time had not yet come, and said in closing, "It is further evident that the Holy Ghost was to continue in full working power when men would open their hearts to receive it [italics not in original copy] until the perfect one should come and establish peace and perfection on the earth. If there are three persons in the Godhead as we most certainly believe, and one is 'unchangeable,' the other, 'the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever,' then what shall we say of the third? Is not his nature similar? We think so. So that those who obtain that Spirit to-day will as surely obtain its gifts, prophecy among others, when and to whom God sees fit to bestow it."

Mr. Haupt makes no reply to my argument on the present power and work of the Holy Ghost, which I imposed against the idea of prophecy failing and tongues ceasing, and in favor of present revelation, but takes up the subject of prophets and discusses that. As this is the matter we have been waiting for him to commit himself on, almost from the first page of this rejoinder, we now proceed to examine his claims. This is what we referred to under Objection No. 8, and said we would discuss it again under No. 10. Heretofore I have said little of his claims to having prophets and apostles in the Episcopal Church, but now we will go down to the bottom of that claim, and see what there is in it.

PROPHETS.

Mr. Haupt says, "See prophets in Cruden's Concordance." But Mr. Cruden was not infallible and his definition of terms are only human. Mr. Samuel Blackburn, of London, who was doubtless of Episcopalian sentiment, and who wrote the "Memoir" of Alexander Cruden, says: "Mr. Cruden's sentiments were decidedly Calvinistic, as the definitions of various terms in his concordance sufficiently testify." Mr. Cruden's "definition of terms" therefore are prejudiced, and we could expect a studied effort in giving the definition of a prophet. Indeed, his explanations sufficiently prove that. But notwithstanding that, he is compelled to admit a point that Mr. Haupt can not accept and remain a loyal Episcopalian. It is this: "The most usual [notice Mr. Cruden does not say "usual" but "most usual"] way by which God communicated himself to the prophets was by inspiration, which consisted in illuminating the mind of the prophet, and exciting his will to proclaim what the Lord declared to him. It is in this sense that all the authors of the canonical books of the Scripture, both of the Old and of the New Testament, are acknowledged as prophets." How can Mr. Haupt accept that definition of a prophet and still think the canon of scripture closed? He is not a loyal Episcopalian. Mr. Cruden continues: "God also communicated himself to the prophets by dreams and nocturnal visions." From the fact that Mr. Cruden did not place the "most usual" work of a prophet first in his definition, shows his prejudice. Every possible turn is taken to magnify the unusual work of a prophet before giving the real definition. From the further fact that Mr. Haupt ties to the unusual and rejects the "most usual" shows him also prejudiced, and in representing the faith of his church reveals also its weakness. If "he whom God has sent, speaketh the words of God" (St. John 3:34), we must reject those as not being sent of God whose teachings do not conform to his word.

While we believe them honest and sincere, and greatly admire their zeal, we must reject their authority. Thus we get at the root of his claim for a church with prophets in it. We have shown according to his own authors they possess only the unusual and not the most usual kind of prophet, but an excitable kind of a preacher. Can Mr. Haupt produce the kind of prophets who are inspired to produce "canonical books" of scripture? If not, how about his claims to having them? If his church possesses such prophets, how, then, about the canon of scripture being full? Which horn of the dilemma will he take, or, will he go back on his friend and witness, Mr. Cruden?

Again he says: "The verb nibba, to prophesy, is of great extent. Sometimes it signifies to foretell what is to come. [Do Episcopal prophets do that?] At other times, to be inspired, to speak from God." Latter Day Saints believe there are degrees of inspiration, but perhaps the highest degree is that of prophecy or tongues. Shall we attain to the highest or be satisfied with the lower and anathematize those who do attain to the higher?

The Lord's definition of a prophet is: "And when this cometh to pass, . . . then shall they know that a prophet hath been among them."—Ezekiel 33:33. (See also Deuteronomy 18:22; Jeremiah 23:28-30; 28:9.)

Mr. Haupt next, with Cruden as a basis, proceeds to whittle down the real work of a prophet and magnify and burnish certain obscure texts which indicate rare work of a prophet. Let us notice them.

Aaron as Moses' prophet. (See Exodus 7:1, 2.) "And the Lord said unto Moses, see I have made thee a god to Pharaoh: and Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet. Thou shalt speak all that I command thee," etc. Mr. Haupt explains this passage: "That is, explain, and interpret thy sentiments and commandments to Pharaoh and the people." According to that rendering, any one who explains God's word is a prophet, or any one who properly interprets God's word is a prophet if that be the work of a prophet. Rather a weak prophet, that. But the text in Exodus shows that Moses was to put words in Aaron's mouth, and he was only to speak what Moses commanded him. He is called his spokesman. So with a real prophet of God. He will put words in their mouth and they must speak as God commands them. Does the Church of England have such prophet?

"Poet prophets." (See Titus 1:12.) What reason Mr. Haupt and Mr. Cruden have for calling this man a poet I do not know. The text says nothing of poets. Paul evidently used the word prophet in this verse as the pagans used it or as we would put it in quotation marks, or as Mr. Haupt himself says: "Because pagans thought their poets inspired of the gods." Is this the kind of prophet Mr. Haupt argues for?

"Prophecy in song." (1 Samuel 10:5, 6.) I suppose there would be nothing strange in a prophet with the gift of song, singing his prophecy. I have heard such upon several occasions; but this text does not say the prophets whom Saul was to meet sang at all, and there is no proof that Saul sang his prophecy.

"Evil prophets." (1 Samuel 18:10.) In this text it is not stated what Saul said, but it is stated what he did, and I suppose it was used to show that a prophet when operated upon by an evil spirit was "greatly agitated," etc.; but if we admit all that, still it does not follow that the good Spirit will do that, for "God is not the author of confusion, but of peace as in all the churches of the saints." And "the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets." (1 Corinthians 14:32, 33.) Any spirit that controls the prophet is not of God, for the spirit is subject to the prophet, and not the prophet to the spirit. Mr. Haupt used these texts to show that "prophets are transported by the motions of God's Spirit, or by evil spirits." These texts say nothing about being "transported" or being "agitated in a violent manner," etc., only so far as the work of an evil spirit is concerned. God's Spirit does not work that way. But has the Episcopal Church prophets that occasionally get "transported" by the Spirit, or, are "agitated in a violent manner," while teaching the people? Such would naturally be one's conclusion.

Now what have we in the above? An effort to show that teaching, explaining, or interpreting, is prophesying, and those who do that to-day are prophets, and therefore the Church of England has prophets. These rare and obscure texts are used to prove the real work of a prophet, and even they are misinterpreted. Mr. Haupt says: "Sometimes the verb nibba signifies to foretell what is to come," but the latter texts were used to reduce as much as possible the real work of a prophet. But why cut out the major work of a prophet and tie to the minor? Is it because that is the only kind he can show? Evidently. The Bible Dictionary, by James P. Boyd A. M., defines prophet in the Hebrew, "Speaking beforehand." Any dictionary will give a similar definition.

The reader will notice all the way through Mr. Haupt's argument he has sought to cut out or cover up the gift of a prophet in foretelling future events. Why do that if the Holy Ghost is the same to-day as formerly? In all of his arguments in favor of prophets and apostles he did not argue for the true kind but a kind of an enthusiastic instructor, so that we are safe in saying that although Mr. Haupt argues for prophets he can not show a real one in the Catholic Church for hundreds of years.

When therefore we get down to the bottom of Mr. Haupt's claims, there is little or nothing in them, allowing him all he asks, and accepting his own definition and those of his quoted authors.

The rest of Mr. Haupt's reply has no reference to whether prophets were to fail or tongues cease, but is his opinion of the Elias and the gathering of the Jews, so we will leave that to its proper place in the next chapter.

The foregoing twelve objections (two new ones) to present revelation are refuted. We have shown that none of them has any weight, or foundation in scripture or reason.

"METHODIST BROTHERHOOD" ORGANIZATION.

American Methodism is at present entertaining a British visitor of the same faith, inspired with a novel mission. He is Mr. R. W. Perks, a prominent English layman, who has come to present to the Methodist public a scheme which he hopes will realize the standard set up by John Wesley in "using the influence, the wealth, and the energy" of the Methodist denomination "for the social as well as the spiritual well-being of the people." His plan embraces the fourfold projects of emigration, employment, savings institutions, and old-age pensions. It will be seen that these agencies, though new to the Methodist policy, have in part been put in operation by the institutional church and the Salvation Army. Mr. Perk's plan of assisting emigration, an enterprise extensively carried out by the Salvation Army, is, he asserts, peculiarly adaptable to the Methodist denomination, which possesses, beyond that of any other religious community, "a complete organization throughout the world." Approval of this part of the plan is expressed by the Christian Guardian (Toronto, Methodist) in these words:

"Methodism has agencies in nearly every land. Why not utilize these agencies in wisely directing the streams of emigration from congested lands into channels that shall be very largely under Methodist control? Action in this direction has already been taken by the Canadian church, and there seems to be no valid reason why we should not go even further than we have; nor why Methodism in other lands should not follow. It would make the bitterness of severing old ties lose much of its poignancy if men and women could feel, as they turned their faces toward a new home, that they were going where the Methodist Brotherhood was waiting with a warm welcome for them."

The further elements of Mr. Perk's proposition are set forth by him in words quoted by the Christian Advocate (New York), from one of the Wesleyan newspapers of London published on the day of his departure for this country. We read:

"The second way in which Methodists may, I think, help Methodists is in employment. Here I again fall back upon Mr. Wesley's advice and practice. Writing in May, 1741, he says: 'I reminded the United Society that many of our brethren and sisters had not needful food, many were destitute of convenient clothing; many were out of business, and that without their own fault,' and having stated the evil, our founder started with characteristic energy to deal with it, and did so very successfully.

"Working alongside the emigration department and the employment agency of the Brotherhood, I would have a loan society and something in the nature of a church friendly society or savings bank. Many a worthy man has spent his old age with the workhouse staring him in the face, who would have been a prosperous colonist or a successful trader had there been some such loan society as that which John Wesley founded ready to help at the critical moment. I have, in the course of my business life and Methodist experience, met scores of Methodists who have been helped to emigrate, or have been started in life, or assisted over some temporary difficulty through the kindness of friends; but there are multitudes more who have 'gone under' simply because there was no such agency as that which I venture seriously to recommend to the consideration of the business men of Methodism. I am persuaded that such an institution might be managed, as indeed Mr. Wesley's modest loan society was, on sound and successful commercial lines, especially if its funds were to some considerable extent employed to assist worthy emigrants.

"The fourth branch of social work which the Methodist Brotherhood might, and I think should, undertake, is the encouragement of provision for old age. Possibly the state may some day or another be rich enough to deal with this problem. Even if that be so, it is, I think, still incumbent upon the Methodist people to do everything in their power to shield the aged poor of their church from the sufferings which poverty entails."

This visit of Mr. Perks is designed to inaugurate a movement which shall so develop that when the representatives of Ecumenical Methodism meet in Washington in 1911 for their fourth decennial conference the subject will be ready for definite action.—Literary Digest, June 15, 1907.

JONAH ON TRIAL.

From time immemorial generations of men have been confronted with the problem of Jonah and the whale. Millions of perplexed men and women have pondered deeply the parable as set forth in holy writ. Perhaps no other disputed point of the Bible has aroused so much argument among the literalists, while many ardent Christians maintain that the story of Jonah and the whale is of no material consequence in the general plan of redemption and salvation.

Now comes an announcement of universal interest that this hoary question is to be threshed out in the courts, and it is promised that early next September we may expect a final legal determination of the mighty issue in the case of the Bible college of Missouri against the Reverend Gustavus A. Hoffman. How Jonah and the whale happened to be mixed up in the troubles of the Reverend Mr. Hoffman is an interesting circumstance. It appears that Hoffman gave his note for $5,000 to the Bible college, where he was employed as financial secretary. After two years of service he was discharged, and then he refused to pay the note because, as he alleges, the college was teaching that the story of Jonah being swallowed by the whale is a myth. He also says the college denies that Moses was the author of the book of Genesis and the Pentateuch, and that the story of Adam and Eve was only a beautiful fairy tale. But the main point of this singular controversy, as we understand it, rests upon Jonah and the whale.

When the case comes up for trial it will be unique in that some of the foremost Bible authorities of the country will be called to testify. It is admitted that the most of the testimony will be mere hearsay, as it is believed that any eye witness to the famous Jonah episode, if there was any, is dead long since.

The announcement is made by Hoffman that he will take the depositions of J. W. McGarvey, president of the Bible college of Kentucky University at Lexington; J. W. Lord, editor of the Christian Standard, of Cincinnati; F. W. Crablett, president of Bethany College, West Virginia, and R. D. Dugan, president of the Bible college of Drake University, Des Moines, Iowa. All these authorities are said to be firmly committed to the Biblical version of the Jonah story. How the defendant in the issue, being the plaintiff in the suit, will prove that the account given in the Bible is not true is hard to realize. Higher criticism is on trial and we shall await the result with respectful patience.—Kansas City Journal, June 14, 1907

UNMOVING DEPRAVITY.

"I stand exactly where I did ten years ago, namely, that though the church proclaimed against the continuance of this relationship, though the State proclaimed against it, neither the church nor the State may absolve the moral obligations that I am under, or release me from that moral duty."

So spake Roberts to the young people of Zion in the Tabernacle on Sunday. He defies both the law of the State and the revelation of his church; and he sets forth his brazen defiance as an example to the youth of Mormonism. He pleads a "moral obligation" to disobey and defy the command of God, who is the foundation of all morality and excellence. We venture to say that such a thing as a "moral obligation" to disobey the law of God was never heard of before in the history of mankind.

Roberts knows that there is a law of this State which prohibits, and which would punish if properly administered, men of his ilk who entertain views and practices such as the one which his uttered word defends. The Doctrine and Covenants is the supreme doctrinal law of the Mormon church; and this is what it has to say to Roberts and his polygamous associates:

"Let no man break the laws of the land, for he that keepeth the laws of God hath no need to break the laws of the land."

But Elder Roberts is rebellious, and teaches the youth to be likewise insubordinate to the "word of the Lord." The highwayman feels that he is under moral obligation to protect his pals. He is obliged to commit robbery, so he thinks, in the exercise of that protection. He knows that his acts are contrary to law, but he continues in them and looks upon the state as his enemy because it seeks to prevent or punish his crime. That is the expressed attitude of Roberts, with reference to the particular lawlessness of himself and polygamous pals. And that is the example and teaching which he sets before the youth.—Salt Lake Tribune, June 11, 1907.

PROBATION AFTER DEATH.

"Son, remember."—St. Luke 16: 25.

The words are put into the mouth of Abraham, but Abraham is here the representative of God; God is the real speaker.

They are spoken to a human soul in the scene of punishment. In this connection many have been struck with the word "remember." It suggests the continuity of memory in a future life. But the most powerful expression is the but seldom noticed, the little word "son." That a man in a state of retribution should experience the burden of memory is not wonderful; retribution demands memory. But that a man in a scene of retribution should still be addressed as a son of God—that is a startling thing! It is as beautiful as it is startling, and it is as true as it is beautiful.

Wherever you and I may pass to at death, we shall never pass out of the divine Fatherhood, nor out of the divine pity.

The man in this parable who is meeting retribution is not punished by his Father; he is punished by his own sin. If a child, in disobedience to an earthly father, goes near a fire and is burned, you would not say he was punished by his father. It would really be more correct to say that his father shared his penalty. The sense of human parentage is never so strong as when the father realizes the child's pain; it immediately becomes his own pain and sorrow.

So it is with the divine Father. The Filial relation is not broken when I burn myself—no flame can consume that cord.

Paul asks: "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? . . . I am persuaded that neither death nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come; nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

Thus always and everywhere we are under his eye, and enfolded by his pitying love.

"I know not where his islands lift
Their fringed palms in air,
I only know I can not drift
Beyond his love and care."

Very finely does this narrative suggest that however wide the gulf between Dives and Abraham there is a chain across it. Sympathy can bridge it, and there is a telepathic communication from soul to soul. Dives holds fast by the divine Fatherhood; and the divine Fatherhood claims Dives as still a "son."

My "Father, who art in heaven," by this name shall I ever know thee. Whither shall I flee from the presence of thy Fatherhood? If I climb up into heaven it is there; if I fly to the uttermost parts of the earth it is there; and even if I make my bed in hell it is there also!

My darkness can not cover me from thy Fatherhood: my sin can not make me less thy son. Unworthy, wicked, rebellious and disgraced—still thy son. Go where my spirit may, it can never get beyond thy pity. It may get into the prison house, but thou wilt not be its jailer. Is it not written that the spirits in prison received a message from thy crucified heart? Blessed message—for them, for me!

It tells every Dives, in every hour, of sin and its penalty, that thou canst span the gulf which Abraham could not span—that fire can not melt the golden chain of thy compassion, nor distance break the bond that bids thee call him, "son."—Times Dispatch, Richmond, Virginia.

Have Faith in the Boy.

Have faith in the boy, not believing
That he is the worst of his kind,
In league with the army of Satan,
And only to evil inclined.
But daily, to guide and control him,
Your wisdom and patience employ;
And daily, despite disappointments
And sorrow, have faith in the boy.

Have faith to believe that some moment
In life's strangely checkered career,
Convicted, subdued, and repentant,
The prodigal son will appear.
The gold in his nature rejecting
The dark and debasing alloy,
Illuming your spirit with gladness,
Because you have faith in the boy.

Though now he is wayward and stubborn,
And keeps himself sadly aloof
From those who are anxious and fearful,
And ready with words of reproof,
Have faith that the prayers of a mother
His wandering feet may arrest,
And turn him away from his follies
To weep out his tears on her breast.

The brook that goes dashing and dancing,
We may not divert from its course,
Until the wild, turbulent spirit
Has somewhat expended its force.
The brook is the life of the river;
And if we the future might scan,

We'd see that a boisterous boyhood
Gave vigor and life to the man.

Ah, many a boy has been driven
Away from his home by the thought
That no one believed in his goodness,
Or dreamed of the battles he fought.
So if you would help him to conquer
The foes that are prone to annoy,
Encourage him often with kindness,
And show you have faith in the boy.

Have faith in his good resolutions,
Believe that at last he'll prevail;
Though now he's forgetful and heedless,
Though day after day he may fail.
Your doubts and suspicious misgivings,
His hopes and his courage destroy;
So if you'd secure a brave manhood,
'Tis well to have faith in the boy.

Have Faith in the Boy.

Dear Ones of the "Home Column": As I have been thinking along this line I will try to put my thoughts, or at least some of them, on paper, hoping some dear one may be helped or encouraged by them.

I know many hearts to-day are aching over the wayward boy. The closer I observe those about me, and the more experience I have as a mother, the more I am led to believe that one great reason for the waywardness in many of our boys is because we as parents do not exercise the patience, or such patience as is required to help hold in check the growing, turbulent nature of our boys. We too often reprove in harshness instead of kindness.

I have made the acquaintance of several boys whom people called bad, wild, and reckless, and by ever speaking kindly to them, little by little I have gained their confidence, and have not found one single boy as yet who was all bad or depraved. All have some good traits of character, and all respond to kind, considerate treatment. By closely observing this, I have gained some knowledge that to me has been beneficial. I find that men are too apt to forget their own boyhood days, and not to have the patience with their sons that they should have. And, again, as mothers never have been boys themselves, they do not so easily understand how to rule and control the boys as they do their girls.

Let me give you one of my experiences. I had heard for some years of a boy whom almost every one termed as hopeless. And, to use a slang phrase, he was said by his companions and the boys of the neighborhood (for it was in the country) to "wear the belt" for championship. His parents had given up hope of ever making anything that was good or respectable out of him. He would drink, fight, be bad at home and at school, and make things lively in a general way wherever he was. His father once while speaking to my husband had said, "I have no longer any hopes of ever reclaiming him. I have talked and scolded and whipped and threatened him and could do nothing with him, and now he is a man and I feel his case is hopeless."

Not long after this I met this boy, now a man in size and strength. He was a handsome young fellow with brown curling hair, large brown eyes that always seemed to smile when you spoke kindly to him. A firm look about the mouth and chin that seemed to speak of strength of character. I could hardly believe it was the one of whom I had heard so much; but my curiosity was aroused and I chatted pleasantly with him as though I had met a man I knew to be a gentleman born and bred; for he (be it remembered) belonged to one of the leading families of the community. Two of his sisters and two brothers were all filling places of honor with credit to themselves, and had the confidence and esteem of all about them. His home was a large country house where evidences of thrift and comfort were to be seen on all sides.

My mind was made up at that first meeting that if it were possible I should in the future satisfy my own mind at least, as to the cause of this boy's waywardness. I talked to him of such things as I thought would interest a boy such as he, and at last invited him to our home. We sang and played for him and invited him to join in the games some of the family played. And one evening he accompanied us to church a distance of three miles, and instead of going out and trying to hunt up a row or taking a drink (for there were some outside who, sad to say, were drinking) he sat very still and seemed to listen very attentively. The elder dwelt at length upon the duty of saints of the most high God. In part he said: "If there is a degraded woman or a man who is a drunkard in this community, and you are not trying with your faith and prayers to lift her or him up, to win from the error of their ways, then you are not coming up to the Christ standard. It is your duty as well as your privilege to help all such; and if you have not been praying for them then see that you get down on your knees and pray earnestly for them and yourself as well." His words sank deep into my heart. Indeed it seemed they were being spoken to me; but the elder was a stranger to me. I knew, of himself, he did not know of my experience, although he looked me straight in the eye for almost a half moment, before he turned his gaze away. How my guilty conscience smote me. And I began to pray for my newly made friend.

That night on the road returning home, I spoke to him about the evil of strong drink, and it seemed he was surprised to know we knew of his bad habits, for we had ever been so kind to him he had thought perhaps we had not known of his waywardness. He said he had been trying to do better ever since he first came to our home; but it seemed it was not much use trying. I assured him it was, and said how glad his parents would be; he said he had told them but they acted as though they thought it an incredible thing for him to reform. Here was a new revelation. His parents had lost confidence in him, and he knew it and this had weakened his confidence in himself. I told him I had confidence in him and said there is surely not a proper understanding between him and his parents. He said that there was not much understanding about it. If they had any business matters they never spoke of them to him, but to his other brothers; and if he knew anything he usually tried to keep all matters hidden from them.

So day by day I prayed earnestly, and even fasted that my prayers might be according to wisdom. He began to avoid his former associates, stay at home and help more about the farm. One evening he came to us and his brown eyes seemed to wear a troubled look. At last he told us his friends had found he was trying to reform, and they laughed and jeered at his folly; and he felt perfectly miserable. He felt he was and had always been misunderstood. I spoke to him in a kind, motherly way, and at last he turned and in his plain, straightforward way of speaking he said: "If there is any one who can help me reform it is you. If a fellow does do wrong you are not always scolding and acting like you thought he was meaner than a dog." I said I had no word of reproof—only pity. I was very sorry for him.

Then I told him how our Savior had loved us all even while we were sinners and said: "Remember him in your youth. He can help you overcome all trials and temptations." At last as though unable to listen to more he arose, grasped my hand, and strode away in the gathering twilight. I see him often, and although it is hard to curb so turbulent a nature at first, I have the assurance he is trying hard to overcome his faults, and I am still praying for him; and many times I feel assured he will make a good and useful man.

Let us pray more and scold less. Pray in faith not doubting, lest our prayers avail us nothing. Did I not have such great faith in the power of prayer, many times I should be sadly discouraged with my own boys; but I know if we pray in faith believing, that we can trust them in His hands who doeth all things well. He will ultimately overrule for our good and theirs.

I often recall to mind the experiences of one of our elders, who had an erring boy over whom he prayed and wept much. But before his death he said to the writer: "I have prayed and fasted much, and now I am perfectly resigned to leave the matter in the hands of the Lord; and I know it will all be well by and by. Perhaps my death will do what my life has failed to accomplish; for it may cause him to stop in his wild career long enough to think over matters a while." Not long after this the prodigal boy come into the fold, and to-day he is preaching the gospel with power and much assurance, the Spirit bearing witness to him through the gift of tongues given through another, "that he it is whom the Lord has chosen [there being other sons] to put on the armor and finish the work which his father left unfinished." Let us, mothers and fathers, be faithful, be patient, constant in prayer, and we then can feel to trust in the Lord for the final overruling for good for our boys.

In gospel bonds,
A MOTHER.

Editors Herald: The HERALD is all the satisfaction we have here. There are about sixteen different church-houses here, but you can not get one to preach the gospel in. Bro. W. R. Smith, F. M. Slover, and F. L. Sawley came here in March, so I got the city hall one night for Bro. Smith, but before we got the cards up some one raised the Mormon cry, so they would not let us have it—not one night, so Brn. Smith and Slover went and Bro. Sawley stayed and preached in our house three nights, but the crowds were very small. It rained nearly every night. It was so cold he could not preach on the streets. It would be a good place if we could get started. My latch-string hangs outside. Any time our elders come this way would be glad for them to come and we will try to get a place for them. C. LEURY.

PARIS, Texas, June 9, 1907.

Editors Herald: I thought perhaps a few lines from this place would not be amiss. We are the only Saints at this place. We had Bro. Bussell with us a few weeks ago. He preached once at our house to a nice little audience. We should have been glad to have him stay longer; but he was directed toward the country south of here, and so I carried him overland part of the way.

This has been a trying year with us in this far-away land, men's hearts failing them for fear of the things which they see and hear. It is destruction on every hand, storms and tempest, and cyclones, causing poor people to quake and tremble; seemingly they would rather see death itself than to see the dark clouds hurling here and there, leaving death and destruction in their track. Besides, I think crops will be a failure. Cotton should have been in bloom; whereas it will average but four inches in height, and not one third of a stand.

In these perilous times we are glad we can say we are Latter Day Saints; and, if faithful, will not be forgotten. We gather our little three together day by day, with the rest of the children, and offer our thanks to him who doeth all things well. My wife, son, and myself are the only Saints here. We are poor as to this world's goods; but we have a hope that money can not buy. And we hope ere long to be on the battle-field and help to finish the fight, according to the promise which said, You are not prepared; but go your way to the Lord of the vineyard and prepare yourself, and then go help finish the work. We hope that we have made ready to enter the battle, and open fire on the enemy. I ask an interest in the prayers of all the Saints, and also of the army of the Lord, that I may be faithful. God bless all the Saints, is my prayer.

Your brother,
G. W. Cox.

SAN ANTONIO, Texas, June 12, 1907.

Editors Herald: Possibly a few words from this part would be interesting to some. Last year while opening up some new places and trying to get the restored gospel before the people, we were challenged for debate by the Christians or Campbellites at Pearsall, Frio County, Texas. I notified Bro. S. S. Smith, he being the sub-missionary in charge. The Christian people got a Mr. W. F. Lemmons, the editor of the Eye-opener, and after some correspondence between him and Bro. Smith, the debate was set for June 1, 1907.

June 1 we were on the ground and Mr. W. F. Lemmons was there to shake hands with us for the first time. In the meantime we had kept the campfire blazing, and had baptized four from among the best citizens of that neighborhood. The discussion began promptly at ten o'clock, June 1, Bro. S. S. Smith in the affirmative: "Is the Reorganized church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints the church of Jesus Christ in fact, being scriptural in organization, doctrine, and practice?"

Bro. Smith made an able defense for the truth, and showed the identity of the church and was followed as usual by vilifying the characters of Joseph Smith instead of showing where the church was out of harmony with the apostolic church, as he had agreed to do. The encyclopedias he used were the New American and Chambers'. He also had a few extracts from other historical works. Chambers' was dropped like a hot potato, when we read regarding Joseph Smith and the Mormons, that they were in many important respects morally, socially, and industrially far in advance of their neighbors, and that on the night of March 22, 1832, a mob of Methodists, Baptists, Campbellites, and other miscellaneous zealots, broke into the prophet's house, tore him from his wife's arms, hurried him into an adjoining meadow, and tarred and feathered him, and again that it can not be shown that Smith was a polygamist.

This did not have the right ring, so he was driven from his own witness, for he never referred to Chambers' again. He made a villainous attack on Joseph Smith's character, but it was shown that the slanderous reports were made by his enemies, just as Alexander Campbell's character as a man was sought to be blackened by his enemies, and then was referred to a statement in the Christian Baptist, page 217, where the startling revelation is made by the pen of Campbell himself, "In Kentucky some time after my debate with Mr. M. Calla, it was reported that I had stolen a horse; and not long since in Illinois it was said that I was excommunicated for drunkenness. Not far from Lake Erie I was said to have turned Deist, and in many places I was known to be an extremely immoral man in my own vicinity. In fact as a doctor of divinity told his people near Lexington, I am a very bad man."

How does this sound coming from their own leader and lawgiver? He confesses the enemies accused him of the very things they now hurl with such unmerciful report at the character of Joseph Smith. If Joseph Smith is to be condemned by the statement made by his enemies, Alexander Campbell, the originator of their own church, must be condemned likewise. In answer to this he said no historian or writer of any consequence said any good thing of Joseph Smith; but he was as badly mistaken as in the other, for his ears possibly were saluted for the first time with the historian Bancroft's statements of facts in his histories; also court documents, and other historical statements besides Bancroft's such as Making of Illinois, a very fine book showing our true history. Thus he got a good smoking in the very hole into which he had dodged to fight us. One thing was clearly shown by about three fourths of the people present, that they were truly satisfied that he had grossly lied about us. The arguments on the church organization that were shown forth, but little was said about. His old theory on qualifications of apostles by seeing Jesus Christ was exploded, and he never did answer the arguments successfully on apostolic succession. The apostasy he argued to, on the first proposition, but it proved a positive detriment to his theory of Pentecost in the second. He paid but little attention to proof-texts showing restoration of the gospel and the kingdom of God. On his side he howled "Pentecost" long and loud, and when it was shown that even before Pentecost, during Christ's personal ministry, his church was begun and was called the kingdom, and that the existence of the church at Pentecost was never denied; but the important thing for him to do was to show his church to be like that one. When he got his church set up and it had only elders and deacons, it made but poor comparison. It was shown they had left off one principle of the gospel, the laying on of hands. Their church, being divested of spiritual gifts, could not possibly agree with the pattern. The farther the debate advanced, the more uneasy they became, and finally at the last stage they made one desperate effort, and to the minds of the majority they failed utterly, and it was plain to be seen when Bro. Smith had taken his seat behind the stand for the last session of the debate the neighbors and friends of the place began to come up and lay money on the table, and when Bro. Smith had counted the offering he had twenty-five dollars. So the good work goes on, and the restored gospel is finding lodgment in the hearts of the Texas people.

Your brother in gospel bonds,

D. S. PALMER.

INDEPENDENCE, Missouri, June 16, 1907.

Editors Herald: I have been quite sick for the last five or six weeks and consequently unable to do duty as a minister of the gospel. I wish to state through your columns that I am at this writing very much improved, for which I feel grateful to my Father in heaven. I also wish to state that I believe with all my heart that Bro. Joseph Luff is the right man in the right place. He came to my rescue and administered to me first of all; then, as the one appointed of God, attended me for about three weeks, until now I am able to get around. Now, dear Saints, through the earnest prayers of the Saints, and the faithful administration of the elders, with the means God has appointed, I am what I am to-day. And I feel indeed to praise and adore his holy name for his matchless love bestowed upon me. I am now in my seventy-seventh year and have never before been impaired. I have been unfitted for duty but a very little while at a time, and hope to soon be able to step into the ranks again with my brethren for a few years at least.

I was ordained an elder when in my nineteenth year, and preached five years without purse or scrip in the old country. Emigrated to Utah in 1856, in 1864 united with the Reorganization, and in 1865 returned to the States. I am still in the faith and know that Jesus is the Christ, have the hope of immortality and eternal life begotten within me through the word, and hope to be able to endure to the end and be saved in the kingdom of God.

I am cheered occasionally by the way, as I hear from and see some of the faithful old warriors of the cross that I have labored with in this Reorganization for the last forty-four years, and oh, how sweet their tidings are that their loved ones have endured to the end and entered into their rest. Oh, Bro. Derry, but a few more years of toil and sorrow here, and we shall have finished our course. Through the One mighty and strong we shall triumph. Glory be to his holy name!

As a father in the church let me say to those among whom I have labored so many years, Let us not be discouraged. Let us hold on to the rod of iron that has carried us safely through thus far, the true and safe guide that leadeth to the tree of life. If faithful, we shall surely eat of it and live for ever. May God help us to be humble unto death.

Your brother in gospel bonds,

404 Grand Avenue.

HENRY KEMP.

BLISSFIELD, Michigan, June 13, 1907.

Editors Herald: As we have been made to rejoice I thought I would convey the news to your columns. Bro. S. W. L. Scott of Coldwater has been here and given us a few sermons. It revived us who were already in the church, and planted the seed in new ground. Although our attendance was not large, we feel that his labor was not in vain, for we know that he left some thinking, and when he comes back he will reap some of his work for the Father. I know that it was good for my family that Bro. Scott came here. I wish to relate to you a dream I had over one year ago. My husband does not belong to the church, and never heard but two sermons until he heard Bro. Scott, only what he heard through me. Well, my dream was this: I dreamed I planted a morning-glory seed and after a while I went around where it was and it had grown up and was in bloom, that is, one had bloomed out full, the others were ready to bloom, and I said, "I have just planted that seed, and here it is ready to blossom in one day." And I think the seed is planted in the heart of my husband and that he will be planted in the church by baptism when we hear from Bro. Scott again, which I hope will not be long.

Your sister in the gospel bond,

MRS. C. B. TONG.

Extracts from Letters.

R. Etzenhouser, Cleveland, Ohio: "Our work is looking up all along the line at points I touched enroute. The spirit of progress that marked the conventions and conferences seems to be in the air and spreading. It was children's day here, and a fine one too. Srs. Florence Lutz and Mary Miller had charge of the juvenile program and decoration and did excellently, as also did the juveniles. The park season was opened auspiciously. A fine audience listened attentively."

F. C. Keck, Norborne, Missouri: "My mission address is Cameron, Missouri. Saints isolated from branches, let us know the prospects for preaching in your communities in Far West, Nodaway, and Northeastern Missouri Districts. Some are to be baptized next Sunday here."

The virtue of a man ought to be measured, not by extraordinary exertions, but by his every-day conduct.—Pascal.

News From Branches

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

With a visit from the district president, George A. Smith, to our credit, we invade the HERALD columns again: The sacrament-service in his charge brought much good to all assembled, the evening discourse being delivered by the same brother. Sunday-school of that morning made a pleasing showing and since has rendered a very nice program on the occasion of Children's Day in charge of Srs. Florence Lutz and Mary Miller.

Elder Etzenhouser has participated in our local work, occupying at the Wade Park open-air service and helping the local force in their street campaign to good effect and holding forth the local rostrum.

E. A. WEBBE.

WINNIPEG, MANITOBA.

Our little branch, which was organized last February by Elder J. L. Mortimer, is growing, and I think is in a fair way to become strong. Our membership has doubled since our organization by baptisms and new members coming from outside points. We are now holding tent-meetings and Elder Dorsett speaks to us every night, assisted by Elder Henderson. There seems to be some interest in some who are only just beginning to know that we are in Winnipeg, and may they realize that we, only, have the everlasting gospel to preach to the people of our large city. We have been told that it depends upon the faithfulness of the Saints here, as to the success of the work.

Our little branch has been wonderfully blessed spiritually; but Satan started his work before we had any spiritual blessings. We were not organized when some of us were greatly tormented by evil spirits that seemed to enter the room about when we were ready to arise from our night's sleep. Bro. Alvin Knisley could tell you something of these evil spirits, I think, as he was here for a while during their visits. But it was just before we received blessings from our heavenly Father. We have great promises for the future if we are faithful, and I would like to ask the prayers of the Saints for us that we may go on in the work purely for the good that we may do, and may we give him all the glory.

We are also to hold a reunion in the city July 11 to 14 inclusive, and would like all of the near-by Saints to come and help us make a success of it. R. C. Evans will be with us and will likely be the principal speaker. Our tent has seating capacity for two hundred, but we may be able to get a theater for our Sunday-services. We will likely be able to give all the visiting Saints free sleeping quarters, and their meals will not cost them more than four dollars per week. We will be able to feed all that come for this price, and none of the Saints will have anything to do with the work of preparing meals, which will allow us all to attend all meetings.

GEORGE T. MCLEOD.

DENNISPORT, MASSACHUSETTS.

The work is better and more firmly established here than it has been for years.

The branch has passed through many trying scenes, and the end is not yet. Many old Saints have entered the paradise of rest; others have released their hold of the rod of iron and have wandered away into the glittering building of sin; and still others have struggled along fighting the spirit of indifference; praying, hoping, and working.

It was this band of faithful Saints (all sisters with one exception) that I found when I came here. They were holding sisters' meeting, which was the best they could do. I thought of the sisters in Greenwood, New York, who try to keep the sacred fire in their midst, by gathering at the little chapel and offering prayer and testimony to God.

Many years ago a prophecy was given that the Dennisport Branch would "reel to and fro but rise again and blossom as the rose." Mention is often made of the incident, lately, and many think that the former part has come to pass, and that the latter statement is being fulfilled.

Just previous to my coming here the Holiness Church had held a revival, and some forty or less had been "saved"; but either fortunately or unfortunately the baptisms were postponed till warm weather. Before that day came, some thirty had changed their minds, and were not baptized, and three who had risen for prayers embraced the true faith, since which time I have been accused of stealing converts. I think the theft was justified.

Th sound went out that preaching-services were being held in the Saints' chapel, and large audiences came. Old men and women who had heard the gospel before the writer was born came and listened and continued to rebel; but the younger generation received the word and, at that time, six accepted it. Being obliged to leave before my work was finished, I decided to return, which I did in February, and others were added to the fold. Returning again this month, I find the interest good, and others are added, making twelve noble souls, including three young men of promise.

They now enjoy an excellent Religio, in which old and young take part. Five classes are striving to learn the interesting history and very useful teachings contained in the Book of Mormon. The prayer-meetings are well attended by the Saints, and it is most inspiring to see the young members praying and testifying.

An uncommon spectacle was witnessed last Sunday, when baptisms were administered by the Holiness minister and by the Latter Day Saint elder at the same place and at nearly the same time. Several hundred persons were present.

RALPH W. FARRELL.

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

The past month has been a very busy, as well as profitable one. On June 4 a splendid sacred concert under the auspices of the Religio was given for the benefit of branch expenses. On the evening of June 7 a very instructive lecture was given by Bro. Paul M. Hanson on his trip to the Holy Land. Our branch business-meeting was held June 11, at which time officers were elected for the ensuing term. The same officers were sustained with the exception of presiding teacher, who is now Bro. J. M. Lloyd.

The children's day service by the Sunday-school was a decided success.

On June 16 four young people were led into the kingdom by baptism.

District conference convened at Lansdowne Branch, June 22 and 23, with a large crowd of Saints interested in the advancement of the work in attendance.

Bro. Arthur W. Smith [son of H. O. Smith] having been called some few months ago by Bro. Tanner to the office of priest, was ordained to that office at the Sunday afternoon prayer-service during conference.

We are pleased to note eight baptisms for the past month, all of them by Bro. J. A. Tanner.

Our aged Sr. Grace Remington passed away on June 11, after a lingering and painful illness.

Some splendid achievements have been made among some of our young people the past year in an educational way. Bro. Harold Burgess received a gold medal for being highest in all respects of his class, which graduated from an electrical college in Washington, District of Columbia. His sister Sybil graduated with high honors from one of our high schools; also Bro. Gomer Evans from Washington University; and the daughter of Sr. Crocker from grammar school.

MISS E. M. PATTERSON.

Secretary reported eleven schools in the district all of which reported save two recently organized. The secretary desires to thank the schools for so promptly reporting but would suggest that a little more care be exercised in filling the report blanks, so a more accurate report can be made annually for the general secretary. A motion prevailed recommending that the reports of each quarter be approved by the schools before sending to district secretary. At the evening session an entertainment was given by the Clear Lake school, followed by a collection for the benefit of the children's home. Elsie Lockerby, secretary.

It may interest the friends of the library to know we now have seven hundred and twenty-five books in the library. Not so very many, it is true; but if every one would respond to the invitation, and help the library as liberally as those who have already donated—well, we dare not predict the result; only it would be many times double the library we lost by fire.

Bishop's Agents' Notices.

To the Saints of the Ohio District: We come to you with a plea for help to carry on this great work we all profess to love so well. We do not come begging as one asking alms, but to stir up your pure minds in remembering that all are not doing their duty in regard to the law of tithing and offerings. In fact, a very small portion are so doing. Now, I can hardly think that Saints are neglecting this willfully, but more from some other cause. We often talk to members who will say, "Yes, I know I ought to pay tithes, and I am going to soon." But a year is passed and gone, and nothing heard from them. And if perchance we meet them, the plea is, "I have just neglected." May it not be possible that when we stand before the pearly gate it may neglect to swing open for us to enter? God said to his ancient people, "You have robbed me." Are we not placing ourselves in that class by our neglect? That was all those people did. They did not realize that they were robbing God; yet the Lord said they were.

Now, if the Saints could only realize the great necessity of having means in the Lord's storehouse, so that the Bishop and his agents have not a constant worry as to how the missionaries' families are going to be supplied, there would be no lack. But as it is here in this district (and may be in others), some of the families have gone for months without receiving anything. This should not be, and need not, if we all do our duty. "But," says, one, "I haven't anything." Certainly the Lord does not require of him that has not. But I feel sure, if a show comes along, there can be found a few quarters and halves just to let the children see, and of course we have to go along to take care of them, while the missionary is away from his family for six or eight or ten months, and every now and then the wife writes, "I am on the last sack of flour, with other things scarce. Children's clothes so poor they can't go to Sunday-school. Isn't the Bishop's agent going to send our allowance soon?"

Has commercialism taken hold of the minds of the Saints as it has the world; and are we each trying to see how much we can get of this world's goods (nothing wrong in that if we get it honestly), and then see how much worldly pleasure we can get out of it?

I do not want the thought entertained that I desire to scold or find fault; but that you might see your duty in the light that others see it who are confronted with the problem day by day. We often hear it said, "This is God's work and he will see that it is accomplished." Yes we believe that too, but what credit are we going to get if we have not done our part? Do not let us forget that faith without works is dead. Remember the Lord said, Let those that work in the ministry, and those that labor in the affairs of men work together with God. Now while we have all faith in the final triumph of this great latter-day work, we also want to be helpers in that triumph, that we may be partakers of the blessings.

Our missionaries are all here at work, hundreds of miles (most of them) from their homes, and we do pray that none of them will be compelled to go home to care for their families; but that our district will make a grand showing financially, and we feel assured that a spiritual harvest will be the result. Can not be otherwise, for when we are doing God's will in all things blessings are sure to come.

S. J. JEFFERS, Bishop's Agent.

We desire a report from all branches and officials in District, and would like to have a representative from each branch. Adolphus Hendrickson, vice-president, Badger, Idaho.

Date of Reunion Changed.

The reunion of Northern California will convene August 30 instead of September 13, for reasons. So remember the time, August 30 to September 8, 1907, at Irvington, Alameda County, California. Full items next week. J. M. Terry, chairman committee.

Reunion Notices.

The annual reunion of the Southwestern Oregon District will meet in Myrtle Point, August 15, continuing to the 25th. The meetings will be held in the Dixon Grove, where pleasant camping-grounds are furnished. Daisy B. Short, secretary.

The annual reunion of the Des Moines District will meet at Rhodes, Iowa, from August 23 to September 2. All are requested to attend and make this reunion a success. Members of association will please remit dues to one of committee. E. O. Clark, 2500 Logan Avenue, Des Moines; W. Christy, Lamoni, Iowa; C. M. Richeson, State Center, Iowa, Committee.

Kirtland District will hold its third annual reunion at Summit Lake Park, Akron, Ohio, under the auspices of the Kirtland District reunion association, which will commence August 2 and continue to the 12th. We anticipate a good reunion there, this season, but to make it such we must have the cooperation of the Saints who intend to meet us there in order to overcome some of the difficulties that we have experienced in the past; which is in ordering the tents and sleeping accommodations. This has always been left to the very last minute, and for that reason it has been impossible for the committees to meet with the emergencies in the proper way. We ask those who anticipate attending this reunion to place themselves in communication with either Eben Miller or C. J. Dalberg, of the committee, as they will have the charge of ordering supplies for the reunion. If you wish to have tents and sleeping accommodations, or cots, you must have them ordered before the 25th of July. This refers to ministers as well as members who intend to attend the reunion. We take this measure to protect ourselves against the experiences that we have had in the past. We shall be pleased to have any of the Saints through the district or other places, who would volunteer to run the dining-tent in Akron for this coming reunion, to write at once to Mr. Eben Miller or C. J. Dalberg, at 1244 East Ninth Street, Cleveland, Ohio. Yours of the committee, Charles J. Dalberg.

Southern Wisconsin District reunion will convene at Madison, August 9 to 19, 1907. Notice as to prices on tents, etc., will appear later. Hope all who can will make the necessary sacrifice to attend. We expect to use the same grounds as last year. For the committee, Jasper O. Dutton.

The annual reunion of the Northwestern Kansas District will be held at Downs, Kansas, beginning September 12 and continuing over two Sundays. Good speakers will be in attendance. A patriarch is also expected to be present. Free hay will be provided for teams, also pasturage may be had close to the city. Everything will be made as comfortable for campers as will be possible, so all come well prepared and equipped for camping if you can, and if you

A "Sweat-Shop" Where Money is Made.

Joe Mitchell Chapple in the June number of the National Magazine quotes Secretary Shaw as using the following rather strong language:

The condition of the employees, especially in the summer-time, is well-nigh unbearable, and every consideration pleads for improvement."

JACKSON COUNTY BANK

I take the liberty of soliciting your patronage as we are in a position to do BANKING BUSINESS BY MAIL very satisfactorily. Open accounts can be placed with us for safety at your convenience and command. We have opened a savings department, paying interest on accounts of $1 or more and each member of the family should become interested in having a bank account building for future needs. We also pay interest on time deposit certificates. A number of the brethren are living here, others are looking forward to this location as a future home, and late revelation and admonition foreshadow coming events, adding materially to our spiritual holdings necessary to signs of the times, and in this connection our Board of Directors propose to safeguard the financial interests of the Saints by offering to them a depository proof against graft, greed, or calamity governed by a kindred feeling born of the interest we have in common. It is not popular men, large capital, heavy deposits, National or State laws, that offer absolute security to depositors, but directors and officers progressive and conservative, possessed of the virtue of true manhood shorn of all political ambition, with no taste for frenzied finance or mining speculation and no inclination to furnish funds for others in that line. I point with considerable just pride (I assume) to our Board of Directors as named below. Feel at liberty to write us on matters that concern you in Jackson County, Missouri.

LOOKING BACK.

No man, having put his hand to the plow, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom.

The Master at one time remarked, "No man, having put his hand to the plow, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God."

This is a striking simile as one who has followed the plow will understand. The stake is set up at the far side of an unplowed field, the plow is struck into the soil, and then the driver must keep his eye on the mark toward which he drives. A crook in this first furrow will show in all the later furrows. If the driver looks to the right or to the left the team will swerve from the true course. If he looks back he can not go straight.

The furrow behind him will take care of itself; his business is to look at the goal and press onward. If he makes straight furrows they will show for a long time and be an evidence that he is a careful farmer; if he makes crooked furrows they will show just as long and be an evidence to the contrary. They will show after his grain has been sown; even after it has been harvested. They will show until the field is all plowed over again; and sometimes even then they may be discerned. Such a hard matter is it to undo bad work.

It is a great deal the same way in the church. Men must have something to aim at—a fixed goal. If they change it each day the result will be distressing. If they look back at the things left behind them they will take a rainbow course and will not prove worthy of the kingdom. Their crooked work will show even after they have sowed their seed and reaped the harvest. It is liable to show even if they do their work all over.

Our eyes are put in the front of our heads. It is not intended that we shall look back very much; yet we do, most of us, too much. We keep our eyes on the "good old times" so much that we do not see the good new times. When one is looking back too much to the time "when the church had greater blessings" than now, when the "elders had more power," when the "Saints were more sociable," and when all was lovely, he is not apt to see the work that he might do now; so he proves "not worthy of the kingdom" and loses the blessings of to-day.

Bishop's Office
210 1-2N Main St

Paul's way was better: "Forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

When we are busy we are apt to think better of our surroundings. Work brings happiness and idleness breeds discontent.

Lot's wife was used as an example very early in the history of the world to demonstrate the fact that when God is leading men from danger to safety it is best not to look back. Yet that example was soon forgotten. The children of Israel suffered great hardships under the oppression. They were slaves with scant food and hard labor. Life seemed not worth living. Yet while Moses was leading them to the promised land they were looking back with regrets to the flesh-pots. They regretted their lost portions of garlic. They were not "worthy of the kingdom."

The brothers of Nephi on the way to the land of freedom looked back with regret to the doomed city of Jerusalem, and reproached their father and Nephi for having brought them from their homes. They, too, were unworthy.

The Christians, under the lead of Christ himself, looked back to the world, and went back, many of them. That, perhaps, drew forth this remark of his.

One does not wonder that Adam and Eve looked back with regret to the lost garden of Eden; but one is surprised to note that men, released from the most obnoxious bondage, often regret their deliverance. Many of the negroes freed by President Lincoln mourned out the rest of their days. Freedom meant less to them than did the little cabin in the shadow of the big plantation house. They wanted some one to drive them to work in the morning, to feed them at noon, and to put them to bed at night.

It is often so with those who have been freed from spiritual bondage. We see them looking back at the things of the old life,—the wealth or social position or pleasure of the old life. They miss the stern hand of the Devil that of old guided their destiny. They hate to put forth the effort necessary in striking a straight furrow. The eternal vigilance that is the price of liberty grows wearisome.

Once in a while we see one go back; by his own confession not worthy of the kingdom. What does he gain? Watch the lives of those who have done so. Is their course ever upward? Is it ever happy?

One such, who was once a stanch defender of the faith but now long an opposer, stopped for a little while beneath our roof. He chanced to pick up the Saints' Hymnal and began to sing some of the old songs. Like a flood the memory of what he had been came over him, and he wept tears of bitterness. His feelings must be the feelings of many like him.

One may be happy before he hears of the work; but never after he has loved it and deserted it.

Let us keep our eyes on the goal and strike a straight, true furrow in the sight of all men.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

GENERAL CHURCH ITEMS.

The Spokane Chronicle makes the following mention of the work in that city:

"A conference of the Reorganized Church of the Latter Day Saints for the Spokane District and the Panhandle of Idaho took place Saturday evening and Sunday at the Spokane church, corner of Smith Street and Third Avenue. It is reported to have been the largest conference ever held by churches of this denomination and was harmonious. Reverend F. J. Chatburn of Mold, Washington, presided.

"Officers were elected for the ensuing year as follows: Reverend T. W. Chatburn, president; Reverend F. J. Chatburn, vice-president, and M. Fordham, secretary and treasurer. W. W. Fordham, standing Bishop's agent, was sustained for another year for the same office. The conference will assemble again at the same church on the last Saturday and Sunday of December.

"Reverend T. W. Chatburn recently returned from the general conference, which was held at Lamoni, Iowa, where he was ordained high priest and was sent back here to take charge of the Spokane Branch and of the entire Spokane District.

"Next Sunday at eleven o'clock Mr. Chatburn will discuss 'The difference between Brighamism and the doctrine of the Latter Day Saints.' The church represented by Mr. Chatburn rejects polygamy and other doctrines advanced by Brigham Young and vigorously opposes the teachings of the Utah branch.

"The local church is reported to be free from debt and forty-one dollars was raised yesterday to purchase new seats."

CURRENT EVENTS, SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS.

In all the domain of Uncle Sam July Fourth has long been a day of mingled comedy and tragedy. Such doubts as Great Britain may have entertained regarding the ability of the new States to govern themselves must have been strengthened by observing the way in which they celebrate their independence; any grudge which Great Britain may have cherished because of severed allegiance must have been long ago satisfied by the way in which the spread eagle has maltreated his subjects on the annual occasion of his exaltation. There is a growing sentiment that it is enough. A general effort was made throughout the United States to secure a safer and saner observance of the Fourth just passed into history. Some communities were awakened by the sound of ringing bells; and with relief for the first time within the memory of man failed to hear the infernal din of shotguns, cannon, and other artillery that usually jars the firmament on the morning when liberty celebrates her birthday on American soil. The toy pistol, the dynamite cane, the giant cracker, and other exponents of contusion, concussion, combustion, and lockjaw were justly ostracized. And yet many deaths and accidents are reported from over the country. It is to be hoped that the reform will go on and gain ground until one will be as safe in the United States on Independence Day as he would be in the domain of some "downtrodden monarchy."

During the past week the world in general has taken some interest in the sport of "hunting the octopus." Some facts regarding the inside workings of the Standard Oil Company were desired in connection with the case now being tried in Chicago before Judge Landis and it was decided to invoke the personal presence of the richest man in the world. When an attempt was made to serve the subpoena the desired witness was not to be found. By a strange coincident he had disappeared. After a long and interesting search he was located at Pittsfield, Massachusetts. The result of the search, however, was disappointing, for the reason that when Mr. Rockefeller appeared in court he testified that his position as president of the concern was merely honorary and that he had little knowledge of its affairs, having rendered no active service for ten or twelve years.

"When the question comes to us to-day, What shall we do with this Jesus who is called the Christ? it is of the Christ of this present hour concerning whom it is asked. Whether he was born of a virgin or not is not the issue; whether he rose from the dead or not, as a tangible form, is not the issue; whether he worked miracles of power is not the issue. The issue is concerning this deathless Person whom multitudes are loving and serving now, who is the inspiration of countless lives to-day, who is the comfort and joy of unnumbered throngs of human souls, the Christ who is every day we live changing poor lost men into new creations, and who is giving hope and courage and redemption to the world. What shall we do with him? We must read the story of Jesus of old in the light of what Christ now is."

COME AND HEAR

why I became a Latter Day Saint! The answer will be straightforwardly given at the fourteen days' mission to be held at the Saints' church, Gosford Road, Hamilton West, beginning May 12th, and concluding May 26th. The Missioner will be Elder W. J. Haworth, of Sydney, who will be supported by the local ministry. Bring Bibles, pencils, and paper, and thus prepare yourself for a thorough examination of our message later on in your own home. We don't want people to accept our preaching without proper investigation, but would rather that they compare our teachings with the scriptures. Most of the discourse will be illustrated by large pictorial, oil-painted charts. Come, and we will do you good, if plain preaching, the Old Story, and bright singing can do it.

SOME THOUGHTS FROM MY NOTE-BOOK FOR 1906.

ELDER JEROME E. WILDERMUTH.

A thought has more power than a bomb.

The world thinks we are a deluded people; we know the world is deluded.

It takes three elements to make the church of Christ:

First, the Principles of Doctrine and people to believe them; second, offices and men to fill them; third, the power and Spirit of God.

The Bible shows a succession of apostles because the Lord foresaw that men would dispute it.

There are two births: one we had nothing to say about; the other we have all to say about, if it shall be, and the life beyond.

The yielding of our bodies to God's will is signified by Baptism.

The yielding of our spirits to God's Spirit gives us the Holy Spirit.

Be baptized as Jesus was, otherwise we are putting the example of some man before that of Christ.

Was the baptism of John of God or of man?
If of God why do not you receive it?

All born outside the Garden of Eden must be born into the kingdom.

The Bible tells us what to do, the Book of Mormon how to do it.

The New Testament was not accepted for two hundred years after Christ.

The Book of Mormon is being proved true, and agreeing with facts it will yet be accepted by many.

Why do we need the Book of Mormon? for the same reasons that we need the Bible. Either one alone does not prove God just unto all men. It is the testimony of the second witness. Do you believe the teachings of the Bible? then you believe the teachings of the Book of Mormon.

CRITICISM OF THE REVEREND MR. HAUPT VERSUS "JOSEPH SMITH DEFENDED."—NO. 8.

THE LATTER DAY DISPENSATION.

An answer to Mr. Haupt's criticism on chapter 7. Pages 132 to 143 in Joseph Smith Defended should properly have been placed in chapter 7, and those pages were so considered by me in the summary on page 185. So we will consider them under this heading now. In them I proved from Joel 2: 28 and Acts 3: 16-21 that there were to be prophets in our day; i. e., after the restoration of Palestine. From statistics, I showed that Palestine received her "early and latter rain" first in 1851 and that the land has lately been restored to its former fertility, and thousands of Jews are now gathering to their fatherland. To these eleven pages Mr. Haupt replies: "While it is understood that the 'prophet like unto Moses' was Christ, and that John the Baptist was the Elias which was to come, yet it is a common opinion that another great prophet shall arise among the Jews who shall have characteristics of Moses and Elias and shall lead the children of Israel from the north country, etc., and settle them again in the Holy Land, after which they shall be led to accept Christ, and Joel 2: 28 will again be fulfilled. The north country is Russia, where five eighths of the Jews live in conditions worse than Egypt.

"The isles of the sea are the British Isles, which is next in the number of its Jews, followed closely by the West, or the United States. Then will the Jews no longer say, 'Behold the Lord which brought us up out of the land of Egypt, but behold the Lord which brought us out of the north country, and from the isles of the sea.'"

While both the Anglican church and the Latter Day Saints are interested in the Jewish question, there is quite a difference of belief. As Mr. Haupt refers to this matter again in another place, we will notice it more fully then, but some points we wish to notice now.

1. Peter said Jesus was "that prophet" spoken of by Moses, and there is no reason to believe that promise will have even a partial fulfillment in the coming of any other prophet.

2. While John the Baptist was to come in latter days, no mention is made of his assisting to lead the Jews out of bondage.

3. The Jews are one people and Israel is usually referred to as another. Israel and not the Jews is to come from a north country. While I understand that the Jews are of Israel, they are only a small part of them. Ten and a half tribes were carried away, and we call them the lost tribes. Various efforts have been made to locate them—some in England, some among the Danes, some among the Nestorians, and elsewhere. But none of them are satisfactory efforts, nor do they furnish conclusive proof of their theories. Israel and Judah are both to be gathered, but Israel is to come from a land in the north. Russia is not theretore that country, for the lost tribes are not there; and, for the same reason, the British Isles is not the land of this prophecy.

4. No scripture indicates that either Israel or Judah will accept their Messiah till they gather back or begin to do so, and it is hardly probable that the Lord would send them a prophet till they are converted to the truth of Christianity.

5. In fact, I know of no prophecy that indicates that a prophet will lead them out of bondage, but that the Gentile nations will do that, of which England is contributing her part. (See Isaiah 49: 22, 23; 60: 3-10; 66: 20.) The common opinion, therefore, that "a prophet having characteristics of Moses and John will lead them out of bondage" is unscriptural.

THE DISPENSATION OF THE FULLNESS OF TIMES.

Ephesians 1:10: As a general reply to chapter 7, and this text, Mr. Haupt says: "Here we find a mixture of truth and error that needs sifting. Here also is the real point of controversy between the Latter Day Saints and the Catholic Church. Was the Christian dispensation the last, the church which Christ established to continue until he shall come again? Or, was it temporarily to do a work and then Christ and the Holy Ghost be driven out of it, God withdrawing all authority from the Christian ministry and all grace from the Catholic sacraments, so that from the second century on it was the synagogue of Satan?"

Our position is not correctly stated by him, and of course we will not be expected to defend our faith as misstated by others. Often our opponents misstate our position and then become angry because we will not defend it. We believe the latter-day dispensation was a Christian dispensation as well as the former, and identical with the old in authority, organization, doctrine, and divine favor. So that when he says "the Latter Day Saint says 'no,' the Christian dispensation was not the last," he misstates our faith.

The unkind charge that "Latter Day Saints believe the churches who claim succession from Christ are the 'synagogue of Satan,'" does not do us justice and, intentionally or unintentionally, was used to prejudice believers in that doctrine against us, so that they might look with disfavor on any other statement we might make. Our position is: The church in the early centuries (not in the second, however,) departed from the truth, and Christ no longer honored them with his Spirit, and they dwindled to a mere human organization; doing good, no doubt, as other secular societies, but void of divine authority. To say that we look upon them as the "synagogue of Satan," is both unkind and wide of the truth. Every effort of my opponent to thus poison and prejudice his readers against us, will be promptly met and exposed. We admit that the "real point," or one of the real points of this controversy, is whether the church has continued in unbroken authority since Christ, or whether it was rejected in due time and restored again from heaven in the nineteenth century. The easiest and perhaps the plainest way to answer his misstatement of our faith is to paraphrase it as we now proceed to do.

"Here is the real point of controversy [not more so than the closing of the canon of scripture] between the Latter Day Saints and the Catholic [a misnomer] Church. Was the Christian [both were Christian] dispensation the last? Was the church which Christ established, to continue until he shall come again, or, was it temporarily to do a work and then Christ and the Holy Ghost be driven out of it, [not correctly stated], God withdrawing all authority from the Christian ministry, and all grace from the Catholic sacraments? So that from the second [sixth] century on, it was the synagogue of Satan [was void of divine authority]. Latter Day Saints say 'no' to the former [not correctly stated] and 'yes' to the latter [not correctly stated] question. Let us therefore examine all the texts of scripture bearing on this subject."

Mr. Haupt then quotes a number of texts containing such expressions as "latter day," "latter days," "last days," "last time," and "times," which, so far as I can see, have little or no bearing at all, either for or against a "latter-day dispensation." We are at a loss to know why these texts were used, unless it was to prove that these were not the "latter days"; but as he is on record himself as believing these are the "latter days," he is against himself if that be his object. In his revision he omits them entirely, but as many in the world use these texts as he did we insert them and their answers for the benefit of others. Taking them in their order they are:

Job 19:24. This text refers to the resurrection of the flesh of Job and the appearing of the Redeemer on the earth in the latter days. That time has not yet come.

Jeremiah 23:20 is next referred to, beginning in the middle of the verse and running into the twenty-first, and is made to refer to latter-day prophets whom the Lord had not sent, yet they ran, and to whom he had not spoken, and yet they prophesied. But that language was spoken of Samarian prophets (see verse 15) and does not refer to latter days at all, but the nineteenth and twentieth verses refer to the whirlwind that "in the latter days thou shalt consider it perfectly." The great increase of whirlwinds in the last fifty years locates "the latter days."

Ezekiel 38:16. This text refers to Gog coming against Israel in the latter days. This is yet future, and if used to prove the latter days were in the time of Christ, better have been left out of the account.

Daniel 2:28. As this text properly comes under the head of "the latter-day kingdom," we will leave it till we come to that point later. This is the text that Mr. Haupt wants to get rid of, and for the purpose of locating its fulfillment in the days of Christ quotes some of these other texts to prove those were the latter days as well as these.

Daniel 10:14. Of this text Mr. Haupt says: "Michael tells Daniel 'what shall befall thy people in the latter days,' and proceeds to speak of a time from the first of Darius to the resurrection." His argument is, I suppose, to show that the "latter days" began with "the first of Darius." But note. The angel said more than that; he also said: "But I will show thee what is noted in the scriptures of truth: and there is none that holdeth with me in these things, but Michael your prince."—Verse 21. Not only to show what was to befall his people in the "latter days," but also what was of note in the scriptures of truth; and explaining them he comes down to the latter days, the especial point he was sent to inform him about. (See Daniel 11: 35; 12: 1-4.) These references show that the "time of the end," was what he referred to as the "latter days." Mr. Haupt is mistaken when he says it was Michael that instructed Daniel. (See verse 21.)

Hosea 3: 5, refers to the return of Israel in latter days. As that prophecy is now in process of fulfillment, these are the latter days.

2 Timothy 3: 1. This text refers to the perils of the last days. The great and astounding increase of the evils enumerated in this chapter, in the last few decades, locates the "last days" in our time.

1 Timothy 4: 1. This text was omitted by Mr. Haupt, but we insert it here as having some bearing on this point. This text, we think, has reference to the Utah apostasy and locates the time as now. We may notice this text again.

Hebrews 1: 2. "These last days" as designated from other "last days." This text, in connection with the rest of Paul's writings, it seems to me, could hardly hold him to the belief that those were the specific last days he so often referred to as yet to come.

James 5: 3, contains a prophecy of latter day covetousness. The recent increase of millionaires and multi-millionaires, locates the time of this prophecy in our time.

2 Peter 3: 3. This text refers to the time of the Lord's coming; men would scoff at the idea, hence "scoffers in the last days."

1 Peter 1: 20. "These last times" as distinguished from some other "last times," judging from the text alone. But there are good reasons to believe that the original text has not in the above been correctly translated. The Codex Sinaiticus now at St. Petersburg, discovered by Tischendorf in 1859, in the convent of St. Catherine on Mt. Sinai, also the Codex Alexandrinus, in the British Museum, presented to Charles I in 1628, also the Codex Vaticanus, in the Vatican Library, at Rome, also the Codex Ephraemi Syri Rescriptus, now in the National Library at Paris, all make this passage read, "At the end of the times." These same authors (with the exception of the latter), and many others, make Hebrews 1: 2 read, "At the end of these days," rather than, "in these last days." These proofs are taken from Eyre and Spottiswoode's Variorum edition of the Bible.

1 John 2: 18. "Whereby we know that it is the last time." We can hardly think that John believed that was the last time in the world's history, for it has continued near two thousand years since then. If he did, we can not accept the idea that inspiration led him into that error.

Jude 18. This is connected with the previous verse and on back to the fourteenth, which speaks of the Lord coming with "ten thousands of his saints."

Galatians 4: 4. "But when the fullness of the time was come God sent forth his Son." The clear meaning here is that when the time prophesied of had come God sent his Son. It has no reference at all to the last days.

There are other texts that refer to our time, such as Revelation 14: 6 and Isaiah 18: 5, that Mr. Haupt did not quote; but as we will discuss them hereafter we pass them by, stopping only to state that not one of these texts will locate the latter days in any other time but ours and on to the end. His effort, then, to pave the way for the fulfillment of Daniel 2: 28, 44 in the days of Christ fails, utterly fails. Unless he can move that point he knows his case is lost. Let us then proceed to its examination.

A LATTER-DAY KINGDOM.

Daniel 2: 28-45. "But there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets, and maketh known to the king Nebuchadnezzar what shall be in the latter days. . . . And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, . . . the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter."

Space will not permit reprinting all these verses, and so we will get the gist of the matter as follows:

THE DREAM.

"Thou, O king, sawest, and beheld a great image . . . head was of fine gold, his breast and his arms of silver, his belly and thighs of brass, his legs of iron, his feet part of iron and part of clay. Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and break them to pieces. . . . and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain and filled the whole earth."

THE INTERPRETATION.

"Thou art this head of gold. [Kingdom number 1.] And after thee shall arise another kingdom [number 2] inferior to thee, and another third kingdom of brass [number 3], which shall bear rule over all the earth. And the fourth kingdom [number 4] shall be strong as iron: . . . thou sawest the feet and toes, part of potter's clay, and part of iron, the kingdom [number 5] shall be divided; but there shall be in it the strength of the iron, . . . And as the toes of the feet were part of iron, and part of clay, the kingdom [number 6] shall be partly strong and partly broken. And whereas thou sawest iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men: but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay. And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, . . . and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, . . . thou sawest that a stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, . . . God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter."

From the above we see that the stone represented the kingdom which the God of heaven has to set up; and it was to be the especial thing which it is said should be "in the latter days." Clearly the image represented the governments of men to the end of time. The image was complete even to the toes. During the days of these toes, or very near the end of the world, God would set up his kingdom nevermore to be destroyed, nor should it be left to other people as was the case nineteen hundred years ago. It would finally become catholic (universal), and fill the whole earth.

In the above interpretation we have notice that there were six kingdoms mentioned. In the days of the sixth and last, divided into ten, was the divine one to be set up. While the image was yet standing, before the kingdoms of this world shall have become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ, God was to set up this kingdom.

Before proceeding further let us hear what Mr. Haupt has to say about this text. "He then foretells the four universal empires, Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome, the last being subdivided into provinces, not kingdoms. In the days of these kings, 'The stone was cut out of the mountain.' That is, before any of the four should be totally destroyed, and during the fourth."

Was not each of the four subdivided into provinces? How did Greece or Persia differ from Rome in that regard? (See Esther 1:1; 9:3; and Daniel 8:20-22, as well as history.) Mr. Haupt's cunning on this point reveals his weakness. Why should he attempt to presume upon the ignorance of his readers if this were not so? But we will give him the benefit of the doubt, that he did not know of Persia being divided into provinces and perhaps Greece also, otherwise we would have to consider him insincere.

How could the kingdom be set up in the days of all those kingdoms he mentioned and yet in the time of the fourth? His argument seems contradictory here. Does he mean to extend the authority of the "Holy Catholic" church back of Christ to Greece and Persia and Babylon? If so, how about the "great commission"? Is that what is meant by these kings? If so, what did he mean when he said: "While I glory in being an American, the church that can claim my allegiance must show its authority in unbroken succession from the King at Jerusalem 33 A. D.?"

If he did not mean that, why did he say: "Before any of the four were totally destroyed"? Or, if he had used only the other expression, "during the fourth kingdom," then we would press him for an explanation of the term in the text, "these kings," in the plural.

But he continues: "The ten was seen to grow, and this carries it beyond the ten divisions [Did each province have a king, and were there only ten of them?] when it becomes the most powerful kingdom in the world, and will increase until all the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord. It shall 'never be destroyed' shall 'never be left to other people,' and shall 'stand for ever.'"

The primitive church was left to other people, as every one knows. Jesus said in the temple to the "chief priests and elders of the people" (Matthew 21:23): "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof."—Verse 43. History records this as a fact. The primitive church was composed of Jews exclusively. Afterward the gospel went to the Gentiles, who, for a time, brought forth proper fruits, until they were "turned unto fables." But the kingdom of Daniel 2 was not to be left to other people. The stone kingdom could not therefore have been the primitive church.

Mr. Haupt refers to this matter in another place and we will couple it with this and get it all together.

My comment on the above text was: "From the above we learn that in the latter days a divine church or kingdom was to be set up. This latter-day kingdom was not to be thrown down nor given to another people. It could have no reference to the primitive church of Jesus Christ, as some think, for that was thrown down and the entire flock was destroyed. (See Acts 20:29.) They turned away their ears from the truth. (See 2 Timothy 4:4.) Only a little while was the light with them. (See St. John 12:35.) The kingdom was taken by force with violent hands. (See Matthew 11:12.) Jesus said: 'The kingdom of God shall be taken from you and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof.' (See Matthew 21:43.)"

In the above sentences is couched the very long yet clear doctrine of the "apostasy." I had neither space nor disposition to notice that doctrine in full, but that little was enough to bring out some dangerous epithets from my opponent,—dangerous to his Christianity. He says: "Did ever a religious teacher more falsely handle the word of God!! Take the passages in any order you please and you must convict this 'elder' of lying and misrepresentation."

Some of the few pebbles from the millstone of truth seem to have struck our reviewer; and while it was to be expected that he would remonstrate some on being hit, yet we scarcely expected him to hurl opprobrious epithets at his opponent who honestly differs from him, after saying: "In it all we have endeavored to speak the truth in love, for only as love is manifest will men listen to the truth." He seems to have gone off on a tangent merely at a reference to passages of scripture! And after thus venting his feelings, he proceeds to notice the texts I referred to, "beginning with the last and returning to the first," but touches them very lightly. In his revision he arrays them differently. In it some former texts he omits, and his arguments differ, but the thought is the same so far as I can see.

Matthew 21:43. "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof."

Of this verse Mr. Haupt says: "That kingdom was to be taken from the Jews, not Christians." A fatal admission. That is our position exactly. Though the church continued for a time, first among the Jews and composed of Jews, it was afterward taken to the Gentiles. But the kingdom of Daniel was not to be left to another people—not to be left to the Gentiles. Or if established among the Gentiles it was not to be left to the Jews. The Latter Day Saints' position is substantial and immovable, while that of the Episcopal Church is faulty in many respects.

Matthew 11:12. "And from the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force."

Mr. Haupt repeats the two words till now, and comments: "That is 32 A. D. Nearly a year before that, Jesus said to Peter, 'Upon this rock I will build my church and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.' As the church was not then founded, the kingdom here used could not refer to it."

To what else could Jesus have referred than to the church, a work began by John the Baptist? What did Jesus mean in Matthew 4:23: "And Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom"? This was at the very beginning of Jesus' ministry. The idea that the church was not founded until after the year 32 A. D. is wide of the mark, for the reason that God did not have two organizations in the world, one the kingdom, the other the church. His distinction between the church and the kingdom is wide of the mark. Each referred to the one work of God which began with John the Baptist, and was organized in good working order during the lifetime of Christ, but perhaps not perfected until he "ascended up on high" and gave certain gifts and officers to the church. That there was a church long before Pentecost is evident from the statement of Jesus to his disciples (Matthew 18:17): "And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church." That this kingdom that had suffered violence from the days of John the Baptist was not in heaven but upon earth is evident from the fact that no violence could injure it in heaven. Mr. Haupt and myself both believe that the church was divine, then where is there room for another divine work? The expression, that the kingdom would be taken "by force," certainly is against his position of succession, and in favor of an apostasy.

St. John 12:35, 36: "Then Jesus said unto them, Yet a little while is the light with you. Walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you: for he that walketh in darkness knoweth not whither he goeth. While ye have the light, believe in the light, that ye may be the children of light."

Of this text Mr. Haupt says: "There is here no reference to the primitive church. The words are spoken to Jewish unbelievers and not to Christians." In what respect was the light with the unbelieving Jews? Was it not that it was shining about them? Shining in the darkness and yet the "darkness comprehendeth it not"? We, too, believe Jesus was speaking to the unbelieving Jews and of the truth as that light. According to Mr. Haupt's theory of succession, was there ever a time when the Jews could not have walked in that light? The facts are, the light of the gospel was taken away. It was to be with them only a short time. Mr. Haupt thinks the light was to be taken away from the Jews and not the Christians; but Jesus uses the word nation. The kingdom was to be given "to a nation," evidently meaning the Gentiles. But that does not help his position on Daniel 2:44 very much.

2 Timothy 4:1-4: "I charge thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom; preach the word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long-suffering and doctrine. For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears; and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables."

Mr. Haupt says of this text: "These words are written of the church in Ephesus to whose elders

Paul also addressed the words of the passage in Ephesians 1:10." But were these words written of the Ephesians? Where is the proof of it? This letter was written to Timothy instructing him in his ministry, and speaking generally of the church wherever he might go. Paul had written of the work in various places and mentioned that all "Asia was turned away from him." He had mentioned the men that had opposed him in various places. He had predicted what should be the general religious condition in the "last days," and to guard against that condition he charged him to "preach the word," to "reprove," to "rebuke," and "exhort" with "doctrine," etc. (Verse 2.) In verse 3 he tells him in prophecy that the time will come when they "will not endure sound doctrine." There is no hint here that he meant only the Ephesians. Paul continues: "They shall turn away their ears from the truth and shall be turned unto fables." Thus the apostasy is spoken of clearly, and positively, leaving no room for doubt. It was to be accomplished by teachers sent by the church instead of by the Lord. This text describes very nicely those churches who do not believe in present revelation and a divinely called ministry, and it applies elsewhere than in Ephesus.

Acts 20: 28-30: "Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood. For I know this, that after my departure shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock. Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them."

We are willing to admit with Mr. Haupt that this was spoken to the elders of the church at Ephesus, and perhaps those of Miletus also (see verse 17). We are also agreed with Mr. Haupt that "in a broad sense these two passages describe conditions in many parts of the Catholic Church." Where is the place and when was the time since the dark ages began, when it did not describe all classes of Catholics to a more or less degree, so much so that the entire flock of God was destroyed? From the fact that they are not now and have not for centuries been in harmony with the primitive church in doctrine, organization, or gifts of the Spirit shows the apostasy to be complete and the church rejected. In fact it is not at all necessary now to appeal to the Scriptures to prove such a condition was to come as we see all about us in a very tangible form. However, the Scriptures having pointed out the conditions before they came, our confidence in God is increased, and our trust in his future promises fully assured.

Now we come to the climax of the brotherly kindness with which he fancied himself possessed in his preface: "In it all I have endeavored to speak the truth in love, for only as love is manifest will men listen to the truth." Mr. Haupt exhibits that in the following: "Can any one imagine the writer of page 161 [the one mentioning the foregoing references on the apostasy] was an honest man? If he so deliberately deceives in one place, will he not in all that suits his case?" This we pass without much comment, stopping only to remark that one can be honest and not "deliberately" deceive, and yet differ from Mr. Haupt. He continues: "As we have shown he had falsely handled the word of God throughout the book." The reader of these pages will have discovered how much truth there is in that statement. Not one text has he moved from the place I used it, or given it a better interpretation. Well does he say: "By their fruits shall ye know them." He says: "If I had never doubted the mission of Joseph Smith before I should be compelled to do so now. For any system of religion that must resort to such methods to prove its position can not be of God." In other words, anything not in harmony with his manner and mode of interpretation must not be of God. That is merely begging the question again. He is assuming his position to be true, and because I mentioned the apostasy and gave Bible references I am not honest and "deliberately deceived." The point at issue is whether the church has continued in succession since Christ or whether it departed from the faith. Am I not entitled to bring whatever proofs I choose in support of my position? Let him notice the proofs and not descend to crimination. Matthew 7: 1, 2 might be read with profit. If I were desirous of using such false wisdom as that we have just noticed I could say: "If I had never before doubted the authority of the Episcopal Church I would now be compelled to do so, for any system of religion that must descend to such method to overthrow an opponent must have nothing better to present." His reasoning is faulty and his insinuations and false accusations are unchristian. I charge it only upon him. His church must not be held to his error unless they indorse or condone it. Such a heart is very likely to be void of that good Spirit that leadeth into all truth, and that class will be very apt to reject the mission of Joseph Smith. This is more apt to be the reason for his refusal than the one he assigned.

At any rate one would hardly expect Mr. Haupt to accept the divine calling of Joseph Smith with the misunderstanding he seems to have of his work, as the following will show: "The Latter Day Saints claim that a revelation to a prophet must pass the scrutiny of all the 'quorums,' before it becomes binding upon the conscience of members of the church. But this is the prerogative of the Catholic Church, for the authority which Christ gave the apostles was for 'alway even unto the end of the world.' Therefore J. Smith should have presented his new revelations for such inspection and not have left it to judges whom he himself appointed." It seems that we must repeatedly remind our opponent that he does not represent our faith correctly. With a misunderstanding of our position, how could he be expected to accept the work of Joseph Smith? According to our faith and practice not only must a new revelation pass the scrutiny of the officers of the church, but the membership of the church as well, as they are represented by delegates in the general conferences. What reason then has he for saying: "To judges whom he himself appointed"? In only a very few instances does the president of the church have anything to do with the appointment of the officers of the church. Not five in a hundred, and perhaps not half so many; and even those must be indorsed by the General Conference. It is a well known fact in our history that the first witnesses to the work of Joseph Smith were not chosen by himself. Latter Day Saints have for years used that fact as a proof of his sincerity. But as to the authority of the Catholic Church to scrutinize all revelations, they lost that centuries ago when they closed the canon of scripture, if not before.

The Recluse.

The world's broad highway runs not by my door.

Long since I turned my weary steps aside,
Seeking some refuge where I might abide
All undisturbed by noise and dust and glare,
See with clear vision through a purer air,
And struggle onward with the throng no more.

Here will I dwell, I cried, and breathe content,
And think high thoughts, and utter words whose flame
For ever shall enshrine a noble name;
And they who still the hurrying highway choose,
Hearing, shall ease their feverish haste and muse,
"Are these things good for which our souls are spent?"

So dwelled I many years. And so I thought
To serve humanity, yet dwell apart;
Till one came by, fresh from the busy mart,
And, wond'ring, said, "Fair sir, the distant plain
Hears not your message. You are wise in vain.
On the far highway travelers heed you not!"—Selected.

Are We Thinking.

Life has but one springtime. It is the opportunity which bears no slighting—the years which must for good or ill abide with us until death closes our earthly pilgrimage. And can we with safety say that even this is the end of the mighty influences then started? Shall the seed then planted yield no further harvest? Who shall answer a question of such tremendous import?

"As a man thinketh so is he," are the words of inspiration. But is not all thought the result of either direct inspiration or of seed planted in the mind?

In his "Summer gathering for winter's needs," Dr. Miller, you will remember, says:

"In the summer of childhood and early youth the gathering and storing must be done largely by others, not by the persons themselves. This puts a tremendous responsibility on those who must do this work and furnishes a mighty motive for diligence and faithfulness. They should teach truth with conscientious carefulness. They should train mind and heart with all wisdom. They should seek the most perfect discipline of character in those they are training."

And now we want to bring this plainly-stated fact (for fact it is) right home to the mind and heart of each father and mother in the church who has son or daughter to educate; but especially those who have sons or daughters of an age when they contemplate sending them from home in order that they may obtain better educational advantages than home schools afford. This brings us direct to the subject in hand: Are we thinking? and, if so, what is the character of our thoughts? We are sending them from home for the purpose of having seed planted in their minds, and in their hearts as well. If we are thinking, has this thought come to us?

"The personal element tells in the formation of character. No conceivable advantages of endowments or appliances and no prestige of position should make a Christian parent willing to place son or daughter in an undevout atmosphere, for scholastic training."

The son or the daughter is being sent from home—the home in which the gospel has been taught and honored—for the purpose of educational advantages. We are told by inspiration that "the glory of God is intelligence," hence our children must not grow up in ignorance, but must have every advantage we can afford them of acquiring an education. Moreover we are commanded to seek learning by study and by faith as well as words of wisdom out of the best books. This desire then, we find is not only natural but commendable and in direct harmony with the will of God. But there is much in connection with it demanding thought. Are we thinking?

Addison has said, "Plato describes the supreme being thus: 'Truth is his body and light his shadow.' If we accept this definition there is nothing so contradictory to his nature as error and falsehood." Plato was a heathen, and yet can we gainsay the truth of this poetic conception?

"The glory of God is intelligence, or in other words light and truth," are the words of direct inspiration.

Where shall we send our boy? our girl? is the question. just at this time confronting many parents of our faith. There is Graceland to be sure—I would like to patronize that institution. But it is rather far away and then—well, to be honest Graceland is not an endowed institution, and, compared with many I might name, has few advantages. I want my boy to have the very best I can possibly afford to give him.

And for this desire we honor you. It is what every true parent desires for his child. But have we earnestly thought what is the best, and where it is to be obtained? You are not with Pilate, asking, "What is truth?" You are a firm believer in the gospel restored by the angel—nay, you are more than a believer, for you have many times testified that you know it is true. This being the case, in what light ought Graceland to appear to you when you remember that throughout our entire land there is not another educational institution where our peculiar faith is honored, or we as a people are understood. Not one, where we are even recognized as being Christians. Have you thought what effect this is to have on your boy and has this other question, which if possible goes deeper even than this one, what assurance have I that minds so clouded upon matters so vital to the interests of time and eternity, can clearly discern the truth in other things come to you? The spirit of truth, capable of leading and guiding into all truth, was one of the precious blessings bestowed only upon the followers of the Master: "Whom the world can not receive" are his own words concerning it.

Do not for a moment suppose that we would even intimate that as a people we have a monopoly upon truth. So far from it, the words of the Master are as true of us to-day as of his followers when he said: "The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light." Not that God would have it so, but we are so slow to learn.

We do mean, however, to say, using the words of Horace Bushnell, that "That man has lived to little purpose who has not learned that what the great world pities and its teachers disallow, even though mixed with weakness, is many times deepest in truth and closest to the real sublimities of life and religion."

That, as a rule, we are pitied, yes, often held in scorn and contempt by the great world and its teacher, needs no argument of ours to establish. Can this fail to exert an influence upon our children when manifested by those they are looking up to as teachers and guides?

And this brings us to consider the personal element which is so strong a force in the formation of character; for be it remembered that as a rule the character of our boys and girls is not formed at the ordinary age of leaving home for school.

For instance, let us consider the probable influence exerted by the character of those who have generously endowed some particular university or college—it may be the very one which we desire our boy should attend, and the desire was first aroused in our mind because of its splendid equipment. And this equipment was made possible by the liberal endowment of one whom all honest, conscientious men regard—putting it very mildly—with distrust and suspicion. And yet what more natural than that this man be well spoken of, and his doubtful ways condoned, because his liberality has blinded the eyes and closed the lips to any condemnation of his methods upon the part of those who have received them? The young are naturally hero-worshippers. This man to a certain extent is held up as a hero, and his influence permeates the atmosphere of their school life. Is it such as you wish your boy to absorb? Such as you would have dominate his life? Not long since the following met our eyes in the daily paper, and as it is public property, and so well illustrates the point to which we wish to call your attention, we use it:

"Yes, Mr. Harriman is a very rich man, and he has very strong capital behind him. His associates are the richest and the ablest financiers in New York, but he has no friends. He has no chums; nobody ever seeks his society for entertainment or amusement. Nobody would go out with Harriman for a good time. His home life is ideal. He has a most delightful family, who are devoted to him. His daughter Anne, a girl of 19 or 20, is his most intimate companion. He takes a great interest in children, particularly boys who are compelled to earn their own livelihood as he was. If you want to hear anything good of Harriman, leave Wall Street and go up to Tenth Street and Avenue A, where he is the backer of the boys' club which has nine thousand or ten thousand members. He takes as much interest in that club as he does in his railroads and sort of lets himself out there to relieve the strain of the street. People down here admire his ability, recognize his influence, respect his power and fear his vengeance, but they do not love him. But those East Side boys do, and he can do no wrong in their eyes."

Mr. Harriman is a man too well known to the business world and to the reading public to need any comment from us, hence we only need ask, nor do we wish this man (and others of like tyrannical, unscrupulous habits) to be loved by our boys, but have we thought—are we thinking of the probable danger of this? What influence in the years to come will this man's character exert upon these ten thousand East Side boys who love him, and in whose eyes he can do no wrong, is a question that concerns every lover of his race, but surely it concerns us less than what will be the personal influence of those into whose hands we intrust our boys and girls. Do they love and honor truth and have they the courage of their convictions which will enable them to stand firmly in its defense?

"Truth," says Luthardt, "is by its very nature intolerant, exclusive; for every truth is the denial of its opposing error."

MURRAY, Kentucky, June 21, 1907.

Editors Herald: Will say I still contend for "the faith once delivered to the saints," and in contending for the faith I have found it necessary for me to manifest that faith by my works. That is, I must make my faith reflect by my works. I have learned long ago that "faith without works is dead," and it is surely true that a dead faith will not save any one. I sometimes think that some do not know what a living faith is, so I will present my views, and ask to be corrected if I am not right.

First, surely a living substance will show signs of life by its activity.

I remember one time I had about eight hundred bushels of wheat threshed out wet, and by the advice of some I sacked it up at the thresher and set it away in my barn thinking it would dry out; but in about ten days I went to look at it and it smelled so badly that it did not appear that it could ever be used for anything. I found it still wet and not dried out a bit, so I took some of it to a mill man thinking I could sell it to him to feed to his hogs; but he told me as soon as he smelled of the wheat he would not give me twenty-five cents for the whole eight hundred bushels of wheat. He said hogs would not eat it. So on my way back home I thought over the matter I knew I was in need of the wheat. I had not been in the church long and I thought, Here is a chance to test my faith, so I promised the Lord if he would preserve my wheat I would give him one tenth as tithing, and I would do all I could, and we would work together in saving the wheat. So I hauled the wheat to a school-house, and poured it all in there on the floor. I went every day and changed that wheat from one side to the other. I believed from the very first, and never doubted but what the wheat would be preserved and so it was. I sold the wheat to the same man that told me at first he would give me twenty-five cents for the whole eight hundred bushels. He paid me two cents on the bushel more for that wheat than he paid any one else that year for wheat, and what I exchanged for flour he gave me two pounds to the bushel more flour than he did any one else that year. Then to further test the wheat I had twenty bushels ground by itself, and I can say that it was the best flour I think I ever saw. So it is plain to be seen what my faith did by my works. I am just as sure as I ever was about anything that God preserved that wheat for me, and true to my promise I paid the tenth of that crop of wheat to the Bishop of the church, and in doing so I am sure it was paying it to the Lord just as I promised I would do.

I have seen other things done by faith, such as the sick healed, and the lame made to walk, and the blind to see, and evil spirits cast out of men, but none of the above was done by faith and faith only. So I conclude it is just as the Bible says: By works is faith made perfect. Some will say "Faith is the gift of God." Yes, it is, and it is made perfect by works, or in other words kept alive by works. Works are just as essential to the life of faith as the spirit is to the life of the body. The body without the spirit is dead so faith without works is dead. Also when I think over the past I remember the little seed of faith that was planted in the heart of Joseph Smith, and see what faith has done by works, I conclude it must be the faith once delivered to the saints; and as that faith has been planted in the hearts of men at different times and ages of the world, it has always proved itself by activity. It shows signs of its life, or of being a living faith. There never was but one faith, and there never will be, so if we want to be in the faith let us work in harmony with God and the faith will naturally come and continue to live as long as we work in harmony with God. We are coworkers together with God. If you remember, Christ said he worked and his Father worked. So must we if we ever expect to reign with him in glory. So I believe in our contending for the faith we should see that it is a living faith, and such faith grows like the mustard-seed, and if it grows it will bring forth fruit at the proper time. So I would advise all Saints to work as well as have faith. If we see a thing is needed to be done, and we believe we can do a thing, let us go to work and help do it. If it is to help a brother or sister that needs help, help him or her. If it is to pray for some one, pray for him. If it is to bring our tithes and offerings in to the storehouse of the Lord, bring them. Do not keep back part of them till we get in the notion we can spare a few more dollars! What right have you to keep back part of your tithes? God says a tenth is his, and I believe we should let him have it when it comes due, and it is due every time we get the money till we pay it all up; then we can do as we please with the nine tenths that is ours. I have been appointed to help collect tithes in the district, so send them in. C. L. SNOW.

MILWAUKEE, Wisconsin, June 18, 1907.

Editors Herald: I am glad to be able to pen you a few lines from this great city (376,000). I went to Kenosha a week ago last Saturday and was made welcome at the home of Bro. and Sr. C. B. Woodstock, who had kindly invited me to come and hold meetings in their home. We held four services and got acquainted with several of their intimate friends one of whom ordered an Inspired Translation.

We are glad, however, that we found another Saint in the place, Sr. Samuel Isen, who with her genial husband made me feel at home. Bro. Woodstock had searched them out before I came.

We came here a week ago Wednesday, and having the address of Bro. and Sr. Fred V. Dreyer, were soon made at home with them. We were happily surprised to find that Bro. and Sr. John Riner (formerly of the Fox River Branch of Appleton, Wisconsin,) and family had moved here, and they together with Sr. Emma (Pike) Hoyler, who has lived here now some years, make seven Saints in all that we have been able to find. Now, if there are any of the Saints that know of other scattered Saints in either Kenosha or Milwaukee, I truly desire that they will furnish me their names at once. There has been a family by the name of Gillick or Gillete who claimed to be members of the Reorganization, but thus far Bro. Dreyer has failed to locate them. We understand the family consisted of father, mother, two boys, and one girl. Now, we especially desire that if they are known to any of the church, they will not delay writing to Mr. Fred V. Dreyer, 309 Madison Street, Milwaukee, or the writer at his home address, Box 76, Evansville, Wisconsin.

We are glad to report that we have organized a Sunday-school to be known as the First Sunday-school of Milwaukee, Wisconsin. Bro. Fred V. Dreyer is superintendent. We are thankful to report that this little band of Saints are experienced in branch work and Sunday-school, and consequently we hope will escape some of the disagreeable experiences that are sometimes had. I see I have forgotten to mention one other family, Sr. J. W. Townson, who joined the church at St. Louis some twenty-two years ago, but who has to some extent fallen in with the Utah church, and her children have become members, and she is undecided what to do. We did what we could to turn on the light, and we still hope that she may see the truth, and follow the church with true succession according to the book of Doctrine and Covenants. We hope that by lives of sacrifice and saintly living, this little band of Saints may be able to lay a lasting foundation for our work in this great city. Any of the elders of our State or neighboring State passing through will just let Bro. Fred V. Dreyer know, and there will be a chance to sound the gospel note. Next week the writer expects to be in Sparta, and out in the neighborhood called Burnes, where we have an opening and four loyal Saints.

JASPER O. DUTTON.

MACEDONIA, Illinois, June 17, 1907.

Editors Herald: I am grateful to be permitted to again address a few lines to your interesting columns, and to say that I am striving to perform my duty in my field of labor. I am being blessed with that degree of liberty in presenting the word of God that comes to those who are in the discharge of duty, and it is that which brings sweet peace and consolation to all those who are coworkers with the Master. I would like to hear from any of the Saints in the South-eastern Illinois District who are living away from the branches, where there is a church or schoolhouse that is open for preaching; or if you can not get one of these, and will open up your home and get your neighbors to come out, we will come and preach to them when we have an opportunity. It is the mission of those who are sent by General Conference to warn the world, and we ask the coöperation of all the Saints in this great work, in order that we may have the consolation of knowing that we have done our whole duty when the Master shall call us home to rest. The district has been organized many years, and much labor has been performed by many of the faithful ministry of the church, and yet there is much labor to be done, and as much to be performed as in the past, and many localities where the fullness of the gospel has never been presented, and thousands who have never heard the message. We should be interested in everybody, and have a burning desire to see them saved in the kingdom of God; and we should remember that it is declared that the message is for every nation, kindred, tongue, and people. You can greatly assist us in reaching many precious souls with the light, who are walking in darkness, and we will be pleased to hear from you at any time, and all mail will reach us soon if addressed to Holden, Missouri, and we will be glad to answer any that may write me in regard to this work. So please do not be backward, either in writing or in making an effort to have the work presented to your neighbors and friends. I call your attention to the word of the Lord in Doctrine and Covenants 85: 22: "Behold I sent you out to testify and warn the people, and it becometh every man who hath been warned, to warn his neighbor; therefore, they are left without excuse, and their sins are upon their own heads." And again we are commanded to let our light shine, and there is no better way to do this than to have it preached to your neighbors, and then live up to it so they can see your good works. One way to make your home pleasant for the missionaries, is to make the best effort you can to secure the attention of your friends and acquaintances to the gospel. We are now occupying in a new place that was opened up by Bro. David Smith one year ago, where several were baptized by him; and we are glad to report that the surroundings are encouraging, and we feel glad to labor where the people have a desire to hear and understand the word of God. The enemy has been working hard to overthrow the good which has been done. A debate was held between Bro. Smith and one R. P. McKinley, a Campbellite, on church propositions; but our side gained the victory—so say many who attended the debate. Personally, I feel excellent in the work, and never felt more hopeful of success when the struggle is over. I pray God to bless all his people throughout the district, and I would like to see all so walk that the old gospel fire may burn in your hearts to that extent that there may be a revival of the work such as you never realized before. It is our privilege to come up higher and live nearer the Master.

I hope the above exhortation may be heeded by all in order that we may have a feast of good things from the Lord this year. We feel our weakness without the guiding hand of the Master, but our experience has taught us to trust him at all times in our work, and we ask you to pray for us.

I write this for the purpose of giving a word of encouragement to the district where I am pleased to be permitted to labor another year; and as our association together in the past has been pleasant, I hope it may continue to increase, and that all the ministry may help each other to build up the work. Bro. F. M. Davis is your Bishop's agent, who will be pleased to receipt you for tithes and offerings. Address Thompsonville, Illinois, R. F. D. No. 6. Please do not neglect to keep this part of the gospel law, and God will bless you. With love to all, I still remain,

Your kind brother in the faith,
F. M. SLOVER.

STOCKPORT, England, June 6, 1907.

Dear Herald: I now take the liberty of writing a few lines to you to let you know how we are getting along in this part of the Lord's vineyard. We have a little upper room in which we meet to learn more of the Master's commands and teachings. Our late president (Bro. George Baty) was the means of our branch being organized, and although he is on your side of the mighty deep (Brooklyn), he has left footprints on the gospel sands that can never be washed out. May God bless him and his dear wife, and may we strive to take hold of the plow where our brother left off, and never look back. Our town has nearly one hundred thousand inhabitants, and we have only twenty-three out of that number on our records. Three of our members live five miles out of town, so you will see that there is plenty of work for the Saints in Stockport. Our late president's mantle fell on our Bro. W. Worth, an energetic, God-fearing young man with whom it is a pleasure to labor; and I feel confident that with such a leader God will help us, if we will only keep true to the faith once delivered to the saints. We have had some very trying times. The sickness among the members has been severe, but I feel to thank God for his kindness in removing the same; but more do I feel to praise his name for lifting the cloud that has so long been keeping us from displaying that love that is necessary to keep harmony in the church of Jesus Christ. If only we could see that where there is no love existing, there can be no blessings, I think we should be more careful of wounding our brothers and sisters. I pray that God will fill us with that spirit of love that will enable us to bring about the unity of the faith which is so necessary at this time; and although young in years and in church work, I feel that we, as Latter Day Saints, are more responsible than any other religious body on God's footstool for the bringing about of unity. We have now a mission started at Denton, five miles out of Stockport, where three of our members with their families and friends are holding forth to God's honor and glory with Elders T. Brien and E. Nixon of Manchester in charge. Our Utah friends are holding meetings in the neighborhood, and have increased their numbers in a very short time to about ninety members. Some of their members tried hard to persuade one of our Denton sisters not to join the Reorganized Church. When they knew that she had been baptized they begged of her not to tell the other girls at the works for fear that they would get to know of the two bodies and the differences between them. But thank God she was baptized last Tuesday, May 28, along with another sister at Gorton, near Manchester, and both were confirmed June 2 at our Stockport Branch, sacrament being administered after confirmation, where the Spirit was much in evidence.

For the benefit of our brothers and sisters who have crossed over to your shores (five having crossed), I will say that the hatting trade is still bad, but the cotton trade is still good.

Dear HERALD, I am very happy in this latter-day work. God has blessed me wonderfully since I obeyed the gospel call. I can not begin to tell you of his love and his blessings. They have been so numerous. My wife and three of my children have obeyed and are happy in the work. I wish I could speak the words that are in my heart. I feel that if I could put them down in ink, I could make the hearts of your readers leap for joy. I was fifteen years in the Methodist chapel choir, and afterwards confirmed in the Church of England, and kept trying to be a good lad, but the Devil got the best of it every time. Since I took hold of the rod of iron the Devil has had a much harder task, and, God being my helper, I will be true to the covenant I made in the waters of baptism. My chief desire is to spread the gospel so that others may feel the comforting influence that comes by obedience to God's word. May God bless his word in all lands, and may we love to work for him who has done so much for us is my prayer.

"I gave myself for thee;
What hast thou done for me?"
In gospel love, I am,
Your brother,

DENNISPORT, Massachusetts, June 24, 1907.

Editors Herald: In this branch, as well as in others, one often hears mention made of the old-time prayer-meetings, how spiritual they were, etc. I do not doubt that the old Saints had many seasons of rejoicing, and I believe that they also had poor meetings. Results depend upon conditions, and it is very evident that our weekly prayer-meetings will be about the same as we have lived during the week. It is folly to think that simply entering the church door will spiritualize us. God blesses us every hour; but what might be termed special blessings are granted us upon condition of our being able to receive them—upon condition of our humble, faithful walk before him. Whether in the past days or the present age, a spiritual meeting is the result of fervent prayers and testimonies of pure-minded, consecrated, humble Saints. And in conversing with old members, I learn that when they enjoyed true manifestations it was because everybody was interested in the welfare of everybody, and that there were no big I and little you among them.

About forty years ago it was necessary to dissolve the Dennisport Branch and reorganize it because of iniquity. This act resulted in the withdrawal of some, but those who remained were blessed of God, and one prayer-meeting especially was long to be remembered. The Saints confessed their sins, acknowledged their mistakes, allowed the hard hearts to melt, and so were bathed in tears of rejoicing for three hours.

If, instead of hopelessly folding the hands and sighing for the old-time meetings, the old Saints will unite with the young in establishing peace and good will, there will exist no reason for the Father's withholding his Spirit.

I believe in every gift of the Holy Spirit; I do not believe that one can be substituted for the other: they are all essential. "These gifts. . . never will be done away, even so long as the world shall stand, only according to the unbelief of the children of men," says Moroni, and it seems to me that when there is a dearth of the gifts among us it is because of our unbelief and unfaithfulness.

I like the tone of the HERALD, yet I think it would be improved if it contained more articles from men capable of writing upon leading gospel topics. It is very easy to find printed the opinions of men, the earth is flooded with such confusion:—we want facts, things that are authentic.

May peace and hope be with all the Saints.

RALPH W. FARRELL.

KAUKURA, Society Islands, May 15, 1907.

Dear Herald: On the 3d of May we left Papeete with the intention of going to Takapoto, another diving island farther to the north; but because of calm weather and adverse winds it took ten days to reach this island, and we decided to rest here a while, then at the first opportunity, proceed on our journey to our intended destination. I will write more in detail of our experiences in the near future; but this is to inform our friends that we will not be able to send any mail to them on the June steamer. This leaves us reasonably well, after our experience on the vessel, and in the hands of kind Saints. Our address while in this mission will always be Papeete, Tahiti.

Yours in gospel bonds,

LOS ANGELES, California, June 14, 1907.

Editor Herald: Once more hath God invaded our hearthstone. Without warning he has cut asunder an endearing human tie. As if by magic he has renewed and extended it until it reaches beyond the border. Our babe is dead. He brought sunshine into our home; he took much of it away with him. Still the memory of it is an inspiration to service. With heavy hearts and minds perplexed we face the future.

The "why" of it all is at present a deep and impenetrable mystery. At nine in the morning he was playing in the yard as happy and free as a bird; at five in the evening his lips were silent for ever. An autopsy revealed nothing.

For years, I have been pleading for unselfish living. If aught of selfishness remains God must discover it. One consolation we have, his short experience was care free and full of joy; not even a cloud has momentarily darkened his pathway. His merry laughter and joyous, happy greetings have many times made a rift in the clouds which envelop us. The cause of his going I know not; but if in the lengthening years allotted unto me I can be as serviceable to others as he has been to me, I will not have lived in vain.

With each recurring trial and experience the road seems to grow more heavy, and we query, "Is life worth living?" I can not say. I do not know. The best answer I can give is an unstinted effort to make it so. The contemplated "life to be" lies with God; the life that is, is partly within our keeping. May we fill it to repletion with unselfish, loving service, and trust God for the future. The faintly revealed facts of a reunion with loved ones in another and better sphere of action conserves mental poise, and partly checks the flood of sorrow which surges through our being. Oh! it is so terrible to count the weakening pulsations in the ebb-tide of life, to note the slowly receding life force, to sense the outgoing of an immortal which is dearer, more precious to you than your own life!

I thank God for the privilege to give this precious, noble soul physical expression. His little journey through life was short as measured in days and months, but he filled his mission and who knows but in the day of accounting the effect of his service will be more far-reaching than our own! It is so difficult to take up our work again. The aching void, the silent rooms and nooks, the false and alluring echoes which memory vivifies—all these, aye more, obtrude and bear us down. Surely in the words of the poet, "I would not live away," as life is measured here. With resignation to that which human effort can not correct, and renewed determination to accomplish that which is possible of execution here,

Your brother,

GARDENA, California.

SPRINGFIELD, Missouri, June 14, 1907.

Saints' Herald: As I have not written to your pages for about four years, I thought I would write a few lines. The gospel is just as dear to me as it has ever been; and now that I have entered the field of labor I feel a greater degree of responsibility.

I have the pleasure of laboring with our missionary in charge, Bro. A. M. Baker. We have been doing what good we can by preaching on the public square; while we meet disadvantages and opposition, we trust some good will result from the effort. We find the Utah people represented here.

We are trying to show the people the difference existing between us. They deny polygamy, but when they are pressed closely they will sustain (or try to) the principle, and say that God no longer requires it of them. We hope the time will come when they will see the error of their ways, and turn to the Lord. It is my desire to be always found doing my duty.

I realize my weakness, and desire the prayers of the Saints, especially the ministry, that I may be faithful to the end. Ever praying for the welfare of Zion, I am,

Your brother in Christ,

P. T. PLUMB.

ST. JOSEPH, Missouri, 1907.

Editors Herald: By this means we desire to acknowledge receipt of letters of condolence from our many friends. We thank you kindly for your love and words of cheer and comfort, in our severe trial. While our hearts are made sad and we feel our loss keenly, yet we are not unmindful of the fact that even the sparrows do not fall without the Father's notice. We feel that her work on earth was accomplished, and her mission filled, though her stay on earth was brief indeed. She has only gone home a little ahead of us, there to await our coming, to meet and greet us so dear and sweet, as she so often did on earth, when we returned home.

Some have asked to know of the cause of death. Our answer is, We do not know; and the doctors were puzzled, although the coroner signed the burial permit as "acute pneumonia" the first doctor refusing to assign any specific cause. She was sick but a few hours, and we did not think her condition serious at any time.

She was a hearty and vigorous child, ate a hearty supper, romped and played with her mother until bedtime. We can believe nothing save that the Lord called and she responded.

The Saints here have doubly endeared themselves to us, We shall for ever feel ourselves indebted to them, for their love and kindness. Oh, how beautiful is that soul who has been with and learned of Christ; surely the Lord dwells in the hearts of this people, and we love them, and are content to be and dwell with them. Our work here hitherto was a pleasure and we felt so much at home. Never before in our lives were we so happy and contented, until our loss came. But we do not mourn as those who have no hope; our faith is unshaken; our course is fixed, we feel to say as did the patriarch of old, "The Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away, blessed be the name of the Lord."

If the Lord will only assist us to more fully reflect the Christ life and character, and to fill our mission on earth acceptably to him, we will be content. We invite all to kindly remember us in their prayers.

PT. AUSTIN, June 24, 1907.

Dear Herald: I wish you knew how anxiously we await your weekly visits and with what deep interest we read your pages. But when we tell you that we are among the scattered ones some of your readers will understand. Sometimes, the longing to live where we could go out on the Sabbath day and hear one of the many wholesome and edifying talks given by our elders in different parts of the world becomes so great that we are inclined to feel quite discontented. But it seems to be the will of the Father that we remain here. Perhaps there may be something for us to do here in his name, though our efforts so far seem to have been fruitless. Pray for us that our eyes may be open to the opportunities around us, and that we may have a fullness of his love that will enable us to overcome all difficulties. If people could only be made to see the awful chains of prejudice, and pride, and fear of men, that bind them and shut them from the light, it would be easier to help them. I am keeping the HERALDS containing Elder J. W. Peterson's reply to Reverend Mr. Haupt's criticism and when it is finished I intend to ask our Baptist minister here to read it. He once promised me that he would read anything I might give him, if he had time. I have had some experiences here that I think would be of interest to some of the members of our great family, but am afraid I have already written too much. Just let me say before I close that I am building on the rock, and am proud to be called a Latter Day Saint.

MRS. MARY HUNTER.

WILLOUGHBY, Ohio, June 24, 1907.

Editors Herald: I have not been able to read any in the dear old HERALD on account of my nervous condition, which has been a great trial to me; but I am beginning to improve, and by using a little moderation in mental work and plenty of outdoor work will be all right again.

I am now located in dear old Kirtland. Work here in pretty good condition. Almost all the Saints seem to have a more determined desire to improve the opportunity than I have observed heretofore.

Warm and gentle showers have matted the hills and plains in beautiful green. One's eyes never tire of viewing the picturesque scenes of Kirtland. Associating this with the eventful reminiscences of the past, leads one to believe there is still a future for Kirtland, and God is still watching over it.

My heart yearns to be out in the harvest-field of the Lord, leading honest souls to the Lamb of God. The dear brethren with whom I have been associated in the work are all sweetly remembered by me.

The last two Sabbath mornings I have occupied the sacred stand in the historic old temple, and have felt blessed in the effort. If I have done no one else any good, it has been a little encouragement to feel the old-time vim and vigor of mind in telling the blessed story to the lost and dying world. Wherever my lot may be cast, I hope to be able to do a little good. And as there are many ways in which we can do this, I lack not for opportunity.

It is beautiful to descant upon the moral ethics of the gospel; but far more beautiful to live it. What a glorious rest it must be for those who have spent their life in the army of the Lord to lay the armor off with that triumphant shout, "I have kept the faith."

I have just learned of the death of that grand old soldier, Bro. T. J. Beatty. How often have I heard him say he was anxiously awaiting his summons to join the spirits of just men made perfect through suffering. He has had his share of suffering in the world. May my life's record be as clean as his.

Ever praying for the full fruition of Zion redeemed, I am as ever,

Your colaborer in the holy covenant,
F. J. EBELING.

TOWER, Indiana, June 20, 1907.

Editors Herald: Bro. F. L. Sawley has been in our midst for three weeks. Held meetings in three different places with good attendance and good order. More calls to preach than can be filled by a half dozen men. I have been very busy for three months. Held one meeting at the Harvey Schoolhouse, well attended; at Fredonia, six meetings, with splendid order and good attendance.

The work is looking up in this part of Indiana. The Spirit of God is moving upon the Saints, and the people also. Prejudice is disappearing, and the people are glad to hear the gospel from our people. God bless the ministers who do his will in the vineyard.

Bro. Sawley is the man in the right place. The Saints and people like him as a minister. He will do a good work in these parts. The Leavenworth Branch has bought a schoolhouse, and we have it nearly ready for preaching. Have it seated and papered, and are going to paint it next week. As soon as finished, it will be dedicated. Ministers coming this way, call at our place, Leavenworth Branch.

We are doing lots of work in Indiana. Although I have been put on the superannuated list, have held forty-six meetings since the first of April, and am doing all I can for this work. I feel good in the ministry, and love to work for the Lord.

P. A. FLINN.

ARTHUR, Ontario, June 22, 1907.

Dear Herald: No paper in the world is any dearer to me than this, and it gives me pleasure to speak on its behalf, read its columns, and write a few words now and again. The late article of Bro. Ellis Short on the mining question interested me very much, because I thought he took the right view of money speculation in gold-mine uncertainties. I, too, think it is about time our people were warned of such—what shall I call them—fakes? I was also pleased to note that our General Conference spoke against our representative men engaging in such matters, especially when they are missionaries.

Listen, brethren, to our Methodist friends, and how they censured the ministry of their church at a conference held here at Toronto, Laymen's Association, June 18, as taken from the London Free Press, June 19, headed: "Reverends as sellers of mining stocks":

"It has become a sort of obnoxious thing," said W. E. Page, 'to men in business to have these men call upon us with mining stocks, and oil stocks, and other slippery things, and try to force them on us by the force of the prestige that their title gives them.'

A resolution followed after a heated debate:

"That this conference desires to express itself as of the opinion that any minister in the active work stepping aside from that work be requested to resign from the ministry."

I think they did the right thing, and I also think if we can not be satisfied with what the church allows us, better step down and out of the mission work; for God wants our whole time, no half-hearted service, no dividing of our talents. We can not serve God and Mammon.

I know there is another side to it, that our men make great sacrifices, and all that; but our Lord has said, and acted it out, that the man who accepts the call to go and labor as his missionary is to "forsake all and follow me" else you "can not be my disciple." Brethren, let us awake. The idol, the god of this world, is MONEY. Get it fast; get it easy; get it almost any way; never mind the rights of others! All self, myself, me; look out for No. 1! The whole world is seemingly being baptized with that influence. Talk about Zion and all things common! Things may not be as bad as I see them; but there is so much selfishness it really seems to me as if it is the few that rightly value money. Money is a curse to nine out of ten who get it. Mark the moneyed man as he prospers, and it nearly always follows that as he prospers financially the tendency is to grow selfish, stingy, and often mean. There is an old adage that says, "Many men can stand adversity; but few men can stand prosperity." "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."

God has given us the law of tithing to educate us to advance to a more perfect condition; and that is to be ready, willing at any moment to part with our all; yes, all; nothing reserved. My belief is we are not right with God until we reach that condition that we can cheerfully say: Lord, take all that I have, only let me enjoy that peace that passeth understanding. Be my companion and my friend, and I'll still trust thee to lead me on till my mission is finished.

Many of our people do not rightly value their property and bank account. The more money we have the more opportunity we have to do good; so that it is no sin to be prospered. In fact it seems that it is one of the blessings that follows obedience; but what and where God prospers, let us not forget the dangers that follow prosperity: first, selfishness and greed, and, second, a neglect to observe the demands of the church, the widow's tears and needs, and the orphans' cries.

My letter has drifted into a kind of sermon; but what I have written I have written.

Earnestly yours,
GEORGE BUSCHLEN.

SCITUATE, Massachusetts, June 23, 1907.

Saints' Herald: In reading the church papers one can not help feeling the current of ill nature, envy, contention, and strife felt towards other denominations that do not happen to see things along the same line we do. It seems to be the life of some to make slurring remarks of other teachers of the gospel, and engage in debates. I have in mind a particular meeting which I attended with about one hundred others not of the church, and that meeting kept me from the waters for two years. There were many Christian Scientist members there, and their friends. The elder made a light remark, in a slurring way, about Mother Eddy's church; and I know many would not attend meetings after that evening. How many were turned from accepting the gospel by those few light words, we can not tell. The people at that time were very much in earnest, and interested, many coming miles after a hard day's work.

Paul says, in 1 Corinthians 13, that charity is the best gift. If we can remove mountains and raise the dead, and yet have not that true love in our hearts, it is nothing.

It seems to me we should leave the judging to the great Commoner, who will try us according to our works, not for our fine sermons. The environments of all our lives run along different channels, and we can not force others to see as we do; but we may lead them by love, if our lives are clean.

Yours in the gospel,

JAMES H. HOLMES.

National Soldiers' Home, Tennessee, June 23, 1907.

Dear Herald: I thought I would write a few lines and give the Saints a little idea of what a soldiers' home is. This is one of the finest homes I have been in. As I have been laid up on account of my health, in the Leavenworth home, they offered to pay our way if we would come to the mountains, so seventy-three of us gave our names. The home is at the foot of the mountains. Our water is piped from a spring upon the mountain about three miles, and it is as soft as rainwater. The buildings are all first-class, up-to-date, lighted with electricity; the water is forced all over the home, and into two artificial lakes. I have been working in the hospital ever since I came, and I expect to give the Lord one tenth of all I make while here. If I can not preach I can assist some elder's family, while the elder is in the field.

I would like to ask Bro. Joseph Lane a question. I have read his article in HERALD of June 12, in which he mentions the branch at Pisgah, Iowa. I want to know if Pisgah is in Union County. If so, I used to live there. The Mormons camped there one winter, and they gave it the name.

N. S. DUNNINGTON.

WEBSTER, Ohio, June 21, 1907.

Dear Herald: As I have not seen anything from this field for some time, will write. I have been quite busy since conference. Stopped on my way home at Middletown and Dayton to look after some business there by request of Bro. Greene. Arrived home the first of May. Stayed a few days, laboring in our own branch, then went to Ironton, for ten days. Baptized four, with others waiting our return. Also a new opening awaiting us. Came home again, and then we had the sad duty of assisting at the funeral of our much-beloved brother, T. J. Beatty. One of God's faithful ones has gone to his reward, which we believe to be glorious. On our return home again we were hemmed in for several days by high water, then were called to preach the funeral of Sr. Harvey's child. Then we went to Floodwood by request of Bro. May, president of branch, to assist in adjusting some matters there. Met Bro. Reese Jenkins, who had been there some time preaching, and found that he was well received, the Saints speaking well of him. While he does not spare any who transgress the law, he reaches them in a kindly way, and seems to be very energetic.

After performing my work there I returned to my own branch, doing some work. Came here yesterday, met Bro.

Devore as we are assigned to labor together. Will probably remain here over Sunday, and then move on to other places that are ready for work. Yours in bonds,

S. J. JEFFERS.

LOWER LAKE, California, June 22, 1907.

Editors Herald: Nearly a year has passed since I had the happiness to obey the gospel, through the ministrations of Bro. William Newton; and were it not for the church papers, HERALD, Ensign, Autumn Leaves, and Glad Tidings, I do not know what we should do to keep our hearts in touch with the blessed faith that we (Joseph and I) have had the happiness to embrace. We have had no meetings since Bro. Hinton (priest) left us to live in Willets, Mendocino County. He had presided until May 5, ever since Bro. J. Y. Graumlich (elder) departed for his long rest, last October.

We would be very glad if some gifted elder could come here for some weeks, and stay with us, and preach to the Campbellites and others, who are now listening to the Seventh-day Adventists preach in our district schoolhouse Sundays, and sometimes during the week, evenings.

We have just finished reading Joseph Luff's autobiography. It has been a source of much edification. I wish every one might read it. Every Tuesday the church papers arrive, and I assure you that their contents are eagerly devoured.

Yours in the true faith,

MARIE JULIA T. ADAMSON.

SPERRY, Iowa, June 25, 1907.

Editors Herald: I came here the 22d of June, where I once had a good crowd and good liberty in presenting the word, but now the talk is that they will close the house against me. The Baptists fear for their flock. The question is, "Are you going to organize a church here? If you are, you can't have the house." I will try to have meeting to-night. It may determine whether we can continue the meeting longer or not.

Your brother in gospel bonds,

NEPHI LOVELL.

SYCAMORE, Illinois, June 27, 1907.

Dear Herald: I became a member of the church of Christ September 11, 1902, when I was baptized by Bro. Rushton at Glasgow, Scotland; and was a member of the Hamilton Branch up to the 23d of February, 1907, when I parted with our brother and sisters with whom I spent many a pleasant hour, and have witnessed the power of God in our midst. I know it is his work restored in these last days. I have seen the sick raised by the power of God, when men failed. I hope and trust that the time is not far distant when the honest in heart will obey the gospel, and be led to rejoice with us in the blessings which God has laid up for them that love and serve him. On Sunday, the 2d of June, I had much pleasure in meeting with the Dekalb Saints, and partaking of the sacrament with them. They are very nice people. The Spirit of the Master seems to be with the Saints everywhere alike. I hope that I may be kept faithful to the covenant I made with Christ in the waters of baptism. May the Saints in Hamilton and elsewhere so live that others seeing their good works may be led to glorify our Father, is the prayer of

Your brother in the one faith,

WILLIAM PINKERTON.

WINNIPEG, Manitoba, June 27, 1907.

Editors Herald: The tent-meetings are arousing much interest, and we have daily inquiries respecting the work.

The difference between us and Utah Mormons is now clearly defined, and the city papers give our announcement of services equal space with other denominations. Elder R. C. Evans will be with us from the 7th to 14th inclusive of July. Persons availing themselves of special rates to the Winnipeg Industrial Fair (13th to 20th) will have an opportunity of attending our reunion from 11th to 14th, and of hearing Elder R. C. Evans, with an opportunity of afterwards attending the great fair of Western Canada. The Saints will see that meals are furnished at reasonable rates, and a limited number can secure free bedding. For further particulars address W. I. Arnold, secretary, 656 Victor Street, Winnipeg, or A. F. Henderson, 217 Lipton Street, Winnipeg.

Yours fraternally,

A. DORSETT.

HEBRON, Nebraska, June 25, 1907.

Editors Herald: I left Nebraska City June 16 for Fairfield to visit the Saints and friends there, and to administer to the sick. The sick were blessed, and the Saints strengthened. Bro. Burt Trask's oldest daughter Vada was baptized and confirmed.

At Hebron I preached to the Saints whom we had not visited for over a year. Found them in the faith, ready to hear the word of God.

Our reunion will convene on the 12th of July at Nebraska City. We are looking forward to a good time, and hope to see many of the Saints. There will be water and board on the ground, and plenty of good shade, and tents for all, especially for those who send their orders in time. Come and bring the Spirit and let us have a good time.

W. M. SELF.

SOLDIER, Iowa, June 21, 1907.

Editors Herald: The correction you undertake to make on page 541 of HERALD, June 19, fails to correct.

See HERALD for May 15, first page, where you make Moroni to say, "And whatsoever thing persuadeth to do good, is of me; for good cometh of none save it be of me." Thus making the "me" to refer to Moroni; whereas, by referring to the book of Ether in (Book of Mormon) chapter 1: 94, large edition, from which you make the quotation and by referring to verse 91 of the same chapter, you will see that the "me" is not Moroni, but "Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Father of the heavens and of the earth, and all things that in them are." Quite an important difference you will notice.

In tent-work at the above place, with Bro. Eli Hayer. All goes well.

For the right,

J. C. CRABB.

CHATHAM, Ontario, June 28, 1907.

Editors Herald: I noticed a good editorial in the HERALD columns of June 12 by E. A. Smith on church leaders and tithe-payers, comparing Christ as he organized the church in his day, who lived and died poor, with the spiritual leaders of late years, such as Mrs. Eddy, Dowie, Brigham Young, and others who have all amassed princely fortunes while posing as spiritual leaders and true followers of the carpenter's son; and also speaking in favorable terms of Joseph Smith in the first organization, who never took advantage of church finances but shared the vicissitudes of his brethren and died poor (but a true martyr to his faith; and also speaking of the honorable position of the present Reorganization and of the accuracy with which the funds are handled of all amounts received and expended, and the channels of expenditure, and that the financial records of the church are open for inspection at any time, properly audited by a competent board, and a yearly report published of all money received and expended, to be scanned to satisfy all concerned. Now is it possible to improve on the present system established by our church? Let us reason the matter carefully.

In looking over the last yearly report of the Bishop, I find appointed: 1 bishop, 2 counselors, and 85 Bishop's agents. The largest amount collected by any one agent was $12,385.44; the smallest amount, $41.35. Now, I do not suppose the church authorities have ever asked any agents to account to the Bishop for any more money than he has collected. But in looking over the last report carefully I find that the Bishop declares interest, and I find only one Bishop's agent of all the number who, in handling his collections, declares interest. That one is Elder R. C. Evans, of the London District, Canada. In his last report on $5,773.67 collected, $30.75 interest accumulated on that amount, a little over $5.00 interest on every thousand dollars on that amount, a little over $5.00 interest on every thousand dollars collected. Now if one can do this, why can not others who have access to good banking privileges do accordingly? There are two ways of banking money: Current account with no interest, or savings department with interest. There is keen competition to-day in banking institutions, and any chartered bank of Canada will handle the Bishop's agents' collections in the savings department where, if properly handled, the interest will accumulate. Every month the banks balance their books, and interest is declared on every man's account. Every three months the interest is computed or estimated: after that it is in a position to compound—interest is declared upon interest. These privileges are granted by Canadian banking institutions, and surely the United States can not be behind Canada in such privileges!

I understand most of the agents bank their collections with their own private funds. Now, would it not be better for the general authorities to suggest that every agent who has access to good banking institutions, bank the church money as an agent, separate from private accounts, and seek for the bank that offered the best inducements; and if this were done interest money would accumulate and help to put one or two or even more missionaries in the field to spread the gospel?

There seems to be a spirit of investigation going on in the world to-day, and governments are appointing commissions to investigate financial institutions, and the majority are brought into question, and people have lost faith in many financial concerns which formerly appeared to be solid.

Let us not keep up only the standard achieved by our church in financial lines, but let us progress and embrace every opportunity to better our condition. If one agent can accumulate interest, every agent or collector should take advantage of every opportunity to increase our funds, and all church money be kept separate from private accounts, and then the agent's bank book could be audited along with his church books, and thus give entire satisfaction.

I do not write this in order to put my knowledge against the financial men of the church; but I do it in a spirit of humility, having some knowledge of bank privileges, and also knowing and believing that God, whose all-seeing eye beholds our actions and the intent of our hearts, blesses not only the man who advances the spiritual condition of the church, but also the financial and social condition as well.

STEWART LAMONT.

GERING, Nebraska, July 1, 1907.

Editor's Herald: I have just closed a ten days' meeting here. Interest was fairly good. One lady gave her name for baptism last night. We will administer the rite next Sunday. I have visited Alliance and Belmont recently. The outlook in the latter place is favorable for the extension of the work, due largely to the good character of the Saints in that vicinity. Oh, how I wish the Saints would all live to honoring of their profession!

When I came into this branch, I missed the genial greeting of Bro. D. W. Shirk, whose blameless character and vigilance as president of the branch has done more for the work here than pen may tell. May the blessings of God follow him. Saints of this mission, please do not forget our reunion, which convenes at Bayard, Nebraska, September 17 to 23. You are all invited and requested to be there. Come and let us have a feast of the good blessings the kind Father has for his children.

Yours in gospel bonds,
C. W. PRETTYMAN.

Over the Mountains.

Editors Herald: On the 7th inst., I came here to Provo, Utah, in company with Elder J. F. Curtis, my colaborer, after spending over two weeks in the city of Salt Lake. Provo, about sixty miles south of Salt Lake, has a population of nearly ten thousand, nine tenths of whom are said to be Mormons. It was the home of the late Eliza R. Snow of poetic fame: it is the present home of Reed Smoot, senator-elect, who came near losing his seat on the charge of being an accomplice to crime if not a criminal. With its numerous flowing wells; its irrigating streams traveling in perpetual playfulness from the mountain glaciers, and by which its verdant gardens may be daily inundated; its Eden of flowers of variegated hue; its luscious fruits now in season, make it a delightful habitation from the standpoint of its physical features, to say nothing of its social relations. It has many adobe houses and some very stately residences. In the reading of Parley Pratt's autobiography I notice that he called here going back and forth in the early fifties, from which we determine that it had been started soon after the pioneers reached the valleys of Salt Lake.

Here are the footprints of some of our valiant men. Here is the battleground of the clash at arms between Judge Tanner the Mormon and Bro. Curtis last summer. Here are found some of the fragments of dynamited tabernacle sermons and exploded speculation, the inventions of men of renown, once men of God. Here is where we meet the real old Mormons that have been handed down from Nauvoo, who crossed the plains, who saw the hardships, who followed the fortunes of Brigham. And when I go along the street and see a bent old man or woman, I think of what they have passed through. If it is a woman, I wonder: have you suffered the pangs of polygamy? did your only dear husband for whom you had left all, pierce your heart with the dagger of polygamy? In revolt to your heart, your own known feelings, did you give your husband—he who but a few years earlier had promised to keep himself from all others—over to lust? did you yield to his enticings to sacrifice himself on the altar of licentiousness? Poor creature! Would to God that I could apprise you of the fact, only too true, that the "Josephites," looked upon with disdain and contempt by your leaders and deceivers and by yourself insofar as you have been led by them, compose the church of Christ intact; that it is like the church in the days when amidst the scoffs and frowns of hypocrites you joyfully stepped within its precincts; that it has the same powers and blessings you once enjoyed, but now know only by memory and recollection.

Well did Oliver Cowdery say to the twelve—or was it Pratt?—"the time will come when you will desire to see a day like this and shall not see it." That glorious "day,"

News From Branches

DES MOINES.

Four were baptized on Sunday, June 23. These were members of the Sunday-school and were brought into the church through the school.

The Sunday-school and the Religio have each selected a representative for the new library commission, J. R. Epperson for the former, and J. G. Carpenter for the latter. The branch will likely take action at its first business-meeting.

A class of fairly good size has been started in the normal work, and we expect to see it increased in numbers. We are confident that every one will be greatly benefited by this line of study.

On a recent Sunday while passing along the street we were handed some literature entitled, "Old Theology Quarterly." The literature handed us announced that "Meetings for truth-seekers" would be held every Sunday at a certain public hall in the city. The reading-matter handed us consisted of four sermons as follows: "A cure for infidelity. To hell and back. Who are there. Hope for the recovery of many of them." "The great prison-house to be destroyed. Its 20,000,000 'prisoners of Hope' to be released." "Higher criticism repulsed. The oath-bound covenant." "Selling the birthright. The allegory of Jacob and Esau applied." Des Moines, our capital city, is metropolitan, we believe, to the extent of having nearly every religious "ite" and "ism" represented, and each are crying "lo here, and lo there." And so many of the people are wandering in darkness.

The annual Chautauqua was held in the city the first week in July. Among the prominent speakers present was Doctor J. Wilbur Chapman, who conducted a very successful evangelistic meeting in the city during the early part of the year. The Doctor in his lecture before the Chautauqua, among other things said: "With the existing conditions of to-day the church people should get out into the street and shout the praises of the Lord. This, I believe, is the only way to save the souls of the masses. The people should start from their churches and, forming a procession, march through the streets headed by a brass band which would play the tunes of King Jesus."

In our capital city we have eighty churches, and the city a population of nearly 100,000. What these people do on Sunday was on June 23 estimated by one of the daily papers as follows: 32,000 went to the parks; 9,000 went picnicing; 5,000 went to ball games; 2,000 went fishing. No estimate was made of the number of people who attended the several churches on that day.

Three troops of the Second United States Cavalry transferring from Ft. Snelling, Minnesota, to Ft. Des Moines, Iowa, passed through the city and on the street by our church during the Sunday-school hour, on June 30. This was something out of the ordinary. Soldiers in time of peace excited our curiosity. What would be the excitement in time of war?

A. A. REAMS.

SPOKANE, WASHINGTON.

We merely wish to say that we arrived in our field on schedule time, found all well and doing well in the Queen City of the Inland Empire. Very unlike the Zion land, fruits here give evidence of abundance, peaches, apricots, apples, plums, in fine, all kinds of fruits small and great bid very fair to be an abundant crop. If ye Missourians' mouths water too much, we might be prevailed upon to send you a box or two. However, should any one write in reference to it, please inclose a stamp. W. C. Duncan greeted us on our arrival, he having preceeded us together indeed, when the twelve were installed, the first twelve, in the actual midst of a heaven of pentecostal showers and the most marvelous demonstrations. But with Utah Mormons that day is history unless they repent and receive the ordinances of the gospel at the hands of those who have authority, and unto whom they are under as much obligation as the most superstitious idolator who never heard the name of the unerring Son of Mary.

A special force of missionaries are here attending to these people as a consequence of an intimation in a late revelation. Why should I be restrained from putting myself on record as believing that this special warning has in view one of the two following effects: either the converting or ingathering of many or a large percentage of these people; or, their destruction in a catastrophic manner. We will let it rest here.

Last Sunday six were baptized, Bro. Curtis officiating. Three of them were Mormons. A number of others are near who are likely to obey in a week or two. The weather is now mild and congenial. The atmosphere continuing cold till unusually late this year has deterred street-preaching. Bro. Curtis and the writer called on the mayor here, a Mormon, to obtain his consent to do street-preaching. He gave it, but very reluctantly and after much demurring. Strange that he would hesitate, having been a missionary himself and knowing what their men constantly put up within outside fields.

A number of our members live four miles north of the city on the "bench," which is a flat of land between the main level and the river. They have small plats of fertile soil and depend on fruit-raising, watering their vegetation with the crystal streams having their rise as before stated. It is a most beautiful place in this basin, everything green; the grandeur of Provo Canyon near by and the majesty of the Rockies but a mile distant. Electricity is so cheaply generated by water-power in the mouth of said canyon that even the street lights are of perpetual illumination—burning in the day time. And what an unparalleled display of electrical brilliancy they had for two days last week during a celebration.

Northward in the city is the Brigham Young University, connected with which is Professor N. L. Nelson, who Mormons say is the author of the "first strongly pro-Mormon book published by an international press"; also Joseph B. Keeler, another Mormon author.

Bishop Kelley and Apostle F. A. Smith are in Salt Lake City at present.

My permanent address remains 1037 West Maple Avenue, Independence, Missouri. ALVIN KNISLEY.

An Apology.

Dear Herald: Through your columns I desire to offer an apology to Bro. F. R. Tubb of Toronto, Canada, for the manner in which (in HERALD No. 24, vol. 53) I offered criticism to an article written by him (entitled, "If a comet should strike the sun") appearing in HERALD No. 22, same vol). I should have written nothing, or offered my criticism in a logical review of the article. Realizing the impropriety of criticising in a manner that would reflect as a personal insult, I am sorry I was so unwise, and beg pardon of this brother, or any others, for any offense that might have been taken. I am very late in offering this; but I hope not too late to accomplish the result sought, viz: reparation as far as possible for any harm that might have occurred.

Respectfully,

D. H. SCHMIDT.

STEWARTSVILLE, Missouri, June 30, 1907.

with his family. They will be quite an acquisition to our branch for usefulness. We greet them gladly.

Our district conference passed off very smoothly. While the attendance was not large it was very harmonious indeed. The following officers were elected for the year: T. W. Chatburn, president; F. J. Chatburn, vice-president; M. Fordham, secretary and treasurer; W. W. Fordham, sustained as Bishop's agent.

The branch also has selected us as branch president. This would seem to be just a little heavy for the first year at least; however, we will not complain, but do the best we can.

Bro. Andrew Jackson Layland has also arrived in the district and participated in the deliberations of the conference. Our brother seems to be sighing for the flesh-Potts of Idaho, but we feel assured that A. J. will be swearing by Washington, so to speak, before the year is gone. The question of three counties recommended to be taken into the Spokane District by Bro. G. T. Griffiths, also the communication from the Seattle District was taken up at our conference, and a committee appointed to confer with the Seattle District looking towards an amicable adjustment of the matter. We do not wish our sister district to think we are trying to appropriate a part of their territory without just grounds—as the missionary in charge surely thought we could do a better part by those Saints living in that territory than they could receive otherwise. We are of the same opinion because of the lay of the country, better railroad facilities, and the better chance of being visited by district officers.

We give you due warning, now, to look out for our Bro. W. W. Fordham, who will no doubt visit the next Seattle conference. However, there may be other matters pending that will necessitate a representative there. W. W. belongs to the Booster's Club of Spokane, and the tendency is to boost things.

Bro. Editor, I may be excused for this long letter, as I lost several weeks in which the branch was not represented. Then, I have toiled, labored, and sweat with this typewriter which I purchased of you, and when I sought a little sympathy, the only thing I received was to see my letter in the HERALD, without my consent, too. It's hard enough to wrestle with a critter like this, without public exhibition by the Editor.

T. W. CHATBURN.

The time for the Northern California Reunion is August 30 to September 8, 1907, at Irvington, Alameda County, twenty-seven miles south of Oakland. The time was changed from the former date. The committee has already perfected many of the arrangements for the accommodation of the many visitors expected. Tents will be had on the grounds at the following prices: 8x10, $2; 10x12, $2.50; 12x14, $3. Bed-springs and mattresses will be furnished at lowest possible price. An eating-house will be operated by the committee, furnishing meals at lowest possible rate; a suitable house will be built for this purpose. Kindly give special attention to the following: 1. Order your tent and such other things as you shall want. 2. When you purchase your ticket be sure to get a certificate or receipt for same to insure one third fare on return. 3. Come determined to make some one better and happier. The ministry will be well represented, including R. C. Evans of the First Presidency and one or both the ministers in charge of the mission. Do not forget to send your orders at once to my address. J. M. Terry, 1237 Union Street, Oakland, California, for committee.

The eastern reunion association will meet July 27, at Highland Lake, Massachusetts, about twenty-one miles from Boston. We are celebrating "old home week" in Boston the same week that we hold our reunion, and parties from a distance can get rates to Boston at about one and one half cents per mile. It will probably pay you to consult your ticket agent, as you may be able to save considerable on your fares if you are coming from a distance and can just as well come to Boston and go from there to the reunion grounds. These tickets are good beginning July 27, and can be used to August 6. Agents have been appointed in all of the large branches throughout the Eastern States with whom you can leave your orders for tents, cots, and board. Those who are in a scattered condition may remit with your order directly to me at Winter Hill, Massachusetts, Box 10, not later than July 15. Tents 10x12, $3; 12x15, $3.50; single cots, 50 cents; double cots $1. We also have a few of the cots which are not in first class condition, which will do for children, at 25 cents—only a limited number of these twenty-five cent ones—which will be supplied as long as they last in the order received. Board will be $3.75 for seven days; young children at a smaller price. Arrangements have practically been completed for everything necessary to make our session an especially successful one. Many of the missionaries are expected to be there and we will have plenty of good speaking. Come prepared to add your part to the spirituality of the occasion. Arrangements have been made for normal work for the local priesthood, and we desire to have every member of the priesthood in our different districts present so that they may partake of these good things which are prepared for you. Make it a business to arrange your affairs so that you can come and enjoy the few days with us on this occasion. All mail intended for campers should be addressed to Highland Lake, Norfolk, Massachusetts. M. C. Fisher, chairman.

We will hold a reunion of the Clinton District at Eldorado Springs, Missouri, beginning August 9, and lasting ten days. All are invited. Tents can be had for two dollars and fifty cents each; hay and grain at the market price; pasture at a low rate. We must have your order for tents by August 1, so as to order them all at once. Address, S. C. Williams, Chairman, Box 102, Eldorado Springs, Missouri.

Northeastern Illinois District reunion will convene on the same ground as last year, August 23 to September 1. Tents, 10x12, 3 foot wall, $2.25; 12x14, 3 foot wall, $2.75; 10x15, 6 foot wall, $3.75; 14x19, 6 foot wall, $4.25. We have a few bed-springs which we can furnish to those who order them for ten cents each. Please order tents as soon as possible, as we must get the order in before the 15th of August. If you wish your tents set up add 25 cents to above prices. A dining-tent will be operated: Meals for adults 15 cents, children from five to twelve years, one half price. Please let us know if you will board at the tent or not. Those who have the enlarged hymnal bring them; we want to learn some of the new pieces. Let us come together with the Spirit, and with a desire to build up the work, and the Lord will bless us. For further particulars write to the secretary. J. Midgorden, president; J. M. Blakely, secretary, Plano, Illinois.

The annual reunion of the Southeastern Illinois District will be held in Castleman's Park at Creal Springs, Illinois, August 16 to 25. This is a good location. We are expecting Apostle Heman C. Smith and other good speakers. Everybody invited to come. Committee: F. M. Davis, F. M. Slover, Henry Sparling.

Two-Day Meetings and Dedications.

Burdickville Branch will hold a two-day meeting, July 13 and 14, and at that time will have their neat chapel dedicated. Those desiring to attend should go via the M. & N. E. to Cedar City, and at that point teams will convey you to the place of meeting. Inland Branch will also hold a two-day meeting, July 20 and 21. Their commodious chapel will be dedicated at this time. Those going who live on the P. M. R. R. should stop at Bendon; those going via M. & N. E. should stop at Platt River, and from those places teams will take you to the place of meeting. Bro. J. W. Wight will be present at both dedications, nothing preventing. All Saints who can possibly go should attend one or both of these meetings. Good music and an enjoyable time will be had at both places. Saints going can notify Peter Price (Maple City, R. F. D.) for Burdickville dedication, and those going to Inland can write to George Anness, Bendon, R. F. D. H. A. Doty, secretary.

Russia's Heir to the Throne.

The Russian girl student who tried to convert a Cossack of the convoy—as the palace guard at Tsarskoe-Selo is called—to revolutionary principles offered the soldier about five thousand dollars, or so the London Standard reports, if he would attempt the life of Alexis. This was weeks ago. Details of the child's daily life have been kept secret ever since. He was getting four meals every twenty-four hours last spring, and these never included mutton broth or pudding that had not been prepared under the eye of his mother or of some one designated by her. The ill health of the child is ascribed to the misfortune that so few residences of the Czar's do not leave much to be desired from the point of view of sanitary science. One of the Czarina's spells of illness has been traced to the defective plumbing which makes a certain imperial palace uninhabitable in summer because of its odors. Her Majesty is said to tremble for Alexis when she remembers the revelations made by the eminent Moscow physician, Doctor Zakharin, as to the contributing causes of the ailment which finally carried off the late Emperor Alexander III. The private apartments of the imperial family in the winter palace at St. Petersburg are very damp. Alexis can not be hurried to the Crimea like his four sisters. The terrorists are believed to attach too much importance to Alexis Nicolaievich—to give him the full name he received in baptism within an hour of his birth—to render land journeys expedient. The only Czarevich born while his father was on the throne, with the exception of the son of Peter the Great—himself an Alexis and unlucky—has been and, the Paris Figaro fears, will see very little of this world. It has not always been possible to provide him with butter from sources above suspicion, whereupon heir to the throne of Russia has had to eat his bread dry.—Current Literature for July.

The Train That Walks a Tight Rope.

A car running on a tight rope was a novelty indeed. But on this track Mr. Brennan's mono railway-train accomplished all the feats he claimed for it without the slightest hitch. The six-foot model carriage was actually raised from the ground to the level of the track, about seven feet overhead, on a section of wire rope stretched tight between the uprights, propelled by electricity supplied by accumulators. In appearance the vehicle was not unlike a miniature motor-car devoid of the customary wheels—not, of course, that this strange little carriage was without wheels. But the wheels—small steel ones set in line along the center of the car—were beneath the vehicle and almost invisible. Thus, to the astonishment of the spectators, as the car ran backward and forward, it achieved the task of balancing itself more steadily than did Blondin when crossing on his rope over Niagara Falls.

The apparently magical equilibration of the running car was produced by the antagonistic motions of two large gyroscopes. In the special manner in which he has discovered how to fit and adjust these gyroscopes lies the inventor's secret.—From an article in The Circle for July.

Imitating Motion of Heavenly Bodies in an Aerial Railway.

Hitherto the gyroscope has been popularly known as a child's toy, but to scientists it has long been an inscrutable perplexity. It consists of a ring with a fly-wheel inside, the combination being capable of behaving in a style, when set in rapid motion, which seems to defy altogether the ordinary operation of the laws of gravitation. The little top so constructed when in full revolution resists every attempt to shift it from the level, and remains poised at an angle of forty-five degrees. Scientific men understand that Mr. Brennan secures this perfect equilibrium by applying the principle which Nature uses in balancing the heavenly bodies in their gigantic orbits. The earth revolves on its own axis from west to east, and also moves on its orbit round the sun in the same direction. But between these two movements there is a third, which was discovered by the Greek astronomer Hipparchus, who lived in Bithynia about 160 B. C. That great philosopher, after profound study of the records of their observations left by the Chaldean Magi, discovered that the axis of the earth has a special top-like motion in the opposite direction to that in which the earth itself rotates. This motion is styled "precession." Now, when, as Lord Kelvin puts it, we "hurry the precession in any body," a strange result follows. So the very movement which would otherwise precipitate a fall actually prevents that fall. And thus we enter a kingdom in which every law of Nature seems to be contradicted in the most bewildering style. And that is why Mr. Brennan's new gyroscopic car acts in a way so strange.—From "The train that walks a tight rope," in The Circle for July.

The June Arena.

The Arena for June, which ends the thirty-seventh volume of this leading progressive democratic review of opinion, contains a striking and varied table of contents. Several of the papers will prove of special interest to general readers of a thoughtful turn of mind. Among these the following are specially noteworthy: "Modern Germany—mad?" a brilliant critical paper dealing with the present morbid and erotic wave that is sweeping over Germany, by George Sylvester Viereck; "Plant consciousness," a delightful sketch dealing with the evidences of brain power in various plants, by Arthur Smith; "World-peace," a timely and suggestive paper by the Reverend H. W. Thomas, D. D., one of the most philosophical and fundamental thinkers in America; "The educational value of a great exposition," a paper that should be read by all people contemplating attending the Jamestown exposition by Professor Frank Webster Smith; "The story of two oligarchies," by Professor Frank Frost Abbott, Ph. D., of the faculty of the University of Chicago, a striking and significant historical parallel showing how the oligarchy of ancient Rome is being paralleled in the United States Senate; "Democracy and socialism," by James McKaye, author of "The economy of happiness." This essay keenly and lucidly analyzes the difference between reactionary and class-ruled governments, democracy, and extreme socialism. Mr. Flower, the editor of The Arena, holds it to be the most important political and economic essay of the year. "Mongolian immigration and the British colonies," by C. B. Galbreath, is a paper that will be of special interest to the people of the Pacific coast. "Why I am a Christian Socialist," by the Reverend J. O. Bentall, Ph. D., presents the views of a brilliant young Baptist clergyman who is heading a movement not unlike that which was led by Canon Kingsley and Frederick D. Maurice in England fifty years ago. The editorial department of The Arena, which is probably the most important and popular feature of this review, is very strong and the news digests of the movements for Public Ownership, Direct Legislation, Coöperation, and Proportional Representation makes this magazine indispensable to all persons interested in these great and growing movements.

The Confederate Organizations.

Recent events at Richmond have centered attention on the surviving Confederate veterans. As the years go by, their ranks are thinning. According to the best available figures, the number of separate enlistments in the Confederate army was from 1,239,000 to 1,400,000. But many of these were reenlistments, and the terms of service were varied. Reduced to enlistments for a three-years' term of service, the estimated number is 1,082,119. There is a lack of data upon which to base any trustworthy estimate of the number of survivors.

The principal association of the surviving soldiers is the United Confederate Veterans, organized at New Orleans on June 10, 1889. This body is divided into the Army of Northern Virginia Department, the Army of Tennessee Department, and the Trans-Mississippi Department, each under a department commander. State organizations are authorized, and are called divisions. The number of separate camps is about 1,600, and the number of members about 75,000. There were 1,259 camps represented at the Richmond reunion. Permanent headquarters of the association are at New Orleans, Louisiana.—From "The South's care for her Confederate veterans," by William A. Glasson, in the American Monthly Review of Reviews for July.

THE ENEMIES OF JOSEPH SMITH.

A false friend is the worst enemy.

It is not difficult to understand why the religious world disliked Joseph Smith from the start. His very first pronouncement was to the effect that their creeds were wrong—so irreparably and monstrously wrong as to render them abominable in the sight of God. It followed that he was hated by those who were defending those creeds, and more especially by those who were paid to defend them. The fact that he was young, uneducated, and decidedly no theologian rendered his charge offensive; and the further fact that he claimed to have received his knowledge by way of a revelation rendered it doubly offensive to a class of religionists who themselves were not favored with revelations.

A more thorough study of the creeds thus arraigned has since convinced the theological world that they were wrong, and a process of creed revision has been going on for some time and is still in progress. Men who read those creeds to-day and fully grasp their doctrines of predestination, infant damnation, and others of like class, readily see that they must have been abominable in the sight of God because they so hideously misrepresented him. The outcome indicates that Joseph Smith was a profound creed critic and able to anticipate public sentiment fifty years in advance of his contemporaries, or else he learned it as he claimed from One whose knowledge is from everlasting to everlasting.

In any case, the charge then made that the revelation came from the Devil is disproved, because the Devil is not in the business of exposing erroneous creeds.

These changes of sentiment, however, were then future and did not in any way mitigate the fury of the storm that burst upon the young man who had discerned and voiced the truth. To-morrow's truth is to-day's blasphemy—at least in the opinion of men. Emerson has said, "Coarse slander, fire, tar and feathers, and the gibbet, the youth may freely bring home to his mind, and with what sweetness of temper he can, and inquire how fast he can fix his sense of duty, braving such penalties, when-

"It is a worthy object to organize an association in the interest of certain classes, giving them advantages in obtaining employment, homes, and wealth. But it is a much more worthy one to pursue the heaven-born rule that comprises in its bounds of beneficence all classes and conditions."

ever it may please the next newspaper and a sufficient number of his neighbors to pronounce his opinions incendiary."

It is no figure of speech or flourish of oratory to say that these things befell the man of whom we write. He paid the maximum penalty for seeing things as they were.

To denounce and deny, however, was only a small part of Joseph Smith's work. He immediately proceeded to affirm and defend a system of doctrines that were beautifully simple and that were based on the literal interpretation of certain very plain passages of scripture, notably Hebrews 6: 1-3. He proceeded to organize a church which was the only one at that time containing various officers that are clearly pointed out in the Scriptures as belonging in the church. (See Ephesians 4: 11, 13; 1 Corinthians 12: 28.)

With such an easily defended system of doctrine and church organization he and his followers could and did meet and defeat the champions of the creeds in debate and made converts wherever they went, in some instances converting whole congregations.

Noted preachers, secure in their knowledge of Greek and Hebrew, stood up to do battle with some unlearned defender of the faith and were promptly, neatly, and effectually run through with some plain passage of scripture from the common version of the Bible. Such a defeat is striking and dramatic, but humiliating, and in anything less than a man of God it leaves an undying hatred.

In view of these facts we can understand why Joseph Smith found enemies in religious circles. That was why in the land of religious liberty a certain event occurred which is recorded in the Columbian Encyclopedia (volume 20, 1890,) in the following words: "March 22, 1832, a mob of Methodists, Baptists, Disciples, and miscellaneous zealots broke into the prophet's house, tore him from his wife's arms . . . and tarred and feathered him."

These facts perhaps more than any others account for the murder of June 27, 1844. Coarse slander, fire, tar and feathers, and the bullets of the mob all were invoked by the passions of religious partisans. Indeed we can realize to a degree the feelings of the men who were thus offended because of the things that he taught, and realizing their blindness we can forgive them. They were not his worst enemies, and in strict accord with his own prophecy he triumphed over them though they slew him; they did little or nothing to defeat his work.

The greatest hindrance to his work originated among those who professed to be his followers. Of all the weapons used against him "coarse slander" was more effectual than any of the others named by Emerson: fire, tar and feathers, and the gibbet.

And the coarsest, vilest, most widely accepted slander of all was and is fostered by those who profess to be his friends. The worst enemy is one who poses as a friend and is accepted as such; and such a one struck at the name and fame of the Prophet when the bullets of his open enemies had put him where he could not parry the blow.

Eight years after the death of Joseph Smith and one thousand miles from where his wife and sons were residing, Brigham Young stood before a conference in Salt Lake City and made public a document now known as the "revelation on the eternity of the marriage covenant, including the plurality of wives." Unwilling at the time to stand back of it himself, he declared that he had received the document from Joseph Smith, though he could not produce the original, as that he stated had been destroyed by Emma Smith, wife of the Prophet.

For various reasons, some of which we will give, we are compelled to believe that Joseph Smith was not the author of the document, and that the man who published it to the world as coming from him was guilty of "coarse slander" which was rendered the more reprehensible from the fact that he posed as a personal friend and follower of Joseph Smith.

This purported revelation sanctioned polygamy, a practice offensive to Christian people, contrary to the word of God, and productive of such grave disorders and deep sorrows in the home that four short years after its introduction in Utah Brigham Young in a public discourse threatened to divorce all polygamous wives in the Territory if they would not immediately cease to complain of their unhappiness.

The thing went even further and gave sanction to the people to commit every crime that might be named, with one exception. We quote:

Verily, verily I say unto you, if a man marry a wife according to my word, and they are sealed by the Holy Spirit of promise, according to mine appointment, and he or she shall commit any sin or transgression of the new and everlasting covenant whatever, and all manner of blasphemies, and if they commit no murder, wherein they shed innocent blood—yet they shall come forth in the first resurrection, and enter into their exaltation.

It will be remembered that Emma Smith was named as a possible witness, Brigham Young stating that she read and destroyed the original of the document. When this came to her ears she denounced it as a falsehood for which there was not even a shadow of foundation in fact. Shortly before her death, face to face with eternity, with nothing to gain and with everything to lose by a violation of truth, she declared that Joseph Smith neither taught nor practiced polygamy. Her reputation for veracity was as good, we think better, than that of the man whose word she opposed.

Then comes the further fact that the teachings of this document were in direct violation of the known teachings and acts of Joseph Smith during his life. The law which came to the church through him said, "Thou shalt not steal. . . . Thou shalt not lie. . . . Thou shalt not commit adultery."—Doctrine and Covenants 42, while this document gave permission to do any or all of these things. It is inconceivable that the two came from the same source.

Again his teachings upon the marriage question as published during his life are clear and concise, and they are irreproachable, being the reverse of those put forward in the purported revelation.

He translated the Book of Mormon and gave it to the world, and in it is this teaching: "Behold David and Solomon truly had many wives and concubines, which thing was abominable before me, saith the Lord." And again, in the same chapter (Jacob 2: 6) it is written: "There shall not any man among you have save it be one wife: and concubines he shall have none: for I, the Lord God, delighteth in the chastity of women."

Through him came the revelations contained in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, and in section 42, paragraph 7, we read, "Thou shalt love thy wife with all thy heart, and shall cleave unto her and none else; and he that looketh upon a woman to lust after her, shall deny the faith, and shall not have the Spirit; and if he repent not, he shall be cast out." In section 49 it is recorded: "Marriage is ordained of God unto man; wherefore it is lawful that he should have one wife, and they twain shall be one flesh."

It is fair to presume that the sentiments of Joseph Smith were in harmony with these laws and that consequently he was opposed to polygamy. That assumption becomes a certainty when we learn that only a few months before his death he personally expelled one of the elders from the church for teaching that doctrine, and that he so published notice in the official church organ, the Times and Seasons, February 1, 1844, in which notice he classed the doctrine as "false and corrupt."

We submit that a man is to be judged by his known teachings and acts while living and not by some posthumous document exhumed eight years after his death and put forward on testimony that has been impeached.

By the publication of this document a man who was supposed to be a friend attempted to brand him as a false and corrupt teacher. That and the practices since indulged in in his name by reason of that false revelation have constituted the worst slander ever perpetrated against his character. And to this day some who pose as his friends and admirers publish that document to the world over his signature. They put into practice as many of its teachings as they dare and constantly cite him as their authority, making his name a synonym for lawless beastliness. They build monuments to his memory pointing heavenward and garlanded with flowers, and when they have thus gained the attention of all the world as his most ardent friends they turn and say, "Here lies the man who taught us to defile the marriage covenant and told us that we might lie, steal, swear, or commit any crime short of the shedding of innocent blood and yet pass to our exaltation and glory."

These things are not written of in malice but in sorrow, because they have done more to hinder the progress of the great latter-day work than could have been accomplished by all the "Anti-Mormon Leagues," exposes, or mobs this side of eternity. No man can tell the power and dominion that the church might have attained to ere this had all its members been true and faithful, ordering their lives in harmony with the principles of truth and virtue taught by the Prophet and incorporated in the standard church books.

GENERAL CHURCH ITEMS.

The HERALD Editors are in receipt of a neatly printed program card announcing the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Plymouth (Massachusetts) Branch, Sunday, July 14. Elder John W. Gilbert was the principal speaker of the morning and Elder M. C. Fisher in the evening.

Elder Gomer R. Wells of Australia is the author of a new tract on the millennium.

The Gospel Standard, June 1, contains notice of the death of Bro. H. Griffith of Oak Vale, Victoria, Australia. He was a veteran of the Crimean War. The Standard quotes as follows from a local newspaper: "On Tuesday last at his residence, Oakvale, there passed away at an advanced age a noted veteran in the Crimean campaign, in the person of Mr. Henry Griffin, a resident of the Oak Vale district since 1864. He was a native of Kilkenny, Ireland, and had reached the age of seventy-five years. He possessed three medals won in active service in campaigns noted in history. He joined the army at nineteen, and served in the Burmese War. He fought through the Crimean campaign from beginning to end, and when the troops returned to England he was the youngest man in the service. When Queen Victoria was pinning medals on his breast she remarked: 'I did not think I had such a young man fighting for me.'"

It is not altogether impossible yet to observe the instruction in the Book of Covenants, "Let all thy garments be plain, and their beauty the beauty of the work of thine own hands," as will be seen by the following clipping from the Cleveland (Ohio) Press. Sr. Bessie Phare is a daughter of Bro. J. J. Phare, formerly of Kansas City:

"'I'm so glad you like my graduating gown,' said Miss Phare. 'I made it myself.'

"The other girl graduates of Woodland school gasped. Not one but had spent anxious weeks with seamstress and modiste. The bills had been big, too. And here was their classmate, who besides standing high in her studies, had found time and had the cleverness to fashion a gown with her own hands.

"'It cost only five dollars,' said Miss Phare. And the other girls gasped again. For the dress was of the softest French lawn, trimmed with embroidery and lace, and there was art in the fit of it.

"'It has always seemed to me,' said Miss Phare, 'that a girl should learn the useful arts as well as the accomplishments. I can not remember when I could not sew. I wouldn't think of calling in a dressmaker. When mamma suggested a tailor-made gown for commencement, I almost laughed. Why, I have more confidence in myself than in any tailor.'

"Miss Bessie Phare is the daughter of J. J. Phare, 10716 Woodland Avenue Southeast. She has just completed her sixteenth year."

Mrs. L. H. Davis of Kingsley, Iowa, says, "I do wish some good elder who can waken a crowd of sinners could come and preach here. They are welcome to a home with us while here."

CURRENT EVENTS, SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS.

Mayor Schmitz, of San Francisco, who has been convicted of extortion, was sentenced July 8 to five years in the penitentiary. He was impudent and defiant under the judge's severe castigation and expressed a determination to appeal to the people. The crowd present voiced its opinion of the appeal by continued cheering when sentence was given. It will be remembered that Schmitz was the man who issued a proclamation at the time of the earthquake authorizing the shooting of all persons found engaged in thieving. He ought not to complain at any sentence lighter than the one that he imposed on others.

While the Government looks after our foods the clergymen take an active interest in our fads. Several learned divines, including one Catholic priest, have denounced the popular "teddy bear." They plead for the abolition of the bear and the return of the doll. The thought is that the little girl who plays with a doll will in later life appreciate babies while her sister who now fondles the "teddy bear" will tolerate nothing short of bears. There are extenuating circumstances. This present association with bruin may fortify some women for the society of some men later on; then again the teddy bear will cease to be a fad long before it becomes a factor in the race suicide question.

The Department of Agriculture has handed down a decision prohibiting the use of benzoate of soda as a preservative of foodstuffs. This is said to be a hard blow to the lunch-counter pie. Mineral and coal-tar dyes, extensively used in foods, are also placed on the prohibited list.

"Do you think your mining stock will pay dividends?"

"I'm afraid not," answered the optimist. "But I do not regard the money as wholly lost. I have had several thousand dollars worth of pleasurable anticipation."—Washington Star.

The Straight Road

BAPTISM OF THE SPIRIT.

ELDER ALVIN KNISLEY.

"There is no provision in God's word for a change in the Holy Spirit or its effects."

One of the Reformers advocated that we are obliged to receive the baptism of water in this age, but not the baptism of the Spirit. Other reformers held that it is highly essential that we receive the baptism of the Spirit, that we can not be saved without it, but that water baptism is not essential.

Now which is right? Is this question answered in the Scriptures?

Yes, indeed, and very plainly. Jesus said: "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit he can not enter into the kingdom of God."—John 3: 5. "Born" here has been proved to mean baptize, which if substituted would read: Except a man be baptized of water and of the Spirit, thus making the water and the Spirit both essential.

It is no more consistent to use that text to prove water baptism and ignore Spirit baptism, than to use it to prove Spirit baptism and ignore water baptism. And yet that very thing is done to-day. If "born of water" applies to us now, so does "born of the Spirit."

Christ received the Spirit baptism after water baptism. (Matthew 3.) The same chapter teaches us that John promised the baptism of the Spirit to those who would receive the water sacrament at his hands. In Acts 2 we read of its descent on the apostles in a visible manner. In Acts 10 we read of its descent on Cornelius and his household. And Peter afterward affirmed that they received it, or that it "fell on them, as on us at the beginning." (Acts 11: 15.)

It stands undoubted that the baptism of the Holy Ghost was given on the occasion of Pentecost and at the conversion of Cornelius and household; but some have insisted, erroneously, that these were the only instances where it was thus bestowed after Christ's ascension. Yet Peter (Acts 2) promised "the gift of the Holy Ghost" to all who would repent and be baptized.

"No," says one, "the 'gift' of the Holy Ghost is distinct from the Holy Ghost itself."

Let us see: Did not Cornelius and associates receive the Holy Ghost itself? Yes. Very well, if you will read Acts 11: 17 you will there find that it was the "gift" that they received. Although the gift of the Holy Ghost is not always synonymous with the Holy Ghost, when not synonymous it is of necessity the effect of it; hence the individual must have the Holy Ghost in order to have the gift.

Acts 8 teaches us that the Holy Ghost itself was bestowed upon the men and women of Samaria after they had received baptism by Philip. Its effect was so visible, or perceptible and astonishing, that Simon thought it an object of purchase; hence he offered them money.

Acts 19 teaches us that the twelve men of Ephesus received the Holy Ghost under the ministrations of Paul. They had already been baptized with water, but that did not do. Paul not only sees fit to rebaptize them; but by laying his hands on them the Holy Ghost was conferred, and it influenced them to speak in tongues and prophecy.

In 1 Corinthians 12 we are told that "by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body." Who is meant by "we"? All the faithful Corinthians, to be sure; all of them received the Spirit baptism. How, then, can one say we do not receive the Spirit as a baptism in this age, that it is not intended for us?

The Corinthians enjoyed the "gifts," the extraordinary gifts, along with their baptism of the Spirit as seen in chapters 12, 13, and 14. Peter says the Holy Ghost is a witness which God gives to them that obey him. (See Acts 5.)

Jesus promised it to his followers, and defines its office-work in John 14, 15, and 16.

Mark 1 shows distinctly that the Spirit baptism was not restricted to the apostles, but was for all penitents who received the water baptism in precedence.

We must believe according to 1 Corinthians 12 that no man can say knowingly that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost. We must have the same Holy Ghost with its same functions, the "fruits" (of Galatians 5) and the "gifts" (of 1 Corinthians 12). There is no provision in God's word for a change in the Holy Spirit or its effects.

A VISION.

During the evening of March 1, 1886, after I had retired, and before going to sleep, while lying in my bed, and addressing a silent prayer to the Father of spirits, the power of the Spirit came upon me, and I beheld in vision the scenes described as follows:

Immediately after feeling the divine influence, I seemed to be, as it were, enveloped in an atmosphere of a soft, yellowish light, which radiated like heat, as it rises from a stubble-field on a very warm day, and as I beheld, a voice from within said to me: "This is the love of God." The scene then changed, and I seemed surrounded by a much darker atmosphere in which appeared many tongues of fire. The vision again changed and I saw as it were a great, black storm-cloud which, in size, would cover about one-sixth part of the sky, and while I gazed upon it, the cloud was rent with a flash of chain lightning, and the same voice which spoke in the first instance, said: "This is the cloud that stood between the Israelites and the Egyptians." Another transformation took place, and a most beautiful cross appeared, coming into view much the same as a person approaching from out of darkness into the light. It approached to within about forty feet distance where it remained a short time for my inspection. Its height was about that of an average man; its symmetry was perfect; the parts of which it was formed were about eight inches in width; the body of the cross was a rich emerald color, and the upright and horizontal parts were studded with jewels of gold, which had much the appearance of eyes. It was very beautiful; in fact I have never seen anything that would compare with it in its grandeur and beauty. There was one peculiar feature of which I wish to make special mention: Where the upright and horizontal parts crossed, there was a circular opening, or hole, through the cross, instead of being solid, as is usual in the construction of crosses. I was filled with awe when this part of the vision appeared, and again the voice said: "This is one of the forms of the Lord." This part of the vision passed away, and again the dark cloud appeared, having the same shape as before, though, in comparison, but a speck on the horizon when compared with its former size, while at its second appearance there was a soft, yellowish light streaming out from behind the cloud, similar to that displayed in an active, brilliant northern light. This scene passed away, and through the influence of the Spirit operating upon me, I was given a sense of feeling suggestive of thoroughly laundered linen, with just a suggestion of unworthiness upon my part, mingled with the purified condition I was made to realize, and then the vision ended.

"This is the love of God." The interpretation of the first scene of the vision is manifest in God's goodness, preparation, and care for the human race. God has made all necessary preparation for man's maintenance, prosperity, happiness, and perfect salvation, and with the means now sought out for the dissemination of thought and news, and for the transportation of produce, were mankind generally inclined to be righteous, such things as famine and the attendant suffering associated with it, could be nearly, or quite, eliminated, and with God's blessing which would follow righteousness, would soon be a thing of the past.

To the second scene, that of the tongues of fire, I have received no interpretation, and, at the time of the vision, I did not understand the import, or meaning, of any part of it. I understood the source from whence it came, and that it was a mental or spiritual conception, and not one that was visible to the natural eye, although the scenes were just as distinctly visible, and many times more impressive. However, through the operation of the Spirit of truth, little by little, the interpretation was unfolded until I could comprehend the lesson taught in the vision.

The dark cloud represented the condition of my mind as to the gospel light at the time of the vision. The cloud that stood between the Israelites and the Egyptians was light to the one, darkness to the other. He that is born of the Spirit hath knowledge of God and walketh in the light, having the mind of Christ, but the carnally-minded person is in the dark, not having the Spirit nor confidence of his Creator. The cloud, which represents the condition between the spiritual and carnal life, was light to the children of Israel while it was darkness to the host of Egypt. The Egyptians were carnally minded while the Israelites were in the light.

Prior to the vision the Lord had given me but one truth through the Christ Spirit, and that one was an understanding of the "tree of life," and the "river of life," which are synonymous with "eternal truth," or the intelligence of the Creator. The manner in which this truth was given me was peculiar, and I have never received another in the same way. It entered the heart first, coming quickly with a perceptible feeling, rose to the brain immediately, and then unfolded to my understanding. This was the lightning that rent the dark cloud—the operation of the Holy Spirit upon my mind. At that time I believed that I understood the plan of salvation, and that I was in an enlightened state spiritually, but through the knowledge received afterward, I was made to understand that I was yet in my sins.

The fourth scene was the cross which represented Christ and the Christ-life. Its beauty represented the excellency of the Christian life, while each jewel which bedecked it, was a fitting emblem of the attributes, love, mercy, goodness, long-suffering, etc., which belong to that life, while the opening through the cross had a significance peculiarly its own. The fifth scene was a repetition of the third scene, but in a changed condition, with the cross intervening, and was a representation of my mind at a future period when the Spirit of truth shall have had time to operate upon it, provided I shall pass through the cross to obtain the enlightened condition represented by the fifth scene. The last three scenes, besides the other intelligence received therefrom, conveyed a conditional promise, while the last experience of the vision represented an advanced state of holiness, through the grace of God, to which I could obtain if faithful and obedient unto Jesus Christ.

I have been inclined to a religious life from my early youth, although I was not always so good as I should have been, and when about nineteen years old I united with the Evangelical Christian Union Church, in which I had membership for about four years. I left that church and joined the United Brethren because I considered them more zealous in their service to Christ than the church to which I first belonged. Although inclined to the better life, I was not always as faithful as I should have been, and as I moved away from the church to which I belonged, soon after uniting with it, I grew cold and careless, and drifted a long way into infidelity.

About the year 1885, several years after coming to the Pacific Coast, I attended a protracted meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, at which time I concluded to unite with that church, and to strive to secure all the benefits to be had in a religious life. Through the effort I made, light soon began to break in upon my mind, and as a result, through visions and the power of the Spirit to enlighten, I was shown many things, among which was the apostasy, and that there was no authority except that of man in the church to which I belonged, neither in any with which I was acquainted, that my baptism was of no effect; and that I was yet in my sins; and that the blood of Christ had not been applied to me. When I was made to realize these things, I cried out in my distress, and felt, indeed, as though I was the chief of sinners. The knowledge received made it necessary for me to withdraw from the Methodist Episcopal Church South as God did not recognize it as his church, and I would not be justified in remaining a member of it after the disclosures received through the Spirit.

Having received a knowledge of the truth, and tasted of the heavenly gift, I sought after the kingdom of God, not as diligently as I should have done, but I made search for thirteen years before I came in contact with the church that taught the doctrine of Christ in its fullness, and then I found it where I least expected it to be—in the church established by Joseph Smith, the Prophet and Seer.

There is much more that I could write, which is closely connected with this vision and subject; but I feel that this is sufficient for this article. The above information gives the reason why I am associated with the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ.

TEACHING IN THE RELIGIO AND SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

"A scholar may listen to the talking teacher without revealing either his own ignorance or his own knowledge, but a judicious question will sound the measure of his information. It is due the pupil that questions should be asked him; for in no other way will his work be recognized and appreciated.

"If more questions were asked in the class, there would be more studying in the homes of our pupils. Many classes have been killed by too much talk on the part of the teacher; and the most successful teachers are invariably those who call out the knowledge and thought of their pupils.

"Questions should be original; that is, they should not be read from the question book or a lesson leaf, nor from a written list. Let them be the teacher's own questions, however prepared, and let them come from his own mind.

"Questions should be direct. Questions should rarely be asked of the class as a whole, to be answered by a few prompt and forward scholars, while the rest of the class are silent.

"Each question should be addressed directly to some member of the class.

"Avoid frivolous questions. Remember that you have but half an hour in which to impress a mind, a heart, and a character with a portion of God's truth, and waste not the precious minutes in discussing unprofitable themes."—Jesse Lyman Hurlburt.

It is my intention to suggest in this paper the methods and restrictions which, in my judgment, will render a Religio or Sunday-school an ideal one. Therefore let me suggest a method for class teachers, which, if carried out, according to its designs, will furnish an interest for the children equal with the interest it will furnish for the older class. I will quote as a basis for it a commandment given especially for the benefit of the school of the prophets.

"Appoint among yourselves a teacher, and let not all be spokesman at once, but let one speak at a time, and let all listen unto his sayings, that when all have spoken, that all may be edified of all, and every man may have an equal privilege."

There is a too prevalent idea alike in the junior and senior classes, that the teacher should do most of the talking. In the senior classes it is considered that the teacher should be better informed on the subject, consequently more able to bring out and explain the thoughts therein; and, generally speaking, the teacher does most of the talking. When he or she does ask a question, it is asked of those who are always ready, neglecting to interest those who need it most.

In contrast to this ask each pupil in his or her turn. If he or she can not answer it, ask the next pupil, giving each an equal privilege to manifest his or her individuality. For, as it is with the giving of the gifts, to each is given a distinct gift, so with the thoughts brought forth in the class: each pupil will receive a thought unseen, not thought of by the other pupils, consequently, all may be edified of all, all may have an equal privilege; the class will be governed by the pupils and for the pupils.

Do you teachers who have become experienced teachers still have to rely too much on the Quarterly as a help? Let us as teachers of the senior classes rely more on, and require more of the pupils. The basic outline indicates a need of self-reliance, of trust in your own understanding and knowledge, assisted by inspiration. It requires a maintenance of the class proportionately.

Regarding the children, the same method holds good for the most part. They may not be able to bring out points; but they should be able to answer in their own turn; and a teacher can enable them to do this, by seeing to it that each child has its eyes on the location of the answer the question calls for.

Children who can not read I consider an exception to this rule. That the teacher must do the most of the talking to such a class is inevitable. But if they can read, let me say, that after becoming interested, they have, not unlike the older class, an inclination to manifest individuality—they take pride in answering questions. Therefore, do not, while teaching the intermediate classes, remain on the simpler subjects, but rather blend a something more profound, a something that will make them deeper-minded, and arouse a curiosity to know. And aside from that, always see to it, if it be possible, that each child, no matter how stupid, obtains an equal privilege to have a say in the matter. For "every spirit," says the martyred Prophet, "that God ever sends into this world is susceptible of enlargement."

The spirit of a child is in its innocent state. It can grow from grace to grace, from exaltation to exaltation, in all knowledge, until it knows God, and thereby acquires "eternal life."

Hence the definition of the intelligence of the spirit of man: "Ye were also in the beginning with the Father, that which is spirit, even the Spirit of truth." "Whatsoever is truth is light; and whatsoever is light is spirit." Therefore, let me say that spirit is truth, light, spirit of truth, and light of truth. And truth, says God, is a knowledge of things as they are, as they were, and as they are to come.

"The glory of God is intelligence, or in other words light and truth." "Intelligence or the light of truth was not created or made." "Truth [or the reason of man] is independent in that sphere in which God has placed it, to act for itself."

In corroboration of this Joseph, the martyred prophet, has said, "All fools, learned and wise men, from the beginning of creation, who say that man had a beginning, prove that he must have an end, and then the doctrine of annihilation would be true. But if I am right, I might with boldness proclaim from the housetops, that God never did have power to create the spirit of man at all. God himself could not create himself. Intelligence exists upon a self-existent principle. It is a spirit from age to age, and there is no creation about it. All the spirits that God ever sends into this world are susceptible of enlargement. The first principles of man are self-existent with God; that God himself finds himself in the midst of spirits and glory; because he was greater, and because he saw proper to institute laws, whereby the rest could have a chance to advance like himself, that they might have one glory upon another in all that knowledge, power, and glory, etc., in order to save the world of spirits." So then, let us try to bring the children up in light and truth, thereby enlarging their spirits, or in other words their intelligence, giving them a good start, that they may become the "pure in heart," for intelligence is religion. We can give them a good start by cultivating their understanding, by transcending the bounds of simplicity; delving into deeper truths, which will arouse a curiosity to know; and, consequently, when they arrive at the years of maturity they shall realize that "intelligence is the only source from which all true enjoyments flow."

Let us now pass to a no less important consideration, even that of order, both in general actions and in parliament. Concerning it I should say, It is that alone that renders society "agreeable," or in other words: Just in proportion as we become orderly and methodical, will we become "peaceable" and "endeared" to each other.

As a suggestive outline for this phase I will quote from the Church History: "Elders Joseph Smith, Jr., Sidney Rigdon, W. W. Phelps, David Whitmer, and Hyrum Smith were appointed a committee to draft rules and regulations to govern the house of the Lord.

"The following resolution was adopted:

"By the unanimous voice of the whole assembly, motioned, seconded, and carried unanimously that no whisperings shall be allowed in our councils or assemblies, nor any one allowed (except he is called upon or asks permission) to speak loud, upon any consideration whatever; and no man shall be interrupted while speaking, unless he is speaking out of place, and every man shall be allowed to speak in his turn."

Joseph Smith states regarding the work of this day: "This has been one of the best days I ever spent; there has been an entire union of feeling expressed in all our proceedings this day; and the Spirit of the God of Israel has rested upon us in mighty power, and it has been food for us to be here in this heavenly place in Christ Jesus. And although much fatigued with the labors of the day, yet my spiritual reward has been very great indeed."

Is it impossible for us to emulate in our worship and service the conduct of our predecessors? I think not. If we will set before our minds an ideal Religio or Sunday-school, having laws analagous to those laws which governed the assemblies of our predecessors, we shall gain favor with God, become united; and where there is unity there is strength, love, and progress. If you who have obligated yourselves as leaders, instructors, and exemplars, will set the pace for order, the indifferent will gradually fall in line.

There must be exercised over the minds of the indifferent an orderly influence towards the maintenance of order, in order to make the needed impression.

Exhortation without example will never remedy disorder and its kindred offenses. If the active set the pace there will be found an ever-increasing, generally active belief that the house of God is calculated to be a pavilion for the exhibition of concentration, solemnity, and their kindred blessings.

Many of the offenses given in Religios and Sunday-schools are given through the business part of the program. And what are the causes? Let me suggest a few. There are many who do not like parliamentary rules, and, consequently, when we do business, they do not know how to make a motion; they do not talk to a motion; and even if some others have in talking to a motion expressed their sentiments, seemingly, they have to have a say in the matter anyhow.

However, in contrast to this, every young lady and every young man should become conversant with the rules of order and debate and obey them. The rules of order are just. To create order we must create rules; order is a concomitant of the obedience to right rules. To exclude rigid rules is to exclude peace, love, unity, and progress. Just to the extent, therefore, that we become orderly and solemn, will we enjoy the Spirit's influence; for, as it is with a prayer-meeting, so it is with all other services. We must concentrate our minds in a spirit of solemnity and order in the service in order to enjoy the intelligence and power of God. If while others are talking, you have the right to talk, whisper, laugh, and walk around the room, every other member has the same right or rights. In fine, let me say that before us lies a possible realization of a fulfillment of the axiom: "Man's extremity is God's opportunity."

ALEX. MCINTOSH, JR.

IS ATTITUDE SIGNIFICANT IN PRAYER?

It is a truth that man the creature is moved by his environments more readily than by rule set forth by those supposed to have enjoyed some degree of inspiration of a divine character.

As Latter Day Saints, have we any room to boast of our fidelity more than others? When we take under consideration the difference between the claim made by ourselves and by other religious people—"present communication from the Father to man his creature"—it seems strange to a thinker who is observant of "innovations" that those who had been thus directed and held so tenaciously to the idea of humility and the thought of humbling self before the Almighty, that there would be a departure so soon from well-established form or attitude in prayer.

If as claimed by the father of the Latter Day Saint theology, that inspired men are a necessity to keep the children of the Lord in the proper path or way, and by this order this church is more surely founded on the rock than others, would it not appear to one who stops to think that there ought to be a more harmonious uniformity in following out well-defined rules of action in one department of our work as in another?

Innovations came in the Christian system in the lives of the New Testament apostles so gradually and so inoffensively to the majority that before they really were aware of it, they were engulfed in so many "new ideas" which had been theologically "crystalized into truth" (in their own mind) that it was impossible for them to retrace their steps; so we find it true in latter days.

A rule of action never can be replaced by "crystalizing" the "exception" to the rule, where an intelligent gospel hope is exercised. If we stifle that hope by silent submission when evil cometh, and make no resistance, we certainly enter into a condition of "nonentity" so far as our personal rights and our personal development is concerned. It may be a feature, doing, or rule of action that seems insignificant, yet it has its bearing and fruitage of good or evil.

Baptism in water by immersion has long since been settled so far as Latter Day Saints are concerned, yet people will assume upon the supposed "exception" to this rule that as there was no water in the jail spoken of by Paul for immersion the jailer and his house were saved without it, and if they were baptized it must have been by sprinkling or pouring. "Consistency, thou art a jewel."

Laying on of hands for the conferring of the Holy Spirit is the "rule" as sustained by New Testament writers, yet some people have "crystalized" the supposed "exception" and make it their rule, from the brief history of Cornelius and his household. It may seem better and conform to our idea of what ought to be, but can an "exception" (if that be one) take the place of a well-defined rule? If not in this regard, how about other specific instruction and example? Take for instance, the late method among Latter Day Saints, which is to a great extent becoming the rule, of standing while offering the opening prayer at their preaching-services.

And I have known and was present once when they stood up and prayed in the opening of their prayer-meeting. If it be proper to do so as a rule in preaching-services, why not at prayer-meetings?

A quarter of a century ago if an elder had stood up and prayed in a Latter Day Saint church, in opening that service, I doubt whether he would have been permitted to ever occupy that pulpit again; but by degrees we have got used to it, or have said nothing till that "goatish" appearance it had when our neighbor did it had disappeared, and we can do now (or some may) do it without thinking of that Pharisee of old.

If we as Saints crystalize the exception to the plain and humble rule, followed by our worthy predecessors, how much will the thought affect our neighbors though eloquently presented, that we enjoy direct communication and inspiration from God? Will they believe us? What think you, my brother and sister? If the testimony of one witness is sufficient for the ordinary Christian, it seems as though we ought to be well established in all our ways with three, and with direct communication to us from heaven! Jesus said: "When thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are; for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets."—Matthew 6:5. If it was not prudent for New Testament Christians to stand when praying, will time modify this instruction and sanctify the act of standing when in prayer? Attitude has its influence, when it carries with it all the other necessary characteristics for good.

"He that humbleth himself shall be exalted" (Luke 14:11) is the language of Jesus Christ. And one so closely associated with him as Stephen left an abiding testimony as to the attitude of humility and reverence that most pleased the master—"and he kneeled down" (Acts 7:60)—in harmony with the illustrious example of his leader, the Christ, when he "fell upon the ground" (Mark 14:35). And as we cross the great waters and begin our investigation on this continent, this same idea prevailed as we read, "Humble yourselves even to the dust."—Book of Mormon, p. 299. "Thou shalt not do as the hypocrites, for they love to pray standing in the synagogues" (or churches).—Page 448. "And it came to pass that he spake unto the multitude, and commanded them that they should kneel down. . . . And the twelve did teach the multitude, and behold, they did cause that the multitude should kneel down."—Page 459. "And they did kneel down with the church."—Page 534.

These teachings are ratified by revelation to this church as follows: "He shall kneel with the church and call upon the Father."—Doctrine and Covenants 17:22. But what will the church do when the elder says let us stand? God says, kneel; humble yourselves. Shall we do it, or follow man? The latter-day Seer in his maiden effort "kneeled down," and found favor in the eyes of God. Shall we do likewise? The rule is what we must follow, and not these exceptions by which we give stability to our manner of service.

There are times when standing to pray would be wise, but it would be the exception. At the water when in prayer to kneel in the mud or on the wet grass, or in a crowded house when it would be impossible to kneel, these would be conditions when there might be offered an excuse, if there is any needed. It does seem to me that attitude is significant. We might offer as good and effective prayer, and it be acceptable to God (standing); but it is the rule that we are speaking of, and not the exception. If this shall stir up the pure minds of my brethren and sisters to thinking, I certainly shall feel well paid for the effort. While much more might be said, yet I forbear for fear that it might be thought the writer is in a state of apostasy. If it is a sin to think, I am guilty, and why should it be?

Hopeful of the final triumph, I remain,
In gospel bonds,

CRITICISM OF THE REVEREND MR. HAUPT VERSUS
"JOSEPH SMITH DEFENDED."—NO. 9.

Having digressed from the main subject far enough to notice the texts in favor of an apostasy from the primitive faith, let us return to the thread of our argument on "the latter-day dispensation." The last reference used was Daniel 2, which speaks of a kingdom to be set up in the days of certain ten kings, which we argue could not have been in the days of Christ, but doubtless in the century just closed. Our next text is:

Isaiah 2:2: "And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountain, and shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow unto it."

Mr. Haupt does not attempt an explanation of this text, but indulges in language that very nearly reveals the spirit operating upon him. He says: "But such a handling of God's word is the sin of sacrilege." One is sacrilegious, I suppose, because he differs from Mr. Haupt, and permits God to interpret his own meaning of the word mountain as used in this text. Is it any more sacrilegious for me to differ from him than it is for him to differ from me? If I was wrong, why not show that fact and give a better interpretation of the text if he could. In that matter he has repeatedly failed, and my interpretation still stands.

Perhaps we better examine this text a little more in detail than before as this is a very important one in favor of the "latter day dispensation." The "Lord's house," I presume all will admit, refers to His church, and this was to be "established" in the "last days." This word established is used in the sense as when we speak of any business house being established in 1847 or 1860. We understand it was begun then. Where then is the "unbroken succession" of the house of the Lord since the "King at Jerusalem 33 A. D"?

Ephesians 1:10: "That in the dispensation of the fullness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in him."

After a long explanation of the fifth chapter of Ephesians, little or none of which has any bearing on the subject, but which perhaps we could accept, Mr. Haupt arrives at the following conclusion: "Thus is the primitive Catholic Church of Christ described." He also says: "This is but a part of a very long sentence concerning a very long period of time beginning before the foundation of the world and reaching until the redemption of God's own possession, unto the praise of his glory."

Yes, sir; and during that time there was to be a dispensation for the purpose of gathering all things in Christ on earth as well as in heaven. When is that dispensation? Of this text I said, page 145: "The dispensation here referred to certainly was not the dispensation of nineteen hundred years ago, for that was a time [of] scattering, especially to the Jews; nor was it the "fullness of times," i. e., when all times are full or fulfilled. At this time there was to be another dispensation, when all things in Christ would be gathered together in one, both in heaven and on earth. Paul was writing of a time in the future from that day. It was clearly to be very near the end of the world, for the expression, "fullness of times," could mean nothing else. As a commencement of that time (the gathering of the Jews, Gentiles, and redeemed), there was to be a dispensation to man—a restoration of all things spoken by the prophets. Only Latter Day Saints claim a latter-day dispensation and restoration of the church of God; not a reformation, but a complete restoration of the ancient church of Jesus Christ, with the same officers, the same doctrine, and the same gifts of God following.

Mr. Haupt did not reply to the foregoing, and his explanation of the text does not set it aside. The "dispensation of the fullness of times" is the same as God's latter-day kingdom spoken of by Daniel. Here we have two witnesses that have not been impeached, and we shall introduce others.

Before leaving this text, however, Mr. Haupt must say something on succession, and at the same time misrepresent our faith. Hear him: "Surely if we believe this is God's description of Christ and his church, nothing can make us believe his love and sacrifice and care for his own flesh and bones were all in vain, that this church was destroyed, and another and better established in the nineteenth century." But who claims Christ's love and sacrifice for his church were all in vain? Who claims a "better" church than the one established by Christ was to be established in the nineteenth century? Certainly Latter Day Saints do not. It seems that every time Mr. Haupt tries to quote or in any way refer to the faith of the Latter Day Saints, he misrepresents it. If he would do that with us, might he not with the Bible also? Our position on this is stated above.

Mr. Haupt continues: "More evidence can be produced to prove that Christ's church can not be overcome, [we replied to this under the text of the olive branch,] and the plan of salvation set aside." Who sets aside "the plan of salvation"? It was in the plan that, after the church apostatized God would order another dispensation, of the same faith.

Acts 3:20, 21: "And he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you: whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God has spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."

Mr. Haupt says this refers to the millennium. We think so, too, in part; i. e., that the millennium will be the final outcome, but to bring it about there will be the dispensation of gathering, and as we shall presently see the coming again of Elias the restorer, to "prepare the way of the Lord." The restorer was to restore all things before Messiah comes. Jesus said: "Elias truly shall first come, and restore [from the same root as restitution in Acts 3:21] all things."—Matthew 17:11. Mr. Haupt says: "When He comes, then will be the restitution." Jesus said: "Shall first come, and restore." Here is a case of Mr. Haupt verses Jesus. Whom shall we believe, and what will happen to Mr. Haupt for misapplying the scriptures? Added to the latter-day kingdom, the house of the Lord in the last days, the restitution of gathering at the fullness of times, we have now the restitution of all things spoken by the prophets. Closely connected and associated with this is

Malachi 3:1-4: "Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me: and the Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant, whom ye delight in: "Behold he shall come, saith the Lord of hosts. But who may abide the day of his coming? and who shall stand when he appeareth? for he is like a refiner's fire, and like fuller's soap: and he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver; and he shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness. Then shall the offering of Judah and Jerusalem be pleasant unto the Lord, as in the days of old, and as in former years."

My comment on this text was: "The coming of the Lord here spoken of, certainly was not his first coming, for he did not come suddenly to his temple, nor did any one have any difficulty to stand when he then appeared, neither did he come as a judge or a refiner. Neither did Judah bring forth a pleasant offering, nor did he purify the sons of Levi. Every expression in this text shows that it was the second coming of the Messiah that is referred to, and not the first, and that the Lord's messenger was to prepare the way before him at that time."

Mr. Haupt's answer is: "We admit that this was only partially fulfilled at the first advent, and we look for a second when he shall "purify the sons of Levi," etc. . . . "He" is not Joseph Smith, but the Lord who shall suddenly come to his temple."

Who believes it was Joseph Smith? That is not our faith. Our claim is that Elias gave to Joseph Smith, by appointment of God, the keys of the Levitical priesthood, whereby there may be accomplished the work prophesied of, i. e., under John's direction. Together, we believe that Jesus was the one to purify the sons of Levi, but he was to do it by the restoration of repentance and remission of sins through baptism, and the rest of the gospel. Part of the same prophecy runs to—

Malachi 4: 5: "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and terrible day of the Lord: and he shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse."

Speaking of this matter, Jesus said: "Elias [or Elijah,—one is Greek, the other Hebrew] truly shall first come and restore all things."—Matthew 17: 11. The coming of the prophet was to restore all things first. Of this, Mr. Haupt says: "I think no one questions that Elias shall come and prepare the way for the second advent of Christ." I wish I could find a class of people other than the Latter Day Saints who do believe it. We are glad to enlist Mr. Haupt as a soldier to fight with us against Protestantism on this point. If his church accept the latter-day appearing of the "restorer," what will they do with their doctrine of succession? Or if a prophet arise "among the Jews having the characteristics of Moses and Elias both," where appears the authority of the Episcopal Church? Would it be any more out of harmony with scripture for a prophet to arise among the Gentiles than among the Jews? As Mr. Haupt admits the force of my argument on this text, we have no further need to discuss it, only to add to it Daniel 2, Ephesians 1, Acts 3, and Malachi 3, already discussed.

JOSEPH SMITH'S ORDINATION IN FULFILLMENT OF THE APPEARANCE OF THE RESTORER.

Concerning this ordination (see page 150) Mr. Haupt comments: "We have an ordination by the messenger with the laying on of his hands, performed upon unbaptized persons. Then one of these unbaptized persons, baptized the other, who in turn baptized his baptizer. Then as if recognizing the validity of the 'messenger's' ordination they proceeded to reordain one another to the 'Aaronic' priesthood contrary to the law of God given by Moses. This priesthood is conferred upon men who are not of the sons of Aaron or the tribe of Levi."

Taking up these objections, beginning with the last, we answer. Suppose the ordination was contrary to the law of Moses, we are not now living under the law of Moses. "For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law." (See Hebrews 7: 12). In the time of Moses there were two priesthoods, one conferred on Moses, the other, the lesser, upon Aaron and his sons. The one held by Moses (called the Melchisedec) was typical of that prophet whom the Lord should raise up like unto him. Paul says one was changed. Which one was it? Evidently not the greater, but the one used to administer the law of Moses. That was changed so as to administer in the new covenant which was for all the world and to every creature. The "middle wall of partition was broken down" and the Gentiles admitted to fellowship and priesthood. Notice, Paul does not say the priesthood "under which the people received the law" (verse 11), i. e., the Levitical was abandoned or discontinued, but "changed." According to Mr. Haupt, the Episcopal Church does not possess this priesthood, as they are not of Levi. Therefore all Israelites who come into that church can not again obtain the priesthood of their fathers.

The "two ordinations to one priesthood" is next objected to. As we understand it, the latter was but the confirmation of the former. Had the second not occurred, the church and even Mr. Haupt, when arguing from this standpoint, would have claimed no one could receive that priesthood, except by the hands of a heavenly messenger. He ordained them to baptize and ordain. Thus all the false reasoning that might have been employed is shut off.

"An unbaptized person baptizing another" furnishes the next grounds for complaint. Will Mr. Haupt tell us who baptized Moses, by whom all Israel was baptized? (See 1 Corinthians 10: 1.) Or, who baptized the first person ever baptized? That is no strange thing at the beginning of any dispensation. A command from God is sufficient authority to baptize; but that does not release the baptizer from yielding to the law himself.

"The conferring of priesthood on unbaptized persons," is next objected to. That is no new thing either. Aaron and his sons received it that way and likely the same was true of John the Baptist, the very person who was now bestowing it upon others. Mr. Haupt says: "In what way this affects the sons of Levi we are left in doubt." The messenger said: "This priesthood and this authority shall remain upon the earth, that the sons of Levi may yet offer an offering unto the Lord in righteousness." When the sons of Levi turn to their Messiah, they could not obtain their priesthood from the "Holy Catholic" Church, for they do not claim it, but it has been restored to the Latter Day Saints, and is ready for the sons of Levi when they are ready for it. The efforts of the Episcopal Church among the Jews is of little avail to them, and so far the Jews have had the good judgment to see that point.

"Levitical priesthood in the last day." That the Levitical or Aaronic priesthood is to exist in the last days is evident from the following scripture: "And they shall bring all your brethren for an offering unto the Lord out of all nations upon horses, and in chariots, and in litters, and upon mules, and upon swift beasts, to my holy mountain Jerusalem, saith the Lord, as the children of Israel bring an offering in a clean vessel into the house of the Lord. And I will take of them for priests and for Levites, saith the Lord." Not only of Levi's sons, but "all your brethren." Do the sons of Israel now hold divine authority? If so, how about the claims of the "Catholic Church"? If they are to be made priests and Levites of God, where will they obtain it? Certainly not where it does not exist, but from those to whom it has been restored. Can Mr. Haupt now see how they are to be affected by the restoration of the Levitical priesthood?

"Men as angels." Mr. Haupt says, "The accounts of Joseph and Oliver are contradictory, one saying that it was an angel, the other that it was John the Baptist. John was a man and therefore a different order in the creation." That is no greater mistake than the one made by Luke when he called the two angels that stood by, when Christ ascended, "two men in white apparel." (Acts 1:10). Nor was Oliver Cowdery's mistake greater than Mark's when at the sepulcher, the woman entering "saw a young man sitting on the right side clothed in a long white garment." (Mark 16:5.) Matthew said it was an angel. (See Matthew 28:5.) These accounts are contradictory, and Mr. Haupt to be consistent should reject the account. Men are so critical sometimes, they do as the Dutchman said "cuts off dere face to schpide dere nose." Mortal men are sometimes called angels too, and that by an angel himself. (See Revelation 2:1, 8, 18, and 3:1, 7, etc.) Mr. Haupt seems more anxious to criticise than to search for truth. This very sentence shows him to be prejudiced and a fault-finder, "making a man an offender for a word" (Isaiah 29:20, 21): "The scorner is consumed and all that watch for iniquity are cut off, that make a man an offender for a word."

Mr. Haupt continues: "The redeemed in heaven are more blessed than the angels." But Jesus said: "They are equal unto the angels." A closer study of the Bible, and less of the "apostolic fathers and doctors" would be of much benefit to some modern doctors of divinity. They would not try to doctor divinity so much, perhaps. I recommend Mr. Haupt to the favorable notice of the Utah Mormons on this point. They, too, believe men will pass beyond the angels in the world to come.

Mr. Haupt says again: "As Christ's second advent is to be 'with all the glory of heaven,' a great and terrible day, so the appearance of John the Baptist is to be in the spirit and power of Elijah." Does Mr. Haupt mean by that, that Elijah was to come "with all the power of heaven"? If not, why did he make the comparison by using the word as? To be sure, he does not say he was to come in that way, only by his comparison, but why mention the Savior's coming and burden this point with foreign matter? It "darkens counsel with words without wisdom." But what was the "spirit and power of Elijah"? Wherein did John manifest a lack of that spirit in either of his earthly missions? Mr. Haupt continues: "There is no scripture to warrant the idea of his (John's) coming as a thief in the night or that he will be seen by only two men." Where is the scripture against his appearing to only two men? Angelic or other heavenly messengers have seldom appeared publicly. Take the many accounts of angel visits, and notice that usually they have appeared to one or two, or to a small company, all of one faith. In fact it is the Lord's plan to reveal his power to "witnesses chosen before of God." (Acts 10:41.)

The introduction of the last dispensation was in a similar manner to those of the first, third, sixth, and ninth hour dispensations; that is, by an angel. Strange, indeed, the Lord does not do things as Mr. Haupt would wish. One thing can be said of the Lord, however; he always acts like himself; that is, in every age alike. But why say he came as a thief in the night, when the witness says, "As in the blaze of day; yes, more, above the glitter of the May sunbeam which then shed its brilliancy over the face of nature then his voice, though mild, pierced to the center, and his words, 'I am thy fellow-servant,' dispelled every fear." That is not like a thief in the night. Not more so than the visit of Moses and Elias on the mount of transfiguration to only three of the disciples. So important an event as that, and only four persons to behold it! Strange!

Zechariah 2:2-4: My comments on the foregoing text are found on pages 153 to 158 of Joseph Smith Defended. Among other things I wrote: "Several times Jerusalem has been rebuilt and inhabited, but not until since 1853 has it been inhabited without walls. This of itself locates the fulfillment of the prophecy in our time, and it will be noticed that the prophet saw that a young man was to make the proclamation because of instruction from an angel."

Mr. Haupt says: "No version of this scripture that I have been able to find says that a young man was to make the proclamation because of instructions from an angel. There is nothing common between this young man and Joseph, except they were both young, and Joseph Smith claims the angel visited him also."

We can see more points "in common" than that. The point of time is a very important one, yet Mr. Haupt totally ignores it. Perhaps that is the only thing he could do. There is no escape from the conclusion that the prophecy was to have its fulfillment in our day. Here is a "common" point, Joseph's declaration fits the time exactly. The scriptures do say that the prophet saw "another angel [who] went out to meet him, and said unto him, Run, speak to this young man, saying, Jerusalem shall be inhabited as towns without walls." All through the chapter the Lord shows what shall come in the latter days upon Jerusalem and Israel, and the matter is introduced by the prophet saying that he saw and heard that a young man was to be instructed by an angel. In our book we showed Mr. Smith was so instructed.

Isaiah 11:11, 12: Mr. Haupt says: "If the author had no intention of deceiving, he could have saved time by quoting the preceding verse." After quoting the verse, he says: "The ensign then, instead of being a new church, is the root of Jesse." My argument was, that it was the body of Christ, the church. Where is the deception? Mr. Haupt is himself committed to the deception, if it be a deception, for he continues: "Make this mean the church if you will, then read the epistles to the Ephesians and Corinthians and learn again that Christ has but one body into which he will gather both Gentiles and Jews." What manner of man is it that will charge another with deception when he himself is committed to the same deception? According to his view, I deceived my readers by not quoting the previous verse; and yet when he quotes it, he comes to the same conclusion as myself.

Mr. Haupt continues: "These texts say no more about it being started anew, than they do of reforming, restoring, or reorganizing it." By his admission, if they say "no more," then they do say as much: Thanks for the forced admission. But of the three he mentions, to which theory does he hold, reorganizing, restoring, or reforming? A careful reading of the texts will disclose the fact that a reformation is not even hinted at. That he was to restore it again from heaven is our claim, and thus in one sense it was reorganized.

Before passing on we may as well notice more fully the point to which we promised to give more serious consideration. "By its very nature as Christ's body, it has the power within to grow, to renew its strength, cast off disease and diseased members affected by parasites crept in unawares."

We should not be surprised to hear a Roman Catholic use that argument; but we are a little surprised that one of her offspring, "parasite" perhaps though, should use it. There is nothing in the nature of the church as Christ's body to prevent its apostasy and final death, seeing it is only yet the church militant. Indeed, even though it were the church triumphant, there is nothing to prevent it even then. The angels which kept not their first estate fell, even Lucifer; the son of the morning, abode not in the truth. Our foreparent Adam lost his first estate through transgression. Are we more holy than they, seeing we are yet human? The proposition of Reverend Mr. Haupt presupposes the idea of "once in grace, always in grace," for men, while it was not true of angels, or even of the "son of the morning." Admit the possibility of falling from grace and you admit the possibility of the apostasy; for what one man may do, so also may every other. Admit the truth, that a servant of God worthy to receive talents and burying them and finally being cast out, and you admit the possibility of a failure on the part of every other servant. It does not therefore follow that because the church is the body of Christ it can not fall. By its very nature, says Reverend Haupt. What is its nature? Indestructible? Can anything composed of human timber be indestructible? Can an indestructible structure be made of destructible material? Christ is the head of the church as a husband is the head of the wife, but there are legitimate reasons for a separation, and that is infidelity to the marriage vow. So also may the bride of Christ prove unfaithful to her marriage vow and be divorced by her Lord. The church is not the physical nor yet the literal body of Christ, else she could not be his bride. But she is the mystical body of Christ. Paul says: "For the husband is the head of the wife even as Christ is the head of the church." While in other places Paul uses similiar expressions, here he explains how. It is therefore not impossible for the church to fall or fail. Such position will not stand the test of reason. But, says Reverend Haupt, "It has the power within to grow." But has it that power independent of God, i. e., "within" or of itself; or only when it abides in the vine? The Holy Spirit is therefore the life substance flowing from the vine to the branches, but the Holy Spirit will not "abide in unholy temples." The church has not the power to grow of herself, for "no man can come to Christ except the Father draw him." It has no power to renew its strength, for all earthly timber is perishable, and the renewing is "the renewing of the Holy Ghost," individually, and consequently collectively. "God giveth the increase." How are its acts of cutting off effectual unless, first, the party is guilty, and, second, unless they themselves are righteous, and thereby hold the keys. And this power they have not "within"; it is given of God.

Having noticed the statement that "by its very nature, the church has the power within to grow," etc., we notice his further statement, "Therefore with the restoration of the Jews, the church will be set up in Jerusalem as never before."

Any effort to convert the Jews before that time will be premature; besides that, the Church of England could not make them priests of the Levitical priesthood, as it does not possess it, and it requires present revelation from God to designate whom to ordain. But they are doing the work of the Gentiles in nursing them, etc. Mr. Haupt then says: "If this ensign means the Latter Day Saint church, it must have a large membership of converted Jews; but the Anglican branch of the Catholic Church has almost as many Jews in it as the entire membership of the Reorganization." Not too fast, Mr. Haupt; the time is not yet come, although it is fast approaching. The Jews are not yet gathered. Unlike the Church of England, we are not running without tidings, and our work is not premature. The last shall be first and the first shall be last. The gospel was first given in Jesus' day to the Jews and afterward went to the Gentiles. In latter days it was first given to the Gentiles and afterward is to go to the Jews, "to a nation scattered and peeled." "When the fullness of the Gentiles be come in," then will come salvation to the Jews. All the efforts of the Church of England and Church of Germany and others are fulfilling scripture, however, where it says, "They shall bring your sons and daughters from afar," etc. The phenomenal gain in wealth, of the Jews is also fulfillment of scripture. "They shall suck the milk of the Gentiles," etc., "and the wealth of all the heathen shall be gathered together, gold and silver in great abundance," etc. This is to be immediately at the time when all nations (including England), will be gathered against the Jews and Christ shall descend to the very place he ascended from—the Mount of Olives. Everything in its time, Bro. Haupt. Do not hurry the Lord. One man lost his life for trying to steady the ark of God who had no right to touch it.

Isaiah 5:25, 28: My position on this text was: "Who ever heard of horses with wheels." Surely we all have in latter days,—since 1825. We have both seen and heard the "iron horse"—the locomotive—with its wheels, indeed like a whirlwind. This last clause will locate the time when this prophecy was to have its fulfillment, when this ensign was to be "set up." There are other points also in this text that will help us to determine the time. One is, those who travel, would do so with "speed swiftly," but in this traveling, none should be "weary or stumble among them." At the time when people could travel in this way on horses with "wheels like a whirlwind," God would "lift up an ensign afar off," at the "end of the earth." This not only shows when but where. The end of the earth would certainly be at the farthest point, and of course going from Jerusalem would land us in America. It would also be "from afar." In reply to the above, Mr. Haupt wrote: "Again we are compelled to make a flat contradiction, for this passage says nothing about 'horses with wheels.' Ask any school-teacher to read verses twenty-six to thirty and give you the antecedent of 'their,' in every clause, and you will find that in every case these plural pronouns have nations and not horses as antecedents."

"The Hebrew has the singular pronoun he, his, and him, in which case the antecedent would be ensign." To which position does Mr. Haupt hold? His interpretation is unsatisfactory and contradictory. In fact it seems as if just anything will do, just so it contradicts the Latter Day Saints. If the pronoun is plural it can not be singular, and if singular it can not be plural, and if the antecedent is "nations," it can not be "ensign"; and if "ensign," it can not be "nations." Which is it? Not a very safe guide. We are expected to use reason as well as book learning. Shall we apply a little reason to this text and others? What are nations, with wheels like a whirlwind, or an "ensign" with "wheels like a whirlwind." What is the "roaring of a nation like a young lion"? or the "roaring" of an "ensign," "like young lions"? As a rule the antecedent should closely precede the pronoun, and not the pronoun pass back over one or two nouns to find its antecedent. According to Bro. Haupt we must pass over the word horse and go back to nations. But suppose we admit for the sake of the argument that the prophet desired to convey the idea that the horses and not the ensign or nations were to have "wheels like a whirlwind," would he not have used the very expression used here? What else could he have said? Our interpretation is more in harmony with the rules of grammar, more in harmony with reason, and the only word that could have been used to convey the idea we contend for. Mr. Haupt must of course contend for an interpretation that is not against his position. By thus floundering, he reveals the fact that he fears this passage of scripture; for he can not separate the time of the setting up of the ensign from the appearance of the horses with wheels like a whirlwind, so away goes his apostolic succession.

Mr. Haupt continues: "Nor does it say this ensign shall be afar off, at the end of the earth, but, he will lift up an ensign to the nations (which are) from far, 'from the ends of the earth.'"

The clear, common sense, reasonable rendering of this passage is that the ensign would be especially for the nations afar off, and that he would "hiss unto them from the ends of the earth" and not from Jerusalem; and, in connection with the rest of the text shows it was to be in our time. Mr. Haupt's expression, "the ensign (the root of Jesse) was lifted up upon the cross at Jerusalem, has been carried 'unto the nations from far,'" does not harmonize with the text in any sense.

LAND BOOM IN JERUSALEM.

The real estate boom in Jerusalem and the Holy Land was explained to the Omaha Real Estate Exchange at its noon meeting on Wednesday by Reverend Doctor J. M. Caldwell of Chicago. He visited Palestine in 1890 and since that time has been in constant communication with Americans there.

"Palestine is being restored to the Jews," said Doctor Caldwell. "The last thirty years have been rich in fulfillment of Bible prophecy. From the year 79 to thirty years ago—nearly eighteen hundred years—the Jews were not allowed in Palestine. It had fallen into the hands of the Turks and had gone to consequent ruin. It was leased out to the people in small parcels of about five acres each and was farmed with primitive farming utensils, which had not improved in the last three thousand years. Their plows only scratched the ground about like a harrow and the ground which in the time of Christ brought forth, 'thirty, sixty, and an hundredfold' yielded only about fivefold. The people actually wept as they sowed the seed—it was so precious.

"To-day that same ground is the most fertile in the world. It was American plows and harrows that brought the good qualities out of the soil. American farming implements dominate there to-day as they do all over Europe and Asia.

"To-day there are in Palestine 225,000 Jews and if the present rate of influx continues the Jews will be again in possession of Palestine by the end of another twenty years."—Omaha Bee, June 5.

COLD STORAGE DANGERS.

Doctor H. W. Wiley has been investigating the effects of cold storage upon eggs, meats, and other foodstuffs. He has found that meats of all kinds deteriorate rapidly in cold storage. He pronounces meat which has been in cold storage more than three months to be entirely unfit to eat, but states that eggs deteriorate much more rapidly than does meat. The result of his investigations will doubtless be to liberate and put in the hands of the public scavenger enormous quantities of eggs and the decaying carcasses of beasts of various sorts which have been confined in cold storage for indefinite periods. Doctor Wiley says the contents of many cold storage warehouses "seem to be serving life sentences, with no commutation for good behavior."

The proprietor of a cold storage warehouse in Chicago stated to the writer some years ago that there were dead ducks in his warehouse to the number of many thousands which had been incarcerated there for more than three years. The antique specimens all doubtless found burial in human stomachs without their rotten condition being discovered, through the dexterity of the experienced chef who knows how to disguise the flavor of putrescence with hot condiments of various sorts.—Good Health.

A PROPOSED CHURCH UNION.

Negotiations pending since 1903 for an organic union between the Congregational, the Methodist Protestant, and the United Brethren Churches have resulted in an act of union which has been adopted by joint committees of the three denominations; an act, however, yet to be passed upon by the churches concerned. The Congregationalists have about 6,000 churches, the Methodist Protestants about 2,200, and the United Brethren about 4,000. To accomplish organic union it will be necessary for these bodies to reorganize their missionary and publishing societies so as to make one society do the work now done by three, and also to reorganize their conferences and associations so as to make one ecclesiastical body serve the purpose of three. The union does not necessarily involve the merger of local churches, though this might doubtless follow in some localities. A liberal and evangelical declaration of faith has been agreed upon, though there is not in the Articles of Agreement anything to indicate that this declaration of faith is imposed as binding upon any of the churches. It is apparently a statement of what the churches do believe, and not a statement of what the churches and the ministers are required to believe. The name of the joint organization is hopelessly cumbersome. It is, "The United Churches, Comprising the Congregational Churches, the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, and the Methodist Protestant Church." It is suggested that the title "The United Churches" will in practice be substituted; but if the one title is too cumbersome, the other title is too unmeaning. Very serious opposition to the union has been developed in some of the strongest Congregational churches, preëminently among them the Old South Church in Boston, the Broadway Tabernacle in New York, and the Tompkins Avenue in Brooklyn. It is not the province of the Outlook to discuss purely ecclesiastical questions; we leave those to be debated by the ecclesiastical journals. It is legitimate, however, to explain for the benefit of non-Congregational readers the three fundamental principles of Congregationalism. They are: (1) The absolute independence of each local church, which is a pure democracy and has power to frame its own creed, organize its own ritual, form its own rules of business, and elect its own officers. In doing this it may ask counsel of other local churches, but no ecclesiastical body, whether council, conference, or association, has any authority over the local church. (2) In the local church all the members are on an absolute ecclesiastical equality; neither pastor nor deacon, however great his influence may be, has any greater authority than the humblest member. (3) These churches fellowship one another and coöperate in common undertakings, and societies have been organized for the purpose of carrying on these common undertakings, but they are not under the direct ecclesiastical control of any distinctly ecclesiastical body. The Congregational Councils and Association exercise neither legislative nor judicial functions; they only express opinions and offer advice. Whether the proposed Articles of Agreement between the Congregational, the United Brethren, and the Methodist Protestant Churches are consistent with these fundamental principles of Congregationalism is one of the questions upon which the Congregationalists themselves seem not to be fully agreed. Without undertaking to pass judgment on that question, it is clear that the Congregationalists ought not to surrender or modify either one of these three fundamental principles unless they do so intelligently, purposely, and with a clear understanding of what they are doing; and if they do not mean to surrender or modify either one of these principles, those principles should be made so clear in the Articles of Agreement that there can be no opportunity for future discussion on the question whether they have done so.—Outlook, June 29, 1907.

THE PRICE OF WAR.

SCENES FOLLOWING THE BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG.

No contrast could have been gloomier than that between the light-hearted hilarity of our breakfast and my visit to the battle-field immediately following it. The rebels had removed many if not most of their dead, but ours lay still in ghastly array on the ground where they had fallen. There can be no more hideous sight than that of the corpses on a battle-field after they have been exposed a day or more to the sun in warm weather—the bodies swollen to monstrous size, the faces bloated and black, the eyes bulging out with a dead stare, all their features puffed out almost beyond recognition, some lying singly or in rows, others in heaps, having fallen over one another, some in attitude of peaceful repose, others with arms raised, others in a sitting posture, others on their knees, others clawing the earth, many horribly distorted by what must have been a frightful death-struggle.

There were more harrowing experiences in store for me that day. To look after the wounded of my command, I visited the places where the surgeons were at work. At Bull Run I had seen only on a very small scale what I was now to behold. At Gettysburg the wounded—many thousands of them—were carried to the farmsteads behind our lines. The houses, the barns, the sheds, and the open barnyards were crowded with moaning and wailing human beings, and still an unceasing procession of stretchers and ambulances was coming in. A heavy rain set in during the day—the usual rain after a battle—and large numbers had to remain unprotected in the open, there being no room left under roof. I saw long rows of men lying under the eaves of the buildings, the water pouring down upon their bodies in streams. Most of the operating-tables were placed in the open, where the light was best, some of them partially protected against the rain by tarpaulins or blankets stretched upon poles. There stood the surgeons, their sleeves rolled up to the elbows, their bare arms as well as their linen aprons smeared with blood, their knives not seldom held between their teeth while they were helping a patient on or off the table, or had their hands otherwise occupied; around them pools of blood and amputated arms or legs in heaps, sometimes more than man-high. Antiseptic methods were still unknown at that time. As a wounded man was lifted on the table, often shrieking with pain as the attendants handled him, the surgeon quickly examined the wound and resolved upon cutting off the injured limb. Some ether was administered, and the body put in position in a moment. The surgeon snatched his knife from between his teeth, where it had been while his hands were busy, wiped it rapidly once or twice across his blood-stained apron, and the cutting began. The operation accomplished, the surgeon would look around with a deep sigh, and then—"next!"

And so it went on, hour after hour, while the number of expectant patients seemed hardly to diminish. Now and then one of the wounded men would call attention to the fact that his neighbor lying on the ground had given up the ghost while waiting for his turn, and the dead body was then quietly removed. Or a surgeon, having been long at work, would put down his knife, exclaiming that his hand had grown unsteady, and that this was too much for human endurance, hysterical tears not seldom streaming down his face. Many of the wounded men suffered with silent fortitude, fierce determination in the knitting of their brows and the steady gaze of their bloodshot eyes. Some would even force themselves to a grim jest about their situation or about the "skedaddling" of the rebels. But there were, too, heartrending groans and shrill cries of pain piercing the air, and despairing exclamations, "Oh, Lord! Oh, Lord!" or "Let me die!" or softer murmurings in which the words "mother" or "father," or "home" were often heard. I saw many of my command among the sufferers, whose faces I well remembered, and who greeted me with a look or even a painful smile of recognition, and usually with the question what I thought of their chances of life, or whether I could do anything for them, or sometimes, also, whether I thought the enemy was well beaten. I was sadly conscious that many of the words of cheer and encouragement I gave them were mere hollow sound, but they might be at least some solace for the moment.—Carl Schurz in McClure's Magazine.

THE POWER OF EXAMPLE IN KEEPING THE SABBATH DAY.

The tendency of the times is to detract from the sacredness of the Sabbath day, and if we, as parents, wish to see it observed as the Lord intended it should be, we must look well to our own example with regard to it.

We need not expect our children to reverence the day if the example in the home is to lie in bed on that day until there is barely time to get ready for the preaching-service, while the Sunday-school is overlooked altogether, if it comes in the morning. We can not expect them to delight in it if they are accustomed to hear such expressions as these, Oh dear! I am so tired; there is so much going to church that Sunday is the hardest day of the week to me; and as one young lady answered me a short time ago when I suggested to her that she would enjoy our Sunday-school if she would attend, "I think I am serving my Master best by staying at home to rest on that day. After working hard all the week, it is so nice to slip on an easy wrapper and lie around and rest on that day." "Well," says some one, "the Sabbath is designed as a day of rest, and if one is very tired, why not rest then?" True, it is intended as a day of rest; but of worship also. We need holy inspiration, as well as rest, to enable us to make our lives the best they are capable of being, not only spiritually but physically, and I am sure there is not much inspiration in lying around all day, perhaps whiling away the time with some light literature.

I am not one of those who plead for too strenuous church-going on the Sabbath, for I remember how the Savior answered the Jews when they reproached him for giving relief to the suffering on that day; but I think even our church-going should be tempered with wisdom. Nevertheless, I think, in these days of pleasure-seeking, there is more danger of our being too lax rather than too careful.

If we want our children to delight in the day, we must show them by every act of ours that we delight in it.

We want to make it a day that the children can look forward to with joy, not for the indulgences they receive, but for the real uplifting pleasures they are to partake of. Let us make it a day of rest, by having our house set in order, our food as nearly prepared as is possible, and our clothes and bodies made clean on the day previous.

Father will not have to go to work on that day, and it may not be necessary to rise quite so early as on week-days; but it must be early enough to enable us to get ready for the first service of the day without hurry. Let us rise with joy in our hearts and a song of praise on our lips; not forgetting to call the family together as soon as they are ready, to return thanks to God, and to seek his blessing in such a way that the children may partake of the service with pleasure.

And oh! if father can sometimes take the children, or a part of them, for a walk, while the mother is getting necessary work done up, and by calling their attention to the birds and flowers and other things of Nature, and from them leading their young minds up to Nature's God, he may prepare them to partake of the service of God's house with reverence. There is nothing more inspiring than an early morning walk on a beautiful Sabbath day with some one who can help us to see, in the beauties around us, a foretaste of the life to come. I know this, because I remember such walks with my father.

Let us make it a holy day by setting aside the things we have engaged in during the week. Let us wear our Sunday garments, read our Sunday books, sing our Sunday songs, visit only where we can do good or get good, and eat our Sunday dinner, which, though mostly prepared the day before, should be such as the children will enjoy, simply for the sake of helping to make the day a glad one.

Perhaps some one will say, If we are so careful to attend to all such details, we shall become quite pharisaical. But that is not our intention. We simply want to impress the thought of the important part those little things play in the formation of the habits and character of the child, while above all these we must keep in mind the one important thought that God has blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it, and he has commanded us to keep it as a day of rest and worship. Christ did not condemn the Pharisee for giving attention to the little things, but said, "These ye ought to have done and not to have left the other undone." A child is impressed by these small things, while the main thought may be quite beyond him. Do you think I have forgotten how it used to be my dear mother's custom to have our shoes nicely polished and our clean clothes made ready on Saturday evening for Sunday morning or the gentle reproof of our father one Sunday morning soon after we had been to breakfast when he found my two sisters and me at the pump in the back yard playing with the water and splattering our polished shoes and clean, white aprons with it? Do you think such things did not help to give me a lasting reverence for the Sabbath day? They surely did, and the memory of them is as impressive to-day as it was fifty years ago. I tell you, parents, our example will speak to our children long, long after our precepts are forgotten.

Questions on August Reading.

What is the intention of the Lord in regard to the keeping of the Sabbath? Where may we find instruction concerning this? What is to be gained by rising early on Sunday morning? What exception to this rule of early rising is justifiable? Should undue weariness be avoided by proper use of the time through the week? Is there any lesson for us in the Jewish preparation for the Sabbath? What is the effect, spiritually, to one in health, of spending the Sabbath in lying around? What need besides rest to the body, is the Sabbath designed to supply? Should our church-going be set aside for pleasure-keeping? What causes may legitimately keep us from church services? What evidences do we see of laxity in the keeping of the Sabbath? Do we delight in the Lord's day? How can we show our delight in the day? How shall we make the Sabbath enjoyable to the children? Is merry-making in harmony with the sacredness of the day? What is the Lord's command in regard to the preparing of our food? What is meant by the singleness of heart with which we are to observe the day? Should this day be made one for the entertaining of company, or should it be sacred to the family life? Is there no call for the exercise of Sunday hospitality? What habits formed in childhood will have a tendency to lead to keeping the day sacred? Give illustrations of the effect of example in the keeping of the Sabbath. Have we the reverence for the day that will make our example worthy of being followed?

Letter Department

HURON, South Dakota, July, 1907.

Dear Herald: I will try to give you a few items of an itinerant minister in the land of isolation, for in this mission of two hundred miles square there are about sixty families, or parts of families, and not one branch; so they must depend on the church papers and the missionary for whatever instruction they receive, and wherever we go we are welcome guests. The writer generally follows the rule not to go where he can not get a response to his letters, believing that there is some legitimate reason existing why they do not invite him. I had an invitation from Sr. Anna

Johnson of Castlewood, South Dakota, to come to Dempster, a near-by town, where her sister, Mrs. Stringer, resided. It was a journey of more than three hundred miles, and on May 22 after having planned a journey that would take in the isolated ones, I bade loved ones and friends in Omaha good-bye, hoping to be with them again by Christmas-time. I remained one night in Sioux City and enjoyed the hospitality of the Saints, and on the morrow rode behind a footless steed to Akron, where I visited the Mans and Anways (too many to name all), and made the short visit—one of mutual good to all by social talk on gospel themes. On the 24th I stepped off the train at Fairview and was met by Bro. E. C. Dougherty and taken to his home, where I tarried over Sunday the 26th and had an enjoyable time with the home class Sunday-school, five of whom I had baptized one year before, and held one preaching-service. The 27th found me at Sioux Falls at the home of Mr. Pearson where Grandma Emmons resides. I was made welcome and kindly cared for. It is pleasant to find honorable men of the world who think like Robert Burns, "A man's a man for a' that."

On the 28th a journey of seventeen miles brought me to the home of Frank Pletcher and wife, two miles from Valley Springs, where I tarried thirty-six hours and then hied away to Salem to the home of Bro. DeLon R. Lytle to remain part of the day. On the 30th I was welcomed at the station at Brookings, being met by Bro. and Sr. DeLapp and all the family at eleven o'clock, and enjoyed their hospitality for one day. I was now a few hours' ride from my destination; but perhaps the reader wonders why all this stopping: to feed the flock of God whom the church has committed to the care of the missionaries; to encourage, comfort, cheer, edify, and anything that a servant of God of right ought to do, which includes helping the publishing departments. On the 31st I went to Dempster and was kindly received by Mrs. Stringer. Arrangements had been made for meeting in the village schoolhouse. Mrs. Van Hess, daughter of Mrs. Stringer, and Sr. Johnson came to attend the meetings. The weather was very unfavorable, raining a great part of the time. Ten preaching-services were held, and many hours of private conversation and reading the scripture which convinced Mrs. Stringer and Mrs. Van Hess that they ought to obey the truth. The former is a widow with several children dependent upon her. Opposition soon developed which may break up the home. She concluded to follow Christ and trust a loving Father for strength to bear her trials. May the ministrations of God's Spirit cheer her in time of trial, and give her strength to endure.

On June 15 I went to Arlington, and then out in the country seven miles to a small band of Saints. It is the only place in this State that I have found a people that take a real interest in the gospel. They make a strenuous time for the missionary. They are anxious to learn, and this includes those not members. The only way to escape their inquisitiveness and persistency is to go to bed, and it will be of short duration there. I preached ten sermons, attended two sessions of Sunday-school, baptized four, collected tithing, sold books, and received subscriptions for church publications. Brn. Eli Hayer and L. G. Wood had planted the seed; the writer was greatly blessed in watering it, and God gave the increase, and we left all cheerful and hopeful, and some at the threshold "almost persuaded."

The 24th found me in Huron at the home of Bro. E. E. Willard. He was rejoicing because of spiritual and temporal blessings, and also that the reproach of being a "bachelor" was removed, and as a new crowned queen of the home, his bride of a few weeks, presided with grace and good cheer.

On the 29th, by the agreement with my colaborer, Bro. L. G. Wood, we commenced a two day's meeting in the grove of Bro. B. C. Rooker, six miles northeast of Spencer. Bro. and Sr. Lytle, and family, of Salem, Bro. and Sr. George Kelley, and Sr. May Putnam were there, and we had a pleasant and profitable time. Two were baptized—Sunday-school home class scholars. We were blessed in preaching, the Saints were cheered, and friends made. Bro. Wood had baptized two before meeting me. Knowing by experience the difficulties in the way of reaching the people in this mission, a special effort of one month's meetings will be made in Brookings in the month of October, and because the missionaries or the one family can not meet the expense, it is deemed expedient to ask the Saints to aid financially in the enterprize. We will need to rent a hall, and an eight-page paper will be issued containing special articles from well known writers in the church which will be a very valuable feature and will aid in the work. Dear Saints, as God hath prospered you, we will be pleased to have your assistance. Address and remit as is most convenient, to Brookings, South Dakota.

EDWARD RANNIE.

Branch and District Work.

Dear Herald: As some are asking why I resigned as a member of the High Council of Lamoni Stake, I hereby state that the reason was given in my resignation sent to the May meeting of the council; but it was not published in the account of the conference when it was finally accepted, not being considered necessary. So will now say that my reason was my inability to hear well enough to enable me to keep good trace of the business transacted. Two or three times before May I had written my resignation, but fear of being hasty prevented me from handing them in. Finally, after much thought and prayer, I decided that it would not be wrong, but that I was justified in vacating, and I did so. It seems to me that it is not a matter of very great moment wherein a man serves or does his duty, if he will but do it whenever it falls to him. It is not the office, but the usefulness in it that counts.

I will add that about forty years ago, perhaps in consequence of my army service, I gradually became entirely deaf in one ear; but I heard so well with the other one that few, even of my friends, knew of the defect. But now for six years past the other has been failing, and for two years I have heard little ordinary conversation, and during months I never hear a prayer excepting my own, and very seldom a testimony in the social meetings. Occasionally one speaks distinctly a few words in the right tone for me to gather it, and when Bro. George Derry of Lamoni is on the same side of the house where I sit I often hear all he says, if his face is not away from me. So with sermons. I can hear one who speaks in an even clear tone, if he is not too far away, but can not hear those whose voices change rapidly between high and low, as is the manner of most public speakers. All who are hard of hearing find these sore difficulties. Therefore, to sit for hours, whether during preaching or at social meetings, shut out from communication, is no small trial to those in the church whose hearing is defective, and because of this lack, some meetings are not attended by them. But "let patience have her perfect work" if possible.

Nevertheless I continue to be deeply interested in branch and district services, in the work that builds up the Saints and the church at home, and I have been especially interested since 1870, when I was called to the charge of district work in Northern Illinois and Southern Wisconsin, and during many years I devoted my time in trying to improve the branches, so far as I understood how; for I believed, and still believe, that the first great need in the church is to feed and strengthen those we have and whom God brings to us, rather than to let them grow weak and perhaps die, while the church devotes the chief time and means to urge to obedience others who may later come to the same neglect about nourishment and growth. Indeed it is pretty certain that if all our branches and districts were doing their best to keep the commandment, "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works," and if in them the pastors, priests, and teachers were as active in their callings as the word of the Lord provides for, then the inevitable result of such spiritual excellence would be a much larger gain in numbers than now results, or ever will result from the combined efforts of any missionary force we can send into the world independent of this happy condition which has been commanded by our Lord to be manifested in the daily lives of those already his people. The natural increase in numbers of conversion under such favorable circumstances would surely be very great, besides the gladness, the joy, and the spiritual growth resulting to every faithful member and to the whole body because of such righteous condition among God's people throughout the branches, districts, and stakes. And that is what he is seeking for; not so much the number, as the righteousness. (See Deuteronomy 7: 6-7.)

In closing will mention that I have continued to preach in the Lamoni stake every Sunday since General Conference up to June 30 having been occupied. Have spoken at Evergreen, Leon, Lamoni, Greenville, Pleasanton, Ellston, Wood Schoolhouse, and McDaniel Schoolhouse; and, though now disabled by rheumatism, being part of the time helpless, yet I hope to get out again and do what I can while life lasts. I have also been on constant call among the sick and the shut-in Saints. Have preached thirteen funeral sermons since January 1, and in May baptized seven persons.

Sincerely yours,

LAMONI, Iowa, July 8, 1907.

H. A. STEBBINS.

Mobile, Alabama, Reunion.

The Mobile reunion is a matter of history. It closed Sunday, the 7th. A good time was had by all who attended, we believe. The Saints were so well pleased that the vote was unanimous for another reunion to be held at the same place in October, 1908. This is the first one ever held in this district.

The attendance was rather small during the week, except nights and the Fourth. The Fourth was children's day, and a good time was had. It was quiet for a Fourth to we Northerners, as there was no shooting of guns or fire-crackers. They reserve such for Christmas times.

Bro. C. J. Clark and wife of Memphis, Tennessee, were with us and rendered good assistance. The preaching was done by Bro. Alma, N. L., and W. L. Brooker, George Bankester, G. W. Sherman, C. J. Clark, and the writer. Two were baptized.

Bro. Clark and I will travel together till after the Alabama reunion. The first point we will visit after leaving here, will be Bay Minette.

Yours respectfully,

J. M. STUBBART.

Confession; Request for Prayer.

Editors Herald: I have many times thought to write a few lines, but felt my weakness and unworthiness. In my girlhood I obeyed this beautiful gospel, lived and enjoyed it until we became isolated, no Saints, no church, and I in my weakness drifted and indulged in worldly life. I feel my guilt very much, and have much to confess, as during that time I set no proper example before my family or others. I have been afflicted several years with a disease known to the world as cancer; but the Lord in his mercy has promised me that if I would humble myself sufficiently I would yet be healed; and, dear Saints, though wicked, guilty of deceit and unfaithfulness, I am willing to come as it were to the foot of the cross, confess my weakness before the world, as well as before my heavenly Father. And oh, that this may be acceptable, and that I may be healed, and devote the balance of my life to his service! Never in my life have I felt so weak and humble as now; and may God in his great mercy (who has watched over me during my neglect) see fit to forgive and heal this body of mine! I hope I may not ask too much space in our paper; but I feel that an open confession should be made before the Saints and the world, that it may be a warning to some who may have stepped aside, as I did. Dear Saints in general, pray for me, that this disease may be rebuked, and, if the Lord will, that I may be spared to my family, who yet need a mother's care.

Your sister in the gospel,

HETTIE WATTS.

Extracts from Letters.

John Zahnd, New Albany, Indiana: I wish to let the Southern Indiana Saints know that I have again located in their midst, and will likely make New Albany, Indiana, my future home. My address will be 2017 Culbertson Avenue, and any of the elders passing through will find a welcome home, as in the past.

News From Branches

KEOKUK, IOWA.

The Keokuk Saints are improving their chapel. We are having electric lights put in; also arranging to have it repapered.

Considering the hot weather our attendance is good. It has become necessary to add another class to our Sunday-school.

We met for the first time to study the Book of Mormon at seven o'clock Sunday evening. It may be we will have a Religio in the near future.

Some of those who were recently baptized are taking an active part. There are several who linger at the door, and I pray God will help them to obey.

A. C. ANDERSON.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

Brn. McDowell and James Baggerly are doing street-preaching in West Pullman with large and attentive audiences. The West Pullman Branch flourished at one time, with a membership perhaps the equal of either of the city branches, but a falling away of one or two at a time has reduced the membership to perhaps a score, who meet in a convenient little hall, depending almost entirely on the other branches for ministration from the priesthood. Bro. McDowell has been faithful in his work and time devoted to them, and it would appear that his labors are showing signs of fruitage.

The local brethren frequently do street-work in the way of following up other denominations, and entering discussion, and quite often gathering their own crowd. Hard it is to interest people of the city in anything pertaining to the gospel. Those who are inclined to be worshipful have their select organization and church, and it takes much "presentation" of "persuasion" to awaken a semi-trained mind to a greater light.

Many things seem to contribute to make Chicago one of the seven wonders of the world, and it would not seem strange were we to learn that one of them is the almost impracticability of the Saints here uniting so far as possible into a central branch, and purchasing suitable church property. This, while it would seem the wisest thing to do, is so far from being in harmony with the general will, that it would be useless for any faction to begin an agitation along that line, as any union would mean a disunion along other lines, in the way of removing many a great distance from either church or employment.

The West Side Branch at present are making a strenuous effort to secure church property. And they are trying so hard and so unitedly, too, that they are going to succeed "the first thing you know," and find themselves lodged in a little church of their own; and so quick will be the turn in affairs and so complete the coup that many will exclaim, with a retrospective glance, "How did it happen, anyway?" Although we have squeezed and squeezed and schemed, we are almost to our last penny, and still lack about four hundred dollars, of being able to start anything, but that keeps lopping off a little here and there, like an island in a swollen river. The Saints are all active, and willing to work, but we have a hard proposition to face, which makes the problem appear the harder. A few disadvantages that once confronted us have passed away. Will they stay, and new advantages spring up to reward a faithful band of people who have struggled hard to procure a church in which to serve the Lord, and break the bread of the world?

ST. JOSEPH, MISSOURI.

Everything seems to be progressing nicely in the St. Joseph Branch. Bro. Goodrich and family are now settled in their new home, and, although still grieved and lonely, over the loss of their dear little one, (which occurred so soon, and suddenly, after their arrival among us) seem to have become quite well acquainted with the Saints here and to have won their way already to our hearts. They are certainly in earnest in the Master's cause; and the faithful and diligent work they have already performed leads us to look forward with hope and courage to the future.

Quite a number are being added to the church here of late. On next Sunday five or six more, all adults, will be ushered into the kingdom.

One week ago last Sunday the Sunday-school held the regular election of officers. The former incumbents were for the most part reelected. The Sunday-school is thriving and continually on the advance as regards new ideas, new systems, and helps.

On June 16 the school gave its annual children's-day service. In the morning the children were treated to a fine talk by Bro. A. H. Parsons. In the evening the regular entertainment in the form of a cantata was given by the children of the school, and was witnessed by a large and appreciative audience. It was a success.

July 4 was the Sunday-school annual picnic day. The Saints were invited to attend, and a goodly number assembled at beautiful Krug Park, and thoroughly enjoyed the beautiful day, the pleasant spot, the excellent dinner, and delicious treat of ice-cream, as well as the amusing sports provided by the young men of the school. It was a quiet, happy celebration and we believe was pleasing to our heavenly Father.

EDITH FIFER COCHRAN.

LAMONI, IOWA.

Bishop E. L. Kelley was the speaker at the chapel Sunday morning, F. B. Blair in the evening. R. M. Maloney occupied at the Saints' Home, the stake bishopric at Liberty home.

The following local missionary work is reported for Sunday: F. M. Weld at the Thompson schoolhouse, W. R. Dexter at the Wion schoolhouse, Elbert A. Smith at Andover in the morning, Joseph Turman at Andover in the evening, John Smith at the Jack Wood schoolhouse in the morning and at Greenville in the evening, C. I. Carpenter and V. W. Gun-solley at Davis City, Moroni Traxler at New Budah, S. D. Shippy at Ellston, R. S. Salyards at Lone Rock, and G. W. Needham at the Center schoolhouse four and one half miles north of Lamoni, where he has a new opening.

At the last business-meeting of the Star of Bethlehem Sunday-school the following was adopted: "Resolved, that we, as a school, discourage the attendance of Sunday picnics and Sunday outings for pleasure, or anything not in harmony with the sacredness of the day whether by officers, teachers, or members." It is to be regretted that such action seems necessary, but at the same time the Lamoni Sunday-school is to be congratulated for having the strength of its conviction along this line.

The Star of Bethlehem Sunday-school has arranged for its teachers' meetings for the ensuing quarter in a way that is sure to stimulate the interest of the study. We mention it that others may adopt the plan, or something similar, if they choose. The superintendent has charge of the normal work, which occupies one half hour; Sr. Flora Scott directs in the study of the lesson; Sr. Callie B. Stebbins brings out the critical questions of the lesson; Sr. Anna Salyards makes the lesson application.

J. F. GARVER.

LONDON, ONTARIO.

President R. C. Evans and Sr. Evans left in the early part of the month on an extended trip to Northwest British Columbia, California, Utah, and the Eastern States. They purpose reaching home for the October conference.

At our last business-meeting the following brethren were reelected officers of the branch for the ensuing term: W. Fligg, president; S. Pope, priest; G. Henley, assistant priest; W. Hardy, teacher; P. Philippin, assistant teacher; R. Martin, deacon; J. Judkins, assistant deacon.

The Sunday-school elected the following officers for the next six months: O. W. Cambridge, superintendent; W. Hardy, assistant superintendent; L. Gray, secretary; F. Gray, assistant secretary; J. Judkins, librarian; J. Wine-garden, assistant librarian; M. Cambridge, organist; T. R. Seaton, chorister.

Our Sunday-school intends holding its annual picnic at Springbank this week.

Convention Minutes.

NORTHEASTERN KANSAS.—The Religio met in joint session with the Sunday-school in Atchison, June 2. The forenoon was taken up with short talks on the work by the different representatives. The afternoon was devoted to business, and the evening program was full of good instruction—the normal work for the Sunday-school was conducted by the district superintendent, Bro. Frank Hedrick, and Sr. Flo McNichols, president of the Religio. The Religio work is new in this district, but good interest was shown, and we hope before another three months to see new locals organized and the whole district earnestly interested, and working for our motto: "Onward and upward." #### The Bishopric.

NOTICE OF APPOINTMENT OF BISHOP'S AGENT, DISTRICT OF FLORIDA.

To the Saints and Friends of the District of Florida: Please take notice that on the resignation of Bro. J. D. McArthur, Bishop's agent in and for said district of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and upon recommendation of the district conference of said district, Elder G. T. Chute, of Berrydale, has been duly appointed agent for the Bishopric in and for said territory.

The Bishopric commend Bro. Chute to the Saints and friends of the Florida District, and trust that he may, with them, be able to perform such a goodly work in the interest of the Master that it may stand as a monument in time to come to the district and a credit to each helper therein. We are "laborers together with God" in his work, provided we labor and help. We are not laborers unless we do: and by and by, when the rewards are to be meted out, those who fail to do, will not receive the commendation, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

Every member and friend of every district in the church should see that his or her work is performed, and instead of having the Bishop's agent pushing them into their work, they ought to be pushing the agent with urgent demands so that they shall not be left out of the account, and that good may result to the cause of the Master.

We are hoping and praying for the time to be brought about when there shall not be found an idler in the entire work of the Master. This means that every brother and sister who has membership in the church will have their names entered as having performed their duty. If it is only a penny's worth as represented by "the widow's mite," let it be performed; and if faithfully done it will represent to the party the rich reward that was promised to the widow in her efforts and work.

The Bishopric also take pleasure in commending the work of Bro. McArthur in the past, trusting the Lord may bless and prosper him in whatever he is called to engage in, in the future. We also extend special thanks to Bro. McArthur for work accomplished by him.

Please remember the address of Elder G. T. Chute, Berrydale, Florida.

In behalf of the Bishopric,

Very respectfully,
E. L. KELLEY, Presiding Bishop.

INDEPENDENCE, Missouri, July 10, 1907.

Bishop's Agents' Notices.

To the Saints of Northwestern Nebraska and Black Hills: Long ago it was said, "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul." We believe that obedience to the gospel law will save the soul. We believe the law is "perfect," and that it will bring the comers thereunto unto perfection; that it will accomplish the purpose for which it was given.

But in order that this law may be taught to the people, there must be means provided; there must be those who are willing to go forth and proclaim the gospel; and they, with those who are dependent upon them, need support. The Lord in his law has also made provision for this support. In Doctrine and Covenants 64:5 we read: "Behold, now it is called to-day (until the coming of the Son of man) and verily it is a day of sacrifice, and a day for the tithing of my people; for he that is tithed shall not be burned." It is a day of "sacrifice," and a day of "tithing." This is God's law, and given to us as a people. Shall we heed it, or pass it lightly by as if it were of but little importance? Shall we give heed to and obey one part of God's law, and fail to obey the other? We believe the temporal part of

Pastoral.

To the Saints and Friends in Southern Indiana District; Greeting: Having been placed in associate charge of the above-named field by Bro. J. W. Wight, we take this means of reaching scattered members of the church. Our home address is Lamoni, Iowa. We have no field address yet; will publish one as soon as we can. We have only three elders in this field: F. L. Sawley, our district president; P. A. Flinn, who has been placed upon the superannuated list. Any one knowing of an opportunity of getting openings please notify us.

We also ask the Saints to remember the financial wants. We must pay two cents a mile in this State now. Our Bishop's agent of the district, Elder I. J. Boswell, lives at Wirt, Indiana, R. F. D. 1. He would be pleased to place the name of each member of the district as a tithe-payer upon his books, and he will promptly receipt for all money sent. Who will be first? This is a part of the gospel law, as well as is baptism for the remission of our sins. "He that is tithed shall not be burned."—Doctrine and Covenants 64: 5.

We trust we may have your hearty cooperation in trying to advance the gospel of Jesus Christ. To this end let us all see to it that we do our part faithfully, discharging all the duties enjoined in the gospel covenant.

Yours in bonds,

C. E. HARP.

Reunion Notices.

The Eastern Colorado District reunion will be held in Denver, Colorado, beginning September 4, and closing with the conference of that district, September 14 and 15, 1907. The committee is working to procure railroad reduced rates and think prospects are good. There will be a boarding tent on the ground, and meals will be served at reasonable rates, as low as possible. Tents will be furnished each one upon the ground, and will be ordered upon the receipt of their order. In regard to railroad rates, cost of board, and that of tents, definite items will be announced as soon as obtained. All those going to the reunion grounds from union depot will take Colfax car to the loop, at the loop transfer to the Fourth Avenue car, get off at York Street, then go two blocks south. The grounds will be occupied by the Adventists just preceding our date. We will be in attendance and take advantage of advertising privileges. The grounds are accommodated with good shade and water. There will be good speakers on the ground, and good singing, and a splendid good time is anticipated. Now, dear Saints, let every one rally to the support of this the third reunion of this district, and let us make it a power for good, to convert the unsaved, and to more fully equip the Saints of the unchangeable God for the Master's use. Let each one earnestly pray, remembering that faith and works are still copartners in the work of the ministry, and for the edifying of the body of Christ. There has never been a divorce suit in heaven to separate what God has joined together, notwithstanding the many petitions that poor sectarians have sent up. Send all financial aid for the reunion expenses to J. D. Curtis, Falcon, Colorado, or Charles E. Everett, 129 South Logan, Denver, Colorado. Send all orders for tents, cots, etc., to Bro. Everett. Bro. E. F. Shupe has assisted the committee in the struggle to procure the grounds, which was hard work, owing to the recent rigid rules passed by the city of Denver against any kind of tent-work being done within the fire limits of the city; and he will still assist in the further arrangements of the reunion. His address is 3633 Clayton Street, Denver, Colorado. Charles E. Everett, J. D. Curtis, and J. W. Morgan, committee.

The annual reunion of the Lamoni Stake will be held in the Dancer Grove, one mile south of Lamoni, Iowa, beginning Friday, August 23, and closing Sunday, September 1.

The grove is well shaded, a cool retreat, with plenty of good water for general use. The program will include services of preaching, Sunday-school, Religio work, and other exercises by the church auxiliary societies. A good program, with good speakers, will be presented. The Saints and friends of the Lamoni Stake, and of other districts, are invited to attend. Come and enjoy a season of refreshing, rest, and social enjoyment with neighbors and friends. Tents for rent or for sale; apply to D. C. White, Lamoni, Iowa, for prices. Meals and refreshments will be served in the dining tent: 21 meals $3.50; single meals, 25c. Hay, straw, and other feed will be sold on the grounds at reasonable prices. D. C. White, chairman; R. S. Salyards, secretary. Committee.

JACKSON COUNTY BANK

I take the liberty of soliciting your patronage as we are in a position to do BANKING BUSINESS BY MAIL very satisfactorily. Open accounts can be placed with us for safety at your convenience and command. We have opened a savings department, paying interest on accounts of $1 or more and each member of the family should become interested in having a bank account building for future needs. We also pay interest on time deposit certificates. A number of the brethren are living here, others are looking forward to this location as a future home, and late revelation and admonition foreshadow coming events, adding materially to our spiritual holdings necessary to signs of the times, and in this connection our Board of Directors propose to safeguard the financial interests of the Saints by offering to them a depository proof against graft, greed, or calamity governed by a kindred feeling born of the interest we have in common. It is not popular men, large capital, heavy deposits, National or State laws, that offer absolute security to depositors, but directors and officers progressive and conservative, possessed of the virtue of true manhood shorn of all political ambition with no taste for frenzied finance or mining speculation and no inclination to furnish funds for others in that line. I point with considerable just pride (I assume) to our Board of Directors as named below. Feel at liberty to write us on matters that concern you in Jackson County, Missouri.

WHOM SHALL WE BELIEVE?

THE "LIAHONA" VERSUS THE "ORACLES" ON THE QUESTION OF BLOOD ATONEMENT.

The Liahona, the missionary organ of the Utah Mormon Church, published at Independence, Missouri, has a department called "Question Box," in which questions concerning faith and doctrines are asked, and, we suppose, are officially answered. In the issue of the Liahona for July 13, 1907, one of their elders asks the following question:

Was there ever such an organization in Utah as the Danites or Destroying Angels? And is there any foundation for the stories of Brigham Young or any one else having men put to death in order to save their souls when they were on the verge of apostasy, or for any sin they may have committed? As an elder I have to meet these questions, and they are told by people who claim to have lived there in early days. I have been denying them as being without the least foundation, but if I am wrong, would like to know it, and if right, would like some proof. (Signed) "G. H. R."

The editor of Liahona, or some one for him, makes answer, referring to the Doctor Sampson Avard organization originating in Missouri, about the time the Saints were in the midst of persecution, and which the Prophet Joseph Smith so roundly denounced; and then slides into a general denial of the existence of any such organization in Utah at any time. We are not disposed to find any fault with the answer given to this part of the question; but, in the answer given to the other part of the question, inquiring if there was any foundation for the "blood atonement" idea, the editor shows that he is either ignorant of the facts in the case, or he purposely avoids telling the whole truth. His answer is as follows:

It is not now, nor was it ever, a part of the religious belief of the Latter Day Saints that a man's soul can be saved or his sins atoned for by putting him to death; and the officers and writers of our Church, who are best authorized and qualified to state its views, regard with horror such a doctrine. No instance ever occurred in which a human life was taken by any person acting by the authority of our church, as an atonement for sin or a corrective for apostasy. There is no body of Christians in the world who would abhor any proposition to do such a thing more intensely than would the Mormon people of Utah.

"Send me! It is a prophet's prayer. No pot-boiler ever prays it."

In a contest between two factions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which rival claims to certain

Bishop's Office
210 1/2 No Main-st

tion upon which the decision of the court hinged was, properties were being aired in the courts, the question—"What are the doctrines of the Methodist Church?" The court decided that the doctrines and faith of that church were those tenets of faith and doctrine as found in the teaching of Bishops Wesley and Watson.

Assuming the principle involved in this decision of the judge, which in effect is this, that the faith and doctrines of any church are those peculiar tenets of faith and religious beliefs peculiar to that church, as the same are set forth by the leading men of that church, apply the rule, and witness the result.

From the death of the Prophet and Patriarch, Joseph and Hyrum Smith, and the choosing of Brigham Young to preside over what is known as the Mormon church in Utah, there was a gradual sliding away from the written word, and an increasing reliance on what were called the "living oracles," the priesthood, chief of whom were Brigham Young and his counselors. Under this assumption of authority President Brigham Young taught that there were sins which could not be atoned for by the blood of Christ, but could be by the shedding of the blood of the offender. He taught:

All mankind love themselves; and let these principles be known by an individual, and he would be glad to have his blood shed. That would be loving themselves even unto an eternal exaltation. Will you love your brothers and sisters, likewise, when they have committed a sin that can not be atoned for without the shedding of blood? Will you love that man or woman well enough to shed their blood? That is what Jesus meant. He never told a man or woman to love their enemies in their wickedness. He never intended any such thing. . . . I have known a great many men who have left this church, for whom there is no chance whatever for exaltation; but if their blood had been spilled, it would have been better for them. The wickedness and ignorance of the nations forbid this principle being in full force but the time will come when the law of God will be in full force.

This is loving our neighbor as ourselves; if he needs help, help him; and if he wants salvation, and it is necessary to spill his blood upon the ground in order that he may be saved, spill it. Any of you who understand the principles of eternity, if you have sinned a sin requiring the shedding of blood, except the sin unto death, would not be satisfied nor rest until your blood be spilled, that you might gain that salvation you desire. That is the way to love mankind."—Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, p. 220; Desert News, vol. 6, p. 235.

Brigham Young at that time had as his counselor, Jedediah M. Grant, and following his principal, in the elucidation and elaboration of the dogma of "blood atonement," he said:

I say there are men and women here that I would advise to go to the president immediately, and ask him to appoint a committee to attend to their case; and then let a place be selected, and let that committee shed their blood.—Deseret News, vol. 6, p. 235.

Brigham Young and Jedediah M. Grant, his counselor, were at the time of these utterances, the chief "oracles" of all the "host of oracles" in the church in the valleys of the mountains. The standard books of the church, as these were left by the Prophet Joseph Smith, had been laid aside as too antiquated for the guidance of the people; absolute reliance upon the priesthood had been demanded; the word of the chief oracle, President Young, was the finality, and all were required to accept it; the people were to obey counsel; who then were the exponents of the faith and doctrines of the church, if these two leading and chief "oracles" were not? No formal opposition to or renunciation of this formidable dogma, by the Utah Mormon church, either by its conference enactment or by its public councils or chief leading exponents, has ever been given to the public. Whom then shall we believe? These chief men who were "best authorized and qualified to state" the views of the church over which they were presiding, or this missionary editor, who chooses to deny so emphatically, what he must know is within the power of ample proof; that there is sufficient and just "foundation" for the "stories" told of the "doctrine of blood atonement" as promulgated by Brigham Young, advocated by him as a theory of salvation, and practically advised to the church membership as a measure provided by the church authorities existing at the time of its advocacy, and of which persons might avail themselves by an application to the acting president of the church, Brigham Young. How else can any reader of the statement of Counselor Jedediah M. Grant understand what he said? If these two men, Brigham Young and Jedediah M. Grant, presidents of the church, were not authorized to represent the church and state its doctrines and its faith, who were? And by what right and authority does the editor of the Liahona cover up and deny the facts in the case? Whom shall we believe, "the oracles," or the Liahona?

Should the Liahona choose to dispute the documents from which we have quoted, or the correctness of the quotations, we refer the editor to the files of the Deseret News, and extant copies of their own work, the Journal of Discourses.

Should we be charged as trying to perpetuate strife by reviving the sayings of President Brigham Young and Jedediah M. Grant, we reply, that it is the province of the Reorganized Church to see to it that so far as it lies in the power of its members the truth shall not be evaded nor covered up by subterfuge, no matter by whom these may be attempted.

"We have the world fairly well preacherized, now let us Christianize it."

THE NEW HERALD OFFICE.

We presume that the Saints everywhere are interested in the progress being made on the new building. The brick work is above the second floor and will soon be ready for the roof. A cut of the building will be seen elsewhere in this issue of the HERALD.

We have not spared expense that was necessary to make the new building suitable for the present and future demands of the publishing department of the church. Machinery has been ordered that will give us at least double the capacity of the old plant. We trust that all of the Saints will show their appreciation by giving us their hearty support. When completed, the building and machinery will be worth about $50,000 to the church.

We have not solicited donations from those living outside of Lamoni Stake, but we wish to assure all those who have a desire to assist in paying for the new plant, that their offerings will be gratefully received and acknowledged. Any of the Saints having a few hundred dollars that they are willing to loan to the publishing department at a reasonable rate of interest for one or two years, will please address the business manager.

We do not expect to reprint many of our books until we move into our new quarters. All can assist us by subscribing for the HERALD, Ensign, and Autumn Leaves, and if you already subscribe for all of them, why not send them to your friends? Let us be "colaborers with God" in the work.

Your servant in Christ,

F. B. BLAIR, Business Manager.

GENERAL CHURCH ITEMS.

The sanitarium committee has purchased land for a sanitarium site on the south side of Blue Avenue, the main avenue leading from Independence to Kansas City. The land purchased is known as the Sawyer tract, consisting of nineteen acres and including a three-story residence. The purchase price is $19,800. Three or more acres are to be retained for a sanitarium site, and the balance is to be offered for sale. The committee is to meet at once and formulate plans for work on the sanitarium.

The Daily News, Independence, Missouri, July 2, contained an account of an interview with the editor of the Liahona, the Utah church publication recently established in Independence. From it we glean an idea of our own nothingness. From it we learn again that only two and one-half per cent of the Utah people were willing to obey a heaven-inspired (?) God-appointed doctrine upon which their souls' salvation depended. The doctrine that Brigham Young declared would "sail over and ride triumphant over all the prejudice and priestcraft of the day" was truly accepted and lived up to by a paltry two and a half per cent of his own followers. We quote from the News:

"Elder Benion was a caller at the News office this morning. He had a copy of the News, and asked for more. Elder Benion characterized as false the statement that the Reorganized Church had made it possible for the Utah Mormons to come back here. The church of Utah, Elder Benion stated, did not depend on any one to make it possible for any undertaking of theirs, and that the Reorganized Church in comparison with the Utah church was as nothing in the palm of his hand. When questioned as to polygamy the elder stated that the church believed in polygamy as taught and practiced at Nauvoo, Independence, and in Utah, but the church abandoned it to comply with law, and only two and one half per cent of their church were polygamists. He claimed the scriptures taught it."

The dedication of our church at Mountainville, Maine, took place July 14; Apostles Griffith and Greene and Elder LaRue in charge.

CURRENT EVENTS, SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS.

Reports from the great Elk's gathering at Philadelphia rather indicate that old Sol is disposed to "discourage" secret organizations. The parade which occurred July 18 is described as an "inferno." Excessive heat and humidity conspired to produce a condition that resulted in the prostration of over four thousand people. Twenty thousand Elks took part in the parade.

DALLAS, Texas, July 15.—According to reports received here, a buried city has been discovered in Ochiltree County in the extreme northern part of the Panhandle, by Professor T. L. Everly, an archæologist and instructor in the Canadian college at Hereford. The appearance of a number of mounds attracted the professor's attention and his examinations are said to have revealed a number of buried buildings in which were human bones, ancient pottery, and stone utensils. The mounds are rectangular and their number shows that it was a city of several thousand people. The character of the remains indicates that they antedate the Aztecs or Toltecs. Mr. Everly will make further excavations.—Woman's National Daily, July 16, 1907.

Reverend W. P. Ferguson, pastor of the First Methodist Church, University Place, Lincoln, Nebraska, recently preached a sermon of great eloquence and power on the subject of virtue and purity. The results were unexpected. Perhaps the best evidence of the force of the sermon is that it moved Mrs. Cross, with whom the preacher had entertained improper relations, to repentance and she made a confession that resulted in the suspension of the eloquent pastor. The Reverend Mr. Ferguson is a man of some note, formerly a professor in the Wesleyan University of Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, delegate to the Methodist Conference in London in 1901, and, at the time of his lapse, pastor of one of the largest Methodist churches in Nebraska. Preachers similarly situated will do well to carefully scan the audience before giving free rein to their eloquence; or better, let them use it at home as a preventive.

"We shall speedily witness a tremendous drama, and perhaps a tragedy, almost without a parallel in civilized history. . . . That British soldiers should be assaulted in the outskirts of Cario [in Egypt], seems . . . to all who know the facts as an occurrence full of the most dangerous significance. . . . A Jihad or holy war will as surely be preached as the Nile will overflow its banks at the appointed time. It is a far cry from Egypt to India, but the two problems are actually one. Both countries are Mahammedan, and both owe religious fealty to the Sultan of Turkey as the head of the Moslem church. Knit together by that fierce fraternity of the sword an outbreak in India or Egypt would be as a fire in the corn throughout the Mohammedan world, and national boundaries would be submerged under the torrents of fanatic zeal. . . . The British garrisons in India are upon the razor edge of suspense that has no parallel since the great mutiny."—Los Angeles Times.

"The evidences of Christianity, to be effective, must be looked for in present experiences, not in past history, for the simple reason that past history itself must first be proved before it can become proof to the present generation. If the miracles of Jesus Christ are relied upon to prove the truth of Christianity, the miracles must first be proved; if his resurrection is relied upon, the resurrection must first be demonstrated. But generally he who is skeptical about Christianity is still more skeptical about the miracles and the resurrection. The witness to Christianity must be a living witness, whose testimony can be heard and who can be cross-examined."

"Praying is simply opening up your whole establishment toward God, day by day."

"Every day is a feast of the passover and every man a redeemer and savior of his kind."

Elders' Note-Book

A LIFE'S RECORD.

Cartoon by Elder J. E. Wildermuth.

The record of a life that is not governed by gospel principles will be a peculiar and inharmonious medley of truth marred by error, strength defeated by weakness, and goodness overpowered by sin.

EXTRACTS FROM THE SERMONS OF ELDER MARK H. SIEGFRIED.

"I hold no virulence toward any man, but I hate the Devil under whosoever coat he may be hiding."

"I love nature because in it I see the eternity of God."

"Beware of him with whom you seem to become acquainted in a few moments of time. Your lasting friend will be the one with whom you never become thoroughly acquainted. There is something to him."

"The happiest thought of a Saint is, 'There will be room for advancement in the next world.'"

"Intellect is crowned a prince at the expense of affection and sentiment."

"All men see the truth alike, but the intervention of error makes them see differently."

"It is better to love than to be loved; but you could not love had you first not been loved."

"One hour of liberty in this world is worth an eternity of bondage."

"Indecision makes a troubled heart, and a troubled heart is the most potent factor in bringing man to his premature grave."

"We pace the streets of unrelenting time.

Impatiently we watch the rising of the sun,
With nervous cadence clamber in the noon-day clime,
And stagger at the gloaming e'er our work's begun."

"Life is filled with many vicissitudes. But there is none so great that the human soul, attuned with God, is not able to surmount and change to a blessing. What we most need is a willingness to be attuned with God."

"To me the word home has a heavenly ring. It is the only spot on earth worth living for. And when blessed by the bright smiling countenance of purity, love, and virtue, untainted by the folly of gaudy pride, it transports my soul into the very paradise of God."

"Some minds seem to be almost incapable of accurate action. There is loose-jointedness about their mental make-up. If we analyze these people we find that they do not observe definitely or think sharply. They lack mental method and system. Slipshod thinkers are loose-jointed doers."

"There are many avenues leading to the heart of man, but there is no one who can so successfully open them all as the girl he loves and the girl that loves him."

"Never allow your sentiment to control your reason. If you do you'll be led astray. Keep them both within the scope of your conscience. If you have to trust one more than the other, trust your reason. Reason never fails, but a lack of it always does."

"Incessant writing or talking drives more nails in the coffin of thought than any one other fault."

"If your bones are filled with the marrow of success, you will be successful wherever you are and whatever the conditions may be. If you have not in you the elements of success the opportunities for success will never be known to you."

"Great souls are always positive and creative. They know more of the depths of gloom than their friends imagine; but a pessimist tells all the sorrow he ever heard of."

"There is but one final defeat and that is the defeat of wrong."

"You may talk of settling a thing peaceably, but until those concerned reach a conclusion that is in harmony with truth and logic, the thing itself is like a smoking volcano,—always dangerous."

"Better to make war to obtain peace than to keep silent when justice is being strangled."

"The foundation principle of the Christian religion is the agency of man. When taken away, the individual thus oppressed, is no longer a servant of God, but a servant of the tyrant who took it away whether he did it innocently or purposely."

"If these people who spend their time meddling in other people's affairs, and those who are constantly drawing on their imaginations, would tend to their own business and tell facts instead of hallucinations, the world would move on at a more even pace and would not have to be dealing with so many worthless impressions; and intelligence would be above par, whereas, in many cases, it goes begging in the streets for want of meeting some one with individuality enough to pick it up."

"Better to serve God in this world and reign with him in the next, than to reign with the Devil in this world and serve him in the next."

NEW MUSIC FROM THE FIDDLERS' STAND.

We are battling away. I am holding forth at Highland Park, at a dancing-hall. I am preaching every night from the fiddlers' stand, making quite a different music. The people are not as quick to dance to this joyful sound as they are to that of the violin; but we are having real good interest. I am furnished with three gasoline lamps to give light, and benches, so I will stick to it as long as it is offered to me. I am using charts to quite an advantage.

J. W. METCALF.

LOUISVILLE, Kentucky, July 8, 1907.

THE HIGH PRIESTS' ANNUAL.

At their meetings during the late General Conference, the Quorum of High Priests arranged for the publication of the "High Priests' Annual." As its name indicates, it is to appear annually. It is to contain items of interest regarding the quorum membership, papers read at the quorum meetings, and programs for the meetings to be held during the coming General Conference. It is to be illustrated. The above cut representing the president of the quorum, Elder F. G. Pitt, with his two counselors, A. H. Parsons and T. W. Williams, is one of the illustrations to appear in the "Annual" for 1907, soon to be issued.

"If things are wrong and you get upset instead of helping to put them right, it is because you are out of harmony. The harmonious man bends his energies to straighten crooked places."

DREAMS OR NIGHT VISIONS AND MIRACLES.

I have enjoyed a great many dreams and visions, but having not recorded many of them as I learned when asked for my experience along this line I only record what I can remember and never will forget.

In the winter of 1885 I was having a very interesting meeting and plenty of opposition, and in my weakness I sought the Lord for help, which I felt I needed badly, and laid myself down to rest after the service of the evening. I was transported into a large and spacious room, and a person came to me with a large Bible, and began to show me its contents, and said that I would have to defend the Inspired Translation, which I knew but little about then and he unfolded to me the history of the King James translation and I read the history as found in the old-fashioned Bible to this effect: "Portions of the manuscript had become obliterated by reason of age and we had to fill in by conjectures." I may not have worded this correctly, but near enough to help you to see what effect it had upon my mind.

When the next night a minister arose and ridiculed the Inspired Translation, I was more than ready for him as was in evidence ere we closed. It was during this same series of meetings that I wrestled with the angel, which I have related before.

In February I was shown and instructed to go into a neighborhood where I had never preached and occupy a church that I had never seen the inside of, and I saw the congregation and the interior and the minister just as I saw them the night I went there to preach and knew just what he would do, for it was shown me in that dream. I preached seven hours in three nights, as that was all the time he would allow me to have the building, and he made an attack on the Inspired Translation, and I never enjoyed such liberty to meet that issue before as I did that night. He was dumbfounded.

Again I was guided in a dream to a schoolhouse seven miles away where I was to preach, and was fishing and caught three fish, but one flopped back into muddy water that I had gotten them out of. I went, and this was literally fulfilled. I preached on the calling of Joseph Smith, something I had never done before or since in introducing the work; but I was led to do it and I knew it was what God wanted preached there, and they got it the best I could do. At the close of the meeting, I asked if any one wanted to obey this gospel, and a man and his wife rose up, and the father of the man said he believed every word and thought he would go along; but instead turned against us.

In 1899 I had two manifestations. I was on a farm and was going over to help a neighbor and was driving away from home, when Bro. Joseph Smith came walking up the road and met me and after passing the time of day he said, "I have a message for you." "Well," I said, "go up to the house and I will be home in a short time and will hear what you have, as my neighbor is waiting for me."

I looked back and saw him walking along up to the house and I wondered what he had for me. At the next General Conference I was selected for the High Priests' Quorum, much against my feelings at the time.

The other was to the effect that I was called to take charge of a church. Such a building I never saw before, and the people were somewhat strange and hard to get near. In March I was asked to leave Philadelphia and take charge of Kirtland Temple. I had never seen such a building, and I found that the Saints had been deceived by a would-be teacher, and they were the strangest Latter Day Saints I had ever met, but time told the story that I was there to do them as much good as my limited ability would permit and we got acquainted.

I was called to my mother's bedside, in 1886, if I remember correctly, and she had lain there for some weeks with seemingly no hopes for her recovery, and not able to recognize anybody or speak above a faint whisper. Enroute I was given to understand twice that she should live. I was fourteen days getting there, being snow-bound, and these testimonies came to cheer me. I arrived home and asked that the room be vacated by all but the family and a Sr. Fisk, who was there, and we knelt and prayed a short prayer, and I anointed her and confirmed the anointing, and before we moved from our position mother turned over in the bed and spoke to me.

In 1892 I was called to administer to Sr. Laura Christy in Philadelphia, and she was instantly healed of a fever. Bro. Cross of Camden, New Jersey, lost his speech, and after administering to him in a prayer-meeting he arose and began to speak in praise to God for deliverance. I have seen many just as remarkable miracles as any I have related, but can not call them sufficiently to mind to tell them. Let God be glorified in them and his word be made plain to all people. A. ### CRITICISM OF THE REVEREND MR. HAUPT VERSUS "JOSEPH SMITH DEFENDED."—NO. 10.

(Concluded.)

THE AMERICAN CHURCH.

Mr. Haupt says: "Mr. Peterson boasts that the Latter Day Saint is the only American church. Unfortunately for a number of sects, they must admit their American origin; the United Brethren in Christ, the Church of God, and the Christians are of about the same age as the Latter Day Saints."

Unfortunately for Mr. Haupt's statement, these churches are not purely American. Each of them claims some connection with former organizations from over the sea; but the Latter Day Saints claim authority direct from heaven to America. I know of no other church but in some way received their authority from Rome, including the Church of England, as we shall proceed to notice after quoting another sentence from Mr. Haupt: "While I glory in being an American, the church that can claim my allegiance must show its authority in unbroken succession from the King at Jerusalem, 33 A. D."

We are not a little surprised that Mr. Haupt could cast his lot with the Church of England, after making the above declaration, for that church has not the New Testament organization nor the faith of the apostles. History shows that they have been merged with the Roman Church time and time again at periods sufficiently long to have lost all authority, repeatedly, except what was received through the mother church, whom they anathematize. So far as "unbroken" authority is concerned, theirs has been more often broken than any other we know of; and in the days of King Henry VIII they were part and parcel of Roman Catholicism, receiving her ordinations and authority from her. They can never clear themselves from the charge of being apostates from the mother church. Their highest officer must be, according to the word episcopal, only a bishop.

The Encyclopedia Britannica, volume 8, page 484, says: "By episcopacy we understand that form of church organization in which the chief ecclesiastical authority within a defined district or diocese is bishops having in subordination to them, priests or presbyters, and deacons."

On page 370 of the same volume, under the heading, "Church of England," is the following: "That part of the Universal Church of Christ located in England, having for its ministers, bishops, priests, and deacons." Where are the prophets and apostles Mr. Haupt has been contending for all along? The most difficult problem he ever encountered will be to show "unbroken succession" without these officers. At most, the Episcopal Church claims to be only a portion of the "universal church," according to the above quotation. As early as 668 A. D., Rome swallowed up every vestige of the English Church. In the same volume and page as before quoted, we find the following: "To effect if possible an agreement, a conference was held at Whitby (664) in which Calmon on one side and Wilfred on the other, took a principal part. The Roman party gained the advantage and the British peculiarities were gradually merged in the greater power and vigor of the Roman system. In 668 Theodore the Greek was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury by Pope Vitalian. Nearly the whole of the Island was now Christian, and all parts of it recognized and submitted to archbishop Theodore." Here is a complete submerging of the church in England with the Roman Catholic; and although they rebelled from time to time, they were again and again full-fledged Roman Catholics. Their line of authority was again and again broken by the Roman party, should they try to trace their authority outside the Roman church, or it was again and again broken by themselves if they should try to trace it through Rome.

As we said in the beginning, the Church of England can not possibly trace apostolic succession, either by history, Bible prophecies, or a resemblance of church doctrine. To aid a little further in support of my statement, we quote again from the Encyclopedia Britannica, page 372, volume 8: "These emissaries joined in a council with Norman-English bishops (1070) authorizing on the part of the Pope, the deposition of the English private and other bishops, and the spoiliations of the monasteries, and effecting the complete subjection of the English Church to Rome. The establishment of the papal sovereignty over the English Church and the setting of the Romish system in England was intrusted to Lanfranc, as late as 1170 A. D. appeals were to lie to come."

Of the twelfth century, the Britannica says: "During this century the Roman Church was at the height of its power and influence." "Unbroken succession," indeed!

To locate very nearly the time of the apostasy, we quote from Reverend James Whorey's sketches of Church History, issued by the Presbyterian board of publication, the following: "The ancient Britons, no longer sustained by the Roman power, were miserably harrowed by Picts and Scots. To assist them against these troublesome neighbors, they called over the Anglo-Saxons from Germany to their aid, 449 A. D. But the remedy they soon found to be worse than the disease. These foreign auxiliaries undertook to subdue the people whom they had come to assist. This produced obstinate and bloody wars between them, which lasted with various successes for one hundred and thirty years, when the Britons were compelled finally to yield up their country to the Anglo-Saxons and retreat to Batavia and Cambria, the modern Holland and Wales. During these conflicts, the British Church was in a deplorable condition. The Anglo-Saxon, who as yet worshiped their own gods, although they did not directly persecute the Christians, yet showed them no mercy, and put multitudes of them to death."—Pages 72, 73.

Adding 449 to 130 and we have 579 A. D. Add to this 1260 prophetic days or years of Revelation 12:6 when the church was not only away from the abodes of man, but away from "the face of the serpent" (verse 14), during which time also a new power was to arise, and "to make war with the saints and overcome them" (Revelation 13:7), the fourth kingdom of Daniel 7:25, i. e., Rome, instead of being the church itself was to "wear out the Saints"; allowing nine years for overtime (for it was during this period that the saints were overcome) leaves 570 A. D., added to 1260 brings us to 1830, when the church was again restored.

Isaiah 18:1-3. Of this text on page 165 I have said: "First we notice that this event was to transpire before the harvest (Jesus said the harvest was the end of the world), and so soon before, that the bud was to be perfect. Another thought is, it was to transpire when ambassadors could go 'swiftly' on the water. This brings us to a time later than the invention of steamboats, and even later, than that; for it was not until 1819 that the first steamboat, the Savannah, crossed the Atlantic Ocean." Commenting on the foregoing, Mr. Haupt says: "From Mr. Peterson's interpretation of this passage, we are surprised to learn that 'vessels of bulrushes' were steamboats, and must conclude that Egypt is ahead of us again. Moses' parents put him in a steamboat, and here it was that he first met the daughter of Pharaoh." May it not be that I drew my conclusions from the "swift" mode of travel rather than the "vessels of bulrushes"? In fact, that was my argument, as one can see from reading the foregoing. However Mr. Haupt connects the vessels of "bulrushes" with the one Moses was in, he applies my language as applicable to the other as if they were the same thing. Where is the absurdity and who is responsible for it? Mr. Haupt does not attempt a rendering of the text but seeks to throw a little dust in the air to take the mind of the reader from the real issue. In the absence of opposition my conclusions still stand. It was as follows (page 167): "In that light in simple epitomized form, the passage in Isaiah 18:1-4 would read: In the land of America and the nation of the United States God would in our time set up his church. The description of the land and people fit the Jewish people and their land, and it will be noticed that the swift messengers were to go to that people and not to come from them. [We might add through all the changing scenes in England during the past thirteen centuries.] Furthermore, it is shown that the land upon which the ensign was to be raised would be located beyond Ethiopia." Of this matter Mr. Haupt says: "Following Mr. Peterson's suggestion, draw a straight line on the map or globe, from Jerusalem, across the rivers of Ethiopia, and see where you land. Only on the returning line around the globe will you come near any possessions of the United States."

Let us see. I hold in my hand a small globe, and I notice that a straight line due west across northwestern Africa, then a part of Ethiopia, will land us very near Charleston, South Carolina. Aiming just a little north of west, we miss Egypt and cross north Ethiopia of that time and land in New York; and not on the returning line around the globe either, but only about one third around the globe.

THE LATTER DAY REVELATIONS.

Under this head Mr. Haupt says: "There is nothing in the prophecies of Joseph Smith quoted in this book, that any man might not have foretold."

If I am not mistaken, that is precisely the statement of the infidel, regarding the Bible. Mr. Haupt admits the prophecies and their fulfillment (he could not do otherwise) and that is sufficient. "While other men," he says, "prophesied," they were mere guesses in their own name, while Joseph Smith prophesied in the name of the Lord and it came to pass. However, we only quoted a few of the many prophecies in print. We are not a little surprised, however, that Mr. Haupt places Joseph Smith in the same catalogue of prophets (?) with Washington, Jefferson, Patrick Henry, George Mason, Peyton Rudolph, James Madison, etc. Thank you for recognizing (as you think), Joseph Smith's natural ability; but we think it was not natural, but inspirational.

We note, however, that Mr. Haupt did not quote the prophecies of these men so we could compare them. "Let us have no foolishness but well digested discussion," says Mr. Haupt. When would he call a reply without proof or attempted proof?

THE BOOK OF MORMON.

Says Mr. Haupt: "The Book of Mormon has no literary, ethical, or devotional merit to commend it even to a place among the writings of the so-called 'dark ages.'"

Let us see. Literary. Suppose we admit that it has no "literary merit." What of it? Would that prove it untrue? Like the Bible, there are places in it that may not be up to the literary rules of men, but God is not bound by human rules. Besides the Book of Mormon is a translation of the writings of a peculiar, isolated, and ancient people, and one would expect it to partake more or less of the peculiarities of the people and the spirit of the times. It is proof in its favor. Its pages are very plain and easily understood. There is scarcely a possibility of misunderstanding its meaning, and that to most people is of considerable merit. King Mosiah's address in the first chapter of Mosiah is possessed of some literary merit, but we are not so particular to defend the literary composition of the Book of Mormon. That is of little or no consequence.

Ethical. Webster's chief definition is: "Relating to manners or morals." No faithful student of the Book of Mormon can say truly that its moral teachings are bad. It would be a wonderful book if no one could find any fault with it; but it comes as near finding favor in the eyes of the honest and virtuous as any book of my experience. But Mr. Haupt finds one example, though he misstates it: In the first place, Laban, whom Nephi slew, was not his uncle, as Mr. Haupt states, nor was it necessary to preserve the law of Moses after Christ, and their family genealogy was of little worth to others but themselves. Mr. Haupt's complaint has little to commend it on that line. His statement is: "It is contrary to the Spirit of God to compel Nephi to kill his drunken uncle in cold blood, in order that Nephi might steal the family record. Instead of the family records it was the law of Moses. The record itself says: 'Yea, and I also thought that they could not keep the commandments of the Lord according to the law of Moses, save they should have the law, and I also knew that the law was engraven upon the plates of brass. And again I knew that the Lord had delivered Laban into my hands for this cause, that I might obtain the records according to the commandments.'"

KILLING OF LABAN.

As this forms the chief objection against the "Book of Mormon," we will notice it under a separate heading. In several places the Book of Mormon, as well as the Bible, condemns very severely the taking of human life; yet the Lord has commanded wars, and thus the taking of human life by the wholesale. As noticed in both books Moses killed an Egyptian; and to be consistent Mr. Haupt should reject the Pentateuch. If it be argued that that was not done by command of God, how about this case in the Bible: "And Samuel hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord."—1 Samuel 15:33. Let Mr. Haupt now reject the Bible.

The reasons given for the killing of Laban are: "It is better that one man should perish than that a nation should dwindle and perish in unbelief." Suppose we admit that Nephi was mistaken in the supposition that God told him to slay Laban, still the fact that he thought so and did slay him remains, and the record is true.

Devotional. One or two quotations from the book itself will show that Mr. Haupt's criticism is not based on a knowledge of the contents of the Book of Mormon, at least not without prejudice.
