HE THAT ENDURETH

In the sixteenth verse of the sixteenth chapter of Mark one may read the great promise of the gospel to the penitent sinner, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved"; in the twenty-second verse of the tenth chapter of Matthew is found the gospel promises to the baptized believer, "He that endureth to the end shall be saved."

Looked at from the other side of the waters of baptism it may seem to the candidate that the matter is fully stated in the promise first quoted; but viewed from this side, it is gradually borne upon the mind that the first promise finds its complement in the second.

The individual who accepts the first promise and acts upon it soon finds that he is placed in a position where his endurance is being tested. This test is designed not alone with a view to determine his endurance but rather to strengthen and develop it.

There are few who are too weak to acquire a degree of fortitude and usefulness if they will but patiently submit to the processes of Christian development; there are none so strong that they can resist the soul-destroying blight that settles upon those who persistently rebel after having enlisted to obey. Following these divers courses, the strong and mighty perish, while the weak and poor grow and flourish as the palm tree or as the cedar in Lebanon. Proud but rebellious Saul was a child in the hand of the aged prophet Samuel.

It might seem strange to some that the process of Christian development should include anything calculated to test endurance; why not the "flow'ry beds of ease"? Because neither mental, physical, nor spiritual vigor comes from resting upon flow'ry beds of ease. The muscle that feels the twist and strain of the oar is strengthened; the brain that studies and solves problems becomes active and powerful; the Christian character that is put to the test, that endures, resists, and achieves, becomes great, and is saved at the end of the struggle. Such a character is worth saving; and it is saved, because it has, with God's help, overcome all that would destroy it and has become in a measure like Christ, who said that all power was given into his hand.

Saints are not promised that they shall escape all the cares or even the afflictions of life; the promise is that all these (with all other experiences) shall work together for their good. They are not promised that they shall escape all the burdens of life; the promise is that they shall be given a yoke that is easy. If there is an implement that is typical of labor, that implement is the yoke. If the Master did not intend his disciples to labor after they had taken his yoke upon them he made a mistake in his choice of illustrations that was quite foreign to his judgment and to his method of discourse.

His call is to those who are weary and heavy laden and they are promised rest, often best found in congenial activity. The unprofitable burdens of sin and ignorance, of the world, the flesh, and the Devil, are to be cast aside, and in their stead is given a line of work that will bring a glorious reward.

There are many experiences that come to an individual, even in the course of a short life, that test the powers of endurance. These are of such a severe character that in the world thousands who have no hope, other than the world offers, seek relief in suicide. The new recruit to the army of the living little realizes the character of the warfare upon which he enters, almost at birth; soon, though, he finds himself fighting against temptation and sorrow and pain.

Often as an individual advances in years the tendency to become discouraged increases; how then shall one endure to the end? The answer is found in that gospel through which he first received the promise conditioned upon endurance.

James names the gospel law as the perfect law of liberty. This law sets men free: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

No man could ever be free if he were constantly threatened by evil forces that are stronger than he; and the excellency of the perfect law of liberty is seen in the fact that it makes men sufficiently strong to overcome these forces of evil, and so they are "free indeed." This desired end is accomplished by virtue of that increased spiritual energy bestowed upon those who accept Christ,—who came that they might "have life and have it more abundantly,"—to whom the promise is that the Spirit also shall help their infirmities, and by virtue of that process of education, the scope of which is indicated by the declaration that the individual shall be guided into all truth. God never attempts to give liberty without knowledge, for such a condition could not be maintained; nor does he propose to bestow zeal, enthusiasm, and riotous energy without bestowing the proper wisdom to guide and control.

Thus is revealed the only way in which one can hope to endure to the end. An otherwise hopeless conflict, though severe and long continued, may become more joyful as it progresses, until at last the Christian cheerfully faces the last enemy that shall be conquered—death.

OPPOSITION, BLIND AND OTHERWISE

One of the things peculiar to the opposition to the latter-day work is that men, many of whom are liberal and sincere in their consideration and expression with reference to other institutions and propaganda, are both narrow and insincere in their activities against the cause of Christ; and that men of every class have sought by destroying character to discredit the latter-day gospel.

In fighting the truth men become blinded to its light, and see distortedly, if at all; and in extreme cases, sometimes unconsciously but none the less fully, lend themselves to the Adversary of truth in misrepresentations calculated to poison the minds of those who are without opportunity or disposition to hear only the opposition.

Of interest in this connection is the following statement by Elder E. C. Fuqua and appearing in the Word of Truth for October 19:

It is unnecessary, at any time in any way, to attack the character of Joseph Smith . . . ; and in all our debates we confine ourself to a diametrical distinction between the organizations of Christ and Joseph Smith. These are so irreconcilably hostile to each other, nothing else is needed to demolish Smith's claims.

If Elder Fuqua of the Word of Truth in debate with our brethren has failed to attack the character of Joseph Smith and the Latter Day Saints, living and dead, it has been in a discussion or discussions unreported. The Word of Truth to date has been open to R. B. Neal, et. al., for slanderous attacks upon character; and even in this article under consideration Elder Fuqua continues his former policy along the same lines. In this article Joseph Smith is pronounced a "false prophet," "in sheep's clothing," leader of a class who, "through the hypocrisy of men that speak lies, branded in their own conscience as with a hot iron," and esteeming themselves "as equal to God's son," promulgated an "invention" a "system" by which the same prerogatives [the office of high priest.—HERALD EDITORS] might be conferred upon other men," in perpetuating "the utter rottenness of the deception."

Again, two weeks following the statement and discussion of Elder Fuqua, the Word of Truth for November 2 is opened to a venomous attack on the character of Joseph Smith by Charles A. Shook, who attempts a reply to the discussion of a party disinterested in the latter-day work. Mr. Shook says:

From first to last his article is a pail of whitewash for a man whose record for deception and immorality is not surpassed in the history of the world.

The author of the article mentioned is severely arraigned by Mr. Shook for "defending the character of such a man as Joseph Smith," "so vile an impostor," and "guilty of criminal acts."

Thus it is seen that the Word of Truth has abandoned neither its policy of attack on character nor its policy of misrepresentation. If in the examination of the system as announced by him it is unnecessary to attack the character of Joseph Smith, the editor of the Word of Truth seems not really to so have learned, or, learning, has not been profited thereby, his statement to the contrary notwithstanding.

The Word of Truth is representative of an unenviable class. For those of this number who are blindly led we may have charity. For those who maliciously misrepresent we may have pity. Toward neither should we harbor bitterness, which affects not others and only brings injury and loss to ourselves. We may graciously leave all to the arbitrament of the final judgment, secure in the consciousness that then if not before we shall find our vindication.

CURRENT EVENTS SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

TERRITORY FOR GUNS.—Official advices announce that Russia has ceded to Japan her half of the Island of Sakhalin in exchange for heavy guns. This island was officially Russian until 1905, when the southern half was ceded to Japan by the treaty of Portsmouth.

PANAMA-CALIFORNIA EXPOSITION.—The exposition at San Diego was opened at midnight of December 31, when President Wilson, at Washington, pressed an electric button lighting the exposition grounds. Secretary of Treasury McAdoo represents the President at San Diego.

PHILIPPINE DISTURBANCES.—Local disturbances in Manila have been followed by a number of arrests. Governor General Harrison attributes the trouble to the revolutionary campaign conducted from Hongkong for a number of years past, and states that nobody of standing or influence is connected with the movement.

UNITED STATES PROTESTS.—The United States Government has protested against British interference with American commerce, insisting on an early improvement. Friction seems to have arisen out of a lack of definiteness in the matter of contraband, and the rights of neutrals at sea. The complaint of the United States is being considered by the British governmental authorities.

IMMIGRATION BILL.—An effort in the Senate on December 31 to strike from the pending immigration bill the literacy test was lost by a vote of 47 to 12. An amendment to exclude all of African blood was adopted by a vote of 29 to 25. The clause excluding "those who admit their belief in the practice of polygamy," was amended to read "those who believe in, advocate or practice polygamy." The amended bill passed the Senate on Saturday by a vote of 50 to 7. Passed last February by the House, the bill goes to conference.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—After conferences with Brigadier General Scott, General Mayterena has removed his forces to a point sixteen miles south of Naco. It is reported that General Hill is taking his troops to a point opposite Douglas, Arizona, and that both generals agree not to conduct further operations along the border where United States lives or property might be endangered. Fighting continues between Carranza and Villa forces, in the vicinity of Tampico, Vera Cruz, and elsewhere, generally favorable to Villa. Villa forces have occupied Monterey. Provisional President Guitierrez is said to have issued a decree halting executions and insisting on trial by due process of law, and to have substituted civil for military tribunals. Bandits have attacked property and interfered with railway traffic thirty miles out from Vera Cruz. The United States State Department has warned United States citizens against returning to the oil regions of Tampico.

EUROPEAN WAR.—The Russian forces are holding along their entire line except in the Carpathians. In east Prussia and in north and south Poland they have made gains. The Germans lost heavily in their attempt to break through to Warsaw. Turkey claims gains in the Caucasian territory. The allies report slight advances near the coast, in Alsace, in the vicinity of Noyon, in the Argonne, and along the Meuse. On December 25, seven British aeroplanes, accompanied by light cruisers, destroyers, and submarines, entered the harbor of Cuxhaven, and engaged German aeroplanes, Zeppelins and submarines. Four British aeroplanes were wrecked. Italian papers state that a French submarine has been sunk in the Adriatic. The British battleship Formidable, was on December 29 sunk in the English Channel by a submarine or mine. Eight persons were killed and many wounded in Poland, on December 26, by bombs dropped by German aeroplanes. The French Senate has unanimously confirmed a bill granting the Government a credit of one billion seven hundred million dollars to defray expenses of the war for the next six months. Germany has notified neutral countries, including the United States, that consuls in Belgian territory must be acceptable to German military authorities.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

PUBLICITY WORK.—Patriarch F. G. Pitt has been holding evangelical meetings in Cleveland, Ohio. The brethren there have done some excellent advertising in the interests of his meeting. One large square card, headed the "Eleventh Hour Message," shows a dial with the hands pointing to the hour of eleven, a picture of Brother Pitt, and announcement of time and place of meeting.

RARE BOOKS ON "MORMONISM."—Elder Daniel Macgregor, of Oyen, Alberta, Canada, writes us that he is about to send out circulars to several hundred collectors of rare books throughout the English-speaking world. If any of the brethren desire to obtain a particular work on "Mormonism," he volunteers to assist him in that undertaking. The eldership will appreciate this offer, and perhaps some of them may profitably take advantage of his kindness.

FAVORABLE MENTION.—The Byron Promoter, published at Byron, Oklahoma, in the issue of November 27, makes very favorable mention of the work of Elder J. E. Vanderwood in that vicinity. The report closes with the following paragraph:

Mr. Vanderwood is of the same brotherhood as W. P. Bootman, the man who held open-air meetings here last summer. Both gentlemen are able representatives of the cause they advocate, and made many friends here and in the Locust Grove community.

NO BETTER PEOPLE.—The Chariton, Iowa, Leader, for December 17, in commenting on the passing of President Joseph Smith, says:

Joseph Smith, president of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, is dead, passing away at his home in Independence, Missouri, recently. He was the son of the founder of the cult, and was a man of pure life and motives. The headquarters of this church is at Lamoni, Iowa, and no better people are to be found anywhere.

The Leader speaks from association with our people. There are many good Saints in Chariton and Lucas County; and Lamoni, a neighboring town, is known to Chariton as the home of the Saints, a community of good morals and with respect for law. This is the calling of the Saints of latter days—to live above reproach, bringing honor to the cause they serve.

INTRODUCTION

The body of this little leaflet is an exact reproduction of an editorial appearing in the Kansas City Journal for December 12, 1914. (Published at Kansas City, Missouri.)

Jesus said, "By their fruits ye shall know them." Better test was never given. More rigorous test was never submitted to. Joseph Smith was a member of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ for over seventy years. He was its president and prophet for fifty-four years. As such he was its chief exponent in life, character, and teaching.

Too often the church is judged by those who violate her precepts. Let her now be judged by one who for so long a time made an honest and generally a successful effort to conform to her teachings.

Again it is said, "Like father like son." If there is anything in heredity, Joseph Smith the Martyr, founder of the church, under divine direction, in 1830, may be judged by the son, who at his death, December 10, 1914, terminated fifty-four years of leadership.

That which we term "the latter-day message," or the "restored gospel," as taught by the church organized in 1830, and as still taught by the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, demanded and still demands personal as well as community righteousness. Let the message and the church be judged by their fruits. ELBERT A. SMITH.

JOSEPH SMITH

In the ecclesiastical dogmas which made up the denominational belief of the late Joseph Smith the general public has no particular interest. But in the death of the late venerable head of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints the country loses an interesting and useful citizen. Joseph Smith was considerably more than a powerful church man, into whose keeping had been committed the destinies of one of the great denominations of the world.

Those who ignorantly confounded the Reorganized Church with Mormonism, in the objectional acceptance of that term, will not appreciate the theological distinctions between the two, nor understand that nothing was more hateful to Joseph Smith than the doctrines of Brigham Young, with their polygamous teachings and all the other features which make Utah Mormonism obnoxious in the eyes of the average American.

But all who ever came in contact with Joseph Smith could readily appreciate the broad charity of his tenets; the untarnished private life he lived; the unswerving devotion to duty which he always displayed; and the simple modesty of his relations toward his church and the world at large. To his church he was the Prophet whom all its communicants revered, but he was also the unostentatious leader who constantly practiced the virtues which he enjoined upon his followers. To the world he was the blameless citizen who walked before all men as an example, and whose interest in the movements that made for the welfare of the community always had his heartiest support.

Perhaps nothing could give a clearer insight into the character of Joseph Smith than the directions which he issued shortly before his death in respect to his funeral. Disliking nothing so much, next to sham, as ostentation, he directed that his funeral should be conducted with the utmost simplicity, without any of the elaborateness which his followers would otherwise have provided in order to testify to the honor in which they held him. He was the Prophet, but first of all he was the Christian gentleman and the good citizen. As such he lived; as such he died; as such he will be remembered by all outside the household of his faith. His followers themselves can have no legacy of remembrance more honorable than this appraisal of the people among whom he lived and labored so many years.

Kindly, cheerful, loyal to his own creed, tolerant of those of others, standing for modesty, simplicity, good citizenship, embodying in his private and public life all the virtues which adorn a character worthy of emulation—such is the revelation which Joseph Smith leaves to the world, as the real interpretation of an ecclesiastical message translated into terms of human character.—Editorial Department, Kansas City Journal, December 12, 1914.

THE DREAD OF RESPONSIBILITY

this age when we are so readily satisfied with outward terms and words. It proved so interesting that we read it through nearly at one sitting.

The especial theme is concerned with the analysis of democracy, especially the democracy of France. The first chapter, on legal ideas and customs, is concerned with the judiciary of France. There it appears the "bench" instead of being a reward for exceptional legal services is itself a career. From this it appears, according to Mr. Faguet, that in order to secure political preferment the courts are subservient to the Government.

This means that in the case of the lower courts and the provincial courts that the representative in the chamber, if of the governing party, has the direction of judgments of the local court. If of the opposite party, this power rests with the Government at Paris. Those familiar with the parties in our large American cities will recognize the type of danger. A word to a man of power has often been sufficient to secure acquittal. But Mr. Faguet argues that this comes from dread on the part of the courts to assume responsibility. He refers to the Dreyfus case as showing very clearly in his mind this tendency in the courts. This is shown as much by the decision of the court of Cassation, as by the decision of the court martial.

The tendency of his argument is therefore in favor of an aristocracy, who will assume this responsibility.

"Among the senators of Rome and of Venice the divine function of guarding the interests of the state was a family profession, and that is just the reason why it was so well performed." The argument is that at least by such methods there could be no indirect pressure of hope of preferment, and there would always be a sense of responsibility. This sense was felt in the French monarchy, because so publicly was the statement made that the King being divinely appointed was responsible only to God, that he was held by the public responsible to God, and also by his own conscience. And under the monarchy, the judiciary offices being hereditary and even purchasable, there was at least a fixed responsibility. Now the courts do not feel themselves responsible, partly because of the law which they do not make, and partly because their decisions are inspired by the Government, hence they are not personally responsible.

So the first chapter is summed up with the suggestion that the court of Cassation should make all the appointments and promotions of the whole bench, and that the court of Cassation shall be appointed by the bench of France by election as fast as these seats become vacant. This is ultra aristocratic, and, curious to relate, is the plan set forth in the Book of Mormon, as used during the reign of the judges.

The second chapter is concerned with the professions. This fear of responsibility causes the public to prefer a government job, because there they only have to do as they are told. So a job requiring eight hours a day work and worth one thousand, six hundred dollars per annum is divided in two and then in time it is again divided, and then again in two, so that they have eight functions, which give two hundred dollars a year, and men who do one-hour work apiece. There it has to stop as to salary, but not as regard to work; as applications continue to increase, it is subdivided again and new jobs created. So is the desire satisfied: Very little work and a pension, no will and no responsibility.

This is shown also in investments, so that a government bond paying three per cent is preferred to an industrial enterprise paying much more, and in which there is risk. To take chances is to assume responsibility. So one may say to his children, "I have increased your estate very little, but I have taken very little chance with it." He never has been responsible.

They consider working for the Government to be superior to any other work, and so cause it to be considered a disgrace to carry on the street a parcel as large as one's fist. The young girls of the French bourgeois despise those who pursue their studies beyond primary work. It is very promptly said, "Have they nothing to live upon?" The idea is not to work very much, but especially to work under orders and obey some one else who is responsible for what one does.

Even doctors will give up a good private practice to work for the railroad. The railroad can get so many and such good doctors, too, that the prices they pay are continually going down. It may come to the point where they shall pay them with their transportation. Some one may ask why they should resign an excellent private practice? The answer is, "There is a title and a salary." A title for his vanity and a salary for his security; and a pass is preferred to risk and responsibility.

So the chapter is concluded with a description of equality, which tends to show that equality is contrary to liberty. We see an example of this in our own country, as this author suggests, in the labor unions. Liberty and freedom will produce differences, or, in other words, inequality.

Chapter three is concerned with the family. The author criticizes the small families in France, because of the dread of the responsibility of trying to raise several children. So one who has more than two is looked upon as improvident. It is easier to provide a start in life for one or two than for four or five or ten, and we must not take chances. Then we might suggest the dread of assuming the responsibility for any family at all—a sort of cowardice, which is serious to the state, for it is the basis of celibacy, in some instances.

The fourth chapter, upon political custom, drives home very forcibly the dangers of democracy. America is not a democracy. In France, back of the written constitution is the real constitution. The President in the written constitution has certain powers to prorogue Parliament, to veto bills; but in the real constitution he has no power to express himself or influence legislation. He is only a figure-head for pomp and pageantry. The Senate fears to express itself, because it is not directly elected by the people. The chamber of deputies, consisting of nine hundred members, safely divides the responsibility of government functions, judicial, legislative and executive, since it has so large a membership no one can be held responsible. But not contented with this, the real power rests with the council of state, which is totally irresponsible. In fact the Government is impersonal and so irresponsible.

But the author is not for the monarchy, since a strong king who is very intelligent, very pious and above all parties is rare. "So let us be republicans without being democrats." (These terms should not be considered in connection with the American parties, since neither of the American parties are in fact democratic.) The republic with democratic basis but containing aristocratic lawmakers, is his ideal. Let the aristocrats and thinkers make the laws, but give the popular chamber the right to veto. For the people, while unable to know what they want, are very capable of knowing what they suffer and do not want; and should be represented by persons who do not make the laws, but who have the right to reject.

Let the president, elected as in the United States, be given similar powers and responsibilities. Let the labor unions, universities, the army, the cities, and the judiciary be represented in the aristocracy.

The above only partially represents this work. It is courageous in its analysis of existing conditions. So few people ever stop to consider what is a democracy, an aristocracy, a republic or a monarchy. But few have ever considered to what form of government the church belongs.

While reading this book we were asked what it was about, and we replied that it was an argument against democracy and in favor of aristocracy. The reply was made, "Well, I am open to conviction, but I do not think you can convict me." Yet the man who made the remark is in fact himself an aristocrat, and believes in family, and believes in the son succeeding to the position of the father. And hereditary aristocracy is generally considered to be the poorest form.

We do not believe that the church is a pure democracy, though it has the very best democratic principles in its constitution, united with the best of aristocracy and of monarchy.

We heard a remark recently concerning one of our men, that he thought more of his family than he does of the church. We should regret to think that this is true, because paraphrasing and extending the statement of Coleridge: "He who thinks more of Christianity than he does of truth, will think more of his church than he does of Christianity and finally think more of himself than he does of the church." We might say, he who thinks more of his family than he does of his church will end by thinking more of himself than he does of his family.

A republic means delegated power and authority, and in its best sense it would mean to secure the ablest men and delegate to them authority and power, and hold them responsible to the people for its exercise and want of exercise. For this Mr. Faguet argues, and with much reason. Though the organization of the church we consider superior, fusing as it does, the best of aristocracy, of monarchy and democracy, as well as principles of the republic.

SERVING WISELY

Behold, I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves; be ye therefore wise servants, and harmless as doves.

After years of mature deliberation on the spirit of the above text, the writer is particularly impressed with its magnificence, its far-reaching, uplifting, and transcending virtues. Coming as it does from the Master Teacher it is of special import to us; and even if it should have had other origin it would nevertheless be of sterling worth, since it pictures vividly the type of character and the type of service that should be maintained and performed by the servants of the Master. As we dwell upon the simplicity, and yet transcendent excellence of thought expressed in so few words, it almost causes us to behold with awe, and yet with admiration the author of such sublime rhetoric.

Innocence and wisdom are so closely and beautifully related, and so impressively associated together, that we can not escape the conclusion that either one without the other would be incomplete; and it is therefore further impressed upon the writer's mind that both innocence and wisdom are essential features to be understood and acquired by those who accept the responsible service of the Christian ministry.

"I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves," is only another way of expressing the precept found in the sermon on the mount, viz, "Resist not evil." In short, it suggests to the intelligent mind not only nonresistance in action but also nonresistance in thought, or, in other words, complete harmlessness. If therefore we should read the Master's words in paraphrase, they could be expressed in this manner: You are sent out into the world where destruction is prevalent; you will find men there of fierce countenances; many will seek to devour you because they are darkened in mind and perverted in judgment by reason of a false conception of power and of right; but notwithstanding these conditions do and will exist, it is required of you to conquer through love and not by force, by submission and not by fiat; you should not harm in the least, but like the dove by tender cooing and fond caressing make your lives a benediction unto all with whom you come in contact.

We, however, have not always been wise servants; at times our spirit has savored more of the wolf than it has of the lamb. It is without question a prevalent error made by humanity in general to forget the gentle cooing of the innocent, harmless dove, and to assume the ferocious, domineering voice of a lion. In place of kindly and lovingly entreating, we become severe and harsh in our denunciation of what we call the faults or sins of others, while in many cases the greater fault is in ourselves. The writer frankly admits having been guilty in this matter, but has learned in more recent years to be more tolerant with others, and is therefore able to do far more good in the world than he could by the method of harsh denunciation.

It is well that we learn to employ Christ-like methods in our missionary efforts; to say the least, that would be the part of wisdom,—and the writer has learned,—and by hard experiences in some cases,—that a negative message is never very prolific in good fruits, but is very effectual as a rule in stirring up strife, confusion, revenge, malice, and prejudice; and I have long since concluded that I was badly in need of wisdom when I resorted to such. One unwise act on the part of the minister will frequently do more harm than a dozen of his brethren can do good.

If the writer is able to correctly understand the matter it is a grave mistake for the missionary to say, when fortunate enough to get a place in which to preach, and a congregation to hear him, "I will never get another chance at them, and, therefore, I will give them a good one while I am about it," and then makes himself so very obnoxious that he never will get another opportunity to speak to the same people or to occupy the same pulpit; and what is still worse, his brethren who are wiser than he will also be denied the privilege of presenting the glad tidings to the perishing people. Would it not be the part of wisdom in such cases to say, "I will get the privilege again of speaking to this people because I will deal so gently with them that the Christ-like-ness of my deportment will give them a desire to hear more of my message"? And then in the Spirit of the Master feed the people the "bread of life," or, more properly speaking, with the "sincere milk of the word," and thus gradually with kind actions and tender words gently lead them towards the perfect life, which can only be realized in the developing of a perfect character.

The individual who simply finds fault with the belief and teaching of those who differ from him is lacking materially in wisdom and ability to present his own cause. He who has a message to deliver need not tamper with the structure of others; and the writer has come to believe that he who does so is badly in need of the life-giving essence of his own message.

The minister for Christ, then, must be Christ-like; he must be possessed of unbounding love and unflinching wisdom; divine goodness must be personified in him if he would make a success in his profession. He must cultivate that gentleness that will not harm a living creature; become broad enough in his views to see the good in all; and grasp the underlying motive rather than the outward action. He must learn to lead and not seek to drive mankind into his way of thinking. He must learn to patiently endure all things. He should meekly submit to the conditions that can not be changed; and should lovingly tolerate the weakness of others, at least until he is able to lead them higher.

Now the writer desires to be understood in this matter, so do not misconstrue his words to mean that he would in the least compromise truth,—far from it! He would maintain truth under every condition by rising above error; and, avoiding dogmatic phrases and harsh words, he would implant the seeds of truth the deeper in the hearts and minds of men. If others misrepresent and abuse one, they have to do with that and not I. That which is false can not hurt me unless I permit myself to be hurt of it; and if I retaliate and in my blindness resort to the same methods, I admit that the charge is founded in fact, my own actions being my accuser.

And so it is that debate frequently does more harm than it does good, because the debater forgets to be as a sheep in the midst of wolves; he fails to be a wise servant and as harmless as a dove. Of course if he is not harmless he of necessity must be harmful, and if harmful then a hindrance and not a help to the cause he seeks to represent among his fellow men.

To fulfill the requirements of our text one must become more than a mere iconoclast; he must build not only a character for himself but an ideal for others that will transcend in beauty and grandeur all the idols that have hitherto been enthroned in their hearts or minds. And thus through meekness and love we may lift those with whom we mingle to higher ideals; and by reason thereof they will forsake their idols, they will part company with their perishing ideals and will supplant them with the brilliant gems of truth that have been discovered in our message.

Earnestness, kindness, sincerity, patience, cheerfulness, forbearance, and love are the essential characteristics of Christ-like service, and if these virtues are carefully cultivated by us we will wield an influence for good wherever we go; for it is obvious that people are able to discern, in a measure at least, the spirit by which we are affected, and if we fail of the virtues just mentioned, though our theories be excellent, they will nevertheless be empty, merely a shell from which the pearl has been removed.

Let us then remember that wisdom and harmlessness are the watchwords. We should continually affirm them. We should seek to fathom their truest and deepest meaning; and being able to understand we are then ready to go about, as did the Master of men, doing good. We will disseminate peace in place of strife, love shall be given for hatred, kindness will be returned for harshness, error will be met with truth, and hatred will be swallowed up in love.

Behold, this is the blessed heritage of the servant or Saint of God; and if this be not learned we shall yet fall short of the divine blessedness. If we are partakers of the divine nature we will bless where others curse, forgive where others condemn, remain silent when assailed, serene in the midst of confusion, and strong in the hour of temptation. And thus overcoming, thus subduing the selfish, sinful propensities of the lower man, we will ascend the heights of the sublimely virtuous. Our patient continuance in well-doing will melt as it were the heart of stone, and like the Master of life we will draw all men unto us.

Thus we may make this world a fitter place in which to live, and thus will the conditions of heaven, or harmony, become a part of our very being, and thereby we may be able to commune with the Highest, both here and hereafter. J. E. VANDERWOOD.

"THE ARMY OF THE LORD"

"We have all for life enlisted in the army of the Lord!" is the sentiment often expressed in song in our social meetings; but are we merely an army of singers? Think you that the ramparts and fortresses of sin will crumple before an assault of musical sound? That Satan, the seasoned and crafty general of Sin's battalions, will turn and flee with his hosts from such a combination of poetical, musical and vocal ability? Do not be deceived; God's soldiers must do more than sing. They must not be of those who "say (or sing) and do not."

The Lord has an army. Service in it is not compulsory. "Hark, listen to the trumpeters, they call for the volunteers!" He is very impartial in his selection of soldiers—"He is calling now to battle, both the aged and the youth." The youthful are not discarded because of inexperience, nor the aged because of decrepitude.

To be efficient, the soldier must be trained. He must learn to be subject to discipline; to obey the word of command. These requirements are as relevant in God's army as in the armies of the nations. Without discipline and obedience an "army" is a rabble; opposed to another army which recognizes these imperative requirements, certain defeat will result.

Initiation into the Lord's army is brought about by obedience to the principles of faith, repentance, baptism, and the laying on of hands. Many people can not "see any sense" in being baptized or in receiving the laying on of hands. To them both are foolish acts. They have not learned the lesson of obedience. It is not the privilege of a soldier to talk back to his superior, nor to "reason why" a command has been given. General Jesus Christ has issued commands that all men should obey the principles under discussion in order to enter his army. By our obedience or disobedience our love and loyalty are tested.

A disloyal soldier is a menace to any army, the army of the Lord included. A loyal soldier or recruit will be willing to obey the orders of the commanding general without question. That, in a nutshell, is the difference between the regenerate and unregenerate soldier in the army of the Lord. It would be well for all to remember that Christ is the "author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him." The disobedient, disloyal soldier has no such promise.

After enlisting in the Lord's army we must learn our duty. The victories of the Lord's army are not now upon fields of carnage. His soldiers, unlike those of this world, are not trained to kill and to destroy, except it be to destroy the evil within themselves.

There's a war to wage with sin,
Foes without and foes within;
Gird your armor on.

Our fight is against the "world, the flesh, and the Devil." Paul, one of the Lord's captains, thus describes the forces we have to meet, and the equipment required by the Christian soldier:

Be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might. Put on the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the Devil. For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places. Wherefore take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand. Stand therefore, having your loins girded about with truth, and having on the breastplate of righteousness; and your feet shod with its preparation of the gospel of peace; above all taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God.

Every soldier must become skillful in the use of his weapons of offense and defense. He must train his natural abilities with the aid of the word of God—all the time keeping in mind the idea of discipline. It is the prerogative of the General to command, and our duty is to obey, right through the battle, until we lay our armors down. If we heed his commands we will be victorious—otherwise we can not have his blessing. We must learn to depend upon him. "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord," is a motto we should carry upon our banners. If we recognize that principle, we will always be subject to discipline, and will not be found fighting in our own strength.

The Lord's army has officers whose duty it is under God to direct the warfare. Each should be honored in his calling, and should accord to his superior officers due respect and support. The membership should uphold and support every officer and honor him in his position, so long as he performs his duties in righteousness. As in the armies of the world, each officer needs special training for the duties assigned him. He must study to show himself a workman approved, who needeth not be ashamed.

If these directions are all followed, the army of the Lord will become a remarkable effective fighting machine, before which the forces of evil will quail and flee in hopeless disorder. Are you doing your part? Are you preparing for service?

It is time to dare and do,
Gird your armor on.

HAWAIIAN COMMENT ON PRESIDENT JOSEPH SMITH

[In the HERALD of December 23, press comment on the passing of President Joseph Smith was reproduced as illustrating the growing understanding throughout the United States on points of difference between the Reorganized and Utah churches, and the appreciation of the good work of the Reorganization. The following from The Pacific Commercial Advertiser, published at Honolulu, Hawaii, evidences the same understanding in these far-away islands of the Pacific.—EDITORS.]

Gilbert J. Waller, elder of the local branch of the Reorganized Church, was notified yesterday of the death of President Smith, of whom he had been an intimate friend for a number of years.

The cablegram came from Frederick M. Smith, the present president of the church, the message stating that his father's death occurred at one o'clock yesterday afternoon and that the funeral would be held at two o'clock on Sunday afternoon.

At the same hour here special services will be held at the church of the faith in King Street.

A history of Joseph Smith, who was a son of Joseph Smith, prophet and founder of "Mormonism," is a history of the Reorganized Church of the Latter Day Saints. It was he who brought together the little bands of "Mormonism" in Illinois, Iowa and Missouri, left behind when the main body emigrated to Utah. He became the first president of the Reorganized Church and held that office more than half a century. He was a cousin of Joseph Fielding Smith, in recent years president of the Latter-day Saints in Utah.

The greater part of President Joseph Smith's life was a struggle, as had been the life of his father, to place "Mormonism" upon a sound footing. During the last years of his life he was blind.

He was born November 6, 1832, at Kirtland, Ohio, where his father had gone two years earlier with a few followers, from Manchester, New York. Soon afterwards the colony moved to Missouri. There at Independence, the prophet, as he was known, established the "New Jerusalem" of the church, obeying, he said, a revelation. Enmity of other settlers, however, resulted in the "Mormons" being driven out. Prophet Joseph Smith was arrested and placed in jail at Liberty, Missouri.

In jail, where the younger Joseph, then five years old, spent the first night with his father, the Prophet bent over the child as he sobbed himself to sleep, and to him commended the hopes and aspirations of the church.

"My mother accompanied my father to Liberty," Joseph Smith told, in later years, "but fearing for her life, my father induced her to go with members of the church to Illinois. I tramped across the almost uninhabited prairies of Missouri to Nauvoo, Illinois, where my father, when he was released, joined us. Then, in 1844, when I was twelve years old, one day his dead body was brought to us. He had been shot by a mob at Carthage, Illinois."

After the death of the Prophet most of the members of the church emigrated to Utah under the leadership of Brigham Young. Young Joseph Smith, remaining behind, worked as a farmer and as a clerk and studied law. This he gave up to effect the reorganization of the church, which was formally accomplished at Amboy, Illinois, in 1860. Twenty years later headquarters of the church was established in Lamoni, Iowa, and in 1906 a removal was made to Independence, Missouri, where President Smith made his home and where he resided until his death.

President Smith lived simply, occupying a modest cottage, one room of which constituted his office. He arose early, and, until his health began to fail a few years ago and blindness overtook him, he devoted his days to editorial work for the SAINTS' HERALD, the official publication of the church, and governmental affairs of the organization, as well as responding to many pleas for advice from communicants. The aged church-head was a familiar figure in Independence, with heavy whitened beard and dressed plainly, he had much the appearance of a well-to-do-farmer. He was in close touch with the members of his church and was familiarly addressed by them as "Brother Joseph." Much of the active conduct of his office he turned over in 1912 to his son, Frederick M. Smith, who, he declared, a revelation said should succeed him.

President Smith was married three times, losing his first and second wives by death. He denounced polygamous teachings and practices and most emphatically denied that his father was a polygamist or sanctioned polygamy.

Some eight years ago, Joseph Smith visited Honolulu, coming here to dedicate the new church of his faith erected in King Street. At that time he was introduced to Honolulu as "the champion polygamy fighter of the world."

Mr. Smith was one of the charter members of the Republican Party, casting his first vote for Abraham Lincoln.—Commercial Advertiser, December 11.

Memorial services for the late Joseph Smith, founder and first president of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, whose death occurred Thursday in Independence, Missouri, will be held in the Honolulu church, South King Street, to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock.

There will be special music by the choir and addresses by Elder Gilbert J. Waller, Elder Isaac H. Harbottle and John M. Mahuka; all of whom knew the late president of the church personally, having met him during his visit to Honolulu at the time the local church was dedicated.

Through the death of his father, Frederick Madison Smith, president of the church since 1906, has become the foremost figure of this religious organization.

President Smith is a well-known man about Washington, a personal friend of President Wilson and an expert in social questions, criminal law and criminology.

While his father was well known in Honolulu, President Smith has never visited the islands. He is known personally, however, by Elder Waller, who has frequently visited Independence, Missouri, where the headquarters of the church is established, and by other local persons who have traveled in the United States.—Commercial Advertiser, December 12.

STEALING FROM INDIANS

An organized clique of grafters, we are told, is operating in Oklahoma and the city of Washington to rob the Oklahoma Indians of more than $200,000,000 worth of coal lands. The spotlight is now turned on these operations by Miss Kate Barnard, Oklahoma's Commissioner of Charities, whose position makes her the immediate official protector of the Indians in her State. The accused clique, according to Miss Barnard, has entrenched itself so strongly in State politics that she found it necessary to refuse a renomination for her present office, and is organizing instead a State-wide and Nation-wide "people's lobby" to rescue her wards from the spoilers. Her startling charges, according to a Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, are indorsed by Mr. Cato Sells, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as "in the main true." Mr. Sells further bespoke "the cooperation of all good people" in Miss Barnard's "righteous struggle to protect the weak and helpless." Writing in the New York Survey, Miss Barnard tells us that

Two hundred millions is a low estimate of the money prize at stake, and the success of the plot means misery and poverty for 10,000 Indian mothers and the unborn babes of coming generations. This remaining stupendous wealth is now in the hands of 33,000 restricted Indians, most of whom are ignorant and can not read or write. The remainder of the 100,000 Indians have already been robbed. This conspiracy reaches from the political group which dominated the fourth legislature of Oklahoma, is dominating the Oklahoma delegation in Congress, and through the delegation is evidently dominating the Indian Department, as it affects Oklahoma matters at this time.

The first step in the plot, we are told, was accomplished in 1908, when the Federal Government was induced to surrender its supervision of Indian minors and full-blooded heirs and to place this authority in the probate courts of Oklahoma. The next step, says

Miss Barnard, was taken when the last Oklahoma legislature crippled the State Department of Charities, "the last disinterested official protector of these Indians." Another move of the plotters, she goes on to say, was to procure the removal of certain Indian agencies from the protection of the civil service and their transfer to purely political control. We read further:

Approximately $5,000,000 in cash of tribal funds are now ready for per capita distribution among about 80,000 Chickasaws, Cherokees, and Seminoles. Approximately $30,000,000 more will be ready to distribute in the near future among 40,000 Choctaws and Chickasaws; there are still nearly 25,000 separate ledger accounts open relating to the unfinished sale and transfer of title to more than 2,000,000 acres of tribal lands. Is it an accident that the Department of Charities, the only branch of the State Government having any legal authority to protect these helpless minors in the courts of Oklahoma, should be destroyed on the eve of the distribution of these vast natural resources and tribal funds?

Describing the methods by which the Indians are robbed, Miss Barnard goes on to say:

The most common form of plunder lies in the power to sell a minor's land for the pretended purpose of "benefiting" the minor. Reduced to money, eighty per cent of the capital is consumed by fake "court costs," "attorney fees" and "allowances," bad loans, and investments.

One of the leading newspapers of the State obtained from the Indian minors thousands of dollars on its worthless stocks and bonds.

At one time, the Department of Charities was informed that three "elf" children were sleeping in the hollow of an old tree and eating at neighboring farmhouses. An investigation proved that these little ones were actually living in this homeless, friendless fashion, their hair so matted that it had to be cut from their heads. We found further that they were under the "protection" of a "guardian," who had fifty-one other children under his protecting care. These three children had valuable lands in the Glenn Pool oil fields. The guardian was charging up large amounts for their "schooling" and "general care," yet he did not know where the children were.

At every turn, says Miss Barnard, her efforts to protect the ignorant and helpless Indian heirs from those who were fattening on them were balked by a combination of interests so strong that they even undertook to dictate the manner in which the laws should be enforced. When she refused to conduct her department according to their program, and to make an appointment at their dictation, the appropriation for the Department of Charities was cut off. We read:

I was told I would be given "all the money I wanted in the Appropriation Bill," but when I refused to make the appointment I was left without money for office help, field help, stamps, or telephone. I furnished $350 of my own money and solicited additional money from my friends, and at this time the Department of Charities of Oklahoma is financed upon the money of humanitarians and philanthropists.

Miss Barnard declares that she is "in this fight to the finish," and she calls upon the people of the United States to stand by her "until the hand of partisan politicians is wrested from the control of Indian Affairs in Oklahoma and in the Nation."

Turning again to the Washington correspondence of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, from which we have already quoted, we gather the following additional information:

It was freely admitted at the Indian Office that a systematic robbing of Indians in Oklahoma had been going on for a long time and the office was at work trying to get at the bottom of the criminality. Convictions of scores of crooked administrators have been obtained and hundreds of thousands of dollars in money recovered and restored to the Indian children to whom it belonged.

Soon after Congress meets in December the crookedness that has been going on in Oklahoma will be brought to its attention by Commissioner Sells in a special report.

The policy insisted on by Miss Barnard is that the United States Indian Office shall provide a number of special attorneys in Oklahoma to take charge of the probate business involving Indian children. They are to look after such cases of adjusting estates as may arise, and also to dig up all the wrongdoing in cases already disposed of and institute criminal prosecutions where necessary to bring defaulting and thieving administrators and executors to justice.—Literary Digest, November 28, 1914.

WAR'S DERANGEMENT OF RELIGIOUS WORK

Organized religious work everywhere suffers by the war, so the Philadelphia North American's regular writer on religious topics points out. "The caution and readjustment compelled by the war are causing a limitation of all gifts on the part of church members, which all philanthropies and religious institutions are even thus early beginning to feel." The marked effect upon foreign-mission work already has been dwelt upon in these columns. But the same interference with the course of international activity and the same need for retrenchment affect, we are reminded, all bodies which depend upon public gifts for their normal income. Take a typical incident cited in The North American:

One of the Baptist boards had planned to send a woman worker to the Pacific coast for a special form of service. When the war broke out she was notified by telegraph to remain in the Middle West, simply in order to save so small an amount as one worker's traveling expenses.

Nowadays, continues this writer, "There are many international religious organizations, and these are peculiarly sensitive to such disturbed conditions as the present." For example:

The Young Men's Christian Association at Geneva has three secretaries, and at the outbreak of the war one of these was called to the Swiss colors, one to the German, and one to the French, with the result that the association was left without workers. Doctor John R. Mott has abandoned his proposed world tour. Everybody knows that the church peace congress was broken up as soon as it convened.

Sunday school workers have been preparing for a world's convention in Tokio next year, but now the leaders look grave.

The Christian Endeavor Society was to have held a world's convention in Australia, but that had already been postponed, because of the prevalence of an epidemic.

Not only have present troubles lessened gifts, but they will divert the general stream of unpledged benevolence. Relief work, that will be made necessary in behalf of all nations, will have first claim upon the sympathies of the public. Americans are foremost in responding to international appeals, and the one popular cause in the whole field of philanthropy for a long time to come will be the relief of war-sufferers.

There will be a sifting out of many frailer organizations and a careful examining of the relative claims of the causes which demand public support. All of this may mean more than any man can yet tell.

One great international body, the Salvation Army, is facing the most severe crisis of its existence, according to officers quoted in The New York Times. More than ten thousand members of the organization are said to be actually fighting in the ranks. In all the fighting countries, except England, its actual existence as a working factor is said to have ceased. In this country,

The work planned by the Army to meet some of the tremendous problems that it is asked to solve must in large part now be abandoned. This will have serious effect on our work in Chicago, Pittsburg, and many other cities.

The Salvation Army in America is without reserve funds, and its gifts from the well-to-do have always been small in number and amount. Churches give little. So hardly more than a hand-to-mouth existence has been possible for some weeks. Most of the money of the Army is earned in industrial plants, but these have been well-nigh put out of business. Some collections are received at street meetings, but these have much fallen off.

In particular, the annual Christmas charities in the large cities will suffer, for, as the Times notes, "most of the larger donations and gifts of money to the Army are now for the sufferers in the war zone, and are being sent abroad for distribution through such parts of the organization as remain intact in the warring countries."—Literary Digest, October 31, 1914.

PROHIBITION IN RUSSIA

The associated press gives the story of the prohibition movement in Russia as furnished by Michael Denitrovitch Tchelisheff, perhaps more active for prohibition than any other man in Russia. For many years Tchelisheff (as an alderman and mayor of Samara, and finally as a member of the Duma, worked for prohibition without success, the bureaucracy being loath to abolish a governmental monopoly in the manufacture and sale of vodka, bringing to the national treasury a revenue of five hundred million dollars annually. The European war did what Tchelisheff and the Duma could not do, concerning which he says:

Mobilization precipitated the antivodka measure. The grand duke, remembering the disorganization due to drunk-ness during the mobilization of 1904, ordered the prohibition of all drinks except in clubs and first-class restaurants. This order enforced for one month showed the Russian authorities the value of abstinence.

In spite of the general depression caused by the war, paralysis of business, the closing of factories and the interruption of railroad traffic the people felt no privation. Savings banks showed an increase in deposits over the preceding month and over the corresponding month of the preceding year. At the same time there was a boom in the sale of meats, groceries, clothing, dry goods and house furnishings. The thirty million rubles a day that had been paid for vodka were now being spent for the necessities of life.

CZAR EXTENDS PROHIBITION

I dreaded to seize this occasion for a press campaign, so far as this is a possible thing in Russia. I organized delegations to present petitions to the proper authorities for the prolonging of this new sobriety for the duration of the war. This step found favor with his imperial majesty, and an order was issued to that effect. Another similar campaign to remove the licenses from privileged restaurants and clubs was successful and strong liquor is no longer available anywhere in Russia.

The second month of abstinence made the manifold advantages so clear to everybody that when we called upon his majesty to thank him for his recent orders he promised that the vodka business of the Government would be given up for ever. This promise was promulgated in a telegram to the Grand Duke Constantine.

There remains only now to find elsewhere the revenue which up to the present time has been contributed by vodka. There has been introduced in the duma a bill offering a solution of this question. The aim of this bill is not the creation of new taxes or an increase in the present taxes, but an effort to render the government domains and possessions more productive.

Sunday School Department

EDITED BY GOMER R. WELLS, BURLINGTON, IOWA

Wherefore

There's a reason. Otherwise we would not be greeting you here.

At the very time we were writing our "Adieu" in the farewell issue of the Exponent, Editor Elbert A. Smith was dictating a letter inviting us to conduct a Sunday school department in the church organ.

At that time our thoughts were running thus: Since our association has made the most of its opportunities to publish an organ of its own, it would be inconsistent and also undignified to suspend publication and then knock at the doors of the HERALD for space to reach our people. That is, so long as we continue to publish our own quarterlies.

Having done our editorial work under all kinds of disabilities, we felt relieved in a certain sense when the executive committee decided to quit publication. Nevertheless, when the kind offer came to occupy for the good of the work in the HERALD we could not turn it down, and we accept on behalf of the association with sincere thanks. It shows that the spiritual authorities of the church are keeping an eye on our movements, and that they think we should have some avenue of expression and instruction.

A second reason: The opportunity was too good to let pass. The HERALD is the very best medium. It reaches many thousands more than we ever reached with our "official organ," and it will do it three times as often, under present arrangement, which is to greet you once a month. Once a week would be a dozen times better, a facility we may not soon be able to provide on our own account as an association.

HOW LONG?

But this department is not meant to take the place of the Exponent. It would be unreasonable to expect that amount of space under the existing policy of the association. Our arrangement with the HERALD editors stands good only until next April, at which time there can be something more permanent provided either by the convention or its new officers. What the HERALD management may have to suggest at that time remains to be seen. We appreciate their generosity in the present offer and also their interest in the Sunday school work.

The Unpaid Host

There are two kinds of hosts. One kind entertains, especially one who entertains strangers for compensation. No doubt there are hosts of this kind who sometimes go unpaid, but their cases are the exception to the rule. Most people pay their way at hotels and lodging houses.

The host that we are thinking most about as we write is exactly the opposite to the above named. The majority go unpaid and delight to have it so. They never think of taking legal or other action to have their pay, and they would feel insulted if you mentioned it.

At the Thanksgiving season this year Doctor H. M. Ham-mill, veteran Sunday school worker of America, mentioned among other things: "I am thankful for the ever-increasing efficiency of the Sunday school, its wonderful literature of Bible helps, and its unpaid host of consecrated workers."

NOT DEBATABLE

It has been thought by some that there was not as much consecrated effort in church work now as formerly. This is a serious question, but we believe the tendency may be more apparent than real. The lives we live to-day are more complex than formerly. We may be mistaken; but we would not debate the matter five minutes, because we see no means of procuring the data by which we could be exact in our comparisons. We could not discuss it comprehensively and satisfactorily. Only God knows the true status of the case, and to him we must look for the true decision. It is something like discussing whether our forefathers will be saved or not. If they did the best they knew how—lived up to all the light they had—God will take care of their case. The serious question for us is, Are we living up to all the light we have received?

LOVING SERVICE

We have all been born and reared more or less under worldly conditions; under a system that is perverted, in which the idea of service is perverted. Even conceptions of property and ownership are wrong. The necessities of our system and our environment are such that we are compelled to have pay for most that we do. The first thought that occurs to the average mind is, What am I going to get? What is there in it for me? Therefore, a person who does something for nothing and makes it a rule of his life to do it regularly, for years, is an oddity. And the pessimist tells us these oddities are getting scarcer every day.

Let us lose no time nor be diverted from service by such deadening suggestions. We can gain nothing from it. Let us only ask ourselves: Do I love this work? For if I do, I am consecrated to it body, soul, and spirit. And I will be spurred on in my efforts by the question, How much better off is the world because I love it? Some unpaid worker brought the gospel to me. Will that effort end in me?

WHAT IT MEANS TO US

When we think of the religious movements of the ages past and present we can not fail to recognize the great unpaid host. Out of the hundreds of thousands of workers in the International Sunday School Association, there are less than two hundred paid, and they are officers who give their whole time in the office or travel in the interest of the great organization.

Our own church to-day could not have inherited the rich legacy of truth and light were it not for the consecrated efforts of an unpaid host who went out trusting in God "without purse or scrip," and those early Saints who suffered much that their faith might make itself felt in the world and win a name and place among religious movements. There would be no Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and we would have no General Sunday School Association; no General Religio Society; no Woman's Auxiliary for Social Service; no Ladies' Aids; no Library Commission; no Social Purity Board—no auxiliaries at all, if there were no unpaid, consecrated workers. And it is equally certain that these agencies for good can not be perpetuated unless there continues to come more consecrated workers. Of course, where the work is developing beyond the possibility of volunteer service to give the attention it ought to have, assistance must be given those so they can forsake their daily vocations and give their whole time to that work. Even then we do not look upon it as compensation. We call it an "allowance," which is not meant in any sense to be adequate pay according to the business standards of the day.

AVENUES FOR SERVICE

In some aspects, our work is unavoidably being placed on a business basis wherever it is clear that it means increased efficiency. But the true spirit of the unpaid hosts still permeates it, for they find avenues for service opening daily and at their very doors. Some of the lines whereby we organize our service are shifting, and we must be alert to see just where and how to make the most of our opportunities. Should a worker of a hundred years ago return, he would at first feel quite lost. He might fail to recognize some of the old forms of service, and he would have to be introduced into many new forms, such as those mentioned above. It is a day of classification, of organization. He would soon feel quite at home, for he would discover that only the outward form had changed; the spirit is the same the world over and in all ages. Humanity's needs are ever the same.

To every consecrated heart in every dispensation there opens an opportunity for unpaid service, an avenue for the expression of altruism. Love sees the way.

A CONTRADICTION OF NATURE

We mean perverted human nature. The carnal, selfish mind can not understand why "it is more blessed to give than to receive." It can not see how it is that consecrated service brings its own reward. And no wonder; for spiritual service is spiritually discerned. "So is everyone that is born of the Spirit." Join this unpaid host and you will comprehend it.

All honor to the unpaid host of consecrated workers in every avenue of service. The world will be better because they lived in it. They are serving a spiritual apprenticeship for more advanced conditions here and hereafter. If they obey and continue to develop the beauties of the celestial law, they shall be quickened by a celestial Spirit into life never ending—that host which John saw, redeemed out of every nation, kindred, tongue and people, which no man could number.

“What Is Institute Work?”

Those in newly organized districts and others often ask this question, and we are requested to give our answer to it. It is one of the requirements of the standard of excellence that at least one session of institute work be held in the district each year. Special efforts are being made this year to bring up the standing of every district and many are nobly responding. We hope the newer districts will start right by arranging for institute work at some of their meetings in the near future.

When used in connection with educational work, which ours unquestionably is, the word institute means an occasional meeting of teachers at the call of a superintendent for normal instruction by means of lectures, class examinations, discussion of methods, etc. In Sunday school institutes, we add to this officers who are all interested in becoming more efficient in their work. In our association, we also include all departments, such as home class, normal, library, cradle roll, social purity, etc.

Any effort to make more efficient teachers, better informed officers, to stimulate and extend the various departments, and put ginger into the workers is good, sound institute work. Of course, there might be institute work that did not bring such results, and the district would get credit on the books of the general secretary for it; but if it bears no fruit, it is “as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal.”

Some of the older Saints think all institute work is worthy of this description, but they are mistaken. What we need to do is to work for real results. Once the older folks see that it makes for efficiency, for building up the kingdom of God and his righteousness, they will change their mind.

Institute work means a united effort of officers, teachers and heads of departments to study to show themselves approved, workmen that need not be ashamed. It is not an artificial requirement. The work calls for it. God and Christ can use us better because of good institute work. Therefore our standard of excellence is not complete without it.

As Corresponding Secretary

We just can't refrain from remarking that our secretary is a live one, who also has the capability and the heart to work.

Turning to section 3, article 5, page 4, duties of officers, in our constitution, you will read two distinct paragraphs on the duties of general secretary. The first refers to the function of “recording secretary”; the second of “corresponding secretary,” laboring “under the general direction of the superintendent,” advising and instructing all district officers, district associations, and schools by correspondence, etc. “He shall procure and prepare items of interest for the General Association.”

Our secretary is trying to measure up to the above standard, and is succeeding, in our estimation. If you get a blank asking for a report of your convention, remember he is “procuring and preparing items of interest for the association,” according to the constitution. Don't turn it down.

If the secretary keeps after you with instruction and asks for information, exhorts you, circularizes you, and then does it all over again, don't be surprised. He is on his job, and we have asked him to prosecute some duties for us, because we have others demanding our attention. He is doing this in addition to his many other duties, so don't waste his time by not responding when that is required.

Only for a live secretary, we would not have consented to fill out the unexpired term of our predecessor.

Look out for “secretarial notes.” Read them the second time.

Secretarial Notes

DON'T FORGET US

When you have your convention programs printed, don't forget that the secretary wants at least a copy—more, if you can spare them. We like to know about the questions being discussed and who does it. Then if you are looking for new subjects for your programs, write us, for we may have something you are wanting.

NEW CONVENTION REPORT BLANKS

The intelligent manner in which the district secretaries are filling out the new blanks for reporting principal items of district conventions to the general secretary, shows they understand the news value and the historical importance of such things. If we can learn when you hold your conventions we will send a blank for conveniently reporting these things. Kindly inform us of the dates of your conventions if it should happen that you do not publish same in the church papers.

NEW SUPPLIES

Many changes have recently been made in the supplies for our Sunday schools, especially in the report blanks. Reports from various quarters indicate that they are well received and accepted as an improvement.

An entirely new catalogue is now issued by the Herald Publishing House, describing both the new and the old Sunday school helps. It is free, and you should have a copy. Have some at your conventions to distribute to those who ought to have them.

Special inquiries regarding the use of any of these new features should be addressed to the undersigned, who will take the matter up by personal letter and in detail as you desire.

Get the catalogue first, for it may answer the question you want to ask.

REPORTING

Blanks have been sent out to every district secretary for the annual district reports. If some one has succeeded you as secretary, please pass them along and drop us a card and give the name and address. We want a good, reliable report from every district.

ADDRESS

Our General Normal Superintendent, L. F. P. Curry, should now be addressed at 428 Maxcy Hall, Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island.

E. D. MOORE.

LAMONI, IOWA.

Letter of Recommendation

To the Sunday School Workers of Nebraska: This is to certify that your state normal superintendent, Sister Blanche I. Andrews, of Bethany, Nebraska, is considered by us to be a proper and fit officer to advise in Sunday school work, to hold institutes, and to build up this arm of the kingdom of God.

As such we heartily recommend her to you and urge that you procure her valuable service both locally and in conventions, tending her such financial help for traveling expenses as your circumstances may permit.

GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT.

Proposed Amendment to Constitution

The following was adopted by convention of the Independence Stake Sunday school held September 11, and ordered printed for action at next General Convention:

"Resolved, That this convention recommend to General Convention that one year from next General Convention our delegate vote to the General Convention be changed from one representative to every ten, to one for every twenty-five or fraction thereof. (Signed) "MRS. ARTHUR ALLEN,
"Secretary."

Our constitution says notices of proposed amendments "must be published in the official organ of the association two months previous to the convening of each session" of convention. Since the official organ has been discontinued by order of the executive committee, there may be some question as to whether a legal notice for proposed amendments can now be given.

We are willing to cut red tape and say that for the purpose of the association this department while it runs between now and next convention is the official mouthpiece, and we encourage all workers to send in their amendments. We shall hold that for the purposes of the constitution publication in this department under the present special circumstances shall be sufficient and fulfill the spirit of the constitution, if printed within the time limit.

The executive committee have a subcommittee appointed to prepare amendments to constitution to suit change ordered by last convention, and we presume that committee will file their report for publication within the two-month limit.

Offerings

CHRISTMAS OFFERINGS

Although administered by the Bishopric, the Christmas offering is, nevertheless, a Sunday school movement. And the Association rejoices in the help our members have given every year at the very time it is most needed. It is the time when the cry of the poor and the needy is heard most; the time when the families of the missionaries can not go without allowances.

Sometimes a great and good man's opinions may not be as effective while living as after his death. In one certain respect, we hope that this may be so with our late President Joseph Smith. One of his parting requests was that the money which might be spent for floral tributes to decorate his bier and grave be given instead to the poor and needy. Over two thousand persons took a parting look at his face as his body lay in state in the big stone church, and many of them cast an offering into a jardiner placed near by for that purpose. Quite a neat sum was thus gathered and turned over to the Bishopric in harmony with the noble desire of our departed leader.

We could not all attend the funeral and participate in that remarkable offering, but all have had their opportunity. It was in the Christmas offering by which we could help to magnify the example of our late President. We could have decided to purchase fewer and less expensive presents this year and thus double the offering of last year. If the altruistic spirit of Brother Joseph failed to grip us this year, let us begin now to set a standard for next year.

The beautiful Christmas spirit has in many places degenerated into a competitive exhibition of reciprocal generosity between friends and relatives in which the giver becomes also a receiver.

Where do the poor come in?

Let us not lose sight of the real, original Christmas spirit.

The Master would have us give to those who can not reciprocate, and that without showing neglect to loved ones. These have our love all the year and our constant attention. Christmas is special, and though we would like to shower still more upon our loved ones, we must insist that such is not the Christmas spirit, the genuine original.

Let the watchword of friends and relatives, by common consent, be, others. If my friend and I agree to do this, the poor are doubly blessed and we, too, are blessed in spiritual development. Let friends and relatives get together on this matter. It is necessary to have it mutual, in order that no misgivings or doubts may obtain as to the others' intentions. If we give to those who can not give in return, the statement, "It is more blessed to give than to receive" is fulfilled in us. Thus do we bring our gold, frankincense and myrrh to the Master. If, in mutual admiration, we suffer ourselves to become both givers and receivers, it is not so.

Christmas in this country falls at a time when household expenses are heaviest. Would it not be well to begin earlier and work in a systematic way, in order to avoid the unpleasant experience of giving at the last moment far less than we desired? Some of our schools have done exceedingly well in this way. In some schools each class has a Christmas offering box into which small consecrations are cast from time to time during the year. They think the Christmas spirit is kept alive all the year, which is better than one spasmodic effort the last few days of December. The children are encouraged to deny themselves candy, chewing gum, etc., and thus a continual voluntary development is going on—all for the sake of the Master. And don't forget that he doesn't want it unless it is entirely voluntary.

For the same reason mentioned in the foregoing paragraph, the church treasury runs very low at that time of the year. Think, then, what a great help the Sunday schools of our church can be to the work at that time? And think how much greater help we can be if we will work systematically, and not leave it till the last moment and throw in a coin in a perfunctory manner, or, perhaps, just because we don't want to be left off the list. And we can give the treasury such a good lift and relieve the bishops from worry and borrowing, or overdrawing accounts and paying heavy interest.

Shall we not do it? We can if we will. "Blessed are they that DO."

But avoid competitive exhibitions between classes. The church gets the money, but we fail to get the spiritual development. And do not work this beyond its natural and legitimate bounds. If we succeed in "gathering up the fragments," as Sister Walker used to say, there will be a splendid showing. We must not divert the penny that should go toward buying school supplies. Nor should this offering overshadow, in the child's mind, the principle of tithing.

There may still be a chance to get in an offering for 1914, —in place of a floral tribute to our late Brother Joseph. Give to your local district or branch bishop's agent, or send direct to Bishop Kelley, Independence, Missouri.

Then for something more systematic for the Christmas Offering of 1915.

BIRTH AND BIRTHDAY OFFERINGS

We understand the same sister who started the Christmas offering fund also started the birth offering fund. The purpose was to publish books for our children, which has been done; and the present "Birth Offering Series," composed of eight books, published by the Herald Publishing House, is the result of the success of that fund, which was more widely observed by the mothers of the church formerly than now.

In former years the Herald Publishing House has received from fifteen to twenty dollars a year for the birth offering, but this year it will do well to reach four dollars. Why this difference?

Gradually there was started a few years ago the custom in the local schools of collecting from every member a "birthday offering" of one cent for every year of age. This idea spread so rapidly that it has nearly killed the original "birth offering." This is due, we feel quite sure, to a confusion of the two funds, and mothers have put birth offerings into the local birthday offering, thinking it was all for the same original purpose.

This is a mistake. The two are quite different. And we urge a closer consideration by all. First, by the officers and teachers. Bring the matter up in the proper place and see that a clear understanding is obtained, and then announce it several times from the pulpit and in sessions of the school.

HOW IT HELPS

The Herald Publishing House has been able to put out cheaper books for the children and youth of the church through the help of the birth offering fund. In publishing any book, the setting up of type, the purchase of large quantity of paper and the binding all require the outlay of quite a sum of money before a single book has been sold. For that reason publishers must feel assured that books will sell before printing. And then the first edition is necessarily the most expensive; for, the first cost and interest on the outlay must be realized before a cent of profit can be booked. In million editions and with quick sales assured, the price can be lowered. The larger the edition and the quicker it is sold, the cheaper the book. That is why church and all professional books are higher than popular novels.

If some one could advance the first cost, or a good part of it, any new book could be sold cheaper. And that is just what has been done in the publishing of the "Birth Offering Series," not one of which was published for more than fifty cents, although some of them would have been dollar books, published on the ordinary method.

At the present rate, the next birth offering book will be a long time getting published. This should not be, and we can change it if we have a little talk about the two funds and clear up the misunderstanding. We are surely not ready to drop this time-honored fund, which has given to our church libraries wholesome reading at a price within the reach of all.

The latter birthday offering idea has decidedly the advantage over the birth offering fund, because brought constantly to mind through the weekly reading of such offerings every Sunday, and they are repeated year after year; whereas, the birth offering is made once for all, as a thank offering given about the time of the blessing of the baby. The names of all such can be seen recorded in the first or last pages of the books of the "Birth Offering Series."

In addition to clearing up the misunderstanding existing, we believe it would be well in accord with a good custom if schools would regularly vote a portion of their birthday offering fund to the "Birth Offering Series." The rest of it could be voted to the local or district library board. This is done in some schools. This would encourage the publication of books within the reach of the poor and insure a wider reading.

Both kinds of offerings are worthy, but we do not like to see the later one flourish at the expense of the older, which has done so much good. Will all local and district superintendents please take this matter up and make the necessary distinction?

Convention Program

One of the most arduous duties that falls upon the general officers is the work of drafting a program for General Convention and finding the people who are to take part.

This is always a problem for a superintendent who has had other duties requiring the major part of his time. Not only because the time does not permit of concentrated thought, but also on account of not having been in touch with the workers in the various districts.

One important part of the genius which a superintendent, local, district or general, should have is the happy intuition by which he can put his finger on the persons who are to be successful workers and able to push the good work on.

Even after desirable talent for a General Convention program is "spotted" it is often impossible to know of it long enough beforehand to make up the program, which increases our difficulty.

We have before us an attractive "Welfare program," given by the joint convention of the Kirtland district association, on October 9, 10 and 11, 1914, "at historic Kirtland, held in the old temple built in 1833." This was furnished by our secretary, who asked for their left-overs. We mention this merely to show one of the benefits of the general officers. If we had such program from every district for twelve months we could soon locate desirable people for our general programs and get into correspondence, with a view to finding who would be most likely to be present.

YOU CAN HELP

Will every Sunday school worker who is interested in a good convention next April drop us a line, making such suggestions or requests as occur to mind as necessary? We have a subcommittee which is responsible for the drafting of a program but they are all very busy people and would appreciate your suggestions.

Tell us what features of past conventions appealed to you most. Do you like the department "conferences"? What have you to suggest as something different?

Young People's History Ready

You could not give your boy or girl or the local library a better present than this new history, now ready for mailing. It is not only suitable for our young people from eight years up, but also fine for adults who wish to read a condensed history of the latter-day work. The volume makes four hundred pages, profusely illustrated, and costs but one dollar.

The association welcomes this book, as it has been urgently needed for some time in all our schools. We hope that every body will provide the children with one, and justify the request made by our superintendents in the past. Every home should have one.

From Pacific Ocean Mission

Sister Ida E. Jones, writing from Honolulu, Hawaii, Territory, says: "My husband and I reached Honolulu on October 26. The Sunday following I was elected superintendent of the main school, which has 90 enrolled, with an average attendance of about 75. But I work also in two others every Sabbath.

"The main school meets at 9.45 a. m. At 2.30 p. m. I go to another and at 4 p. m. I teach in and sometimes superintend a school of Chinese and Hawaiians, with 22 enrolled and an average attendance of about 19.

"I am wondering if you could offer me any suggestions as to how I might improve the work here. So far, I have not been able to get the teachers together for teachers' meeting. Several of them are high school students who live out of the city, coming for school in the morning and going home before night. On Sunday they teach in the various schools, so we have very little chance to have a meeting on Sunday. We have five schools on Sunday.

"This work is new to me, among this class of people especially. But I am anxious to do all I can to help in this glorious cause. If you have any suggestions, they will be gladly received."

Sister A. H. Christensen, writing from Papeete, Tahiti, Society Islands, says: "I was pleased at receiving the appointment as field worker for Sunday school and Religio. On arriving here I indeed found a field for labor, and it is in the home, as well as in the school and Religio. The members of both organizations are faithful attendants, and can repeat the entire lessons just as written. There are, however, many little helps and encouragements which can be added, bringing appreciation, and I believe would increase our number. I expect to make trips to the small islands with my husband where I shall do some organizing and other work. We are trying to accomplish the language. I am learning patience as rapidly as dialect. Both are necessary for our work. Have received Quarterlies and Exponent by each mail. We appreciate them. We enjoyed the entire journey, and were very much pleased at the appearance of the islands, as we were prepared to find conditions very much worse. There is a feeling of love for these people which eliminates all difference of race or color. We are sure we shall continue to enjoy our work here, and pray our heavenly Parent for assistance and guidance. May he bless the efforts put forth in each department of the work we so dearly love."

Brother C. Edward Miller, writing from Melbourne, Australia, says: "We organized a district association at the conference held here September 26. There are four schools in the new association, so I think it will move along all right. Some lines of church work need working up here. Nothing has been done in the library commission line. We held our first institute and it was a success. I shall urge the secretary to send items to the general secretary. As assistant superintendent, I shall try to develop the new officers. Will act as a kind of 'blackboard superintendent.' Some of the artist sisters will make carbon copies of drawings I shall get up to be used monthly in the schools, the aim of the drawings being to prove our church a true one. Will urge the superintendents to use them on their blackboards, and invite them to get up original ideas of their own, which I shall circulate also among the schools. Things are moving along fine in this mission, and hope nothing will interfere with the progress we are making. The war and a drought are going to go hard with the finances. A great number of young men are eligible to be missionaries. Think we will have to export some of them to America, as there does not seem to be many offering themselves for the work there."

On Giving Suggestions

We have so many letters from willing and humble officers asking for suggestions, and some ask that we write anything that occurs to mind as likely to be of use to them. These letters come from all points of the compass, some from far-off missions and some from places widely separated in this land.

It is impossible to give just the suggestions needed unless we had been on the ground and know the peculiarities of the situation in each place. We might write dozens of pages to each one and still not say the vital things applying to the work in hand. Please be more definite in your requests.

Nevertheless, these requests suggest to all the need of our general officers being free to give their whole time and visit as many of the districts as possible. A missionary in charge never advises with the same confidence to workers where he has never been, as he does in territory where he has visited and personally taken notes. Advice that would apply to our inland schools would not do for the isolated ones, or for the island mission schools.

The situation also suggests the necessity of sending trained workers to those far-off missions, hard to visit.

Front Line School

The author of that excellent book, The Making of a Teacher, Doctor Martin G. Brumbaugh, was elected governor of Pennsylvania, in the November election, by over one hundred thousand majority. That shows the good judgment of the Pennsylvania voters. That is the State which has the most progressive Sunday school organization in the world, according to International Association standards. We are glad to note that our main school in the city of Philadelphia is on the rolls of the state organization as a first grade school. "Front line school," is their term. And, by the way, the superintendent of the beginner department in this school is the editor of our lessons of the beginner Quarterly.

Mothers' Home Column

EDITED BY SAMUEL A. BURGESS, LAMONI, IOWA

A Daughter's Viewpoint

It will do us good sometimes to see things as others see them. We present the short paper below, written by Miss Nona Poush, of the Oland, Missouri, Branch, as the views of a girl in her teens on the subject given.

A Mother's Interest in the Friends and Pleasures of Her Daughter

We all know that there should exist a close bond between the mother and daughter, that she should know the character and aim of her daughter, because she above all others is interested in her welfare. A mother should have faith in her daughter just as much as a daughter should have faith in her mother. There is an old proverb which says, "The first thing you should pursue after faith is a good friend." The choosing of our friends and pleasures are of the utmost importance, for our happiness is largely dependent on this choice. There are two positions which may be taken concerning the mother and daughter.

One is the mother and daughter of to-day, and the other the mother and daughter of yesterday.

First we shall take the mother and daughter of to-day. A girl's position is rather a difficult one to-day. Our mothers are so worldly-wise, that is, the majority of them, instead of staying at home like the old-fashioned mothers did and seeing to the welfare of their children, go everywhere. They read the new books containing all the problems of the day, they hear all the gossip; then they try to work out all the problems on the girls. They care more for their own pleasures and follies of society, than in the training and society of their own daughters. Yet they bemoan our dallying and the heedless, careless ways of youth, forgetting they did the same thing themselves. They expect much of us, but how are we to attain to their desires if they take no particular interest in us?

That is the way with the world to-day. Children are forced to take care of themselves, all on account of the pride and frivolous society in which the mothers are engaged. No mother is satisfied with herself or with what she has accomplished in life; so she tries to place all her failures on her daughter. She tries to make the path of life smooth for us by warning us against pitfalls, forgetting that her experience teaches little to the next generation. That is a sad mistake of the world to-day, and many a daughter is forced to pick her own friends and pleasures, of which her mother knows nothing about.

The negligence of so many mothers concerning their daughters has ruined many a girl, and for this reason she will have but little faith and companionship with her mother. This is the standing of the mother and daughter of to-day.

Now let us hear from the mother and daughter of yesterday. The center of attraction of the mother and daughter of to-day is society—of yesterday it was the home. The old-fashioned mother cared for pleasures, but she considered the pleasures and enjoyment of her daughter greater, and this is the way she strove to gain her daughter's confidence and friends. She confided and talked to her, urging and impressing upon her mind to avoid undesirable associates. She also accompanied her to place of amusement and her friends' houses in order to get acquainted with the girls that would make desirable company. This companionship drew them nearer together, and gave the girl more respect and consideration for her mother's wishes, but should the daughter find out that her mother's sympathies were less than a friend's, then there would fall much harm, for the mother would lose the confidence and companionship of her daughter.

Thus the mother of to-day must strive to gain her daughter's confidence before the latter can really be what her mother expects her to be.

Prayer Union

SUBJECTS FOR THE SECOND THURSDAY IN JANUARY

That the church at large may strive more earnestly to reach the standard of righteousness required of the people of God. That all may understand that the fullness of time of the Gentiles is drawing near, therefore it behooves us that we be not found among the sleepers, and the careless pleasure seekers.

Lesson, Revelation 3: 11-13, and verses 20-22; memory verse 1 Corinthians 4: 2.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYERS

Sister Ellen Scott, of Blair, Nebraska, writes a pleading request for prayers for her son, who is suffering from what seems to be nervous prostration on account of the wrongdoing and desertion of one who should be a comfort and stay. She fears he will lose his mind entirely if help is not received from a higher source.

Letter Department

A Visit to Old Manti

In the prosecution of my missionary work, I visited Shenandoah, Iowa, where I remained over three Sundays, and, in addition to the regular services, preached several times during each week. This one-time flourishing branch and Sunday school has dwindled to a fragment of what it was in former days. It has met the fate of so many other branches in the Central West. Most of the young have married and gone into the great West, or to intermediate points to make for themselves homes. A few have gathered into the stakes, and many of the older ones have passed on to their reward, while others because of the infirmities of age are less active than in their youth. In addition to these seemingly unavoidable difficulties "Old Nick" has not failed to make a desperate effort to be faithful to his mission.

At one time the Western Normal College was a flourishing institution, and many of our young people received the last of their scholastic education there, finding in the church and Sunday school their religious home. Many of these to-day are "making good" as home builders and occupying positions of trust and responsibility in the church and its auxiliaries. Shenandoah is one of the most beautiful cities in western Iowa. It is highly progressive, has fine schools, five churches, paved streets, electric lights, water plant, three small parks, a fine public library, and no saloons. It is one of the sad misfortunes that has befallen our gospel work that in such an important city, in the midst of a rich farming country, our cause could not have been more permanently established.

In company with Brother J. F. Redfield and his friend Mr. Blessing, we were taken to Manti, about four miles from the city of Shenandoah. This is the place where Alpheus Cutler and his followers made a settlement after the expulsion of the Saints from Nauvoo in 1846. All we found left of the colony was the cemetery, about a mile from where the store, blacksmith shop and post office stood. This is a small tract of land; it can hardly be more than two acres. It is in a pasture and is covered with a growth of light timber. The cattle run at will among the trees. There are only two tombstones standing, some being partially covered with dirt, and some broken. One of those standing bears the following inscription: "Alpheus Cutler, died June 10, 1864, aged 80 years." The following names were noted on stones lying down: Mary J. Pratt; Lois A. Anderson; Squire Eggleston, who died in 1868, Henry A. Way, who died in 1859.

Brother J. F. Redfield was born in this region about 1855, and was present when the body of Alpheus Cutler was buried. From him I learned some of the interesting incidents of that small colony of wandering latter-day Israel.

Alpheus Cutler believed that he was the successor of Joseph Smith as the leader of the church. The small colony with him shared this belief. In September following the death of Elder Cutler, the greater part, if not all, of these people disposed of their land and left Manti, some of them going north and finally settling in Minnesota. Among their descendants are those who are now active in the Reorganization. Brother Redfield's parents with their children returned to Nauvoo where they remained about three years, and then returned to the neighborhood of Shenandoah, where some of them have since remained.

On their trip to Nauvoo, the entire family escaped destruction by a narrow margin. It was war times, and "bushwhackers," and "jayhawkers," were quite common near the northern line of Missouri. On their journey they fell in with a company coming back from California, and from them and other sources learned that they were being followed. Instead of uniting their forces for mutual protection, they separated, and that night the California company was all killed, and their supplies and cattle stolen. Brother Redfield's family was followed to near the Des Moines River, and at one time the bandits were within half an hour's ride of overtaking them.

Those of the colony going to Minnesota made an effort to put into practice their idea of "all things common." At stated intervals they would have a "dividing up." This division was attended to minutely, even to the dividing of bedding. Complaints were soon made by the industrious and frugal that careless and indolent ones were not entitled to share in the products and labors of the industrious. This brought discontent and discord. Instead of growth under what they thought was the divine plan, they suffered disintegration.

The tombstones and wanderings of these few Saints who were seeking a better country, alone are not of great value. But from them the novelist could write a thrilling and pathetic story, and the historian could associate cause with effect, and teach us a lasting lesson, which would likely be that modern Israel, like ancient Israel, if successful, will be so because she has not forgotten the teachings of Moses when he said, Behold I set before you this day a blessing and a curse. A blessing if you obey the commandment of the Lord your God, which I command you this day; and a curse if you will not obey the commandment of the Lord your God.

While we may look with a measure of pity on their crude efforts to seek to bring about a greater degree of equality among themselves, we might ask ourselves, What have we done in eighty-four years to gain the same end, and are we any nearer than at the beginning? Are we nearer than thirty years ago? Are we any nearer than twenty years ago? Those who have and to spare may think this the day hoped and prayed for. But the poor, of whom Jesus never spoke an unkind word, the widow and orphan, the woman at the tub, the old man with dim eye and shaking hand, know that it is only a daydream, and that the only hope of rest to their wearied bodies and troubled minds is when Jesus shall call them home to him. We are not yet near enough to our Jordan to look over into the promised land and see that land "flowing with milk and honey."

November 25, 1914.

EDWARD RANNIE.

SANTA ANA, CALIFORNIA, November 24, 1914.

Editors Herald: Having just read Sister Maggie Macgregor's appeal in the newly arrived HERALD, I am almost stunned by the words of exaltation which she has so lavishly bestowed on the person whose name stands at the heading. While I do feel most grateful for the interest this good sister has taken in the publication of the prospective book, honesty to myself and the public forbids my retaining these jewels of worth with which the sister has adorned me. They are not mine, and with bowed head I hand them back.

I am persuaded that the sister had no thought of flattery. I think that is beneath her. She simply did not know me as I know myself. Her acquaintance has been, as she has said, from what has been written. A large portion of that was when the human was eclipsed by the influence of the divine Spirit, and she has mistaken the person of these exalted moments for the "real me."

But know you not, dear Saints, that God chooses the weak things of this world through which to manifest his power? So the creatures can make no claim to that power being in and of himself. The gift is from God, and the glory belongs to him. I would not belittle the grand and varied testimonies that the Lord in his kindness has made me the recipient of, but they are the gift of God, and I believe as much for the benefit of others as for myself.

One sentence in my blessing is, "One in whom the influence of the Spirit has been made manifest because of God's love to thee, and his love to others extended through thee." And again, "And with thee shall be found resting those things that shall win others to a recognition of the worth of the Lord Jesus Christ and his work."

Beautiful gifts, indeed, and I hope in the day of reckoning they will not be found wrapped in a napkin.

EMMA BURTON.

Chicago

Upon the request of those in charge, I shall endeavor to report the condition of the gospel work in the city of Chicago and suburbs. I hope to confine this effort to the present, and not permit the possibilities of the future to color conditions brighter than they actually exist.

Here, as elsewhere, the work of the gospel is sadly needed in the lives of men and women, but they are slow to learn obedience to "the perfect law of liberty," notwithstanding it would add greatly to their well-being and happiness to do so. The saloon with its kindred institutions, the dance hall, the theater, and other amusements more or less harmful, are shining attractions of Satan, leading the minds of the people away from God. Where the first great commandment, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, is not observed in the daily lives of humanity, the second, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself, will also be ignored. The inevitable result of this condition is selfishness, with its long train of evils.

There are many churches in this city, and they accomplish a great deal of good, but in their divided condition and opposition to each other they are powerless to combat the united forces of evil. What is the remedy? Paul tells us, "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation." I believe the various religions in the world are beneficial to humanity, but that only in the fullness of the gospel is there found the promise of complete salvation. Religion cures many of the ills of mankind, but the gospel is the panacea for every ill that afflicts humanity. Religion may be termed the relationship which man establishes between himself and God, while the gospel represents the relationship which God has established between himself and man. I prefer the latter. There may be and are many conflicting religions of men, but only one gospel of Christ, otherwise referred to in the Bible as "the gospel," "the gospel of the kingdom," and "the everlasting gospel."

Prophecy and history establishes the fact that the angel referred to in Revelation 14:6 has accomplished the work of restoration; that the church of Christ exists to-day organized as anciently; and that the same gifts and blessings accompany the gospel. In this city servants "called of God as was Aaron" have been and are preaching the glad tidings of salvation. When the number of its adherents compared to the population of this great city is considered, the gospel might appear to be almost a failure, but not so when one experiences the joy and peace that come to those who love God and endeavor to keep all his commandments. Gospel history is but repeating itself, in that many are going the broad way, while but few are traveling the straight way through the narrow gate that leadeth to life eternal.

In Chicago and vicinity we have three organized branches, viz, the First Chicago (West Side), at 4416 Gladys Avenue; the Central Chicago (South Side), at Sixty-sixth and Honore Streets; and West Pullman Branch, 648 West One Hundred and Nineteenth Street, West Pullman, Illinois. The first two now occupy church buildings of their own.

The First Chicago Branch has the following officers: James F. Keir, high priest, president; Chris B. Hartshorn, F. E. Bone and J. W. Pettersson, priests; V. A. Reese, Frank Sly and Charles E. Shaw, teachers; Glenn Fairbanks and Elmer Hoover, deacons.

Central Chicago Branch: Henry Keir, presiding elder; W. I. Cochran, William Wainwright and Arthur Sherman, priests; John J. Oliver, James Lang and Frank Hastings, teachers; Clarence Wainwright, deacon.

West Pullman Branch: Robert N. Burwell, presiding elder; Instruments blending together, yield the divinest music,

Elder Edward O. Byrn acting as presiding priest; H. C. Morgan, teacher; and Charles E. Cotton, deacon.

The work in the city is also blessed by the labors of the following elders: Wellington McGahen, Harry Passman and P. G. Fairbanks.

A short time ago a mission was opened among the Dutch people at Roseland, in charge of Brother and Sister Duijzers as reported in a recent number of the HERALD by Sister Duijzers.

A new opening for the gospel is reported at Oak Lawn, near the Ninety-fifth Street station of the Wabash Railroad, where there are four families of Saints. A Sunday school is soon to be organized and the work is to be looked after by Elder Edward Lang and John Harris, priest. They are in hopes of occupying permanently the Methodist church building in which Elder D. E. Dowker preached Sunday afternoon, December 13, to an interested audience, and left a favorable impression.

Midweek cottage meetings are being conducted in different parts of the city. These are valuable means of developing experience in preaching, as well as affording an opportunity of presenting the gospel to many whom we can not persuade to attend our regular church services.

A number of street meetings were held last summer by our city missionary, Elder David E. Dowker. Good attention was given by large crowds to the preaching of the word, and it is hoped many friends were made to the truth.

We are now in the midst of special preaching services at the West Side Branch, conducted by Elder J. W. Wight, assisted by Elder Jasper O. Dutton. A united effort has been made to present Brother Wight with a large audience. To this end printed announcements of the meetings and subjects to be considered were distributed in the neighborhood from house to house with a cordial invitation to attend. A number of outsiders have attended, but by far the majority are friends and neighbors of the Saints who accompany them to the church. This result is not discouraging, but only proves the greater power of living epistles above printed epistles in winning souls to Christ. Similar meetings are contemplated at the other two branches in the near future.

Auxiliary work in the three branches is not being neglected, each having a Sunday school and Religio. The West Side also has a Bible normal class, and an organization of the young called The Gospel Study and Social Club which meets from 5 to 6:30 p. m., Sundays.

The priesthood of the three branches meet once a month, with an attendance of about thirty. Educational and interesting subjects are considered, such as: The duties of the teacher; The duties of the deacon; Soul-sleeping; Parliamentary rules; Civil duties of Latter Day Saints; Order of Enoch; Law of tithing; Marriage and divorce.

The Woman's Auxiliary for Social Service also meets once a month. They report interesting as well as beneficial services.

The necessity of the choir is fully appreciated. Regular practices are held every Friday evening, under the leadership of Brother O. O. Randall on the West Side and Elder D. E. Dowker on the South Side.

A new feature just instituted is the quarterly sacrament meetings of the three branches. It is proposed to hold these meetings 3 to 5 p. m. on the third Sunday of each quarter, so as not to interfere with regular services at the different branches. Branch sacrament meetings are held as usual on the first Sunday of each month. These union sacramental services will produce acquaintance and sociability on the part of the Saints of the city, and join us more nearly together in gospel bonds of love and unity.

District conference will be held at the South Side Branch, January 23 and 24.

On all sides we hear the remark that the work in the city was never in better condition. This is not depreciating the efforts of those who have labored here in the past, but only proves, as they will be glad to hear, that their labors have been bearing fruit. The present spirit of unity and co-operation among the Saints promises well for the future progress of the Master's work.

There has been a noticeable increase in the attendance at the services. A year ago West Pullman had an average attendance of fifteen or twenty at their preaching services, while they now report forty and over. A year and a half ago the South Side midweek prayer meetings were attended by a dozen or less, but now by forty or more. Many of the Saints have great distances to come, but are regular attendants. Another feature worthy of mention is the activity of the priests in visiting work.

The Saints have been encouraged and strengthened of late through the gift of prophecy. The Master is pleading with his people to occupy higher ground. The promise is that if the Saints are humble and faithful many in the city will yet be brought to the knowledge and blessing of the truth.

Northeastern Nebraska

On Friday evening last, while at the home of Brother J. M. Sumner in Rosalie, en route to this place, I saw in the public press the account of the death of the Grand Old Man of the Reorganization, the sage of West Short Street. And while I have no confirmation so far in any way of the report either by our own papers or by private communication, I feel fully persuaded that the facts stated have come to pass.

About the time of my visit home in early October last I received a friendly, sociable letter from Brother Joseph, in which he cordially invited a personal visit. So one day I went over and had what has proved to be our last and final interview and discourse together. I wondered at that time whether I would get to see him again. His mind was marvelously strong. But one could hardly observe its operation in that failing body, that declining tenement, without wondering how soon it would release itself from such an uncommodious and unsuited habitation.

Joseph always seemed from my viewpoint somewhat distant and cold-blooded, but I have the same identical charge to make about Jesus Christ, to which conclusion we can not very well read the New Testament with our eyes open without being conducted, whether we have had anyone to accentuate it in our presence or not, which the celebrated Archdeacon Paley points out so strikingly in his Evidences of Christianity. Jesus never fawned on any man, and when they were wont to adulate and to cuddle or fawn on him he was stout to declare his independence.

Following, or some time after my last correspondence to our church press the writer paid a visit to Wisner, Nebraska, which I believe was in latter August. I found three scattered members there. I preached from my car on the street, baptized a practical and practicing school-teacher, Miss Edith DeFrates, and her graduating sister, and had an all-around good time, and left seeds of truth in the hearts of several—many.

Friday afternoon, by invitation, I attended a Congregational Sunday school picnic, where I was introduced to their pastor. The gentleman thought I was a "Mormon," not knowing until he entertained my explanations that there was any difference. He invited me to speak for him Sunday evening in their church. I consented. Saturday evening he attended my street discourse, a portion of which was in explanation of some elementary matters connected with the Nephite record. Announcing my sermon for the following evening in the Congregational chapel, I stated that I appreciated the fact that there was one of the pastors of the town sufficiently liberal both to permit me to occupy his pulpit and to come and listen to what he did not believe. Next day while entertaining me at his house, or elsewhere during the day he said, "You said last night that I do not believe the Book of Mormon. You were too fast. You don't know whether I believe it or not. I had a pastorate at Susquehanna, Pennsylvania, but three miles from where the Book of Mormon was translated, and I have visited the house in which the translation was conducted; and I want to say to you that having read the book itself I am prepared to pronounce it as in my estimation the greatest account I ever ran across of the peopling of ancient America." When I had filled my engagement in his church to his congregation and to others who came there especially for that evening, he shook my hand very cordially as I departed from the door, saying, "If ever you come back here this pulpit is open to you."

Taking my departure from this place I hastened toward Pisgah, Iowa, through rain and all kinds of mud, with my Ford, to take in the latter part of the reunion, taking with me from Decatur, Brother Lloyd Marteeney, the honest grist-mill man who ships the real whole-wheat flour to the Saints abroad. I shall not soon forget our experiences together, our getting stuck in the mudhole, our lunching on the way, our being flooded and almost blown out of the camp grounds that fateful and wild night in the park of Pisgah.

Soon after the reunion I motored out to the west end of the State, in fact across the boundary into Wyoming, within about sixty miles of Cheyenne, and back directly to Omaha, and on home to our own Kansas City and Independence. My long trip was interesting and eventful. Was entirely alone, made as much as two hundred and twenty-four miles per day, calling momentarily on our people by the way at Schuyler, Columbus, Shelton, North Platte, Roscoe, Bridgeport and Gering.

After a stay home sufficiently extended to put things in adjustment for the season, the winter, or until spring, I have motored back to my field, via Saint Joseph, Shenandoah and Omaha, landing at Decatur, Nebraska, where I smashed my poor finger the same evening, and remained till I had baptized two estimable ladies. Was there about three weeks. The ones baptized were Miss Grace Aldredge, of Leon, Iowa, who was there visiting, who has done some school-teaching and is a jolly and cheerful girl, and a Mrs. Wildman, a resident of the town.

On the first Sunday in December we had sacrament in Decatur. There were present several members and nonmembers of the Lamanites, who came from Macey and Walt Hill region on the reservation some twelve to twenty miles away. Those who were members were baptized by Brother Man while he officiated as a missionary among them, some one, two or three years ago. A prophecy was delivered in the meeting in which the Lord said he had brought these brethren of the Lamanites here for a righteous purpose, that his work might go forth among them. We had a grand time, the Indian Saints taking part in the exercise, bearing testimony with the rest. They are of the Omaha tribe. Many of them are in good circumstances. The land allotments of the Government to Indian girls has made them in many cases an exceeding object of desire to young white men, which accounts for the numerous interracial marriages—not only of Indian women to white men, but Indian men to white women as well.

And I want to say that I am where I am now as a result of Lamanite interest in the beautiful story as told to and by their forefathers, A Brother Bugbee, of Holden or Knobnoster, was working here recently, and ascertaining the desires of some Indians here he wrote to F. M. Smith, and via Bugbee-Smith-Gillen-Shakespeare I learned of conditions, and have little more than arrived, and am now on the "reservation" preaching nightly. I see in distant horizon a little speck that may become a great cloud. Best way is to not anticipate nor be unduly sanguine and let what comes be borne on the wings of faithfulness, let it develop and mature. The memory of Brother Man is much revered by the Indians.

Yesterday I had a pleasant visit and dined in an Indian home, where I also inspected some of their beaded and feathered clothing, most exquisitely wrought by the dark hands of some of the tribesmen.

I am thankful to God that there is not that nature in me that makes any race distasteful or unlovable. Shall test my adaptation to Indian likes and Indian proselyting, anyway. Should glory to lead some of the young men and pretty Red Wings of Laman into the waters of baptism.

Yours for all the human race,

PENDER, NEBRASKA.

ALVIN KNISLEY.

News from Branches

Los Angeles, California

The annual business meeting passed off nicely and with good nature. Election resulted in the choice of V. M. Goodrich, president.

The Los Angeles church has just been given a new coat of paint and a new roof, made possible largely by the efforts of the sisters.

A benefit was given recently under the auspices of the Woman's Auxiliary, and the balance of the expense of moving the pastor here from Saint Joseph was reduced by thirty-five dollars.

Although the people were pretty well prepared for the news of the passing of Brother Joseph, still it evidenced the fact that that was an event for which preparation does not altogether prepare. Brother F. M. Sheehy had been announced for a special service at the Los Angeles church on Sunday morning, but on receipt of the word arrangements were changed, and he delivered a memorial sermon instead. Brother W. A. McDowell delivered a special memorial address at Santa Ana, at 2.30 p. m., which was attended by the Saints from Garden Grove, and Brother V. M. Goodrich favored the Long Beach Saints in the same manner at the morning service, Brother Sheehy occupying at Santa Ana at night and Brother McDowell at Los Angeles.

Brother Sheehy returned north to-day in order to spend Christmas at home, the first time for several years. A number were disappointed at not seeing Sister Sheehy this time, but accept the promise not to be disappointed the next trip.

The extra issue of the Ensign was a very welcome messenger of the particulars of the last hours of President Joseph Smith, and was very much appreciated by the people in general.

Brother Goodrich has been quite bravely pursuing the even tenor of his way, in spite of physical ailments—neuritis, in addition to his usual trouble from indigestion.

Brother McDowell occupies with the Cucamonga Branch next Sunday.

An Expression of Thanks

Dear Brothers and Sisters: I feel I owe an acknowledgment of thanks for the messages and kindnesses of the Saints shown to us as a family during the late sickness and death of Brother Joseph. It seems like a great nightmare. The happenings of the past month and the realization of the termination of it all are making themselves most vividly felt in our household.

The empty chair is a constant reminder of his absence,—the music of his cane as it sounded on floor and furniture is for ever still. But when I think and meditate upon the fact that two members of the family heard a band of angels singing over the house the night he was taken sick, in glad anticipation of his coming, the loss is easier to bear. When we feel sure he is with God and Christ, all pain and sickness removed, no darkness, our only concern is to make ourselves worthy to be with him over there. If we may be with him we surely will be with Christ.

I desire in behalf of all the members of the family to thank all who have sent messages of condolence, and who in any way helped "bear each other's burden."

Very gratefully your sister,

MRS. JOSEPH SMITH.

Book Reviews

HANS ANDERSEN'S FAIRY TALES.—Hans Andersen. Harper and Brothers, Franklin Square, New York. $1.50. Over one hundred illustrations and decorations give new interest to the familiar stories of "the ugly duckling," "the snow queen," "the fir tree," "the ice maiden," "the little match girl," "the tin soldier," "the emperor's clothes," and the other tales of this Danish writer. William Dean Howells writes an introduction to the tales in which he says: "I suppose there never were stories with so little harm in them, so much good. Each of them has a moral, but so neatly tucked away that it does not stick out at the end as morals usually do, particularly in stories meant for children, but is mostly imparted with the sort of gay wisdom which a friendly grown-up uses with the children when they do not know whether he is funning or not. The great beauty of them is the homely tenderness which they are full of, the kind of hospitality which welcomes all sorts and conditions of children to the same intimacy. They are of a simplicity always so refined that there is no touch of coarseness in them; with their perfect naturalness they are of a delicate artistry which will take the young children unaware of its perfection, and will only steal into their consciousness perhaps when they are very old children. Some may never live to feel the art, but they will feel the naturalness at once."

JEWISH LIFE IN MODERN TIMES.—Israel Cohen. Dodd Mead and Company, New York. Illustrated 8vo. $3. This volume contains a full and graphic description of the social conditions of Jewish life, with particular reference to communal organization, family customs, and the distinctive features of home life, whilst the moral status and philanthropic activity, as well as the racial physical conditions of modern Jewry, are also dealt with. It will be of especial interest to HERALD readers, as the following from the introduction would indicate: "The purpose of this volume is, therefore, in the first place, to depict the variegated life of the Jewish people at the present day in all its intimacy and intensity, and, secondly, to trace the evolution that is being produced by modern forces, or, in other words, to describe the static conditions of Jewry and then to analyze the effects of the dynamic forces to which they are exposed. The widest possible purview has been taken: the whole crowded map of Jewish life has been unfolded, surveyed, and described, with the help of such elucidations from history as are necessary to understand the present situation. First, a General survey is presented, showing the dispersion and distribution of Jewry in its countless manifestations, its diversity of composition in political and spiritual respects, and the solidarity that unifies its disparate elements. Then follow five main sections, in each of which a leading aspect of life is investigated—the social, the political, the economic, the intellectual, and the religious. Under the Social Aspect are set forth the growth and constitution of the community, the characteristics and customs of the home, social life and amenities, morality and philanthropy, and racial and physical conditions. Under the Political Aspect are related how one half of the people acquired civil equality, how the other half is still suffering in bondage, and what services Israel has rendered to so many countries both in their government and their defense. Under the Economic Aspect are reviewed the different spheres of commercial, industrial, and professional activity in which Jews are engaged, the contrasts of material welfare and predominance of poverty, and the ceaseless currents of migration from the lands of bondage to the havens of refuge. Under the Intellectual Aspect are considered the advance made by secular education among the Jews, the nature of their national intellectual products in modern times, and the contributions they have rendered to the progress and culture of humanity. Under the Religious Aspect are described their ecclesiastical organization and administration, their traditional faith and observance and the growing divergences therefrom, and then the drift and apostasy that are assuming ever more alarming proportions. Finally, the resultant tendency of all the foregoing manifestations is examined under the National Aspect, the strength of the forces of assimilation and absorption is contrasted with the inherent force of conservation, and the realization of the Zionist ideal is urged as the most effective means of insuring the perpetuation of Israel."

A NEW CONSCIENCE AND AN ANCIENT EVIL.—Jane Addams. Macmillan Company, New York. 50 cents net. In this volume the author, eminently qualified by her work and observations, clearly and with dignity discusses the commercialized traffic in women in the light of the present tendency to suppress the same. Agencies and conditions contributory to this traffic, including the professional procurer, economic pressure, social disorders, conditions under which girls work, desire for pleasure, etc., are presented, as are investigations and prosecutions in specific cases. Aroused public sentiment in favor of legislation, prohibitive and protective, education in sex hygiene and eugenics, philanthropic activities, and the crusade against diseases, of which vice districts are centers, and alcoholism, "the indispensable vehicle of the business transacted by the white slaver," all suggest to the author the final abolition of the social evil. Those wishing a concise, clear, and clean discussion along these lines will find this such a book.

CHANGE OF POLICY

Owing to the large increase in the work in the subscription department of the Herald Publishing House it has become necessary to make a change in policy.

Heretofore we have continued the subscription of our publications for one year after the date when the subscription expired, but hereafter the subscription to all publications will be discontinued when they expire.

The change is made for the good of the church of which you are a member and we feel satisfied that all will make the necessary effort and cheerfully comply with the new rule. A little effort on the part of each one will produce splendid results to the body—the church of Christ.

We solicit your cooperation and support.

THE REVIVAL

BY EARNEST A. WEBBE

Ten little mourners at the bench repine,
One goes out to fetch a friend—
Then there are only nine.

Nine zealous converts stay to church so late,
One lost his job (he couldn't get up)—
Then there are only eight.

Eight little proselytes can not agree on heaven,
One gets mad and quits right there—
Then there are only seven.

Seven little churchgoers discover naughty tricks,
One is chided for his ways—
Then there are only six.

Six studious little folks with faith and doctrines strive,
One gets tired and drifts away—
Then there are only five.

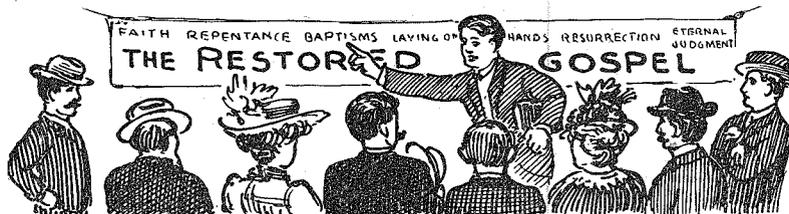

Five left, but one returns where she went before,
Committee calls and talks it out—
Then there are only four.

Four struggling souls remain, rejoicing that they're free,
One feels "called to start a church"—
Then there are only three.

Three still determined to fight the battle through,
One ate too much at an oyster spree—
The mourners now are two.

Two survivors only, discussing faith or fun,
One declares for the garish way,
Then there is only one.

One clinging to his faith with all his might and main,
Hears the gospel as restored—
Then seeks the nine again.

THE TWENTY-THIRD PSALM—THE SHEPHERD'S SONG

The twenty-third psalm is recognized as one of the masterpieces of literature. Its beauty has won the admiration of the irreligious. Those of a religious inclination have loved it because it expresses in the finest possible manner sentiments that they have felt but could not express.

The twenty-third psalm is a triumph. For three thousand years it has stood as a witness that simplicity is the best expression of greatness. How simple its imagery,—a stream of water, green fields, a shepherd, a flock of sheep. How simple the words, as translated, mostly one and two syllable words. Common words. Yes, common words. Who can dispense with the common things? As one old violinist expressed it in his homely way, "You may buy a fifty dollar violin; but you can't make music without the aid of a five-cent lump of rosin."

The twenty-third psalm is a triumph. Almost anyone can take an unimportant thought and clothe it in big words so that no one can understand it. That is easy. To take a thought that is profound, fundamental, and explain it so simply that all may understand, is a triumph. The twenty-third psalm contains elemental thoughts. It deals with life, death, love, enmity, and above all with faith, in an arrangement of something like one hundred and seventeen words that anyone can understand and no one can excel.

The man or woman who imitates this psalm in his life and makes that life a simple and humble interpretation of great truths will be the true and successful messenger of the covenant. Simplicity of dress, simplicity of conversation and deportment, are all consistent with true greatness, in fact are inseparable from true greatness.

The twenty-third psalm breathes sincerity. David meant what he wrote. Otherwise he could not have written the twenty-third psalm. He might have written a pretentious poem, ornate with sounding phrases, but a minor poem. To be sincere and simple is to be godlike. David felt what he wrote as plainly as one feels hunger, cold, love, repose; and so his psalm goes home to the hearts of men and women.

"The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want." The man who can say that and say it truthfully is indeed fortunate. In this age of uncertainty and doubt, when many conflicting claims are urged in the name of religion, and when thousands have abandoned religion and have written as the chief article in their confession the negative proposition, "I do not know," it is a wonderful thing to be able to say, "The Lord is my shepherd." It may be easy to say, as a mere matter of articulation, but let us not deceive ourselves; to say it truly one must not only acknowledge the leadership of Christ but indeed be really following him.

A great many people acknowledge Christ in a way. Spiritualism and every other ism tries to hide behind him. "Yes," they say, "Christ was a spiritualist. Christ was the greatest medium that ever lived." And so the argument is, "Christ was like me," which is vastly different from saying, "I am trying to be like Christ."

To be able to say, "The Lord is my shepherd," argues not only a certain amount of obedient righteousness but also a certain communication with God. Yes, we can base our argument for continued revelation even on the opening line of the twenty-third psalm, the classic that has cheered multitudes of orthodox Christians. There is only one way for any man to know that Christ is his personal shepherd. He can not know that fact by reading it in the Bible, because it is not stated anywhere in the Bible. He can not know it by reading that Christ was the shepherd of David or of Paul. He can only know it when like David and Paul he establishes personal communication with the great Shepherd.

He calleth his own sheep by name, and leadeth them out. And when he putteth forth his own sheep, he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him: for they know his voice. And a stranger they will not follow.—John 10: 3, 5.

To argue that this is not an age of revelation and that communication between God and man has ceased, is folly. If we have no communication with our heavenly Leader, then we are indeed left with earthly leaders who are no better than we,—blind leaders of a blind people. Yet, strangely enough, such a proposition has been urged ever since the day when Joseph Smith first announced that he had seen a vision. It is merely an argument of convenience,

As a shepherd lad David had often led his sheep along the dusty highway and over barren plains, hot sand under foot, hot sun overhead, hot wind on the cheek, until at last they came down into the feeding places, cool green fields beside the still waters.

When he became the sweet singer of Israel, he remembered that scene. He made it a part of his great psalm. He recognized that even as he had been a shepherd and had led his sheep, so Christ was a shepherd and was leading him.

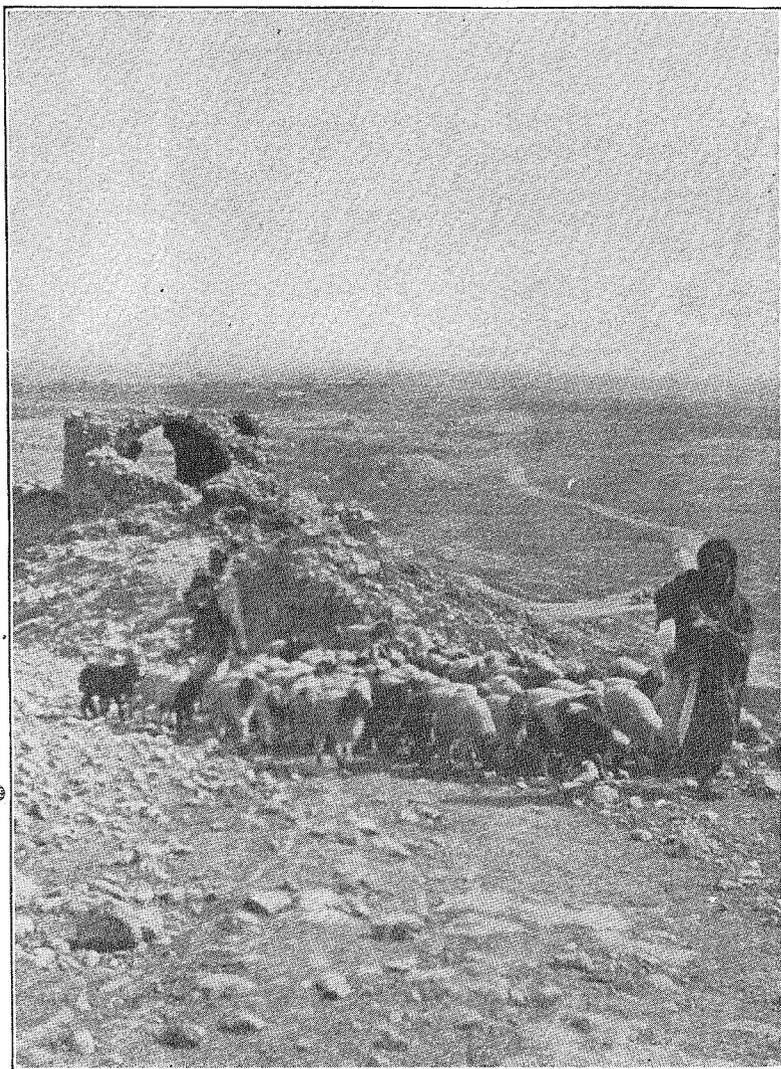

The individual who has journeyed even a short distance in this old world begins to appreciate what it means to bear the "heat and burden of the day." Sorrow, sickness, poverty, loss of loved ones, the unfaithfulness of friends, one or all of these will find him out, whatever his station, and will compel him to seek consolation somewhere. Happy is the man who finds his way to the green pastures and the still waters of God's love.

"He restoreth my soul." The Book of Doctrine and Covenants tells us, "The spirit and the body is the soul of man. And the resurrection from the dead is the redemption of the soul; and the redemption of the soul is through him who quickeneth all things." In the light of this definition of the human soul, a true one we believe, we see that the restoration of the soul means the conquering of death and sin and the reuniting of body and spirit in a condition of purity and perfection.

"He leadeth me in paths of righteousness for his name's sake." The Saints of God are bought with a price. They are no longer free to do whatever extravagant fancy may urge. Their actions reflect credit or discredit upon their Master and upon the cause for which he died. It is their duty to walk in paths of righteousness "for his name's sake." They can not go with the world and do as the world does.

To be correct in doctrines and dogmas is not enough. They must cleave to that which is good and eschew that which is evil, "for his name's sake," if for no other reason. When we reach the point where we will stop to consider the inevitable results of certain lines of conduct as affecting the work in general, the church will begin to arise and shine. When the world sends us a gilded invitation to attend its continuous vaudeville, let us write across the face of that invitation the third verse of the twenty-third psalm.

"Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art urged because no other comes to hand; and we can afford to ignore it because the men who urge it most strenuously themselves deny it at every popular revival.

"He maketh me lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters." This might not mean so much in a land where all fields are green and where water is so common that though indispensable to human life it is described as "having no economic value." But in the land where David dwelt were many sandy wastes, streams and lakes were infrequent, and the words water and green fields conveyed more than mere poetic pleasure.

with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." It is easy to see where David got that figure of speech,—“The valley of the shadow of death.” As one approaches the mountains he crosses sun-kissed plains, but when he enters the canyon, where granite walls loom up on either side, he enters the chill and shadow of another world. Yet if he persists on up the valley he at last comes out upon the heights where the sun is still shining, shining with a beauty not before realized. Wonderful the panorama that is then unfolded to his vision!

The valley of the shadow of death lies before us all. The chill and gloom that is there felt by the bravest explorer has given death his title, “the king of terrors.” Yet David said that he would fear no evil. Why? Because the Lord would be with him; and because he knew that beyond the valley of the shadow the sun was still shining.

“Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.” Sometimes an obscure expression is understood when we know the customs surrounding the author during his youth. Elder Paul Hanson gave an explanation of this phrase gleaned from his travels in the Holy Land. He was told that it was the custom of the shepherds on dark and stormy nights to precede their flocks, and as they go to rap with their staffs upon the rocks and bowlders; the sheep hear and are comforted as they follow the unseen shepherd home to the fold.

“Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over.” It seems strange that a follower of Christ should have enemies. Yet such is frequently the case, if not the rule. The lion's den, the fiery furnace, dungeons, the scourge, the cross,—with these arguments an offended world has reasoned with men whose pious lives have been a rebuke more scathing than any denunciation. The day of such persecution is not past. Husbands who are otherwise kind still make life a burden for wives whose only offense is that they wish to live the life of a consistent church member. Young men and women are still disinherited by parents and disowned by associates because in the day of choosing they have chosen the right and because that right came under the banner of the restored gospel. When the young man through whom that gospel was restored went out in the woods to pray on that spring morning, the only thing in the world that he wanted to know was what he ought to do. God told him what to do and he did it. For that he was hated. The thread of hatred that runs through history shows red at Carthage, Illinois, as plainly as it did in Jerusalem or in Ephesus. Yet, paralleling it, runs the white thread of God's love. “Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies.” Have not the individual Saints tested that promise, at Kirtland, in Missouri, at Nauvoo, and found it true? Immortal psalm! Unfailing promises!

“Thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over.” This is an expression of the unstinted bounty of God. We serve a generous God. Christ, our elder brother, is an advocate of the idea of giving good measure, pressed down and running over.

“Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life: and I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever.” How proud men are to build and beautify a house here on earth! The poor man saves and economizes and never quite gives up the idea of owning a little home of his own. He dies in a rented house, and some one has cheated him out of his birthright. The rich man schemes and speculates, beats close to the lee shore of the law, grinds the face of the poor, that he may build a mansion. All that money and power can command and art and skill supply goes into a marble pile of faultless design and appointment. But while the mills of finance are grinding out the dollars and the masons are building them into walls and the sculptors chiseling them into statuary and the landscape gardener transmuting them into lawns and parks, the sun rises and sets, time moves regularly on, and about the time the grand ensemble is nicely arranged, the proud owner is filed away in the family vault, where the quarters are close and the atmosphere depressing, yet where none complain.

Why give so much attention to our temporary home? Why give so little attention to our eternal home? If all would plan to be associates in the house of the Lord in the life to come, we might be able to strike a balance between the palace and the tenement here in this life. So far as the future is concerned, we are assured that in our Father's house there are many mansions.

The twenty-third psalm deals with affairs in this life, with affairs in the world to come; and with the much dreaded passage from the one to the other. It is essentially a message of comfort, and its keynote is trust. It defends its own claim to immortality. The Jews carried it with them into Babylon. The ten tribes took it with them into their captivity. Probably Lehi brought it with him to the promised land. Our Lord heard it repeated when he was a lad. Now it comes to us, after long centuries, “borne on the wings of a hundred translations,” venerable with age, yet clothed in immortal youth.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

MINISTERIAL ANECDOTES RETOLD

This story, related by one of the ministry, indicates that had woman the right to preach, new and undreamed of perils would threaten the land: An old Welch sister in Lucas, Iowa, was upbraiding the elders for their negligence. Said she, "If I was a mon, and had the authority I'd open me mouth all over this country."

A critic sometimes meets with unexpected reverses in his efforts to reform the world. Elder Joseph Burton used to tell how he at one time remonstrated with his brother "Eb" because of his bad orthography. "Why do you do everything in the hardest way?" asked Brother Burton. When you write to anyone you put a lot of extra letters into most every word when they don't belong there at all."

"Is that all?" said his brother Eb.

"Is that all? Isn't that enough?"

"No. What's the use of making such a fuss about a few letters when you've got plenty of them."

Some years ago the Improvement Era, the organ of the young men's society of the Utah church, had a ministerial anecdote department. One of their anecdotes we fancy would appeal quite as much to members of the Reorganization. In fact we think we can join in the laugh with better grace than can some of the Utah people. The story is as follows: "An energetic young elder, who is still alive, and will probably read this, was, years ago, doing missionary work in Ireland. On this particular occasion, he was preaching to a good-sized audience on the first principles of the gospel. As is the general custom of the elders in the mission field, he was endeavoring to show his audience that no two of the contending sects of Christendom can be the true church, and he had quoted several verses from the Bible in support of this statement. One passage—the last to be given on the topic—was especially pointed; so he repeated it with an energy and emphasis that anyone who has heard him give this favorite verse can easily understand. It was from Paul: 'One Lord, one faith, one baptism'—'And one wife, be jaburs,' blurted out one of the listeners."

As illustrating how difficult it is in the pulpit to correct a mistake once made, it is said that Elder Mark H. Forscutt, early in his ministerial career, was preaching in Sandwich, Illinois. In speaking of a certain case of connubial infelicity, he attempted to say that the husband and wife constantly fought and quarreled; but Brother Mark's mind probably ran on ahead of his speech, so he became slightly confused and said, "They constantly farled and quat." Realizing instantly that his ready tongue for once had played him false, he hastened to correct the mistake by declaring, "I beg your pardon, they quat and farled." There he left it, amid the smiles of his auditors, rather than risk another attempt.

Brother W. W. Blair was fond of repeating an anecdote apropos of mixed metaphors. A certain public speaker, having his suspicions aroused touching the intentions of another party, stated the fact in the following terms: "I smell a rat! I see him floating in the air! Let us nip him in the bud!"

"In a certain town it had become a fad among the clergy to preach doctrinal sermons. They treated total depravity, baptism, redemption, predestination, election, justification, reprobation, hell and damnation, and all other 'nations,' 'ies,' and 'isms,' but the knock-down discourses were on predestination, for the church representatives of the Presbyterian cult were the most numerous. The thing was catching, and the negroes insisted that their colored brother should also take a whack at predestination. He scratched his head, and hemmed and hawed, and didn't like to tackle the job, but finally consented, and there was great interest and curiosity in his congregation that morning. He got up at last, cleared his throat, repeated the word predestination several times, and said it was a mighty big word, but 'brethren, dis is a very simple subject after all,' and he added, 'it am like dis: Way back in 'ternity, the Lord predestinated you, ebery one of ye, to be saved, and live wid him in heaven. But de Debbil, what goes rompin' and roarin' round, he predestinated you, ebery one, to go to hell wid him. It was nip and tuck. Dat made a tie, and each one of you has de castin' vote.' And he sat down. He had made the hit of the season."

CURRENT EVENTS

SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

MASSACHUSETTS RECALL.—The first recall election in New England was held at Salem, December 29, when Mayor John E. Hurley was recalled, and Matthias J. O'Keefe, candidate of the Better Government League, elected.

ILLINOIS COMPENSATION.—The Illinois workingmen's compensation act was held unconstitutional on December 30 by Judge Crow, of the State Circuit Court, on the grounds that the legislative records fail to show that the bill was printed in the Journal before final passage.

REJECT NOMINATION.—For the third time, the United States Senate has rejected the nomination by President Wilson of Ewing C. Bland for marshal of the western division of Missouri. Bland was appointed during the fall recess, the vacancy having occurred before the adjournment of Congress, and the Senate questions the authority of the President to make recess appointments when vacancies have occurred during a session of the Senate.

CREDIT FOR BIBLE STUDY.—The public schools of Des Moines have arranged to allow credit to high school pupils pursuing a prescribed course of study outside of the regular curriculum, including Bible study.

WILSON AND SUFFRAGE.—Addressing a delegation of women, President Wilson on the 6th, declined to support the woman's suffrage bill now before the House, stating that in his opinion suffrage is a State and not a National issue.

IMMIGRATION BILL.—The House by vote of 252 to 75, has rejected the Senate amendment to the immigration bill, which would exclude all of African blood. The Senate amendment to exempt Belgian agricultural emigrants from the literacy test was denied by the House without a division. The bill on the 7th went to a conference committee of House and Senate.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—General Hill is said to have signed an agreement to neutralize a strip along the United States-Mexican border. General Maytorena declines to sign, stating that he has not authority so to do. General Maytorena has been ordered by the Guiterrez government to make no further attacks. General Scott and Villa are expected to confer regarding border troubles. Carranza forces under General Obregon report the taking of Puebla and the capture of General Angeles, which has been denied by opposing authority. General Jesus Carranza, brother of Carranza the Constitutionalist leader, is held by Convention forces and threatened with death unless his brother makes certain concessions.

EUROPEAN WAR.—In the East the Germans cling to their plan to take Warsaw, but have been unable to advance beyond the Bzura River, behind which the Russians are entrenched, their only important gain for the week being the taking of Borjimow. The Russians have checked the Austrian advances in Galicia, and are again pushing their way through the Carpathians and advancing upon Cracow. Aside from this, there is little alteration in the eastern battle line, extending from the Baltic to the Carpathians. Russia claims to have crushed the Turkish advances in the Caucasian territory. Both sides claim slight gains in the West, with the advantage in favor of the allies. The French have taken Steinbach, a coveted point in upper Alsace. It should be remembered that the gains reported in the West are generally slight. Except on the two wings, the fighting here is mainly by artillery. British battleships have captured Dar-Es-Salaam, capital of German East Africa. Dardanelles fortresses are reported to be bombarding the blocking Anglo-French fleets. The insurrection in Albania is reported more formidable. The Italians, who occupy Avlona, have sent a battleship to Durazzo, the Albanian capital, to protect their interests there. Word from Rome is that the war sentiment is gaining in Italy. It is said that one million men will be under arms within the present month, and that another million are being formed into reserves. All regiments have been provided with new and powerful guns. French and British newspaper men are reported en route to Roumania. Developments indicate that this country may soon enter the war. The holy war has not materialized. A German army officer and three reservists were on the 3d, under the direction of the United States Department of Justice, removed from a steamer outward bound from New York, on the charge of conspiracy to defraud the United State Government through the use of forged American passports, by means of which they hoped to pass French and British authorities in returning to Germany.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

NEW DEPARTMENTS.—In the last issue of the HERALD appeared for the first time the Sunday School Department. The Sunday school people will occupy this department the first issue of each month until their General Convention, and maybe longer. This issue contains the first appearance of the Children's Home Department. The church home for children is a necessary and a worthy institution, deserving of such aid as may be given it. The important work of our General Sunday School Association has been generally known for many years. We welcome both these departments and their workers, and commend them to the Saints.

"AUTUMN LEAVES" FOR JANUARY.—A very interesting feature of the January number of Autumn Leaves is the article by President Frederick M. Smith, entitled, "Lights and shadows of southern California." This article was prepared during the sojourn of President Smith in the land of sunshine. It is splendidly illustrated with numerous pictures taken by the author, showing characteristic sea, cloud, and mountain scenes in Southern California. Another feature of this number is the article by Elder E. D. Moore, secretary of the General Sunday School Association. Elder Moore appears in this number as the "guest of the editor" and occupies in the editorial department on the subject, "Lost motion." In the same number appears a very interesting article by Sister Alberta Lake, on the subject of social problems. The leading editorial is entitled, "The testimony of the clock."

AMONG OUR POETS

The Little Old Clock on the Kitchen Shelf

BY DAVID W. WIGHT

Oh, the little old clock on the kitchen shelf
 Is ticking away
 The minutes and hours
 Through night and day
 With failing powers,
 That have steadily toiled while years have fled,
 And hopes that were living are long since dead.

And the little clock on the kitchen shelf,
 With its face and hands
 So old and brown,
 Demurely stands
 And gazes down
 On the shifting scenes as they come and go,
 While the dial of time swings to and fro.

And the steady tick, tick, of the little old clock,
 In the evening hour
 'Twixt night and day,
 When the shadows lower
 In somber gray,
 Brings hallowed thoughts of bygone hours
 When life was a season of song and flowers.

And I sit and think, in the twilight dim,
 Of childhood years,
 When life was fair,
 When bitter tears
 And anxious care
 Were strange to the childlike glad and free,
 Unmindful of years that were yet to be.

And my mind goes back to the days that are past,
 To loved ones dear
 That are dead and gone,
 Struggle on
 'Mid the vain regrets and useless sighs
 For the bitter pain of those sad good-bys.

So changed is life, so changed; yet still,
 May not its hours,
 So intertwined
 With thorns and flowers,
 Some virtue find

In each experience sad or sweet
 That yet shall make our lives complete?

Oh, brother of mine, and sisters dear,
 As far apart
 In life we move,
 Let not the heart
 Forget to love
 And sacred hold each earthly tie
 And the memory dear of days gone by.

For, as musing I sit in the twilight hour,
 Methinks I see,
 So fair and bright,
 A life to be
 In the clearer light
 Of the better land where no pain shall come,
 And loved ones united may rest at home.

But the little old clock ticks steadily on,
 With its face and hands
 Grown old and brown,
 And quietly stands
 And gazes down
 On the shifting scenes of the passing years,
 So strangely checkered by smiles and tears.

The Years

BY ADAM J. KECK

As if an artist sat a while
 And on his canvas wrought, and then,
 Passed from his place to come no more,
 And others, one by one, in turn,
 Wrought each upon the scene a change,
 So work the years that come and go,
 Progressive change upon our life.
 So still they come, so still they go,
 Their passing scarce we note, but they Take careful note of us and ours,
 And by their feather touch the face
 Of all that is is changed.

The face

Of childhood faith to youth is turned,
 And then, anon, the man appears,
 And still their gentle brush they ply
 Till gray and wrinkled age appears.
 Nor cease they then; their wondrous art
 Paints death upon the face of life,
 The somber-tinted picture turns
 To casket, then to moss-grown grave.

The wilderness where roam the wild,
 Untamed, and tameless beasts, it shows
 Where nature undisputed reigns,
 And life for sake of life abounds.
 New lights and shades invade the scene,
 And beasts are driven, Nature tamed,
 And rude, half-cultured man is there;
 Then cities rise, a nation grows,
 And works of science, skill, and art
 Adorn the face of human life.

Still, years in passing, pause to lay
 Their changing colors on the scene;
 The cities fall, the nation dies,
 And man departs, his works lay waste—
 Again the forest and the plain
 Own Nature's sway, and hers alone;
 Wild beasts and birds obey her will,
 Where silent lay his works and man,
 Till others come to delve for him
 As he had delved for others gone.

So years are painting as they pass,
 Soft brushing o'er the face of life.
 So constant change and change again
 They lay upon the canvas there.
 'Tis good to think one grand design
 Has ruled the changes of each year;

That in the light of endless day
Upon the face of life shall be—
Wrought from the colors of all time,
And from the scenes of all the years—
Pictured how man has wrought for God,
How God has wrought his will with man.

The Prophet Lehi

BY "SISTER BERTA"

The word of the Lord to the prophet came,
In a country over the sea:
"Rise up, and to all the land proclaim
Of the things that soon shall be;
And then make haste and get thee gone
To a land I have given thee.

"I gave to my people a royal law,
They have heedlessly passed it by;
The warnings I gave they have laughed to scorn,
My word they have dared defy;
While up from the ground for revenge I hear
The blood of the prophets cry.

"Thou hast walked in my statutes and kept my law;
Thou hast kept thy faith in me.
There lieth afar, o'er the ocean's wave,
A land I will give to thee.
My choicest blessings on it I've strewn,
And it shall thy portion be."

The prophet arose, and the guiding hand
Of Jehovah led the way.
The days went by, and the way was dark,
And the prophet grew old and gray,
Till the days were years; yet his faith failed not,
For his trust in his Master lay.

Through the lonely forest where wild beasts howled,
Over arid plain, 'neath the scorching heat,
'Mid the lightning's flash, and the thunder's crash,
On the pathless sea, when the tempests beat,
Like the needle to pole, his faith in God,
Till his journey's at last complete.

And he saw o'er the waves in the gray of morn
The dark blue haze of the nearing shore;
And his soul rejoiced as he knelt in prayer,
While the fresh'ning breeze his praise-song bore:
" 'Tis the promised land, Thy word's fulfilled;
O Father, I ask no more."

He had breasted rebellion of thankless sons,
And their wicked scheming been called to face;
Right well might the faithful heart rejoice—
He had finished the course, he had run the race
On the shining roll of the faithful ones,
When thou shalt the tale of the ages trace,
'Midst those who have fought and have kept the faith
Give the name of the prophet Lehi place.

God of the Changing Years

BY RALPH W. FARRELL

God of the ever changing years, Thou doth not change;
Be still my Friend,
And through the shifting scenes of life
Lead to the end.

And may my heart respond to Thee,
Eternal One;
Teach me in hours of grief to say
Thy will be done.

Our Daily Bread

BY EARNEST WEBBE

"Back of the loaf is the snowy flour,
And back of the flour is the mill,
And back of the mill are the wheat and the shower,
And the sun and the Father's will."

Then give us this day our daily bread,
O Lord of the sunshine and shower;
Give us to work so it may be said,
We know of thy glory and power!

AS TOLD IN THE MORNING

The sun was shining over Jebel Fureidis tingeing with ruddy color the new-built fortress of Herodium.

The mountains of Moab lay along the horizon, a purple wall in the morning light.

Out of the billowy sea of brown hills rose the ridge of gray Jura limestone on which lay Bethlehem.

Down the northern slope in the way that ran from terrace to terrace among the fig trees and grape vines walked a lad. Presently as he rounded a slight bend in the road he came face to face with an old man.

The lad stopped abruptly and looked about him as one might look for an avenue of escape, but he was too late; already the old man had spied him.

"Ah, Stephen!" he cried, "is that you? You rascal! I have searched long for you and your mother is near frantic. Where have you been since on yesterday I sent you into the country to bring me three lambs due me by contract from Simeon the shepherd? Answer me, and, if your account be not straight, I will deal with you in a manner that shall make you more expeditious in the future."

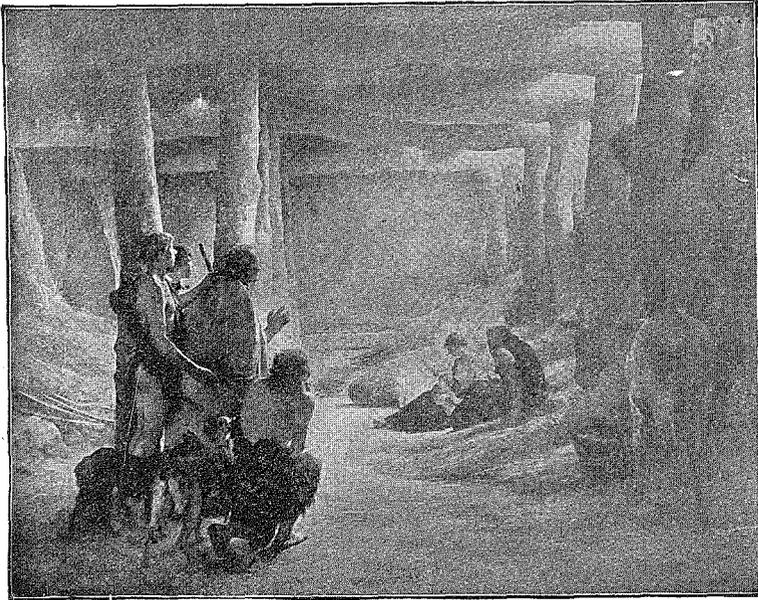

The old man leaned upon his staff and peered at the lad from beneath his bushy brows. The lad stood his ground as one who in a crisis knows that he has the situation in hand, yet, withal, he stood at a discreet distance.

"Father," he said, "I have a strange story to tell, but if it be not true Simeon the shepherd shall tell you so and you shall beat me; which will give you pleasure.

"I went to Simeon, but it was past the midday when I found him, with his flocks; and the six lambs were in a far field with another flock that is tended by Simeon's sons. Simeon said the lambs were not yours by right, but his wife said that though the compact was unjust yet it must be kept. And so between the haggling and the distance it was night before I had them in hand.

"Simeon bade me stay the night. He said I was not to blame that my father was usurer and spake not the truth."

"I thought to see more, but saw only Joseph and Mary, and with Mary was a little babe."

The lad drew away a step, but the old man only said gruffly, "Go on," while his eyes burned with a somber glow.

"Well, we lay among the hills watching the flocks, out beyond the Tower of the Shepherds, and Simeon and his men told tales and sang songs and tended a little fire, for the night was chilly."

"Ah; so this is your strange story," the old man broke in.

"No, you have not yet heard. As we talked, the sheep became restless and crowded around us, and the dogs came and cowered at our feet, whining. Simeon, who is a righteous man, had been telling us of the Messiah who was to come and of the many wonderful things that our people had seen, and now he seemed as one inspired. 'Wait,' he said, and see what the Lord will show to us.' Presently it grew light, though it was yet night—lighter than day; and, looking up to see from whence it came, we saw a man in the midst of great light.

"So we all fell down thinking that we should immediately die, but the man said: 'Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the City of David, a Savior, which is Christ the Lord. And this shall be a sign unto you: Ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger.'

"And then there were a great many like the first, and we knew them for angels, and they all said: 'Glory to God in the highest, and on earth, peace, good will toward men.'

"So, after they were gone a little while and we found that we still lived, Simeon and the shepherds ran, and I with them forgetting my three lambs; and, after we had gone a long way, we came to the gate and entered Bethlehem.

"The shepherds sought out the khan of Zaccheus and made much ado, and I thought to see more, but I saw only Joseph and Mary of Nazareth, whom you know, and with Mary was a little baby. That was all, but Simeon said he had seen the Messiah and went everywhere telling the people. So with the morning light I thought of home, and there was I going when I met you."

The old man leaned upon his staff and his hands trembled and in his dim eyes was a strange new light.

"Can it be?" he said, "Can it be?" And again, "It is written, 'Out of thee shall he come, oh, Bethlehem!'"

The lad slipped away unnoticed, and the old man stood a long time beneath the fig trees pondering the ancient prophecies.

THE DEDICATION OF KIRTLAND TEMPLE

It was Sunday morning, March 27, 1836, in Kirtland, Ohio. The sun was shining between the gray clouds, driven swiftly along by the force of the cold northeast wind. On the hillsides the snow lay in small drifts, for the evidence of winter had not yet been obliterated. The early morning air was cold and penetrating. The sun's rays had not yet melted the frost that whitened the grasses on the bare hill-tops.

AN IMPOSING STRUCTURE

An imposing structure of solid masonry, its cemented walls showing architectural beauty and strength, crowned a hill at whose base ran the swift waters of the Chagrin River. It was a scene of animation; everywhere life abounded. A crowd of people in plain apparel, but with earnest faces lighted by smiles of pleasure, stood before the unopened doors of the building. It was the morning of the dedication of the Temple, that remarkable structure erected by their sacrifice, by the toil and labor of their own hands. Now it stood before them, a monument of the indomitable courage and determination of that band of workers.

those moments of a heavenly Father's acknowledgment. The throng still surged around the doors, and every seat provided for the assembly was taken. The aisles were filled, also the vestibule, when, at nine o'clock, the Presidents, Joseph Smith, jr., and Sidney Rigdon, reluctantly ordered the doors closed so that the exercises of this memorable day could commence.

THE SERVICE

The ninety-sixth and twenty-fourth Psalms were read by Sidney Rigdon, after which the following hymn was sung (Saints' Harp, 1004) :

Ere long the veil will rend in twain,
The King descend with all his train,
The earth shall shake with awful fright,
And all creation feel his might.

Proclaim the joys of heaven around,
Hosannah! now the trump shall sound,
And all the Saints together join,
With songs of love, with hosts divine.

As the Saints with their well-trained choir sang, the Spirit seemed to shake the temple, and heavenly choirs were heard to mingle their voices with those of the Saints, making the effect wonderful, soul-inspiring, and uplifting. A thousand voices with the help of the Spirit and augmented by the heavenly forces who had been assigned by the Father to make

Showing arrangement of pulpits in lower auditorium.

The doors were opened, the social talk so common to Saints was at once hushed and quietude pervades the throng. With hats removed and bowed heads they enter the building, which during its erection had received its baptism of tears, caused by the opposing forces, which, from the laying of the corner stone to the last stroke of the painter's brush, had forced persecution and suffering upon its builders.

But the hour of their triumph had come, and the recognition of a heavenly Father's favor was awaiting their entry into the courts of the Lord's house. A mellow, soul-pervading power took possession of the hearts of the faithful as they entered the auditorium. The eye refused to keep back the tears, the lips would quiver as the fire of God's Holy Spirit burned within the soul, and before they were conscious of it they had begun to breathe the atmosphere of heaven.

Ah, who but a true child of God could appreciate sacred and more impressive the service of song, made it a service of rapture.

The discourse following, by Sidney Rigdon, was one of eloquence and spiritual power, occupying two and one half hours. After this, the Prophet, Joseph, was presented to the congregation as their prophet, seer, and revelator. All arose from their seats to receive and acknowledge him as the one appointed of God to be their president. Then followed the song, "Now let us rejoice in the day of salvation," and the exercises of the morning closed, with an intermission of fifteen minutes.

The sun shone through the windows of the temple upon a people filled with joy and praise. The hours had fled as though they were minutes, so intensely happy were God's people under the holy influence which filled that edifice upon that occasion. But the real feast was yet to come.

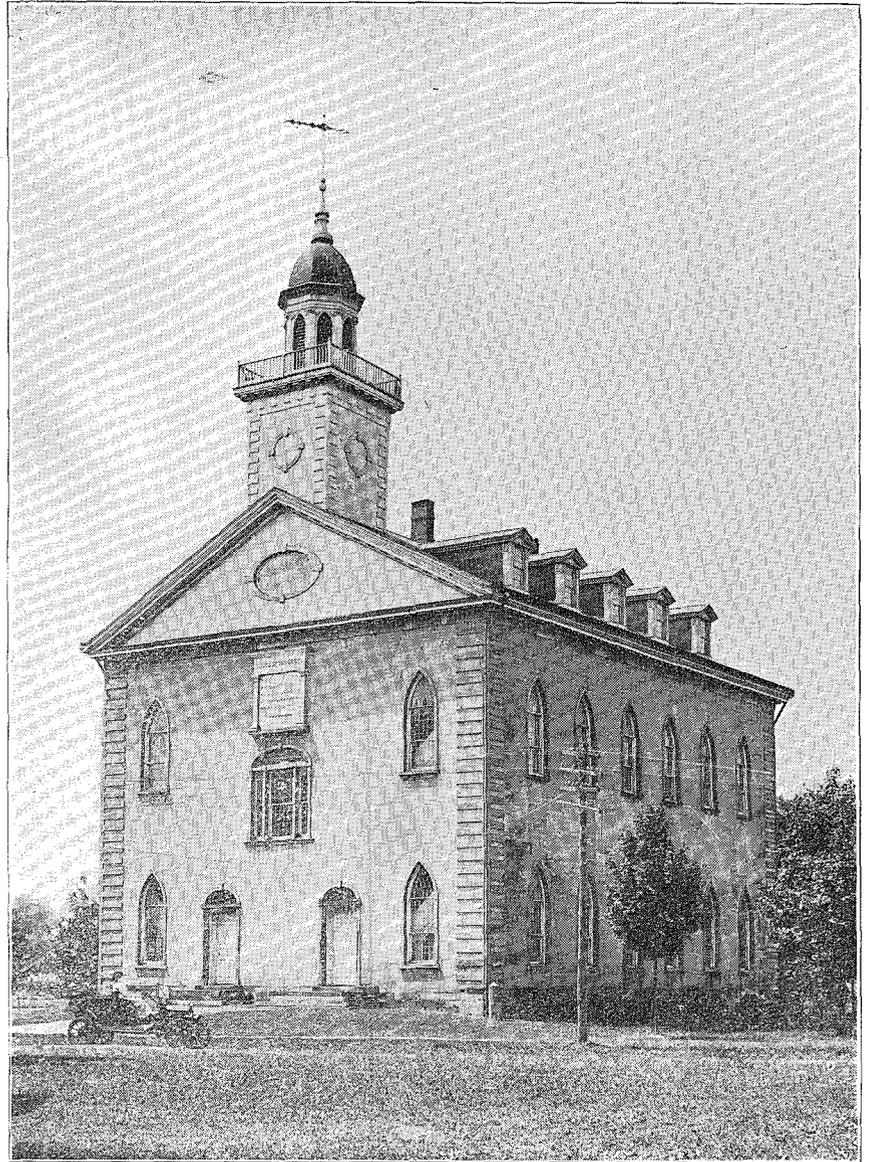

All joined in singing, "This earth was once a garden place." President Joseph Smith then arose and after some appropriate remarks prophesied to the assembly concerning God's blessings upon that people, and the work intrusted to their care, after which followed the prayer of dedication by Joseph.

There stood the living Prophet of God, clothed with a mantle of light and intelligence, even that of the Holy Spirit, with eyes closed and uplifted hands. He presented to the Infinite One the first temple built under the direction and after the pattern given of God since the temple was raised to his name and glory in Jerusalem, and by the sacrifice of his people.

With face illumined by the holy fire burning within him, stood this man, pouring out the longings of his soul to God, giving thanks and praise for the success which had crowned his efforts and the struggles and terrible persecutions which had attended the labors of these faithful Saints while building this house to the honor and glory of God.

The fervor, pathos, and spiritual power manifested in this prayer of dedication long remained with those who listened to its outpouring. The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel was earnestly appealed to, to accept the work of the hands of God's children, who through much sorrow and persecution had continued their work to its completion. The Lord was asked to permit his glory to rest upon it and to come into it for his children's blessing. The poor, the sick, and the afflicted were not forgotten before the Lord. The persecuted ones in Missouri, some of whom had been cruelly beaten, or slain and others driven from their homes and lands, were remembered, and the tears of sympathy coursed down the cheeks of the Prophet as he earnestly pleaded their cause before the Lord. The sobbing response of those who silently joined with him in prayer showed how their hearts flowed out with sorrow towards their afflicted brethren. The church was remembered, with all the elders in Israel, that holiness might prevail among them, and that nothing should be permitted to enter the temple to pollute it; but that it might be preserved a house of holiness unto the Lord, that his glory might ever rest upon it. He prayed for himself, that he might be strengthened to do the will of God, and delivered from his enemies. His wife and children, with the families of all the Saints, were committed to the fostering hand of a loving Father.

Thus the Temple was handed over to the Lord for his acceptance, and the sequel will reveal the fact that the work of sacrifice by the Saints was pleasing to the Lord and accepted by him.

THE SPIRIT'S OUTPOURING

The Holy Spirit which had been pent up in the hearts of God's people during the wonderful prayer of the Prophet found relief when the hymn, "The Spirit of God like a fire is burning," was sung. Oh, what ecstasy of delight, what a thrilling power pervaded the assembly! Again heavenly choirs joined in chorus, swelling the strains of melody and praise to Jehovah. The hills surrounding the Temple took up the sweet strain and reveberated the hallelujahs of that wonderful song of praise, and nature all around seemed to rejoice before the Lord. "Oh, happy people, whose God is the Lord!" The very atmosphere of the Temple was filled with a soothing, melting influence which brought spiritual invigoration to the true and faithful children of God.

Quietude settled over the assembly when Joseph arose and announced that the emblems of the Lord's body would be administered. His brother, Don Carlos Smith, blessed the emblems and they were administered by the elders.

Then came a season of testimony and a wonderful display of spiritual power and manifestations of blessings in prophecy. There were tongues, and visitation of angels, one taking the seat between Joseph Smith, sr., and Frederick G. Williams. Loud acclamations of "Hosannah, hosannah to God and the Lamb," with "Amen" thrice repeated were sung by the assembly as an expression of the power and the blessing of God felt within them. Those "Hosannahs" were sung by an infant who had been brought into the temple under its mother's shawl, thus showing that the Lord used every available means to display his love and willingness to bless his people upon this memorable occasion.

Oh, the depths of the riches of his grace! How willingly he reveals his wonderful goodness when his people can utilize his blessings! Thus the meeting ended and the occasion has gone into history as one of the most blessed ever recorded.

A VISION

Upon the Sunday following, the Saints again assembled to partake of the emblems of the Lord's body. A spiritual feast was again enjoyed. After the assembly was dismissed, Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery retired to the pulpit, the veil being dropped. They bowed in solemn, silent prayer before the Lord. On rising the following vision was opened to both of them.

The veil was taken from their minds and the eyes of their understanding were opened. The Lord, even Jesus Christ the Lamb, once slain, descended and stood upon the breastwork of the pulpit before them. Under his feet was a paved work of pure gold, in color like unto amber. His eyes were like a flame of fire, his hair white like pure snow. His countenance shone above the brightness of the sun and his voice was as the sound of the rushing of great waters, even the voice of Jehovah, saying,

I am the first and the last; I am he who liveth; I am he who was slain; I am your advocate with the Father. Behold, your sins are forgiven you, you are clean before me, therefore lift up your heads and rejoice, let the hearts of your brethren rejoice, and let the hearts of all my people rejoice, who have, with their might, built this house to my name, for behold, I have accepted this house, and my name shall be here, and I will manifest to my people in mercy in this house; yea, I will appear unto my servants, and speak unto them with mine own voice, if my people will keep my commandments, and do not pollute this holy house; yea, the hearts of thousands and tens of thousands shall greatly rejoice in consequence of the blessings which shall be poured out, and the endowment with which my servants have been endowed in this house; and the fame of this house shall spread to foreign lands; and this is the beginning of the blessings which shall be poured out upon the heads of my people. Even so. Amen.

What an indorsement of the work accomplished was this! Even the Master Workman who had given instructions concerning its building came down and inspected it himself, smiled upon it, then said, "I accept it."

Then the veil was rolled back from heaven's gate, and Moses appeared before them and gave them the keys of the gathering of Israel and the gathering of the ten tribes from the land of the north. After this Elias appeared and committed unto them the dispensation of the gospel of Abraham. Then Elijah, who was taken up into heaven without tasting death, stood before them and said the prophecy of Malachi was about to be fulfilled and the coming of the Lord was near at hand. Thus ended the vision. Who is a God like unto our God?

What beautiful memories cluster around that wonderful building, and more wonderful experiences attending its dedication! We feel this a fitting place for the beautiful hymn of David Smith's composition.

From pinnacle to corner stone,
A temple unto me was shown,
A building most desirable in which to dwell;
Built with wisdom every wall,
And graceful tower straight and tall,
High springing arch and spacious hall—were beautiful.

Within its courts I longed to go,
Its cause and purpose longed to know,
Above the door a name did glow,— God's Church Below.

EVERLASTING LIFE

BY ELDER A. B. PHILLIPS

The closing verses of the 6th chapter of Romans contain these words:

But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life. For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Long before the fountain of perpetual youth allured the New World explorers, sages of the Orient had spent years of time and also much wealth in their search for the source of life,—hoping to learn how to perpetuate the vital spark, so far above the valuation of all else. They wished at least to understand its source and destiny.

We need not dwell upon the lives of which even the memory had passed centuries since but for the pens of historians, themselves remembered only in history. Ages before these men lived the coveted formula had been discovered, and lost. To the first man who ever breathed, amid the sparkling radiance of a world which was truly new, was made known how life might continue on and on, for ever; but scarcely had the wonderful news reached him ere he violated the conditions it contained and was left to face the certainty of an ever approaching death.

A LIFE CONFORMED TO AN IDEAL

Thousands of years passed away, amid which arose from time to time inspired seers who presciently saw the coming of one who should know the formula and prove to the world its unfailing potency; and when the power of life was again revealed to man and a living example shown to them, it was found that very few were really willing to abide by its conditions. It meant the conforming of a life desirable, that no one could attain to it except by making it the supreme purpose of each hour, and crucifying every impulse tending to lead even the thoughts in forbidden paths.

So men began to advocate the person of the one who had conquered death and had shown them how to do the same, but that which he had taught them they did not observe; notwithstanding which, they tried to believe that in some way, how they did not know, they should obtain everlasting life. This may seem strange to some of our day, inasmuch as the Great Teacher had said:

Everyone that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man which built his house upon the sand: and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it.

But it is recorded that when he had ended these sayings "the people were astonished at his doctrine." They did not appear to believe that he really meant what he said, for they continued to neglect or disobey his teachings.

And so it is at the present day that men study medicine, establish hospitals, practice physical culture, and do many other things that are of themselves well enough, but can not discover how to perpetuate life beyond a few years at most. We must go back to the old warning issued at the beginning, that warning of death, which was so surely the result of breaking the law of life. Just how death results from sin is not, perhaps, essential for us to know. It is of infinitely greater importance to know that death is the result of sin. Death is the opposite of life, hence those things which tend to produce death can not by any means be productive of life, but must be, on the other hand, destructive to life. He who seeks life, therefore, must not do that which is destructive to the very thing which he seeks.

WHAT IS LIFE?

Life is the most manifest force in all the world, and yet no one sees it, handles it, or hears it. To deny its existence is to deny our own existence. Its power is truly wonderful, both in animal and all other forms of life. It is an intelligence which creates; but though that which is created appears, life never appears to mortal sight except by its manifestations. Many definitions have been given, as for instance, that it is correspondence with environment; or, that it is response to external association; and others which may more or less suit the conceptions of the individual. No definition that may be thought of is adequate to fully express it. What no one fully understands, no one may fully explain.

Is there some source of life to be found, where inexhaustible supply is stored? We believe there is, and that Christ is that source; but no one should imagine that life is to be apportioned as by measure. If it is inexhaustible it must also be perpetual or it would cease to be life. Whether or not we understand of what it is composed, it is certain that we may know how to obtain it. God has not satisfied our curiosity by giving such explanation of it as some might desire, but he has provided the means of satisfying our necessity for it.

DEGREES OF LIFE

It is not difficult to understand that one may possess varying degrees of life. This is true of physical and also spiritual things. He who is deaf can not respond to even the most ecstatic strains of music that the archangel could compose or the seraphic hosts render. The blind man, though he may possess the soul of a Raphael or Rembrandt, can not respond to the wonderful work which their genius has produced. In vain he may pass his fingers over faces that almost live and breathe from the magic touch of the artist's brush; he sees them not. Not all of his physical senses are alive, and until he can bring all of them into correspondence with things around him, he can not know the joys that are possible to normal man.

Let us apply this principle to life in its most perfect sense. To possess life fully we must know its possibilities and uses. Jesus said, "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." To have life more abundantly we must be rid of that which is destructive to life. Herein applies the first part of my text: "But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life."

Life and death are waging a war for eternal supremacy; which shall we aid? We can not serve two masters; our forces are enlisted for the side that we ourselves choose, but never upon both sides at once. Our wages are either life or death. But we do not choose the wages; we rather choose the things that inevitably shall return to us in wages. It is not therefor, safe for us to trust to our ignorance; but rather we should trust the word of God.

A homely illustration will make this thought clear; our progenitors burned tallow in which was a dipped rag, and, being ignorant of the advantages of a kerosene lamp, were probably tolerably satisfied. Our grandmothers used badly constructed lamps in which burned poorly refined oil, and were thankful. So, many follow the dark labyrinths of gloom to-day, not knowing the joy and peace to be found where the light of life always radiates its glory upon those who seek the better way. Sin will cease to overpower one who realizes the fearful price which he must pay for its indulgence, and who knows the rich rewards of the higher life. Let us be sure that we fully live, and not be satisfied with being only partly alive. The possibilities of complete and abundant life are with us; our only aim should be to possess it fully.

PURPOSE VERSUS DESIRE

One of the chief reasons why men fail is that they content themselves with desiring life in the abstract rather than desiring the conditions that are essential to life. We must realize that there is no such thing as heaven independent of the atmosphere that has created it. If some characters were permitted to dwell in heaven, it would become the veriest hell. In this sense it seems apparent that we are, consciously or unconsciously, creating our eternal state; that we shall find ourselves in precisely the atmosphere that permeates our own bosoms, when we enter the land where mortals may not tread. We may wish for ecstasy, but shall never realize it until we live its prerequisites.

We may wish to associate with angels, but our first aim should be to become fit to associate with them; to radiate from our own lives angelic influences, otherwise we should defile their very presence. We shall never become more glorious than the purposes executed by us will reflect; for all other glory must be borrowed or stolen—it is not ours, and never can be ours to all eternity. He who would reap an abundant harvest must sow his seed with care, and protect its growth until maturity. His thoughts must not be confined to his prospective yield, but he must devote his purpose to cultivation, and care for the details of preparatory work. He who reaches the celestial glory obtains it by inheritance. He may not be fully worthy of it, but he will be prepared for it by having cherished the right and labored for it as the one great purpose of life. Desire is not always purpose.

DESIRE BECOMES PURPOSE

It is possible to desire, abstractly, something good, and at the same time desire its opposite much more, in a specific sense.

It is not desire alone, but desire becomes our purpose, that will overcome obstacles in our pathway. We need the desire to obtain everlasting life, but we also need the purpose, ever insistent within us, to live according to the conditions that will perpetuate life; otherwise everlasting life is impossible for us, and we become of those to whom Jesus said: "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life."

Let us not make the mistake of supposing that a desire for the right will bring us everlasting life, if our purpose is expressed in doing that which is wrong. In other words, let no desire linger for that which leads away from God, who is the source of life. A purpose that is dominant will also mold the secondary aspirations until all desires of the soul are in harmony with it. If that purpose is to attain everlasting life we shall succeed; but if some conflicting desire is permitted to become dominant we shall fail, because everlasting life then ceases to become our purpose so far as the specific means of obtaining it are concerned.

WHEN DOES IT BEGIN?

Everlasting life may be considered anticipatory, and in its highest sense this is true; but Jesus indicates what may be sensed here as also hereafter when he says:

Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life.—John 6: 54.

And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent.—John 17: 3.

My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: And I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand.—John 10: 27, 28.

I am the resurrection, and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die. Believest thou this?—John 11: 25, 26.

He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life.—John 3: 36.

But whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life.—John 4: 14.

Can anyone doubt that the divine life begins here, and that, beginning here, it shall continue for ever? How, otherwise, shall we believe the Messiah's words: "Whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die. Believest thou this?" When he said that he came in order that they might have life more abundantly, he implied the same means of possession as when he said, "Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life." Many religionists look upon the eucharist and imagine they perceive there the real flesh and blood of the Son of God, but John saw the flesh and blood of Christ with infinitely clearer vision when he said: "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." Paul saw it when the mystery of godliness was to him revealed and he exclaimed, "God was manifest in the flesh."

The God-life is the real, the immortal life, and to the extent we eat and drink of this flesh and blood, the Word Incarnate, to that extent we have eternal life abiding in us; for Jesus says, "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life." In no uncertain terms he sets forth the startling doctrine of reascent life to every soul who shall partake of him, whom he says:

Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life.—John 5: 24.

The disciple whom Jesus loved, and whose faith and love reached the sublimities of the divine realm, was no less positive than the Master, saying:

We know that we have passed from death unto life.—1 John 3: 14.

And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life. These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life.—1 John 5: 11-13.

To have the Son of God is to have the substance and not simply the form. It was the qualities he possessed that made him the Son of God; the name alone did not comprise his sonship. So, for us to have everlasting life is to have that which made life everlasting in him. There is no assurance beyond the grave of that which we reject or neglect in this life; but our assurance is that we may receive in fullness in the world to come of immortal life, if we have cherished it beyond all else of human association or purpose. These things that make life immortal may become qualities in our lives now, and we shall never become dispossessed of them except by our own act. The acts, thoughts, and purposes of each day shall still be with us as we reach the bounds of the endless day, when the sun of this life has set to rise no more.

LIFE'S FULLNESS

Who knows what life's possibilities are? The development of all the powers of life has in this world but just begun. We can no more conceive the future to be reached than could our fathers know what we should attain to-day. To hope for celestial life is to hope for fullness of life, but the fullness of life can only be expressed in its activities; and we seek to enter a realm where we may perfectly and for evermore express the activities of life.

Robert G. Ingersoll conceived that "Life is a narrow vale between the cold and barren peaks of two eternities." This idea may be considered poetic; but, as is liable to be the case with poetic conceptions, it is at best simply fanciful. How can one who claims to know nothing of eternity know that its peaks are either cold or barren? Conclusions must be based upon evidence, and it can hardly be conceived that there ever was a time when nothing existed; it is contrary to all the evidence of the universe. Even disintegration is but a process of evolving life to another environment, as is shown in its various forms. Because we are not able to correspond with an environment to which we have not yet attained is no reason for concluding that no other exists. Such argument was no doubt conclusive to those whose vision could not reach to a New World, nor hardly believe the testimonies of those who had seen its wonders; but they are forgotten, while the memory still lives of the great men who could see the earth a magnificent globe revolving in the midst of eternity.

Life may change with its ever changing surroundings; but when the surroundings become perfect life must become perfect in order to remain. Let us rather say that life is a ceaseless stream, springing forth from the beginning of eternity and flowing resistlessly on to its end. Sometimes scintillating beneath the glory of the zenith sun, then entering softly into the shades of the enshrouding night, until the golden radiance of an endless morn heralds the fullness of its undying ecstasy.

Incarnate intelligence, responsive wholly to the supreme Intelligence of the celestial realm, may at last enter upon its heritage of everlasting life: Immortal life, because every faculty of the soul has attained to the fullness of its potentiality, and thus is eternally freed from the fetters of death; and celestial life, because the intelligence comprehends all things. May it be our supreme purpose to reach it, and to this end may we consecrate the brief years that to us still remain.

"WHAT WENT YE OUT TO SEE?"

BY ELDER J. A. KOEHLER

What we see when we look at a thing depends upon what is in our minds. What comes into the mind when an object or idea is referred to it depends upon what we have associated with the object or idea theretofore. The mere mention of limburger cheese raises in the minds of some people pleasurable memory images of taste and smell, exciting a flow of saliva, and stimulating the appetite; while to others the mere mention of the name produces a state akin to nausea. Since in the mere mention of the name there is actually no limburger cheese present, the pleasurable or painful images arising, that is, what we "see," must depend upon what is in the mind. Our actual experience with this article of food has impressed the mind that certain feelings are associated with it,—the mind has rather connected the feelings with the object,—and future reference to the object calls up the feelings we have previously associated with it, and they seem to be a part of the object itself.

The scene thrown upon the canvas by the moving-picture machine is determined by the impression previously made upon the film. Every time the machine "looks" at the canvas it sees only its formed impressions. Our minds are not moving-picture machines, but they are nevertheless subject to impressions from without; and as the impressions on the film are projected upon the canvas, so our impressions about an object are liable to be projected by the mind into the object when it is present to our senses.

WE SEE THINGS DIFFERENTLY

A given object may have several different forms to several different people. I mean that what different people have in their minds may cause a given object to take on different aspects. To illustrate: Let us take one lone rich man as an example (this figure is taken from "Thompson's Laws of Thought"): A poverty-stricken individual may regard him as a very fortunate person who can purchase many luxuries that a poor man may not enjoy; some religious people regard him as a very unfortunate person with more than the usual amount of temptation, and with good chances of going straight to hell; the economist may regard him as an example of the unequal distribution of wealth; the merchant regards him as one whose patronage is very desirable; some ignorant people regard him as one whose prestige makes his counsel valuable; while the philosopher may regard him as a fool who is ignorant of his folly; and perhaps some good Latter Day Saint may regard him as a man to whom God has intrusted much property because he sees that the man may use the property for righteous purposes.

WHAT IS REALLY SEEN?

The same object (that is, the same matter) exactly. It was the same word-sound "limburger cheese," and it was the identical rich man in every case. It is true these things appeared under different "forms," but the variety of forms was due to the fact that each man had connected his own prior conceptions of imagination with the man and the cheese. Let us remember that in each case the matter, i. e., the thing itself, is the same; the form it has in our minds in no way changes the thing itself. What we have in mind can only color the object to us. What we see is what was in our minds before the object or idea was presented to our senses.

To the man with blue glasses everything appears blue; but to the man with red glasses the same objects appear red. In much the same way many things foreshadow evil to the pessimistic mind, while the same things may be regarded as hopeful signs by the optimistic mind. The thoughts we have about things differ widely, sometimes; and in view of this fact it is really important that we should observe with Descartes that, "My thought imposes no necessity upon things." Things exist independent of our thoughts; our thoughts have no bearing upon their existence or nonexistence. Shall we remember then that some things we see are purely the products of our imagination, and have no existence outside of our minds?

It will be greatly to our advantage to think about these things when Brother A or Sister B are not doing their part of the work; when C is seeking to do us an injury; when the whole church is out of joint; and when the task set before us is such an unreasonable and hopeless one that there is no use undertaking it, etc.

OUR DESIRES

Our desires often have much to do with what we see. To the boy who wants to go to the ball ground, but to whom we have said, "No, you can not go until it stops raining," it clears off in his imagination long before it does in fact. If he wants to go in swimming, but must wait until the weather gets a little warmer, the weather warms up in his imagination long before it does in fact. And it is that way with us big boys and girls, too; what we want to see is often the thing we see, whether it is "seeable" in fact or not.

Many people simply "can't see" (so they say) the force of an argument supporting an idea or doctrine. In some of these cases the blindness grows out of a preference for some other view of the matter: "And even as they did not like (or desire) to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind."

A woman of considerable culture invited me to her home to review some matter that I had presented from the pulpit. Being challenged to prove my position, and since it was a question of the competency of my witnesses, I asked her if she would believe my position if the Bible affirmed it. She agreed she would. Whereupon I asked for her Bible, which she offered to me. But in order that there might be no doubt in her mind about the character and substance of the testimony of her approved witness, I insisted that she should do the reading. I called for the reading; she read, whereupon I asked, "Is not that exactly what I said in my sermon?" She replied, "Yes; it reads that way, but I can't see it that way."

It was evident to me that she preferred to see that matter in the light of her past training rather than to see it as it was in fact; and had I known the state of her mind I could easily have reached the conclusion (by a priora reasoning) that the testimony of the witness of her own choice would not appeal to her. Her desire determined what she saw.

So whether we "see" the kingdom of heaven or not when it is presented to our senses depends very largely upon how much we would like to see it. Whether truth appeals to us or not when it is properly stated depends upon how much we hunger and thirst for righteousness. In other words, what we see depends largely upon what we would like to see; upon our desires or preferences; upon what is in our minds.

ANGLE OF VISION

The angle of vision then, has much to do with what we "see." A man marries an ugly woman; or perhaps I should say a woman marries an ugly man; and no odds how bad the bargain may seem to the neighbors, to the bride the groom is "simply lovely." Evidently this man is seen from different angles; whence the different aspects he presents. He is seen through eyes that have their stimuli interpreted by different memory images.

Christianity certainly looks different to the Hindu from what it does to the man born of Christian parents, and vice versa. These minds received their impressions under widely different circumstances; and these "circumstances" determine the angle of vision; and the angle of vision in turn determines "what is seen."

Many people have been introduced to the Latter Day Saints through trashy literature written by ignorant or designing men. Or perhaps all they know about the church is what they have seen acted out in the life of some Latter Day Saint family (so-called) that did not live its religion. Under these circumstances they will not likely see anything good or desirable in the church even when the matter is presented to them by some proper representative. The real church is viewed by them in the light of the early impressions received concerning it. However, there is a different angle from which to view Latter Day Saintism; and viewing it from this different angle we may see it as it is. There are thousands to whom this work has been presented, whose minds were not charged with prejudices, who had no preference for anything but the truth, who saw and still see in this work the revelation of God's will to the world to-day.

Whether any truth appeals to any man or not depends largely upon what is in his mind; upon the angle of vision from which he views it. The man sees what is in his mind; he may not see the truth. Viewing the latter-day work is like viewing anything else. And when what we expected to see does not appear at once we begin to search around to find the thing we were looking for; we look for something to confirm our previous notions. Yes, if we have allowed some "Job's Comforter," some one whom we have come to allow to do our thinking and advising, to picture Brother A, or the pastor, or the priest, or others, as unskillful, undiplomatic, whose ministrations are ineffective, and so on, we will "see" these people in the light (or darkness) of the picture our friend ("Job's Comforter") has painted in our mind; and we will not be satisfied with his ministrations, no odds how proper they may be. It is as if we have come to regard some one as being habitually behind time, delaying every program with which he is connected; even when that person is actually on time, the best we can see in him is that "he did not delay the program as long as usual"; and even this much may be acknowledged very reluctantly.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE MATTER

The importance of this matter lies, as is already apparent, in the fact that these preperceptions render our judgments faulty. Every individual desires and seeks his own welfare. It seems evident that to promote our interests we need to see things as they are. Let us suppose that the preservation of my health demands a change of diet. If I see in my present diet that which is best for me, and have no apprehension of the change that my system demands, manifestly I am in no position to promote my own interests. I must have a "vision" of what is needed, of what is good and bad, else I am liable to "perish." "Where there is no vision the people perish."

Let us suppose again that "eternal life" (that is, the welfare of every man's soul,) depends upon seeing (or apprehending) the things God has declared to be necessary to our salvation. If we do not see these things of God we are surely in no position to promote this particular interest. Here again I must have a vision of what is good or bad, or I am liable to perish. If I see green where I ought to see red, I have a wrong perception; I do not see things as they are. Similarly, if some philosophy (or theory) that is not a revelation of God's will appears to me to be a revelation of his will, I do not see things as they are. If the revelation of God's will appears to me to be not a revelation of his will, I do not see things as they are. And since to promote my interests I must see things as they are, it follows that in order to promote my eternal interests I must see those things which misrepresent God as not expressions of his will; and I must at once see the things which represent him as real expressions of his will. Now then, when we go out into the field of ethics, or economics, or religion, or what not—

WHAT DO WE GO OUT TO SEE?

If we go out to see the things that we have always believed to be true, everything that seems to support those early impressions will be readily assimilated; that is, what is in our minds will modify what we see and hear so as to make those things appear to confirm our early impressions; and all this notwithstanding the fact that the things we see may be flat contradictions of our notions. If we have concluded that all the religious world outside of our own is barren of truth, the identical truths to which we might readily subscribe if they were presented to us as doctrines of our own church may seem to us to be errors, and that, too, because they are presented as doctrines of an institution that we have already decided in our minds is an alien to the truth.

WHAT SHOULD WE GO OUT TO SEE?

The distinctive idea in education is "disinterestedness." We do not mean by this that the objects and ideas presented to our minds should be dismissed or put aside without consideration. We mean that whenever we look, or taste or feel, or listen, we should try to let the form that the object or idea takes in our minds be determined by the thing itself. By disinterestedness we mean that we should have no goal to which we desire our observations to lead us; we should not desire to have the Latter Day Saint or any other church prove to be the work of God; we should not be interested in proving that any particular doctrine is true; we should only desire to have the truth, the location or identity of the truth to be determined by things themselves and not by what is in our minds. Observations should be made with the one idea of getting a true idea of the thing observed; of getting at the facts. If we approach any field of knowledge in this mental attitude, the answer to the question, "What went ye out to see?" will be: "We went out to see what was to be seen; to see things as they are."

In this mental attitude we will be fair to our neighbor, and honest with ourselves. This way of "seeing" things will likely reveal to us much truth of which we are now ignorant, and will disclose many errors that now stand to us for truth. The importance of going out to see the right things, things as they are, lies in the fact that only in this way are we able with certainty to promote our own interests and happiness. It is therefore worth while, yes, it is highly important to ask ourselves the question, "What went ye out to see?"

MISSIONARY WORK

BY FRED JOHNSON

(Read at Plano Reunion, August, 1914.)

All are called according to the gifts of God unto them; and to the intent that all may labor together, let him that laboureth in the ministry and him that toileth in the affairs of men of business and of work labor together with God for the accomplishment of the word intrusted to all.—Doctrine and Covenants.

Scriptural quotations seem superfluous in connection with this subject, as the calling of mankind to the service of God is the fundamental idea of all that appears in the Scriptures and all revelation. The Bible as it stands and our later inspired literature exist for the purpose of affording converted men a basis for their appeal to the ungodly and mistaken.

Not alone in the written word do we find the divine call, but from all nature, where the beautiful is permitted to manifest itself, comes the call to spread the tidings that will bring the careless and misguided to a better knowledge of the Creator.

And a powerful call to spiritual duty comes with the obvious opportunity for such service. For instance, the meeting with a discouraged person is a definite appeal for spiritual assistance, apart from any ministerial authority; likewise the call for service comes direct to us in the chance association with the morally weak, those deficient in will power, whose misdemeanors run the gamut of crimes, great and small. This is purely unselfish work, unspectacular and of high character and definite good. All that is for good is for God.

Allied with this service of precept is the missionary work done by example. This is the distasteful part, and it is of far greater importance than is generally realized. Some of the most energetic men, so far as laying down the law to others is concerned, are considerably less excited when it comes to their own shortcomings. The man who talks to his acquaintances concerning the glories of the gospel and then goes home and abuses his family is not helping the work as much as he is hindering it.

It is reasonably to be expected that the true and unadulterated gospel will bring about as marked an improvement in character and disposition as is produced in those who accept the inferior brands of religion, and neighbors and friends are quick to note and draw conclusions from breaches of the peace at home and improper conduct elsewhere. I have in mind actual instances of this sort.

It does not seem necessary to make any distinction as to the opportunities of men as compared with those of women and children. Those old enough to feel and recognize the call for such service as referred to can officiate, as conditions may permit, regardless of sex or age.

There are a great many women engaged in welfare work of various kinds, and with the increase in effectiveness which they expect will accompany their use of the ballot it is possible that still more may be accomplished for the benefit of humanity and the consequent pleasure of God.

Our people who engage in such work perhaps have different ideals and a larger vision in that they will attempt not only to improve living conditions and thus give adversity-scarred minds an opportunity to dwell on something besides their misfortunes, but will also endeavor to instill in those minds the nucleus of a great hope and a bright faith, that will develop with their comprehension and render them eventually good citizens in this life and in that to come.

The call along other lines than for the mission field is increasing. There is the call for assistance with the fruits of industry and with the knowledge of practical things and of sciences. Do not refer to the latter as "worldly knowledge." We realize that all things are governed by law, and to seek to understand these laws is labor of a high order. It is doubtless more satisfactory to the Master Worker to see men tilling their fields scientifically, getting the maximum return therefrom without abusing the soil, than to see other men working their lands ignorantly, wastefully, and destructively. The same idea applies to other lines of effort. There are plenty of things, alas, that qualify as worldly knowledge, without applying that term to those legitimate branches of learning that enable men to apply themselves more intelligently.

I might mention some sorts of knowledge for which there is no "call." I shall not refer to the knowledge of the exact length of once-white sock that must show between the oxford and the trouser cuff, nor to the knowledge of how to spread the most kalsomine over an otherwise attractive face,—but to the sinister knowledge that lies beneath modern politics; to the expert knowledge of the manipulation of stocks; of high finance; of gambling in dens and in social affairs; of wines and liquors; of how to barter the souls of women; of sensuous dances, etc. All these and such as these are worldly and must perish with the earth, as they can have no place in the kingdom of God.

I regret that my time does not permit me to go further into this subject, as it is of great interest and importance to all of us, and much depends upon our realization of our gifts and callings.

BIOGRAPHICAL DEPARTMENT

BIOGRAPHY OF PRESIDENT WILLIAM MARKS

BY ELDER R. M. ELVIN

With some degree of hesitancy do I undertake the write-up of a man who was so prominent in the church for seven or more years before the break-up at Nauvoo, and from 1853 till 1872 in the Reorganization. As a text or a prelude I offer the following beautiful word picture as helpful by way of an introduction to this paper upon the life and Christian labors of Elder William Marks, whose name is the second on record of the Quorum of High Priests, and is written without pen upon the memory of many of the old-time members of the church, and is worthy of a place in the "Hall of Honor," among the many true and faithful who made willing sacrifice to establish firmly the "restoration" of the gospel unto the salvation of souls.

Blessed is the man who hath not walked astray
In counsel of the wicked, and i' the way
Of sinners hath not stood, and in the seat
Of scorners hath not sat. But in the gate
Jehovah's law is ever his delight,
And in his law he studies day and night.
He shall be as a tree which planted grows
By watery streams, and in his season knows

To yield his fruit, and his leaf shall not fall,
And what he takes in hand shall prosper all.
Not so the wicked, but as chaff which fanned
The wind drives, so the wicked shall not stand
In judgment, or abide their trial then,
Nor sinners in the assembly of just men;
For the Lord knows the upright way of the just,
And the way of bad men to ruin must.

—John Milton.

Our work shall be the cord that will bind the fragments of history into a souvenir of remembrance; a writer of more vivid imagination might write a book, we shall satisfy ourselves with a few plain statements.

The name of William Marks first comes to our notice in the minutes of a conference held at Kirtland, Ohio, Sunday, September 3, 1837. The church met in conference as a committee of the whole; the business seems to have been to approve of quorums and councils; a number in the high council were objected to, and William Marks was chosen to fill a vacancy. (Millennial Star, vol. 16, p. 57.)

On September 9, 1837, the high council of Kirtland met and we have the following chronicle. "The High Council of Kirtland met in the Lord's house, and organized by electing Jared Carter, president, and Phineas Richards, clerk. The members elected on the third were ordained."—Millennial Star, vol. 16, p. 77.

As we have no reference to his holding any office before named for the High Council, it is probable that his ordination as an high priest was on September 9, 1837. At a conference held in the house of the Lord, September 17, 1837, Bishop N. K. Whitney stated that by the provisions of a late revelation he would be required to travel, and he nominated William Marks to act as his agent during his absence; this clearly indicates that Elder Marks was considered sufficiently competent and honest to transact business for the bishop. (Ibid., 85.)

A paragraph in a letter from the President and Prophet of the church, dated, Far West, March 29, 1838, and addressed "To the Presidency of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints in Kirtland"; and signed: "Joseph Smith, junior, President of the Church of Christ of Latter Day Saints," reads:

I would just say to Brother Marks, that I saw in a vision while on the road that whereas he was closely pursued by an innumerable concourse of enemies, and as they pressed upon him hard, as if they were about to devour him, and had seemingly obtained some degree of advantage over him, but about this time a chariot of fire came, and near the place, even the angel of the Lord put forth his hand unto Brother Marks, and said unto him, "Thou art my son, come here," and immediately

he was caught up in the chariot, and rode away triumphantly out of their midst. And again the Lord said, I will raise thee up for a blessing unto many people. Now the particulars of the whole matter can not be written at this time, but the vision was evidently given to me that I might know that the hand of the Lord would be on his behalf.—Millennial Star, vol. 16 p. 131.

The faithfulness of the man in the church up to the fatal day that the church was deprived of its chief officer; and then on through the "dark and cloudy" days of usurpation and apostasy, mid irksome trials and disappointment, and again in the re-gathering of the scattered flock into the true fold, and rounding out his good works for his fellow man, falling asleep just prior to the reaching the octogenarian mile-stone, should be sufficient evidence that the Lord was indeed over him "for a blessing unto many people."

In the revelation given at Far West, Missouri, July 8, 1838, is this concerning an appointment by the Lord:

Let my servant William Marks be faithful over a few things, and he shall be ruler over many. Let him preside in the midst of my people in the city Far West, and let him be blessed with the blessings of my people.—Millennial Star, vol. 16, p. 183.

The next fall after the foregoing, the Saints were driven out of the State of Missouri, and I have not found any statement of history that Elder Marks fulfilled the assignment to preside at Far West.

A twenty thousand-acre tract of land in what is now known as Lee County, Iowa, was offered the church on reasonable terms, on the installment plan, without interest. A committee of the church reported favorable to the purchase, at a conference held at Quincy, Illinois, February, 1839. William Marks and others opposed the scheme of the church colonizing. What it was that prompted those men who favored the Saints to scatter out is not in evidence. That might have proved the better method, as the locating at Nauvoo finally resulted in the expulsion of the largest faction of the church under the leadership of Brigham Young from the confines of the United States, and then settling in foreign, that is, in Mexican territory. In view of the results, who is able to say but what Elder Marks advocated the wiser counsel? If, however, considered from a financial viewpoint, a mistake was made, for that beautiful, rich plot of land that could have been obtained for forty thousand dollars, is to-day worth millions. Of a truth we may in safety accept the affirmation of the Master of men: "For the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light."

At a conference held at Commerce (afterward named Nauvoo), Hancock County, Illinois, October 5, 1839, a stake was organized. The account reads:

President Joseph Smith, jr., then spoke at some length upon the situation of the church, the difficulties they had had to contend with, and the manner in which they had been led to this place; and wished to know the views of the brethren whether they wished to appoint this a stake or not, stating that he believed it to be a good place and suited for the Saints. It was then unanimously agreed upon, that it should be appointed a stake and a place of gathering for the Saints. The following officers were then appointed: William Marks to be president.—Times and Seasons, vol. 1, p. 30.

The following officers were then appointed:

The names of these forming this stake council are given, but no other officer mentioned. Again we have him spoken of as the president of the Nauvoo Stake, and making choice of C. C. Rich and Austin Cowles as counselors, but the names of the council are not named. (Church History, vol. 2, p. 519.) The council of 1839, and that of March 29, 1841, are in all probability the self-same council with the changes wrought by time.

February 1, 1841, the first city election of Nauvoo was held, and William Marks was one of the alder-

Let us step back one month in time and read the divine instruction found in the revelation of January 19, 1841:

Let my servant Isaac Galland be appointed among you, and be ordained by my servant William Marks, and be blessed of him, to go with my servant Hyrum, to accomplish the work that my servant Joseph shall point out to them, and they shall be greatly blessed. Let my servant William Marks pay stock into that house, as it seemeth him good, for himself and his generation.—Doctrine and Covenants 107: 24, 25.

When the municipal court of the city of Nauvoo, Illinois, held its session to hear the cause of the kidnaping of Joseph Smith by Joseph H. Reynolds and Harmon T. Wilson on a writ of habeas corpus, William Marks presided as acting chief justice, assisted by five others. The court met July 1, 1843. (Times and Seasons, vol. 4, p. 243.)

After the scattering of the Saints from Nauvoo, the name of William Marks appears in connection with some of those who aspired to leadership. He evidently followed faithfully the inspired instruction of Paul: "Prove all things, hold fast that which is good." To carry out this counsel it was unavoidable for him to have some association to learn the policy of their organizations; one thing is sure, he did not fraternize with those for any length of time or with those who gave countenance to the crime of polygamy.

From a letter dated: Independence, Missouri, September 28, 1914, and written to me by Sister Josephine Wood, a granddaughter of Elder William Marks, I excerpt the following:

Have you the prophecy delivered to him in 1859 through Sister Helen Pomeroy: O thou man of God, thou hast oft-times in the past sat in council with my servant Joseph the Seer, and the time is near at hand when thou shalt sit in council with his son. When I called my servant Joseph the Seer he was as a lone tree, but when I shall call his son he shall be as one of a forest.

At a special conference, held at Amboy, Illinois, June 10 to 14, 1859, on the second day of the conference, we find the date and identification of the subject of this paper with the church as follows: "The following were received by vote into the Reorganization, having formerly been in fellowship with the church: William Marks, (high priest)." (Church History, vol. 3, p. 236.) At the same conference he with two others was appointed to publish a hymn book.

In October, 1859, at the Semiannual Conference held in the house of Israel L. Rogers:

Elder William Marks to visit western Iowa and vicinity, to organize branches and do such other business as will best promote the interests of the church. He was also appointed on the publishing committee, and as one of the solicitors for the proposed HERALD.—HERALD, vol. 1, p. 64.

October 23, 1859, Elder Marks puts himself on record against the dogma of polygamy. His article is under the caption, "Opposition to polygamy," and is found in the first number of the first volume of the HERALD, pages 22 and 23 of the reprint.

At the Semiannual Conference of 1860, Elder Marks with two others were appointed a committee to choose three men for ordination as apostles. (HERALD, vol. 1, p. 236.)

Revelation of March, 1863, is vital to our topic. It reads:

Hearken unto me, O ye elders of my church. Lo! I have seen your efforts in my cause, and they are pleasing unto me. I declare unto you, it is my will that you ordain and set apart my servant William Marks to be a counselor to my servant Joseph, even the president of my church, that the first presidency of my church may be more perfectly filled.—Doctrine and Covenants 115: 1.

The General Conference held at Amboy, Lee County, Illinois, April, 1863, took action on the nomination to add to the First Presidency as follows:

Brother J. W. Briggs made some remarks concerning a revelation which was given in March, 1863, for the appointment of Brother William Marks as counselor to the President of the church. Brother W. W. Blair said that at the June conference in 1859, it was prophesied that Brother William Marks would be a counselor to the President of the church. Brother W. W. Blair read the revelation which was referred to by Brother J. W. Briggs. "Resolved, That Brother William Marks, be ordained a counselor to the President of the church." He was then ordained to that office by Brothers Joseph Smith, J. W. Briggs, and E. C. Briggs. (HERALD, vol. 3, p. 197.)

As age and health permitted, he continued to fill and magnify his calling and office as a member of the First Presidency until in the hour of death he laid down his commission as a servant in the church militant, subject alone to whatever appointment the Jehovah of the universe hath in reservation for his faithful high priests.

In an address of President Joseph Smith, at the April conference of 1872, relative to vacancies in the traveling high council, and other important matters of the church he spoke as follows:

With respect to the First Presidency: Brother William Marks is very aged and feeble, and may be taken away at any time—this would leave the First Presidency with one member only. He had also sought for light on this question, and received a very pleasing intimation that it would be provided for, though no especial designation was made. The speech of the President was listened to with great interest, and was a fitting close to the first day's services and sessions.—HERALD, vol. 19, p. 284.

The loving-kindness of God shines out in the manifestation of the Holy Spirit to the President like the hand of a guiding angel, relative to the passing of our brother so soon prior to his departure to the home of rest.

The leading editorial in the HERALD for June 1, 1872, reads:

With feelings of no ordinary moment called forth by an event of more than common interest to the church, we chronicle the departure of William Marks, senior, from this earthly life.

Brother Marks was one of the noblest of men. He lived a life of most singular usefulness to his fellow men. Kind and upright in thought, it was known of him that his acts were founded in his consciousness of right; and what was wrong to him he would not do.

Brother Marks united with the church at an early day and was with the Saints through all their troubles, up to the terrifying times of eighteen hundred and forty-four and five, and then because that he would not keep still while crime and iniquity overran the rights and liberties of the people of the church, he was made an offender and left the city of Nauvoo. He was indented with some of the movements towards reorganization of the scattered ones of the fold, but in each instance, when he became aware that there were principles of evil and wrong obtaining in church government, and among the originators, he announced his disapproval and withdrew from their association.

As the president of the stake at Nauvoo, Brother Marks was one of the most faithful and steadfast men the church had. He was an example of clear-headed wisdom, a man who ruled his own spirit, and consequently one who controlled others. He was a wise counselor and a wise administrator, and became one of the most valuable and trusted friends of the Martyr Joseph. His integrity was incorruptible.

He cast his lot and his influence with the Reorganization in 1859, and remained a steadfast promoter of the truth; ever ready to reprove what he saw that he believed to be wrong, and fearing no man, loving neither place nor power, his personal influence was always a force for the cause of God on the earth.

At the proper time Brother William Marks became the counselor to the President of the Reorganized Church, which position he held at the time of his departure, which occurred on the 22d day of May, 1872, at 11 h., 45 m., a. m.

In a good old age, respected and loved, he has laid down the weapons of his earthly warfare without regret, to take up the unbroken threads of his spiritual existence, in the rest of the paradise of God, there to await the assembling of the redeemed and the sanctified, when "He shall gather in one all things in Christ."

Brother Marks was born in Rutland, Vermont, November 15, 1792, and died May 22, 1872, having lived nearly eighty years. He was patient and long-suffering during his decay, and seemed to be full of confidence that a blessed future awaited him. His death was as the death of the righteous.—HERALD, vol. 19, pp. 336, 337.

The foregoing tribute was paid by the close personal friend and associate and yokefellow in church work, President, Prophet, and Seer of the church; also, the Editor in chief of the HERALD.

Relative to the death of Elder Marks, our historian has written: "By this sad event President Smith lost his only counselor, and the church a wise and discreet defender." (Church History, vol. 3, p. 702.)

The faithful and impartial biographer has this to say:

President Marks was a man of sterling integrity, true to his convictions, faithful and courageous in the discharge of duty. If he seemed vacillating because of his several changes from one faction to another, it was only seeming. He was seeking the right; and when he discovered wrong he had the courage to denounce it, and sever his connections from those who fostered it. Through all these changing scenes and experiences he maintained his honor intact, and his record was unstained by immoral acts. He was, much of his life, a man of considerable means, which he always freely spent in the promulgation of what he accepted as true. The last years of his life were spent in peace, satisfied in the possession of what he long had sought among the factions in vain. Firm and unwavering in his early devotion to the church prior to the death of Joseph Smith, he proved in his devotion to the Reorganization that he had not lost those stable qualities."—Church History, vol. 3, p. 725.

We learn that he was twice married. The wife of his youth was Miss Rosannah R. Robinson. They were married May 2, 1813, to which union there were born six sons and five daughters. He was left a widower October 18, 1863. His second marriage was in 1866, to Mrs. Julia A. Muir. She remained a widow some twenty years, and passed peacefully away at Lamoni, Iowa.

As a peroration of tribute to high priest William Marks, the words of the Master of men—our great High Priest, even Christ Jesus the Righteous, wherein he set the gauge and criterion of men:

A good man out of the good treasure of the heart bringeth forth good things; and an evil man out of the evil treasure, bringeth forth evil things.

Wherefore by the fruits we shall know them.

Time and Friendship

BY CHARLES FRY

O Time! Thou art so kind, yet ruthless:
Thou comest to us ever, yet remainest not;
Most lavish are the gifts borne on thy transit,
Yet awhile thou carriest them away.
Thou bringest life, thou bringest death,
Thou fillest us betimes with joy and sorrow,
Both good and ill are wrapped in thy embrace—
So paradoxial are thy gifts.

O Time! Of all that thou dost bring,
True friendship is to us most prized;
For though thou oft removes from us our friends,
Their friendship lingers long, and gives Abiding hope of that bright day when thou
Wilt no more separate.

O Time! Wilt thou not deal with us kindly?
For we rest upon thy bosom as upon a flowing tide.
Spare us, O spare us the richest of thy treasures
And take not from us the friendships of the past,
For they are precious in our sight—
The friendships of man and of God.

History of the Hymn, "Angel Message"

BY JAMES L. EDWARDS

[One of the most popular of our hymns is "The angel message." It is a purely Latter Day Saint product,—theme, words, and music. The words are happily wedded to fitting music. The author of the hymn is Brother James L. Edwards; the composer of the music, Brother H. R. Mills. Some years ago, at our request, Brother Edwards wrote a brief account of the origin of this hymn which we reproduce here, confident that it will be of great interest to many lovers of "The angel message."—HERALD EDITORS.]

It is with some degree of diffidence I write you in regard to a hymn in Zion's Praises called, "The angel message." But having heard from so many, telling of the comfort and blessing received by hearing it, and the spirit that appears to accompany its singing, and that its use is becoming more general, I thought it might be interesting to my brothers and sisters to know the little history there is attached to it. Also in this public manner do I thank my dear heavenly Father for whatever of inspiration I may have received in writing it.

One morning, some years before writing the song, my wife, upon arising from bed, asked me the meaning of the word eureka. I replied, "Why do you want to know?"

She said, "Never mind; tell me the meaning of the word." I answered, "It is a Greek word, and means 'I have found!'"

She then related a dream she had had a few hours previously. I will give it as nearly as I can in her own words:

"I was in a very large room where there were many Saints sitting on chairs arranged as they would be in Sunday school, that is, the scholars on the two center rows of chairs were facing each other, and you were on a chair back of mine. During a pause in the proceedings, you arose, leaned over my shoulder, called me by name, and putting an open hymn book into my hand, said, 'Sing Eureka.' I turned to look at you. Your face was beaming with happiness, and I perceived you had the Spirit in great measure."

That is the gist of the dream. My wife recognized many of the Saints present, one of whom remarked to her how happy I appeared to be. I wrote the dream, as I do nearly all things of a spiritual character, and for a long time I would search through every hymn book that came within my reach to find a hymn called "Eureka," but failed to find it.

Long after my wife's dream had been forgotten, I wrote the hymn as now found in Zion's Praises (number 206), with the addition of one stanza which has been left out, which was as follows:

"My former teachers told me if I only would believe,
That pardoned all my sins would surely be;
But I found they were mistaken, no more can they deceive,
Since the precious angel message came to me."

Before I sent the poetry to the HERALD I noticed that the first three words of the piece were, "I have found," or eureka. Then the dream came to my mind, but I could not understand it, as I was only sending it to the HERALD as a simple piece of poetry, with no thought of it ever getting into a hymn book.

In sending an offering to Graceland College through Bishop E. L. Kelley, I inclosed the piece of poetry, asking him to please hand it to the Editor, and in acknowledging my letter he said in effect, I have done as requested, but you never know what these editors will do, what they will publish, or what they will consign to the wastebasket.

In a note sent to the Editor with the poetry I had given the piece the name "Eureka," but added, "You have the privilege to give it any other name you may think more appropriate," not mentioning anything of the circumstances of my wife's dream. In a short time it was printed in the HERALD under the heading of "Original Poetry," with the title, "The angel message."

I thought little more of it until in a time of peculiar and severe trial some two or three years later, when everything seemed to be covered as with a dark pall, a letter came from a dear brother, named Charles L. Sessions, which I will take the liberty to write extracts from.

"KALASKA, March 9, 1903.

"Mr. James L. Edwards,

"Dear Brother: I have thought to write to you for a long time, but did not have your address until lately, when I wrote to the Herald Office for it.

"I became acquainted with your name by your writing 'The angel message.' I put a chorus to it and had it printed twice, and it has thrilled the multitude and will yet make the whole world ring. It is grand. Most of the Saints in this part of the vineyard have become familiar with it, and have rejoiced in spirit many times on account of having it printed and put before the people in our conference. So I trust that you will forgive me for making use of it without first consulting you.

"I have just received two thousand copies of it, with four others from the Glad Tidings office. So if you receive this letter all right I will send you some of the songs.

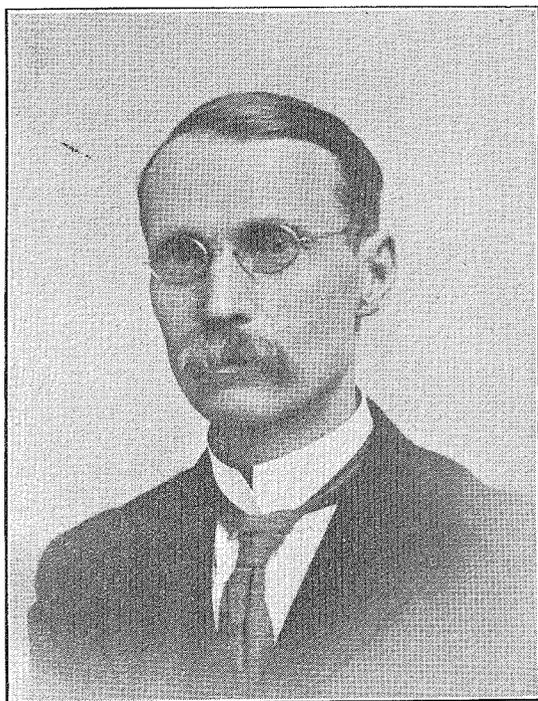

"I will wait to hear from you before I send the songs, so as to be sure you will get them.

"From your brother in the gospel

"To my heart there comes like an angel song,
A glorious glad refrain
If you heed it not, like a sweet, lost chord,
We can never hear it again.

"That song might have thrilled the multitude,
Might have made the whole world ring,
But the moment is passed and we weep sad tears,
For the song we did not sing."

"But, brother, we will not weep sad tears because we did not sing this one. "C. L. S."

ELDER H. R. MILLS.

Composer of music used with the hymn, "Angel message."

The letter from the brother was like the oasis in the desert. It cheered, strengthened, and comforted us, and we realized that the Lord was watching over us and had sent us a blessing to tide us over a season of gloom and depression; and if this should ever meet the eye of the brother (whom I have not heard from in some years,) I wish to thank him again from the depths of my soul for the great joy brought to us by his thoughtful, loving, Christian act.

I answered the brother's letter and he sent us several hundred copies of the song. Some time later when I read that the church was about to enlarge the Hymnal I sent the poetry to Brother H. R. Mills, together with several choruses, asking him to bring it before the Hymnal committee. He kindly arranged a chorus and made music for it, discarding the music I had written it to be sung to, viz: "I have found a friend in Jesus," for which I thank him in the name of all Saints through all coming time who may be comforted by the elevating and touching music of "Eureka."

My song was too late for the Hymnal and was given a place in the school songbook, Zion's Praises, as was indicated in Sister Edwards's dream, by the arrangement of the seats as for a class in Sunday school.

"I have found the glorious gospel that was taught in former years,

With its gifts and blessings all so full and free;
And my soul is thrilled with gladness, and banished are my fears,
Since the precious Angel Message came to me.

"Chorus:

"Then praise the Lord, oh, my soul!
Abundant mercy, oh, how free!
In joyful song thy Spirit doth accord,
Since the precious Angel Message came to me.

"I wandered long in darkness, yet sought the narrow way,
And my life was like the surging of the sea;
But now I am rejoicing in this the latter day,
Since the precious Angel Message came to me.

"My once blind eyes are open, my sins are washed away,
And the kingdom I can very plainly see;
No more do fears and doubtings my trusting soul dismay,
Since the precious Angel Message came to me.

"Now for celestial glory, in the presence of the Lord,
I will work and watch and humbly bow the knee;
No longer faith, but knowledge, in true and sweet accord,
With the precious Angel Message brought to me."

Music and God's Evangel

BY JOHN W. RUSHTON

Sometime ago the editor of the Staff department of the HERALD requested the writer to put into letter form some of the ideas we had been discussing with several persons; and this is the attempt, though very crude and unsatisfactory.

It has become fashionable to speak approvingly and enthusiastically of the influence of music in our church life. It seems a long time ago that it was a matter of grave controversy as to the place and influence music should have in our spiritual culture. Yet we have seen a wonderful change of sentiment; and only in a very recent General Conference our musicians were organized and a general chorister was appointed to direct the musical forces of the body. If I am not mistaken, there was not a dissentient voice or vote.

The effect of such a fillip is seen in the developing ability both of instrumentalists, vocal soloists and choral unions all over the church; and as one of the ministers of the church I pay affectionate tribute to the very valuable service which has been rendered in so many places and on so many occasions when the collaboration of the musical service with the preacher's effort has conspired to improve, inspire and render very much more effective the effort made.

Speaking experientially, we appreciate to some extent the power of music in the life of man, and while it is true that some men have allowed themselves to become so absorbed in their studies that the natural appetite for music has atrophied, yet we who have felt the thrilling magic and have been lured into the Elysian fields of immortality and have felt the mighty tide of hope lifting us to higher and brighter zones of idealism and power can not but feel that those who have lost their love of melody and harmony as they flash and surge in the combinations of the masters, no matter what they have gained, have been left stranded in a pathetic poverty of emotions.

We also speak with gratitude, but with some hesitancy about the chastening and disciplining effect of music, for who has not felt in the rapturous minors the unutterable grief of the ages, of tragedies over which angels have wept; and, the profundity of voiceless remorse that has swept like a wintry blast into the inmost recesses of conscience and being until the tears which had long been delayed would spring from the wells of emotion and sanctify to us the very pain as the pride and passion of selfishness was changed into a nobler love for a purer purpose and holier crusade, under its baptism.

Some of us who have watched human nature in the mass, so to speak, and have tried to understand the psychology of the crowd, have noted the lost art of "seeing God." The individual lost in life's rills has not noticed the "sound of many waters." Life in all of its ugly horror and black loneliness emptied of the glory of the divine and unilluminated by ennobling purpose—everywhere the stretches of barren waste, so that even romance and chivalry have lost their golden light and become transmuted into lead and brass; and the hall of dreams made into the charnel house of violated promises, prostituted genius and neglected opportunities in which the ghosts of bygone memories grin and mock. I say, we have seen such experiences when all other agencies have been powerless to move the Stygian waters, and when music has taken the imagination out of the grave clothes, and traveling over the long, gray road of the past that separates the now from the then, and under her gentle yet powerful ministry the soul becomes molten and once again incandescent with love. The eyes are turned from the black and empty present and light up with hope's forward-looking, and the miracle of redeeming grace begins its work of making a new man in Christ. Life's desert places are refreshed with showers and verdant greeneries smile over the erstwhile wastes of death; night's gloom is banished and once again the sky lives in the translucent blue of eternal day, and the chords of the soul become harmonious in the songs of majestic triumph.

We have seen the heart broken in sorrow, calloused in sin, void in selfishness and all of life's forces paralyzed in discouragement, yet under the wonderful influence of music the spell has been broken and the soul has sloughed off its paralysis and new continents have been added to the empire of human destiny.

We know how childish lisplings of nursery rhymes and the innocent folk-lore of our Nation's childhood have the power to make our home full of the peace of heaven and the joy which is its sweetest treasure, and none can know the despair which settles upon mankind unless they have known the dreadful silence which falls upon the home when death shall quiet forever the sweet voices of innocence which sang the songs of love.

We know that the greatest genius of the pianoforte, Liszt, did not reach his zenith until his power had taken hold of the gypsies' simple songs and revealed the marvelous depths of passion and wondrous radiances which were imprisoned in these crude and natural simplicities. Is not this like all the work of God, who teaches us to find life's joy in converting our simplicities into sublimities. Surely it is nothing short of a miracle that Liszt should have found in this the spirit of Orpheus playing hide and seek with Eurydice in Olympiad, and in Nature's musings and whisperings find the heavenly strains of his unapproachable rhapsodies.

Knowing some of these things and tracing the spiritual influence of music's ministry and following its ancestry until it is lost in the twilight of time, it has occurred to some that we might with much pleasure and profit utilize these things as a means of blessing to our fellows in cooperation with our usual church activities. And in the uniting of the church's ministry with the singers, instrumentalists, choirs and orchestras arrange for a series of Sunday evening musicals having the definite end in view of attracting our townspeople to our church to consider these ways of God in his approach to the soul of man.

The lectures could be arranged to describe the life of the masters or their work either in general, or detail, or effect. Those who were qualified could take up the meaning of sonatas, symphonies, oratorios, etc., and use them as means of portraying the several emotions, and have the lectures illustrated by musical numbers, employing those who can be used in such work. Surely such a service is not unworthy of our most reverent attention as we are dealing with soul and the soul-forces in this work.

The good to be received will not only be in our own pleasure and uplift, but also will be for our education and the cultivation of a purer taste for music and the widening of our sympathies and influences for good among our friends and neighbors. Then there will also be the cultivation of talent and the discovery of genius among our own people; and, lastly, I feel sure such services would assist in the broadening of our vision of the Divine. In a word, the effect would be a stimulus in our quest for truth, holiness and God.

The suggestion is but tentative, and we are painfully conscious of its crudity, and would have preferred keeping the matter in mind until we could have sublimated its beauty and attraction. However, in response to the request we present the idea, trusting that some of the vast possibilities which are latent therein may be recognized and used by others more competent.

It is encouraging, at least, that in Independence the matter has received very sympathetic and favorable attention from the pastor and the leaders of the musical programs there. We have not yet made a start for several reasons, the chief of which is the amount of work the local choir and musicians already have in hand; but we have our minds set in that direction, and the very beautifully written article on the life of S. J. Bach by A. McKim is a straw which is significant.

While there may be possibilities to this idea which would be out of the reach of many of us, all can at least attempt something which would be within our scope. We could surely muster a pianist, a vocalist or may be a quartet. This would make an excellent commencement, and if for the program the "brilliantes" of the musical constellation are beyond us, we could try the hymnologies and there find a very profitable field, for the hymn books of the churches are the real history of the soul's travail as it passes from death unto life.

Such a movement even with unpretentious beginnings could be made the nucleus of a larger philharmonic society, choral union or orchestra. It is just such endeavors which make the matrix of the great combinations. And in this common love and worthy ideal we may break down the barriers which have made society into a human mosaic. We may through this means join with angels and apostles in the effort to establish universal brotherhood. And again in this twentieth century let history repeat itself and have music as the pioneer in the celestial anthem which has been the theme of all preaching: "Peace on earth, and good will to men."

I am weak,

And can not find the good I seek Because I feel and fear the wrong.

—Longfellow.

EDUCATIONAL DEPARTMENT

EDITED BY SAMUEL A. BURGESS, LAMONI, IOWA

The Value of Education

IN PREPARATION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF ZION

In Hibbert's Journal for October, 1913, there is an excellent article on the "Moral obligation to be intelligent." The writer refers to the strong trend in English literature to praise bulldog tenacity and morality at the expense of reason and intelligence.

"Be good, sweet maid, and let who will be clever."—Kingsley.

Milton's Satan is an intelligent, thinking, brooding being; while the powers of righteousness are often good, dogmatic and unthinking. Many of the leading novelists of England present a similar contrast; a scheming, thinking villain, and a ruddy, stupid hero, who is saved from the consequences of his own stupidity only by the intervention of Providence in the last chapter. We realize that after the last chapter, if he is to keep out of trouble, it will require continued intervention.

The author even intimates that the loss of the Titanic is no more a monument of British courage than it is of stupidity. However good our intention may be, it does not bring the child to life who has been fed Rough-on-rats by mistake. There is a moral obligation to be intelligent.

Mankind is divided into three classes: Those who would be men—whatever that may mean; those who would be intelligent men, and those who unconscious of the almost blasphemy of the suggestion, would rather not be intelligent, but to do the will of God. But how can a man do the will of God unless he knows it?

This thought is peculiar to the literature of England. The book of Job in Hebrew literature presents no such contrast between righteousness and reason, nor does the great literature of antiquity when rightly understood. The Old Testament is full of such passages as the second to ninth chapters of Proverbs. "Bring forth your strong reasons, saith the king of Jacob" (Isaiah 41: 21). Also the Jews are stated to be easily first in recent antiquity in education.

The New Testament offers: "Study to show thyself approved unto God." (2 Timothy 2: 15.) "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." (1 Thessalonians 5: 21.) "And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." (John 17: 3.) And so the literature and fiction of other peoples praise intelligence and knowledge and do not place them in contradistinction to righteousness.

It is curious how often this trend of thought has influenced the expression of men of the church; so strongly as to lead many young people to suppose that morality and spirituality are upon one hand, and intelligence and reason are upon the other. Yet, do we teach in the first principles that sincerity is sufficient, or must we choose the right way? How can we choose the right way, unless we think and know? The writer has now become firmly of the opinion that there can be no lasting intelligence without morality, and this intelligence departs from the immoral. We see this regularly in our insane asylums. We see it in Doctrine and Covenants 90: 6: "Light and truth forsaketh that evil one."

But again there can be no lasting morality without intelligence. There can be no revelation except to the thinking mind. To make and keep our mind comparatively blank to receive revelation, is to throw ourself open to every evil influence. Sincerity is not enough. Reason was given us to use. "The glory of God is intelligence." (Doctrine and Covenants 90: 6.) And in that we become like him, our glory must also be measured by a like standard.

We have lived long and yet have failed to see all of the passages that bear upon this brought together, especially those that seem contradictory. For how often is reply made with such passages as 1 Corinthians 1: 25-31, "Because the foolishness of God is wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men. For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called: but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty; and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to naught things that are: That no flesh should glory in his presence. But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption: that, according as it is written, he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord."

Also 1 Corinthians 3: 18-23; 1 Corinthians 2: 11-16; Ecclesiastes 12: 12; 1: 18. Evidently there must be a consistent explanation, and all have their proper place and meaning in the divine economy.

Evidently the man who puts his trust in earthly wisdom will fall; surely the man who trusts the arm of flesh will come to naught, however wise he may be in his own conceit. There are two things he does not know; one is, those things that are spiritual, the truth of God, which is the greatest of all; the other is how much he does not know. No man can know too much. No man can be too well prepared. No man can be too able, too worthy or righteous for the service of God. But some men may unworthily deceive themselves. So we find the answer correctly made in Jeremiah 9: 23, 24:

"Thus saith the Lord, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches: but let him that glorieth glory in this; that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord which exercise loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness, in the earth: for in these things I delight, saith the Lord."

In John 14: 26 and 16: 13 we read that he will guide us unto all truth. But what is truth? Let Doctrine and Covenants 90: 4 answer: "Truth is knowledge of things as they are, and as they were, and as they are to come."

It is true, "Thy word is truth;" but the word of God if we narrow it to the three books of the church certainly is not all truth. If it were, we should have no further need of revelation. If it were, we should have no need to be admonished to come up higher, that our Father has greater blessings to give us. Then there are such splendid promises as in Job 32: 9 and Doctrine and Covenants 67: 3; 68: 1; 90: 1; 11: 4 and 43: 4, which latter expression, "I send you forth to teach and not to be taught," can only be rightly interpreted by the preceding paragraph, which says that it means we are not to be taught of men in the things of God. But we are certainly to study and teach one another.

But with all these beautiful promises by way of encouragement, and with the Spirit of God to teach us, is it reasonable to suppose, in the divine economy, that we should sit down with folded hands and sing, "Jesus paid it all, all to him I owe"? Is this any more justifiable in the matter of preparation, of intelligence, of study, than it is in the first principles of the gospel?

Let the word of God answer, not only in what we have quoted above, "Study to show thyself approved," "prove all things," and many others above set forth, but also such passages as Doctrine and Covenants 85: 21: "Also, I give unto you a commandment, that ye shall continue in prayer and fasting from this time forth. And I give unto you a commandment, that you shall teach one another the doctrine of the kingdom; teach ye diligently and my grace shall attend you, that you may be instructed more perfectly in theory, in principle, in doctrine, in the law of the gospel, in all things that pertain unto the kingdom of God, that is expedient for you to understand; of the things both in heaven, and in earth, and under the earth; things which have been; things which are; things which must shortly come to pass; things which are at home; things which are abroad; the wars and the perplexities of the nations; and the judgments which are on the land; and a knowledge also of countries, and of kingdoms, that ye may be prepared in all things when I shall send you again, to magnify the calling whereunto I have called you, and the mission with which I have commissioned you."

All this should leave no doubt in our minds as to the divine purpose, "that ye may be prepared in all things when I send you again, to magnify" your calling. See also Doctrine and Covenants 85: 36; 90: 4, 6, 12; 43: 3; 87: 5; 94: 2, 3. Note the admonition to study and prepare ourselves. And is this not entirely in accordance with the divine plan as shown in the first principles? There is something for us to do, and our heavenly Father helps us most when we are striving most earnestly to fit ourselves for his services.

Consistently, then, what a man should strive to be is: Strong enough physically to bear the pressure of the work our heavenly Father requires at his hands; intellectually prepared by study and by faith and by prayer; taught in all the learning of Egypt, in all the learning of the world that time will permit; yet humble, meek and full of love, (Doctrine and Covenants 11: 4) and taught of God. A man should bring his talent to the altar, make every effort to fit and prepare himself, and then dedicate himself, heart, mind and soul to God, and thus be enabled to secure divine help.

As we look back in history, such a man was Moses; such a man was Paul, the one man, who, after the Master himself, left the most profound impression upon the early Christian church. Such a man was Joseph, was Lehi and was Nephi.

And men of God in every age, including these latter days, in which the work of God has been proclaimed, and which have made the claim upon men to fit themselves and prepare schools and colleges and universities for the education of the young.

How long has the church suffered because it has struggled with problems that have been solved long since! And with making again old experiments that have already been made! The divine plan is the best to solve the social problem; but we can not fully value the divine plan as we should, unless we have had training in what other men have demonstrated and tried out along economic lines.

The glorious gospel of Jesus Christ is the greatest thing in the world, yet we can not appreciate it as we should, if we know nothing of other philosophy. Zion can not be redeemed except by the pure in heart, and by men who are prepared intelligently to cope with her problems. And this means not one man to lead, but it means a host to support him in his leadership, and to follow him, as he follows Christ in righteousness.

Our language is best understood when we have a knowledge of other tongues. The word of God is best appreciated in the light of the history of language and philosophy. The problems of to-day are best understood in the light of the history of the past, and what our heavenly Father has done and tried to do for humanity. The man who takes the talents his heavenly Father has given him and develops and increases them is the wise servant who will hear the commendation, "Well done," if only to his peculiar preparation he shall add humility, devotion, and the teaching of the Spirit of

GRACELAND COLLEGE.

God. Our ability was given us to use and develop. And when we have done our utmost, the Comforter is ready to teach us the things of the Father. Or, rather, while we are doing our best, we may look for the largest degree of inspiration.

Economic and spiritual Zion, then, requires education, which logically means the unfolding or development of the natural ability or talents—a mighty and able host fitted and ready to follow in the footsteps of the Master. S. A. B.

College Finances

We feel that a word should be said in regard to the finances of Graceland College. Some seem to think that since the conference placed us under the supervision of the Presiding Bishop that we no longer need endowment or help. This is not the case. Yet the receipts have fallen off very much from this source, and also in the College Day collection. We appreciate the situation and money stringency, and only ask that a reasonable effort be made.

Next month we hope to make a statement showing what its cost has been and something of what the college is worth to the church. We are very sure when the amount of good that has been done, and is being done by our college is understood, she will not lack for reasonable support. We should consider the value of our investment, and what we are getting as well as what we are paying; but the idea of most members has been very hazy in this particular.

In The Outlook for November 11, there is an article, "Shall American children pay for the war?" the particular problem being money withdrawn from educational purposes to meet existing conditions on account of the war. It raises a question worthy of our most careful consideration, since our college as well as other institutions of learning is suffering from that withdrawal of support.

This is not an European war only, it is a world crisis, which affects all of us. We can not escape its consequences, yet we should not place the burden on future generations by the withdrawal of support, nor should we permit our children to suffer, and the work as well, because of this present stringency.

A New Publication

We are interested to note the preannouncement of the publication for the priesthood, to be issued by the Independence Stake. Elder George E. Harrington is to be editor in chief. Other editors for the various quorums are to be chosen.

John W. Rushton, A. K. Dillee and Harry Sandy were chosen as a lessons and a revising committee. They have extended the courtesy of an invitation to the editor of this department.

We are pleased to notice this new indication of aroused interest in preparation for service, a work that will be distinctly educational in doctrinal and priesthood lines.

Notes

Various priesthood meetings, including that of Brooklyn, New York, have had for especial discussion the value of education to the priesthood. The Sunday school class of Elder Albert Carmichael, in Lamoni, Iowa, are studying the social and economic teachings of Jesus.

The work of the Extension Institute is showing a small but steady growth.

Question

Q. In preaching is it better to refer to one's self in the third person, or as we, or is it better to say, I heard a noise?

A. This is not a question that belongs to the Department of Education, but rather of public speaking. Usually it is better to avoid personalities, especially stories which attempt to show the speaker to be unusually bright, as that sounds too much like boasting. When it is necessary to refer to one's self, circumstances and the person must determine the usage. "Your speaker," or "we" can often be used effectively. But when relating some strong personal experience, like in Paul's address before King Agrippa, the "I" is far stronger and preferable; but this is rare, and ought not to be used for trivial circumstances. With care one may avoid all personal reference by indirect address.

CHILDREN'S HOME DEPARTMENT

EDITED BY HEMAN C. SMITH AND CALLIE B. STEBBINS, LAMONI, IOWA

Purposes of the Home

The Saints' Children's Home Association which owns and operates the Children's Home at Lamoni, Iowa, though a separate and legally independent corporation under the laws of Iowa, is controlled by a body of seven trustees chosen by the General Conference of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints and their tenure of office dependent upon the action of that body. It is therefore in a general way the property of the church and indirectly controlled by the church.

The purpose of the institution is as set forth in Article 5 of Articles of Incorporation.

"Article 5.—The purposes of this corporation shall be to receive, adopt, care for, place out for adoption, and improve the condition of destitute, abandoned, abused, ill-treated, friendless and orphan children, to secure and own suitable ground and tracts of land, to erect and maintain suitable buildings, where such children may be provided for and educated."

It will be seen from the foregoing that it is not the purpose of the home to keep a boarding house, reform school, or sanitarium. If in cases of emergency the trustees receive children to keep temporarily it is always with the understanding that they can not remain to the exclusion of applicants coming within the proper purpose of the institution as set forth in Articles of Incorporation.

It is the understanding of the present board of trustees that the leading effort should be to bring the homeless child and the childless home together; hence we solicit all who have good homes not blessed with children to take some homeless child or children, adopt and care for them as their own. This we hold is not wholly an act of charity, though it partakes largely of that feature. It is rather an act of reciprocity, as while the foster parent helps and blesses the ward, the child is a blessing to the parent and the home.

Every man and woman needs educating and developing as a parent, and no character is fully rounded out and developed without having taken a course in child care and having been made better by coming in contact with child love; nor can this be satisfactorily done outside of the home circle. We have in the home at present writing the following children subject to be placed in private homes approved of by the board:

Six girls, aged, respectively, eight, eight, ten, twelve, fourteen, and sixteen years, and four boys of ages nine, ten, eleven and thirteen years.

The board guarantees to use all the care and inquiry possible to secure proper homes, and when placing children in homes reserves the right to take them back if those who have received them do not give them proper care and attention.

We would be glad to furnish blank application to parties who may wish to receive children, and when applications are filed will investigate conditions, and gladly place such children as desired in proper homes among worthy people. Look over the list as given above and let us know which would suit you, or if you want one different write us and we will file your application and communicate with you when we have one desirable.

Where we have two or more of one family we prefer to place them together, or as near together as possible.

Applications either to place a child in the home or to receive one from the home should be addressed to Mrs. Callie B. Stebbins, Lamoni, Iowa.

Financial Support

The Children's Home has as yet received no endowments, and has no stipulated income, and so we must depend solely upon donations to feed and clothe and provide help for operating the home, and sometimes we are hard pressed to meet our monthly bills. We are not finding fault with the manner in which our needs have been met; indeed, we have been cheered and comforted by the loyal support we have received, and have only words of commendation for the noble and liberal spirit manifested towards this worthy enterprise; yet the stress in business and multiplicity of cares engaging the attention of the Saints, they are liable to forget the possibility of these unfortunate children being without nourishing food and comfortable clothes while we have plenty, a thing that no true Latter Day Saint would permit knowingly. We think it proper therefore that we mention that at the present time we are out of funds for running expenses, and bills are unpaid.

Judging from our past experiences in making appeals and from what we know of the character of the Saints and of other friends, we are sure this emergency will be promptly met, but let no one think that others will come to the rescue, but let each one do what he or she can and all will be well.

If any have scruples about paying means only through the Bishopric, let us remind you that the treasurer of the board is a member of the Bishopric, and will faithfully account for this means and see that it is used for the purpose named.

Send your donations for Children's Home to Bishop Joseph Roberts, Lamoni, Iowa.

Need of Publication

The home has long felt the need of some direct means of reaching the Saints and presenting the needs of the institution. The ways and means of doing this have been canvassed quite extensively.

Last spring the Board of Publication presented conditions upon which we could occupy two columns of the HERALD twice a month. The board accepted the conditions and appointed two of its number to prepare the necessary matter, but one of the two was absent most of the summer, and soon after returning suffered a painful accident, disabling the right arm, and while yet disabled was called to the bedside of President Joseph Smith, remaining until his death and burial; hence this work has been delayed. We will now, however, try to occupy upon our privileges, and give the readers news and information concerning the Children's Home semimonthly.

Should any information be needed through this department which we have overlooked, an inquiry addressed to either Callie B. Stebbins or Heman C. Smith, Lamoni, Iowa, will receive attention.

Address

G. W. Anderson, Iola Lake, Kansas.

Requests for Prayers

Prayers are requested by Sister Edna J. Cochran, of Van-cleave, Mississippi, for her sister, Mrs. F. B. Smith. Sister Cochran says her own health is much improved and indeed appreciates the interest the Saints have shown in her behalf. Her name was given us some weeks ago and printed here. Let us steadfastly continue to remember these afflicted ones, for God surely hears us.

A woman not of the church and who is hindered in her desires to unite with the faith because of an unbelieving husband and from the fear that she will not be able to keep inviolate her covenant with God, requests the prayers of the Saints that she may have strength to perform her duty. The husband of this woman does not object to her uniting with the church, but he is inclined to infidelity and is a drinking man, and the sister fears that it would be impossible for her to live the life of a Saint under these conditions. She should be remembered.

Book Reviews

THE ADVENTURES OF MR. MOCKER.—Thornton W. Burgess. Little, Brown and Company, Boston, Massachusetts. Illustrated. 50 cents. This juvenile is one of the series of six, each complete of itself, and devoted to the adventures of one animal, telling of his trouble, good times, enemies, and friends. The little people of the forest and meadow appear in fascinating style, and as expressed in the New York Times, "these stories have an engaging simplicity, a droll realism even in their phantasy that brings back grateful memories of Uncle Remus." This book tells of the havoc played by Mr. Mocker, a mocking bird just from the south, in his mocking of each of the forest folk under the direction of "Uncle Billie Possum," who finally introduces his friend at a grand party of reconciliation. A delightful book for children.

DEDICATION KANSAS CITY CENTRAL CHURCH

It was the privilege of the Editor to attend the dedication of Central Church at Kansas City, Missouri, which took place January 10, 1915. The exercises were in charge of the pastor, Elder J. A. Tanner. The dedicatory services opened at 11 o'clock in the forenoon with the singing of a beautiful and appropriate hymn:

You may sing of the beauty of mountain and dale,
Of the silvery streamlet and flow'rs of the vale;
But the place most delightful this earth can afford
Is the place of devotion—the house of the Lord.

Prayer was offered by Apostle John W. Rushton, after which the choir rendered a splendid anthem, "Send out thy light." The dedicatory sermon was by Elbert A. Smith, the subject being, "Building the walls of Jerusalem." After the sermon, Sister W. N. Robinson sang a solo, "The mighty God hath spoken," and the dedicatory prayer was offered by Bishop E. L. Kelley. The benediction was offered by Apostle Paul N. Hanson.

At the afternoon session at half past two, short addresses were made by Bishop E. L. Kelley, Judge Goldsby, G. E. Harrington, president of the Independence Stake, Bishop Richard Bullard, Bishop Ellis Short, and Apostle John W. Rushton. These addresses were interspersed with music of a very pleasing character.

While all of the addresses were spiritual and edifying, the congregation was especially pleased with the sentiments expressed by Judge Goldsby. Judge Goldsby is a member of the Methodist Church, and, we understand, was a member of the congregation from which Central Church was purchased. He expressed warm affection for and great confidence in our people, and stated that he always felt at home in Central Church.

HISTORICAL SKETCH

At this service a short historical sketch of Central Church was read by Bishop E. L. Kelley. Thinking that this would be of general interest, we reproduce it:

The Central Methodist Church Association of Kansas City, Missouri, announced its purpose of disposing of its church building, including adjoining buildings, in the summer of 1907, as the society was erecting a new building at the time on the Paseo, about two blocks away.

Bishop Short and a few others, including the writer, canvassed the proposition among ourselves and also with the trustees of the association; notwithstanding some of our own members advised against it, because at the time it would incur a heavy debt, and already there was closeness in finances because of the money panic which was giving so much uneasiness in the East. Having decided later through the especial kindness of members of the trustees of the Central Church Association that it would be practicable to handle the indebtedness, the final reference as to action to be taken was made to President Joseph Smith, at his home in Independence, Missouri. His answer came back, "If you think you can meet the indebtedness, by all means improve the opportunity, the Lord has opened the way."

A few days later, on Saturday evening, a telephone message came stating the lowest figures the property could be had for, to-wit: Twenty-one thousand, seven hundred and fifty dollars, as stated by Mr. J. S. Chick of the board of trustees of the Methodist Society; also, that Monday morning following, the proper officers would meet at the church building and complete sale to us or to another church society that was anxious to get the property. The answer was returned by phone that we would take it. Mr. Chick stated in reply: "It is sold then, for I know you will do as you agree."

"All right," was the return reply.

On Monday morning the trustees and district officers of the Methodist Church met, and although an offer of seven hundred and fifty dollars more than we had answered for was waiting from another society, a resolution was passed at once, awarding the sale to the Reorganized Church, and later, after due arrangement and examination of title to the property, on the 25th day of November, 1907, Central Methodist Church Association, a corporation under the laws of the State of Missouri, duly conveyed the property by warranty deed to E. L. Kelley, trustee, for the use and benefit of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

Amicable arrangements were made with the trustees of the Methodist Church for that society to occupy until the completion of their new church edifice, their last meeting being held February 15, 1908. On March 1, 1908, the opening of the work of the Reorganized Church took place, the exercises being in charge of Counselor Frederick M. Smith; President Joseph Smith delivered the discourse, and E. L. Kelley the opening prayer. The music was in charge of Arthur H. Mills, with a choir of about twenty voices. Paul N. Craig was organist. The sermon in the evening was by E. L. Kelley.

The first Sunday school opened March 8 under the superintendency of Arthur G. Larky. Harvey Sandy the same date was chosen president of the Religio society.

On Monday, May 4, 1908, by branch action, all meetings were removed from Wabash meeting place to Central Church at Ninth and Lydia, and carrying on the church work was referred to the general church authorities.

Elder M. H. Bond was elected to preside; Harvey Sandy, presiding priest; Seth L. Sandy, teacher; George W. Salander, deacon; A. G. Larkey, clerk; Paul N. Craig, in charge of music; D. F. Winn, was retiring pastor of Wabash church; F. M. Smith, retiring pastor of Central Church.

On Sunday morning, June 11, at eight o'clock, the first young people's prayer meeting met, fifteen present.

In November, 1908, Elder W. E. LaRue was appointed by the First Presidency to preside and take oversight of the work, and with his family he occupied the pastorate December 3, 1908, remaining until the appointment of Elder Thomas W. Williams, April, 1911. During his pastorate Sister W. N. Robinson served as chorister. May 14, 1911, Elder LaRue preached his farewell sermon.

Elder T. W. Williams was elected president May 10, 1911; with Harvey Sandy, priest; W. C. Rambo, teacher; Lot Sandy, clerk; Mrs. S. C. Diggle, chorister; Miss Amy Winning, organist.

From May till September 17, 1911, the work was carried on by the branch officers without a president present to aid. On September 17, Elder Williams arrived and remained faithfully at work until October 19, when he returned to California.

November 6, 1911, Elder W. R. Pickering was elected pastor of the branch, and superintended the work until December 7, 1911, when Elder Evan A. Davis was selected as pastor, he being the sixth to occupy in that place:

The conference of 1912 sent Elder Davis to California, and Elder J. A. Tanner was appointed by the First Presidency to take charge of the work, and on May 20, 1912, Brother Tanner was elected president of the branch, and the other branch officers were sustained. Brother Tanner and family arrived July 8, 1912, and settled in the pastorate August 12, of that year. Brother Tanner continues as pastor of the church. Fred C. Anderson is superintendent of Sunday school; F. G. Hitchcock, assistant superintendent; Joseph Tanner, secretary; Mrs. G. H. Hidy, president Religio; Mrs. O. L. James (chorister) in charge of music; Miss Elizabeth Tanner, organist.

At the present time the membership of the branch is something over four hundred.

The total receipts and collections including rentals of property are for the time $12,408.18. This includes $550 from sale of old building and lot on Wabash Street; also $10.80 sale of hymnals to Armstrong Saints. Total paid out upon property, $28,806.03. This includes all improvements, repairs, interest and furniture, amounting to $129.50 for parsonage. The net amount furnished by the church is $16,397.85. The contributions were from the Saints in Kansas City, except $2,262 from Saints in Independence, Missouri.

The evening service at 7.45 consisted of an address by Bishop E. L. Kelley, together with the usual devotional services and with special music, including anthems and solos. The musical features of the day under the leadership of Sister O. L. James were an important and pleasing part of the exercises. Although the weather was somewhat unfavorable, the attendance was excellent, and a splendid feeling of harmony, unity, thankfulness, and humility prevailed throughout the entire day.

The church thus formally and fully dedicated to the services of God forms a strong strategic point from which to work in this great city. It is our hope and expectation that it may be intelligently used in the service to which it has been dedicated, and that the congregation meeting there, under the leadership of the pastor and the branch officers associated with him, may succeed in presenting before the world the gospel as it is preached in its doctrinal form, and also in their lives such a demonstration of its power that there may be a great ingathering and addition to the kingdom of God at that place.

In a great modern city we have dedicated a church to the same God who among most primitive surroundings spoke to Moses from the burning bush. As he led the children of Israel, so may he lead us; but may we follow with greater celerity and devotion.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

UTAH IN SELF-EULOGY

A number of Brighamite periodicals are making much over the recent visit of Joseph F. Smith to Independence, Missouri, at the dedication of a new chapel built there by the Utah people. That they have been able to erect and dedicate such a building in a community from which the Saints were formerly driven seems to them to be a matter of congratulation. That Joseph F. Smith, born in Missouri in troublous days, should have been able to attend and officiate in this dedication is by the Deseret Evening News considered "a feature illustrating poetic and divine justice."

WHENCE CAME IT?

What is it that together with the arbitrants of time has brought about this reversal of sentiment in Jackson County, Missouri? Is it the disregard for law of both God and man, for a long time known to exist in Utah, and a few years ago confessed to before a committee of the Senate of the United States? Or is it the law-abiding conduct of the Reorganized Saints as they have sought to honor the counsels of God in gathering together to Zion, as the feelings of the people and preparation of their own part would allow? Let answer the nation-wide propaganda against Utahism, which has come to recognize the integrity of the Reorganization, expressing in very many instances the sentiment set forth by Senators Burrows and Dubois in the Reed Smoot case before the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections:

In order to induce his followers more readily to accept this infamous doctrine, Brigham Young himself invoked the name of Joseph Smith, the Martyr, whom many sincerely believed to be a true prophet, and ascribed to him the reception of a revelation from the Almighty in 1843, commanding the Saints to take unto themselves a multiplicity of wives, limited in number only by the measures of their desires. . . . Such the

It is only fair, I think, for me to say—and I am glad the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. Burrows) treated upon it the other day—that there is a branch of the “Mormons,” called the “Josephites,” who ought to be separated clearly in the minds of all Senators from the Brighamite “Mormons.” . . . The Josephite “Mormons,” with their headquarters at Lamoni, in the State of Iowa, and wherever they are, no matter in what part of the country, are among the best of our citizens in all respects.—Congressional Record, December 17, 1906.

A CONTRAST

The Utah people build a church at Independence. Their dignitaries, with much pomp and display, attend personally upon its dedication. And is there favorable comment? Only in the self-expressed eulogy of the Brighamite press, such as appears in the Deseret Evening News, as follows:

The child [Joseph F. Smith] who came into the world under such pitiful conditions has been spared to become a man of might and influence, his name known throughout the civilized world, and his character for integrity and uprightness recognized and honored by all honest men everywhere.

President Joseph Smith, of the Reorganized Church, passes peacefully away at his modest home in Independence, and kindly appreciation of his life and the institution to which he had faithfully given the same is extended upon every hand, and feeling expressed in the editorial columns of the Kansas City Journal for December 12, recently reproduced in the HERALD, and which concludes with the eulogy:

Perhaps nothing could give a clearer insight into the character of Joseph Smith than the directions which he issued shortly before his death in respect to his funeral. Disliking nothing so much, next to sham, as ostentation, he directed that his funeral should be conducted with the utmost simplicity, without any of the elaborateness which his followers would otherwise have provided in order to testify to the honor in which they held him. He was the prophet, but first of all he was the Christian gentleman and the good citizen. As such he lived, as such he died, as such he will be remembered by all outside the household of his faith. His followers themselves can have no legacy of remembrance more honorable than this appraisal of the people among whom he lived and labored so many years. Kindly, cheerful, loyal to his own creed, tolerant of those of others, standing for modesty, simplicity, good citizenship, embodying in his private and public life all the virtues which adorn a character worthy of emulation—such is the revelation which Joseph Smith leaves to the world, as the real interpretation of an ecclesiastical message translated into terms of human character.

RETURN, OH, ISRAEL!

It must be known in Utah, as it is known elsewhere, that silence in the former instance and general and favorable mention in the latter is the key to the matter of public sentiment throughout the country. Yet the people of Utah have the face for self-congratulation, and would impress their constituency with the idea that Jackson County, Missouri, and other communities stand open-armed, to receive in full confidence Utah and her representatives, that is, “all honest men” and communities do.

The HERALD stands for tolerance and freedom of conscience. We would not exclude from any community law-abiding representatives of the Utah or any other faith. We hail with zest and gladness the opportunity of a comparative exposition in Jackson County of the teachings and virtues of the institutions under consideration. But when it comes to a matter of public sentiment and institutional standing, with others, we have nothing in common with the Utah system, and know, as all observing men know, that if Utah is to command the respect and confidence which they already claim for themselves it will be in the day when they discard their departures and come back to the original tenets and virtues of the Palmyra Seer. If there is doubt of this on the part of any of Utah, it may be driven away by removing a polygamous family to Independence for residence, or to any place else in the country not under Utah control.

CURRENT EVENTS SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

LORDS ADJOURN.—The English House of Lords adjourned on the 8th until February 2, when they will reassemble.

IMMIGRATION BILL.—The House and Senate conferees on the immigration bill have agreed to eliminate the negro exclusion provision, and the provision exempting Belgian farmers from the literacy test.

FOLLOWING STRIKE.—Following the calling off of the miners' strike in Colorado, a number of strikers have been reported reemployed, and the operators have conceded to the men the right to select their own checkweighmen.

FAMINE IN CHINA.—Famine in some Chinese provinces, caused by loss of trade with Europe incident to the war, is already so severe that wives and children are reported being sold to alleviate suffering described as “heartrending.”

NAVAL BILL.—The Naval Bill, submitted to the House on the 13th would provide 2 battleships, 6 torpedo boat destroyers, 17 submarines, aggregating an approximate expenditure of $148,000,000, $21,906,000 of which would be for that part of the construction to be completed next year.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE DEFEATED.—The Mondell resolution for an amendment to the Constitution granting women the ballot was defeated in the House on the 12th by a vote of 204 to 174. On March 19 last, an amendment in the Senate lost by a vote of 35 to 34, a two thirds majority being required. Opposition to the resolution was based largely on the argument that for the Federal Government to proscribe qualifications for suffrage would be an invasion on States' rights to control their elections.

HATTERS' CASE.—The Supreme Court has affirmed the judgment for two hundred fifty-two thousand, one hundred thirty dollars awarded D. E. Loewe and Company, under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, against one hundred eighty-six members of the United Hatters of America. The case has been in the courts since 1904. The original verdict was rendered in 1912 and reaffirmed in October of the same year. To pay the award the homes of a number of men have been levied on.

ELECTION FRAUD.—Eighty of one hundred fourteen defendants before Judge A. B. Anderson, at Indianapolis, Indiana, on the 12th plead guilty to Federal Grand Jury indictments alleging fraud in the November election. Eight of the eighty were present and former employees of the Terre Haute city administration. Eight plead not guilty, the remaining twenty-six, including Mayor M. Roberts, Circuit Judge Eli H. Redman, City Judge Thomas Smith, and Sheriff Dennis Shea, filing demurrers.

DISASTROUS EARTHQUAKE.—A disastrous earthquake, reported second only to that of Messina in 1908, occurred in central Italy on the 13th, resulting in fifty thousand estimated killed and injured. At Avezzano where the shock was most severe there are thought to be twelve thousand casualties. A large area was affected, much property destroyed, and many are left homeless. The American Red Cross will cable $20,000 to the Italian Red Cross and will ask President Wilson to issue an appeal to the people of the United States for funds to aid the sufferers.

EMPLOYMENT BUREAU.—A national employment bureau is being established by the Department of Labor. Applications for work and workers will be received by postmasters and forwarded to labor department agents in charge of the various zones. The distribution branch of the Immigration Bureau will receive these applications, and will also be informed by Department of Agriculture agents of sections needing help. Through this branch of the Immigration Bureau, applicants will be apprised of places where they can secure work, the postal service acting as a collecting and distributing agency for applications and replies.

ENGLAND ANSWERS PROTEST.—On the 8th Secretary Bryan announced that Great Britain had filed a preliminary reply to the protest of the United States Government in the matter of interference with American trade at sea. The United States concedes the right of search for contraband shipments, but contends that England can not lawfully take to port vessels for more extended examination. Great Britain concedes that relations between neutral nations should be those of normal times of peace; refers to irregularities by United States shippers; and promises redress whenever action may unintentionally exceed the provisions of international law. The British note is considered friendly.

MOTHER TEACHERS RETAINED.—By decision of Commissioner of Education, John H. Finley, of New York, Mrs. Bridget Peixotto, a teacher who became a mother while absent without leave, and who was dismissed by the New York City Board of Education for neglect of duty, is ordered reinstated. Five other mother teachers are under this decision reinstated. Mrs. Peixotto had carried her case to the courts, and the court of appeals had ruled that the determination of the question involved rested with the Commissioner of Education, from whom there is no appeal. Commissioner Finley in his conclusion said:

It is difficult to conceive how a reasonable, unwillful absence, due to natural, unavoidable cause, could be construed as neglect of duty; and it is difficult to understand why an absence for the most creditable social reason should be so treated.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—Under instruction from Villa, General Maytorena has signed the agreement, already signed by General Hill, to prevent further fighting along the international border. The Washington administration has protested the threatened closing of the oil wells in the vicinity of Tampico by Carranza authorities for refusal of the operators to pay assessments levied. Villa forces have taken Saltillo from a Carranza army, and Carranza forces have withdrawn from Monterey. It is announced from Mexico City that the national convention has with the full approval of Villa reappointed General Guitierrez provisional president. Guitierrez is said to have reported to this convention an agreement of all armed groups which practically solves the Mexican problem of pacification.

EUROPEAN WAR.—Renewed activity has developed in the western theater of war. The allies early in the week made advances north of Soissons and near Reims, later withdrawing slightly north of Soissons from before a violent German attack. Germany claims slight gains in the Argonne, and along the Meuse. Germany has checked advances along the coast, and with reinforcements regained some ground near Neuport. Russia has advanced in Galicia, controlling practically all the territory except fortified towns, is threatening Hungary, and claims gains in eastern Prussia. Desperate fighting has been resumed in Poland, where the Germans have made gains on the Russian center. Considerable action is reported in the Caucasian regions. The Turks deny having been defeated here by the Russians. Servia is said to be attacking Austria with renewed vigor. Activity on the part of the Russian fleet in the Baltic Sea is reported, resulting in the damaging of Turk-

HEALTH HINTS

NUMBER 1.—FOOD

BY W. A. SINCLAIR, M. D.

[The series of four articles including this one and three to follow, appeared some years ago in Autumn Leaves. They were not prepared by Elder Sinclair to be published in serial form. They are reproduced here as being suggestive as to means of conserving health. Following this article will be installments on "Sleep," "Sunshine," and "Good Temper." —EDITORS.]

Considering the fact that man by habit is omnivorous (eats all kinds of foods), almost as much so as the pig, and that he eats about eight hundred pounds of food, exclusive of fluids, annually, it ought to surprise no one when I say that many derangements of the blood arise from the use of improper food. Look how directly the food goes into the blood, then see how directly it goes to the manufacture of bone, muscle, nerve, etc.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, in the North American Review, has presented this change very happily, when he says:

If the reader of this paper lives another year his self-conscious principle will have migrated from its present tenement to another, the raw materials even of which are not yet put together. A portion of that body of his which is to be will ripen in the corn of his next harvest. Another portion of his future person he will purchase, or others will purchase for him, headed up in the form of certain barrels of potatoes. A third fraction is yet to be gathered in the southern rice field. The limbs with which he is then to walk will be clad with flesh borrowed from the tenants of many stalls and pastures, now unconscious of their doom. The very organ of speech, with which he is to talk so wisely, plead so eloquently, or speak so effectively, must first serve his humble brethren to bleat, to bellow, and for all the varied utterance of the bristled or feathered barnyard life. A bag of phosphate of lime which he has ordered from Professor Mapes for his grounds, contains a large part of that which is to be his skeleton, and more than all this, by far the greater part of his body is nothing after all but water, and the main substance of his scattered members is to be looked for in the reservoir, in the running streams, at the bottom of the well, in the clouds that float over his head, or diffuse among them all.

The rapidity with which the food of to-day is incorporated into the body of to-morrow should make us prudent in what we eat, if we would preserve our blood from impurity, and the atoms composing our bodies from disease. How prudent the human family is, may be seen by sitting at the table of various people, civilized and barbarous.

A VARIETY OF DISHES

At home we are treated to all sorts of dishes, seasoned with condiments, and saturated with the oleaginous juices of swine. A fashionable dinner comprises about three courses of different animal food; in some cases turtle soup, then fish of some kind, then roast beef or turkey, with side dishes of mutton or lamb, veal or pork, etc. It can not, perhaps, be demonstrated, but is it not reasonable to suppose that each one of these meats possesses a latent magnetism, as individual in its character as when animated by life? If so, the stomachs of some people have every day to conciliate and make up a happy family of a great diversity of magnetic elements. To live fashionably is to live improperly.

Now let us step intrusively into the kitchens of our neighbors. John Chinaman feasts his stomach on cats, dogs, wharf-rats, sea-slugs, sharks, bats, and caterpillar soup. Australians, and many other people, eat snakes, kangaroo-rats, mice, maggots, etc. The Japanese prefer green peaches, apricots and plums, to ripe ones, as an offset, I suppose, to our eating green cucumbers. A traveler among the Indians of the Rocky Mountains, or a guest of the people of Zanzibar, will smack his astonished lips over puppy stew, without knowing what it is made of. One who visits Africa may have a plate of tender young monkey; while the people of the Arctics treat their visitors to a diet of putrid seal's flesh, putrid whale's tail, reindeer's chyle, train-oil, whale's skin, and partially hatched eggs. The native of Surinam eats toads. And the Hottentot considers roasted caterpillars to be savory as sugared cream.

Frogs are eaten by the French, by the Chinese, and by many people in both Europe and America. The French have lately taken to eating snails, having found their flavor superior to that of frogs. One hundred thousand are daily supplied to Paris by Burgundy and Champagne alone. On the maguey plant in Mexico, a large yellow worm thrives, which the native Indians eat, and call the dish maguey butter. In brief, among the many strange things used as food, not already mentioned, may be named: elephant, hippopotamus, giraffe, zebra, antelope, wild ants, leopard, lion, alligator, crocodile, eggs of reptiles, lizard, wildcat, panther, wolf, opossum, muskrat, rat's brains, porcupine, bird's nest, locust, grasshopper, spider, and nearly every insect; and the Chinamen are so given to domestic economy as to eat the chrysalis of the silkworm after the cocoon has been wound off. General Charles Napoleon Achille Muret, son of the great French general, who spent the closing years of his life in Florida, and who had tried all sorts of eating, declared as follows:

Horse flesh, good. Dog, fox, and cat, only middling. Skunk, tolerably good. Hawk, first-rate. Crow, second-rate. Pigeon, jaybird, and blackbird, tolerable, and, though I have no prepossession, buzzard is not good.

Now, nearly all the foregoing animals, insects, etc., contain the true constituents of food, and many of them are not unwholesome. Some, indeed, which seem revolting to an educated taste, are better and purser for aliment than others which we regard as above criticism. To sustain life, we simply need food which possesses saccharine, oleaginous, albuminous, and gelatinous properties, combined with a proper admixture of salt, sulphur, iron, lime, and phosphorus. But what we should do is to avoid food which, possessing all the necessary elements, is also tainted by disease.

PORK

One of the most common causes of blood impurities is the use of pork. It has been said that all things were created for some wise purpose. This is undoubtedly true, but hogs were never made to eat. We read that Christ used them to drown devils; they can never be appropriated to a more beneficent use. As an article of diet, pork exerts a most pernicious influence on the blood, overloading it with carbonic acid gas, and filling it with scrofula. The hog is not a healthy animal. From its birth it is an inveterate gormandizer, and to satisfy its eternal craving for food, everything in field or gutter, however filthy, finds lodgment in its capacious stomach. It eats filth, and wallows in its filth, and is itself but a living mass of filth. When, therefore, it is remembered that all our limbs and organs have been picked up from our plates—that our bodies are made up of the things we have eaten—what pork-eater will congratulate himself with the reflection, that according to physiological teachings he is physically part hog?

We have been served up at the table many times over. Every individual is literally a mass of vivified viands; he is an epitome of innumerable meals; he has dined upon himself, supped upon himself, and, in fact—paradoxical as it may appear—has again and again leaped down his own throat.

From the earliest history of swine, they have been regarded as more subject to scrofula than any other animal. This disease, so peculiar to the hog, before it received a name, so far antedated the same disease in the human family that when it did make its appearance in the latter it was named after the Greek name of swine as best expressing its character. There are various diseases peculiar to certain animals. Scrofula is the prevailing disease among swine. The diseases affecting other animals than swine are usually such as to condemn them before they reach the shambles of the butcher; and the law treats with severity all venders of diseased meats, with the exception of pork dealers. This is partly because the scrofula of the hog can not always be readily detected, and in a measure owing to the indifference of pork eaters to the known presence of tubercles, tumors, etc., in pork. To what extent the flesh of various animals may be affected by these diseases to which they are subject can hardly be determined, but Professor Gamgee affirms "that one fifth of the common meat of Great Britain—beef, veal, mutton, and lamb—is diseased; while Professor Gerlach states that in Berlin at least as much diseased as healthy meat is consumed." It is apparent, however, that when scrofula may be communicated simply by habitual contact with a scrofulous person, the contact of scrofulous food with the mouth and stomach must inevitably inoculate the system of the imprudent eater. One fact regarding pork is well known to all physiologists. It is, with few exceptions, the most indigestible food that can be taken into the stomach.

Again, pork is charged with being wormy. It killed a great many persons in Germany, and not a few in other countries, including our own. Scientists on both sides of the Atlantic, after examining the flesh of porkers with the microscope, found he possessed imps of probably the same devils which were cast into his progenitors on the hillside. They are called trichinæ, and the disease they produce in man is denominated trichiniasis. The parasites are so minute that they can make their way to any part of the system. This perforation of parts by millions of microscopic worms is attended with symptoms more or less violent, depending upon their numbers, and the strength and health of the victim. As the worms make their way into the muscle, pains like those of rheumatism, cramps, weakness, or entire loss of power resembling paralysis, ensue; and when the number of trichinæ are large, wasting, exhaustion, and death follow. Persons escaping with few of these disagreeable tenants suffer in a smaller degree from similar symptoms, but gradually recover, and a small portion of their muscles, removed and magnified, reveal the trichinæ arrived at their destination, and undergoing the various stages of calcareous encrustment.

It is related of Doctor Adam Clark, that he had a strong aversion to pork, and that on an occasion when asked to say grace at dinner, where the principal dish was roast pig, he said: "Oh, Lord! if thou canst bless under the gospel what thou didst curse under the law, bless the pig."

RELATIVE FOOD VALUES

As a rule the flesh of herbivorous (feeding on herbage) is more wholesome than that of carnivorous (feeding on flesh) or omnivorous animals. The use of animal food of every kind has been pronounced injurious to many; but I am fully persuaded that its moderate use is attended with no physical injury. Almost everywhere it is used to excess. Too much animal food inflames the system, and overloads the blood with the red corpuscles. In our climate, and the southern latitudes, little or none should be used in summer, and in winter sparingly, as there is enough heat-producing food, of a vegetable character, to impart sufficient warmth to those preferring vegetable diet. According to the investigation of Leibig, and other celebrated chemists, peas, beans, and lentils contain more of the blood-forming principle to the pound than meat; wheat meal contains about half as much; and oatmeal, barley meal, stale bread, and maize meal, about half as much; and when we seek the heat-forming principle, potatoes contain more than meat, while bread, peas, lentils, barley, beans, sago, maize, oatmeal, and rice yield double and triple the supply to the pound than animal food does. Nearly all vegetables provided for the table contain more solid matter to the pound than meat possesses.

Grease is supplied quite too abundantly for the table to preserve the purity of the blood. Weak stomachs call loudly for reform in this particular, while strong ones faithfully perform their work of sending the offending substance to the vascular system, to feed or create humors. Fat is not digested in the stomach, but simply melted and absorbed into the blood. A certain amount is necessary to nourish the brain, and save the wear and tear of the nervous system; but fatty meats and rich gravies are positively injurious. Eggs, milk, butter, and vegetables yielding oil furnish all the oleaginous substance necessary to carry on the processes of nature.

THE EFFECTS OF DIET

Diet exercises such an influence upon us all, physically and morally, too much care can not be observed as to the quality of the food we eat, and the regularity with which it is taken.

Much of our conduct depends upon the character of the food we eat. Bonaparte used to attribute the loss of one of his battles to a poor dinner, which at the time disturbed his digestion. How many of our misjudgments, how many of our deliberate errors, how many of our unkindnesses, our cruelties, our acts of thoughtlessness and recklessness, may be actually owing to a cause of the same character?

Late and hearty suppers are to be condemned,—active digestion and sleep mutually disturb each other, as at night the exhalation of carbonic acid is lowest, and tissue changes most retarded. The overloaded blood is not relieved, and invades the repose of the brain, producing heavy, disordered dreams, and nightmare, followed by headache and ill humor in the morning. Still, there is the opposite extreme of sitting up late and going to bed wearied, hungry, and with an indefinite sense of sinking, followed by restless, unrefreshing sleep. A little light nourishment in such cases, a couple of hours before retiring, may prevent these unpleasant effects.

To sum up: People must be more careful what they eat; at what times they eat; how much they eat, if they would preserve the healthy condition of the vascular and nervous systems. There can be no precise rule laid down for the governing of all. A little careful observation, however, would teach everyone of mature age what is best adapted to his peculiar organization.

THE HOUSE OF GOD

For a scriptural reading your attention is called to Matthew 6: 24-30 inclusive:

No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye can not serve God and mammon. Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment? Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they? Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature? And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: and yet I say unto you, That even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?

For a basic thought, or scriptural text, your attention is called to Psalm 127: 1: "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it."

If I thought that the statement here had reference to a structure of this kind, I would give but little attention to it. But when the Psalmist says, "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it," I think that he has reference to the great house of God, his church, and except God should build that we but labor in vain; for unless we are laborers together with God, our labor amounts to nothing. And methinks this is one of the striking reasons why there is so much religious teaching in the world that contains so little spirituality, if I may give expression to such a thought without being thought to be judging the case. There is not enough dependence upon God. We seek to perform the labor without relying upon him.

If I thought to-day that the congregation instrumental in erecting this structure worship the building, or were in any sense making an idol of it, I would have but little faith in that congregation being able to accomplish anything. For I well remember how that in their love for ornamentation, the beauty of the structure and the real ornate conditions belonging thereto, the disciples took Jesus out to behold the temple. They were proud of it. They looked upon the magnificent structure that had already been some forty-six years in building, and they permitted the vanity of their minds to get the better of them with reverence to this huge structure of stone and mortar rather than to feel that it was but emblematical, in a very small degree, of the great building whose framer and maker is God—his church. And until in the very depths of our religious precepts we shall take hold of that immediate fact, we shall not, we can not, have a true comprehension of our duty toward both God and man.

CONSIDER THE LILIES

Could we but reach a true comprehension of that which was so beautifully expressed by the Master, "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin"; and yet Solomon in all his glory, with all the beauty, all the grandeur of his ornamentation, the mighty buildings, the groves in the high places surrounded by all the forces of humanity, with all the pride, with all the honor, clothed with the purple and the linen—and yet in it all he was not arrayed like one of these!

What is the difference to your minds this morning of this striking contrast? It is this: He in the pride, vanity, pompousness of his heart and soul, had turned after the vanities of life; the lily, growing in the field, surrounded by nature in all its beautiful acclaim, was but clothed in harmony with the law of its being, and in consequence thereof, that lily was arrayed more gloriously in the grand beauty of simplicity and harmony of its willingness to yield obedience to the law governing its being. And, oh, if we would but take the lesson and give heed thereto!

It is well said that fine feathers do not make fine birds. And well do I remember awaiting a train that I might pass along the highway to my destination, beholding a creature of God's creation, but who had for some reason,—the reason doubtless was that she had yielded obedience to the behests of fashion, dame fashion,—bedecked herself in such a peculiar style that I could but feel that she had made a serious blunder as per consequence of the manner in which she had arrayed herself. One had almost to be told to know that it was a human being; and I wondered, not very much, however, if God could really look upon the creation of fashion's demand and say, in this particular instance, that she was better arrayed than was the lily? Never! never! and there is where the serious mistake comes, in the seeking to so clothe ourselves in harmony with the demands of fashion, that we forget the beauty of the clothing of humility and of a sound mind and are carried away to the realm of sham, forgetful of the things of life and the law of our being, that if lived up to, would place us side by side, in the beauty of ornate conditions, with the lilies of the field.

But the Master asked us to consider how they grow. They do not care that we trust in them. They do not care to grow as we sometimes undertake to make ourselves grow! And I have said at times that had such and such a creature have been so born, he or she would have spent untold thousands to have obtained the privilege of the natural and created condition and the which no array of adornment can possibly improve, save that in the sense of a humble covering in our present and unnatural state comeliness makes but her rightful demands.

A HOME FOR SERVICE

Somebody says, "What has all this to do with the dedication of a house?" Simply this, that in the dedicating or setting apart this building to the worship of God, the thought is, as expressed by the Psalmist, that except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it. God builded our physical beings; we can not improve them. And all our toil, all our money, all the expenditures of whatever nature, all the worry, until the final completion of this building, has simply been in vain if in its construction we have simply thought of the building rather than the great fact underlying such construction, that of true service in the sight of God, as a home, a place where we can render that service.

These nails may rust and go into utter oblivion; these walls may crumble to dust; this wood may in turn rot; these panes of glass may be broken into a thousand fragments; and yet if beyond it all, underneath it all, with the first thought of construction and throughout all the various ramifications, we have not thought of the greater fact, that this is but emblematical of a desire to put ourselves more nearly in attunement with God, then our labor, our toil, our work shall have been in vain. And if, when the building had been completed and the last dollar had been paid for its construction, there was one taint of false pride, one taint of false vanity, one taint of selfishness, then the construction had not done for us all that should have been accomplished. And if there were to be found one taint of jealousy, one taint of animosity, one taint of false pride, one taint of evil in the concept of our minds anywhere, all that should have been has not been reached.

This church home, though small, obscure, and though it may be pointed at with the finger of scorn by some who may worship in cathedrals, is not a home in the true spiritual sense unless within its walls, we, in the true spirit of humility, can worship God in spirit and in truth. And, oh, I care not for the humble surroundings; I care not for the simplicity of the structure that my pride should be humbled thereby; I care not that upon its outside or inside there can be found no ornate conditions; that for which I do care, which concerns my soul, is that as worshipers within it we may worship truly, remembering the while to put ourselves into complete correspondence with God, that in deed and in truth we will become laborers together with him. And to the extent that we fail, to that extent will we come short of receiving the blessing.

THE WAY TO GOD

So first, then, I would impress, and oh, may God help it to go home to everyone, the great and solemn necessity of worshiping God in the spirit of true humility, in the spirit of true sobriety, in the spirit of true soundness of mind, in the spirit of the kind of worship that God demands at our hands, and all whether man shall point the finger of scorn, or whether the scoffs of the world shall be arrayed against the utmost efforts to climb onward and upward until the attunement of the highest that God wants has been attained, all regardless as to what the world may say or do. The world with all its worth, with all its magnificence, with all its grandeur and glory and skill, can not save. God, and God alone can save. And under the great fact of that law of life that puts us in touch with the divine will, he will save, and only will he save. And there is the great and important factor in our worship, as to the kind that should be exercised within this building.

I can not have the red corpuscles coursing my veins, I can not have these red corpuscles unless there shall be a compliance with the law of physical hygiene. I have no right to make claim upon life, if, day by day, I shall be transgressing the law of my being! I have no right to lay claim upon God unless I shall put myself in correspondence with him! I have no right to expect healthful spirituality, or the spirituality of health, unless I shall put myself in harmony with the law of spiritual hygienics, the law that God gave and that was so perfect as to robe those lilies of the field in grander magnificence than was Solomon in all his glory! Oh, if we could but stop to think, stop to consider, and under the operation of such consideration but put ourselves in an attunement with God. All these singers full well know, and they will pardon my personal allusion, that unless they shall yield obedience to the law of music they can not put themselves in harmony with the law of attunement, and that where attunement is lacking the law of discord prevails, and where discord is had unity never can be realized.

I do not care where you go, in what realm you may occupy, it is just the same. And shall we say that when it comes to the question of putting ourselves in attunement with God that we can do it in our way, in my way, or must there of necessity be a given law by which the result is obtained?

Let us consider Jesus as he was about to take his departure to the realms of glory. Just prior to that ascension he uttered this wonderful declaration, "They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover." And directly in harmony with that thought comes his worthy brother, James, as follows: "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him."

Suppose now that I stand before you and say that I am in harmony with the word of God and that I am seeking to fully comport my life in harmony therewith, and on the other hand say that there is no use, though suffering and languishing with pain, excruciatingly so, to send for the elders to pray over me, it will not do a particle of good; and having thus uttered a declaration of that kind, in the succeeding breath suppose I were to give utterance to this thought, "Oh, I believe in God with all my might, my mind and my strength!" Could I under such conditions feel that I was harmonizing myself with God?

I am frank to confess to you that I know not why it was commanded that these mortal hands should be laid upon an individual after such individual has been anointed with oil. It is enough for me to know that such is the command without stopping to inquire as to why God did not institute some other means. I do not profess to understand wherein the divine revelation is fully comprehended in the fact of my going to God and talking with him in the method we call prayer. But, notwithstanding my ignorance, the confession is yet made unto you that this opinion is held that until a full compliance with the promise of Christ and the command of his brother is had there is no reason to expect the results thus promised to follow; that, on the other hand, if not complying there is reason to expect the result to fail.

I know full well that were I to seat myself at that piano and seek to manipulate those keys with these fingers and thumbs that there would be an inharmony of sound, a discord that would no doubt cause a serious quaking along the vertebræ of your spinal column. And why? No attunement; plenty of discord! And how shall I stand here in the face of that simple illustration and say that I can put myself in attunement with God and yet not comply with the commandment given? Those who have occupied at the piano this morning as well as those who have occupied in rendering the harmony of the song service are such as have yielded obedience to the law governing, and have thus been prepared to give unto us a healthful harmony in music and in song. And can I expect the results to accrue, the blessing of health through healing, and yet stand aside and say, No, sir; I will not send for the elders, it is not for me?

Why, bless your souls, there have been times in my life when I have been making arguments along lines of Bible declaration and have quoted that very passage of scripture, "They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover," and my opponent has said, "Oh, you must be a 'Mormon'!" You see he did not believe that kind of a doctrine and thought that only "Mormons" did! And when he was told that I was not a "Mormon" he has said, "But you must be, for you believe in the Book of Mormon." I then asked him, "Do you believe in the Bible?" "Oh, yes." "Well, you must be a Bible then!" We should be very careful as to how we call names with reference to anybody's faith, no matter as to how ridiculous it may seem to us. We ought to occupy a higher plane than that, and we will never be men and women in Christ until we do.

GOD BUILDS HIS HOUSE

So then I would seek to impress this greater thought upon your minds, that except God build the house, we labor in vain that build it. And in the construction of the church or house, of which this building is but a mere semblance, an offering to God by setting it apart in service to him, we should feel the necessity of a true occupancy in his sight. And when by song, sermon and prayer we thus consecrate, it should be with the view that there shall be found no discord within the edifice, no wrangling, no bickerings or evils of any kind. We should arise above these things and overcome these petty faults. If we do these things we can not expect the grace of God to be with us.

Mind you, I did not say, If you do it, but if we do it! I hope the thought is not in the minds of any of you this morning, "I am glad that such an one is here; he needs to catch it," for if that is the way we feel, then we will not be putting ourselves in harmony with God. The rather had we better to think, "That is right, give it to us!" Then will we put ourselves in harmony with true humility, and thus enter into an attunement with God and be prepared to worship him in harmony with the Spirit of truth, the Comforter.

We believe in the laying on of hands for the blessing of little children; we believe in the laying on of hands for confirming men and women, thus setting them apart unto the reception of the Holy Ghost; we believe in the laying on of hands for setting men apart unto the service of the ministry. We believe that repentance should precede baptism for the remission of sins; that repentance is to be preceded by true faith. We believe in the resurrection of the dead, both of the just and of the unjust, as well as in a final judgment whereby we will receive the reward of glory or punishment, as the case may be. And unless we shall be in attunement with God we can not put ourselves in harmony with him, and therefore we shall not be laborers together with him; consequently unless God shall build the house we shall labor in vain.

We should have this purpose in mind when we come here to worship God in spirit and in truth. We should come here with the idea of such worship lest that which we do shall sink into utter oblivion. And so worshiping God we will be able to rise higher and higher in the scale of a true harmony with God. For it is in this way we may overcome the mistakes, and yielding obedience to the law governing draw nearer and nearer to the eternal throne by putting ourselves to the test in the school of spirituality, by which we shall reach that grand harmonious condition wherein there will be no contention, no strife, no evil of any kind.

Let there be within these walls that construction of true character, that spirit of sociability, of love for others, that those not of our faith and who may have desire to come here to worship, may feel free in their occupancy. In fact, we believe in a free pulpit and an open Bible, without reference to the faith of others, believing that all have the right to worship in harmony with the dictates of their conscience. And I do thank God that thus far in the life of our organization that has been our position all along, and that as our creed we have proclaimed, "All truth," believing that though crushed to earth truth will rise again. Let truth come from whence it will, it is truth just the same, because the "eternal years of God are hers."

May God so help us that our lives may reach that excellent condition, a perfect attunement with him . . . that finally we shall come off more than conqueror with him, is my prayer.

PALESTINE TO BE FREE?

LONDON, December 4.—One result of the present war may be the realization of the dream of centuries past—the setting up of Palestine as an independent Jewish state. Both England and Russia will favor the project, says the London Globe—England because a small neutral state in the Holy Land will be the best possible protection to Suez and Egypt, Russia because it will make the way easier for it to settle certain Jewish problems within her own borders. Continuing, the Globe says:

The events of the moment show how immediately Egyptian integrity is imperiled by the fact that a right of way through Palestine is open to a hostile power. Palestine must become either British or neutral. There is an obvious political objection to a British occupation. Neutrality is the more desirable solution.

DREAM TO COME TRUE

But if Palestine is to become neutral, who is to govern it? Directly that question is raised, the claim of the Jews forces itself upon our attention.

We have to deal with the remarkable fact that a people which lost its country over two thousand years ago still cherishes the memory of that loss, and links the hope of recovery with its deepest religious instincts.

Here, then, we have two influences at work for the reestablishment of a Jewish state—the British desire for a neutral Palestine and the territorial instinct of the Jews themselves. There is a third influence. Russia has pledged itself to the reestablishment of an autonomous Poland under the Czar. But in Poland, as we know it now, there is one obvious obstacle to the development of a Polish state strong in its national consciousness, and that is the presence of a large Jewish element.

FITS IN WITH THE CZAR'S PLANS

All who know Russian Poland will agree that a settlement of the Jewish question is essential to the complete success of the great scheme to which Russia is pledged, and will recognize that it is precisely to the Polish Jews that the reconstitution of the Jewish state would make the strongest appeal.—Kansas City Star, December 5, 1914.

WAR'S DISRUPTION OF RELIGIOUS WORK

Fears were expressed at the beginning of the war that the various missionary enterprises of the world might be seriously affected. These fears have been more than realized, it appears, and the missionary situation becomes more and more acute. One of the most serious spiritual effects, says The Missionary Review of the World (New York, December), is the dismemberment of many international Christian organizations. "The Christian Endeavors of different lands have been obliged to break off friendly correspondence and to become enemies." Over two hundred thousand members of the Young Men's Christian Association are in the various armies of Europe, reports Doctor John R. Mott, and there is scarcely a secretary not under arms. The Geneva association presents the most poignant case. At the outbreak of the war its three secretaries separated, one to fight under the German colors, one under the French, and the third to stand and wait with the Swiss troops. The survey of conditions continues:

Sunday school workers have been closely united all over the world and met last year at Zurich. In 1916 they planned to have a convention in Japan, but to-day many of their members are under arms and under oath to kill one another. . . .

The Continuation Committee of the Edinburgh Missionary Conference is split into British, German, and French factions, and only God by his love and power can weld them together again. . . .

In France it is said that two hundred and eighty of the four hundred and fifty pastors of the National Union of Reformed Churches were liable to service when the war broke out. This leaves, therefore, half the churches of Protestant France, for the time being, pastorless.

Even in the neutral lands the deadly conflict has a spiritual as well as a material effect. Doctor Walling Clark, for twenty-five years a Methodist missionary in Italy, reports that in spite of Italy's neutrality, commercial and industrial activities throughout the land are paralyzed. Factories are closed and printing houses have reduced their corps of workmen by one half. This means that vast numbers of laborers have been turned out of employment. Multitudes of Italians have also returned to their native land from the countries at war, and they are absolutely without means of support. Doctor Clark continues:

"It is significant that the people in Italy are flocking to the churches everywhere—both Protestants and Roman Catholic. Even men of high social and government positions are turning their attention to spiritual things, and a wave of religious faith is sweeping over all the people. After the war is ended, I believe that one result of the conflict will be the moral and spiritual transformation of the entire Continent."

As to the effect of the war on the Russian Empire, Mrs. Bertha A. Pancake writes through the Methodist Board of Foreign Missions that words fail to describe the depressing effect upon everyone. A large number of Methodist preachers have been called to the colors. Some foreigners, loyal to Russia, and who have lived for many years in Petrograd, were obliged to leave their families and go into exile because they had neglected to take out papers of citizenship.

One of the strange ironies of the war is the situation created for German missionaries, a large proportion of whose work is situated within the limits of the British Empire. As we read: . . .

Concerning the effect of the war in German colonies the Basel Mission reports to its friends in a circular letter: "The first effect of the war in Germany, and the mobilization in Switzerland, was the emptying of our mission house. Nearly all the brethren, so far as they were of German or Swiss nationality, were called to arms, including the brethren who were ordained for the foreign field at the last mission feast. When the youngest were called out with the Landsturm, only eight or ten were left of the one hundred and twenty-one mission students.

"Another effect of the war is the interruption of intercourse with our mission fields. No one can be sent out or brought back, though many missionaries are greatly in need of rest. Correspondence is greatly hindered. This is the more serious as our brethren have to suffer directly or indirectly from war conditions. Togo already has been torn for the present from the German Empire, and a similar fate is threatened Kamerun. It is very uncertain what conquering England or France will do with our missionaries. The position is also uncertain in the English colonies. Even if our missionaries should not be expelled they will be put under severe control. Money can not be got to them at all. A third effect is financial. Present business conditions make it very hard for the mission to meet all the expenses."—Literary Digest, December 12, 1914.

REASON FOR LIQUOR CRUSADE

Why this Nation-wide fight against alcoholic liquor and for the prohibition of its manufacture and sale?

It is not primarily to close saloons and to prevent men from using liquor.

1. It is a response to humanity's call for a higher civilization.

2. It is a part of man's effort to become what God would have him be.

3. It is a portion of twentieth century Christianity's program for man's social betterment.

4. It is the swinging of the pendulum from the material to the moral development of the race, as humanity's first duty.

5. It is a modern realization that personal character makes national greatness.

6. It is a determination to cultivate the soul of man, and subordinate and control his appetites and passions.

7. It is a crusade to preserve a race virile in body and brain, and to prevent racial degeneration.

8. It is an acknowledgment that children are our most important crop, and youth our best capital.

9. It is a supreme effort to preserve the health and life of the people from the destructive power of the poison of alcohol.

10. It is a great social crusade to prevent normal men from becoming social derelicts, drunkards, criminals, paupers, by the dissipating effect of the use of alcoholic liquors.

11. It is a movement to preserve the mechanical skill and industrial efficiency of the millions of mechanics and other laborers who make our wealth.

12. It is because we have come to realize that sobriety is a nation's greatest asset in times of peace, and her strongest defense in times of war.

13. It is in order to effectually stop the nation's greatest waste of men and money.

14. It is an effort for relief from the great burdens borne by the taxpayers to care for and control the victims of the liquor traffic.

15. It is a determination to dissolve the partnership and break the alliance that has for years existed between a Christian Nation and a great public moral wrong.

16. It is a purpose to declare to heathen nations and inferior civilizations to whom we are sending missionaries, that the civilization which we offer to them is not represented by the brewery, the distillery and the saloon, emblems of barbaric vice.

17. It is an endeavor on the part of Christian man to lift his brother to the moral, mental and social ideal set forth by the teaching of the Man of Galilee.

18. It is an exalted effort by an enlightened citizenship for a better Nation, a better Government, a better man and a better environment, or a purpose to establish a civilization in the Western Hemisphere that shall really reflect the ideals of Christianity.—Doctor A. C. Bane, in The New Republic, December 18, 1914.

Looking Forward

We used to think, years ago, that there was a world of coldness and heartlessness in the cry of the people who live under the rule of absolute monarchs, when in the course of their national experience it became necessary for them to say, "The king is dead!—Long live the king!" But as life brings to us its wealth of experiences, and we realize that the world must go on in spite of any tragedy or sorrow which may come to us, either as individuals or as nations, we can see that there is less of heartlessness in that old cry than of heart, less of cruelty than of the kindness of hope. It is not disrespect for those passed on, so much as it means loyalty and support for those whose burdens have become heavier by the same proportion as they became less for the one released.

And so we feel that it is very meet and befitting, that we now, even with our sorrow fresh upon us for the loss of the leader who has been called home, should "take heart of grace," and, recognizing the hand of God even in this event, look forward with confidence and with trust that the work we all love shall move right forward, and that it, and the men called now to heavier responsibilities, shall receive in abundance sufficient for the demands that Spirit which will spell success. For one, we are determined to look up, and forward, and try, by every means in our power, to perform any work which may come to our hand, with the cheerfulness and confidence necessary to its proper accomplishment.

January, then February, short and fleeting as it is, and March and, in a breath, Conference is upon us! Are you ready? Are you preparing? Are you guarding against being caught again napping? Are the church singers—the "sweet singers of Israel"—qualifying to serve in the great aggregation who, at that blessed "feast" time, will sing the songs of God's people, the songs which shall ascend as sweet incense of prayer to his throne? Where else can the like be found? Where else will so large a body of consecrated and devoted singers, of a chosen and "peculiar" people be met with "one accord?" Now, now is the time of preparation for the annual feast of the Spirit. And see to it that you are not sleeping upon your rights—your opportunities!

And now we wish to send to all the musicians personal greetings and good wishes for the good new year, with its clear white pages ready for our writing. May each desire to do good come to fruition! May we do, not merely dream! May we look back upon 1915, from the threshold of the next incoming year, with a sense of duty well and cheerfully performed, of opportunities improved, of aspirations for good fulfilled, of promises redeemed, of resolutions for renewed and consecrated services carried out in true humility and the spirit of gratitude that we have been privileged to help.

Hymns We Love

(We are pleased to announce that under this caption there will appear from time to time histories or descriptions of some of our familiar hymns. These will be compiled and arranged by Sister M. T. Short of Independence, Missouri, who is bringing to the task abundant ability and enthusiasm, which promises well for its unqualified success and popularity.—A. A.)

“ABIDE WITH ME”

Never were the words of Shelley, “They learn in suffering what they teach in song,” more completely verified than in the case of Henry Francis Lyte, the author of “Abide with me.”

For twenty-five years, from 1822 to 1847, he was the beloved minister over the parish of Brixham, Devonshire, which was composed largely of hardy fisher folk, with here and there a few more cultured people.

Devonshire is noted for its beauty, but notwithstanding this delightful place of residence, with its blue skies, balmy air, and the sea breezes, Shelley himself was suffering from an incurable disease which he well knew would one day take him from the loved scenes, and the people among whom he had so faithfully labored.

While yet in the prime of life, the time came when he felt his work would soon be over, and he earnestly and prayerfully desired to do something before he was taken away that would be a benefit to others after he had gone; this longing is expressed by him in the following words:

“Might verse of mine inspire
One virtuous aim, one high resolve,
Light in one drooping soul a hallowed fire,
Or bind one broken heart—

“Death would be sweeter then,
More calm my slumber 'neath the sod,
Might I thus live to bless my fellow men,
Or glorify my God.”

He closes this poem in which he unveils his secret heart with this prayer:

“Oh, thou whose touch can lend
Life to the dead, thy quickening grace supply;
And grant me, swan like, my last breath to spend
In song that may not die.”

Being told that he must lay aside all work, and advised to take a sea voyage, he was very desirous,—despite protests from his friends—to preach once more to his loved flock, and to hold one last communion with them. Carrying out his wish, although he was hardly able to stand in the chancel, he addressed them in words of such melting tenderness and love, pleading with them to lead holy lives, that at the close his hearers were almost all in tears.

It was a perfect day, and in the late afternoon, he walked feebly down the terraced walk to the seashore, to look once more on the dear familiar scenes, which he was to leave on the morrow for ever. God's benediction, and the spell of the hallowed hour was upon him as he walked alone beside the waters.

He returned slowly to the house, in silence, going at once to his own room. It was in the inspiration of that hour, as “the darkness deepened,” that the human cry went up to God, and the great hymn was written. As we read it, in the light of its story, how pathetic the plea, “Help of the helpless, oh, abide with me.” Joining the family circle, shortly afterward, he carried in his hand the immortal words,—an answer to his prayer, a heritage to humanity.

Doctor W. H. Monk, the musical director, composed the appropriate music, which seems to belong to the sweet pleading words of the hymn, and together they have gone to the ends of the earth; and who can tell the far-reaching influence over all classes of people. It is even said to be a favorite hymn of the homeless tramps.

In its tender personal appeal, what countless numbers of stricken hearts have found comfort; and as long as the heart is attuned to sorrow, and man looks to God as his helper, so long will “Abide With Me” prove the expression of that sorrow and that trust.

Masters of Music

WOLFGANG AMADEUS MOZART

The life of Mozart reads like the story of a sad dream. That one man should have crowded so much of life into the short space of thirty-five years, and should have met such wide extremes of success and failure, seems beyond the realm of fact, and only a fantasy. Yet such was the life of Mozart, “the little magician,” “most exquisitely endowed of men.” At nine years the idol of Europe's musicians, and the pet of kings and queens; at thirty-five, buried in an unmarked pauper's grave: could there be a course more tragic?

It seems the balance of Nature: where she gives much, she requires much in exchange. And never was child of Music given more than was Mozart. He was a genius from his cradle, a very pet of the Gods it seemed. Yet the world was to learn again, through him, that none is favored above the rest, and that sorrow is the common lot of us all.

Mozart was an infant prodigy. At three he was picking out chords on the zither; at four was taking regular lessons on the harpsichord; and at five was composing little pieces which his father proudly copied for him. At nine he was touring Europe, the guest of royalty and the favorite of princes.

It happened in this way: His good, German father was a musician and very poor. He recognized his boy's genius and resolved to gratify his pride and add store to his purse at the same time. So he took his children—Mozart's sister, three years older, was scarcely less talented—took them on a concert tour to Munich. Their success was wonderful. They were pronounced children of Genius, and were courted on every hand. The favorable reception was so gratifying in fact that the father ventured farther, and hurried them off to Vienna.

Mozart was just nine, but he played with the finish of an old artist. He won his way into every heart, and soon had a call from the royal court, itself. He so delighted them by his playing that they would not let him go. He was treated as though he were of royal blood, and he, in turn, was not in the least abashed by the august presence of the royal family. The little musician loved the good queen Maria Theresa, and would spring into her lap and kiss her impulsively, as though she were his mother. He was a playmate of Marie Antoinette, and because she was so kind to him, gravely promised to marry her when he grew up.

Life was pleasant in Vienna, but they could not always stay there, and were next found in France. At Paris they were as kindly received as at Vienna, and again the royal family was their patron. The little boy met every test that was put upon him, and won new honors every day. He not only played any instrument that was given him, but composed many pieces, and everywhere his winning personality gave him friends. And he was not without a home in Paris: palace and mansion were alike open to him.

In London, in Amsterdam, in The Hague—each great city where he went gave him greater honor than the last. When he came home again to the little town of Salzburg, where he was born, he had made the circuit of Europe's most brilliant capitals, and had won universal admiration and honor. But, as his father lamented, they had received more smiles than gold, and the family purse was in as sore need as before.

His father was vice kapel meister, attached to the court of the Bishop of Salzburg, and dared not let go the position, because the meager salary attached to it guaranteed that they would not starve, even though they were humiliated by great poverty. So when Wolfgang started out again, he was without his father's direction.

In the two years at home he had progressed rapidly in the art of composing, and was ever at it. Indeed through his life he was a strenuous and persistent worker. When he went again to the court of Austria he gave concerts, and the pieces were his very own. His success was greater than before, but royalty still payed in compliments, and was most sparing of money. The poor boy found it hard to live on the bounty of his admirers, and was learning young the lesson that later was to crush him so completely.

It was while in Vienna at this time, when only fourteen years old, that he conducted a great orchestra concert, the music of which was his own. It was an inspiration to see him, a mere boy, standing on a chair that he might wield his baton and be seen, and leading with a master's art.

In Italy he was given a continued ovation from city to city, and was received by the Pope in Rome and knighted in the highest order of the land. It meant something to get this stamp of Italy's approval, for in 1770 Italy was the acknowledged power in music.

Meanwhile Mozart composed much: arias, operas, hymns, pieces for solo instrument or orchestra, and they were finished work. He was a careful, conscientious craftsman, and no crude or incomplete product left his hand. It was easy for him to compose. He carried the melody in his head and did not have to resort to instrument or pencil. He was industrious to a fault, and his known works attest it. Nine hundred and twenty-two pieces are his contribution to the world's music—five times the work of Beethoven, six times that of Mendelssohn, and this, too, from a man whose life was cut short in his thirty-fifth year.

These were the happiest days of his life, but they were not long. His first grief was disappointment in love. The girl was fair and he enshrined her as his heart's idol. He idealized her. He was wrought to a fearful tension of love. But the beautiful Alloysia Weber was as fickle as she was lovely to look upon, and tired of Mozart she scorned his suit for another. It broke his heart and his health. He was never the same again, though he married after a while and seemed to be content.

Work as he would, he could not make money. He was ever at his composing, but as fast as it came from his hand it was stolen and the fruit of it reaped by another. Calumny and cabal did the rest. His best operas were ruined; nothing that he attempted was permitted to succeed. His royal friends forgot him; privation and trouble made fast acquaintance with him. When in happy times money would come he did not know how to keep it. Every beggar knew him as his man, and he could turn no plea aside. Between his enemies and his own kindness of heart, he was kept stripped bare of substance. His wife was as easy natured as himself, and only accentuated his troubles.

Ill health followed close on ill fortune, and at thirty-five he was a broken man. He had composed his wonderful Masonic opera, "The Magic Flute," but even that great tribute to his brotherhood brought him no help. He was commissioned one day to write a requiem, and he felt that it would only too likely be his own. It was. On December 5, 1791, Mozart died, overcome by privation, and the worry of an ingratitude heaped upon him by a careless world.

It was a cold day when they carried him to the cemetery, and his few friends turned back at the gate. His body was hurried into a pauper's grave, unmarked and to be unknown. No further commentary than this was necessary on the chance of life. The consolation of it, alone, was: his works could not be consigned to the dust and to oblivion with his body. To-day they are a common heritage of the race, and the name Mozart it a talisman that unlocks the chamber of heaven's own music.

A. E. McKIM.

Singing with the Spirit

It has been said that music is a language expressive of emotions which no other science or language can convey; it was born in heaven and heralded to the sons of men on the wings of angels, and with the passing away of this life it is the only of earth's blessings that may be taken up in the life to come. This is a beautiful theory and true in a measure only. Whatever we do to develop us for service to others will be used for that higher development in service to others in that life to come. Then does it not demand a consecration of all our efforts for that particular work we are best able to do?

In music, expression means consecration to me. It is one thing to give pleasure to an audience with beautiful sounds, but quite another to give expression that will touch the hearts of the people. Not long since we heard two women give a talk along certain lines of their work. One was a very pleasant speaker and interested the audience, and an occasional smile would greet the speaker from the listeners; the other speaker was a quiet little woman, who at first could hardly be heard, but gathering courage as she proceeded to tell her story she touched the hearts of the congregation and brought tears to the eyes of the listeners. Which one made the most lasting impression? Expression in this sense means much.

A singer must study the words of the song and make the sentiment to be expressed his own. He must feel the words and be moved by them; he must place himself in the situation of the personage he represents, and cultivate the capability of repressing and producing the various emotions which the art of music is able to create. Jousse said that sounds dictated by feeling can alone express passions with truth and energy. Patti in singing "Home, sweet home" always brought her audience to tears, because she sang with her soul.

Not long since we heard a congregation singing "Onward, Christian soldiers," and it sounded like a funeral march. Several years ago we had a study in expression on the correct rendering of the song so will pass it along. It certainly is worthy of study.

"This is a command to a company of Christ's soldiers to march as if going to war; yes, into battle with their eyes on the Leader in advance. What kind of step do you think soldiers take on going to battle? I should think a quick step, as it is expressive of action, and if you have no idea of how rapid this movement is, just get on to the floor and step it off, up and down the aisle, and you have it exactly. Take the first verse in a cheerful, animated style and in perfect march time.

"We come now to the second verse. Like a mighty army moves the church of God.' What do we know about large bodies generally? Well, they move slowly. The church of God is a large body and moves like a mighty army; slow and sure. The whole army can not move rapidly. The cavalry may; also the infantry on a charge, but the entire army, with its commissary department, must move slowly. Let this second verse be in slower movement than the first, and yet strong on the first line. The second line brings us to a radical change of thought. Active powers have been in play thus far but now we come to the reflective. 'Brothers, we are treading where the saints have trod,' where those who have gone before us to the better land. Solemn thoughts here; reflection and memory are here enthroned, and this is wholly incompatible with the rapid muscular movement. When engaged in deepest thought, recalling the past, we sit motionless; the muscles are not called into action when the reflective powers are hardest at work. Even the gates opening to the outward world are often closed, lest sensation comes to intrude itself upon the presence of her, who sits higher on the throne at this moment. This should be thoughtfully sung and slower till we come to the chorus, when the usual march time is resumed, for this is action.

"We come to another verse: 'Crowns and thrones may perish,' etc. I would sing this a trifle faster than the former verse, but not as rapid as the chorus. In this verse is found the climax, so to speak, of the hymn, the crowning thought of the composition, 'Gates of hell can never 'gainst that church prevail,' and why? 'We have Christ's own promise.' Yes, here is the church's foundation. This is the soldier's confidence. He is sure of success. He never would have enlisted had he not felt sure of success. No soldier would ever enlist from pure patriotism did he not feel certain he would win the day. He is told the gates of hell shall not prevail against the church. This army is bound to win, and why should it not go forward with its eye on the Captain. 'Yes, we have Christ's own promises,' and what about that? 'They can never fail.' Here is the climax. Crown and thrones may fail; the very stars may fall from heaven. Heaven and earth may pass away, yet amid the wreck of worlds and dissolving nations Christ's promise can never fail; utterly and absolutely impossible! How should you express such a thought as this. Slow, emphatic and staccato. They—can—nev—er—fail. Then the chorus in usual march movement.

"The last verse is a song of triumph and praise, cheerful and strong. Good singing implies study, thought, brains—the highest type of cultivation as well." ALTHA DEAM.

How Does Our Work Strike You?

"Our work,"—the music! Oh, don't you wish that everybody in the church, old and young, would sing,—would read the words over carefully, and then sing them with understanding, and thus make every song a prayer, or an anthem of joyous praise?

Do you ever notice whole classes in the Sunday school talking or lounging during the singing?

Gipsy Smith's method often occurs to our mind, and we wish our superintendent or song-leader would say, "Now, let class number three sing the next verse all alone, then all join in the chorus." Or, "Will all the boys sing the chorus alone, and the girls sing the verse, and then everybody sing!"

We need more enthusiasm in our singing, not alone in the Sunday school, but in all our church services.

Are you tired? Sing,—it will rest you! Are you sad or depressed? Sing,—it will cheer you! And if you are sick,—then, too, sing! It will expand the lungs; help the respiration; lift the pressure from weak parts; and rejuvenate the whole body!

Mothers, sisters, get the little ones together in the home and sing songs of praise and rejoicing. Good reading in the home, good music in the home, encouraging, instead of scolding, will go far towards making our lives a continued psalm! Close the year with song, songs of thanksgiving and joy, and begin the new year with song, veritable anthems of praise and consecration!

MRS. S. R. BURGESS.

Musical Notes

The committee of the Kansas State Music Teachers' Convention, recently held in Wichita, has reported standards for piano, voice, and violin instruction, and for music schools. They are now arranging a course of study to be used by all accredited teachers in Kansas, to be in operation by September, 1915.

Now is an excellent time for those who would like to advance in musical work to begin the study of some orchestral instrument, with a view to playing in the church services later. Great good can be done by the young of the church in this way, and incidentally they can earn quite a little extra money from time to time as opportunity permits. Why not begin now?

It is a curious but significant fact that a number of the most meritorious instrumental compositions ascribed to various of the world's great composers are now considered spurious. Two of Mendelssohn's "Songs without words" are said to have been written by his sister. Steffani instead of Handel is said to have written, "Angels ever bright and fair"; and Reissiger instead of Weber wrote the "Last waltz."

One of the results of European war has been to reveal the fact that we have quite a number of Americans who have become noted among the musical profession in Europe. They have been so quietly at work that only for the necessity of returning to America on account of the war would their value have been as quickly discovered to us. Recognition is often slow in coming to those eminently worthy of it; even Tchaikovsky was a long time in obtaining the place which is now recognized generally as his due among the greatest composers.

The cost of musically equipping the houses of worship in the United States is estimated to have been about sixty million dollars. To educate an organist in a first class manner may cost from two to six thousand dollars exclusive of living expenses. Instruction usually covers a period of from ten to fifteen years.

The first organ in New England, and probably in the United States, was built about 1752. In 1909 this country produced sixty-four thousand one hundred and eleven reed, and twelve hundred and twenty-four pipe organs, totaling a value of more than five millions. The growth of music here is also indicated by the fact that the only bassoon in the United States in 1817 was one owned in New York, and the only oboe player in 1828 was in Baltimore. To-day we have about two thousand bands, and thousands of orchestras.

The fact that the Brooklyn, New York, public schools, by the advice of the director, have established violin classes as a part of their courses is sufficient to show something of the value that is being placed on musical education to-day. It can not be successfully denied that music is one of the most powerful factors in educational development that can be employed; and its pecuniary value is at least as great as many other studies required in our public schools. Why, then, should it not form as much a part of our public school training as other courses considered indispensable? A. B. P.

Saint Louis Notes

The Saint Louis choir has not as yet gone into oblivion. Real life and animation was made manifest last Sunday at the sessions of district conference, when some forty-eight voices were assembled. The splendid and effective work accomplished denotes that we still have in our aggregation a body of singers capable of excellent and powerful work for good. Tonal quality and volume especially we find improved, and if we can develop and produce, to a nicety and finish, the sharp and vigorous attack of which our leader, Brother Bell, is so proud and insistent upon having, our work will surge ahead and build up, and its combined melody and technique will be more pleasing, and result in lasting favor, of both God and man.

Our last experience, at the September district conference, was a very enjoyable affair. First, the long, delightful ride to Alton, Illinois, in a specially chartered car of which pleasure more than one hundred of our people availed themselves. After a splendid all-day session, in which our music was a satisfying feature, we returned, many other Saints augmenting our numbers.

I might mention here that this undertaking proved a most profitable one. The brethren who were in charge paid the company's price for the car, and by charging the regular fare going, with half fare for those returning, some fifteen dollars was netted, which might have been proportionately refunded to the Saints, but which, we are glad to say, in this instance, was placed, instead, in the district fund.

On the homeward journey all who wished to sing did so, many singing until their voices were spent. And only when the last cadences had died away, and we had stolen quietly back across the great "Father of Waters" to our own home city, did we realize that another day had gone, a wonderful day, a historical day, to mark one more soul-satisfying offering in the line of our especial and chosen service to the God we love!

Next Tuesday night, December 21, we go in a body to Columbia, Illinois, to assist with our services in an entertainment in a Methodist church, where one of our brethren has been preaching. We hope good will come from it. Most of the twenty or more numbers on the program are by the choir and members. We have been exceedingly well drilled, and are keyed up to the highest pitch. We believe we are ready.

Some one dropped the remark recently suggesting that they were busy. Bring in the person who is not! Our chorister, visiting different choirs several nights a week, is getting quite a share of busy and bustling work. No true worker finds a resting-place for any great length of time in this our beloved cause.

The next district conference will be in Saint Louis, in March, and the choir is to have the Sunday night for the rendition of a cantata. So we lead in the response to the "Get busy" signal, and assume to prepare for the task of the future. What we do then, we will let you know.

More news later,

T. J. ELLIOTT.

(Hurrah for Saint Louis! Truly they are hustlers! Independence, too, is studying the cantata, but as yet has not had the temerity to really decide upon a date for its rendition. We are hoping that the Central and other live choirs among our Kansas City branches, as well as the South Side Independence singers will all qualify on this cantata, so that when it is given we may have a grand uniting of forces! —A. A.)

Behold us, Lord, to-day, with cares oppressed,
Bound 'neath the load of hurt humanity,
Dreaming perchance of heavenly bliss to be
When from earth's tasks we shall be dispossessed;
Teach us to wear the yoke that sets us free,
And find the heaven of work thy love hath blessed.
—Howard Arnold Water.

READING FOR FEBRUARY.—POSTURE AND EXERCISE

Intelligent cooperation of parents and teachers is more and more coming to be recognized as a necessity for the accomplishment of all that is desired in the education of children. Evidence of this is to be seen in the organization of the many parent teacher associations. From the parents' side there is much that may be imparted for the help of the teacher. On the other hand, teachers now have great advantages for gaining information that would profit every parent, and that, if possessed by both parents and teachers, would aid greatly in the care and development of the children. Much information of this nature is contained in the textbook for normal students, entitled, School Hygiene, by Edward R. Shaw. We quote at length from the chapter on "Posture and exercise."

CONDITIONS PRODUCTIVE OF BODILY DEFORMITIES

"Improper chairs and desks at which pupils are obliged to sit, the wrong postures which they are allowed to take in standing as well as in sitting, and the muscular fatigue caused by the inactivity of a great number of the muscles of the body for a long period,—all these exist in a surprising degree in a great majority of schools in this country, and they can be regarded in no other light than as causes greatly productive of bodily deformities.

PROPER POSTURE IN STANDING AND IN SITTING

"When the pupil stands with the heels so placed that neither of them is in advance of the other, and with the weight on both legs, we have a posture in which the trunk is evenly poised on its supports, the pelvis and all the parts of the body are evenly placed. . . . If in this posture the weight is thrown slightly on the balls of the feet, the hips drawn back, the head poised a little back with the chin drawn in, the chest will be thrown forward, and we have correct posture for standing. It is the posture which the pupil should be trained to take while standing for short periods. Since, however, both legs undergo the same amount of muscular tension at the same time, it is a posture which the pupil will not keep if he is obliged to stand long. Muscular relief and change are necessary. If, then, in any lesson exercise the pupil is required to stand four or five minutes or more, he should be directed to change from this posture by placing one foot slightly in advance of the other, after the manner of the public speaker, and to vary this from time to time by placing the other foot slightly in advance and bringing the weight upon the leg which has previously been favored.

"The posture most economical of muscle power in sitting is one in which the pelvis rests equally on the chair, the spinal column is erect, the head is poised above the spine and the arms are in line with the hips.

BAD POSTURES

Picture a right angle formed by a school seat and its back while a boy who has learned his shoulders back and pushed his hips forward forms the third side of the triangle. His head is bent forward until his chin almost touches his chest in order that his eyes may rest upon the book that is held in both his hands. Of this posture School Hygiene says:

"The pupil has slipped forward in his seat and is resting nearly the whole weight of the trunk on the end of the spine and on the shoulder blades. It is held that the need of motion at the hip joint is an important factor in causing the pupil to assume this posture. The injurious effects which result from such a posture must be evident. The dropping of the head downward not only constricts the chest and tends to decrease the amount of air inspired, but it also stretches the muscles which connect the head with the spine, with the result that these muscles at length become elongated, and as a consequence, not only does the pupil become round shouldered, but there ensues a carriage in which the head is pitched forward. The posture here spoken of, bringing some of the weight of the internal organs upon the spinal column, tends to produce in the spine a curve backward."

A posture in which the pupil bends forward with both arms on the desk and head close to his work "constricts the chest, interferes with free respiration, and puts additional labor on the heart because it is constricted. . . . This results in round shoulders, a curving of the spine backward, and a carriage in which the head is pitched forward. . . . In addition the internal organs are displaced. . . .

"Let it be remembered that the best school desks become exceedingly tiresome to the pupil when but little opportunity is given during a school session for complete change and active readjustment of the various muscles, such demand being an imperative physiological demand of the growing organism. . . . The fact is that pupils are wearied from long sitting and can not maintain a proper posture.

"Bad postures in sitting are more injurious in their effects than bad postures in standing as they are usually maintained for much longer periods of time than bad postures assumed in standing. Sitting at the desk with one leg crossed over the other induces malformations, especially in girls.

MORE INJURY TO GIRLS THAN TO BOYS

"Improper postures have a decidedly more injurious effect upon girls, as a general rule, than upon boys. The more varied and greater amount of physical activity indulged in by boys unquestionably counteracts to a considerable extent the effects of bad postures upon them. Because of the lesser variety and amount of physical activity on the part of girls, their general muscular habits become confirmed at an earlier period than the muscular habits of boys. This emphasizes the great importance of watching more closely the posture of girls and of exercising the utmost care to prevent, if possible, improper postures from becoming habitual. It may be added that malpositions from wrong postures become fixed in a much shorter time in pupils that are poorly nourished.

HOME AS WELL AS SCHOOL RESPONSIBLE

"It must be remembered, however, that the school can not be expected to prevent malpositions unless aided by the home. Malformations arising from bad habits of posture are frequently chargeable to the home itself. Take, for instance, the habit so prevalent among girls of carrying books propped upon one hip. If one will observe any group of high-school girls, or girls of the upper grammar grades, on the way to or from school, he will realize what effect a habit of this kind, kept up for four or five years, must have in producing malpositions of the body. The books rest in an oblique position, supported by the left arm and left hip, as a rule. In this case, the left shoulder sags, there is a lengthening of the right side, with a corresponding shortening of the left, causing the ribs on the left side to approach each other, and those on the right to diverge from each other, and giving the spine a lateral curvature with its concavity to the left. To counteract the force of gravity the head is thrown slightly over to the right.

"The school can do little more in this matter than explain to pupils the injurious effects that ensue from the habit of carrying books in this fashion. Such explanation will doubtless exert some influence in checking the practice. Its abolition, however, devolves not upon the school, but upon parents.

THE SCHOOL RECESS

"The physical activities which the recess directly promotes counteract to some extent the tendencies which improper postures exert toward malformations. Through the fuller breathing which physical exercise compels, the circulation is equalized and the blood oxygenated. Besides the physical activity which the recesses afford, there should be given to each grade, every school day, at least two short periods of systematic physical exercises, designed to promote quick and strong muscular control of the various parts of the body, to equalize the circulation which mental effort combined with sitting at the desk has rendered more or less uneven, to give proper carriage to the body, and to expand and enlarge the chest so that deep breathing shall become a fixed habit.

"In a system of exercises designed to secure these results, care must be taken not to overtax the heart. . . . The periods devoted to physical exercise should afford a relief to the mental powers and serve to recuperate the mental energies instead of further taxing them. With a proper system a period of physical exercise should in its employment excite in the pupils mind a sense of pleasure. . . .

"Despite all that has been written of the dependence of mental development upon physical development there has not yet been accorded to physical culture the place in our schools which its importance demands. How best to secure physical culture is undoubtedly the question of greatest importance in education at the present time. . . . The pupils' physical organisms are pretty largely neglected, and deteriorating conditions are tolerated against which the growing child must struggle.

PROPER CARRIAGE OF THE BODY

The following advice is from Physical Culture:

"Holding one's self erect at all times whether sitting or standing is good exercise in itself. . . .

"Lift the weight of the body, both standing and sitting, and carry it suspended from the shoulders. The force of gravitation exerts a constant downward pull upon every part of one's body; unless guarded against, one unconsciously permits the body to literally slump and sag down.

"To overcome this tendency, lift with the shoulders and stretch the muscles, first on one side of the body, then on the other, until you feel all the muscles lifting, then let loose of shoulders, holding the "body grip." Be careful to do so on deflated lungs; inflate only after you cease lifting. You must feel a sustaining muscular support, particularly under the shoulder blades. The shoulders themselves should be free from muscular tension. As an exercise, simply lift the body upward with back muscles, first on one side, then on the other; next loosen the shoulders but maintain the body in the uplifted position. Inflate the lungs afterwards. Never lift with the breath, as you can not hold the position. Take care not to lean backwards in lifting. Throwing the shoulders far back is not an erect position."

An osteopath was telling a young lady how to fill out the hollows in her chest by exercise. When the doctor remarked upon her need of this, the young lady at once threw her upper arms and shoulders back in a strained position, in a manner not uncommon, but which leaves the shoulders high and pointing forward. The osteopath exclaimed impressively, "No! just see where that puts your shoulder blades." A glance at a mirror showed them protruding unpleasantly. "What you want to do," the doctor continued, "is to draw your shoulders down and lift your chest; then with the abdomen drawn back and the weight of the body resting on the balls of the feet, you are in proper position to begin the exercise." (This with other exercises will be given in a later paper.)

"Hold your neck (not your head) in line with your spine, eyes lifted, chin always in. You must feel the pull in the muscles of the neck and upper spine. No brain can be at its best with such pressure upon the nerves and blood vessels. Pull your neck often in position with a side and upward movement of the head; but always with chin in. Also sometimes pull head forward and down, to stretch the neck muscles.

"Brace yourself with a firm 'body grip.' Many men possess no weight or personality because of their loose, unstrung physical presence. A man of presence always stands with a solidity that compels our respect. . . . His movements are steady and suggest power. . . . We feel his reserve power,—he has himself in hand. . . .

"A student who knows ever so much about physical culture but who fails to embody his knowledge in his personality falls short of the mark. We have a right to demand proper carriage, a well-poised body, a flexible spine, an elastic step, diaphragmatic breathing, resonant voice and grace in movements. These elementary requirements . . . are nevertheless attained to by but a very small percentage of students." (Physical Culture.)

There can be no doubt that if more students had the help of the home from childhood up in these matters which affect not only the appearance but also the physical and moral strength, there would be a better showing. It is worth some effort to become informed upon this subject of physical culture, and then, of whatever age we may be, to profit by what we learn, so far as we may be able, as well as to seek the well-being of the rising generation as we may have opportunity.

In the home, one's anxiety to keep children from forming hurtful habits of posture may easily lead into a nagging way with them. Reminders should be given as pleasantly as possible so that such an impression upon them may be avoided.

ILFRACOMBE, SISTER'S CRESCENT, D EUMMOYNE,
SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA, November 13, 1914.

Editors Herald: We have lately been favored with a visit by Elders Gomer T. Griffiths and C. Ed. Miller, and feel that the church has sent the right men to build up the great work in Australia. Brother Griffiths has been staying at my home while in Sydney. I have been called and ordained to two offices through him, priest and elder. I trust that I may be an instrument in the hands of the Lord in accomplishing a great work for him.

God is indeed marshaling his army in this country. A great work is ahead of us, and the time is coming when thousands of honest souls will be gathered in on this island continent.

I am no longer young, but God has much for each of us to do. The healthiest sign I can see is the great interest the young are taking in the work, and the desire on the part of young men to advance the latter-day cause. Many are entering into the missionary field.

Our Brother Griffiths has accomplished a great work here in organizing the mission. We have all learned to love him, not only in his official capacity, but as a brother. He is kind of heart and wise of counsel. His forced departure caused great sorrow. We are sure the illness of his wife must have been very serious, and feel that there was no other course open to our brother but to go. We trust and pray that if it be the Lord's will, Sister Griffiths may be speedily restored to health and strength. Our Brother Griffiths had not accomplished the work he had contemplated, as this mission is a large one and our people are scattered. However, he has the work here at heart, and knows of its needs, and will be able to counsel and direct in its needs from America.

The work has been left under the direction of those well qualified to carry it on. Elder W. J. Haworth was left in charge, with Brethren C. Ed. Miller and J. H. N. Jones and others in charge of the various districts. One of the best plans contemplated is the sending out of three gospel wagons to the various towns and villages where the gospel as restored has not been presented, and where there are many who seem honest in heart. I have long seen the need of this, and am thankful that the plan has been devised.

Australia is of the best and most temperate climate in the world; fine weather for about nine months of the year. It is proposed to send two elders, or missionaries, with each wagon. Comfortable sleeping accommodations are to be provided, and cooking utensils. In this way the church will be saved much expense and the restored gospel be preached to those who would not otherwise have the opportunity of hearing the same. It is proposed to visit from house to house so far as possible, and distribute tracts, etc. We feel that if this plan is carried out great good will be done, and many will be called out of darkness into the marvelous light of the gospel. The Australian mission is a very important one.

Our good Brother Miller is beloved by all, and is accomplishing a great work for the Master. His devotion to the cause is shown by his willingness to leave his loved ones for a stay in this country. We feel sure he will be an instrument in the hands of the Lord in accomplishing much good. We feel, however, that it would be well if his family could join him here, if they are willing to come. We are sure that they would not only like sunny Australia, but all the Saints also.

The Balmain Branch is the largest here. It is strong in numbers, but better still has a high standard of spiritual life, and greater unity than has been seen for some time. Only when the Saints of God are in this condition will the work of the Lord prosper. The Saints realize that as they are the salt of the earth God expects much of them. Only as all realize the importance and magnitude of the cause will we accomplish what God has designed for us. The great lesson all Saints in all parts of the world need to learn is that only as we are faithful, prayerful, and diligent, can the work of God go forth. We may help or hinder.

The least of God's children has a work to perform and influence with others. So let all try to comprehend the magnitude of the work before us. Remember the honor of being a coworker with God, to give the everlasting gospel of Christ to the earth. The angels of heaven would delight to do the great work in which we are engaged, but that it is not their mission. God has placed this honor upon men.

Then let us rouse ourselves to a holy enthusiasm for the cause of righteousness; for without enthusiasm nothing great has ever been accomplished in the world. Let us all do our best and leave to the Lord his portion. We should never refuse when God calls. It is a serious thing to do this. Remember, his purposes can not be frustrated, and if we refuse he will call others to do the work we might have accomplished. This work is the most important business on earth, no matter what the nature of the work may be.

We extend greeting to the beloved Saints who have labored here in former years, and whom we have learned to love. All accomplished much good in Australia.

I pray that the work may spread and increase, not only here but throughout all the world, and that the honest in heart may be gathered into the fold of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ, and rejoice with us in the everlasting gospel as restored to earth in the latter days.

Your brother in Christ,

J. F. GREASY.

Society Islands

There is great interest manifested in this part of the Lord's vineyard. Brother Clyde F. Ellis and the writer have just returned from a trip throughout seven of the upper islands. We have been separated from Tahiti and loved ones for about two months, during which time we encountered a few experiences worthy of note.

When we left Tahiti we were expecting to set sail for the island of Niau. It was the desire of Brother Ellis and writer, however, to go in an opposite direction first, that is, to the island of Tikahau. An hour after leaving Papeete, the captain discovered that the winds were favorable for sailing to Tikahau, the very island we desired to reach first. We reached this island the second day after leaving Tahiti, and though we were there but about a half a day, we held one preaching service, Brother Ellis preaching, the writer interpreting. Although our stay was short, we were pleased to meet with them, as this was perhaps the writer's last visit among them.

From Tikahau we went to Rairoa, where we remained about a day and a half, and where we also met with the Saints and preached to them. From Rairoa we sailed to the north about ninety miles to the island of Manihi. After being lost at sea for about twenty-four hours, we finally discovered the island about fifteen miles distant.

We both felt impressed to remain on this island for a season, and while considering the matter, being somewhat perplexed as to how we would reach the next island, we were confronted by a good brother whose object in approaching us was to persuade us to remain on that island, with the understanding that he would take us to the next. We decided to stay, and in our labors with this branch we felt greatly blessed. On the day set apart for departure, the Saints gathered at the seashore and sang a few hymns and offered prayer as a farewell meeting, seeking the blessing of the Lord to be with us in our journey upon the seas. It was with great reluctance that the writer left the brethren and sisters of the various branches at the water's edge, never again to meet them perhaps until we meet on the shores of eternity.

The next morning we reached the island of Arutua where Brother Ellis baptized three natives and where we remained for about one week, after which we departed in a small boat, the smallest boat I believe that the writer has ever sailed on, being about sixteen feet long and about eight feet wide, its capacity about one ton and a half of dried coconut. The sea was not very favorable for a boat this size, and we were tossed to and fro in our little craft by waves large enough to swallow it up. We reached our destination safely, however, and we praise the Lord for his kind watchcare over us. This last island was Apataki.

The next day we took a small power boat to Kaukura, and after a four days' visit with them we returned to Apataki, where we waited from Monday until Saturday for favorable winds to carry us to Niau. The winds were very strong and were almost against us from Tuesday until Friday, at which time we fasted and prayed to the Lord to give us favorable wind and sea that we might meet with the Saints in Niau upon the following Sunday. The boat we were to go on was also a small craft, and it would not have been wise to have attempted to travel with such unfavorable sea and wind. Shortly after we had fasted and prayed for fair wind and smoother sea we noticed dark clouds arising in the eastern horizon, which soon proved to be a rainstorm and very strong wind, and in a very few moments the wind changed and it calmed down somewhat and gave us fair winds to take us to the desired island. The wind remained in this same direction until we reached Niau the next day, and immediately after landing the wind changed and made it favorable for the return of our brethren to the island of Apataki. We praised our heavenly Father for thus assisting his servants while in the interests of his work among his people upon the islands of the sea.

We returned to Tahiti last week and found loved ones well and everything quiet in Papeete, not quite so much excitement as we experienced in September when the German gunboats bombarded Papeete.

We have received news from the island of Rairoa concerning the death of Turatahi, the secretary of the mission, and father of the little native boy whom Brother and Sister C. H. Lake took to America in the year 1910. Brother Turatahi was one of our leading native missionaries, and was always a willing worker in the service of the Master. He has gone to his reward. May the Lord bless and comfort the hearts of those who mourn their loss. This good brother and missionary has assisted many of the past foreign missionaries in this mission. We believe that our loss is heaven's gain.

The writer and family are contemplating to return to America in the month of March. It has been six years the coming Conference since we were appointed to labor in these fields.

We are pleased to say that Brethren A. H. Christensen and Clyde F. Ellis and wives are speedily acquiring the Tahitian language.

Ever praying for the advancement of God's work and the triumphant establishment of his kingdom on earth.

J. CHARLES MAY.

News from Branches

Brooklyn, New York

The year 1914 has just passed into history, and with it a year of activity can be recorded for this branch; meetings are held almost every night in the week. Being busy keeps the mind and hands occupied, and we learned by experience many years ago that Satan finds work for idle hands to do—and tongues, too, for that matter.

A branch of the Woman's Auxiliary for Social Service was organized last September, with Sister J. W. Hull as president, Ella Squire, vice president and Ethel Potts, secretary-treasurer. The enrollment is seventeen at the present time. Sewing was the first work attempted; other departments will be added as the association grows.

The Religio is doing a big work, especially with the young; in creating in their minds a desire to study the textbooks of the church. The entertainment feature, which is the drawing card with some, has been well managed. Brother William Nichols and wife, president and vice president, respectively, may feel proud of results achieved thus far.

The department of music in the branch is attracting much attention. Lovers of good music will be found where the same is to be had, hence this department of work is made a special feature. People are constantly being drawn into our services through their love for good music. Thus the gospel story is heard by many who possibly would not have been present if the musical numbers had been omitted. The choir is ably conducted by Sister Ella Squire, with Brother Earl Audet at the organ.

Brother Albert N. Hoxie, the General Chorister, has given us one night a week, instructing the choir in the general and district anthem music. The brother's presence has created much musical enthusiasm. All are thankful for his services, given so freely for the cause of Christ.

On December 27, the choir rendered the beautiful cantata, "The morning star," under the direction of Brother Hoxie. All present were made to feel the power of the Spirit, as the story of the nativity was being told in song.

On the evening of December 29, the Sunday school, in costume, gave the Christmas cantata, "Blessed is he that cometh." This entertainment was a great success. The cantata was preceded by a children's program given by the primary department, under the direction of Sister Fannie Harris, superintendent of this department.

The priesthood meet in session every month to discuss general topics, pertaining to the work of the various offices in the priesthood. The theme at the January meeting was

"Department in the house of God and in public speaking"; the topic for February will be "Education, as applying to members of the priesthood." In gospel bonds,

E. B. HULL.

Saint Louis, Missouri

Feeling grateful for the opening of another year, whereby new opportunities for growth and advancement are afforded us, we believe it is the sincere desire of all Saints to renew their efforts to glorify our heavenly Father by consecrated and holy lives, and by making every effort to assist in the establishment of his kingdom on earth.

As a large family bereft of their father, we are saddened by the departure from this earth life of our President, Brother Joseph, as it pleased him to be called. His last days coming as they did with the closing year, aged as he was, remind us of the passing of the old year and the entering of the new, or the younger one—the aged man giving place to the younger, whom we should sustain with our efforts and prayers.

Conference Sunday, December 14, a beautiful memorial sermon was delivered in honor of Brother Joseph by Brother Christy, his text being, "Where there is no vision, the people perish." The pure, Christ-like life of our brother was portrayed in the forceful and impressive manner characteristic of Brother Christy. Among the many splendid thoughts was, "Through the beautiful Christ-like teachings and example of Brother Joseph, he still lives with us to-day."

We had a very large attendance at our district conference, and with Sunday school, two preaching services, prayer service, priesthood, and Woman's Auxiliary, a very busy and profitable day was spent, both spiritually and socially. The work of the church district choir was enjoyed very much, as was also a solo at Sunday school by Sister M. Masten, composed by Joseph Smith, "Tenderly, tenderly, lead thou me on." Brother G. S. Trowbridge gave a talk on normal work, urging greater interest in this line.

Our Sunday school Christmas entertainment was a decided success. It consisted of a cantata entitled, "Santa's Christmas bargain." Many compliments were tendered those who had charge of it, as well as the participants, every one of whom worked hard for its success. The tiny tots as fairies were exceptionally good.

The first Sunday of the new year was rally day, members of the district being invited to join us, some of whom availed themselves of the opportunity. This truly was a most enjoyable occasion, many staying for every service. The sacrament service was exceptionally well attended and was full of spiritual strength and encouragement. Many strangers were present, some of whom are honestly seeking the truth, and who expressed themselves as being pleased with the service. A departure from the regular order was had, the Sunday school session being extended to 11.30. Brother Joernatt gave a review of the lesson, and then we were privileged to listen to a lay sermon, or short talk, by Brother H. A. Hampson, who, though a babe in the work, vividly told how God through his love and power led him to the church, directing him by dreams and visions of a wonderful nature.

We were made to rejoice when after the morning service Brother George Reeves conducted into the kingdom Sister Charles Peat, jr. We have been anxiously waiting for Sister Peat to unite with us for many years, and when she decided to start the new year in the Master's service we were truly made to feel happy. She was confirmed in the afternoon.

Your sister in Christ,

Church Secretary*DELEGATE CREDENTIALS TO GENERAL CONFERENCE

Delegate credential blanks, provided for by action of General Conference, have been sent to secretaries of districts, stakes, and branches not in districts. Such officers are requested to forward credentials of delegates appointed to represent their organizations at the General Conference of 1915 to the Church Secretary, as soon as practicable, that the report of the committee on credentials may be made up and printed before the opening of the conference, as required by conference action. Credentials of delegates appointed at fall or winter conference should be forwarded without delay, and of those yet to be appointed immediately after appointment. All credentials should be in hand as early in the month of March as possible.

One certificate for each delegation, with number of members in district or branch, and names of its delegates, signed by the secretary of the body appointing, with name of such organization, place and date of conference or business meeting, is sufficient; separate, individual credentials to delegates are not necessary. Please insert "total membership" in all cases; also report if delegates are authorized to cast majority and minority vote in case of division and the full delegation not present.

Any failing to receive blanks will be supplied on application to the undersigned.

The rules governing "representation" and the "restrictions of delegate voting" will be found in chapter 17 of the Rules of Order, with the exception that such rules have been amended to provide that the basis of representation shall be one delegate for every one hundred members.

District should take notice that fractional numbers—less than one hundred—do not entitle them to another delegate.

Branches having a membership of less than one hundred, when not included in districts, are entitled to one delegate.

Tribute to Memory of Joseph Smith

(The following was adopted at a meeting of the Independence Branch, January 12, 1915, a copy to be sent to Sister Joseph Smith and family, and to the HERALD and Ensign for publication.)

In the passing from the successful conflicts of earth-life, to the triumphs of the beautiful paradise of God, of our friend and brother, President Joseph Smith, the membership of the Independence, Missouri, Branch by these presents express their grateful and profound appreciation of the exalted life he led; his nobility of character, his broad charity, his loving ministry, and his patient endurance under trial and severe affliction, testify to the devotion of his life to the attainment of the character so wonderfully manifested in the lofty example of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ.

While we are saddened that the presence we honored, and the cheery voice we all loved, always ringing so true, shall no more be seen and heard in mortality, we are thankful for the memories and associations of the past; for the wise, kindly and fervent counsels he has given, and earnestly pray that our lives and characters may attest that his labors among us have not been in vain; that he may have joy in the accounting time, in the fruitage of his ministry which has been of much value to us in securing the exaltation and salvation made possible of attainment through the precious life of the Lord Jesus Christ.

We record with deep satisfaction, and sincere appreciation, that never at any time during over fifty years of faithful, loyal service in the ministry of the gospel of Jesus Christ has any one among us found either occasion or necessity to apologize for, or to be humiliated at any act inconsistent with his profession or calling as a minister of Jesus Christ, or in his character as a citizen. He honored the laws of God and his country. We gladly bear testimony to the example he set before his people in honesty, integrity, and purity of life and purpose.

While we share in the bereavement of the church, and of his family deprived of husband and father, we also feel the comfort brought by the attestation to the splendid work and character of President Joseph Smith, in the encomiums and commendations so widely and justly expressed by the prominent journals throughout the United States where he was best known.

We respectfully tender to the faithful companion, and to the sons and daughters of our brother our deepest sympathies in their loss; thankful that so rich a heritage has been bequeathed them in the beautiful life and honored stewardship, now returned to the Master from whom the trust was received, praying that so long as memory lasts these may be an inspiration to service of the Master that will merit and receive his highest commendation.

When our conflicts here have ended, and we joy in beholding the gracious face of our beloved Lord, we shall meet again our brother and friend, with all the glorious hosts of the heavenly kingdom, and rejoice through all eternity in the sublime exaltation and glory of a companionship, of which the prized and sweet communion of Saints here on earth, united in loving service, is but a foretaste. May our heavenly Father grant that this meeting may be without the loss of one.

LOUISE GIESCH, Secretary.

Book Reviews

THE SALOON SHOWN UP.—Professor Thomas W. Shannon, A. M., author of the Shannon Purity Books. S. A. Mullikin Company, Marietta, Ohio. Paper binding, 15 cents. This booklet is what its title implies, a "show up" of the saloon in its true light and proper perspective. The stock arguments of those who plead for a further continuance of the saloon in business, such as "Saloons make business lively," "Dry territory is dead territory," "No right to destroy vested interests," "The farmer's market will be ruined," "Taxes increased," and many other arguments, are met and answered by a calm, dispassionate presentation of facts which compels conviction. The author, however, is not content to simply answer arguments. He is a master hand in counter assault. He shows how every interest—national, state, local and individual—demands the suppression of the saloon. His final summing up is irresistible: "It is a crime against society and high treason against our posterity for intelligent, reasoning, accountable and responsible men not to deal a death blow at the liquor traffic. The prayers of wives and mothers demand it, pleading of dependent children demand it, the rights of the unborn demand it." Prohibition is effectively urged in the sixty pages of this booklet.

HOW GERMANY MAKES WAR.—General Frederick von Bernhardi. George H. Doran Company, New York City. $1.25. As a treatise on the German methods of war, this book is of especial interest at this time as an exposition of the ideas underlying the German plans for the war with the allies, and the methods on which the German staff rely in their operations in the field. In the editor's preface, we read: "The book is an attempt to show how war can be successfully conducted with the enormous masses of men now thrown into a conflict between nations, the armies of millions that put the whole fighting power of a people into the battle line. General von Bernhardi insists that while certain fundamental principles of war must always hold good, their practical application has to be considerably modified now that these 'armies of masses' are brought into action, and have to employ weapons and appliances more efficient than any which were used in earlier wars. The book was written for experts, and all serious students of war should read the complete translation of the work issued last year by Mr. Hugh Rees. But many readers will be glad to have the condensed version of General Bernhardi's treatise contained in the following pages." Some of the chapter titles are, "The secret of modern war," "Force and numbers," "Modern armies and appliances," "The importance of cavalry," "Attack and defense," "Principles of command," and "Naval warfare."

POEMS BY ROBERT UNDERWOOD JOHNSON.—Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis, Indiana. $1.50, postpaid. There are many splendid poems in this book, not the least of them being "The winter hour," which opens thus:

Of all the hours of day or night
Be mine the winter candle light,
When Day's usurpers of Love's throne—
Fame, Pride, and tyrant Care—are frown,
And hearts are letters of hid desire
Yielding their secrets at the fire.
Now beauty in a woman's face
Glows with a sympathetic grace,
And friend draws closer unto friend,
Like travelers near a journey's end.

MARK TIDD IN THE BACKWOODS.—Clarence B. Kelland. Harper and Brothers, New York, $1 net. A book for boys, in the same style and strain of the author's previous work, Mark Tidd.

Instead of Saying to Yourself

"I wish I were in Dixie," why don't you go South this Winter? The cost is low—perhaps not as much as you thought it would be. The resorts are numerous and Burlington service is better than ever. When it is cold and disagreeable in the North, it is delightful in the South, and those who have been fortunate enough to go there are luxuriating in its exotic atmosphere without a single thought of furnace fires and the constant menace of catching cold. A Winter's vacation in that romantic, historic and beautiful land South of the Mason and Dixon line will do you more good than a barrel of medicine.

Come in and let me tell you more about it or send for your copy of our Winter Excursion folder.

TWO NEW BOOKS OF VERSE

TREES AND OTHER POEMS, BY JOYCE KILMER<sup>1</sup>

Here is a poet who puts his worst foot forward. The opening poem, entitled, "The Twelve-forty-five," begins with these lines:

Within the Jersey City shed
The engine coughs and shakes its head.

We have never met with an engine that coughs and shakes its head. Like the small boy for the first time viewing a giraffe, we are tempted to say, "There ain't no such animal." But, of course, we may be mistaken, for as we might say,

The kind that are kept in Jersey City sheds
Perchance may cough and shake their heads.

Those who overlook this inauspicious beginning will find some real poems in this little volume. They may come to agree with Edwin Markham, who said of Joyce Kilmer: "His book ought to be in the hands of all lovers of that strange beauty we call poetry." Note for instance the gem entitled, "Trees," from which the book takes its title:

I think that I shall never see
A poem lovely as a tree.

A tree whose hungry mouth is prest
Against the earth's sweet flowing breast;

A tree that looks at God all day,
And lifts her leafy arms to pray;

A tree that may in summer wear
A nest of robins in her hair;

Upon whose bosom snow has lain;
Who intimately lives with rain.

Poems are made by fools like me,
But only God can make a tree.

If the poem to trees does not convert the reader to Markham's opinion of Kilmer's poetry he may perhaps fall victim to the simple charm of "The house with nobody in it":

Whenever I walk to Suffern along the Erie track
I go by a poor old farmhouse with its shingles broken and black.

I suppose I've passed it a hundred times, but I always stop for a minute

And look at the house, the tragic house, the house with nobody in it.

I never have seen a haunted house, but I hear there are such things;

That they hold the talk of spirits, their mirth and sorrowings.
I know this house isn't haunted, and I wish it were, I do;
For it wouldn't be so lonely if it had a ghost or two.

This house on the road to Suffern needs a dozen panes of glass,

And somebody ought to weed the walk and take a scythe to the grass.

It needs new paint and shingles, and the vines should be trimmed and tied;

But what it needs the most of all is some people living inside.

If I had a lot of money and all my debts were paid
I'd put a gang of men to work with brush and saw and spade.
I'd buy that place and fix it up the way it used to be,
And I'd find some people who wanted a home and give it to them free.

Now, a new house standing empty, with staring window and door,

Looks idle, perhaps, and foolish, like a hat on its block in the store.

But there's nothing mournful about it; it can not be sad and lone

For the lack of something within it that it has never known.

But a house that has done what a house should do, a house that has sheltered life,

That has put its loving wooden arms around a man and his wife,

A house that has echoed a baby's laugh and held up his stumbling feet,

Is the saddest sight, when it's left alone, that ever your eyes could meet.

So whenever I go to Suffern along the Erie track
I never go by the empty house without stopping and looking back;

Yet it hurts me to look at the crumbling roof and the shutters fallen apart,

For I can't help thinking the poor old house is a house with a broken heart.

"Wayside shrines!" said Goethe, "do they not serve to recall wide, wandering thoughts, and turn them to higher, better channels?"

This is the sentiment with which this book of verse is introduced; and following an epoch in which easy and impudent atheism was freely voiced by loose moraled half-poets, it is pleasant to find again the muse serving religion and morality. Many of the poems in this volume are devotional, most of them are religious.

A typical selection is "The prayer of the Breton fishermen on launching their boats," based on their simple petition: "Keep me, my God! My boat is so small,—and thy ocean so wide!"

Keep me, my God! keep me:
So small this boat of mine,—
So wide, thy deep, unresting sea,—
Deeper, thy love divine!

The winds are rising high,
But we must brave their might,—
God guide us 'neath this stormy sky,
God bring us home to-night.

O, thou who dost not sleep,
Watch o'er our homes this day:
Once thou didst walk upon the deep,—
To thee, to thee we pray.

Now keep us, God of might!
In faith we spread the sail,—
So wide this tossing sea, and white,—
So small our boat, and frail!

"By faith, 'tis a look into glory," is the title of another fine poem from this volume, inspired by reading the eleventh chapter of Hebrews:

"Now faith" is "things hoped for,"—the clasping
A hand meeting mine in the dark:
It is resting in Arms Everlasting,—
'Tis the dove flying back to the ark.

Now faith is the confident standing
On promises, firm as God's throne:
'Tis the heart's instinct, truer than reason,—
It is knowing what else were unknown!

"By faith" afar off to behold it,
That heavenly country of mine!
"By faith," 'tis a look into glory,—
A proving the promise divine!

While here I'm abiding, a pilgrim,
Earth's pathway of joy yet untrod,
I am looking by faith to that city
Whose Builder and Maker is God.

"By faith!" How it rings out in music,
Triumphantly thrilling and sweet;
How it echoed the song of Faith's victors,
The tread of their conquering feet!

On earth long as strangers they journeyed;
How nobly each burden they bore!
"By faith" they were seeking that country
Where weeping shall enter no more!

Evidently a very wholesome faith and a fairly sound theology dwells in the heart of this worshiper at wayside shrines. It is refreshing in a busy world of prose to wander for an hour in the rich, sweet fields of poetry, especially in the fields where bloom such fragrant flowers of faith. If we have neglected finer things of late years in the rush and under the burden, it will do us good to return betimes to the poets. God speaks through the true poet.

CURRENT EVENTS

SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

JEWISH REFUGEES.—The press reports that six thousand Russian, British and French Jewish refugees have fled from Palestine to Alexandria, Egypt, and that many more are to follow.

ALABAMA DRY.—Alabama will be a prohibition State after July 1. A few hours following Governor Henderson's veto on the 22d, both houses repassed two related measures by overwhelming majorities.

TO INVESTIGATE ELECTION.—Attorney General Gregory has ordered an investigation of charges of fraud in connection with the election in the Illinois district which resulted in the reelection of ex-speaker Joseph Cannon.

PRICE INVESTIGATION.—Under request from President Wilson, Attorney General Gregory has directed an investigation of the recent advance in prices of wheat and flour, to determine whether or not there has been violation of law.

A POTENTIAL POLAND.—The nucleus of a parliament to rule Poland if the Emperor is able and puts into effect his promise of an autonomous government, has been established at Warsaw by a congress of delegates from all parts of the country.

HAITIAN REBELLION.—Haitian revolutionists under Guillume, seem to be making headway against the Theodore Government. The northern part of the republic is said to be in the possession of the revolutionists. The United States gunboat Wheeler is in Haitian waters, and the cruiser Washington is ordered there.

LABOR TROUBLE.—Nineteen strikers, two of whom have died, were shot in a fight on the 19th between strikers and deputy sheriffs at the American Agricultural Chemical Company's works at Roosevelt, New Jersey. Thirty-two deputies are under arrest for murder. The trouble started when strikers stopped a train to see if strike breakers were aboard, and when office employees of the chemical company on the train started an outcry, thinking the strikers

ITALIAN EARTHQUAKE.—The earthquake in Italy seems more disastrous than at first report. Twenty-five thousand are said to have been killed and 40,000 to 50,000 injured. At Avezzano, about 60 miles east of Rome and where the shock was greatest, 11,000 of a population of 12,000 are reported dead, with like results elsewhere. The estimated damage to property is $60,000,000.

AT WASHINGTON.—The Republican senators are attempting, by what the Democrats pronounce an open filibuster, to defeat in the Senate the administration government ship purchase bill. Senator Burton, of Ohio, on the 20th, after three days of debate, yielded the floor to Senator Lewis, of Massachusetts. Other Republican leaders announced that they will follow. The effort is to prevent action at this session. The immigration bill has gone to the President, including the literacy test amendment, as finally passed. The House on the 22d passed an army bill carrying an appropriation of one hundred and one million dollars.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.—Complications have arisen over the Dacia, a German-owned shipping vessel, represented as having been purchased by Mr. Edward W. Breitung, a United States citizen. This vessel is loaded with cotton for Germany. Great Britain refuses to assure the United States Government of her uninterrupted passage, on the grounds that it is considered that the sale is not genuine. Representatives of the owner inform the Washington administration that the Dacia will proceed on her voyage, and Great Britain notifies the United States that she will be seized and taken before a prize court. Assurances are given that the cotton may proceed to Germany, or be sold in England. Reports of interference with trade at sea are less numerous, and indicate possible leniency on the part of Great Britain.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—Reports from Mexico are many and confusing, including the following: Provisional President Gutierrez, following his recent reelection by the national convention, fled from the capital, and General Roque Gonzales Garza, president of the convention and a Villa supporter, has been chosen to succeed him. Martial law has been declared in the city. The convention announces itself as supreme, and has assumed all legislative, executive and judicial powers. The convention seems yet loyal to both Villa and Zapata, but reports indicate friction between these two generals. Dispatches to Washington suggest the possible withdrawal of Villa, and an attempt by him to control the situation in northern Mexico. Carranza forces are said to be advancing toward the capital. Some dispatches indicate that the convention may remove from Mexico City. Report is that Gutierrez from Pachuca represents himself as the legal executive, charges that the convention is under military control, and declares Villa and Zapata deposed from their commands. The Carranza forces have withdrawn from Naco. All except one squadron of the United States troops have been ordered from this point. Word received at Washington is that the Tampico oil wells are being operated without molestation.

THE EUROPEAN WAR.—Weather conditions generally interfere with activities on both war fronts. The Russians with heavy reinforcements have advanced on the east bank of the Vistula River in northern Poland. They have also advanced to the west of Warsaw and in eastern Prussia, and have taken additional passes in the Carpathians commanding Transylvania. A partial evacuation of Cracow is said to have been ordered. It is rumored that Roumania may throw troops into Transylvania to protect her nationals. The Turks are reported to have met further disaster in the Caucasians. The Germans rested following their advances at Soissons, which were greater than formerly reported. The French claim slight gains along the coast, near Reims, south of Verdun, and in the Vosges. The Germans report ground gained on the Aisne. German victory over the English in eastern Africa is reported. Fresh Portuguese troops are ready to embark for Angola, a Portuguese possession on the western coast of Africa, invaded by the Germans. The French submarine Sapir, was sunk by Turkish artillery while attempting to enter the Dardanelles. Eight Turkish transports bearing troops are reported sunk by the Russian Black Sea fleet. A German raid on six English coast cities resulted in slight damage to property, four English killed, and a number wounded. That a Zeppelin was shot down by the English is denied in Germany. The Turkish Government is said to have renewed orders for the satisfaction of demands by Italy for the removal of British Consul Richardson from the Italian consulate at Hoeide.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

HERALD DESIRED.—Anyone having a copy of the HERALD for March 18, 1914, that can be spared, will confer a favor on the HERALD Editors if they will forward it to them for use in the editorial files. This number is entirely exhausted, and we have none for the files.

IN CLASS BY ITSELF.—The daily papers of the country as a rule have noted the death of President Joseph Smith in respectful terms, generally giving generous recognition to his godly life and character, and showing a decent respect for the feelings of the family and the church. Not so the Detroit News, which seizes the occasion to stand over his open tomb and villify his ancestors in the habitual manner of the average "Mormon Exposé." According to the News, the man to whom The Kansas City Journal paid such a glowing tribute sprung from ignorant, lazy, dishonest parents who apparently spent most of their time of nights pilfering from neighbors' clotheslines and larders. Thus in the presence of death and sorrow the News babbles on, in a class by itself, missing a splendid opportunity to be charitable, dignified, and at the same time truthful.

We are in receipt of an offering from the Ridgetown, Ontario, Sunday school for the assistance of the German Saints who are in need. The act is one so commendable that we wanted to pass it on, and wish you to feel at liberty to use it as your judgment may direct. If the European powers would refer the war to the Reorganized Church we believe it would soon be settled. We are positive it would be if the spirit which actuated these brethren and sisters under British rule, were the compelling influence in the lives of all God's Saints.

We are pleased to give place for this expression of encouragement to our people to do good under the trying conditions of the present European war. It is truly the bond of Christian love which prompts these Saints, loyal to their own nation, to seek to minister to kindred Saints loyal to another. This is the love which shall finally triumph over all differences, and bring the people of God to a unity of the faith which is to make possible the redemption of Zion, and the preparation for the coming of Christ.

THE BUST FUND

During the summer of 1914 Elder Frederick M. Smith made arrangements with Professor Jorgen C. Dreyer, an artist of considerable ability and reputation, to make a bust of President Joseph Smith. That it would be a fine thing to have such a bust for future generations, or at least for those who never met him and for those who would have tender recollection of him because of their association with him, there was little doubt. And while he was or seemed to be in fairly good health, it was thought by those who advised in the matter that there was no time like the present for such enterprise, though it could have been done years ago more successfully. President Joseph Smith was an aged man and naturally his tenure of life was made uncertain thereby. So the contract was made, the work was begun, and, fortunately, death withheld its coming until the model was complete and the final sitting had been made.

Professor Dreyer, in the judgment of all who have inspected the model and later the bronze bust, has done his work with remarkable skill. His task was not alone that of preserving features as they were in 1914. There were changes wrought because of blindness which he should undo,—it was to put his subject back ten, twelve, or fifteen years. Professor Dreyer worked zealously. He worked from dozens of photographs, had many of them enlarged. A visit to his studio during this work was like stepping into a photograph gallery. Regular trips to the studio were made by President Smith, attended by his wife, and transported by automobile to and from Kansas City by Brother William Crick, whose kindness in doing this labor of love will never be forgotten.

This movement, of course, must be financed. Even artists of so fine a temperament as has Professor Dreyer, must live; they must be paid. The task of raising funds for this purpose was undertaken by Brother Frederick M. Smith, in cooperation with Brother Wallace N. Robinson, then superintendent of the General Sunday School Association; but the latter, because of his resignation as such officer and the pressure of business affairs, was forced to forego his plans in regard to the bust. Brother Robinson, however, gave a substantial impetus to the movement by making a liberal donation thereto. The task thus falling back upon Brother Frederick M. Smith who had already taken up his work in the East and was heavily burdened, the undersigned volunteered to take the responsibility of raising the necessary amount to meet the expense. A number of the brethren suggesting the amount could be easily raised by private subscription and pledging their support, this plan was adopted and the work has been carried forward with considerable success.

But at this point the thought has come to us that perhaps there are many, many of President Smith's friends, old and young alike, who would like to help in this work, who would not like it if not given an opportunity to be identified with it. Many, perhaps, have not heard of it, and when the list of donors shall be published, as we contemplate doing when the bust is presented as a gift to the church by these friends of the late President, perhaps fault might be found with those in charge for not at least giving all an opportunity to be represented in this fund. For these reasons we make the foregoing statement, and herewith extend an invitation to everyone who desires to contribute to the bust fund to do so, that no one may feel he has been slighted should he be inclined to take such a view.

Remittance may be made to the Editor of the HERALD, Brother Elbert A. Smith, Lamoni, Iowa, or to either of the undersigned, Independence, Missouri. All remittances will be promptly receipted, and in due time the names of those who assist will be given in these columns.

GOD'S INFINITY

As we pause in the gateway of eternity and gaze out into the immensity of space, our hearts shrink to nothingness within, and the brain reels with the vastness of all without, while trying to comprehend the great infinitude.

Alas! how little we of finite powers can realize of the grandeur, the magnificence, and the magnitude of the works of almighty God.

Well, indeed did the counselor say, "This is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."

As we look upon the everlasting and eternal works of the great Master Mind, we are reminded very forcibly of the grave necessity of traveling in the highway of gospel righteousness and purity which will bring us eventually to the elevation of perfection that leads to the terraced heights from which extend upward the ivory steps, the summit of which reveals the golden gates, that give us entrance into the heavenly sanctuary of the church of the first born, which is the vestibule of heaven.

During our journeys we are made to wonder within ourselves and our hearts fear and tremble and grow faint, as the thought takes definite form: Are we worthy of entrance into the throne room of the heavenly monarch? Are we ready, are we prepared to be ushered into the august presence of the King of kings and Lord of lords who sits with majesty divine upon the great white throne?

As we have striven in the past to clarify and sanctify our souls, and follow in the footsteps of holiness and sanctity, of the lowly Nazarene, comes the peaceful, soul-reviving, uplifting, compassionate influence of the power of God's Holy Spirit, making lighter the heavy heart, inspiring the dull mind, and quickening the intellect. With this power to guide, no height seems insurmountable, no depth unfathomable; but with a keener vision and brighter prospect we press onward and upward with greater anticipation, anxiously awaiting the time when we might be allowed the unparalleled privilege of coming into the stately presence of our God.

We are all waiting anxiously, I was about to say patiently, for the redemption of Zion; let us not forget that Zion is the pure in heart.

The words of our Savior and friend, "Ye are the light of the world," should find continual expression in our hearts and lives, in our thoughts and acts, in our words and deeds.

This is the light of Christ. As also he is in the sun, and the light of the sun, and the power thereof by which it was made. . . . And the light which now shineth, which giveth you light, is through him who lighteneth your eyes, which is the same light that quickeneth your understanding; which light proceedeth forth from the presence of God, to fill the immensity of space.—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 2, 3.

As we stand upon the most distant parapets of earthly vision, and look out into myriad miles of endless space and behold in the heights unexplored and depths unknown, systems more vast, worlds, innumerable, lights and satellites stretching on and on and on, out into the incomprehensible expanse of eternity, constellation after constellation of worlds unknown, come into view. We look up into the milky way, "the workshops of God," and behold the millions upon millions of worlds yet unborn, and are brought to a realization of the eminent power of God.

Just so sure as we see God in the universe and the world, just so sure is he in the world of human beings, working for their salvation.

While the marvels of the physical universe are wonderful and God's divinity and infinity are mightily exemplified by them, yet the time is not far hence when God will make bare his holy arm in the eyes of the people, when other marvels will sink into insignificance by reason of the display of his power in our own realm of thought and action.

It behooves those who have taken upon themselves the name of our Lord Jesus Christ to set such examples before those of the world as will be worthy of emulation. God's mercy is boundless, his wisdom unlimited, and inasmuch as the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork, so should we put forth every effort, striving to magnify our calling before him.

Saints! What the work of God needs now more than any other thing is men and women who are willing to dedicate and consecrate themselves heart and soul to his service, are willing to put forth all of their energy and zeal into the onward movement of his church. He has lavished upon us his kindness and mercy. Shall we not in turn render unto him our reasonable service? Let us do this, not in the outward display of lip service, but from hearts of thankfulness and gratitude to our Savior, making known to him by lives of holiness and purity, by clean living in public and private, that it is our soul's desire to be worthy to be called the sons of God.

HEALTH HINTS NUMBER 2.—SLEEP

BY W. A. SINCLAIR, M. D.

Nearly everyone who is not a baby sleeps too little. Babies are in the way, and are dosed with soothing syrups and put to sleep, because to the public mind they are "troublesome little things." But when they grow up excess of sleep is exchanged for too little. Business, social intercourse, and, in many cases, dissipation, occupy so many of the twenty-four hours that rest is neglected. For this reason it was necessary for the Lord to speak to his people, telling them to "retire to thy bed early, that ye may not be weary; arise early, that your bodies and minds may be invigorated." (Doctrine and Covenants 85: 38.)

VALUE OF SLEEP

Many do not seem to know the value of sleep. They overlook the fact that it is the season of vital recuperation; that while the body is recumbent, the eyes closed, and the faculties at rest, repairs go on which are no less necessary for the duration of life than for the health of every individual.

Without the proper amount of sleep, the vital energy is dried up and withered, and we waste away as a tree would, deprived of that sap that nourishes it. The physical effects of sleep are that it retards all the vital movements, collects the vital power, and restores what has been lost in the course of the day, and separates us from what is useless and pernicious. It is, as it were, a daily crisis, during which all secretions are re-formed in the greatest tranquility and perfection.—Professor Hubbard.

Doctor J. C. Jackson remarks:

As a habit and fashion with our people, we sleep too little. It is admitted by all those who are competent on the subject, that the people of the United States, from day to day, not only do not get sufficient sleep, but they do not get sufficient rest. By the preponderance of the nervous over the vital temperament, they need the recuperating benefits which sleep can afford during each night as it passes. A far better rule would be to get at least eight hours' sleep, and, including sleep, ten hours of recumbent rest. It is a sad mistake that some make, who suppose themselves qualified to speak on the subject, in affirming that persons of a highly wrought, nervous temperament need—as compared with those with a more lymphatic or stolid organization—less sleep. The truth is that where power is expended with great rapidity, by a constitutional law, it is regathered slowly; the reaction after a while demanding much more time for the gathering up of new force than the direct effort demands in expending that force.

Thus, a man of the nervous temperament, after he has established a habit of overdoing, recovers from the effect of such overaction much more slowly than a man of different temperament would, if the balance between his power to do and his power to rest is destroyed. As between the nervous and lymphatic temperaments, therefore, where excess of work is demanded, it will always be seen that, at the close of the day's labor, whether it has been of muscle or thought, the man of nervous temperament, who is tired, finds it difficult to fall asleep, sleeps perturbedly, wakes up excitedly, and is more apt than otherwise to resort to stimulants to place himself in a condition of pleasurable activity; while the man of lymphatic temperament, when tired, falls asleep, sleeps soundly and uninterruptedly, and wakes up in the morning a new man. The facts are against the theory that nervous temperaments recuperate quickly from the fatigues to which their possessors are subjected. Three fourths of our drunkards are from the ranks of the men with nervous temperament. Almost all opium-eaters in our country—and their name is legion—are persons of the nervous or nervous-sanguine temperament. Almost all the men in the country who become the victims of narcotic drug-medicine are of the nervous or nervous-sanguine temperament.

People of the nervous-sanguine temperament are not so unsuccessful at manufacturing, as they are extravagant in expending the vital forces, and as you would control the prodigality of a money spendthrift by keeping him employed, so you should control the many hours of the twenty-four as can be done without recourse to pernicious drugs. Insanity often results from want of sleep.

Doctor Cornell states:

The most frequent and immediate cause of insanity, is want of sleep. Notwithstanding strong hereditary predisposition on the part of some people, if they sleep well they will not become insane. No advice is so good, therefore, to those who have recovered from an attack or those who are in delicate health, as that of securing by all means sound, regular, and refreshing sleep.

Doctor Spicer says:

There is no fact more clearly established in the physiology of man than this: That the brain expands its nerves and itself during the hours of wakefulness, and that these are recuperated during sleep; if the recuperation does not equal its expenditure, the brain withers—this is insanity. Thus it is that in early English history, persons who were condemned to death by being prevented from sleeping always died raving maniacs; thus it is, also, that those who starve to death become insane; the brain is not nourished, and they can not sleep.

The foregoing will demonstrate to our minds the necessity for sleep, also the amount and character, with the results of disobedience. No doubt the Lord had this very same idea in mind when he stated, "Retire to thy bed early, that ye may not be weary." (Doctrine and Covenants 85: 38.) A weary brain is nearing the boundary line of insanity.

HOW TO RETIRE

Now just a few words from Doctor Hall, on how to retire to bed:

In freezing winter-time, do it in a hurry, if there is no fire in the room, and there ought not to be unless you are quite an invalid. But if a person is not in good health, it is best to undress by a good fire, warm and dry the feet well, draw on the stockings again, run into a room without a fire, jump into bed, bundle up, with head and ears under cover for a minute or more, until you feel a little warmth; then uncover your head, next draw off your stockings, straighten out, turn over on your right side and go to sleep. If a sense of chilliness comes over you on getting into bed, it will always do you an injury; and its repetition increases the ill effects without having any tendency to harden you. Nature ever abhors violence. We are never shocked into good health. Hard usage makes no garment last longer.

It is really quite important that a person should retire on the right side. This position favors the passage of the contents of the stomach into the duodenum, or lower stomach, the first division of the intestines. It is well that what remains in the stomach on going to bed should be disposed of, and that position which will the best conduce to the digestion and removal of this matter is the one which should be adopted. By the time the sleeper has become tired of resting on his right side, unless he has taken a late supper, his digestive organs will have been sufficiently relieved to allow him without disadvantage to turn upon the left.

Sleeping upon the back is a bad habit, because the pressure of the contents of the bowels upon some important arteries interferes with a free circulation of the blood, resulting in frightful and disagreeable dreams, and nightmare.

UNITY

Under the conditions existing in the world, Latter Day Saints should easily see the necessity of bending every effort to the upbuilding of Christ's work upon earth. We are living in a trying age, and without the hope of the gospel the outlook would not be promising. It is surely a time when we should stand "in holy places."

The writer has no desire to criticize; but we believe there is a besetting sin, which we should, can, and must overcome before we can hope for any great degree of progress. This sin of omission is the lack of unity among those who ought to be God's children. He has said, "Except ye are one, ye are none of mine." Have we taken sufficient notice of that very significant statement? We are exhorted time and again to be united in our warfare, and the wisdom of this advice is so obvious that we can all understand,—“but yet,”—etc.

Just here we might take a few observations which should teach us a valuable lesson. As we turn the pages of ancient, medieval, and modern history, we find progress and accomplishment, even to the establishment of great world powers, in the union and concentration of purpose; and we find downfall, decay, and ruin in friction and disalliance.

Let us for a moment examine those large business corporations which have obtained such power that they are able to successfully combat the whole Nation. We find those who formed these combines to be men of one purpose; they knew what they wanted and were willing to organize themselves and “pull together.” As a result of this unity of purpose, capital, and action, they have built great monuments to the efficiency of united effort.

Suppose sixty thousand Latter Day Saints were as earnestly engaged in the work of “redeeming Zion” as these men are in the accumulation of wealth; would it be possible to overestimate the result? If under human leadership, by and through united effort, nations are established and deserts become gardens, what might we not be able to accomplish under divine leadership!

Our church stands in a position to-day to lead the world in the solution of the greatest problems that ever confronted humanity. People everywhere are crying for a system of economics which will at least enable all to live in some degree of common decency, and give the poor man a chance to make useful citizens of his children, instead of making criminals of them. The Lord has given us a law which will solve this great question, but we are a little too suspicious one of the other to allow its operation; the world however is fast coming to these principles, and before we know it they will be leading, and we will be bringing up the rear.

We can easily see the mistakes that the church made in its early organization by not following divine instruction. We can all see how much better our condition might have been if a few of the early Saints had exercised a little more faith and not quite so much,—“wisdom” (?). What will the verdict of the next generation be, as they contemplate the results of our actions?

A loving Father is still calling us to come up higher. He still manifests his willingness to be our leader; and he still admonishes us to unite in order that we might accomplish the work which he has for us to do. Let us then rise to our opportunity, throw off our petty grievances, unite our energies and comply with the instructions given, and ere long the nations of the earth will say, “Come, let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob: and he shall teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths.” W. G. BADHAM.

SOCIAL PURPOSE OF EDUCATION

IN THEORY AND PRACTICE

At the Iowa State Teachers Association meeting on November 7, 1914, we were privileged to hear an address by Doctor George D. Strayer, of Columbia University, on the above subject. The ideas were so excellent that we believe the readers of this department should have an opportunity to know what leading educators of to-day are thinking and saying. It is of interest to add that Bishop Joseph Roberts in an address to the high school and college students on December 10, presented many similar thoughts. From memory and a few notes we herewith reproduce a summary.

The purpose of education is mental training. But a trained mind that keeps all to itself and gives nothing to the world is of little social value. We should have a purpose in our education, and that purpose is well illustrated by the parable of the talents. He who improved his talents was rewarded, but he who made no use of his talent and put it away lost what he had. If you have a talent, don't hide it, but use it, and use it for social service.

The man-who counts is not the man who merely preserves the traditions of the past, who continues in the well-beaten path of his fathers, and preserves to us that which has been handed down to him; it is the man who opens up new fields of thought and action; who sees the possibilities in his specialty and makes the most of them. It is the pioneer in thought, and in action, whom we delight to honor. It is so in science, it is so in philosophy. And in business it is not the man who received from his father an established trade and who carries it on in the same way, but it is the man who sees the possibilities, not of yesterday, but of to-day, and who develops them—it is he who succeeds greatly. In manufacturing it is not the man who makes the same articles that were made for past generations, who scores the great success; but it is the man who sees the possibilities of the present demand, who creates new demands and meets them. It is so in scholarship; it is so all along the line. And with this growing knowledge there comes power and the rewards of service.

We do not begrudge the scholar or the scientist the honor that is due him for new discoveries; nor do we begrudge to the millionaire the wealth which he accumulates; nor do we begrudge the captain of industry the power which is his, provided only that this honor, this wealth, this power is gained and exercised in behalf of the good of all, and is secured through an effort for social service for humanity.

Individualism may be right, if right we may decry this other, but to our mind the ideal is the cooperative effort for the common good. There are many definitions given us of society. Are they correct? I do not know. But I do know that society is and should be an association of men and of women who are willing to work for the common good.

We must think, but there are many people in the world who are thinking over its troubles, are ready to weep, and they would like to have us weep. In fact, if they had their way, society would be one big, bawling Infants' Home.

There are others who think and like to discuss the question. They are very willing to discuss what should be done, but if they had their way we should be just one big debating club.

Thinking has its place, sorrow has its place, discussion has its place, but we need men and women who will not only think and discuss and weep, but who will also act for the common good, in a cooperative effort towards the only possible ideal. And our boys and girls and our men and women from the kindergarten to the university under right leadership can be made to work together for the general good. The difficulty is that they are not required to think, but only to memorize the words of others. These words may have been good in the past, they may have been splendid once, but to-day what we need is boys and girls, men and women, who are able and not afraid to think, and to think concerning the problems not of yesterday, but of to-day.

I venture to say that a new generation will look back upon our methods of teaching of to-day as belonging to the Dark Ages and wooden pedagogy. In the kindergarten our children are taught to memorize, but not to think. In the grammar school they are again taught not to think. Through high school and into college they go without thinking. Our laboratories are all too often for setting down prescribed results, instead of being what they should be, centers of research. Students set out to get an answer and not get it too close, for that would be suspicious. They get 95 per cent; they get 93 per cent, but what do they know? I would rather that a boy of mine should attend a school for one week where he was taught to think for himself and meet the problems of to-day, than to memorize and recite all the books in all the college libraries in America.

We want the answer to practical problems of to-day. "Girls, bring me the answer to-morrow: Which is the most economical method of cooking and why, a coal range, a gasoline range, or an electric range? Which is the most efficient and why?" "Girls, discuss the value of the electric iron, or the gas iron, as compared with the old-fashioned sad iron."

"Boys, for to-morrow your problem will be, Which is the most efficient method of heating, coal stoves, hot air furnaces, hot water, or steam?"

Wonderful results have already been secured by following these methods. But much remains yet to be done, especially in the schools throughout this broad land. Language, mathematics, literature, and history, all have their place; culture has its place; knowledge has its place. But our storehouse of knowledge would represent the principals, which should be put to interest, and the income used to meet the practical problems of to-day. The whole funds should thus be devoted to social service, and its value tested by its usefulness to society and the common good. We do not want a phonographic record to repeat other men's thoughts, but we want and must have men and women who can think, and think to solve the social problems of to-day; boys and girls with habits of service, with social ideals, and with the needed preparation. And then we need that preparation, those ideals donated in a cooperative effort for the common good of society.

EDITORIAL NOTE

These criticisms represent a strong tendency of education to-day. Another very marked phase is the growing importance of vocational training fitting boys and girls for definite work; and to this end many leading educators are cooperating with the business men of the community. But we do not want to lose sight of the spiritual and inspirational value of the study of foreign languages. Critical experiments recently made indicate that the study of Latin has a very high value for students of shorthand and bookkeeping. We can most heartily agree that the value of education must be measured by its unfolding of the powers of the individual, and to the extent that these powers are used for social purposes.

THE VALUE OF PREPARATION

It is surprising to remember that twenty to twenty-five years ago we heard school work so much discredited by men of the church. A college was presented as in the same class as the lower regions, and one who went to college became ipso facto a lost soul. Psychological historical developments on this thought is interesting, and may be taken up in the discussion of such a problem as the moral obligation to be intelligent.

It does seem an amazing thing to say that the work of God can only be done by those who are ignorant, and even to our childish mind we could not understand how studying could affect our faith and the Supreme Being. Not wishing to be high-headed, we made it a matter of fasting and prayer, and the result has been that we have felt more and more strongly directed to use all possible time in study.

Then, in 1906, at the Independence Stake reunion, we listened to a discourse by President Frederick M. Smith on "Mind culture." What he really talked about was: Resolved, that college education is not a detriment to the man engaged in ministerial work. At the close his father took up the theme, discussing the topic: Resolved, that a college education is not essential to ministerial service. After the service we heard two interesting remarks, one by a high priest, "Fred musn't think that just because we are opposed to Graceland College, that for that reason we are not in favor of education"; the other by a seventy, "Fred musn't think that just because we do not favor education, therefore we are opposed to Graceland College."

"Why, do you not believe in education?"

"No, I do not."

"Well, you may have noted that Fred's theme was that it was not a detriment. Surely you do not think an education a detriment to a man in the missionary field?"

"Well,—yes; I do."

"You think it would be a real hindrance to you and your work if you had a college education?"

"Yes, sir!"

Well, it passed; and about 1910 a young man in much surprise came to us with the information that one of the leading missionaries of the church had told him, that he didn't think the school of the prophets would be of any use to him; that its purpose would be to prepare young men in missionary service, and he already understood his work as a seventy, and so had nothing to gain from such a school. This seems to us to mark considerable progress backwards, though it involves a different individual. For it is one thing to believe that no institution of the world can teach us anything, and another thing to hold that not even the brethren with the help of the inspiration of the Spirit in the school of the prophets can teach us anything.

But the extreme limit we think was reached within the last couple of years by a Sunday-school teacher, who when considering the question of the resurrection of the dead started to ask questions about the conditions of the millennium, and then wanted to know what we should do in the millennium. This time it was a seventy who started. "Well, I think we shall be gathered in Zion."

"Yes, and then what?"

"Well, there will be a school established."

"Oh, yes, I know there will be a school, but what will we do?"

"Well, as I was just saying, there will be a school, and——"

"Oh, of course, there will be a school, but then, brother, you and I have the gospel. There will be a school for the heathen nations, but what do we need of a school? We already know the gospel."

The answer he wanted was that we would sit upon the throne judging the nations of the world.

Now, there may be others in the church who do not believe that any school or college of the world, or otherwise, the brethren of the First Presidency in the school of the prophets, or even the Lord can teach them anything. But we believe that such persons are few, and are growing scarcer in number. The last twenty years has shown marked growth of understanding of the value of preparation, of getting ready, of finding what may be our natural talents, and developing them so far as we can for the sake of service in God's kingdom.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

"Much is made of the young people to-day, and the old and middle-aged are ignored, and you fail to appreciate the man who has sacrificed his opportunities and desires in order to look after the work of the church."

A. To our mind any person is young who is alive enough to want to do better work. The HERALD a few months back told of a young girl working on a piece of fancywork. She wrote that she hoped to do better with more practice. When a reporter looked her up, because her work was exceptionally good, he discovered that she was only ninety-four years old. We hope we appreciate very much the sacrifice that has been made by men on whom rested the burden of the work, and who have carried it on the past years; but because these men have had to give up their desire for special training, because these men have not had the opportunity to gain such knowledge as they have desired and still desire, is no reason why this opportunity should be denied to men and women, and young boys and girls to-day. Nor can we see how it profits the church to limit present opportunities, because of past denial.

Q. Will not the time come when no man will be ordained to a permanent position in the church unless he has been to Graceland College?

A. We most emphatically hope not. For many able men and women have secured their education elsewhere.

Q. Will not the time come when a majority or nearly all of the prominent officials of the church will be college graduates?

A. Again, we most emphatically hope not, because some of the ablest men have been self-trained, and the church should not lose the benefit of their ability. Education is not entirely a matter of school work, though school work is the most efficient general method found so far. The church is entitled to the ablest men who can be secured for each and every work. On the other hand, that devotion and spirit of sacrifice which will deny one's self in order to secure special training to fit one's self as well as possible for service in the church is the same devoted spirit that we need in positions of trust and responsibility.

GRACELAND COLLEGE

Letters were sent out to all subscribers to the endowment fund of Graceland College late in December. At this date, January 12, a faithful few have been heard from. We appreciate the financial stringency this year, but wish again to emphasize that Bishop Kelley expected the amount to be advanced by him to be only in addition to that regularly received from endowment fund and college day collection, so as to make the amount as small as possible paid from any church fund. We appreciate the very generous support in the past, and sincerely trust that it may be continued.

PALESTINE FACING FAMINE

New York, January 11.—The provisional executive committee for General Zionist affairs made public to-night a letter received from its agent, Wold Gluskin, who is now in Alexandria, dated December 4, in which he says:

Conditions in Palestine are becoming worse every day. Palestine is facing a famine, a real famine in the fullest sense of the word. Is it possible that the population of an entire country will be left to starve?

Permission to remove gold from here to Palestine is not so easily obtained, but, thanks to the efforts of Ambassador Morgenthau, the local authorities are favorably inclined.

The American Jewish relief committee has under way arrangements for sending foodstuffs to Palestine, it was announced.—Associated Press Report.

POLISH DEVASTATION

[The following is of interest in a study of the effect of the European war on the Jews, since a large proportion of the inhabitants of the Polish countries are Jews.—EDITORS.]

New York, January 19.—The president of the chief national Polish committee in Vienna, M. Jaworski, cabled to the Associated Press in New York an appeal for help for Polish war sufferers. The text of his message, which is dated Vienna, January 19, is as follows:

The terrible war has brought about the devastation of all the Polish countries. The Polish nation put forth heroic efforts and made untold sacrifices. It has reached a condition of misery never before experienced in its history.

All contributions either of money, food or clothing will be received with deep gratitude, and will be further evidence of the well-known generosity and nobleness of heart of the American people.

JEWISH COLONIZATION DESTROYED

Alexandria, January 18.—The influx of Jews continues. The American cruiser Tennessee is going continuously between Alexandria and Jaffa, conveying refugees gratuitously from Palestine. The question of accommodation has become a very serious problem.

The latest refugees state that a pronounced anti-Semitic persecution is beginning, and the entire colonization work of thirty years is being destroyed.

The Turks accuse the Jews of favoring the allies, and Arabs have been ordered to seize Jewish lands. Circassians are being settled in each colony. On January 8, Djemal Pasha ordered the destruction of all Jewish colonization documents.—Chicago Herald, January 19, 1915.

JEWISH REFUGEES

Washington, January 18.—Official dispatches to the State Department reported the arrival at Alexandria, Egypt, of six thousand Jews from Palestine. Seventy-five per cent of them were Russians and the remainder British and French. More than four thousand were said to be destitute.

An equal number of Jewish refugees from Palestine were reported coming to Alexandria.—Kansas City Journal, January 19, 1915.

COMING JEWISH NATION

The only nation which looks on Palestine as its home is the Jewish nation. It is close on two thousand years since the Romans destroyed the temple and blotted out the last visible embodiment of Jewish independence, yet throughout the centuries the idea of a return to Palestine has never been absent from the thought of the Jewish race. Within the last few days it has suddenly appeared conceivable that the great wheel of time may now come full circle, and that the Jews may cease to weep when they remember Zion. . . .

It seems as though we were on the threshold of the greatest reconciliation that history has ever known. It is no mere vision. Solid considerations of interest dictate the policy of the reestablishment of an independent Palestine. British and French needs demand a neutral zone between Syria and Egypt. Russia must settle the Jewish question if her plan for the regeneration of Poland is to be carried out.—London Outlook.

FUND FOR THE JEWS

Kansas City Jews have determined to raise twenty-five thousand dollars for the relief of destitute Jewish people in the European war zone. That this sum will be provided goes without saying, and it would not be surprising if it were doubled. Incidentally, the movement furnishes an excellent opportunity for reciprocity. There are a number of wealthy and broad-minded Jews in Kansas City whose purses are always open whenever an appeal is made affecting the welfare of the city as a whole. This is a good chance for those who have been the beneficiaries of this generosity that disregards credal and racial boundaries to testify their appreciation by contributing to the fund for the distressed Jews of Europe.

Of course, this is only incidental. So far as their public statements are concerned, the Jews are not making any general appeal, but are confining themselves to their own people. The fact can not be evaded, however, that in addition to taking the most generous and admirable care of their own unfortunate in every large city, Jewish philanthropists are among the most liberal contributors to all community movements.

It is the unhappy fate of this scattered race that its nationals are found under every flag in Europe. That there are many thousands of Jews arrayed, by dire stress of circumstances, against each other in battle line must be conceded. The fortunes of war have divided Poland into three parts, and each part contains thousands of Jews. Russia has millions of the race within its boundaries. Wherever there is suffering, there are certain to be Jews among the sufferers, and one of the most gratifying of the prospective results of the great war is the larger measure of justice that is to be accorded to the Jew, if indeed the dream of Zionism itself is not to be realized.

But in the meantime millions of Jews are in want, and Doctor Emil G. Hirsch left a sick bed to come to Kansas City and raise his voice in behalf of the movement just launched, declaring that in many places the plight of the Jews is worse than that of the Belgians themselves. The degrees of misery need not be specified, for everybody knows that no assistance given in this frightful time of distress will be misapplied or be superfluous. The Jews of America will respond with all of their notable warm-heartedness to the cry of their stricken race abroad, and Kansas City Jews will do, at the very least, their full share.—Kansas City Journal, December 30, 1914.

CHURCHES DIFFERENT

[The following, under the heading, "Utah and Reorganized churches of Saints are vastly different," appeared in The Kansas City Post for December 23. It is illustrative of the large amount of publicity recently given the Reorganized Church, all of which makes clear the features which distinguish it from the Utah Church.—EDITORS.]

To the Post:

What is a Mormon?

* Many people in Kansas City have read of Mormons, and when they see the word they connect it with polygamy.

There is no such church as the Mormon Church. It is a nickname that was applied to the original Utah Church because of the fact that the works of Mormon were studied.

But the Reorganized Church is as much different from the Utah Church as is the Protestant from the Catholic religion. The two churches of the Latter Day Saints have no connection, are not affiliated with each other. Each is a separate denomination.

The Utah Church was started by Brigham Young, a Latter Day Saint, who, becoming filled with a love of power, succeeded in obtaining authority over a portion of the church and led them to Utah in 1847. When the Utah aggregation grew to ten thousand people he ordered them rebaptized and ministers were reordained, making an entirely new organization.

MEMBERS SCATTERED

Like a counterfeiter, he renamed his new institution after the original organization.

The members of the original church were scattered after the death of Joseph and Hyrum Smith. When they were reorganized they became known as the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. The name "Reorganized" changed it from the rebellious church in Utah.

The courts have upheld the Reorganized Church as the original church. The courts found that the "rebel" church had drafted into its book of faith the doctrines of celestial marriage, plurality of wives and Adam God worship.

The term "Mormon" was originally applied to the original church, because the books of Mormon were studied. Then to the Utah Church out of ignorance. In the books of Mormon studied by the Reorganized Church the doctrines set forth are strictly against polygamy and strongly advocate monogamy.

DID NOT WORSHIP SMITH

The people of the Reorganized Church did not worship Joseph Smith, who recently died. They only considered him a prophet of the faith, and followed him only so far as he followed the Bible.

The new church that was recently dedicated in Independence was of the Mormon "rebel" church. It had no connection with the Reorganized Churches, of which there are several in Kansas City and Independence.

Each was headed by a Joseph Smith until the recent death of the one who led the Reorganized Church. The two men were cousins. Their beliefs were different, but for all that they were friends and visited with each other—with the strict understanding that matters of faith should be avoided.

Mothers' Home Column

EDITED BY CHRISTIANA SALYARDS, LAMONI, IOWA

Higher Ideals for Children

I am inclosing article from the Kansas City Times, November 24, 1914, corroborative of the evidence submitted in my article under the above caption, and published in Mothers' Home Column, SAINTS' HERALD, October 28, 1914.

HARDEST STUDY IS PLAY

To those who have labored through the tedium of textbooks and now look back with a shudder at their grueling encounters with geography, arithmetic, history, algebra, trigonometry, spelling, the languages, etc., doubtless it will seem strange to learn that a little twelve-year-old girl should make the study of those subjects her play and pastime.

Yet that is just what has been done by little Winifred Sackville Stoner, jr., of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, the daughter of Doctor and Mrs. James Buchanan Stoner. Mr. Stoner is now in command of the United States Marine Hospital at Pittsburgh. Mrs. Stoner is known in the literary world as Winifred Sackville Stoner, sr.

Little Winifred, because of her remarkable mental attainments and extraordinary physical development, has attracted the attention of educators the country over. At one year old she used polysyllables and conversed as fluently in "good English" as the average baby of that age prattles along in "baby talk." At sixteen months she was able to read. At three she was as mentally efficient as the average child at nine or ten. At five she was able to talk several languages, and did a hundred and one other things that would have taxed the capacity of a high school student.

SPEAKS EIGHT LANGUAGES

At nine she passed the entrance examinations of one of the large Western universities, and now at twelve she is able to speak eight languages, has written nine books, has taught Esperanto in the Carnegie Institute in Pittsburgh, is an accomplished performer on the violin and the piano, has acquired unusual proficiency in esthetic dancing, paints and sketches exceptionally well, has beaten several widely known chess champions, is an expert swimmer and clever gymnast, can cook, crochet, knit, sew, fence, row, skate, box, ride horseback, play ball, is an enthusiastic motorist, and is ready to take graduate work in any university in the country. But with it all she is just a lovable little girl, not a little old woman as one might imagine, and has as much fun with her dolls, her toys and her canary bird as any other little girl her age in the land.

The head of the department of education in a large university in the Northwest journeyed to Pittsburgh to test the child. Before he left he was playing at dolls with her and wheeling one of her pet rag infants around in a go-cart.

Inquiring into the matter, he found that the secret of the child's development lay in the method which her mother had used to educate and train her. For Mrs. Stoner had invented a system for the education and training of her daughter which she called natural education, in which everything that ordinarily would have been classed as toil was converted into play—play with a purpose.

So enthusiastic did the professor become that he urged Mrs. Stoner to prepare and outline and analysis of her system, and this he himself submitted to the Bobbs-Merrill Company of Indianapolis, who have just published the material in a little book especially prepared for mothers and teachers called "Natural Education."

A LESSON FROM TABBY

"We can learn from Mother Tabby as to nature's intended first teacher of the young," Mrs. Stoner says, "Mother Tabby never allows grandmothers, cousins, aunts or hirelings to give her children their first lessons. She insists on being their teacher herself, and regards this privilege as one of the inalienable rights of motherhood. Moreover, she never plays aimlessly, but always with a purpose. Above all, wise Mme. Cat uses the best language at her command in addressing her little ones, never breaking into 'kitty-itty meowies' like mothers of children."

It all hinges on the spirit of the play which enters into every task under the Stoner system of natural education.

Unable to sing, Mrs. Stoner chanted lines from Virgil's "Aeneid" to her little one when she became restless, or recited passages from famous poems and the classics. The even flow of language as she scanned the Latin and recited the poems and the rhythm of her vocal tones pacified the baby. Gradually the child began to imitate.

Then came her first natural educational game—called "Arma Virumque" ball. Mrs. Stoner would roll a large, red ball to the baby and pronounce the first word in the "Aeneid"—"Arma." The baby was taught to roll the ball back, pronouncing as she did so the second word, "Virumque." In time, by means of this game, little Winifred was taught to scan the first ten lines of the famous Latin classic in a manner that did not overtax her mentality.

Instead of giving the baby a rattle for aimless amusement, Mrs. Stoner attached a balloon to the baby's wrist. Each day a different colored balloon was used. Thus baby came to concentrate its attention and became accustomed to the different colors and sizes and shapes.

Arithmetic, algebra, geometry, trigonometry and the other branches of mathematics became fairy lore—mysterious journeys into the realms of good giants. Arithmos was one of them. Subtraction became a great battle waged between Major Subtrahend and General Minuend and the survivor on the field of conflict was the poor little Remainder.

Geography became a puzzle first and then a wonderful journey around the world. First cut out puzzles were used. The map of the United States, for instance, was prepared in cut out shape, each state fitting into its proper place. Winifred then set to work piecing the map together. Thus she learned the position, the size and shapes of the states.

Another important feature of Mrs. Stoner's system is that she recommends that a child be given an opportunity to teach others what it has learned. This she says assists it in retaining the knowledge it acquires. Winifred has been teaching other children ever since she was three years old, and to this day continues the practice.

TEN EDUCATIONAL COMMANDMENTS

According to Mrs. Stoner, there are ten commandments in natural education, just as there are in our religion. These she gives as follows:

Thou shalt not administer physical punishment.

Thou shalt not scold, but give rewards for good behavior.

Thou shalt never say "don't" to a child.

Thou shalt avoid the word "must"; it implieth doing a thing against one's will.

Thou shalt not give thy child an opportunity to disrespect thee.

Thou shalt not frighten a child.

Thou shalt not allow a child to say, "I can't"; show him how.

Thou shalt always answer a child's questions.

Thou shalt not tease a child.

Thou shalt make thy home the most attractive place a child can find.

Recently a mother wrote asking Mrs. Stoner how much time it would require should a mother undertake to employ the natural educational method of training her child.

"Not any more time than you spend now at play with your little one," was Mrs. Stoner's reply. "Just play with a purpose when you play; that's all that is required. Of course, the more you play the more your baby will learn. That is all there is to it."

NATURAL EDUCATIONAL METHODS

This story of the education of little twelve-year-old Winifred Sackville Stoner is a practical demonstration of the infinite possibilities of the advancement in every respect of the human race.

It would be difficult to find a more thorough demonstration of the practicability of the thorough operation of the higher law in relation to the duties and responsibilities of men, women and children, as is clearly stated in Doctrine and Covenants 46: 6, "For all men must repent and be baptized, and not only men but women; and children who have arrived to the years of accountability." Doctrine and Covenants 17: 20, says, "No one can be received into the church of Christ unless he has arrived unto the years of accountability before God, and is capable of repentance." In Doctrine and Covenants 28: 13, we read, "Behold, I say unto you, that little children are redeemed from the foundation of the world, through mine Only Begotten; wherefore they can not sin, for power is not given unto Satan to tempt little children, until they begin to become accountable before me; for it is given unto them even as I will, according to mine own pleasure, that great things may be required at the hand of their fathers."

At the hand of the fathers, yes, and at the hands of the mothers, the sisters, the brothers, the uncles, and aunts, of every church official, of every organization, of every Saint; that each on their own part and in cooperation with every other may help to bring about those conditions which shall render possible the normal development of every child in advancing knowledge along practical, physical, mental and spiritual lines; that with clearly defined knowledge of the purpose of being, they may be as they should be, under proper environment, to become children of the covenant in very deed.

Wonderful are the responsibilities of those who have covenanted with Jesus Christ to follow in his steps. Those responsibilities fulfilled, surely the highest aspirations of the soul is attainable, and "This earth shall be a blessed place to Saints celestial given." ROBERT WINNING.

SUBJECTS FOR THE FOURTH THURSDAY IN JANUARY

That the Father will hear our prayers for the church and for her leaders; for Zion is as one that mourns. For Jesus' sake may he hear and answer when we cry, and give us so fully of his Holy Spirit that each may fulfill in himself that which we desire.

Lesson, 1 Peter 3: 12-17; memory verse, verse 8.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYERS

Sister Mary B. Lizer, of Orson, Iowa, requests prayers for her mother, who has been in poor health for some time, and who is now almost bedfast. Sister Lizer also asks that prayers may be offered that she may realize a desire upon her own part.

Sister E. C. Hackett, of Oregon City, Oregon, requests prayers. She is informed by physicians that she must undergo an operation for tumor, which in their judgment is her only hope. The sister says her faith is strong, and she desires that God shall hear and answer her petition, and that she may be delivered from her affliction without an operation.

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS, January 7, 1915.

Dear Sisters of the Prayer Union: I wish to present to your column the name of Sister Julia V. Neal, requesting that she be remembered. Sister Neal was one of the first members of the Prayer Union and has always been a faithful member. She is now afflicted with rheumatism in her right arm and suffers a great deal. Will you kindly remember her.

Your sister in the cause of Christ,

The Children's Home Department

EDITED BY HEMAN C. SMITH AND CALLIE B. STEBBINS,
LAMONI, IOWA

History of the Children's Home

The Children's Home is located in the southern part of Lamoni, on a twenty-acre piece of land, formerly owned by Brother Elijah Banta.

The commodious dwelling built by him was the home of his heirs after the death of himself and his wife, and with them for a time Sister Marietta Walker made her home. While here she had many day dreams of the time when the place would be used as a home for homeless children. The situation and arrangement of house and grounds, with the beautiful lawn and fine large trees made it an ideal place for this purpose, and it seemed impressed upon her that here the home would be.

Working with her sisters of the church in the organization then known as the Daughters of Zion, she had inspired them with a zeal for this worthy cause, and year by year a fund was accumulating for the purpose of establishing a home for children. This fund was placed in the hands of the Bishop of the church.

In April, 1906, the Lord gave encouragement to the work in a revelation which said that a home for children should be established, and that "the effort of the Daughters of Zion should be approved and carried unto completion as soon as is consistent with the necessary demands of the work of the church in other directions."

Some years later the Banta place was offered for sale, and some were disappointed when it passed into other hands, and after all, as it seemed, was not to become the home for our needy children. Plans were made for locating the home on unimproved land in another part of town. This land was secured, and is still held as the property of the home. But changes occurred, and again the Banta place was for sale. In the spring of 1911 this place was purchased with money from the fund which at that time amounted to nearly fifteen thousand dollars.

The work of preparing the place for the children was at once begun. The house was remodeled and enlarged, so that it now has eighteen rooms, besides bath rooms and closets. On August 15, 1911, a formal opening was held, and on this happy occasion Bishop E. L. Kelley, Sister Marietta Walker, and Sister B. C. Smith, president of the Woman's Auxiliary, were the speakers. (In April of this year the Daughters of Zion had adopted the above name.)

At the time of the opening two girls had been received as inmates of the home, under the care of Brother and Sister

W. P. Robinson, who had been installed as superintendent and matron. Each month brought other children, until in 1912 the limit of the accommodations was reached when forty children were being cared for in the home.

Since that time the number has never been so large. At present it is the lowest it has been at any time since the first month, being only twenty-two. The total number of children who have been received at the home is eighty-three. Forty-three have been returned to friends; twelve have been placed in homes for adoption; two have been dismissed as inmates, but retained as help in the home; three have died at the home; and one was sent to the State Hospital for tuberculosis patients, where she has since died.

In the control of the home the Woman's Auxiliary was at first represented by a committee known as the executive committee. This was a committee from the advisory board of that organization, and was composed of sisters residing at Lamoni. By an action of the General Conference, this committee was associated with the Presiding Bishopric in the management of the affairs of the home.

In 1912 a board of trustees was appointed for the home by the General Conference. Provision was made that three of the seven members of this board should be women, nominated by the Woman's Auxiliary.

Conditions at the Home

In our little family at the Children's Home we have our trials as well as at other homes.

Since our last appearance we have had a peculiar trial that has affected the whole family. Two of our number were suddenly stricken with what was pronounced scarlet fever. They were quickly isolated from the rest, and so far there are no symptoms of its attacking others, but of course this required a quarantine, and hence all who were attending school had to be kept at home. This was a serious loss, as the children will be behind their classes, and much embarrassment will result. However, the afflicted ones are improving nicely, and all are bearing the loss cheerfully.

The management are maintaining the usual good discipline, and by the blessings of God we hope all will be in their places in a few days. The assistant matron, Sister Helen, is doing all she can to help the children with their lessons. The matron, Sister Robinson has been, and is afflicted, at times, quite seriously, and her pleasant face and loving service is much missed by the little ones. We hope soon to report our afflictions past, our anxiety removed, and our hopes realized.

One little girl has left us and returned to her mother, where we hope that a peaceful, happy, and useful experience awaits her.

In Memoriam

Joseph Smith, President of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, is no more. "Peacefully" was the word that qualified his passing over the battlements to the other side and up the shining way. His life was one of service to God in behalf of his fellow men. A life of service to and for others. What can be more brilliant? What life more useful?

For fifty-four years and more did he serve faithfully, performing the arduous duties of President of the church. What a mighty responsibility! Its weal was ever his most earnest care. He was devoted anxiously to its welfare and prosperity, his life's work being exemplified by the gospel of Christ "wherein the righteousness of God" is ever "revealed" "from faith to faith."

His labors were constructive in character. Through the revelations given of God through him was the house of God, though in a somewhat fragmentary condition in 1860 and prior thereto, gradually "set in order." The work under the law has stood the test of criticism and adverse action. He ruled not by dictation but by gentle persuasion. He promulgated no human dogma. The divine law was the man of his counsel.

Frank and open on all questions, social, civil, and religious, his positions were understood. No prejudice moved him in his demeanor toward those who chose to differ with him. That Pharisaical prejudice is not an offspring of the gospel of Christ, he well knew. His example and life were a rebuke to evil and wrong in all walks of life. He was a strong temperance advocate, in all right; and as strongly prohibitive in all condemned as wrong. Above all compromises, he was not swerved for favor's sake, but remained true to the divine and human principles, gentle, persuasive, and kind. Personally acquainted with him for over thirty-six years, I may be permitted to speak thus familiarly.

He assumed no positions on any questions that affect life, hastily. The philosophic standpoint and conclusions stood the test of logic, law and reason. He was a lover of country and its welfare, always alert to the demands of the right. Being strongly religious, he was ever exemplary in life. He was so moderate and well balanced in disposition that none who knew him called his honesty in account.

Not without some of the weaknesses incident to cultivated humanity, he made no claim to infallibility, as that idea is sometimes held by prophets, so-called. To have so claimed would have destroyed his divine call to his high calling as prophet, seer, and revelator. His conviction was that God's law and gospel was and is infallible.

He was an upright citizen, a devoted husband and loving father, a humble child of God, and faithful servant of the Master in duty, office and calling. His chief desire was the eternal salvation of his fellow men, as plainly manifested in his labors. May he not exaltingly claim, I have finished my ministry, I have kept the faith; there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness. Shall he not hear the plaudit, Well done, good and faithful servant; enter into the joys of thy Lord. Thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many.

Editors Herald: There is a small flock of stray sheep here in the wilderness without a shepherd. We would be glad if some of the elders could come and preach for us. Brother S. W. Simmons came to Blanchard last fall and delivered a few sermons. If any of the elders can come, and will write us, we will try to arrange for them to hold services and will meet them either at Tuttle, Blanchard, or Norman, Oklahoma. Route 1, box 70.

Editors Herald: I am very thankful to God who gave me understanding of the latter-day work, and strength to go forth and obey the gospel in its fullness. I know this work is true. I have received many blessings from the Father since I obeyed the truth. It is my desire and prayer that I may keep humble and hold myself to be pure, that God's Holy Spirit may take up its habitation with me, as I realize that, according to God's word, this Spirit will not dwell in unholy temples.

A short time ago I was called to the priesthood. Our numbers here are few, there being only thirteen. We are striving to keep the Saints in the narrow way and are having very spiritual meetings. God has said that where two or three meet together in his name, there will he be to own and bless.

Not long ago I met a gentleman, Frank I. Sefrit, manager of our paper here in Bellingham, and who is well acquainted with this work. He offered to explain to the public the difference between our church and the Brighamite Church, which he did in the Sunday American-Reveille.

That God may bless the work is my prayer. Pray for me that I may be successful in the good work I have begun.

Editors Herald: The HERALD is a welcome visitor in our home, and brings strengthening spiritual food to our hungering souls. In perusing its interesting pages, I am made glad to know of the many who have made sacrifices for the Lord's work, and who have left their homes and loved ones to go out as missionaries in behalf of the restored gospel.

I am young in the church. I was baptized by J. W. Metcalf in October, 1913. I have been made to rejoice many times in the angel's message, and have at various times received evidences of the truthfulness of this work. Previous to coming into this church, my wife and I for seven years were members of the Free Will Baptist Church. We lived up to all the light we had and thought we were doing the Lord's will; but when we heard the angel's message a brighter light dawned on our darkened vision.

After accepting the gospel, Satan confronted us with the thought, What if we were mistaken? What if the Reorganized Church is not the church of Christ? I sought the Lord that it might be made known unto me if the Reorganized Church was the true church. I was shown in a dream that it was the true church, so that doubt was banished from our minds. Defeated in this, Satan again exercised his cunning in presenting the thought that Joseph Smith was not a prophet of God. I again sought the Lord in prayer, and was shown that Joseph Smith was a true prophet. I could give many more instances wherein the Lord has revealed the truth to us.

My greatest desire is to live in a manner that will be pleasing to my Master. We can not all preach, but we can speak a kind word to those seeking to know the truth, and explain to them the principles of the gospel, telling them about the lowly Nazarene, and how he died that we might live.

I ask the prayers of all the Saints, that I may ever live faithful and that I may always have the Spirit to direct me in time of trial.

Ever praying for the redemption,

Your brother,

M. G. ALLEN.

CHICO, CALIFORNIA, December 2, 1914.

Dear Brother: I am enjoying my work except that it is a cross to be separated so much from those we love. This is the third Thanksgiving in succession that it has fallen my lot to be separated from loved ones. Last winter and the winter before I was among strangers on the Island of Hawaii during the whole of the holiday season, and that is when home ties draw strongest. This year, thus far, I have been where there are Saints, which makes it easier. In fact, missionary work in California is a "dream" compared to what has to be undergone in introducing the work in new places in the islands.

We have been having good interest around here, especially at Nord, a little place seven miles north of here. Brother Hintz takes us back and forth in his auto. Yesterday one more gave her name for baptism; a very fine woman. She is the leading church worker in the village, too, and her influence will mean much for our work there. There are others almost persuaded, so we are hoping to disturb the waters again soon. Altogether, this will make twelve since we came here in September.

The enemy of all righteousness is busy opposing the work, but to date the way has been opened up before us, so we have kept busy. Bad weather is setting in, however, and it will be more difficult for us to continue.

The Spring conference of the Northern California District will be in San Francisco the latter part of February, shortly after the opening of the Fair. So, if nothing prevents, I will take in the Fair, and about March 1 will leave for Denver, via Los Angeles and Salt Lake City. The time can not come too soon for me, either. I will have been absent from Denver five years, and suppose I will be almost a stranger there.

As for home, I fear I have no home. When we left Denver we had things very nicely arranged, that is furnishings, etc., for a neat little home. We were planning on buying a place, but my call to the missionary field upset this arrangement. While we were away in our work our furniture burned. What the future will bring forth I know not, but I hope we may be able to move forward in faith, and trust that light will be given to direct us as needed.

This work has grown to mean very much to me, and I only regret my inefficiency as a representative. We feel that there are grand things ahead for the "tried and true," and I trust that we may all at last be classed as such.

Sincerely yours,

M. A. MCCONLEY.

Number 525 Lance Corporal, Company B,
Sixth Battalion, Manchester Regiment,
Mustapha Barracks,
ALEXANDRIA, EGYPT, November 23, 1914.

Editors Herald: By my address all will know that I am in the service of my king and country. I only hope that I may be able to serve my God as well as I am trying to serve my king. Though it is sometimes difficult, I am doing my best to live up to that which I know to be right.

I left England, September 10. Nobody knew where our battalion was going. We had heard several rumors, one of which turned out to be true, and that was that we were bound for Egypt. Our voyage from Southampton to Alexandria took seventeen days, so that we disembarked on September 27. We were escorted by the H. M. S. Minerva from Southampton to a point about two days past Gibraltar, where we met another convoy of Indian troops escorted by the H. M. S. Weymouth. Our convoy of fifteen ships and the Indian convoy of twenty-two ships stopped for a few hours opposite each other, then the warships exchanged, the Weymouth escorting us to Alexandria, and the Minerva escorting the Indians to France. It was a wonderful sight to see thirty-nine ships all at one time.

For this trip we were all shipped aboard the S. S. Corsica, and packed like sardines, there being twenty-five hundred men on board. Each deck was fitted with table and forms, each table forming a mess of eighteen, including myself as mess corporal. Above the table were twelve hammock hooks on which we had to try to fit up eighteen hammocks, which of course was a mathematical problem. However, we had to be content with being able to fit up twelve, the remaining six men having to rest anywhere possible. Quite one third of the men slept on deck.

The food, well, we could hardly call it food. The best part of it was the tea, which was good, but the bread was unfit to eat. It was sour. Perhaps the less I say about the food the better. I only hope that when I return to Europe we shall not have the same to pass through again.

I enjoyed the sailing best of all. Some men had a dread of the Bay of Biscay. I must confess that I had, too, but I was agreeably surprised when we reached there and I had no signs of seasickness. After passing through the bay we passed around the coast of Spain, and finally arrived at Gibraltar on the 17th. From this point we could see Africa. We remained here nine hours so that we could disembark some troops of the Middlesex regiment, and seven million rounds of ammunition. The massive rocks of Gibraltar are a wonderful sight. The many guns on these rocks mean death to any hostile ship attempting to enter the Mediterranean.

After leaving Gibraltar we passed in turn the five islands of Tunis and various others, also Malta, eventually arriving at our destination, Alexandria. It was a relief to us to get on the soil again. On shore, we were fitted out with sun helmets and marched to the barracks, six miles from the quay. We were wearing our English khaki serge uniforms and were under full marching order, weighing about sixty pounds, together with one hundred rounds of ammunition per man. Before we had marched one half hour every man was wet with perspiration. At the barracks, after the usual drawing of bedding and rations, I was glad to lay down to sleep. I felt as if I could sleep for a week, I was so tired.

We settled down to serious business, which of course is to learn to shoot the enemy before they shoot us, all of which I know to be against the teachings of the Latter Day Saints. Eventually we were allowed out of barracks to visit Alexandria, which has some fine places, and others not fit to be seen; from the latter I have kept away. The chief occupation here seems to be the conducting of bars for the sale of beer, tobacco, etc. The people generally are filthy and dangerous, so that every man has to carry his bayonet when walking out. However, up to the present we have had no trouble with them.

Since the war with Turkey, Egypt has been under martial law. Up to this time there has been no disturbance in this part, but there has been some fighting in the Sinai Peninsula. There are eighteen hundred troops here belonging to the East Lanes Division, one Battalion of the Highland Light infantry, and some hundreds of the famous Ghurkas, all ready for action. We have left the barracks for the time being, having gone ten miles west to a place called Mex, where we are doing a course of shooting and entrenching against any trouble that may arise.

There are several Bedouin tribes about three miles from our camp, so we have to place an outpost on duty every night, at positions east and west of the camp. These people never venture near during the day, but at night they steal around to see what we are doing. We have heard semiofficially that we are to be relieved about the middle of January by another Manchester battalion, that is if things remain quiet here, and that we are to return to England to be refitted with war equipment and sent to the front by the middle of April, when our new army will be ready for the field.

When I stop to think of training to kill our fellow men, it seems ghastly, in fact it is ghastly. I have wondered many times whether or not there were any of our church members on the side of the enemy. I hope not. I have wondered what the situation would be if I were to come in action and should meet one of our faith among the enemy. I wonder what I would do and what he would do. The more I think of this the more I become confused. I hope and trust that I may never meet any of our church members under such conditions, and that we may not harm each other in any way. Of course I know that I am not thinking like the average soldier, who goes out to kill the enemy under rules of modern warfare, and I also know that I have no right to leave my faith in the barracks or at home even in times of war.

I enjoy the life of a soldier very much, but would be more satisfied if the food were a little more palatable. Then, too, I am distressed in being separated from my dear wife and family, who are at home in England. I am pleased to hear that they are comfortable, and kindly treated by our Brother W. R. Armstrong, who does what he can for them whilst I am away, for which I am thankful, and also to other Saints who take an interest in them.

I am enjoying sound health and strength, for which I am grateful. Through my own carelessness, I had an attack of neuralgia. On recovery from this I sprained one of the muscles of my right shoulder playing football. I am now myself again, and never felt better.

I will be glad to hear from any of the Saints. Letters from them will be a great help to me, and would assist me to steer clear of any wrong that I might feel inclined to do. There are many ways in which a soldier may go wrong, and it is from these ways I want to keep clear. I received my Bible from home on Sunday last, and have read a few passages from it, which I find to be helpful. Bibles seem to be scarce here, at least I have not seen one besides my own. I am glad that I am a church member. Many of the men are quite anxious to learn something of our work. They readily understand that we have no connection with the Utah body. I try to do my best to let them have the benefit of what little I know.

I hope that at an early date I may return safe and sound to home and loved ones. I ask the prayers of the Saints in behalf of myself and three brothers who are now at the front.

Your brother,

JOSEPH GILL.

KIRTLAND, OHIO.

Editors Herald: Memorial services always seem like a funeral without the presence of the casket and the heart-rending grief of the near relatives. It was so here at Kirtland at the meeting held in honor of the memory of our departed prophet and leader. There were no visible reminders of a funeral, yet all felt the solemnity of the occasion, and the sadness as of a personal loss. The life-sized portrait that usually hangs in the reception room of the Temple was placed on the stand in full view of all, bringing to our minds the thought of a living presence, a continuing influence rather than the depression of a real funeral.

Those in charge of the service were Patriarch Joseph Squire, Francis J. Ebeling, of the high priests, and Bishop J. A. Becker. The songs were those selected by the prophet for his funeral, as published in the Ensign. After prayer by Brother Squires, Brother Becker read the first address delivered by our late prophet, before the conference at Amboy, in 1860. As the address was read, voicing the integrity and the good resolutions with which our prophet undertook his work as leader of the church, we are sure the minds of all in retrospect could not but feel how successfully he had carried them to completion in his life's work.

Brother Ebeling was the speaker. He first read the following telegram received that day from Brother Frederick M. Smith, who had been apprised of the intention of the Kirtland Saints to hold memorial services in honor of his father. "It is fitting that the Saints in Kirtland, the birthplace of our lamented and devoted prophet, should hold memorial services Sunday. May his life prove a blessing to all the Saints."

Kirtland as it was at the time of the birth of the prophet was vividly brought before our minds by the speaker. The village that is now with its historic Temple crowning the crest of the hill, was then almost an unbroken wilderness, with wild animals roaming about the woods and timbers. The Temple, itself, which has been a landmark for so many years, was then still standing in the forest. The great city of Cleveland was then but a hamlet, and civilization had not made the rapid advancement that it has since. Such was the condition when our late prophet first saw the light of day.

The speaker also referred to the vision our prophet had at the beginning of his career, in which he was made to choose the path of his life's work, whether it should be among those with whom he could have riches and worldly power, or whether he would cast his lot with the humble Saints of God and enjoy eternal life in the world to come.

Brother Ebeling also related his own earliest impressions of the prophet, obtained at a General Conference, where the democratic spirit, ever manifested by him, was strongly demonstrated. It was when a stand taken by the prophet upon a matter pertaining to the sacrament was strongly opposed by many of the leading quorums of the church, and when the vote was taken, his side lost by an overwhelming majority. Brother Joseph then arose and made statements something like this: While I still hold to my opinion, and your votes may not alter my views of the matter, yet what you have done to-day I will stand by as long as it is your law or the law of the church.

The speaker alluded to Brother Joseph as a great lover of liberty, and spoke of the firm and undeviating stand he always took both in public and private against proscribing the personal liberty of any.

Many things in the life lived by our prophet were touched upon which brought out his truly noble character. His simplicity and lowliness of heart were demonstrated by the reading of his wishes in regard to the manner in which he should be buried.

The speaker closed his remarks with words of eulogy appropriate to the occasion, and not mere perfunctory words that we are apt to hear at every funeral, over good and bad alike. We all felt that they were indeed true, that our lamented prophet was truly great in many ways, and that, as the speaker remarked, "For a life of consecration and devotion to humanity the pages of history record none greater."

After singing, "Tenderly, tenderly, lead thou me on," the closing prayer was offered by Brother Becker. A sacred influence pervaded the audience during that prayer. Standing with bowed heads, in the Temple the walls of which were reared by the sacrifices of the early Saints in the days of the Martyr, who had given his life in the establishment of the work so dear to us all, thanks were given to God that the son had so worthily carried on the work begun by the father, to the conclusion of a long and useful life. And special invocation was made for the appointed successor, Frederick M. Smith, that he might be filled with wisdom and the Spirit of God to carry on the great work that would now devolve upon him.

At the conclusion of the prayer the congregation sang, "We thank thee, O God, for a prophet," and was dismissed by Brother Ebeling.

ALBERTA LAKE.

FALL RIVER, MASSACHUSETTS.

Editors Herald: Not having written to the HERALD for quite a long time it may be that some of the Saints, both East and West, where I have labored in the past, are wondering where I am and what I am doing.

For several years my work has been in the Massachusetts District, sometimes in churches both of our own and other faiths, and at other times in tent or street work, and in the distribution of tracts and otherwise visiting those more or less interested in the teaching we promulgate. In some of this work Brother Arthur Koehler labored with me at times, but was finally called to go to the Palestine Mission. Some of our experiences were quite interesting to us, and, it occurs to me, might be to others.

At one time services were held in the Masonic building at Little Compton, Rhode Island, during which both the Methodist and Congregational ministers were present a number of times. Toward the close of the series of meetings they arranged for union services in the Methodist church, and upon their cordial invitation I preached there. Our relations throughout were very pleasant, and we parted friends. At the Masonic building meetings Senator Burchard, now president of the State Senate, then Speaker of the House, was present, and with him Senator Wilbur. These men have fine summer residences at this place, it being upon the seashore.

Mr. Burchard invited me to dine with him, and I met his family there. His wife is only daughter of John Church, of the John Church Publishing Company, known throughout the world. By Mr. Burchard's special request I had the pleasure of discussing the features of our work and history, after we had dined, which occupied over two hours. At this time Senator Wilbur was also present, and both men expressed themselves as being deeply interested, and glad to know the facts regarding our work.

Quite different from this treatment was that received at Wareham, Massachusetts. In the course of tent work there a minister, whose name I do not at this moment recall, spent considerable time visiting members of his flock and others and warning them that our church was the same as that of the so-called Mormons of Utah. Notwithstanding this, many of the members of his church attended our tent services. He evidently hit upon a plan that he thought would prejudice them against us. He called up by phone a house near where we were staying and said he wanted us to let him use our tent Sunday afternoon. When I learned of this I called upon him at his home and informed him that he could have the tent at that time, but he somewhat energetically replied that he would not use it under any circumstances. I inquired why he had asked for it if he did not want it, and in an evasive manner he said he did not know who I was at that time. I knew this was untrue, but did not say so. I, however, called his attention to the statements he had made about us to several people, some of whom had personally reported his remarks to me, and in a respectful manner asked him to correct them, as they were not correct. His only reply was to arise, and opening the outside door say, "I am sorry you can't stay longer; come again when you have more time." Of course I walked out, and on the way received a gentle push from him upon my shoulder.

He doubtless expected me to refuse him the tent, after what he had said about our church, and this would give him the opportunity to tell his flock that we were so against their religion that we would not even let them use our tent. Of course that would prejudice them against us and they would not come to our meetings again. It did not work the way he had planned. At one of our meetings when quite a number were present I recited the entire matter to them, including his manner toward me. They were quite indignant, and subsequently they refused to retain him as their minister, so I was informed. Whether or not this was a principal reason I do not know. Our reunion grounds of about fifty acres, which we own, are located near this place, and we appear to be gaining in favor among the people.

Some baptisms have resulted from our work at various places, but we are particularly trying to maintain our work in such a manner that growth will result in the years to come, believing that the best work is not necessarily most quickly apparent in some environments.

At another time it may be that other experiences of the past will prove of interest, some of them having been rather exceptional in their nature. Generally speaking, there seems to be a reasonably healthy growth manifested in the various parts of this district, though nothing of a startling character anywhere.

Among other things, I am giving music lessons by correspondence to a number of people, having been urged to do so several times. They include music notation and the fundamentals of harmony, and are serviceable for a foundation in vocal, instrumental, and composition work.

Extracts from Letters

Elder James A. Gillen writes from Council Bluffs, under date of January 13: "Have been busy in the near-by districts since the funeral of our late President. Good interest from nonmembers and also good feeling among Saints—not a ripple—everyone seems to have confidence in those who have charge—not one word to the contrary."

Noah N. Cook, Saint Louis, Missouri: "The HERALD, Ensign, and Autumn Leaves bring good news that feeds our souls with spiritual food. We look weekly for their coming. We have read the HERALD for forty-two years and the Ensign since its publication began, as well as other church papers and books, and hope to do so for a long time to come. May prosperity attend the publishing department, is our prayer."

W. D. McKnight, Logan, Oklahoma: "Samuel W. McKnight is a messenger for the Western Union Telegraph Company, at Minneapolis, Minnesota, and is a Latter Day Saint. I wish some of our church people might hunt him up. He should be addressed care of Y. M. C. A."

Elder John Shields writes from Chatham, Ontario, under date of January 16: "Matters seem to be going nicely here. I have not heard any rumor of any ill coming to the church as a consequence of the departure of our beloved President. To-morrow will be my third Sunday here. Our meetings are quite well attended. A number of strangers drop in occasionally, some attend all the time, and the Saints express themselves as being edified and encouraged. Last Tuesday at Ridgetown I preached the funeral discourse of Aunt Jane Leatherdale, as she was familiarly called by the many elders and Saints who well remember her kind deeds and words in the early history of the work in Chatham District. She passed peacefully away on the 10th, at the ripe age of eighty-seven years. Elder David Snobelen, district president, had charge of the service, and Elder J. H. Tyrrell's talent was manifested in song service. There is much sickness among the saints, children especially, but great blessings are being received through the administration of the elders. Truly God is good to Israel, even to such as are of a clean heart."

News from Missions

New Year's Eve in Des Moines District

To-night the gentle hours of time move the dial out of the old year into the new. And it matters not what our successes or failures have been, the ruthless hand of time draws the shades of evening and bids us move on as it closes the door of 1914. Bewildered for the moment, we pause, we look, we rejoice in our successes, while our heads bow with sorrow for our failures. As we stand without bidding farewell to the old we hear the rustle of the wings of the new as she opens wide her door and bids us occupy.

The failures of the past are now under our feet, to be used only as valuable lessons and stepping-stones to carry us up to broader fields of usefulness. No time in history has the world cried so long and loud for clean men and women whose efficiency has not been impaired by dissipation and misuse of the God-given powers, mental and physical. The church never needed men more than now who can and will go out and meet and successfully cope with the present conditions. Are we prepared?

The recent debate at Boone, Iowa, was a success for us. Brother Long did his work well. Two have been baptized since, and a definite move has been started to erect a new house of worship. One lady not a member, has donated five hundred dollars without solicitation.

Eighteen have been baptized in the Des Moines District the past quarter. We members of the district should now look forward to, and make an effort to be present at our February conference at Des Moines, as well as the district conference later in the spring, and the district reunion to be held at Nevada, Iowa, in August.

This new year has three hundred and sixty-five days, and each of us should make every day a special one, for there will not a single one ever return to us. Let our motto be, Occupy with increased faith, added efficiency, and true humble service, and then when the dial of time shall bid us welcome into another new year we will be able to rejoice in our victories of the year to close.

Rejoicing in the present,

O. SALISBURY.

DES MOINES, IOWA, 1209 Fremont Street.

Central Michigan

We have had a number of two-day meetings in Central Michigan District during the past season, which we feel have been beneficial to all. Our Father has poured out his Spirit upon us in preaching the word, in healings, tongues, and interpretation, prophecy, wisdom, and knowledge, in harmony with the word given at the last General Conference, when it was said that a greater manifestation of the Spirit was to be received the coming year.

Now that our beloved President is called from us for a little season, it remains for us to go on in faith, giving our confidence and support to Brother F. M. Smith as a leader among us, designated through revelation.

It seems to me that the church was never in a better condition to carry on the work which our Master has given us to do. It remains for us to take counsel from the revelation given, wherein the Lord has cited us to the life of our beloved President. Let us then be loving as he was loving, charitable as he was charitable, and go on in faith, looking beyond his life to the Man of Galilee.

We have three missionaries in our district. George W. Burt, a high priest, presides over the district, and his faithful labor is shown by the fruits thereof. The district has become self-sustaining through the faithful, whose sacrifices will be blessed in the day of gathering. Jealousy, strife, and contention are becoming to be of the past, because of the example of our brother who has always preferred his brethren. We have also Brother O. J. Hawn, of the Seventy, whose faithful labors have added many to the church during the past year.

We held our conference at McIvor last fall, where a new church building has been erected through the faithful labors of the Saints of that branch. These are the Saints where Brother Hawn labored two years ago, baptizing sixty or seventy, afterwards organized into a branch with a full set of officers.

The writer, holding the office of elder, was appointed to labor in this district. During the past season I have labored at the following places: Houghton Lake, Edwards Center, Prescott, Bentley, Glover, Browmanville, Alma Dale, Colman, and Buttman. At these points I was privileged to lead between fifty and sixty souls into the kingdom of God, the Lord confirming the word. I truly have enjoyed the blessings of the Lord in the work. I have a faithful companion who has always said, "Go" instead of "Stay." It is a grand thing to have a helpmeet in the gospel work whose faith is in God for the advancement of the church.

We have also in the district a faithful local force who are bending their energies for the advancement of Zion. They are making sacrifices, and the Lord is blessing them.

Our two-day meetings and conferences are becoming to be largely attended, from one hundred to four hundred being present. If this keeps up, the time is not far distant when we shall have to provide a permanent place for our conference where we will be enabled to care for those who associate together. I think Beaverton is preparing for this. They are now planning to build a large church. They have purchased a new lot and are gathering in the stone and lumber. We have an opportunity to sell the old church here which has become too small for the congregation now assembling at Beaverton. We think we can secure about one thousand dollars for the building, which will be a good start on the other one. The Ladies' Aid is active, with Sister Clingerman as president, and who is alive in the work. This association will be a help in the building of the church.

I believe we have about twenty-eight branches in the district, which keeps Brother Burt busy watching over and caring for them. I think it would be a grand thing if every district could have as president a high priest, and also for large branches to be so cared for. As missionary in charge, we have Brother J. F. Curtis, whom we all love, and whose wise counsel has been very beneficial to us. We hope that it will be the direction of the Spirit that he be reappointed to this mission for another conference year.

We shall all pray for the coming conference, as the time is fast approaching, that wise provision may be made for the year, and that we may all be united, as were the children of Israel when they left Egypt. There is not the least obstacle in our way. The Lord has cited us to the life record of our beloved President, now deceased, and we may have a record like unto his if we do our duty in places whereunto our Master has sent us. If we hold to the principles of faith, meekness, brotherly kindness, and charity, we will be brought more to a knowledge of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ; and if we have the hope of a glorious resurrection we will purify our lives even as Christ was pure.

I have been laboring about seven and one half years in the priesthood. I hope to devote my life to the service of the Master. May the Lord bless us all, that we may be useful in the advancement of his cause, that each may do his duty, that the redemption of Zion may be hastened, that the honest in heart may hear, that our king may come and reign upon Mount Zion.

BEAVERTON, MICHIGAN.

Yours in the one faith,

THOMAS PENDLETON.

News from Branches

Independence, Missouri

Great nations and wonderful cities have fallen to rise no more, and are well nigh forgotten except in the annals of the dead, dead past. But when a good man dies the people mourn, and the fragrance of his life's memory with all his noble deeds lasts for evermore.

To attempt the recording of all the events of the last few weeks, those affecting the branch and its auxiliaries in this the center place, especially the occurrences relating to not only the Saints but the general public, particularly the peaceful passing of our beloved prophet, Joseph Smith, would at this time be a great task. Lack of space forbids our giving details of the many things that have affected all here so very deeply, but the work dear to the Saints still remains intact, and we cherish an abiding confidence in our heavenly Father's care over his church, and the grace and power he has thus far bestowed upon his children. The beautiful gospel message still continues uppermost in our minds and hearts, and the host of missionaries, who are the true banner bearers, together with the active workers, old and young, are ready in support, sounding forth their pæons of praise, and with the inspiring organ and stringed instruments lifting their voices in the lovely songs of Zion.

For several days before Brother Joseph passed away, the Saints in patient waiting prayed for a surcease of pain and distress, and although they had been looking for his release, it came like a sudden shock, and on December 13 it was their lot to see with tears the vast assemblies gathered at the church for his obsequies, and with emotions of grief to listen to the funeral discourse delivered by Elder Joseph Luff, to hear the softly-uttered prayer by Bishop E. L. Kelley, and to witness the lengthy, mournful funeral cortege wend its way from the church to Mound Grove Cemetery, where those attending joined in the parting hymn, one of Brother Joseph's favorites, "There is a land immortal, the beautiful of lands." Since that day many encouraging and instructive words have been spoken by the elders, and we have been made to rejoice in listening to Brethren J. W. Rushton, Lee Quick, E. A. Smith, G. E. Harrington, William Aylor, Wardell Christy, P. M. Hanson, and others.

The holiday season found the Saints participating in the usual festivities. On Sunday, January 10, many attended the dedication of Central Church, Kansas City, which proved to be a delightful occasion.

On last evening about one hundred fifty met in the weekly prayer service, and Brethren I. N. White and T. C. Kelley, who presided, bore living testimonies of the onward movement of the missionary work, and the help and power displayed by the Spirit's presence. Several names were mentioned for especial prayers, and the peace and calmness attending the Saints attested the divinity of the work, and the continuance of the blessings of our deceased and beloved President in his parting benediction, "Peace I leave unto you; my peace I give unto you."

May the glorious gospel message find its way into many hearts, and may the isolated ones be blessed by its presence and be comforted, and the sick and afflicted in patience look forward to its consummation.

ABBIE A. HORTON.

Minneapolis, Minnesota

Our district conference and Religio and Sunday school convention convened at this city, December 4, 5 and 6. The church was dedicated Sunday forenoon at eleven o'clock by Patriarch J. W. Wight, his discourse being one of excellency.

The conference speakers were, district president B. S. Lambkin, Elders Lester Whiting, Delbert Whiting, J. W. Martin representing the other branches of our district. Elder A. L. Whiteaker of the seventies, Brother Leroy Colbert from Northern Wisconsin District.

Conference adjourned to meet next June in reunion at Clitherall, Minnesota. Some interesting sessions were held during this gathering, which will benefit all those that were present.

Elder J. W. Wight recently held a series of revival meetings here, which were a benefit to our cause in this part of the city. There was a total attendance of six hundred at the fourteen meetings and one hundred and twenty visitors came out to hear the speaker. Handbills were distributed and placards posted in conspicuous places. Over nine hundred people were met at the doors of their homes and personally invited to attend these meetings.

The church has a very efficient representative in J. W. Wight. He induced many to see the logic and truth in the gospel, as taught by our church. Religion in a city like this is not much of a drawing card, there being so many places of pleasure to entice people.

At our first sacrament service in the new year we were greatly blessed by the Spirit, the Lord speaking to all present, saying he was well pleased to see so many assembled together on that day and that he had watched over and protected all during the past year. Many other encouraging words were received. It was a day of great rejoicing, one that will long be remembered. We are glad to have the approval of God in our work, which makes it matter little what some individual might say.

In gospel bonds,

E. H. BENNETT.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA, 1719 Sixth Avenue North.

The Telltale Face

Like a garden where the flowers
Are killed by ugly weeds,
Your face tells if you give hours
To unkindly thoughts and deeds.
But think a generous thought,
Act with a kindly grace,
Do the thing you know you ought,
And you'll carry a shining face.
The years will leave their lines,
And when you're old, 'tis truth,
Your face will bear unfailing signs
Of thoughts and deeds of youth.

Correction

In the obituary of HERALD for January 20, referring to C. E. Gaylord, it is said that he was a grandson of John D. Gaylord, author of "Future of Russia." Some one might perpetuate this error in a historical way. There never was a John D. Gaylord in the Reorganized Church. The one meant was John C. Gaylord who lived near Burlington, Wisconsin, near Voree also, in old Strangite days. He was a high priest, and of the High Council, his name being on the High Council record. I knew him well from 1865 to his death in 1874. The John Gaylord who wrote the "Future of Russia." was another man, and belonged in Plano Branch. I knew him also. Brother Joseph Smith knew both, and would speak of the error if he were living and knew of its publication.

LATER

See Brother Sheen's old record and index of names for two John Gaylords, John on pages 81, 219, 334, 344; John C. on pages 47, 49, 52, 57, 60, 78, 88, 462, 580, 762. Have come to office to look up record. H. A. STEBBINS.

Requests for Prayers

Brother and Sister Clyde Zonker, Wellsburg, West Virginia, request prayers for their little daughter one year old. She has a mark under her eye since birth, and it is desired that it may be removed. Prayers are also asked for Sister Melcher's little boy, who for ten or twelve years has been crippled in his left leg from infantile paralysis. These children are to be administered to on Sunday, February 7, and the request is that the Saints fast from the morning meal and join the families in prayer in their behalf.

How to Advertise

Reaching the public with our announcements is certainly a problem.

Special preaching services or evangelistic efforts may avail but little if the people are not informed about them. To inform and at the same time create a desire to attend should be the object of our advertising. Sensational methods should be avoided, but effectiveness ever sought for.

Each effort in this line should have individual treatment, based on local conditions, but there are certain underlying principles that will apply to all forms of public announcements.

In an effort to aid you and others in solving these publicity problems, we suggest:

When you successfully reach the people in a certain community with your advertising, send us an outline of your plan, the cost, and such samples as you can spare. These will be filed and ready for others on request.

Should you fail in your efforts, tell us your opinion of the causes. Your experiences may save others from failure along the same lines. Your name will not be used in this connection if you desire it withheld. We would appreciate samples of what you used, with cost.

If you need advice on your advertising problems, we will go over these samples and information and glean practical suggestions and submit samples, with estimates of cost if you desire. You may have it printed at the Herald Office or elsewhere; we'll try to help you just the same in either case.

This service is free; we desire to extend its scope until there is a broad, cooperative movement toward successful publicity. We have a gospel of service to others. There is so much competition that we must use all available means to make the message of the church effective. Previous announcements in this publication, entitled, "Service," are bringing responses.

Your help to make this movement a success is solicited. Address,

E. D. MOORE, Lamoni, Iowa.
Care Bureau of Publicity.

CLESTER.—Earl Allen, son of Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Clester, was born December 26, 1910; died January 5, 1914, at their home near Burlington Junction, Missouri. There remain father, mother, sister. A brother preceded him. Funeral at Workman's Chapel by R. Lorensen, interment in Workman Cemetery.

Arthurs, father, Elder George Edwards, 2 brothers, Alvin and George A., 3 sisters, Edith, Julia and Strancy May. Services by J. A. Tanner, prayer by W. H. CAKLER.—George Cackler died at Lacona, Iowa, January 12, 1915, aged 68 years, 4 months, 24 days. His health had been poor for many years. Before his death he requested that Psalm 23 be read at his funeral and that the text be from 1 Corinthians 15: 55, also that the hymn, "There is a land immortal," be sung. Funeral at Graceland Church by John Smith, many friends and neighbors attending.

ROBINSON.—Margaret Jane Robinson was born in Randon, Nova Scotia, November 26, 1847; died at Millford, Massachusetts, January 10, 1915. Married J. C. Robinson, March 21, 1876. She accepted the gospel under the ministration of Joseph F. Burton and others, and lived faithful to the covenant. Hospitality and kindness were the characteristics of her home, shared by the missionaries. Funeral from the home, sermon by H. J. Davison. She leaves husband, 4 sons, 1 daughter to mourn the loss of a true wife and kind mother.

The February "Century"

In education lies the hope of the world to-day—education in its broadest sense, education which will bring us all to larger realization and understanding of other races and peoples—this might be the keynote of the February Century, sounded by W. Morgan Shuster in his brilliant presentation of "Peace and disarmament," some reflections of a neutral on war and education; by Edwin Davies Schoonmaker who makes some startling statements while, he discusses the question, "Has the church collapsed?"; by Arthur Bullard who in his article on "National defense" declares that military strength is not the only, or by any means the best, form of protection; most strongly of all, perhaps, by Marion Craig Wentworth whose one-act play "war brides" voices the passionate protest of the woman of the world who are "strong to keep the world going, to keep sacred the greatest things in life—love and home and work," yet are kept "dumb, silent drudges." Samuel P. Orth's analysis of "England: Imperial Opportunist," Adachi Kinnosuke's interpretation of "Kiao-Chau, and Its Meaning" from a Japanese point of view, and short stories by Caroline Duer, Marie Conway Oemler, Katharine Fullerton Gerould, P. G. Wodehouse, and William T. Nichols are other features to be noted in a number of live and stimulating interest.

CHANGE OF POLICY

Owing to the large increase in the work in the subscription department of the Herald Publishing House it has become necessary to make a change in policy.

Heretofore we have continued the subscription of our publications for one year after the date when the subscription expired, but hereafter the subscription to all publications will be discontinued when they expire.

The change is made for the good of the church of which you are a member and we feel satisfied that all will make the necessary effort and cheerfully comply with the new rule. A little effort on the part of each one will produce splendid results to the body—the church of Christ.

We solicit your cooperation and support.

WHAT IS A MAN WORTH?

A man went down to Panama,
Where many a man had died,
To slit the sliding mountains
And lift the eternal tide:
A man stood up in Panama,
And the mountains stood aside.

The Power that wrought the tide and peak
Wrought mightier the seer;
And the One who made the Isthmus
He made the engineer,
And the good God he made Goethals
To cleave the hemisphere.

—Percy Mackaye.

Judging from the acts of a great many men, they do not think themselves worth much to God, to themselves, or to the community. They are willing to sell themselves for a barrel, more or less of alcohol. We do not know how much alcohol one can get away with before it gets away with him, but at best it is a bad bargain. The man who is trying so hard to break into a drunkard's grave should ask himself, Am I not getting the worst of this deal? I am bartering away body and soul, the respect of my friends and the peace of my family; and I get in return rags, hunger, filth, bruises, insults, and an amount of drink proportionate to my hoggishness.

Others, both men and women, put themselves and their home life in the pawnshop for the privilege of being fashionable and drinking from the cup of pleasure. Some go for a cash consideration, as in the case of some of our senators, and post office officials, and judges, and mayors, who have been discharged, and impeached, and disgraced during the past few years. Probably the proportion of these who have been exposed is small to those who have escaped.

Then there are many in business who are dealing in short weights. The fourteen ounces of meat that they sell for a pound is not all they have sold. They have sold themselves and have gone for the price of two ounces of meat.

Man prizes himself and his honor too lightly; and if himself, certainly others. So long as men will sell themselves for drink, or drugs, or money, or favors, men will be found to profit by their foolishness.

Sixty thousand men was the price of Port Arthur. These men were the pick of the two nations who fought over the walls of that doomed city. They were the pick physically, and in many cases mentally. And what were they given for? That Russia might seek to add somewhat to her domain at a time when she still had undeveloped territory that makes the United States look small.

So long as dirt means more than flesh and blood, there will be war,—national, civil, and individual.

The doctrine of total depravity used to be a favorite one with the churches, and it must have been eminently pleasing to Satan. We read that man was made in the image of God. In what sense? In a physical sense? Well, no; because we have been told that God is a being without a body, or parts, or passions. Man has these. Then it must be according to that dogma that man is in the image of God spiritually and mentally; and at the same time he is by nature and inclination totally depraved? No wonder that God said those creeds were abominable!

That very act of creation shows the price God sets on men. He placed upon men the stamp and image of the divine form; and certainly he did not do that to worthless metal. Man was the crowning act of his creation, the culminating revelation of God's power and majesty; and we are told in the eighth Psalm that he was created only a little lower than the angels and crowned with glory and honor.

He was in the image of God in body and spirit, but on a lower plane; just as a child may resemble his father in form and disposition, yet be but a child. Man's growth has been perverted, and perhaps some few may become totally depraved; but did you ever see one whom you dared to say was that?

Let us rather preach the dignity and worth of man as something too valuable to be used for a base end. Jesus said, "Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings, and not one of them is forgotten before God." Even the sparrow is God's handiwork, and when it falls to the ground, wounded, the same natural law begins to heal it that heals you of your bruises. It is not forgotten. Then the point of the lesson is driven home, "Ye are of more value than many sparrows." If it be a tragedy when the sparrow falls, how much more a tragedy when man falls!

The parables of the lost sheep, the lost piece of money, and the prodigal son, were all designed to teach the worth of the individual and the pains God takes to save him, and the joy there is in heaven when he is saved.

The parable of the prodigal son teaches that it is seldom too late to break a bad bargain; make the best terms we can; get back home; make the very most we can of ourselves. When the prodigal got into serious trouble "he came to himself"; he had been a little bit deranged before. He saw that he could do better than herd swine and eat husks.

In Luke we read of a rich man who said to his soul, "Take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry." All that he thought he was good for was to eat and drink and have a good time. God said that man was a fool. The beasts are satisfied to eat and drink and take their ease; but a wise man should have a higher ideal.

The sacrifice that Christ made, the suffering he bore, prove the value he set upon men. Yes, even upon sinners. How much then must a good man be worth to God? See what God did for you. What are you doing for yourself?

Paul says, "Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost . . . and ye are not your own? for ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's."

God made man of the dust, but that is no reason for him to trail himself in the dust.

Diamonds are carbon, and so is coal; but we do not burn diamonds. The gross material has been glorified.

An ounce of paint serves a savage to disfigure his face; an artist will paint a splendid picture with it. He glorifies the pigment into a thing of art.

And herein is revealed the genius of God that he makes a sentient and lovely creation from the dust.

We have disfigured that work, and it is our business to gain once more our lost estate, and this we will do with the aid of Christ, "Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body."

Man is priceless in God's sight; apparently worthless in his own sight. How much work do we put on our houses and gardens, on our dresses and hats, on our farms and stores: yet these all shall perish. The one eternal thing within our reach to bestow untiring labor upon is the human character. No labor too long, no study too arduous, no sacrifice too great that makes it greater or better.

What are you worth to God?

You are worth something at the worst; but prize yourself at the best.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

A NAME HONORED AND HONORABLE

ON THE PASSING OF PRESIDENT SMITH

The HERALD has taken pleasure in calling attention to the interest of the press in the passing of our late and beloved President Joseph Smith, and to the unstinted praise of the character of President Smith and the Saints. The following expressions are of interest in this connection, coming as they do from newspaper men of personal acquaintance with President Smith and the church.

In the Holden Progress for December 17, we find editorial comment as follows:

The death of Joseph Smith, the venerable head of the Reorganized Church of Latter Day Saints, will certainly accomplish great good in one way. It will give great publicity to the stand this church has steadfastly maintained in opposition to polygamy. A large portion of this good man's life was devoted to a fierce struggle against the calumny directed toward his church, which, on account of its acceptance of the Book of Mormon, has been accused of all the things imputed against the Utah branch.

Speaking for ourself, we have lived among these people for eight years and found them to be possessors of a Monday-to-Saturday religion. We never attended their church, but know of several things which other churches could emulate with great profit. People who have a religion like theirs can be believed when they say they have nothing to do with polygamy. It is to be hoped they will hereafter be allowed to utilize the time and effort heretofore expended in fighting a lie, in constructive missionary work.

In the Concordia (Kansas) Daily Kansan for December 18, the editor in reply to an undignified comment on the demise of President Smith, among other things said:

Joseph Smith . . . devoted his entire life—and he was over eighty when he died—to a consistent, effective fight against the polygamous teachings of the Utah Mormons. It was around his strong personality and fine Christian character that the followers of the founder of the church gathered, because they repudiated the doctrine of polygamy promulgated by Brigham Young and formed an organization . . . fighting polygamy every jump of the road. The church of which Joseph Smith was the head, has done more than any one other organization to eradicate the baneful influence of polygamy in its western stronghold.

A more lovable personality than Joseph Smith one can rarely meet. He was no ignorant fanatic—he was an educated gentleman, trained to the ways of the world as a practicing attorney. The sanctity of home, love of wife—just one—love of children, and an upright, patriotic American citizenship, was the vision held out by Joseph Smith to all in the church of which he was the temporal head. No man ever lived a cleaner life than Joseph Smith. Aside from his religion, his home and his family were all the world to him.

We are not a follower of Joseph Smith, or his church, but we have known the man—the upright American citizen, the fine gentleman that he was—for many, many years, and it pains us to see his name reviled unjustly because of ignorance of the character of the man.

Holden, Missouri, the home of Mr. C. L. Hobart, of the Holden Press, is in the Independence Stake, about forty miles southeast of Independence. At this place the church has a branch of good people. Mr. Hobart therefore speaks from intimate acquaintance with the Holden Saints and the Independence Stake and other church workers who come and go to and from Holden. The fine tribute of Mr. Gomer T. Davies of the Daily Kansan to President Smith and the work of the church is paid out of his personal acquaintance with the public and private life of our lamented President, and his knowledge of the teachings and practices of the church and cause for and in the midst of which he stood. Hence it is that the words uttered in both instances are of more than ordinary interest and significance. With the Saints everywhere, the HERALD appreciates the kindness and helpfulness of these expressions.

It was the ambition of President Smith to live to see the name Latter Day Saint honored, and lifted from the odium of apostasy and the evils incident thereto, and in all his life he bent his energies unswervingly to this end. He was permitted to close his days in Independence among his brethren, an honored and an honorable citizen, and, which gave him more pleasure, in the consciousness that his brethren shared with him a name honored and above reproach. It is fitting that his passing should have been marked by the widest publicity and the clearest statement of his worth as a man, and of the clean character of the Saints, both of early days and of the church in succession.

This good work by the press in behalf of the cause is a matter of much encouragement to those who have waited long for their vindication. It behooves the Saints to remember, however, that we are only coming into our heritage; and that if we are to realize the full possibilities of the covenant of latter days, we must continue to make our lives conform to the requirements of that covenant, which alone can bring the honor of men and the favor and power of God.

CURRENT EVENTS

SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

PROHIBITION IN ICELAND.—The Parliament of Iceland has passed a measure prohibiting the sale of alcoholic liquors on the island. Remaining stock has been exported.

TRANSCONTINENTAL TELEPHONE.—On January 25, President Wilson inaugurated the first transcontinental telephone system by speaking from Washington directly to President Moore, of the Panama-Pacific Exposition, in San Francisco, California.

BELGIAN CONSULS.—Germany has annulled the certificates of neutral consuls in Belgium, stating that they have expired, the United States Government considering them suspended. Neutral consular officers will be granted temporary recognition in Brussels, Antwerp, and Liege.

EMBASSY TO POPE.—Great Britain recently appointed Sir Henry Howard British Ambassador Extraordinary to the Vatican. This is the first formal embassy to be sent by England to the pope for four hundred years. The appointment is made in the interests of Great Britain in connection with the present European war.

VETOES IMMIGRATION BILL.—President Wilson on January 28, vetoed the immigration bill, on account of the literacy test, which would, in his language, exclude immigrants, "to whom opportunities of elementary education have been denied, and without regard to their character, their purpose, and their natural capacity," and because "it would seek to all but close entirely the gates of asylum which have always been open to those who could find nowhere else the right and opportunity of constitutional agitation for what they conceived to be the natural and inalienable rights of men."

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—Consul Silliman has informed the Washington administration that provisional President Garza and his government have fled from Mexico City, intending to establish a seat at Cuernavaca, south of the capital. The conventionalist army has evacuated the city, leaving it uncontested to the Carranza forces, which are understood to be taking possession. Conflicting reports of fighting at various points indicate the continuance of military activities. San Luis Potosi has been turned over to Carranza forces without resistance. Villa is reported wounded, cause being withheld.

IMPORTANT LABOR DECISION.—The constitutional right of employers to require employees to renounce union affiliations as a condition of employment, was on January 25 sustained by the Supreme Court. Action had been brought under a Kansas statute declaring it unlawful to coerce or influence persons to enter into an agreement not to join or retain membership in labor organizations, as a condition of securing or continuing employment. The court held that as labor organizations have the right to deny membership to men not agreeing to refuse to accept or retain employment in company with nonunion men, and as union men have the right to refuse employment unless the employer agrees not to engage nonunion men, so the employer has the right to insist that the employee refrain from affiliation with union men.

EUROPEAN WAR.—The leading feature of the war for the week just past was a naval encounter on the North Sea, January 24, in which the British report the sinking of the German cruisers Bleucher and Kolberg. The Germans announce only the loss of the former, and their claim that one British cruiser and two destroyers were sunk is neither admitted nor denied by England. The British armored merchant vessel, Vicknor, has been lost off the Irish coast, probably by a mine. A German Zeppelin has been destroyed and an aeroplane captured by the British, and a German Zeppelin destroyed by the Russians. The allies are holding against a more determined German attack in Belgium and northern France. Slight gains are claimed in this territory by the Germans, and the French report similar gains in Alsace. Fighting in Poland has slackened. Slight German gains are reported in the north and south. The Austrian defense seems to have stiffened, and slight Russian losses are reported in the Carpathians. The Turks have again become aggressive in the Caucasian district. Advance guards of a Turkish army marching on Egypt have encountered British outposts east of the Suez Canal. The Germans and Austrians are increasing their forces along the Italian frontier, against war preparations by Italy. Arrangements are completed in London for the loan of twenty-five million dollars to Roumania, presumably to be used in the purchase of munitions of war. Germany has notified Roumania that measures on the part of the latter government tantamount to mobilization orders, and encouragement of a revolutionary propaganda in Transylvania, are considered hostile acts. The premier of Netherlands, on January 26, announced in the second chapter of the Dutch Parliament, that "at any moment incidents are possible which may render it necessary for us to make an appeal to arms." Orders to confiscate foodstuffs in Germany are thought to indicate a grave situation, against which the Imperial Government seeks to fortify itself.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

R. E. GRANT DEAD.—Under date of January 25 Elder Arthur Allen wrote from Bay Port, Michigan, stating that R. E. Grant passed away at Grand Rapids, Michigan, at about one o'clock on the afternoon of January 24.

AN ISHMAELITE.—Supreme Court Judge R. F. Walker, in a recent opinion at Jefferson City, Missouri, in an ouster case against a Saint Louis club for selling liquor to its own members, said:

Leaving out of consideration any discussion as to its moral or hygienic effect, as out of place in a legal opinion, we find that the framers and interpreters of our law from the dawn of our jurisprudence, both here and elsewhere, have regarded liquor as an "Ishmaelite" among the products of man's ingenuity, and have placed its sale under the ban of carefully worded restrictions.

Truly, liquor's hand has been "against every man"; and the day has come when most "every man's hand [is] against him."

HELPFUL PUBLICITY.—A press report noting the passing of the late President Joseph Smith, and containing misrepresentations, was published in the Des Moines (Iowa) News for December 11, together with a picture of Joseph F. Smith. Elder S. K. Sorensen prepared a statement of correction which appeared in the News of December 19, with a recent picture of our President Joseph Smith. We call attention to this matter to encourage the brethren everywhere to seek to correct misstatements of the press. In by far the majority of instances, newspaper men will give place to proper articles, in all of which our representatives may set forth historical facts in addition to the corrective statements directly called for. Pictures are always welcomed by the papers. The Bureau of Publicity, Lamoni, Iowa, will cooperate in furnishing such of these as are at their disposal. This line of publicity work is always helpful, and no opportunity should pass without an attempt to take advantage of same.

"AUTUMN LEAVES" FOR FEBRUARY.—In this issue there appears a memorial sermon entitled, "The fading leaf," by Elder Ralph W. Farrell. This sermon was delivered in the Providence church of which Brother Farrell is pastor, in memory of President Joseph Smith. In connection therewith appear some very interesting illustrations, including one of the birthplace of President Smith and another taken of him shortly before his death. This picture has not been hitherto published. It is entitled, "The two Josephs," and shows him holding upon his lap his little grandson, Joseph Perrine Smith. In this same number appears an article in the nature of a travel sketch by the church historian, Heman C. Smith, who tells of his visit to Stratford-on-Avon, the celebrated home of the great poet, Shakespeare. The Editor's Corner is occupied by Doctor Leonard Harrington, physician in charge of the Independence Sanitarium. His subject is, "What should be our goal?" This is a splendid appeal to our young people to engage in the service of humanity. There is also in this number a valuable selection from the writings of John Muir, telling of some of the remarkable scenes of the Yosemite Valley, together with a study of the character of John Muir himself, who in his rugged simplicity was much like the mountain scenes of which he wrote. The leading editorial of this number is entitled, "Feeling, thinking, acting our religion."

REVIEW OF "A FOURFOLD TEST OF MORMONISM"

There seems to be no end of writing books against the work of Christ. One of the latest productions comes from the pen of Henry C. Sheldon, who occupies a chair in the Boston University. This man is affiliated with the Methodist Church, and that helps us to account for his appearance as one of the opponents of the Master's work—his craft is in danger. The publishers seem to be very anxious to indorse this man and his books, as the following shows:

This little book meets the needs of the hour, the name of the author is a guarantee of its quality and value. It has a keen, critical, dispassionate review of Mormonism, tested by history, by criticism and by practical results.

This work is divided into four parts, "Historical test," "Critical test," "Rational test" and "Practical test." In each of the so-called tests the same methods and tests as employed by skeptics and agnostics of the past are used by this author. In the historical test the author has quoted but one class of historians. He aligns himself with such as Howe, Tucker, Hyde, Lynn, Stenhouse, and others equally doubtful as to the truthfulness of the assertions contained in their works, and written against the Saints.

THE WITNESSES

The writer of this exposé has carefully avoided quoting from some of the leading historians in the United States, such as Herbert Bancroft, recognized as a man who can be depended upon when giving historical data; and who tells us in his history of Utah that the class of historians which Mr. Sheldon quotes are "wholly unreliable as to facts," and that each have tried to "excel the other in the libertism of their statements."

The publisher's indorsement in saying, "The name of the author is a guarantee of its quality and value," seems to indicate that people are expected to believe each and every statement, without daring to question any item or supposed proof, simply because the name of the author is Sheldon, who is a professor in the Boston University. People, however, are not so ready as these publishers think to swallow everything that comes into print as an exposé of the faith and tenets of more than seventy thousand law-abiding people. Men have reached that independence of thought in this enlightened age that compels them to look at both sides of the questions. Especially is this true when the class who seem so anxious to write against the church have refused time after time to meet representatives of the church and debate the question in a fair and honorable way.

We venture an assertion that this university professor would not go before the public and defend his own work. How can the publishers, then, have the courage to ask their readers to indorse a work or accept it that bears evidence of not being reliable or trustworthy?

In this brief review we will not attempt to answer all the misrepresentations, for that would require too much time and space; but will present enough to prove the utter unreliability of this so-called exposé. On pages 9 and 10 we find the following as a sample:

As the agent for introducing the new Bible into the world, Joseph Smith had among the enthusiasts who gathered about him a prestige which kept him in the ascendant. As often as any one of them was taken with an ambition to play any sort of independent role as prophet, or revelator, he could be put to silence by the superior authority of the man who was reputed to have been the chosen means of bringing to light a full volume of sacred writings.

The thought is here expressed that no one would dare oppose Joseph Smith even though he felt he was called to do a work for God. Those who are best acquainted with the Saints know this to be untrue. There are no people in the world more willing to stand by what they think is right, even in the face of the most bitter opposition. Men have been willing to face death itself because they felt they were called to do a work, as the history of the Saints will show; and if they would do that it is certainly sure they would oppose Joseph Smith if they thought he was wrong. It is not true that Joseph Smith even attempted to keep himself at the head of the church by keeping men in fear of him. He was, on the other hand, loved by those who regarded him as a prophet, and this was partially the secret that held him so prominently before the world.

As to the new Bible, our friend is helping fulfill a statement found in the Book of Mormon which tells us that some will say "a Bible, a Bible, we have a Bible and there can be no more Bibles," etc. This prophecy has been literally fulfilled many times. Because the Lord was good enough to give the world a record of his dealings with the people on the Western Continent, such men as Mr. Sheldon have objected because we have more of the word of God.

ATTACKING CHARACTER

The author attempts as is usual to blacken the character of Joseph Smith, and thus prove the latter-day work false. He does this by men whose testimony has been proven to be untrue. More of the witnesses he introduces for this purpose were men not noted for veracity in the communities where they lived. These men testify that Joseph Smith was a "money digger," given to "telling big stories," etc. As to the latter charge, Pomeroy Tucker is the principal witness, and states, "Joseph Smith was noted for his indolence and vagabondish character and his habits of exaggeration and untruthfulness." Tucker, who disbelieved that God ever reveals anything to man to-day, was willing to blacken the character of the man who made the claim that God had not only heard his prayers, but was willing to answer his petitions and send an angel to give light and instructions in the reestablishing of his work among mankind. Because Joseph Smith told the people that the gospel with all its gifts and blessings was for man to-day, he must be branded as a knave, impostor, and liar by men who had no faith in the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.

If men are to be branded as such because in this age they bear testimony to the goodness of God, then every true representative of the Master that has ever testified to these facts as contained in the Scriptures must go down. The same kind of evidence that sustains the testimony of men found recorded in the Bible will also sustain the testimony of the Palmyra Seer.

One of the most notorious methods employed by Satan and his representatives is to cultivate that which will poison the minds of the honest in heart, by telling that which is untrue about some one who may have the courage to go before a skeptical world and tell them that God is really doing something for humanity now. The same kind of evidence that proves Peter and Paul to be faithful witnesses proves Joseph Smith to be truthful also. This is not all. The work of Christ does not depend on the testimony of any one man, but the giver of the plan of redemption has always given a testimony to each person who has accepted the true gospel of Christ, and hundreds, yea thousands of men now living are ready, and not only ready but anxious to testify to the truthfulness of the gospel as restored through Joseph Smith. These people wherever they are can be depended upon as truthful, law-abiding men and women, as their neighbors are willing to testify.

Why should not these individuals be permitted to be heard? If Mr. Sheldon wants to bring his work up to date, why not attack their character instead of attacking the character of the man who now sleeps in a martyr's grave? While Joseph Smith was alive he was ready to meet his accusers face to face, but they always (as does this modern critic) sought to attack him under the cover of misrepresentations.

THE BOOK OF MORMON

The following criticism of the manner of translating the Book of Mormon shows the depth of this giant of thought and his reliability as a historian:

The claim that Urim and Thummim (described as large prisms set in rims) were employed, was probably an afterthought, a refinement on the crude original scheme of magic. It is to be noted that a "Mormon" historian concedes that the peep-stone figured in the work of translation, though he supposes the Urim and Thummim to have been used also.

Neither the translator nor any of those who assisted him in the work of translation ever claimed that a peep-stone was used for that purpose, but always said the Urim and Thummim were used. Why this author should tell that which has no foundation in fact, and which is so easily proven to be untrue will perhaps remain a mystery. No historian of the church has ever claimed, to our knowledge, that the reputed Willard Chase peep-stone was used by Joseph Smith in the work of translation. Why did our author fail to give us the name of this historian? We will allow our readers to surmise.

In speaking of the Urim and Thummim, he raises the question, "Had they any virtue to transfer reformed Egyptian into English?" "The scholarly verdict is that the use of Urim and Thummim . . . was only a solemn form of casting lots. A means of deciding between the simple alternatives of yes or no." Mr. Sheldon must be the "scholar" in this case, for real scholars do not agree with him.

James P. Boyd, A. M., in his Bible Dictionary makes the following comment in his article, "Urim and Thummim." "Their purpose seems to be indicated in Numbers 27: 21; 1 Samuel 28: 6. It may be inferred they were consulted to ascertain the will of Jehovah." Here a noted scholar agrees with Joseph Smith, while Mr. Sheldon shows his incompetency in his conclusion. The passages of scripture quoted by Mr. Boyd proves his position to be true, also agreeing with Joseph Smith's statement concerning the purpose for which he used them.

Again, he makes a labored effort to overthrow the Book of Mormon by what he calls the "Rational test." "To suppose that an antique language can be transformed into any kind of English by means of bits of mineral substances is to canonize the queer." Here Mr. Sheldon takes the absurd position because we can not always explain a thing, therefore it must be false, and you can not be accepted.

On this hypothesis we must refuse to take nourishment into the body, for we do not know just the process by which food is assimilated by the body, furnishing the brain and the different organs the materials that make for the good of the individual. Neither must we believe in the resurrection of the dead as one of the greatest of miracles, for we do not know, neither can we explain just how it will be brought about. The story of the three Hebrew children who were placed in the fiery furnace and came out "without the smell of smoke upon their garments" must also go down. All the miracles of the Bible would share the same fate under this "scholarly" effort of this Goliath of modern times. If the account as given by Joseph Smith in his using the Urim and Thummim in translating the Book of Mormon is "to canonize the queer," what would the critic say of these miracles to which we have just called attention? Certainly he is the "queer" in this case. Will Mr. Sheldon tell us how the trumpets of rams' horns affected the walls of Jericho? If he can tell just what force was brought to bear on the walls by the trumpets, we can tell just how the Urim and Thummim could transform "Reformed Egyptian into English."

SPALDING ROMANCE

Our critic makes a very labored effort in trying to prove the Book of Mormon to have originated with the Spalding Romance. It is almost an insult to the intelligence of the reader to ask his indulgence while a few statements may be submitted pertaining to this oft-exploded theory. Once in a long while some fossil of a university professor (who needs to be relegated to a prominent place in some museum as a freak in the image of a man) comes out with this story which has been completely refuted and introduces it as something which the people have not heard of in connection with the origin of the Book of Mormon. It requires considerable courage on the part of the critics of the Book of Mormon to ask intelligent men and women to believe this theory, as they can show no resemblance between the Spalding Romance and the Book of Mormon. So we can be charitable toward them for their bravery (?).

Mr. Sheldon presents the testimony of Joseph Miller, also that of Mrs. Spalding in trying to sustain his contentions as to the origin of the book, and here he runs against a snag. The testimony of Miller is directly opposed to that of Mrs. Spalding, as he says the Spalding Romance was taken to the printing office of Patterson and was stolen by Sidney Rigdon, while Mrs. Spalding says it was not. Our critic, realizing that a chasm has been reached, bridges it over in the following manner:

The conviction of Mrs. Spalding as expressed a number of years later, that the manuscript was left among the effects of her deceased husband, may be quoted in opposition to this report of Miller. But it is quite possible that she did not know or had forgotten the fact that the writing had been sent a second time to the office of Patterson.

Wonderful testimony, indeed, when two witnesses attempt to prove fraud against an individual and their testimony is found to be directly opposed; then for an apologist to come along and ask his readers to accept the testimony of one whom he is willing to admit either did not know or had forgotten is certainly asking more of his readers than he would be willing to do himself. Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel, but thine abiding place is not with Mr. Sheldon.

He finally puts on the capsheaf in summing up his evidence in the following statement, "The worth of a judicial sentence can not of course be attached to these verdicts." Here he admits the testimony presented is not of a character that the courts of our land would admit it as worthy of consideration. This last statement is true; and how inconsistent for Mr. Sheldon to ask his readers to accept as evidence that which he admits is doubtful and unworthy of credence.

We will here present the testimony of two witnesses who are agreed in their statements, which completely overthrow the contention of our critic, also the testimony which he introduced to prove his case. Mr. James H. Fairchild, who in no way was in sympathy with Joseph Smith or the Book of Mormon, testifies as follows:

Mr. Rice, myself and others compared it (Spalding Romance) with the Book of Mormon and could detect no resemblance between the two in general or in detail. There seems to be no name or incident common to the two.

This man testifies to what he knows, not from memory or hearsay. We allow Mr. Rice to testify:

Two things are true concerning this manuscript in my possession. First, it is a genuine writing of Solomon Spalding, and second, it is not the original of the Book of Mormon.

THE PLATES

Mr. Sheldon attempts to show that Joseph Smith had no plates, and then turns squarely around and introduces testimony to prove that the translator stole the peep-stone from the Chase children (see testimony, Braden-Kelley debate) in order that he might translate the characters found on plates which he says never existed. Finding, no doubt, that this solution of the problem would not be satisfactory, Mr. Sheldon now attempts to present a new theory that Joseph Smith, in order to deceive his followers, manufactures plates to suit the emergency, and refers to the plates which James J. Strang claims to have translated, taking the position that because the claims of Mr. Strang were false, therefore Mr. Smith had perpetrated the same brand. It is true Strang claimed he had plates from which he translated the "Book of Law." When we compare the manner of the coming forth of the Book of Mormon, especially that which the work contained, with the Book of Law, there is a wide difference. Mr. Strang, to convince people that his work was true exhibited the plates to all, and they are still being paraded before the people. Joseph Smith never did this. It is also true that witnesses who stand unimpeached to-day testified concerning the plates from whence the Book of Mormon was translated; but outside of a very limited few Joseph Smith never showed the plates.

Mr. Sheldon makes a fatal blunder in supposing because some plates were false, therefore all plates must be false. Every work must stand on its own merit. For example, the Bible and the Koran both claim to be sacred writings. Shall we say the Bible can not be true because the Koran is untrue? The Bible and the Koran stand on the same parallel as the Book of Mormon and the Book of Law. The Koran and the Book of Law are false, while the Bible and the Book of Mormon agree in the matter which they contain.

Mr. Sheldon introduces the testimony of Professor Charles Anthon to discredit the genuineness of the characters submitted to him by Joseph Smith and Martin Harris. Mr. Anthon says of the characters:

It was a singular scrawl consisting of all kinds of crooked characters, disposed in columns . . . wide delineations of a circle divided into various compartments, decked with various strange marks and evidently copied after the Mexican calendar given by Humboldt.

Any scholar who has taken the trouble to compare the facsimile of the characters furnished to Anthon with the Mexican calendar must admit the foolishness of the above statement. It seems men have presumed upon what they consider the ignorance of their auditors and made statements like the above, which when examined show the unreliability of those who make the same. There is absolutely no resemblance between the characters and the Mexican calendar.

In a footnote this statement is made:

A letter of Anthon seven years later refers to this visit of Harris and also gives an account of a second visit. Mormon apologists are able to point out some discrepancies between the two letters.

Here it is admitted that Mr. Anthon can not be depended upon as being reliable.

BISHOP SPALDING

Mr. Sheldon next takes up a late production in a work by Bishop Spalding of Utah, who attempts to prove that Joseph Smith in translating some papyri containing Egyptian hieroglyphics did not give a true translation; therefore if he failed in this case he could not be depended upon when translating the Book of Mormon.

We gladly consider this objection, which is, in our opinion, the only one yet presented in this so-called exposé worthy of serious consideration. Mr. Spalding introduces the testimony of several scholars who seem to be unanimous in their verdict that "the interpretation by Joseph Smith was utterly aside from the real significance." These same "scholars" attempt to give the "real significance," but when a comparison is made of their findings there is a great disagreement among them as to what really appeared on the papyri, other than that the characters were Egyptian. In this they also agree with Joseph Smith. Sometimes men are quite ready to condemn the work of another, but, when their work is examined, men of average intelligence are forced to admit that the same is unreliable. These scholars will never dare admit they are wrong. The facts are, each of them says to his brother scholar, "You are wrong, I am right. I can be depended upon to give a true translation of these characters, but you can't." In their eagerness to condemn Joseph Smith they also condemn each other.

Had Joseph Smith claimed the same inspiration in the translating of this papyri that he did for the Book of Mormon, then the testimony of these scholars would have been a material point against him, if they had agreed as to what the true interpretation was. But there is nothing in the writings of Joseph Smith in which he claims that he had the same degree of inspiration in the translating of this papyri that he had in translating of the Book of Mormon; in fact, he made no claim to inspiration at all. It is for our critics to prove that he did in order to have a valid point against him as a translator. Not only that, they must show by witnesses who agree that the translation he gave was not true, which so far they have not proven. It will be noticed that all are agreed that the papyri contained Egyptian hieroglyphics, which also agrees with Joseph Smith, but when they disagree among themselves, they, of course, could not agree with him.

THE WITNESSES

Mr. Sheldon attempts to impeach the testimony of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon. He questions whether they really saw the plates, thinking it was optical illusion or hypnotic suggestion. In speaking of Martin Harris, he says, "When questioned as to whether he saw the reputed objects with his literal sight, felt obliged to reply that it was by the spiritual eye or eye of faith." All our readers need to do is to turn to the testimony of the three witnesses, also the eight, as contained in the Book of Mormon, and candor will compel them to admit that the above statement is foreign to the truth. All testify that they did see the plates, some that they did handle with our hands that which had been translated by Joseph Smith.

Mr. Sheldon seems to think because men may have had spiritual visions they are disqualified as witnesses. He states that David Whitmer was "exceedingly visionary." We wonder what he would have said of Paul, who also was "exceedingly visionary," had he lived in the age in which Paul lived. In the light of his objection, we must conclude that Paul's experience on his way to Damascus would be condemned by this modern critic as hypnotic suggestion and a humbug, a delusion of the mind. Here we can not refrain from quoting the words of Solomon: "Where there is no vision the people perish: but he that keepeth the law, happy is he." (Proverbs 29: 18.)

An objection is also urged against the testimony of the three witnesses in regard to their hearing the voice of God, bearing record to the truthfulness of the plates and the translation as given by Joseph Smith. Here Mr. Sheldon demonstrates the shallowness of the argument appearing all through this work, as the following will show: "How the voice of God imparted this information . . . is not stated. The door is left open to the supposition that they wish to accredit the Book of Mormon was the effective source of the voice." Here an effort is made to discredit their testimony because, as he states in connection with the above, "whether through an inward impression or otherwise is not stated." It does not make so much difference how that information was given, and to admit that it was by an "inward impression" does not dispose of their testimony.

Our critic would throw aside the statement of these men because they did not explain just how they heard the voice of God. It is too bad that when Moses heard the voice of God out of the burning bush some university professor could not have been present and consulted the prophet as to how he should receive the information, and ask if he really knew it was by the voice of God. We are still of the opinion that Bible believers will continue to believe the narrative, even though some may discredit the account.

CONTENTS

As to the contents of the Book of Mormon, we note the following from Mr. Sheldon:

Of the incredible in the incredible book which Joseph Smith pretended to have received through angelic ministrations, no item is perhaps more fantastic than that which recounts the voyage of the Jaredites to America in very peculiarly constructed barges. Anyone who can believe this story ought not to feel obliged to challenge the historicity of any of the marvelous tales of Alice in Wonderland.

Sometimes we are forced to smile at the stupid blunders made by some of the opponents of the Book of Mormon, and the one just quoted is a sample. Our friend living in Boston should know (whether he does or not) that the boats or barges of Jared as described in the books of Ether were built along the same lines as the lifeboats used by our Government in the life-saving stations to-day. Such blunders as the above we would like to excuse, but the only grounds upon which we can excuse such men as Mr. Sheldon in making this criticism is absolute ignorance of the thing he attempts to criticize.

At the time the Book of Mormon was translated lifeboats were not constructed as they are to-day; now they are built on lines similar to the barges of Jared. Is our critic willing to credit Joseph Smith as being eighty years ahead of science? or will he concede that God had as much wisdom as some of the inventors of our time in the construction of boats? We prefer to believe God should have the credit, and not Joseph Smith.

Our informant tells us the Book of Mormon is of modern origin because it contains a great amount of scripture found in the Bible. When it is remembered that the people who came here about six hundred years before Christ brought with them the law of Moses, also many of the prophecies of Isaiah and other prophets, we understand why these scriptures appear in the Nephite record; they were taught and preserved along with other sacred records for the benefit of future generations.

As to the passages from the New Testament, we also account for them in this way: Christ said, "And other sheep I have which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd." True to his statement, he came to this continent and visited his "other sheep"; they heard his voice as he speaks the same words "unto one nation like unto another." He preached the same unchangeable gospel here that he gave to his disciples on the Eastern Continent, thereby establishing "one fold and one shepherd." This objection urged by our friend goes glimmering, as does all others.

FRUITS OF IDENTIFICATION

Several pages of Mr. Sheldon's work is devoted to the Mormons of Utah. To this matter we attempt to reply. He makes the same blunder that many other writers make in trying to connect Joseph Smith with the crime of polygamy. He insists that the Prophet gave the blasphemous document, teaching the plurality of wives. He admits, however, that the Book of Mormon is strictly opposed to that doctrine, as is also the Doctrine and Covenants.

In the concluding chapter he gives what he calls the "Practical test," but like some other writers he makes this test from the reports as furnished by those who were bitterly opposed to the teaching of the Saints, and by those who have apostatised from the original faith of the Saints. The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ has many times been proven to be that body of believers who properly represent Joseph Smith and his teaching. Our friends in Utah, as an apostate church, should not be the true interpreters of the teachings of the man whom they profess to reverence, denying his teaching in the lives they live.

The members of the true church are willing—yea, anxious to have the tree tested by its fruits as revealed in the lives of its membership. Men high up in the affairs of nations have paid a tribute to the character of these who to-day are respected and honored as law-abiding citizens, not only of the Government under which we live, but also in foreign lands. Mr. Sheldon entirely ignores this body of people, numbering about seventy thousand souls, and would have us believe that all the crime done in the name of religion in Utah is the legitimate outgrowth of the gospel as restored through Joseph Smith in 1830. Is it honorable to ignore a large body of true believers in the mission of the Palmyra Seer? especially when the courts have repeatedly declared the Reorganized Church to be the legitimate successor of the original church which taught the doctrine for which Joseph Smith stood? Mr. Sheldon evidently is determined to make out a case whether he has one or not.

That this review will enable the honest in heart to be able to discern the truth as revealed in the gospel, and to reject false opinion, is the desire of the writer.

HEALTH HINTS

NUMBER 3.—SUNSHINE

BY W. A. SINCLAIR, M. D.

It is said that if a potato be put into a warm cellar with one small window, the potato will sprout, and the leading vine will run along the floor of the cellar until it reaches the window, when it will make directly for it, and continue to grow in that direction as long as it can support itself. House plants instinctively turn their leaves toward the windows, thirsty for sunlight. A running vine planted in a shady locality seems almost to possess intelligence, in creeping around where the rays of the sun may fall upon it.

Should not mankind be as wise as the plant? or as sagacious as the potato?

The celebrated Doctor Moore in his metaphysical works, speaking of the necessity of sunlight, says, "A tadpole, confined in darkness, would never become a frog; an infant, being deprived of heaven's free light, will grow into a shapeless idiot instead of a beautiful and responsible being." "Hence," continues the same writer, "in the deep, dark gorges and ravines of the Swiss Valais, where the direct sunshine never reaches, the hideous prevalence of idiocy startles the traveler. It is a strange, melancholy idiocy. Many of the citizens are incapable of articulate speech. Some are deaf; some are blind; some labor under all these privations; and all are misshapen in every part of the body. I believe there is in all places a marked difference in the healthfulness of houses according to their aspect with regard to the sun; and those are decidedly the most healthful, other things being equal, in which all the rooms are, during some part of the day, fully exposed to the direct light. Epidemics attack inhabitants on the shady side of the street, and totally exempt those on the other side; and even in epidemics such as ague, the morbid influence is often thus partial in its labors."

A CURATIVE

Sunlight not only imparts vital magnetism to the extent of preventing disease, but it has been resorted to with success as a curative agent.

Sir James Wylie, one time physician to the emperor of Russia, attentively studied the effects of light as a curative agent in the hospitals of Saint Petersburg; and he discovered that the number of patients who were cured in rooms properly lighted was four times greater than that of those confined in dark rooms. This led to a complete reform in lighting the hospitals of Russia, and with the most beneficial results.

In all cities visited by the cholera, it was universally found that the greatest number of deaths took place in narrow streets, and on the sides of those having a northern exposure, where the salutary beams of the sun were excluded. The inhabitants of the southern slopes of mountains are better developed and more healthy than those who live on the northern sides; while those who dwell in secluded valleys are generally subject to peculiar diseases and deformities.

The different results above mentioned are due to the agency of light, without a full supply of which plants and animals maintain but a sickly and feeble existence.

Eminent physicians have observed that partially deformed children have been restored by exposure to the sun and the open air. As scrofula is most prevalent among the children of the poor in crowded cities, this is attributed, by many persons, to their living in dark and confined houses—such diseases being most common among those residing in underground tenements.

Doctor Edwards advises isolation in the open air, and nudity where it would not be incompatible with comfort, as calculated to restore the sufferers in scrofulous affections and bodily deformities. People suffering from tuberculosis, or those having a tuber-culous ancestry should pay particular attention in the choice of a location in which to dwell, to select one which has a southern exposure.

Sick people are too apt to be regardless of their surroundings, and depend entirely too much upon their physician to cure them. A wise, thoughtful man, when he is afflicted with illness, seeks to discover the cause, also influences surrounding him which might aggravate the complaint. In his investigation, he may not only find that his rooms are not well ventilated; that the location is not free from swampy dampness; but that his dwelling is so situated behind hills, or under so much shade, as to entirely shut him in from the light of the sun. If he should discover these disadvantageous conditions, he should at any sacrifice of business or property, if he values health and life, remove to some spot where he may secure all of nature's agencies for his recovery.

AN OVERDOSE

Occasionally, some one daily exposed to the sun in the heat of summer gets an overdose of the curative agent, and has an attack of sunstroke; but simply because he has received an overdose and is made sick does not argue that a moderate amount would be harmful. All active medicines are injurious taken in overdoses. Sometimes the sun's heat is censured for what bad habits are responsible for. If a man eats and drinks excessively; or sets his blood on fire with whisky, he is more liable than anybody else to have sunstroke. Some medicines become injurious by mixing, and it could hardly be supposed that the pure sunlight, fresh from the laboratory of God, would mix well with the vile drinks of our low saloons.

However, as the lightning sometimes kills innocent people, continuous exposure to a summer's sun may, in some cases, strike down sober, temperate men. To avoid this, those who are compelled to work in the sunlight during the hottest days of the year would do well to wear a wet napkin or handkerchief on the top of the head, under the hat.

Let no one, however, be afraid of sunlight because of occasional cases of sunstroke. If it were possible to obtain the statistics regarding those who die directly or indirectly from want of sunshine, we would find that this class would number a thousand to one who dies of an overdose.

A GERMICIDE

People who live in the country are apt to bury themselves beneath the foliage of the shrubs and trees, even shutting out the few rays that do penetrate, by closing the green blinds which shelter the parlor windows. Mechanics and a great many of the business men in cities are contented to pursue their vocations all day by gas light. There is a story told of one of the offices of Nassau Street, New York City, the window of which is so shut in by its contiguity to another building that the sunlight never enters it, to the effect that everyone who has occupied it for a number of years has died of consumption.

Sunlight is the greatest germicide known to the medical science; hence its exclusion allows the multiplication of deadly germs.

People who break away from their business for summer recreation and make tours to the watering places think that they derive great advantage from change of air. No doubt this is true. The qualities of the air are greatly modified and affected by the geological formations beneath the surface, and the vegetable products which present themselves above, so that one can not breathe the air of any of these locations without extracting certain properties which the system requires. In this way, change of air frequently proves highly beneficial; but in many of these cases benefits are attributed to this cause when they are more generally due to exposure to sunlight.

When people allow the sun to paint their faces brown, torpid livers are less liable to paint them yellow; sickness will be less prevalent; and health and cheerfulness will be the common inheritance of all.

MICHIGAN INDIANS

WASHINGTON, December 21.—Indians in Michigan receive better treatment both from the Government and their fellow men than in other parts of the country where they have been driven and herded together during the last century. The red men of the Wolverine State have more reverence for the the "Great White Father" in Washington, as they call the President, than others. Michigan is the twelfth State in Indian population, having 7,516 of the aborigines of the country out of a grand total of 331,250.

While the Government has failed to provide schools for 10,000 Indians in other parts of the Union, in Michigan every Indian child has a chance for an education. In this State they have churches, schools, hospitals and libraries.

GET LITTLE LIQUOR

Where in other States the ranks of the Indians are being depleted by the ravages of tuberculosis, and similar scourges, in Michigan they are remarkably free from disease. The liquor traffic among the Indians has been nearly suppressed in the State.

Michigan Indians own 153,000 acres of land. About 1,300 heads of families have a total income of $71,000. They own 14,500 acres of timber, the stumpage value of which is $46,000. Their total individual and tribal property is valued at $311,000. They have more than 18,000 head of stock.

A total of 1,300 Indians in the State are citizens, and 655 are voters. More than 1,500 have professed Christianity. Out of 959 of school age, 836 are in regular attendance.

ENFORCE FEDERAL LAW

Since the discovery a few years ago that one of the Michigan agencies was located over a saloon, more vigorous efforts have been made to enforce the federal law prohibiting the furnishing of liquor to Indians. During the last year twenty-nine arrests were made under the liquor law, twenty-eight cases were dismissed and one resulted in acquittal.

About 1,000 Indians were examined for disease and only thirteen found infected with tuberculosis and 103 with trachoma. The Government spent $65,064 on the Indians in the State during the year. The Government property in the State used by the Indians is valued at $306,000.—Mark Foote, in Grand Rapids (Michigan) Evening Press.

INDIAN NOT MONGOLIAN

The Register and Leader (Des Moines, Iowa) for December 28, 1914, has an interesting item from the Indian Commissioner. Coming from the source that it does, and treating on such a subject, it can not fail to interest the Saints, particularly the eldership. The item follows:

WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, December 26.—Cato Sells, formerly of Vinton, now Indian commissioner, is up in arms because some of the schoolbooks classify the Indian as Mongolian. He is determined to make the American children accept the old idea that the red men are a distinct race. Mr. Sells put out a statement to-night saying the American Indian should not be classified as a Mongolian. He announced that all schoolbooks classifying the Indian as Mongolian would be dropped from the authorized list of books for use in the Indian service. He says he will do all in his power "to oppose an arbitrary classification advanced by a few publishers of schoolbooks which class the Indian as Mongolian.—Register and Leader, December 27, 1914.

PROTECTION AGAINST EARTHQUAKES

The problem of protecting against earthquakes in Italy is discussed in a recent memoir by Professor G. Agamennone, who points out that disasters from this cause are mainly due to faulty construction and bad location of buildings.

It appears that after the greater earthquakes of recent times the authorities have formulated rules to insure proper reconstruction, but these have been disregarded on account of the expense entailed and because the danger of another earthquake seemed remote.

The author thinks the Italian Government should establish a special ministry to control and systematize the work of mitigating the results of earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, flood, and other analogous disasters, and should provide state insurance against the losses due to these agencies.—Scientific American, December 5, 1914.

THE RIGHT TIME TO EAT

That we eat at exactly the wrong time, at least in some countries, is the somewhat remarkable conclusion which Professor Bergonie of the Bordeaux University reaches as the result of his researches, and this is very apropos at this time when we have the Taylor system of best use of the human motor. Again, in an electric station, the engineers regulate the coal consumption so as to concord with the variable demand for current. But human beings, according to him, although they work at stated hours, carry out the absorption of food quite by chance and without being occupied with making the food supply concord with the periods of most work. Fortunately, the liver acts as a reserve of energy, owing to its glycogenic function, but its capacity is, of course, limited.

Take, as an example, a repast composed of one part fatty elements, one part of proteids (meat), and four to five parts carbohydrates (sugar, starch, etc.); the utilization of the energy commences almost at once, and the amount of energy available increases up to some three hours after absorbing the food, then it decreases slowly.

According to this, it follows that most Europeans and Americans use exactly the wrong hours for taking their repast, that is, from twelve to one o'clock and from seven to eight, for the early morning breakfasts (coffee, etc.) can hardly be counted. Especially to be remarked is that the evening meal acts to produce energy just when the organism is about to rest for a long period, and this can only act to overload the liver, being unused for a long time. According to Professor Bergonie, the principal repast should be taken at 7.30 a. m., and should be completed by two others of lighter nature, taken at 4.30 and at eight o'clock p. m.

We would remark that in France and some other countries an early morning repast would not be practicable on account of an absolute lack of appetite for heavy food which is felt at that time, at least by a great number of persons. The Romans had the same habit, so that this must be due to the effect of climate, as it does not depend upon the race of persons who may at any time inhabit such countries.—Scientific American, September 14, 1914.

Study Proposed Amendments

At first thought it might appear that the next convention will have a formidable array of amendments to deal with. But it does not follow that all of them will be considered. And the convention is not compelled to vote this year on all that are admitted for consideration. If lack of time demands it, some of them can be deferred for a year; only the most urgent need be adopted. Unless published now, none of them could be even considered by the convention.

At the last moment as an accommodation, we have framed some of the propositions in order to render them admissible. Our executive had a committee at work on those providing a closer relationship with the parent body, but all of us being busy people with other pressing demands, we did not get our report together in time to be included in this issue. The editor framed a set in order that convention may have something as a basis of action.

We are printing all that have been offered, this issue, in order that it may be seen just what we have for convention in the way of proposed amendments. We have grouped and marked them so that delegates will be able to grasp their relative import and refer to them easily in discussion. These will be printed and on hand ready to distribute to every delegate on the floor of convention.

OBSERVATIONS

1. Those who believe that the point of contact in "closer relationship" with the church should begin and end with the general officers of the association, will probably prefer to consider number 1, "Advisory members only."

2. Those who believe that the point of contact should be extended clear through the organization, to district or stake, and local affairs, will probably prefer to consider group number 2, from "A" to "G."

3. Conventions have for years been referring matters to the "Executive Committee" (sometimes this body is referred to as "Executive Board"). Yet the constitution says nothing about such a function in our organization. It would appear that usage has made it a sort of unwritten law. General superintendents have frequently been called upon to make a ruling as to what officers constitute the executive committee in local schools. Superintendents should be relieved from such rulings. Shall we write it into the Constitution and By-laws and thus make this matter definite and uniform throughout the association?

Those who want to see the executive council defined, but believe the point of contact with the church should not be made further than the general officers, will move to strike out that feature in both district and local school organization.

4. If, as we believe, there is a general consensus of opinion as to the wisdom of the general superintendent being legally provided with a council with whom he and his assistants may advise when needed, it seems clear that the proposal to write this into the constitution need not consume a great amount of time, since delegates can come prepared to act, after two months' time to think it over. And the matter of extending it to district and local organization can be deferred for a year or two, if thought best.

5. It will be noticed that we use the term executive council and not executive committee or executive board. The constitution expressly says: "The superintendent shall be the executive officer of the association and have general direction and supervision of its work. . . . The assistant superintendents shall assist the superintendent as occasion demands.—Art. V, secs. 1 and 2.

From this, it is seen that it would be contrary to our constitution to create an executive committee having all the duties already assigned to the superintendents. But inasmuch as experience has shown that it is good for the superintendents to have some others to advise with it is admissible to give them a "council" with whom they can counsel when advice is needed. The amendments proposed do not in any way curtail or usurp the duties of superintendents. It appears to us that council is the better term to express the function of this body.

6. Since the association has affirmed its belief in closer relations with the parent body, we ought to take it seriously and make such relationship a reality—not merely talk about it or resolve upon the desirability of it. Group number 2 from A to G will bring that about.

Delegates should study these resolutions and come to convention prepared for clear-brained action.

Proposed Amendments

Notice is hereby given that at the next General Convention to be held at Lamoni, Iowa, April 4 and 5, 1915, the following amendments to the Constitution and By-laws will be offered:

I. ADVISORY MEMBERS ONLY

To amend article III, "Relationship to the church," by adding the following: "To this end, it solicits the General Conference to appoint one of the First Presidency and one of the Quorum of Twelve to act as advisers representing the church in all matters referred to the general officers of the association, and on all business considered by them."

II. ADVISORY MEMBERS AND EXECUTIVE COUNCIL

(A) To amend article III, "Relationship to the church," by adding the following: "To this end, a member of the First Presidency and one from the Quorum of Twelve, endorsed by General Conference, shall be considered as advisory members of the executive council, having voice in the deliberations of that body."

(B) To amend article IV, "Officers and elections," by adding to section 1, the following: "These officers to be known as the executive council of the General Sunday School Association."

(C) On page 5, following "Librarian," under article V, "Duties of officers," insert a new section as follows: "7. Executive Council.—Upon the call of the superintendent, the officers mentioned in article IV shall meet to confer on those matters upon which the superintendent and his assistants need advice and counsel. At all such meetings, the advisory members mentioned in article three shall be invited to attend. This council shall evolve plans and methods for the furtherance of the work under their care; and select editors in the literary department and such workers in other departments as are not otherwise provided for. They shall meet conjointly with the executive committee of Zion's Religio-Literary Society for the selection of such officers or workers as are to act for both organizations, such as normal superintendent, field workers, etc."

(D) To amend article III, "Officers," page 9, district association, by adding to section 1, the following: "These officers to be known as the executive council of the district (or stake) Sunday school association."

following new section, under article IV, "Duties of officers": "7. Executive Council.—Upon the call of the superintendent, the officers mentioned in article three, shall meet as often as necessary to counsel on the work under their care and evolve and discuss plans for the furtherance of the work of the district (or stake). The president of the district or stake shall be considered an advisory member of this council and shall be invited to attend its meetings, having voice in its deliberations."

(F) To amend by-laws for Sunday schools, article I, "Officers," by adding the following: "The elective officers of the school shall constitute the executive council thereof."

(G) To amend by-laws for schools, article II, "Duties of officers," by adding a new section as follows: "10. Executive Council.—Upon the call of the superintendent, the officers constituting the executive council shall meet to confer on those matters upon which the superintendent and his assistants need advice and counsel. The president of the branch shall be considered an advisory member of this council and shall be invited to attend its meetings, having voice in the deliberations."

III. HOME DEPARTMENT BY-LAWS

To amend by-laws for Sunday schools, article II, section 4, page 13, "Home department superintendent," beginning in fourteenth line from top of paragraph by striking out the sentences, "He shall transfer all contributions received promptly to the treasurer of the school, keeping accurate account of the same. He shall receive from the school such supplies as shall be necessary for the proper conduct of the work." And in lieu thereof insert the following: "All necessary supplies shall be ordered through the secretary of the school; but if it is urgent, the superintendent of this department may order them, keeping an accurate account of the same. Once in every three months he shall report to the treasurer of school all receipts and expenditures and transfer balance in hand, if any. Should the department not be self-supporting, the treasurer shall supply the deficiency."

IV. BASIS OF REPRESENTATION

To amend article IV, "Basis of representation," section 1, page 6, by striking out the word ten in third line and substituting in lieu thereof the word twenty-five.

V. MANNER OF VOTING

To amend constitution for districts (or stakes), article V, "Elections," section 2, page 11, by striking out the words, "open nominations and vote," in fourth line, and inserting in lieu thereof the word ballot.

VI. MASS CONVENTION

To amend article X, page 12, "Mass convention," by striking out the number "400" and inserting "1,000," making the article read: "Any district association convention, where the membership is under 1,000 may upon a two thirds of the delegates present, change from delegate to mass convention."

Plus Ultra

Some time early last fall, the senior ladies' class of the Burlington Religio local decided to become an organized class. We gave some little aid in drafting a constitution, and learned soon after that the class got started under the best of prospects and had selected the motto, "Plus Ultra."

The meaning of this motto is couched in the verses that follow, written by the teacher of the class, Miss Ethel Lacey, who though losing her eyesight because of a growing cataract, can still operate a typewriter, being a stenographer.

She is hoping and trusting that God will remove those curtains from her eyes, and enable her to continue her work for the Master, as well as earn her daily bread and assist her aged parents.

Let us all hope and pray that "there's more beyond" for her, too, and that her faith and that of her relatives and friends will yet prevail. She still superintends the Burlington Sunday school, ably seconded by Miss Julia Ortleb. Besides this, she presides over the district association. Her mother reads the lessons and all correspondence to her.

PLUS ULTRA

"There's more beyond." 'Tis the Master speaks,
Extends his hand, and gently entreats,
"Come, follow the path that I have trod,—
The path that leads up, ever upward, to God.
Though rugged it seems, still I am thy guide,
More strength thou shalt have with me at thy side."

More strength and more peace, more pleasure we'll find
In work and in play, in body and mind
More vigor and life, and more of a bond
With him. If on the thought of the "more beyond,"
In all our pleasure and service as well,
The future will surely its story tell.

Of strength to resist, of weakness to yield;
On what we are doing to-day we build,
And the more of what will depend, you see,
On what our choice for to-day may be;
So in pleasure and earnest endeavor,
Let us seek as we go, for heavenly favor.

Beyond is more; yes, every day
Brings cause anew for us to say,
"All praise to him who hath led our feet
In the light of truth." In his service sweet
We'll unite ourselves in a loyal band,
And strive with our might to understand

What more there is in each new day
That we may find to do or say,
To give us strength or another pleasure;
For that, after all, is the surest treasure
To lay in store for the great beyond,
Where greater service and joy is found.

Then hail to the band of the more beyond,—
A merry band and jolly, we're bound,
But earnest as well in the cause of good,
With the word of life our daily food,
The victor's laurel our emblem and aim,
Royalty, purity our colors proclaim.

ETHEL A. LACEY.

Home Class Members and the Main School

QUESTIONS

1. Has a home class member a right to be a candidate for office (in main school), provided he is in a position to regularly attend, and of course become a member of the school?
2. Has a home class member a right to vote in a meeting of election of officers?
3. If a home class member has no right to vote for regular officers, has he the right to vote for home class superintendent?

ANSWERS

1. (a) He can not be a member of both school and home class at same time. The home class is designed only for those who can not attend Sunday school. (See by-laws for Sunday school, article VI, section 5, page 15.)

(b) If "in a position to attend and become a member of the school," he should not be a member of the home department. Take his name off and transfer it to the main school where he belongs, if willing to attend.

(c) It would be inconsistent to allow himself to be a candidate in a school where he can not or will not attend, and, consequently, is not a member. Membership in the main school does not bar a member from working in the home department as teacher, visitor or superintendent, if desirous of serving.

(d) After enrolling in the main school, he does not, under present rule, acquire the right of voice and vote therein until he "shall have been in attendance four consecutive sessions, except in the organization of new schools (article III, page 14). But we are of the opinion that exception should also include all transferred home class members, and that the article should be so amended.

2. To this we must answer, No. It is a logical corollary to number 1. Not being in a position to "regularly attend" the meetings of the school, a home class member has not a personal knowledge of the needs and conditions of the school, and should not expect to have voice and vote in affairs in which they can exercise only immature judgment.

3. No. The home class member stands in somewhat similar relation to the main school as does a citizen of a territory to the United States Government. His governor is sent to him; he has no voice in choosing or electing him.

BY-LAWS FOR HOME DEPARTMENT

In starting new departments it is necessary to issue leaflets of instruction, which was done in our home department. On page 15 of by-laws for schools, after the section on home department, there appears a "note" directing attention to "Leaflet Number 2" for further instruction on the working of that department.

This leaflet has been revised from time to time according to the facts of experience by workers in that department, and may still need revising. The last one was issued some four years ago. A new edition will be issued as soon as the General Convention passes on certain amendments that would affect the wording of some parts.

It has been necessary to make rulings, and the results show that what was at first mere instruction and advice has with added experience grown into the nature of by-laws, and should really be incorporated in our Constitution and By-laws. We are submitting in this present issue proposed amendments. We invite the special attention of all district officers and home department superintendents, and ask that they study them and come to convention prepared to take intelligent action, by perfecting them or making such alteration as shall be necessary. Two months' notice is necessary, and we present these merely as a basis for action.

It is possible that the statement in leaflet of instruction under heading of "members," "They may attend the regular sessions of the school, conventions, special day exercises, or other meetings, and shall be welcome as any other member of the school," has led to some difficulty in some places. This language should be revised and made to conform to the constitution more strictly in next revision.

It appears to us there is a slight fallacy in the instruction under "representation," page 7: "All home department members shall be included in the total enrollment of the school, and the representation shall be based therein the same as for any other department of the school." From this it would be easy for a home class member to infer that he has equal rights to voice and vote with every member of the main school. This will be presented to convention, and it will be asked to make a by-law which will obviate the necessity of future officers making "rulings" thereon.

We might remark that the very fact that the superintendent and other officers are called upon to make a ruling on anything pertaining to government of the association is proof that the constitution and by-laws are not sufficiently plain on the subject.

Passing of President Smith

The tragic death of the father and Uncle Hyrum of our late President Joseph Smith not only cut short a work only begun, but emphasized the unrelenting opposition experienced from the first of the movement.

The years of reflection afforded the son from the death of his father in 1844, till accepting his father's place in 1860, led him to pledge himself to the task of making the name of Latter Day Saint honorable in all the world; so ordering his life that by no act of his should his father be judged to have been a bad man in character or in teaching. No higher aspiration could have been his, neither could it have been stated in clearer terms, since his father's lifework was the reestablishment of the gospel of Christ as it had been committed to Christ by God; for Christ said, "My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me."

It is, indeed, doubtful if any of President Smith's associate workers could have written anything that would better embellish his lifework than the splendid tribute of the Kansas City Journal, with the several other splendid references of the press to his demise. Whether or not President Smith realized all within the church in various lines of possible achievement, all he may have expected during his life, we may not know. But one thing we do know; he left no program mapped out unfulfilled; which in a marked sense reflects to the close of his career the wisdom with which his life was so replete, to be complete.

In the passing years some indulged the thought that President Smith did not move fast enough, that the work did not move rapidly enough; but who can certify that either was the fact? That adequate measure of wisdom which so guided him as to leave no incomplete program unfulfilled, may well be the basis for the conclusion that he moved as he was led, and that in his day there was accomplished what was committed to him to do. The work left over and remaining for others, God will qualify them for. With a cause vindicated, and the guidance of the Master at the helm, the future is both bright and clear.

If the wonderful simplicity, faith and charity of President Smith's long and eventful life, with the simple arrangements for his funeral, shall impress those accepting leadership at his hand that the same virtues shall be woven into their lives, then shall the halo of his passing so enriching his life also be shared by all in their lives, and exemplified to an admiring world.

Fondly a coworker of his for the Christ,

R. ETZENHOUSER.

[The following letter to Brother and Sister H. A. Stebbins, of Lamoni, Iowa, containing much that will interest the Saints throughout the world.—EDITORS.]

HILO, HAWAII, November 26, 1914.

Dear Brother and Sister Stebbins: This Thanksgiving Day finds us far away from any of the home folks, and just now even from the Saints. There are only three Saints in this place, two Hawaiians, and a Japanese girl, a sister to the Japanese boy at college. The latter, Mrs. Shiota, was here to-day with two of her three babies, and they are dear little ones, while the baby is just like a big Japanese doll. The baby's name is Chio, and the other two are Kota, and Heroshi. The last, a boy, is a darling, about three years old. Neither of them can talk English, although Mrs. Shiota is a normal school graduate and teaches in the Government schools.

I have made an application for a school myself, as we have been in financial straits since coming here. There being no branch of the church here, we must pay rent, and that is high in this place, as also the living generally. But we have been trying to exercise all the faith we could, and will stick to the proposition as long as we can. There is a big branch in Honolulu, on the island of Oahu, but on this island there is none, and only the three Saints I spoke of, who have become more or less disaffected by reason of their long absence from any branch. We would like so much to have the work started on this island, which is the biggest island of the group. We have some of the best people in this little town (the largest town on the island) interested, and are hoping some of them will come into the church, so a branch can soon be organized.

About the first thing we have to do in a new place is to start a Sunday school, and one had been started here by Brethren McConley and Barrett. We have it now in our house. Perhaps Sister Stebbins might like to hear about our Sunday school, as it is a little different from her band of little folks. Brother Davis teaches all the older ones in the dining room, where we have boards laid over dry goods boxes, which we cover with quilts, for seats. The younger ones I take into another room, and they also have dry goods boxes to sit on. I don't know what they would say about little red chairs, such as the little ones at home have. I am certain they would treasure very highly some of the pictures and books that the little ones back there are so abundantly blessed with, and which are not often seen here.

One little fellow was always telling me of a "b-i-g" book he had, Mr. McConley had given him. He wanted to show it to me. One night we were up to his aunty's, where he lives, and, according to her custom, we must have singing, reading from the Bible, and prayer before we went home. We sang two or three pieces from Zion's Praises, when a little brown head peeped up over the bannisters, and little Walter said, "I want to come up and sing." So he dressed and came up, and after prayer, though he was half asleep, he wanted me to see his book. He brought it, his little brown face beaming with pride, and laid it before me. It was an old primary Quarterly, and it was the greatest treasure he possessed. He had had it a long time, and his auntie said he wouldn't allow anyone to touch it, unless they treated it with proper dignity.

As all our little ones come from homes where the gospel is new or unknown, we teach the principles of the gospel as soon as we can, and talk over them a great deal. We have one bright little boy, Jimmie, whose mother is deeply interested in the church. She is one of the most refined and intellectual women I have ever met. Would rank well with our own church workers at home, and is unusual among this people, who are more or less childlike in their nature.

She is unfortunate, however, in being married to a man who is deeply opposed to the church, and to her joining it. When Mrs. Rhinehardt became interested in the church he suddenly became religious, too, was baptized into the "Central Union" church here, and had all his children baptized. Now they attend both Sunday schools.

One Sunday we were talking about being baptized when we were eight years old, and little Jimmie, aged six, after listening for some time with eyes wide open, said in disgust, "Why, they tooked and baptized me, when I was a little kid, just four years old, and didn't know what they was doin'." Last Sunday we were talking of how Jesus was baptized, and went down under the water, and Jimmie said, "Say, Sister Davis, did they do you like that when you were baptized?" I told him yes, and he said, "Well, they didn't me, they just took a cup and sprinkled some water on me." Of course that opened the way to a discussion of which was the right way, and they all decided they would rather be baptized like Jesus was.

One little boy is of a skeptical turn of mind, and asks all sorts of questions, some of which are hard to answer, as the following: "Was the Devil drowned in the flood, and if not, where was he, or was he in the ark with Noah?" And, "If God would not let the lions hurt Daniel, could a person shoot these little baby angels with wings, whose pictures are in Jesus-books?" "Now, if you say your prayers at the table, God no behind you. He can't hear." I told him God could hear everything. But he insisted "God up in the sky, he no can hear, I can't hear my brother when he upstairs." And then, "I hear men call God very loud in the street. He no come." This was evidence conclusive. This little fellow, whose acquaintance with church is very limited, when the other children were telling what churches they belonged to, said proudly, "I belong to the old man's church." I asked him what that church was, and he told me, "Why, that old man, Santa Claus, I go to his church every Christmas." The woman who has this little boy (the Hawaiians have an old custom of giving away their own children to others) is a regular old hag, with her cigarettes and tobacco, and she is probably drunk a good deal of the time as well.

The sea is high to-night. We can hear it roaring all the time; it is only a short way from here. We could see it from our window were it not for a house directly in front of the window, but we can see it plainly from our front lawn. The boats are lying at anchor out there now, because the sea is too high and too rough to allow them to remain at the wharf without being dashed to pieces. This is surely a lovely climate, and the fresh sea breeze adds to its delightfulness.

We have not learned the language here, as so many of the people speak English to us we have little opportunity. You can see, however, that these were once the same people as the South Sea Islanders; many of the words are similar. The South Sea Islanders speak of God as Te Atua, while the Hawaiian word is Ke Akua. The word for root in Hawaiian is aa while the South Sea Island word is aaa. We often are reminded of the Book of Mormon story of Hagoth, who left America in ships, when we see the customs of these people, who have strikingly Hebrew traits. They still point us to ancient cities of refuge; they tell us they used to keep the feast of the Passover; and there are many other Hebrew customs that were observed by these people.

But I do not want to tire you with too long a letter, so I will close. Brother Davis joins with me in sending regards to you both. We think often of you and the Lamoni people.

Yours sincerely,

INEZ SMITH DAVIS.

WABASH, INDIANA, January 11, 1915.

Editors Herald: Is it not a true saying to a certain extent that what is well begun is half done? From what we can observe among the Saints where we have been, we believe there will be a larger Christmas Offering for the year 1914 than the church has ever seen. This only shows what united effort will do.

As we are laying the foundation for another year's campaign along this line, let us try to encourage the children by placing means within their hands whereby they will swell the Christmas Offering for the year 1915.

It will be an easy matter for those living in the country to give their children a small piece of ground and let them plant in it beans, potatoes, popcorn, or to let them set a hen and encourage them to take the best care of the chickens, saving the proceeds for the Christmas Offering. Those who live in town could make cookies, doughnuts, and let the children sell them during their leisure time. We would be surprised at the end of the year at the amount collected, and, more than that, it would plant in the hearts of the children the spirit of sacrifice and the desire to help, the value of which could not be measured.

Now if there is anyone who can not give their children this little amount to start with, if they will let me know I will see that they get it, and no one but yourself shall know of it. I trust we will have a goodly number who are willing to make the trial.

TERRIT, IOWA, January 12, 1915.

Editors Herald: As Saints we should heed the suggestion of Bishop E. L. Kelley, found in the HERALD for January 6. This is one way in which isolated ones in the Home Department may help in the good work. I have sent a dollar given me for a Christmas gift, to Bishop Kelley, wishing to be among the givers.

Brothers and sisters, let us add to the Christmas Offering and show our love for the Lord. Let us help the Swedish, Danish and Norwegian Saints in their mission work in the fatherland. Send the Bishop your gifts and tell him to send to the different countries. They need our help, such as we are able to spare. The Lord will bless all in the effort.

Yours in the gospel,
C. A. CARLSON.

NORTH PLATTE, NEBRASKA, January 12, 1915.

Editors Herald: It is some two years since I wrote requesting prayers for my son and others of the family. We are now residing in Lincoln County, Nebraska, eighteen miles northeast of North Platte. There are only three families of Saints in our neighborhood, and we are often discouraged for the want of church privileges. We were blessed last fall with the privilege of hearing twelve sermons by Brother Etzenhouser in our schoolhouse one mile west of us, called Myrtle Schoolhouse. It did our hearts good to hear such good preaching. We had a good attendance.

My two sons and daughter-in-law became quite interested, one son being the afflicted one of whom I have spoken. We hope that the Lord will again send Brother Etzenhouser or some one else to conduct the work here. We desire an interest in the prayers of the Saints in our own behalf and on behalf of the afflicted ones of our family.

I have two sons living in Tecumseh, Nebraska. They both belong to the church. The elder one is a barber, and owns his own shop. The younger one has been there four years going to high school. He will graduate next spring. They are good, kind men, but have not heard any Latter Day Saint preaching for several years. Our people once held meetings there several years ago.

I was visiting my boys and daughter-in-law a year ago last October. My daughter-in-law's father asked me why the Saints did not come there any more to preach. I told him I could not answer, but had an idea that they thought it was of no use. He said he would like to hear them. He said he was a "Mormon" himself, as they all call us. This Mr. Webb is wealthy and a retired farmer. His home in Tecumseh is close to that of my son. I feel that an elder would be welcome there. I wish a good speaker could go there and wake them up. The elder son's wife is a Baptist.

My younger son there is a lively lad, yet they tell me he still defends the truth and that no one can turn him from our belief. I hope and pray an elder may be able to go to Tecumseh. If anyone goes he may call for Fred Hamm. Anyone should be able to tell where his barber shop is. An elder will feel at home there.

Again asking an interest in the prayers of all, I am,
Your sister,

MARTHA HAMM.

PITTSBURG, KANSAS, January 18, 1915.

Editors Herald: We are anxiously looking for Brother J. A. Davis to return here and hold more meetings. My boys are all at home now, and I want them to hear the gospel preached in all its purity. There are many other good honest souls here who would be glad to have Brother Davis or some other brother come. We have not heard any preaching this winter. The ministers of other churches charge so high for their services that it is impossible to secure them for work at this place. The harvest is truly great and the laborers few.

We think this an ideal place for the preaching of the gospel. We will do the best we can to entertain anyone who may be able to come. There are several Saints in Stevens and Morton counties in an unorganized condition. We hope for the day when we can meet together for worship. If Brother Davis or the missionary in charge sees this letter, we wish them to know that we are waiting as patiently as we can.

In gospel bonds,
Star Route.

MRS. LIZZIE BAGGERLY.

News from Missions

England

[The following from the report of Bishop Roderick May, president of London District, England, to the district conference, is given here as suggestive of conditions of the church work in that territory.—EDITORS.]

I am pleased to report to you at this conference, and thank the Lord that we are alive and permitted to meet without hindrances, considering the conditions that exist nationally. I regret very much to have to report to you that the church in this district as a whole is not advancing as rapidly as I would like to see it, yet there are some features about it that are very encouraging, especially the advantages for missionary work, as you will see later.

ENFIELD BRANCH

The Enfield branch apparently holds its own, they have regular meetings, both preaching and social, with good success; a few outsiders attend occasionally. The officers are coming to a better understanding of their duties in relation to branch work, and also assist in preaching, therefore the prospects for a better future. I visited them as often as I possibly could and attend to other duties.

LONDON BRANCH

The London Branch still holds its organization, but practically without the assistance of officers, except the president. The priest of the branch has gone unto the King's service; a priest is acting as teacher, but is hindered by reason of family illness; there is a deacon in the branch, but he refuses to act in his office, and consequently the branch suffers. . . . There has been a desire among some to disorganize the branch; to this I am not favorable, as it would disorganize the district; and I accordingly advised that the president should hold office until after this conference. There are many delinquent members in this branch who neither attend meetings, nor do they wish to be retained as members of the church. I advised the president of the branch that all such should be kindly visited, then in the case of those who are not disposed to fellowship with us, action should be taken. I understand there are now cases pending and in the hands of an elders' court.

I had been in charge of this branch for over two and one half years when a change took place. It was sought again to place me in charge; this I refused, on the grounds that I had more than enough already on my hands, without proper assistance, and was consequently overworked; therefore I thought it would be better that it be left in the hands of some one of the local elders for the present at least. The London Branch should hold its organization, and if possible be made to grow, and we believe it can, with energy and assistance.

MISSIONARY WORK

Missionary work in this district has not been carried on very extensively during the summer months. I made several attempts, and went back to the same field where we occupied about a year ago, I was well received and had good audiences. The same opposing element that opposed us at the beginning of our missionary work was met with, but this did not trouble us. I was alone; none came to assist, although I announced my intention to the Saints; yet I was well paid for my effort. Referring back to our first years' missionary work in London, we all know that it brought to the Saints of both branches not only a spirit of sacrifice and endurance but a keen interest in the salvation of those who are honest in heart, consequently several were united with the church; but since our last conference six months ago none have been baptized in this district.

The spirit of building up the branches must extend to those outside as well as those within. We are a proselyting church as well as an internal building up, and a gathering one. All must go together or we will never succeed, nor will we ever accomplish that which the Lord intended in us, as outlined in the first section of the Doctrine and Covenants. We were promised missionary help in London last year, and we thought that the General Conference had made provision for us, but somehow we did not get any. We intend to plead, and keep on pleading for missionaries for London, because we can see that London offers one of the best opportunities for missionary work in the British Isles. The missionary field of London has no special seasons, it is the same all the year round; religious societies are found on the streets, public squares, and parks every day and night in the year.

COBORN ROAD

As most of you know, we have moved our residence from this place, and now reside at 58 Ickburgh Road, Upper Clapton, Northeast, where we are more comfortably situated, and located where we can more consistently represent ourselves and the church,—the church being our first object. We are holding a church history class meeting at our residence every Monday night, well attended by the members of both branches, as well as some outsiders. I think you will agree with me that moving to Upper Clapton was one of the most important moves that has come in the interest of the work in London within the last few years. Our intentions are that it should be used as a headquarters for the bishopric work, and a resident home for the development of missionary work in London.

We have given up the hall, and mission house, at Coborn Road. The London Branch has taken the responsibility of the hall and rented it for one year, thus relieving the general church of this expense.

OTHER BRANCHES IN LONDON

For the safety and protection of the organization of the London District it may be wisdom at some time to consider the advisability of establishing another branch in London. I am not particularly in favor of a cluster of small branches in small cities, but in a great city like London, where members are scattered and traveling so great and expensive, it would be better for the members and also for the general interest of the work that other branches to be organized as soon as conditions would justify, and the city should be zoned for branch boundary lines in accordance to the general post office regulations.

DISTRICT OFFICERS

At this conference you will be required to select officers who will serve for the next term, which is one year. I have been in hopes that some one would be among us by this time who could take this part of the work exclusive of any department except missionary work, but as you know we have none at the present. I held to the presidency of this district ever since I have been in the mission and also did other work not particularly belonging to my office, because I was anxious to see the church succeed, and if possible bridge over until some one could come among us that would take it in hand. I hope and pray that the Spirit of the Lord will so guide us that no part of the work intrusted to us may suffer. Brethren, we can not afford a failure of duty, as we must answer to the Lord for our stewardship.

May peace and the blessings of God be with us in this conference, and among all the branches.

December 1, 1914.

RODERICK MAY.

Eastern Maine

This has been the most pleasant year of my life. My work has been at Jonesport and vicinity where I have been quite active and found more to do than three missionaries could attend to. The many who have visited and labored in Jonesport and partaken of the proverbial kindness and hospitality of the Jonesport Saints are in a better position to know what I mean when I say the year's work has been pleasant. A kinder-hearted people are not to be found anywhere than are those at Jonesport.

Our people have a good influence among all classes of the community. We are pleased to find places exemplifying the promises of the Lord in the Doctrine and Covenants, "Ye shall find favor in the eyes of the world." I have been greeted with fine, large audiences. The morning attendance at Jonesport, where I hold forth most every Sunday, is over one hundred, and the evening from two to three hundred, with excellent interest.

We are all interested in completing the upper auditorium of our fine new church, which we expect to have ready for occupancy by spring. The Saints are to be congratulated on securing such a fine, commodious building at such a comparatively low cost. The brethren contributed all the labor, a grand lesson of what can be done when all pull together. The sisters organized themselves into a band of willing workers and have contributed over twelve hundred dollars toward the new church, and are still as willing to work as when they began.

I have a fine Bible class of thirty-five men, all eager to learn, not simply to argue and show how much they know. We have good times, and gladly look forward for the return of the Sabbath morning to be with them. Our Bible class gave a social a few weeks ago and raised seventy-six dollars for finishing the church. Another one is on the program, with the Willing Workers after us in competition. We believe in the competitive system when actuated by such motives.

We also have held meetings at Jonesboro, South Addison, Bears Isle, Head Tide, Mariners Harbor, Cedar Creek, and Indian River. At the latter place three were baptized. The Methodist minister there gave up his regular appointment for me to preach, an unusual thing. A number of the Saints of Jonesport, and singers, attended with automobiles and a good time in general was enjoyed.

At all places I have been kindly received and liberally supported. The Saints along the coast of Maine have not gotten into the habit of asking an elder if he has enough to take him to the next place, but give willingly when they have wherewith to give. We have some good Latter Day Saints at Jonesboro and South Addison, whom we hope to be able to meet with more often in the future. They are worth looking after. At the former place a fine union church is at our disposal most of the time.

We have a nice church building and a large number of Saints at Kennebec, which place I have not yet been able to visit, but at which I expect to hold a series of special services in two weeks.

In September I was sent by the minister in charge to South Rawden, Nova Scotia, to help with the conference. There are a few faithful and devoted Saints there, still holding fast to the rod of iron. Rumors of the happy past when once there was a lively branch there, and many of the old-time elders made frequent visits, are still recalled by the faithful few. At this conference Brother Boyd Johnson, of Amherst, was elected district president. He has the confidence of the Saints, and will do all he can, we are sure, to maintain the work in Nova Scotia.

From this place I went to Stellerton and held a meeting and baptized a Mr. and Mrs. Bignee, who are truly converted to the gospel and promise to make good. In the baptism of these two humble souls I think the oft-repeated statement is verified, namely, We can not tell the good we do at the time we are putting forth the effort. Brethren Daniel Macgregor and John F. Sheehy were holding tent meetings in a little mining town in Nova Scotia, and after one week Brother Macgregor thought they could not do much there, so they "pulled stakes." Sister Bignee attended two meetings, became interested, and went back to her home one hundred miles away and presented the gospel to her husband. They sent to the Herald Publishing House for reading matter, and consequently asked for an elder to come and baptize them. Years may elapse before we are able to see the fruits of our labors, but the earnest effort will in some way, some time, somewhere, bear fruitage. Every earnest effort put forth in the service of God is a success.

The large branch at Jonesport is ably presided over by Brother W. E. Rogers, who has the confidence of the Saints. He has that happy manner of working with the missionary and looking after his needs, which makes our work pleasant. His faithful wife is branch organist, and you can depend upon her to be at her post of duty. Brother Herbert Rogers with his band of sweet singers add much to the success of the services. We can not lay too much stress upon the power of music in the services of God. We have an excellent band of young people growing up with the church from whom we expect to reap a harvest in the near future. While the young are to be noticed in our meed of praise, we would not forget the few stern and faithful older ones, who stood by the work here when the spiritual flame was at a very low ebb, in the day when it required faith and courage to hold aloft the banner of the restored gospel. Among these we might mention Sister E. M. Walker, Brethren Joel Wilson and Leman Woodward, Brother and Sister Lakeman, Sisters Emily Bryant and Lucy Norton. Others of faithful record have passed on to their blessed reward.

Brother Cushman has labored here for several years and is a household word, loved by all who knew him and thereby understood the noble qualities of the brother in the midst of some peculiarities. Brother Cushman was more of a teacher than a preacher; many places would be greatly benefited if we had more men of his type. A preacher's popularity may be a brilliant outburst of sentimentality, dimmed by the settling of the wave, while a teacher's popularity may increase until the wave touches the shores of eternity, and many glad hearts in other years take up the glad refrain.

I am at present making my home with Brother and Sister A. C. Smith. When I say "home," I do so with all that such means to the missionary. No means are spared to make me happy and comfortable, and in turn I try to make myself useful as well as ornamental.

In the midst of the most pleasant surroundings of my missionary life, I received a sad message from my brother Fred, of Wheeling, West Virginia. This was on Monday morning, November 29. I was sitting by a warm, cozy fire, relaxing before a hard day's work. A messenger handed me this word, "Mother died peacefully in the church last night." Immediately I started on the twelve hundred mile dash to the scenes of childhood, where once a younger mother toiled day and night for those whom she loved.

I tried to picture as the train sped on the last time a mother's warm kiss and gentle smile was offered to her missionary boy. The lips once warm with a mother's love for her returning son were now cold and irresponsive. I tried to recall the many sorrows and hardships a mother of fifteen children must have passed through, and to meditate upon such of those trials as I may have contributed to. But earth's sorrows were soon swallowed up in eternal joy when I thought of the glorious reward awaiting those who are ready as she was. The last moments were spent in the church she had loved so well and in which she had reared all her family, from which pulpit her sons and grandsons and sons-in-law have proclaimed the glad message of the gospel.

Mother embraced the gospel under the preaching of W. W. Blair in the sixties, and all her life her home was an abiding place of welcome for the servants of God. Services were held at the church before a large audience, Brother James Craig of Glen Easton, an old friend, offering appropriate and cheering words, followed by G. T. Griffiths, who gave a comforting discourse. At the grave Brother Griffiths suggested that we sing, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," and, inappropriate though it may appear, I never sang a song with more ease than I did that song, for I truly felt to thank and praise God for a Christian mother, whom he had so kindly taken to himself.

There is never a cloud without a silver lining. As a result of mother's demise I was unexpectedly privileged to visit with my family at Kirtland over Christmas, and enjoyed a happy season after an absence of seven months. During my stay we were fortunate in having Brother H. O. Smith to do the preaching here until my return. I was also privileged to visit and see my brother Joseph, of Colorado Springs, whom I had not seen for over five years; being near the same age, we were quite chummy. It seems hard to think it takes death to bring the scattered family together, but this is one of life's tragedies, to be abolished in the life to come.

Soon after Christmas I returned to my field, and am happy at work. In Boston I stopped over night with Brother and Sister Greene and enjoyed a pleasant visit. Brother Greene had just returned from the Holy Land. Truly the world is in commotion, and we almost hold our breath and ask, "What next?" Pestilences, wars, earthquakes, men's hearts failing them for fear—but to the true Saint of God all has a hopeful meaning. In the midst of a darkened world the shining way seems brighter. If I ever had a strong desire to urge an uncompromising warfare against sin and evil, it is now.

With love and good cheer to all the brethren in the conflict, I am, as ever,
Your coworker,
JONESPORT, MAINE. F. J. EBELING.

News from Branches

Independence, Missouri, Second Branch

I have been associated with this branch from its beginning. In 1909 a series of tent meetings were held in the south part of the city, which culminated in the erection of a church building at the corner of South Delaware and West Short Avenue, nearly one mile southeast of the Stone Church.

In the month of March, 1910, a Sunday school was organized, with fifty-five charter members, also a Religio local with twenty-eight members. The basement now being ready for use, regular preaching services were conducted under the direction of the stake presidency, until June 12, when a branch was organized, with eighty-eight charter members. Our present pastor, Elder H. W. Gould, was elected presiding elder. This branch was the second to be organized within the city limits of Independence. By September 15, 1911, the building was completed and the branch out of debt. The dedication took place on the 24th of the same month.

A great change has been made in this community. Many have been added to the branch by baptism and letter of removal, so it exceeds three hundred and twenty-five members. Recently we have been favored with a series of sermons by Elder J. F. Curtis. The meetings were concluded on January 10. During the sixteen sermons large crowds attended and much interest was manifested, while the speaker handled many subjects in a forceful way. A few have been baptized and others are investigating.

The Religio, Sunday school, and Sunshine Band are doing a good work in this locality. As the result of a righteous war that was waged in Independence last summer, our city is now dry. The saloons have vanished, we hope never more to return to this chosen spot. The public square has taken on a more pleasing aspect already for a clean town over which we are enthusiastic.

Your brother in the truth,
GEO. W. TOUSLEY.

817 South Delaware, January 18, 1915.

Rock Island, Illinois

We have a small branch here, but thanks to our heavenly Father we enjoy spiritual blessings in abundance. On January 21, 1914, we met at the home of Brother William Willets, Rock Island, Illinois, with Elder J. F. Curtis and organized the Rock Island Branch, with, I think, twenty-two members. Elder Willets was chosen president, I. N. Barnes priest. Shortly after the organization the Master saw fit to complete the same by calling Thomas Willets to the office of teacher and W. P. Barnett to the office of deacon.

We met in Brother Willet's home each Sunday for Sunday school and preaching for the first half of the year, then rented the Army Hall, Third Avenue and Sixteenth Street, where we still hold forth, with weekly prayer meetings at private houses. While we have not grown in numbers, we have been greatly blessed at almost every service. The Master has made his presence known by the influence of his Holy Spirit, and on several occasions has spoken to us, recognizing our efforts. We feel encouraged under the leadership of Brother Willets, who is truly a faithful and tireless worker.

As a small band of God's people, we ask the prayers of his Saints everywhere, that we may be faithful and humble and live acceptably before him, that he may give us courage to carry his work on in this place.

On January 21, 1915, we met at the home of Brother Thomas Willets to celebrate our first anniversary, most of the members and their families being present. The forepart of the evening was spent in a social way, after which Brother Willets, by request, made an appropriate address, speaking words of encouragement. At our parting, each showed a strong determination to press forward in love and obedience to the Master's will. All seemed to realize the duty owed to our heavenly Father.

A cordial invitation is extended to all Saints and traveling elders to meet with us at the above address, 3 p. m. each Sunday.

Praying for the welfare of God's work among men, I remain,

Your brother in Christ,
W. P. BARNETT.

SEARS, ILLINOIS, January 22, 1915.

I stood, one evening, by the blacksmith's door,
And heard the anvil ring the vesper chime;
Then, looking in, I saw upon the floor
Old hammers worn with beating years of time.
And so, I thought, the anvil of God's word
For ages skeptic blows have beat upon,
And, though the sound of clanging blows is heard,
The anvil is unharmed, the hammers gone.—Anon.

The fields are all ripening, and far and wide
The world now is waiting the harvest tide;
But reapers are few, and the work is great,
And much will be lost should the harvest wait.

Conference Minutes

LONDON.—Convened at Enfield, December 6, 1914. Bishop May presided, assisted by J. A. Judd. Formal reports received. Communication was received from Elder W. H. Greenwood, mission president, to the effect that although his health had improved he did not think it wise to leave home and journey to London to participate in the conference, which he regretted. The conditions under which the Saints would meet were, without doubt, very difficult, by reason of the nation's conflict in the terrible war, but it was their duty to make an effort to bind the ties of Christian brotherhood closer and firmer. The work is not a one-man work—no one man can do it all—it requires a working together in confidence, each one discharging his respective duties before God and every other Saint to the extent of his ability. At the same time, however, there must be the head of the body, to supervise, counsel, arrange, and suggest ways and means by which the desire of the body should be accomplished. It was, therefore, essential that the executive (branch officers) should meet together often for the purpose of considering the various conditions as they occurred. After enumerating the duties of the various branch officers, Elder Greenwood went on to state that he should be pleased to learn of the reelection of Bishop May as the London district president, as this would be the wisest course to adopt under existing conditions. The writer hoped to pay a visit in the early spring, and so be in a position to report conditions to the General Conference. He hoped to be present at General Conference, and to be able to secure at least two missionaries for London for 1915. Officers sustained: Bishop R. May, president; J. A. Judd, vice president and treasurer; Dover E. Judd, secretary; _____ recorder. At eleven o'clock Sunday, Brother May presided, assisted by J. A. Judd. Short addresses were given by the following: J. A. Judd, J. W. Worth, Dover E. Judd, S. Dennis, Bishop R. May. At 6.30 preaching by Brother May. Dover E. Judd, secretary, 22 Canonbury Road, Enfield, Middlesex, England.

The Bishopric

AGENT'S NOTICE

The work in this district tends to move upward, The Spiritual condition of the Saints is improving in a number of places. The past year has been one of opportunities; the gospel message has been received with interest where preaching has been done, and many are asking for the missionaries and desire to have meetings held.

Here is a sample of word, just received. "Dear Brother: Inclosed find $25 tithing. I am hungry for spiritual food. The Savior said if you love me feed my sheep; there are but few of his sheep here, but they should not be left to starve!" This letter came from one of the faithful ones who has not seen an elder in many months. I sent a receipt and a little good news, but could not supply a preacher. This is only one of the many isolated ones who need food.

Our numbers are increasing in many parts of the district, and we must make advancement along financial lines to meet the demands; this we did not do the past year. We have been working on a plan to better conditions, and for the convenience of members, subagents, or collectors have been selected in a number of places. These helpers will receive and receipt for tithing and offerings the same as the bishop's agent, in his absence. This will we hope, gather in much that is laid up for a time awaiting for additions, and many times is used for something else, thus allowing procrastination to cheat the good intention, the Lord's portion being spent and the work we think so much of being left to suffer. This plan will not in any way prevent those who wish to send direct to me and find it more convenient to do so. The Presiding Bishop indorses this plan, and a resolution favoring it passed district conference December 12. It is hoped by better organization to accomplish more this year so we will not have to call on the general church for help. We take pleasure in commending those selected to the Saints and friends of the Spokane District, hoping for the cooperation of each one interested in the work of the Lord.

Every member of the household of faith should take pleasure and interest in helping the financial work along. To this end may the Lord bless each of the helpers in their efforts.

Appointments are as follows: Oliver Turnbull, Sagle Branch; Laura A. Miller, Gifford Branch; J. H. VanEaton, Leahy Branch; D. A. McDole, Okanogan and vicinity; J. E. Turnbow, Palouse, Washington; J. Oscar Hower, Coeur d'Alene and vicinity.

Yours in bonds,

W. W. FORDHAM, Bishop's Agent.

SPOKANE, WASHINGTON, South 238 Haven Street.

That the light reflected from it shall so lighten those that sit in darkness, that those without may see, and desire to enter in. Let us remember that Zion is the pure in heart, and Zion shall become the city of the pure, and thus work to that end.

Lesson, Matthew 5: 13-16. Memory verse, Psalm 93: 5.

Of six children, four survive her. Baptized August 18, 1912, by Jesse Simmons. She died firm in the faith. Her home was open to the missionaries, and her greatest ambition was to assist the needy. Her life was an exponent of pure womanhood. Devoted to her family, unselfish and useful, she was universally loved. Business men of the town closed their institutions to attend her funeral, conducted by E. A. Erwin.

SALISBURY.—Margaret A. Salisbury, daughter of Jacob Swisher, was born in Galia County, Ohio, April 23, 1845; died after a brief illness at Burnside, Illinois, December 9, 1915. She married Solomon J. Salisbury, September 1, 1865. To

NEELEY'S PARLIAMENTARY PRACTICE.—Bishop Thomas B. Neeley. The Methodist Book Concern, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York, 50 cents. As the name indicates, this is a book on parliamentary practice, containing rules "covering all legal and organized bodies. The author from personal experiences understands the technical methods for such assemblies and the underlying principles as well. The book is put out for the use of all parliamentarians, from the congressman down to the member of the most modest literary society."

THE BRITISH EMPIRE AND THE UNITED STATES.—By William Archibald Dunning. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, $2. This volume is issued in celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the Treaty of Ghent, and commemorates the close of one hundred years of peace between the British Empire and the United States. The introduction is by the Right Honorable Viscount Bryce, and the preface by Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University. In the preface Mr. Butler says: "Friendship, close intercourse, and peace between the English-speaking peoples involve no antagonism to the interests or influence of other nations. On the contrary, they are but the beginning of a new world order, when neither differences of speech, nor of race, nor of creed shall longer be permitted to sow dissension among civilized men, or to arouse human passion to an extent where human reason can not control it and direct it toward the goal of justice, of human sympathy, and of a peace which is lasting because it rests upon a secure economic and ethical foundation."

LOST IN THE FUR COUNTRY.—D. Lange, author of On the Trail of the Sioux, Lothrop, Lee and Shepard Company, Boston. Postpaid, $1.10. "Mr. Lange, now superintendent of schools in Saint Paul, Minnesota, is an expert in the very difficult art of interesting boys profitably, and has proved it to a wide circle by his previous books. Lost in the Fur Country, his new book, is, like the others, an 'Indian story'—he knows what the boys want. Those who are lost are twins, a boy and a girl, and in following the fortunes of the boy from the abduction of the children from their home in Kentucky by Indians at the age of eleven until their reunion at twenty-one, a vivid and accurate picture of real Indian life is given. The human side of this unique people is wonderfully brought out, and a genuine 'Robinson Crusoe' interest attaches to the lonely adventures of the boy in the great forests of the Hudson Bay region while seeking his lost sister, who was sold into another tribe."

THE YOUNG SHARP SHOOTERS AT ANTIETAM.—Everett T. Tomlinson. Houghton, Mifflin and Company, New York. Price $1.35, net. This is in the class of historical novels. It is not written to stir up any lingering ill feeling between the North and South, but with a desire to give a correct picture of a certain phase of the great Civil War. Of this phase the author says in his preface: "The appreciation of the importance of Lee's first attempt to invade the North is necessary if one is to understand the struggle which followed. The dash, spirit, and skill of the great southern

Reaching the public with our announcements is certainly a problem.

Special preaching services or evangelistic efforts may avail but little if the people are not informed about them. To inform and at the same time create a desire to attend should be the object of our advertising. Sensational methods should be avoided, but effectiveness ever sought for.

Each effort in this line should have individual treatment, based on local conditions, but there are certain underlying principles that will apply to all forms of public announcements.

In an effort to aid you and others in solving these publicity problems, we suggest:

When you successfully reach the people in a certain community with your advertising, send us an outline of your plan, the cost, and such samples as you can spare. These will be filed and ready for others on request.

Should you fail in your efforts, tell us your opinion of the causes. Your experiences may save others from failure along the same lines. Your name will not be used in this connection if you desire it withheld. We would appreciate samples of what you used, with cost.

If you need advice on your advertising problems, we will go over these samples and information and glean practical suggestions and submit samples, with estimates of cost if you desire. You may have it printed at the Herald Office or elsewhere; we'll try to help you just the same in either case.

This service is free; we desire to extend its scope until there is a broad, cooperative movement toward successful publicity. We have a gospel of service to others. There is so much competition that we must use all available means to make the message of the church effective. Previous announcements in this publication, entitled, "Service," are bringing responses.

Your help to make this movement a success is solicited. Address, leader, as well as the energy and the daring of his lieutenants, are seen to-day more clearly than in the times when his effort was made. What the consequence would have been if General Lee had succeeded, all can appreciate. The battle of Antietam was almost a pivot of the Great Civil War. That my young readers may gain a more complete knowledge of the daring advance of the great southern general, and the result which followed when his army was turned back into Virginia, I have written this story. My hope is that it will lead to a careful study of the conflict, and that boys, North and South alike, may be led into an increased knowledge of and interest in our common country."

E. D. MOORE, Lamoni, Iowa.

FREMONT AND '49.—Frederick S. Dellenbaugh, author of "The Canyon Voyage." G. P. Putnam's Sons. $4.50. This volume is a splendidly gotten up and valuable work. It contains numerous maps and fifty illustrations. Concerning the work of Fremont, the great pathfinder, we quote the following from the preface: "All we can get out of life is life. Fremont got a tremendous lot of it. His wallet was empty when he died and most of the time while he lived, but he wrote his name indelibly across half a continent, and he will be remembered when most of those who have spoken against him, and all they have said, will be but grains of sand in the interminable desert of the forgotten. The story of his life, one of the most interesting of our time, is told in the following pages with as much detail as was possible in a single volume. It has been prepared with deliberation, with attention to facts, and with a desire to avoid prejudice. When the last word has been said against Fremont, condemnation, ridicule, prejudice, and all, he remains among the most virile and picturesque characters in the history of the United States; a character complete in itself; quiet, polite, seldom explaining and as seldom complaining. He took the storms as they came, with dignity, with patience, and with a kind of dumb resolution that commands admiration."

MY IDEAS AND IDEALS.—John W. Luce and Company, Boston. 50 cents. The object of this work is to set forth the ideas and ideals of Kaiser Wilhelm II—what the Kaiser actually thinks of himself, his people, his friends, and his enemies. The book is composed of extracts of the writings and speeches of Kaiser Wilhelm, setting forth his views regarding politics, religion, war and the destiny of the German people. The publishers says: "For more than twenty-five years Wilhelm II has been the Emperor of the German people. Problems of endless variety have presented themselves to his consideration, and in no case is he accused of hesitation in expressing his views freely and vigorously. No man in public life has provided an equally complete record of personal opinion covering so wide a range of subjects, educational, political, social, theological, historical, artistic, on which may be based an intelligent estimate of his character and tendencies. Let him speak to you as he does in these pages, in his own words, and from them evolve your own conclusions as to the personality and attainments of the central figure in the world's history of to-day."

CHANGE OF POLICY

Owing to the large increase in the work in the subscription department of the Herald Publishing House it has become necessary to make a change in policy.

Heretofore we have continued the subscription of our publications for one year after the date when the subscription expired, but hereafter the subscription to all publications will be discontinued when they expire.

The change is made for the good of the church of which you are a member and we feel satisfied that all will make the necessary effort and cheerfully comply with the new rule. A little effort on the part of each one will produce splendid results to the body—the church of Christ.

We solicit your cooperation and support.

EPISTLE FROM FREDERICK M. SMITH

To the Church: Of the official actions following and contingent upon the decease of our late President, the Saints have been quite fully informed by the published proceedings of the joint council. By noteworthy unanimity of action, agreement was reached as to the oversight of the work of the church till the assembling of the next General Conference, that task being left to the remaining members of the First Presidency. Under the conditions existing, those members of the Presidency in assuming the responsibility deemed it unwise to attempt any marked changes in the arrangements fixed by the last General Conference, and have so notified the various members of the Quorum of Twelve, only making such readjustments of the working forces as the usual mutations have made necessary. Routine work only will be attempted till the meeting of the conference, when the question of more permanent readjustment will be for the conference to solve.

With the work of the Presidency thus for a time more closely reduced to routine, and its care having been arranged for previously, the undersigned decided to return to Worcester and resume his work at Clark University, which he believes to be part of his work of preparation. It was with his church work in mind that he came here for this year's work, and we see no reasons for changing plans now. Whether the plan has been wisely or unwisely chosen time will perhaps demonstrate.

The Editor of the HERALD some issues ago at least partially promised his readers to give them a reproduction of the message delivered to me by my lamented father when I reached his bedside after an anxious forty-hour ride in response to a telegraphic call to hurry to him. To this is appended the message, which we send to enable the Editor to redeem his promise.

My vision of the work of the church grows brighter, broader; and even before the passing of our late venerable President I felt my period of preparation was drawing to a close. Reluctantly, I assumed the responsibility of a counselor, and it is with trembling that I see the near advent of the time when the church may expect me to take upon shoulders already heavily loaded a greater weight of responsibility. Duty has been a relentless taskmaster,—may God help me!

I can not but express my deep appreciation of and the encouragement received from the many messages of confidence accompanying the kindly expressions of sympathy. To one keenly feeling a load of responsibility these assurances of fraternal support are comforting.

With deep interest in the welfare of the church, I subscribe myself,

Your servant,

FREDERICK M. SMITH.

STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT JOSEPH SMITH TO HIS SON FREDERICK M. SMITH, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1914

Frederick M. Smith arrives:

JOSEPH SMITH. God bless you, my boy, I am so glad you reached me before I pass over. Oh, may the Lord strengthen you for the duties, the arduous labor, and make it light for your shoulders, as it has been for mine. I am not loath to go. I am not afraid. I have shown no fear. I have asked them not to hold on to me. I have lived in distress long enough, I think, to be left free. Oh, dear, may you never have to bear what I have done in the way of sickness and human frailty. I can not breathe fully and freely. What a strong and able hand you have. You are the man for the occasion. The Lord has ordained it so. Oh, some one to take hold whose hands will not slip on the rein! nor tremble in the emergency!

F. M. SMITH. My strength wouldn't amount to much, father, if I didn't realize there were many, many good men along with me.

JOSEPH SMITH. I know. That's our strength, with the Spirit of God. I never forget we are workmen together. . . . Fred, a great opportunity lies before you. Better in some respects than lay before me, for, as I look back over the history and the revelations that have been given to the church, and are on record since I have been presiding, they show me very clearly that a great many things which had been left open to misunderstanding have been cleared up in the revelations and in the letter of instruction. I regard that letter of instruction as one of the most important documents that has ever been presented to the church. I have scanned the revelations and have treated of them to some extent in a chapter by themselves. Israel understands them, and to me it is wondrous the work that has been done, literally wondrous, and you will come into the church, if they choose to trust you, with a more complete understanding. I had it all to learn. Fortunately, I was in favor of the Divine One and received instructions, and you will be, my boy, you will be. That small Spirit that filleth the breast and giveth warmth and color and brightness and intelligence will open before you subjects that are necessary for you to decide upon, and leave no dubiety nor things open to controversy. Be steadfast, and if people are heady, if the church is heady, the eldership are heady and take the reins in their hands as they have done a little, especially on the rules and regulations, rules of representation, don't worry, don't worry, let it pass, let the church take the consequences, and they will after a while grow out of it. You understand me?

F. M. SMITH. Yes.

JOSEPH SMITH. It's better that way than to undertake to force them and coerce. That would bring bad trouble.

A SACRED CHARGE

NUMBER I.—TO THE MINISTRY

Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood.—Acts 20: 28.

In the language of the Apostle Paul to the elders at Ephesus, we catch something of the significance of the calling which places men as shepherds before the flock of God, the church. In the expressive symbolism of his time, Paul graphically sets forth the sacredness of this calling and the importance of fidelity thereto. He presents the flock with its needs, the divine calling of the shepherd, and an estimate of the value of the Saints of God. His interpretation, sublime yet simple, is at once inspirational and persuasive.

CALLED OF GOD

It is God who calls men to the work, even as declared by the gifts and powers of the Holy Ghost, his medium of expression to the church. And each shepherd does well to remember from whence his call comes—not from his brethren, nor yet from the church, but from the God of heaven and earth, from the great I Am, the one who has given the capacity to serve, and hence the only one who with unerring judgment can call to service.

The church bestows priesthood and authority only as it becomes the medium of the Almighty. The individual serves God by serving the church. His calling is not alone to the end that the members of the body to whom he ministers may be served; for, in a broader sense, through his service to his fellows, he serves God, that the great cause of righteousness may finally triumph. In the last analysis, then, it is not the church militant, but the church triumphant, the divine purpose, the Father of all, that is served in faithful devotion to ministerial duty.

Hence it is that the shepherd is unconditionally charged to "feed the flock of God." In this flock there may be those who are wayward, or breeders of dissension and rebellion; there may be those who unwisely give place to "grievous wolves," yet the shepherd is charged to stand fast. It is God who has called; and the hour of greatest peril is the hour of greatest need. The shepherd can not retire when the sheep become discontented, or divided, or unruly. In their waywardness he has no justification for withdrawal, but the more reason for standing firm. He serves God, not the flock only. If he is honorably released, it must be when the flock refuses longer to sustain him, and for which act they must stand responsible; or when he is released by the Great Shepherd who called him to the work.

TO FEED THE FLOCK

The shepherd is to watch over and feed the flock. He is not only to see that the flock is fed upon that spiritual food which will strengthen and develop, he is also to be watchful that they partake not of that which is unwholesome, and which may bring weakness and disease. He must be both able to feed and to guard and warn against improper pasturage.

It is for this reason that Paul charges the shepherd to first take heed unto himself, in the language, "Take heed unto yourselves, and unto the flock." If he is to feed the flock he must have himself gathered that which is to give growth and development; he must have studied, and meditated, and prayed, and lived godly, so that knowledge, and wisdom, and spiritual power are his to set before both the sheep and the lambs, and his with which to warn those who would feed elsewhere. Once he has attended to his own needs, the shepherd is qualified to attend to the needs of the sheep. In this way he takes heed both unto himself and unto the flock.

As a standing minister, and the term is used to include every minister whose duty is pastoral, be he elder, priest, teacher or deacon, while the principle may apply to all the ministry, of whatever department, the shepherd is to encourage the Saints to perform every spiritual duty, including duties in private life, in the family, in the branch and the church. These duties are to be found along the way leading from the allurements of the world. The shepherd himself stands, therefore, in holy places by which the flock is to be directed. He stands in the straight and narrow way, to encourage the strong; to help over stony places the weak; to send out a warning cry to the wayward. At no time is he found in the seat of the scornful, or in the broad way of the world, lest the sheep and the lambs mistake the same for the way of peace. Always is he over in the way toward God, reaching out in his tender care that he may place each trembling hand in the warm, unfaltering hand of the great Father, who above all is able to minister food divine.

THE PRICE OF PURCHASE

At a great price has the flock been purchased. It was none other than God himself who gave his only begotten; and it was Christ, the only Son, who came and who traveled all the weary way alone that there might be opened up a passage way before the sheep. At such a price has the church of Christ been purchased, even "with his own blood"!

The church must be very dear to the heart of God. The church is the most effectual point of contact between God and the world. It is through the efficacy of the church of to-day that God designs to save the world of this generation. It is through this church that he proposes to consummate upon the earth the work of preparation against the day of his Son's return and the end of time. Hence it is that God has given so much that the church might be; and having given so much, the church is dear to him.

Having before him, then, the worth of the church as estimated by the Father, no price is too great that the shepherd may pay in his calling to feed and nurture this flock of God. At any cost to himself, his labor is worth while. To keep inviolate the charge imposed upon him should be his constant and single purpose. As one of God's, whom he, himself, has chosen, his efforts, supplemented by the ministrations of the good Spirit, shall make for the final success of the divine plan; and in that consummation he shall have part and place. Let him, therefore, "having done all" stand firm, "praying always . . . in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance and supplication for all Saints."

JOHN F. GARVER.

THE PASSING OF ELDER O. B. THOMAS

With regret we chronicle the death of Elder Orlin B. Thomas, which occurred in his mission field, at Stockville, Nebraska, Sunday, January 31, 1915.

Brother Thomas was a member of the First Quorum of Seventy, one of the minute men of the church, pledged to go when and where needed, one of those whose lives are a silent chorus to the song, "I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord."

He was one of those who give themselves a living sacrifice daily, leaving home, wife, children, laboring in hard and obscure places, diligent, unostentatious, unassuming, unafraid.

It was his wish to continue in the field, despite advancing age, and die in the harness. The wish was granted.

He preached at the forenoon service the day of his death, and in the afternoon was engaged in song service with the young people just a few moments before his death, which occurred in the privacy of his room, suddenly, apparently from heart failure.

Brother O. B. Thomas was born at Streetsboro, Ohio, August 26, 1838. He was married to Carrie A. Church, author of our well-known hymn, "In the light." After her death he was united in marriage with Mary E. Moffet, who is still living. Seven children, now grown to manhood and womanhood, survive him. He was baptized by Elder E. C. Briggs, February 17, 1867. He was ordained a priest in 1868; to the office of elder, April 13, 1875, under the hands of President Joseph Smith and two of the elders; to the office of seventy, June 18, 1888, by Joseph R. Lambert and Duncan Campbell.

The funeral service was held in the church at Lamon, Iowa, February 5, the sermon being delivered by Elder M. M. Turpen.

Thus another of the "Old Guard," who fought in the ranks with President Joseph Smith, has passed to an honorable and well-earned reward.

CURRENT EVENTS

SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

STRIKERS ARRESTED.—Nine coal miners were arrested at Walsenburg, Colorado, on the 1st, charged with murder in connection with disturbances during the recent strike in Colorado.

IMMIGRATION BILL FAILS.—By a vote of two hundred and sixty-one to one hundred and thirty-six, lacking by five the required two thirds majority, the Immigration Bill on the 4th failed of passage in the House over the veto of President Wilson.

PARLIAMENT REASSEMBLES.—The English Parliament has reassembled after a recess for the Commons since November 27 and for the Lords since January 8. About two hundred House of Commons members are absent and at the battle front. Responding to the plea of Premier Asquith, the Commons on the 3d voted to confine the work of the session to Government war measures.

WOMAN LIABLE.—By decision of the United States Supreme Court on the 1st, Associate Justices Lamar and Day dissenting, a woman consenting with her male companion to violation of the Mann white slave act may be indicted and convicted the same as a man, and be made liable to similar penalties. Action was had on appeal from the Wisconsin Federal Court. It is thought that this decision will lessen the likelihood of transportation for immoral purposes, as well as of blackmail by designing women.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—Report that Villa was shot and wounded by one of his own bodyguard is by him denied. He states that he is preparing for an attack upon Tampico and Vera Cruz. Disorder is reported at Mexico City. Jesus Carranza, brother of the leader, is reported executed by order of General Santibanez because of the refusal of the Constitutionalist leader to pardon the latter, who had gone over to Zapata. The Carranza forces in command of San Luis Potosi have been driven from the city by a Villa column.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.—The Dacia, transferred from German to American registry, sailed from Galveston, January 31, with cotton for Germany. She is liable to seizure by England on the grounds of illegal transfer. Great Britain is said to have informed the Washington administration that the purchase of German and Austrian ships, under the pending Government ownership bill, would be considered unneutral. The defection of nine Democrats on the 1st, turned administrative advantage in connection with this bill into a defensive position, under a motion to recommit the bill without instructions, which would pigeonhole it for this session.

EUROPEAN WAR.—The conflict for possession of the Carpathian passes has been renewed with vigor, with the German and Austrian armies in the aggressive, the Russians holding and gaining. Russia continues her offensive in eastern Prussia, and reports gains. Repeated German attack on the Russian center in Poland, to check the advance of the two extremes of the extended Russian line, has failed with heavy losses, and the Russians seem to have made important gains before Warsaw. Russian soil is reported free from Turks, with continued Russian victory across the border. The deadlock continues in the western theater, with sharp fighting, especially at Soissons, slight gains being reported by both lines at various points. Report from London via Copenhagen is that the Anglo-French fleet has destroyed four Dardanelles forts. A Russian submarine sunk a German torpedo boat off Cape Moen, Denmark, January 29. The Japanese cruiser Asama was wrecked off the western coast of Lower California the 4th. Germany has declared the waters about Great Britain and Ireland, including the English Channel, a war zone. Enemy merchant ships found in this zone by German vessels will be destroyed, and Germany declares neutral ships in danger, because of alleged misuse of neutral flags under orders from Great Britain, and because of the hazard of naval warfare. German submarines have become continuously active in British waters, and have sunk three British merchant vessels in the Irish Sea, and two in the English Channel, as a consequence of which foodstuffs in England are advancing in price. Italian troops were on January 21 required to quell a riot in Rome, when a mob attacked a band of neutralists, in session for the forwarding of Italian neutrality. Italian representatives in England have been warned to be in readiness for a call to the colors. Report from Berlin is that the German Government has reduced the allowance of flour to restaurants by one fourth; limited the daily consumption per capita; ordered uniform loaves of no more than fifty per cent of flour or rye meal, together with other restrictions. Announcement of confiscatory orders by Germany is followed by declaration by England that all foodstuffs bound for Germany, Austria and Turkey will be considered as contraband, despite assurances by Germany that shipments consigned to private institutions will not be used for war purposes.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

"HERALDS" WANTED.—In the miscellany department of this issue of the HERALD will be found a notice headed, "Heralds wanted." As stated, these are desired to complete the file of HERALDS in the editorial library. At the time of the fire, in 1907, the library was completely destroyed, and to date we have not been able to complete our file of HERALDS. Anyone who can assist in this will be rendering a useful service to the HERALD and the church.

CONFERENCE DAILY.—In the advertising department of this issue of the HERALD will be found an announcement by the Herald Publishing House manager stating that a daily HERALD will be put out by this establishment during the coming General Conventions and Conference. This conference, for reasons obvious to all, will be of unusual importance, and the Saints are to be given opportunity to keep in touch with its work and developments. The daily will be edited by the HERALD Editors, and an effort will be made to give the conference news as best we can, under the multitudinous diversions of the General Conference season and spirit.

HEARD ON TEMPERANCE.—One never knows when a sermon is preached how far it may travel, or to what good ends it may be made to serve. On November 9, 1914, under the auspices of the Lincoln-Lee League, Elder Elbert A. Smith preached in the Saints' church, Lamoni, Iowa, on temperance. A synopsis of this discourse was published in the editorial department of the HERALD, November 18. A report of the superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of Hawaii, sent us by Elder G. J. Waller, states that this synopsis, with other articles, was sent out by the league to the various newspapers through the territory of Hawaii and was published.

REPLY TO "MODERN MISBELIEFS"

Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever.
—Hebrews 13: 8.

In a sermon delivered before the Young Men's Christian Association, of Scranton, Pennsylvania, Sunday afternoon, November 29, 1914, Reverend George Wood Anderson, D. D., of the Methodist Episcopal Church, assailed "Mormonism," Christian Science, and Russellism. The attack, which is characterized by a woeful lack of analysis, a reckless assembling of premises, and a malevolent setting of the stage in order to produce the effect desired by the author, is now published under copyright in a booklet entitled, Modern Misbeliefs.

In mixing the attack upon "Mormonism" with the attack upon Christian Science and the teachings of Mr. Russell, much that is said of a disparaging character against the latter orders of belief is made by the association to apply against the Latter Day Saints. This is unfortunate, but our true status will appear as we represent ourselves.

The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, as the legal and lawful successor of the church founded under the instrumentality of Joseph Smith, wishes to briefly answer the calumny against "Mormonism" in so far as Joseph Smith and the work introduced through him to the world are involved. We leave the defense of Christian Science, the teachings of Mr. C. T. Russell, and the evil doctrines and practices of the polygamous church of Utah, founded by Brigham Young, to their respective representatives. We are not responsible for the evil doings of the institution founded by Brigham Young and his coadjutors; as the Methodist Episcopal Church is not responsible for the doctrines and deeds of men who have departed from its faith.

SCHOLARSHIP AND INSPIRATION

The public should require priests to prove their slanderous charges against their countrymen, as law courts require proof before a charge of slander is substantiated. If the Reverend Anderson has confidence in his charges against Joseph Smith he should take the time to give his proof; this matter of indulging in wholesale slander is a serious business.

Joseph Smith is not deified by Latter Day Saints, but is regarded by them as a human instrument in the hands of God in ushering in the latter-day dispensation of the gospel. The work accomplished is called by our assailant a "brand-new religion." The reverend gentleman is so far removed in faith from the church founded by Jesus Christ that when the truth unchanged is preached to-day he regards it as a "brand-new religion"—one may be very religious and yet not know much about Christianity.

On page seven of the booklet it is asserted:

Now if you will look carefully over the pages of history you will see that when the world was languishing for a new interpretation of the truth God has always chosen scholars to reveal that truth.

We do not claim for Joseph Smith a collegiate education; he was not so highly favored when he began his career, but he had faith in God and obeyed his commands, and before his life was taken (in 1844) had made remarkable progress in the acquiring of scholastic attainments.

But it is not true that "scholars" have always been chosen "when the world was languishing for a new interpretation of the truth." In giving an authoritative representation of the truth fresh from the throne of glory, Christ made no special appeal to scholars. He chose men who had faith in God, were loyal to the truth, and possessed the courage of their convictions; men who would give their all for what they had espoused. With such characters God can work. He does not despise scholarship, but qualifies whom he calls. Amos declares through whom God works when the world is languishing for a new interpretation of the truth: "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets." (Amos 3: 7.)

Paul writes:

But God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty; and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to naught things that are: That no flesh should glory in his presence. (1 Corinthians 1: 27-29.)

It is singular that Reverend Anderson, as a representative of Methodism, emphasizes scholarship, and ignores the prophetic office without which God has never wrought in giving a "new interpretation of the truth."

On page eight this doctor of divinity asks the question:

Who was it that changed the history of England, saving it from the horrors of a French Revolution and enabling it to hold supremacy over all the world? John Wesley, the scholar.

It is doubtful if England's supremacy over all the world can be traced to the founder of Methodism. Did John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, restore the ancient order of the church? No. Then what religious ground is gained by the pastor of the Elm Park church in the mere claim of scholarship for John Wesley?

In warning the world against "false prophets" Reverend Anderson performs a valuable service. But, mark it, there is no one in the Methodist Church he can refer to as a true prophet—he believes in living false prophets, but not in living true prophets! Dead prophets are canonized, living ones are cannonaded! He believes the Devil speaks to-day, but the God of Methodism has gone off on an excursion. Strange position for a professed servant of Christ!

Further, it is declared:

When God wanted some one to organize his followers into a great church and formulate the teachings of Jesus Christ into epistles that must live through the centuries, he chose Paul, the scholar, the graduate of the greatest law school of his day. (Page 8.)

Were not Peter, and John, and James employed to formulate epistles that must live through the centuries? But what the illustrious Apostle Paul writes is not adopted by the learned divine who attacks our faith. Paul in setting forth the organization and faith of the church, says:

And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues. (1 Corinthians 12: 28.)

Reverend Anderson, though eulogizing the scholarship of Paul, and lauding the living character of his epistles, has in the Methodist Episcopal Church neither apostles or prophets, nor miracles, gifts of healing nor diversities of tongues. Now, why indulge in verbal praise of the scholarship of the Apostle Paul, and reject what is provided for in his epistles? If dead apostles and dead prophets of the New Testament church meet the needs of the Methodist Episcopal Church to-day, why is there not also reliance placed upon the dead elders, dead bishops, and dead pastors of the New Testament church? Why believe in living elders and living bishops, and in dead prophets and dead apostles? Then, too, the Methodist Episcopal Church has uninspired elders and uninspired bishops, etc.; no mention is made in the Scriptures of uninspired officers of any grade in the church. The scholarship of the Methodist Episcopal Church does not seem to be able to see what kind of a church Christ organized. Besides scholarship, some attention should be given to the necessity of divine light in the form of inspiration from God.

CHARGES FALSE AND CALUMNIOUS

On page 9 it is announced that true workmen of God "accept the Bible as the only guide for the people." That being true, why is the Methodist Episcopal Church not identical with the New Testament church in organization, faith, doctrine, and practice? If it relies on the Bible only it should be the same church, for Christ's church was in harmony with the Bible. The Bible is praised, but tradition directs in a large measure the course of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Also, besides the Bible, it has a Discipline (of more than five hundred pages), this being the product of scholarship used to explain the meaning of the Bible to the people.

The disparities and deficiencies of the Methodist Episcopal Church, represented in the Discipline, can be detected by a casual contrast with the New Testament church. Which shall we accept, the Bible, or the Discipline? It is asserted that the Bible is the "only guide for the people," but no account can be found in the Bible of an institution like the one represented by Reverend Anderson: to it God does not speak by revelation, it has no apostles or prophets, no miracles, no ministry called by revelation, no angelic ministrations, etc., etc.—such an institution is no more like the New Testament church than a wheelbarrow is like a modern railway train. The Church of Jesus Christ was in communion with God through revelation (did not worship a dumb God); and ever proclaimed the doctrine of God's unchangeability.

For the information of the public, the following is found on page 10:

Joseph Smith, the founder of "Mormonism," began his career in this manner, blazing the way for Mrs. Eddy and Mr. Russell. He claimed that he received from God a number of golden plates upon which, in strange hieroglyphics, was written the law of the "Mormon" Church, and the true teaching of the Bible could be ascertained only by following this "key" written upon the "golden plates," which no one but Joseph Smith could interpret. Since then we have found that these "golden plates" from heaven, supposed to contain the "Book of Mormons" was a poor, but unmistakable copy of some old Egyptian plates, which, when properly translated, means something vastly different from the "Mormon" theology. But Joseph Smith had a "key" with which to interpret the Word of God, and that "key" is the secret of "Mormonism."

Joseph Smith claimed, in harmony with Isaiah 29, that the "book that is sealed," there referred to, that was to come out of the ground, was delivered to his charge; which contained a record of God's dealings with the pre-Columbian nations of America, evidence of whose existence is found in the archaeological discoveries continuously being brought to public notice. It would have been more accurate to state that what is recorded in the book is regarded as true, rather than what was written upon the plates was the "Law of the Mormon Church." The claim that this is the "key" by which the teachings of the Bible can be understood, is most emphatically not the viewpoint of the church assailed.

"Since then," the public is solemnly informed, "we have found that these 'golden plates' from heaven, supposed to contain the 'Book of Mormons' was a poor, but unmistakable copy of some old Egyptian plates, which, when properly translated means something vastly different from the Mormon theology." The year is not given when such a discovery was made, nor the names of the scholars who made such a discovery, nor what Egyptian plates were used in the comparison to detect the fraud alleged; nor can this champion of the Methodist Episcopal Church in his attack upon the work of Joseph Smith prove any of his bald assertions. The charges are all false and calumnious—never will they be substantiated, nor can they be, by the reverend gentleman, though set forth before the Young Men's Christian Association, and now published to the world with all the prestige that a degree of "D. D." can give to them. Not one of the above charges can be substantiated—let some one appeal for the proof.

On page 11 it is declared:

The second characteristic of these three false religions, which is directly opposite to the work of the scholar, is that they are all antagonistic to the life, person, and teachings of Jesus Christ.

In attempting to establish this point the teachings of the Utah (polygamous) church are quoted; the charge can not be proved by a reference to the standard works of our church, or to the utterances and writings of Joseph Smith published prior to his death. Brigham Young and his colleagues have attributed many things to Joseph Smith of which he was not the author. Latter Day Saints are not, never were, and never expect to be antagonistic to the life, person, and teachings of Jesus Christ—we do not question the divine sonship of Jesus Christ, nor doubt that through his name only man must be saved.

ATTACKING CHARACTER

The James boys and bandits of the wildest west were gentle and refined compared with the founder of "Mormonism" in his bloody battle for houses and lands.—Modern Misbeliefs, p. 12.

The reverend gentleman seems to possess an egotistical estimate of himself, viz, that the public will accept anything he says without proof. If what is stated is true, that Joseph Smith engaged in a "bloody battle for houses and lands," why was such a criminal never brought to justice by the courts of the land? Such a charge is an insult to the law-enforcing officers of our country.

It will be observed that this Goliath of Methodism, who betrays a greed for publicity rather than an anxiety for the truth, does not deal with the doctrines of the church founded under the instrumentality of Joseph Smith—probably for the reason that they are impregnable to assault. There is a wholesale attack upon character. This was the method employed by the opponents of Christianity nineteen hundred years ago, until the church became a sect everywhere "spoken against." (Acts 28: 22.) The Apostle Paul, esteemed so highly by our opponent, said as a result of such warfare the church was regarded as the "filth of the world," and the "offscouring of all things." (1 Corinthians 4: 13.)

toward Joseph Smith was manifested in a very practical way by some of his predecessors:

On the night of the 25th of March, Smith and Rigdon were seized by a mob, composed partly of the Campbellites, Methodists, and Baptists of Hiram, twelve or fifteen being apostate Mormons. The captives were roughly treated, and expected to be killed; but after they had been stripped, beaten, and well covered with tar and feathers, they were released.—Bancroft's History of Utah, p. 90.

Listen to the following on page 15:

Joseph Smith take the stand beside Moses and Isaiah, Peter and Paul, Augustine and John Wesley, with whom you have claimed equality. What is that on thine hand? Blood! The blood of thousands slain to carry out your conquests for wealth. What are those foul, loathsome sores upon thy soul? They are the disease marks of your impure utterances and writings about women—utterances so foul that the Government will not permit them in print. A thief, an adulterer, a murderer, a traitor to the marriage vow, his country and his God, Joseph Smith stands condemned for ever as a false prophet.

The foregoing is a very fine sample of the doctor's phraseological aberrations. His whole booklet is noted for its "dangerous ease of speech." We wish this pilot of souls to know there is a difference between assertion and argument, and that calumny is not proof. We think it would have been very fitting if Reverend Anderson had informed the Young Men's Christian Association and the public that Methodist preachers are in the front rank of those committing crimes among preachers,—see Crimes of Preachers, pages 95, 97.

Reverend Anderson's priestly office does not give him the right to calumniate the living or the dead at his reckless pleasure. When charging his fellow men with crime he should pursue the same course as a prosecutor in a court of law. Joseph Smith was frequently brought to trial, but was never convicted. It appears that all the courts lacked was Reverend George Wood Anderson, D. D., to act as judge, witness and jury. It would be sufficient to reply to assertion with a counter assertion; but attention is called to the fact that nowhere can this calumniator of the dead, who represents Methodism, find "impure utterances and writings about women" in the voluminous writings or utterances of Joseph Smith. We challenge the statement—let the gentleman now get busy. A greater falsehood never fell from human lips than the statement we challenge. He will find plenty of utterances from Brigham Young, but the attack is upon Joseph Smith. Then there is the cry of "thief," "adulterer," "murderer," etc. This reminds one of the saying, "If you can not defeat your opponent in debate, don't get discouraged; call your opponent names." So we have Joseph Smith portrayed as a thief, adulterer, murderer, traitor to his country, etc., with no evidence produced. With as little evidence and as great a flux of words, Methodism is offered to the world as being identical with the New Testament church.

Doctrines should stand or fall according to their merit or demerit; not by an assault upon character. We will test Methodism in the way Joseph Smith and his work is tested by the reverend gentleman before the Young Men's Christian Association. In the Contemporary Review, Archdeacon Farrar, D. D., says, speaking of John Wesley:

The most popular actors of the day held him up to odium and ridicule in lewd comedies. Reams of calumny, full of virulence, and falsehood, were poured forth from the press. The most simple, the most innocent, the most generous of men, he was called a smuggler, a pope, a Jesuit, a swindler, the most notorious hypocrite living.

Again we read:

He was accused of diverting the people from labor (while laboring as a missionary at Savannah, Georgia, of fomenting divisions, of claiming high and unwarranted ecclesiastical authority. His conduct towards a niece of one of the principal settlers (a Miss Williams) was highly resented by her friends. Thirteen indictments for alleged offenses were found against him; but before the time of trial he returned to England (left under the cover of his friends at night), and there for many years pursued a successful and distinguished career of piety and usefulness.—History of the United States, by Wiley, published in 1830, in New York.

Is this the way to test the doctrines of the Methodist Church? No. Then why does the gentleman who is so prominent in the Methodist Episcopal Church as to have his photograph appear three times in his little booklet of thirty-two pages, resort to such a course against the Latter Day Saints? He claims scholarship—does he need inspiration?

On pages twenty-two and twenty-three, a sickening parade is made of the doctrines of polygamy, Adam-God, blood atonement, etc., etc., which are represented as the teachings of Joseph Smith, and to prove this is true the teachings of Brigham Young are introduced! By charging the evils of Brigham Young upon Methodism the Methodist Church could be made to look sick—altogether like a "Modern Misbelief."

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

We now wish to ask, By what authority did John Wesley organize a church? He was a member of the Episcopal Church of England—lived and died in that church. The Methodist Episcopal Church in America received its apostolic authority from Mr. Asbury, through Doctor Coke; Doctor Coke from Mr. Wesley; Mr. Wesley from the Archbishop of Canterbury; and the Archbishop of Canterbury from the Pope of Rome, whom the whole Protestant world denounces as the "son of perdition."

No wonder, then, that the Methodist Episcopal Church in her organization and doctrine does not conform to the apostolic pattern! Wrong in name, no apostles or prophets, no revelation from God, no miracles, no divinely called ministry, etc.

A CHALLENGE

The reverend gentleman is hereby called upon to engage in public discussion with the church assailed. Truth does not hesitate to come to the light that its deeds may be made manifest. Four propositions are herewith submitted, which cover the claims both of Methodism and of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

Propositions:

1. The Bible is the final and complete revelation of God's will to man.
2. The Book of Mormon is of divine origin, and is entitled to the respect and belief of all Christian people.
3. The Methodist Episcopal Church is in harmony with the New Testament Church in origin, organization, faith, doctrine, and practice.
4. The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints is in harmony with the New Testament Church in origin, organization, faith, doctrine, and practice.

The first and third propositions to be affirmed by an accredited representative of the Methodist Episcopal Church; the second and fourth propositions to be supported by an accredited representative of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. To canvass the questions thoroughly at least three sessions of two hours each, should be devoted to each proposition.

This challenge stands good until the Methodist Episcopal Church meets the issue its representative has raised, or apologizes for shooting poisonous arrows at the Latter Day Saints, contrary to civilized warfare.

CHURCH IN SUCCESSION

The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, has, repeatedly, by the courts of the land, been declared the legal and lawful successor of the church founded under the instrumentality of Joseph Smith; it is, and always has been, absolutely innocent of teaching the doctrine of polygamy and its kindred evils. No stronger advocates of monogamy live than the true Latter Day Saints, and the Nation has had no abler opponents of polygamy than the sons of Joseph Smith (the object of Reverend Anderson's attack). No one has ever arisen claiming to be a descendant of Joseph Smith, except through his wife, Emma, his only wife—and at this writing, none of his posterity has ever united with the polygamous church of Utah. The following is an extract from a decision rendered by Judge L. S. Sherman, in the Court of Common Pleas, Lake County, Ohio:

Whereof the court do find as matters of fact: . . . That the church in Utah, the defendant, . . . has materially and largely departed from the faith, doctrines, laws, ordinances and usages of said original church, . . . and has incorporated into its system of faith the doctrines of celestial marriage and a plurality of wives, and the doctrine of Adam-God worship, contrary to the laws and constitution of said original church. And the court do further find that the plaintiff, Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, is the true and lawful continuation of, and successor to the said original Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, organized in 1830, and is entitled in law to all its rights and property.

Senator Fred T. Dubois, who was also a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, in a speech delivered in the United States Senate, December 13, 1906, said of our church: that "wherever they are, no matter in what part of the country, are among the best of our citizens in all respects. They do not believe in polygamy; they never practiced polygamy."

The foregoing evidence we feel assured will lead fair-minded persons to judge us with a righteous judgment. We are striving to be of benefit to our fellow men. Our people are peaceable, patriotic, law-abiding citizens. We do not care to assume any of the odium attaching to those who believe in the pernicious and heretical doctrines introduced by Brigham Young in Utah after Joseph Smith was dead.

We do not believe in political interference; our members being free to support any political party without dictation or interference from the church.

The democratic, representative, and theocratic principles are found in our church government. Legislation may originate with any delegate; and all proposed legislation is freely debated on the floor of the assembly, and then decided by majority vote.

WE BELIEVE

We court investigation of our whole religious faith. We believe that the laws of the land should be strictly obeyed. We believe in an open Bible, and in a free pulpit. "All truth" is our creed.

We believe in God the Eternal Father, and in his Son Jesus Christ, and in the Holy Ghost.

We believe that men will be punished for their own sins, and not for Adam's transgression.

We believe that through the atonement of Christ, all men may be saved by obedience to the laws and ordinances of the gospel.

We believe these ordinances are: First, Faith in God and the Lord Jesus Christ; second, repentance; third baptism by immersion for the remission of sins; fourth, laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost; fifth, we believe in the resurrection of the body; that the dead in Christ will rise first, and the rest of the dead will not live again until the thousand years are expired; sixth, we believe in the doctrine of eternal judgment, which provides that men shall be judged, rewarded, or punished, according to the degree of good, or evil, they shall have done.

We believe that a man must be called of God, and ordained by the laying on of hands of those who are in authority, to entitle him to preach the gospel and administer in the ordinances thereof.

We believe that in the Bible is contained the word of God, so far as it is translated correctly. We believe that the canon of scripture is not full, but that God, by his Spirit, will continue to reveal his word to man until the end of time.

We believe in the same kind of organization that existed in the primitive church, viz, apostles, prophets, pastors, teachers, evangelists, etc.

We believe in the powers and gifts of the everlasting gospel, viz, the gift of faith, discernment of spirits, prophecy, revelation, healing, visions, tongues and the interpretation of tongues, wisdom, charity, brotherly love, etc.

We believe that marriage is ordained of God; and that the law of God provides for but one companion in wedlock, for either man or woman, except in cases where the contract of marriage is broken by death or transgression.

We believe that the religion of Jesus Christ, as taught in the New Testament Scriptures, will, if its precepts are accepted and obeyed, make men and women better in the domestic circle, and better citizens of town, county and state, and consequently better fitted for the change which comes at death.

The Church of Jesus Christ has been reorganized we believe, reestablished in these latter days by the command and under the direction of God. We testify that the latter-day glory has come forth, foretold by the prophets and Christ. (Matthew 24: 14; Malachi 3: 1-5; Revelation 14: 6, 7.)

We again call upon the Methodist Episcopal Church, through its representative, Reverend George Wood Anderson, D. D., to meet us (the object of his public assault), in public discussion, or apologize for the attack upon the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. Will there be a response, or will the reverend gentleman go on crying, "Hear not the voice of the false prophet"?

PAUL M. HANSON.

[Note.—Brother Hanson will organize the Saints of Scranton and an effort will be made to place a copy of the foregoing article in pamphlet form in every home in Scranton. Brother Hanson believes that an "aggressive defense" is good tactics in the army of the Lord as well as in other armies.—EDITORS.]

HEALTH HINTS

NUMBER 4.—GOOD TEMPER

BY W. A. SINCLAIR, M. D.

"A merry heart maketh a cheerful countenance." Good temper is the key to the heart's treasures, the sun to the human countenance, and the balm to many of earth's woes.

Many people have an idea that if they pay fair respect to what are usually understood as physical laws, all will go well with them so far as bodily health is concerned. But few seem to understand the sympathy existing between the moral and physical man. We can not persistently do those things which we feel to be wrong, without wearing away (by slow degrees, perhaps, in some cases) the nervous strength which to-day sustains us in violation of our moral sense.

It is not necessary that a man should do as his conscientious neighbor, or as society dictates. So long as mankind is not run in one mold, there will be diversity of opinion; and each man will form from investigation and reflection a moral standard considerably his own, or at least modified by his individuality. It is not what others say of us individually, or what people of other nationalities say of our nation, that will make us great, powerful, and happy. It is what we can feel regarding ourselves; it is the self-respect which a noble life creates; if our consciences can unequivocally pronounce the verdict, right, we are at once invincible, we are happy, we are healthy. The applause of others may tickle our vanity, at the moment we think it is misapplied; but the applause of conscience sinks a shaft of moral strength, and unfathomable pleasure, down into the very soul's center.

AFFECTING THE HEALTH

Good temper and a clear conscience are necessary for the preservation of health.

Just exactly to that degree in which men and women are improved by a cheerful, unprejudiced condition of mind, they are physically injured by a morose, bigoted, and selfish habit of thought. Anger, jealousy, envy, distrust, and personal dislikes, all tend to induce nervous diseases. When the white man hates the Indian; when the Irishman detests the colored man; when the Yankee feels like fighting the "cockney"; when the Hindu, laboring under prejudice of caste, will not associate with the European; when the Mohammedan regards the Christian as a hog; when a full-blooded African disdains to associate with a mulatto or quadroon, there are certain mental emotions experienced which contort the features and disturb the harmony of the whole system.

The indications of such feeling are at once conveyed to the face, and to some extent leave their impression on the facial muscles, giving to the individual habitually indulging therein a countenance more or less disagreeable. They make themselves felt upon the nervous system by irritating it, and disturbing the harmonious circulation of the nervous forces. They also impair the digestion and interfere with the healthy action of the liver.

GRUMBLING

Chronic grumblers are never really well. They can not be; they keep their sensitive nerves constantly vibrating with discordant emotions. Yet grumbling is indulged in by people of all religions and nationalities. The farmer leans over his fence and grumbles about his crops. Showers have been too frequent and the ground is too wet; or a drought is scorching his growing vegetables. The tradesman grumbles because trade is too dull; or when customers are coming in numerously, he grumbles because of overwork. Even the parson grumbles because his parishoners fail to "come to time" in requiting him for his labors in the pulpit. One is reminded of the old rhyme, "The Kicker:"

In winter when the cold winds blow,
Man kicks.
He doesn't like the ice and snow,
He doesn't like to see the mercury go
To zero; if it falls below,
He kicks, oh, how he kicks!

In summer when the "sizzers siss"
Man kicks.
He growls, Great scott! How hot it is,
As if no misery equaled his;
And as he wipes his steaming phiz,
He kicks, oh, how he kicks!

So whether it is cold or hot,
Man kicks.
He's never pleased with what he's got,
But growls, and fumes, and swears a lot.
And whether it is right or not
He kicks, oh, how he kicks!

Grumbling gives the features a pinched, "sour-milk" appearance; vitiates the gastric juices, and dries up the secretions. These effects are only just penalties on the person who allows his temper to be thus disturbed; but his innocent family and friends suffer with him, as they are kept in a perpetual "nettle," and this induces nervous derangements in them. Many a good wife has been worn into her grave by a grumbling husband; and many a good husband has been driven from intimate association with his family by a faultfinding wife. The children in either case are brought up in a hotbed of discontent, which makes its impress first on the buoyancy of their young spirits and then on their nervous system.

PETULANCE AND VIOLENT TEMPER

Petulance is worse than grumbling. Many people are like snapping bugs—that can not be touched without snapping; or like rattlesnakes that can not be looked at without hissing from their throats and rattling their bones. Such folks are said to be “full of bile,” but the petulance causes the bilious condition, instead of the latter causing the petulance. Petulance often causes hypochondriasis (melancholia, depressive insanity, low spirits or dejection) among men, and hysteria among women.

It was said by Artemus Ward that “George Washington never slopped over.” Petulant men and women are constantly slopping over, and there is no nervous rest or happiness for those who get bespattered with their venomous utterances. Even dogs stand about them with ears and tail down, and with an increased susceptibility to distemper and hydrophobia. Perfect health is incompatible with a petulant disposition, and can not be maintained by those who are compelled to associate intimately with petulant people.

Violent temper is worse than petulance. It is absolutely dangerous to life as well as to health. People have been known to bring on attacks of hemorrhage by indulging in explosive anger; and in certain affections of the heart it has caused immediate death. Such tempestuous emotion causes congestion. At such moments the blood presses the brain and jumps violently through the delicate machinery of the heart; the arteries and veins of the lungs are unduly filled; the digestion is completely arrested, and biliary secretion is suspended. All the vital machinery is clogged with the undue presence of the perturbed vascular fluids.

THE VALUE OF GOOD TEMPER

People who have naturally good temper deserve no credit for being habitually good-natured; but those who have a fretful disposition or violent temper are censurable for indulging in grumbling or rage. There is no work so necessary and ennobling as that of rooting out inherited bad qualities. As soon as they are discovered the work should begin in earnest, nor should it be suspended till they are completely eradicated. If the desire for moral perfection is not sufficient to prompt this effort, then selfishness should, for everyone desires to have good health, and this is not permanently compatible with the indulgence of an irritable or violent temper.

Move around good-naturedly. Let your soul shine out as brightly as the sun. This will warm yourself within, and all those whom you hold dear without. It will promote harmony of action in your intricate physical machinery, and make all about you happy and more nearly healthy. Life will hold more charms for you than you ever hoped to behold, and your record at last will be sufficient to gain you inheritance in eternal sunshine and cheerfulness.

DO THE PLANETS AFFECT OUR WEATHER?

One of the correspondents of the Weekly News Letter to Crop Correspondents published by the Department of Agriculture wants to know whether the positions of the planets have any effect on the weather. The following is the News Letter's answer:

A few people strongly assert that they do, while many others have their doubts. Those, however, who have given the subject careful attention are positive that none of the planets, nor even the moon ever has any appreciable effect on the weather.

As a matter of fact, all weather changes depend ultimately upon temperature differences. The temperature, as we know, constitutes of itself a most important weather factor. Another and equally important weather factor is rainfall. But to obtain rain it is necessary first to evaporate water from the surface of the earth, and this, as everyone knows, requires heat. Still another important weather factor is the direction and force of the wind, and this, too, requires heat, for the winds will not blow unless the temperature is different at one place from what it is at another, any more than the air will draw up a chimney when there is no fire in it.

Since, then, the heating of different parts of the earth and its atmosphere to different temperatures is the real cause of the winds and of all weather changes it follows that the moon and the planets can affect the weather only so far as they supply heat.

Now, according to accurate measurements made with the most delicate instruments, the amount of heat sent to the earth by all the planets and also by the moon is insignificant in comparison to the amount that comes from the sun. Hence, we could not expect either the planets or the moon appreciably to affect the weather. They do not supply enough heat, the one thing that causes all our weather changes.

To most people the foregoing reasoning may seem quite sufficient and conclusive, but there is still another and entirely different method of testing the whole question. We can observe the positions of the planets and the kind of weather during each position and see whether the same sort of weather always comes when the planets are in the same position. This kind of examination has often been made, both for the planets and for the moon, but not the slightest influence of either upon our weather has ever been found.

To sum up: We have every reason to believe that neither the planets nor the moon can have any appreciable effect on the weather, because they furnish so little heat upon which all weather changes ultimately depend, and this belief is fully supported by weather records.

The belief, still to be found in all countries, that the planets and the moon do affect the weather never had any scientific basis whatever, it is only a remnant of the many superstitions generated and fostered by that other and greater superstition, astrology.—Scientific American, July 18, 1914.

THE END OF SEGREGATION

No social development of the last few years has been more surprising than the successful war against vice. It is not characteristic of one city or of one section of the country, but like a great folk movement it has swept across the Nation. Superior, Wisconsin, is now the latest convert to the antisegregation hosts.

A year ago the Survey magazine showed that Superior was in effect licensing vice. A uniform fine of fifty dollars a month from twenty places contributed a revenue of twelve thousand dollars a year. Nominally fines were imposed for violations of the law; actually license fees were collected.

Archibald McKay, who was reelected district attorney in November, is responsible for the recent closing of the segregated district. The situation has elements of satire. Mr. McKay was not known to entertain feelings especially hostile to a licensing policy. Sheriff Joseph E. Comiskey, who was "supposedly supported by the saloons and by the ring-leaders of the vice district," was reputed to have sanctioned the system. Along came the district attorney and forced the closing despite a safe sheriff. And now public sentiment upholds the abolitionists!

The story is much like that of Chicago, Denver, Seattle or San Francisco. Segregation won't work. It protects a disease spot, a source and center of contagion.

Individuals are degraded; society is soiled; and politics is debauched. As Shaw said of another matter, "it simply won't stand thinking about." Of course, segregation is no worse in 1914 than it was in 1908 or in 1900. Public opinion, however, has ripened upon the subject. People generally have become convinced, and once people in multitudes are convinced things begin to happen.

Abolishing the segregated district does not solve the vice problem. Innumerable reorganizations are necessary before that victory can be claimed. It does, however, strike a heavy blow at the commercial side of the sex problem, and that is the enormity of the present. Public sentiment will continue to advance. New facts will be gathered and new ways of relief will be devised. Then we shall be closer to a final answer to this problem, which has lain heavily upon the conscience of the ages.—Chicago Herald, December 31, 1914.

Obedience Through Suffering

In the midst of peace, when fortune favors, and men are content with the seeming completeness of their lives, they sometimes forget God, and forgetting him forget also his needy creatures. It is in grief and suffering that we find the way to others' sorrow and to God; and by this way also do we find faith, and trust, and resignation, and a looking forward to a better land, a place of happy reunion and perpetual sunshine. These sentiments are feelingly expressed in the following touching letter from one who has suffered much, and who through suffering has learned much.

"RIPON, CALIFORNIA.

Editors Herald: I am sitting by my window this evening, watching the sunset, witnessing the dying out of a glorious and resplendent day. Time was when I loved to watch the sun's rising,—but that was long ago, when a young form stood and watched beside me. And I likened the new-born glory of the morn to that same young life, whom I loved more than heaven.

"I think I must have transgressed in my affection for her. God has said, Thou shalt forsake thy all for me; and thinking back I am quite sure that I had forgotten earth, heaven, God and all—all save the love I bore for her, my little one.

"But I was chastened. Oh, how I was chastened! For she is gone now, and my arms are empty. So unreal this silence seems to me. How I listen for the music of that dear voice! Where is the merry laughter and song which so lately filled the house? So lately? Yes, sometimes it seems but yesterday; and then again so long ago.

"The sun is sinking now. The last long rays are painting all the heavens in purple and gold. One can almost feel the breath of the twilight as it stirs the marguerites beneath my window. Oh, those marguerites! How they whisper to me of her. It was she, their namesake, who placed them there.

"As time goes by I grow less selfish in my grief and think more of the sufferings of others. My eye is quickened to pain, my ear to the wail of sorrow. Just above my window a mother bird droops disconsolately; her nest, too, is empty. Far away in the darkening woods and upon the shadowy hills, all the world calls to its young and the young respond. There come times when I also call, but receive no answer.

"Marguerite, my own, my gift from heaven, was given me in the early spring. How fitting a birth-time for such as she! How appropriate that flowers and song birds should herald her coming. The sky was blue that day; not summer blue, but blended with the most beautiful pearl gray tints, just the color of my darling's eyes.

"I always said Marguerite had 'shadows' in her eyes, and I loved to think that they gathered those shadows as her little spirit descended 'twixt heaven and earth.

"So full of grace and beauty she grew; and as she linked her life more and more with mine, is it any wonder that I forgot the world and its cares? Is it any wonder, as I looked deep into those dear, gray eyes, and smoothed back those sunny brown curls, that I thought her to be my all in all, and rejoiced in the thought? I worshiped her. Perhaps it was wrong; God knows. I only know that she was taken, and I am alone to-night with my thoughts and memories.

"How well I remember her eighth birthday. Her little friends gave her a party, and such a party! I shall never forget how beautiful my darling was that day. How her lovely face beamed as her tiny silk-clad form moved among the guests, the queen of them all. Merry and happy children! How little did they dream that ere many weeks had flown the one merriest and happiest of them all should be cold in death. My grief is terrible, but I do not despair, for I know she is safe with Jesus and awaits me there.

"It is quite dark now. The sun has long since sunk to rest, and the stars are creating a veritable fairyland. There is one small star brighter than all the rest, that seems to breathe to me of my child.

"For a long time I could not understand why she was taken. Resentment deep and bitter rankled in my soul, and I despaired. But God was with me. How I delight in that passage of scripture, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."

"Not many days ago, a beautiful white rose grew by the roadside, a rose as fair and pure as the kiss of an angel. But it was not left to become contaminated with the dust of the fields, nor seared by the blight of the winds. It was plucked from the parent stem, and now blooms in beauty and safety in a palace hall. She was carried by the angels to a place of happiness and peace. And I love to think that out on the streets of gold she is playing with other girls and boys. Some one has said that where the heart is, there one is also. If that be true, then I am not on earth. In reality, I am far away from where my little one, where my pretty one sleeps."

"E. NEVADA GRAHAM."

The deep and abiding lessons of sorrow's chastening hand, in contrast to the barrenness of the carefree way of pleasure are fittingly set forth in the beautiful lines of Robert Browning Hamilton, in the Century:

"I walked a mile with Pleasure.

She chatted all the way,
But left me none the wiser
For all she had to say.

I walked a mile with sorrow,
And ne'er a word said she;
But, oh, the things I learned from her
When Sorrow walked with me!"

It is needful that we learn obedience. It is well when we learn in prosperity; it is good that we learn through adversity.

The Children's Home

EDITED BY HEMAN C. SMITH AND CALLIE B. STEBBINS, LAMONI, IOWA

Heredity and Environment

Occasionally an applicant for a child from the Children's Home writes something like this, "It must be of a good family." "It must be of respectable antecedents." "We do not want a child of low or criminal parents." "It must be of good blood."

We can scarcely attach too much importance to hereditary influence, and we readily appreciate the feeling of those who thus address us, for the opening of our sacred homes to influences from without is a matter of serious consequences.

There are, however, many things to consider which are of difficult solution. To recommend one child, or to refuse to recommend another from this standpoint requires discrimination that few, if any, possess. Let us see; each child has two parents, each possessing traits and qualities which are desirable, and each having some that are questionable. All these are supposed to be blended in the character of the child. Each of these two parents have two parents of their own, thus giving the child four grandparents, and these four grandparents each having a father and mother gives the child eight great-grandparents, each contributing a part of themselves to the make-up of this child.

Thus, in ever increasing ratio these progenitors increase as you move backwards until it is estimated that in five hundred years each person has inherited qualities from thirty-one thousand six hundred and ninety-nine progenitors. Carrying this back only five hundred years the child appears before us with thirty-one thousand six hundred and ninety-nine streams of blood surging through its young veins. Is the blood of that child such as you could recommend as good blood? Is he of honorable ancestry? We concede that hereditary influences attach, but if one does others do, and here we have a child who has inherited from thirty-one thousand six hundred and ninety-nine persons, each of whom had numerous qualities of character; and we are asked to say whether the poor little thing has a respectable pedigree or not.

It might be said that we have no need to go back so far, that if the family has maintained a good character for two or three generations it will be satisfactory; but it is well known that there are characteristic traits good and bad that lie dormant often for several generations, and subsequently develop to the great surprise of those who have known the family. Going back only to the father and mother of the child, the combination of the elements in them sometimes result in the quickening and development of the good so that the product is better than either; and thus great men and women are produced with the good in them very pronounced, while the bad element in them lies dormant or sleeping only to be quickened by an unfortunate combination in the next, or some succeeding generation. On the contrary, the combination of elements may be such that the bad traits inherited may be prominent in the product, while the good traits lie dormant, to be quickened into life by a happier combination in the future.

The child before you for consideration is the result of a new combination. New blood, all of which does not exist in either of the parents, has been introduced into this union of element. What the result of the mixture will be, who can tell? To solve this problem requires power of analysis not possessed by any one of the present board of trustees. If any of our readers can solve this problem we would like to sit at their feet and learn wisdom, or, what would be better, give place to them on the board. We are glad to say that each one of the children in the home has good blood in it, and has descended from respectable families. Just how much that good blood has been poisoned, or to what extent these families have associated with those of less virtue, we do not know.

Environment has much to do with us all however, and we are glad to say that each of these children has sufficient good in it that if properly appealed to will produce growth remarkable.

If you have a home of pure and Christian environment into which one of these tender plants can be transferred, we assure you that the environment will have a tendency to ameliorate the evil and encourage the good, and thus you will be a minister of righteousness approved of God; and you will also be blessed and more complete by the evolution of your fatherly and motherly instinct with which by the involution of your Creator you have been endowed.

Of course you would each like to have the child most favorably endowed, but something must be done by somebody for those less fortunately constituted.

Can you? will you help?

True, you have to take chances that make your responsibility great if you give your loving care to a child of a family that has developed evil tendencies, but this is true to some extent of your own children. An uncultivated soil that will not produce rank weeds is worthless when cultivated.

Nature abhors a vacuum; and to pluck up the evil without planting and nourishing good in its stead will be a disastrous failure, and to undertake to cultivate the good by force or violence equally disastrous. This can only be done by carefully, patiently, tenderly, lovingly, nursing and nourishing the plant.

If we cultivate only the stronger, more vigorous plants, allowing others to perish for want of care, the harvest and the reward must be correspondingly limited.

The Home Family

At the present time the family at the Children's Home consists of twenty-eight persons. The inmates number ten girls and eleven boys, ranging in age from two to nearly sixteen years. One boy of seventeen years, having been released as an inmate, is retained to work for his board.

The others of the family are the superintendent and matron, Brother and Sister W. P. Robinson, their daughter, Helen, who is assistant matron, one who is employed as a cook, and two other helpers.

Of these other helpers, one is a young lady, who, as a girl, was the first person admitted to the home. After reaching the age of sixteen years she was released from the care of the home, but was permitted to remain and work for her board. She has developed into a most reliable helper, and is now receiving wages.

The law of Iowa, (we are informed by the State inspector.) provides that no child may be held as an inmate of any home such as ours beyond the age of sixteen years.

Sister Robinson, has had several severe illnesses since residing at the home. The past eight months she has been bedfast during much of the time. At intervals she has been able to be around the house, to the delight of the children and the satisfaction of her friends, and in December she was sufficiently recovered to visit her son in Rockford, Illinois. Immediately upon her return, she was again taken down, and has been confined to her bed ever since.

Her daughter Helen, is doing double duty, watching at the bedside of her mother and taking her mother's place as well as her own in the care of the home.

Sister Robinson suffers greatly, and at the present time is very seriously ill. We bespeak for the family an interest in the prayers of the Saints.

Clothing and Sewing

The Children's Home has many friends in many parts of the land. Of this we have had evidence in the substantial gifts of clothing, bedding, fruit, books and toys, as well as money. All who are connected with the home are grateful that it has been so well remembered.

Aid societies in different places have expressed their pleasure in working for the home, and many boxes of good, well-made clothing, much of it new, have been received as the result of their cheerful service.

Just now we have on hand an abundant supply of bedding, and enough clothing for present needs. What the home needs most now is money; and where aid societies can find sale for all they produce, it might be well to make the exchange of work and material for money instead of sending the goods to the home. The transportation cost from far-off places would sometimes add quite a sum to the contribution. But in cases where the money is not easy to obtain we would not discourage the willing workers who desire to continue making clothing for the home.

Frequent requests for measurements of the children are received by the clothing committee, and heretofore these have been answered in personal letters. A complete list of measurements for the girls is given herewith. For the boys we believe the ages will be a sufficient guide in choosing patterns or clothing of proper size. However, we may say that one of our nine-year-old boys is considerably under size. Besides those whose ages are given in the list, one boy, aged six, and one aged ten are clothed by their friends.

Rompers are the most acceptable clothing for the two-year-old and the four-year-old.

Boys' ages are 13, 12, 11, 10, 9, 8, 4, and 2 years.

United Order of Enoch

The United Order of Enoch, at Independence, Missouri, is not dead, neither has it been as effective for good as many of its promoters had hoped for; but everything has to have a start, and pioneers always find those who think institutions are not moving as rapidly as it ought. This may be true, but it is better to understand every step taken so that there will be no necessity for retracing, or calling in a movement that has been started.

The doing of something is in evidence that the organization is alive, and occasionally one is added to its number. With all the disadvantages this society has had to meet, it has gradually helped a number to homes who otherwise, it is possible, some of them at least, might never had a place they could call their own.

Quite a settlement resides on what is known as "Enoch's Hill," and enjoy the association of a branch organization with a full set of officers. This speaks well for all connected therewith, for a settlement of Saints without church building or branch organization indicates inactivity along the right lines that lead to success. This they have with a neat building put up by their own hands, which makes it sweeter than if it had been the results of an abundance in their possession.

That is the chief purpose of this organization, to furnish opportunity for those who desire to and will occupy for the benefit of themselves and those of their fellow creatures. The rising sun does not have its effect upon vegetation until it has arisen to some height; so we could not expect a new and untried order would move this great church all at once; it takes time for people to realize its object and purpose in claiming an existence. It is hoped that we are near the time when some of the worthy ones who have toiled for the good of this work by the help of this organization and the direction of the Father above may have an inheritance and stewardships appointed unto them. The writer has looked forward to that event for more than a quarter of a century, and now often, though much nearer the time, asks himself if he will live to see that part of the work of God manifested among his children.

The members of the board having faith and confidence in the directing power of God in organizing, informed Presiding Bishop E. L. Kelley that they were ready to arrange to take over the property that he was holding in his own name, and a committee was appointed for that purpose (he being one) to meet and make such arrangements as were necessary, and that would be satisfactory to all parties concerned. That was July 2, 1914. This meeting has not yet obtained, as Brother Kelley is a very busy man, and seemingly always overloaded with work, hence something has to be put off till a more convenient time. The board thought this act if accomplished would relieve him of quite a burden and care. We are still in hopes he may have time so that something along this line may be accomplished before the next General Conference.

The writer believes that was one of the objects of the organization being instituted at the time it was organized,—to be a helping institution to the bishopric of the church in caring for the surplus property and the unfortunate of the church, and by this means help pave the way for divinely appointed inheritances and stewardships. I think we are getting closer to that point every day, and in the Lord's own way and time it will come. Hence let patience have her perfect work.

With a burning desire to be useful and guided by the unerring mind of Him who never errs, I remain in hope of the final triumph of the great work committed to our trust.

A. H. PARSONS, Secretary of the Order.

Separate Meetings Again

In reading the letter department some time ago I noticed that there seemed to be a division among some of the Saints in branches with regard to the colored race. Of those who refuse to take the sacrament with a colored brother or sister, we may ask, did the gospel come out of you, or to you? Who art thou, that thou shouldst despise thy brother because he is dark and thou art white? Did the gospel come as a matter of fancy and gather up a few white pets, and say, "Thou art white and fair, sit thou in this good seat here, and let thy colored brother go back yonder and sit there?" Verily, nay. Where there is partiality there is division, and where there is division there is confusion, and God is not the author of confusion, but of love, joy, peace, etc., and except ye be one, said Jesus, ye are none of mine. Notice the necessity of oneness, unity.

Jesus says, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature (no exceptions black or white). He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved. Through the mercy of a loving Father and the great sacrifice of his dear Son, we are saved, if we obey from the heart the gospel; and if scarcely the righteous are saved, what about those who showeth no mercy to our colored brother (will not sup with him)? Beloved, I believe we of all people should be wise on this matter, who earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered to the Saints.

Again, are not the colored brethren baptized into the same kingdom, the same body of the church, born of the same Spirit? Why then separate them, when we are all baptized into Christ, having put on Christ? We therefore, are married to Christ, and those whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder. I believe this will fit well here.

"Then Peter opened his mouth, and said, Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons: but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him." (Acts 10: 34.)

Again, "What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common." (Acts 10: 15, Romans 2: 11, 1 Peter 1: 17, Job 36: 5, Galatians 2: 6, Ephesians 6: 8.) Let the self-righteous look over those quotations, and then examine themselves to see whether their hearts are right, having a conscience void of offense toward God and their brethren.

I believe the letter written and dated December 9, by our colored brother, Elder George A. Graves, ought to be sufficient to convince all who are honest in heart. When I read the above-named letter I was so greatly impressed that I was moved to write to the HERALD. I do not know the brother, have never seen him, but I believe he has the Spirit of God.

God "hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth;" in my opinion, to drink of the same cup and eat of the same loaf.

When we come together to our sacrament meetings everyone should examine himself, to see whether he has aught against a brother and sister. Why, this is the very place to show sympathy, love, mercy. The very ordinance is an example for all, manifested by our Lord who gave his life for us. If we have no respect for our colored brother and sister, even to sit with us, then we become partial, being respecters of persons, and if we are guilty of such thing, we partake of the supper unworthily, to our own soul's condemnation.

I believe, beloved, it is time we should get close together; this is not the time to separate by putting some in a corner of the gallery, and saying, We are more righteous than you. Don't you think that was the spirit which said, Away with him, crucify him? Verily, yea. What would Jesus do? Would he say, "Look here, you fellows, you have been permitted to come in the kingdom, now separate yourselves, get up to the gallery there, for you are not clean enough to sit with these good people." I can venture to say, "No;" never! "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy." Let this be a reminder.

Your brother in Christ,

JAMES T. MEREDITH.

NEW PHILADELPHIA, OHIO, December 12, 1914.

OTTUMWA, IOWA, December 8, 1914.

Editors Herald: November 16 I left home for Bidwell, a mining town five miles south of Ottumwa. Arriving just before noon, I went to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Papes and took dinner with the family. I have been acquainted with Mrs. Papes and children since my childhood, and was made very welcome at their home. In the evening I went to the home of the president of the miner's local to see if I could obtain the miner's hall to hold services. Mr. Fisher, the president, informed me I could have the hall free of charge. I returned to Ottumwa in the evening and prepared notices, which I mailed to Mr. Richard Williams, who posted the same. I advertised subjects a week in advance, and began the meetings Sunday evening, November 22, with about fifty in attendance, all nonmembers, there being no Saints in the town.

The first night I had to walk there and back, making a distance of ten miles, but had good company in the person of Brother John Lewis for which we are thankful, as well as for his assistance in the singing. The next evening I was accompanied by my brother in the flesh as well as in the gospel, Brother E. R. Williams. Wednesday evening some of the young people of the Ottumwa Branch secured a hayrack and went with me, helping wonderfully with the singing and rendering a short musical program, which was much appreciated by the congregation as well as by the writer.

The next night I received an invitation from Mr. Russell Sincox to go and stay that night with him, but I could not take advantage of his hospitality that evening as my brother who was with me wished to return home that night. The next Sunday evening I spoke on the subject of war and prophecy to a congregation numbering about one hundred and twenty-five, and which gave attention. After I had dismissed the meeting Mr. Papes stood upon one of the chairs and called for order and said, "This man has been preaching here for us for a week and has had no financial aid. While the congregation sings another song we will take up a collection."

The next Wednesday night the young people of Bidwell arranged for a pie supper at the close of the service. Proceeds amounted to twelve dollars and sixty-five cents which were given to the writer. The last evening I spoke on the differences between us and the Utah church, to a full house, many of whom were glad to know of said differences. While singing the last hymn Mr. Papes took up another collection, which amounted to eighteen dollars and fifty cents, which was very much appreciated.

I can truly say that the Lord has blessed me greatly in presenting the gospel to this people. This is a new opening and a good one. We have many friends there. We were fortunate in having Mr. Wilson to play the organ. Mr. and Mrs. Wilson were also kind in inviting me to their very pleasant home, as were also Mr. and Mrs. Anderson and others. At the pie social the young people of the Ottumwa Branch again showed their interest in the work, when about ten of them rendered another musical program. The boys walked back to Ottumwa; the young ladies were asked to spend the night at the pleasant home of Mr. and Mrs. Moss.

No baptisms were recorded but many friends, were made to the cause, prejudice was broken down, and a few were left interested in the angel message.

Ever praying for the furtherance of the cause and the redemption of Zion, I am, your brother in Christ,

D. T. WILLIAMS.

EMERSON, NORTH DAKOTA, December 1, 1914.

Editors Herald: Since attending the Logan reunion and meeting there many new friends who showed me much kindness, I have wanted to write to a number. I take this means of letting them hear from me.

It is not yet a year since I became acquainted with the latter-day work. I have since then been studying and investigating, although not so thoroughly as I would like to do, as I lack time and strength for further work. The letters in the HERALD are a pleasure and a comfort to me. This work was a surprise to me, after coming in contact with many churches, one after another, claiming to be after the Bible pattern.

I am weak and faltering, and worldly cares confront me from time to time and seek to crowd spiritual things out of my life. My greatest desire is that I may more fully understand and know the ways of the Lord, so I might become an instrument in his hands. I desire to be more prayerful, humble, and spiritual.

The reunion at Logan was the grandest gathering I ever attended. I feel as if I have had a taste of heaven. I am thankful for being able to attend and to hear what I was permitted to hear and see of the power of God. All sympathy and kindness were shown me. I hope and pray it may be possible for us to attend the next reunion.

We are eagerly awaiting for one of the missionaries to visit us. We wish to learn, and there are a few interested here. Lester has improved some, and we continue to pray for him.

May God help me to be prayerful and true to others as well as myself. The trials of life are nothing compared to the glory that awaits us if we are faithful. May the Lord help us to make sacrifices for his cause.

With special greetings to all I met at Logan, and all other readers of the HERALD, I am,

Your sister in the faith,

MRS. FRANK ANDERSON.

CLYDE, MISSOURI, December 8, 1914.

Editors Herald: The HERALD is appreciated by us. This latter-day work is wonderful indeed, having within it the means of life. It brings to those who endeavor to live it that peace and comfort which no other thing in the world can bring. But we must learn to do our part, for God helps those who try to help themselves. God does not till the ground and raise the grain, that is our part. The growing of the grain is the part of God. And as he does this, so will he do in all things pertaining to life, here and hereafter. God has promised to the faithful here a little and there a little, but there is no promise to those who are unfaithful.

The preaching we hear and the HERALD and other matter we read contain grains of gold, but we must hear and read to profit by the same. The article on the question of the Sabbath by Brother E. F. Robertson was excellent. My wife thinks it the best thing in this line she has ever read. Other articles are appreciated also. The editorials are grand, and calculated to make the reader wiser and nobler.

The HERALD brings news of sadness as well as of joy and peace. Such sad news is that of the illness of Sister Griffiths. I remember reading how Brother Griffiths once walked forty miles to fill an appointment, and how at one time he sat up over night in a depot without means for food and lodging. May the Lord bless him and his companion.

The Bedison Branch is still alive. Of a membership of seventy, only thirty are located so they can meet together. We have our regular services every Sunday and prayer meetings in private houses every Tuesday night. The Lord meets with us and we feel encouraged. Our president, Brother Lorenson is always with us. He is a faithful man, and has won the respect of all who know him.

Your brother,

A. JENSEN.

LONDON, ENGLAND, December 11, 1914.

Editors Herald: A few months ago all was apparently peace and harmony. From press and pulpit peace and safety was the talk, while there was really no peace, but a constant preparation for war, with sudden destruction near at hand. And now can be heard the cry of the newsboy of another great battle, or the sinking of another warship with its load of living freight. It is heart-sickening to read of the slaughter of human life and property. Beautiful temples, and cathedrals raised to the honor and glory of God, are in ruins, shattered and defaced. The beautiful work of the artist, requiring centuries to produce, has been destroyed by the hand of the spoiler. Surely the day of the Lord is near at hand, and the prophecies are coming to a rapid fulfillment.

London has put on a different appearance, having lost much of its brilliancy. The war cloud has drawn the curtains of mourning over many of her inhabitants, and when the shades of night come down over us, darkness reigns to a great extent. The night lamps are shaded, and in the darkness can be seen the searchlights sweeping over the sky in search of German Zeppelins, lest a volley of death and destruction should come down upon us.

We are reminded of the havoc already done by the incoming trains carrying home to their grief-stricken families dead and dying officers and soldiers, some crippled for life, others to be carried to their last resting places. When the music of the band is heard in sad tones playing the funeral march, one feels to mourn with the sorrowing widows and orphans, left to struggle on through life as best they can. All these distressing conditions lead to much discussion by the Christian world as to the justification of Christian nations going to war.

Nothing very flattering can be reported concerning the gospel work here. A few have been baptized, but until we can get into a more prominent place where we will not be so hidden from the public we can not reach the people. We need two good, brave missionaries stationed in London to do street and park preaching, and a respectable meetinghouse to invite the people to come to and then a proper battle for the truth must be waged before a victory can be won. Brother May's time is so much engaged otherwise that he can not do much public preaching, and as there is no other help available at the present time, the work in London is not pushed forward as we would like to see it. We hope another year will bring us assistance.

Our rights and privileges are the same as those of other churches. We long to see the day when the principles of our faith will be so presented before the people in London that they will see the difference between us and the Utah Mormons, and to see the distinction so clearly drawn that we may not be misunderstood and confused with that church. We are hoping and praying, that our heavenly Father may hasten the day that we may see a realization of our hopes, and the light of truth may shine into the hearts of those who desire to know the truth. This is the desire of

Your sister in the gospel,

MRS. R. MAY.

CAMERON, MISSOURI, December 7, 1914.

Editors Herald: I enjoy reading the HERALD. I have been in this work nine years, and can truly say that the Lord has blessed me. I have been afflicted with paralysis for twelve years and can not use my left arm. I ask the Saints to pray that I may receive strength again, if it is the Father's will.

My stepmother and two sisters are members of the church, and I desire to see my father also one of the fold of God and rejoicing in this great work.

I realize that we are living in the last days, and that the Saints should be awake and striving to do their part for the Master. If only we put forth the effort, each one, we can bring rejoicing to some soul. It is for each to thrust in his sickle and reap, and keep his lamp trimmed and burning.

Your sister in Christ,

VENA PAUL.

EVANSVILLE, INDIANA, December 12, 1914.

Editors Herald: I came to this large city December 7. Learning that the Utah people had a church here, I called on their officials. They refused to let me preach in the church.

They said that if I were present at their meeting they would call on me and I could talk, but that I would not be permitted to preach on the differences of the two churches, or baptize anyone. I told them that the difference between the two churches was the subject I wanted to present, and that if they refused to allow me to preach in their church it would hurt their cause. They did not think so. I then secured the Evansville hall, and the editor of the Evansville Press said he would be pleased to publish my subject, and would not charge me anything. The meeting is for Saturday night at 7.45, and I am looking for a good crowd.

Thursday night my brother-in-law and I went to hear the spiritualists. After a young man began to talk, a lady began to talk to another woman, as the spirit dictated to her, she claimed. She next came to my brother-in-law and sat on the same seat as myself. She began talking to him, and as she told him he had been whipped with a big rope when a boy and other things that had happened to him in childhood that were true, he became interested. He wondered how she knew these things.

I sat praying that the Spirit of the Lord might be given to detect right from wrong. Next she came to me and said she seemed to see insurance papers floating around my head. She said I was an insurance man, asked if she were right. I sat looking at her without a word. She said to me, "Smile a little, if you were to write an insurance policy with that solemn look they would think you were a preacher." I said nothing, but thought much. After she had left me, a lady who sat on the same seat asked me if she told me anything. I answered, No. At the close of the meeting I went up to the front and asked permission to make an announcement, and stated that I would speak in the hall Saturday night. As I walked back through the crowd, the lady mentioned took me by the hand and asked me what my subject would be. I told her it would be on the differences between the Reorganized and Utah churches. She asked, "Mormon"? and I answered, "Yes." Her face flushed very red. She had nothing more to say, no doubt feeling bad because of her mistake when telling me before such a crowd that I was an insurance agent.

Praying that truth and right will triumph, I am,

Your brother in bonds,

L. C. MOORE.

FRAZEE, MINNESOTA, December 13, 1914.

Editors Herald: I am one of the isolated ones. It always does me good to read the letters in the HERALD from the brothers and sisters. There is much comfort in them. My companion does not belong to the church, but the dear Lord is good, and I pray that I may live so that my light may shine forth that he may become one of God's true children. He is a saw mill man, and of course most of his time is devoted to that work. Pray for him, dear Saints, that he may see the light of this true gospel and obey.

I can truthfully say that this gospel is true. I have been blessed a great many times, as has my little one in her affliction. I ask an interest in the prayers of all that I may prove faithful to the end.

In gospel bonds,

SISTER O. F. KING.

LOCK 4, PENNSYLVANIA, December 14, 1914.

Editors Herald: The loss of the HERALD to me would be like a man losing his guide at the parting of the ways. The editorials I think the finest I ever read. They have certainly done me much good. This latter-day work is the grandest thing I ever heard. I can hardly restrain myself from shouting it on the street.

I am living here at Lock 4, four or five miles from Fayette City, but am working at Pittsburgh, and attend the Latter Day Saint Church there and know many of the Saints there and here. On the eleventh I was at the church supper in Pittsburgh, and it certainly was a credit to the Saints. The bill of fare was all that could be desired, and there was not a particle of noise or confusion; everyone seemed cheerful, contented and happy. Everything moved smoothly and without a jar.

Brother Gaskill came here about seven years ago, and was here alone, being a target for every creed and belief. Parties came from all creeds and doctrines to confound him, but not too fast for him. He met them as David met Goliath, and with the same results. Some knew they were conquered, many did not. As I was one of these I should know, and, thank God, I was one of the few who realized it was God's truth, and that it was not Samuel Gaskill I was disputing, but rather the way of God himself.

Brother Gaskill has had Brethren Carlisle and Neville here for two or three weeks, and I understand there are several who are ready for the water, some only waiting an opportunity, myself among the latter. Brother Gaskill was saying some time ago that for all he had done he could not see one in the faith that he was sure had entered the kingdom as a result of his efforts. He will certainly see his hopes realized before spring.

After I join the church I hope the Lord may give me an opportunity to get into the fight. I believe in an aggressive action, not a defensive one.

The letter department in the HERALD is a feast to me, as are the editorials, in fact all departments keep up the good work and encourage the weak and weary. Every insult and every knock the Devil and his hosts give us will only add to our glory in the future. Let us come up through all the tribulation we can. The diamond is not beautiful until it is ground down; so let the Father grind us down. He knows what is for our good; and we do not. We will finally know as we are known, and all will know how much or how little we have suffered here for the Master's cause.

I see by the daily papers that President Joseph Smith has gone to his reward. May his son follow in the footsteps of Christ, as his father has done. Let us all hold up his hands while the battle rages.

Box 67.

Yours truly,
GEORGE MASTERS.

News from Missions

Wales

We were all sorry to learn of the death of our beloved President, yet we should rejoice to know that his life has been a long and useful one, which should be a solacing thought. To those who remain and who most keenly feel the loss of his presence, we might well say, May our end be like unto his.

I have been busy at various points of late. At Gilfach-Goch we have a lively little branch and some good material. Brother M. Williams is the Sunday school gaffer and also the music teacher of the branch. We hope to have his help throughout all Wales. He is a talented choir leader; brass and stringed instruments are not strangers to him. Brethren Williams, Pancell, and Roberts are good helpers to Brother G. T. Jenkins, the president of the branch. They should succeed.

At Aberaman things are quiet, but we are hoping for a revival. The Neath mission is a sort of center for the Llansamlet and Skewen Saints. Brethren Pickton, Crouch, Ellis and Thomas are interested in the work at that point. We pray that God may bless their efforts. Neath is a nice town, and we ought to have a large branch there by consistent labor in unity.

We have at Pontrhydyfen our aged Brother and Sister John Thomas, also Brother Crouch and family. We have had some spiritual feasts there. Brother Thomas is a weaver, in fact, he says he can do anything. Sister Thomas smiles at that, though we see some proof of his ability. We are hoping to reach some good souls at this place. The missionaries know the saintly welcome of these good people.

I went from Neath to Pontyeates. Brethren Williams, Thomas and the Phillipses are yet firm in the faith. Brother Edward Williams is still open for all comers in defense of the gospel principles, and if he can not bring enough emphasis into the argument with one finger, his whole hand comes solemnly down, and that is the end. At Pontyeates I was almost persuaded to dig down deep into my vocabulary for the latent powers to talk in the language of Adam, that is, the Welsh. I had to try anyway, and I have promised either to reform or improve along that line; I am not sure which it is to be.

We had a call at Llanelly and joined in communion with our faithful Sisters Davies, Edwards, Morris, and Thomas. We had a couple of visitors out at night. Elder John Harry is still holding onto the rod of iron. He is quite smart yet, but is troubled with cataracts growing over both eyes. He is cheerful and hopes for better things for the church work in the land of Wales.

We both visited the chapel at Island Place, which is rented conditionally to a nom de plume sect. The only good I see in it is that they are keeping the building from decay. They have kept up a kind of Evan Roberts revival tactics for over ten months, almost every evening. I have never in all my experience in religious endeavor seen people make greater efforts to impress one with the idea that they had something really extraordinary, which in fact is nothing more than they make believe. I think we shall make good use of this place ourselves soon. It was disgraceful to hear the ejaculations of the preacher in Welsh and English. His expressions seemed to us to be nothing short of blasphemy.

The treatment I have received at the hands of the Saints including eastern and western Wales from Gloucester to Pontyeates has been good and encouraging to the missionary. May all receive the blessings they deserve. There is hard work ahead of us, but I feel sure that most, if not all of the Saints want to help in it. I have felt blessed in the efforts to revive the work. Many times before meetings I have prayed: "Lord, be with me, thou knowest the conditions," and he has been there through his Holy Spirit.

The war is causing further rise in the price of foodstuffs, especially bread and butter. The drain on human life still continues, to increasing sorrow which can not be weighed. The feeling expressed by some of our brethren compelled to fight in Germany concerning the possibility of being in conflict with their brethren in Christ is the true gospel spirit which all humanity needs. That spirit alone is the only one that can break down human boundaries and racial barriers. I feel this in the few words of our brother from Denmark found in a recent number of the HERALD. We are awaiting the coming of this spirit, "O Lord, how long?"

Your brother in Christ,

THOMAS JONES.

South Sea Islands

To-night I sit in our cozy little missionary home, thinking of loved ones in America, and of how soon we will be sailing toward Zion's fair shore. We expect to be at General Conference in April, if the Germans don't capture us on our way to San Francisco. It is very dangerous traveling these days on British steamers.

My cup is filled with joy as I think of meeting with my parents, brothers and sister, and my dear little sons, one of whom I have not seen for three years. Only those who have experienced a foreign missionary life for nearly five years can imagine my feelings to-night.

On June 21, 1910, Sister Belle Smith Savage, myself and two children left our homes in Independence, I to join my husband, who had been in this mission one year. Sister Belle was married the day after our arrival and took up the work with her husband in the island of Tubuai, which is three hundred miles south of Tahiti.

I have a vivid recollection of my departure from my old home at Lamoni, Iowa, where I left my dear old grandparents, parents, brothers, sister and other relatives. This had been my home since early childhood, and it was with a degree of sadness that I took my departure for the long journey of about six thousand miles over land and sea. How well I remember the last words my dear grandfather said to me: "Ethel, I know I shall never see you again, but may the Lord bless you, is my prayer."

I tried hard to be brave and said, "Yes, I think you will."

My grandmother passed to her reward last May. Should we have returned last spring we would have seen them both, but on account of Brother Lake's death we were requested to remain another year. I can truly say I am not sorry we did stay, for we have witnessed many scenes I shall never forget. One was the returning of the "Pupu" people, whom Brother Griffiths baptized in the peaceful bay. Oh, what a day of rejoicing that was! On the other hand, some scenes have not been so pleasant (the bombardment of Papeete for instance).

After good-bys had been spoken to all relatives and friends at Lamoni, mother and I went to Independence to visit with relatives and friends, during which time many cottage prayer meetings were held in our behalf. Well do I remember the cheering words of comfort and the prophecies given me by those whom I shall never meet again in this life.

The day came at last when we had to depart. It seemed as though I could not leave my mother, but I had prayed so hard for strength, and I put it to the test. It was not so hard for Belle, for her mother went to San Francisco with her. It is strange how soon this sad parting was forgotten upon our arrival at Papeete, after meeting loved ones we had not seen for a year. The baby, whom his papa had never seen was another pleasing feature of our arrival.

As Father May, now in London, England, wished us God-speed, he said, "Don't worry about the children, for they will get along all right, and we will see them again. I have placed a blessing upon them." I thought of Jacob blessing his grandsons, Ephraim and Manasseh. These same little boys have already returned to America, and are now living with my parents at Lamoni.

I read the letter of Sister Inez Smith Davis with a great degree of sympathy, for I can truly sympathize with her, as I have witnessed this same experience. Our cozy little home, yes, everything except our wedding gifts were disposed of, all for this mission of love. I often think of the young people at home who have nice homes and are laying a little by; but I am thankful that I am one among many who is making this great sacrifice to advance the cause, and who gave up home and loved ones for the gospel's sake.

My stay here in the islands has been a pleasure to me, and I have a great love for my dark-skinned brethren and sisters here. Their sphere in life seems so small; they know nothing of the outside world. Many old people have lived and died on the same island upon which they were born, never seeing a river or mountain, nothing but a low coral island, with vast coconut plantations. The natives have been good to us, and I feel sad to think of leaving them, perhaps never to meet them again in this life. When we mention our departure, they weep and beg of us to remain with them.

To-day is New Year's Day, and it has certainly been a lonely one for Sister Ellis and myself, as our husbands are away in the low islands. The natives have the New Year spirit. Last night a meeting was held from seven o'clock until twelve, and at five minutes of twelve all heads were bowed in silent prayer, remaining in this attitude until the town clock struck the midnight hour and the bells all chimed the old year out and the new one in. After the close of the meeting all shook hands wishing each other a Ia ora na oe i te Matahiti api, which means, "May you have life in the new year." A very appropriate greeting, was it not?

Our last mail brought us the sad news of the illness of Brother Joseph, and we are patiently awaiting the arrival of the steamer for the latest news.

I wish to say to our friends in America, if they could see how comfortable we are they would have no cause to feel worried about us. We are now feasting on water melons, musk melons, pineapples, and all sorts of green vegetables. We are all enjoying the best of health, for which we are truly thankful. This is an ideal climate in which to live.

As another year is before us, let us all strive to live better than we have done in the one just passed; for we know each year brings the end nearer, and we all have a desire to meet Christ when he comes.

Yours for the success of his cause,

MRS. J. CHARLES MAY.

PAPEETE, TAHITI, January 1, 1915.

Des Moines District

This finds me at Rhodes, Iowa, where I have been holding meetings for the past three weeks. I baptized two last Thursday, and we have baptizing announced again for next Sunday. A number are near the door. Brother David J. Williams and the writer were here one year ago and baptized five, and the work has been moving nicely, the seed growing and bearing fruit ever since. Brother Ed Beys, one of the parties recently baptized, has been called and I had the privilege of ordaining him just two days after he came into the church. He is a prominent business man of the town, and well informed.

The conference year is drawing to a close. This is my second year in the Des Moines District, and everything has been encouraging to me. I have experienced a great degree of the Spirit in preaching. We have had splendid interest and attendance nearly everywhere we have held meetings. Have baptized a number more than I did last year. On the whole the work is advancing rapidly all through the district.

During the tent season Brother D. J. Williams and I labored at Colo and Nevada. Since our reunion last fall Brethren Williams and Long have labored together, leaving me to travel alone, since when I have labored at Frasier, Des Moines, Sandyville and Rhodes.

Our late reunion was a success from every standpoint. The committee is striving to make the coming reunion, to be held at Nevada, Iowa, the best in the history of the district.

We have a band of young people in the district known as the "Des Moines District Doers." They are certainly making their power felt for good—boosters in every sense of the term.

The Saints of this district, presided over by Elder O. Salisbury, a progressive man, are getting enthused, and practically every branch in the district is making rapid strides. Young and capable men are being called into the priesthood in a number of places.

The promise was made to us last year that the Lord would be with his servants to a greater degree than ever before, has certainly been true, so far as the writer has observed. The hastening time is surely upon us. Let us be leaders, up and doing; and while discouragements, trouble and sorrow overtake us, perhaps to try our faith, let us remember the old adage, "It might have been worse."

Let us all pray that the coming General Conference will be peaceful, and that steps will be taken that will insure a steady yet rapid growth of the church along all lines.

Your brother in bonds,

J. L. PARKER.

DES MOINES, IOWA, 1412 Maple Street, Home Address.

Phoenix, Arizona

The winter days here are so balmy that we are enabled to preach in the open air every day. Brother Ammon White's auto is our street pulpit, and it serves, well for that purpose. Brethren S. S. Smith, Ammon White and the writer are laboring together at this point at present. With daily sermons on the public thoroughfare and by distribution of tracts to those who hear, we are reaching many people of various parts of the United States and Mexico. Our Spanish literature is serviceable, as a large percentage here are Spanish-speaking people. Priests and teachers of other denominations mingle with other folks in our audiences. The following will serve as an example of how some of the "cloth" regard our work.

We noticed a certain minister in our congregation, listening with a critical ear. This is the first chapter of the narrative.

Last evening while walking along one of the streets near a church, we were attracted by swelling sounds of most vociferous prayer coming from within the church. Agony, vehemence, and remarkable lung power were thoroughly mixed, and labeled "Devotion to God," being discharged like belching artillery. The plea could be heard at a great distance. As we approached the church, the building seemed to fairly tremble before the awful onslaught of prayer. We supposed the worshiper's gospel was not coming in "word" only, just at that moment, but also in "power." It seemed probable that some sinner was in the last stages before breaking through to salvation. Such however, was not the case, for we soon discovered that the occasion was of far greater importance than the salvation of a single sinner.

The words of the pastor to the flock rose above the billows of eloquence in the cry, "O God! O God! Put down Mormonism!" We entered the church at once to learn if there were indications that the prayer was about to be answered, and, behold, it was the same minister who had attended our meetings with the critical ear. So it was clear as to what branch of Mormonism he was informing the Lord he ought to put down. We believe however, that the Lord will do nothing hastily in the matter, notwithstanding the urgency of the appeal and the unquestioned dignity and piety of the aforesaid spiritual advisor and his poor, frightened flock.

With this as a suggestive example, it is quite easy to discern a similar spirit operative in other hearts which vents itself in secret councils and behind closed doors. But many souls are more free from pharisaical bigotry, and are more open-minded to the truth. These receive the word to their betterment, and some are being baptized, two so far, as a result of these meetings; and we know that the word of truth is in very deed a blessing to many souls who never embraces all of its precepts in this world.

May blessing be upon all the Saints and as many sinners as will receive, and also upon the poor hypocrites, is my desire.

J. E. YATES.

News from Branches

Omaha, Nebraska

"I thirst for springs of heavenly life,
And here all day they arise;
I seek the treasure of thy life,
And close at hand it lies."

The special meetings conducted by Elders J. A. Gillen and Paul N. Craig closed Sunday evening, January 17, with a well-filled house. How glorious the gospel plan! If we could, or would, exert our best efforts to do the Master's will day by day, what heights we might reach!

Lewis F. Eden and daughter, Dorothy, were baptized Wednesday evening, January 20, by Elder Paul N. Craig, confirmed by Elders M. A. Peterson and Craig.

The Northeastern Nebraska Sunday school and Religio conventions will be held in Omaha, February 12, the district conference the two days following. We trust all our workers will lend a helping hand to make the meetings a success.

Elder H. A. Scott occupied the morning of January 24 and Elder Paul N. Craig in the evening, both giving excellent instruction, showing how willing the Lord is to assist us, if we would just awaken to a realization of our obligations, and put ourselves in a position where the Lord could shower his choice blessings upon us.

"Dear Lord, my heart hath not a doubt,
But thou dost compass me about,
With sympathy divine.
The love for me once crucified
Is not a love to leave my side,
But waiteth ever to divide
Each smallest care of mine."

ALICE CARY SCHWARTZ.

Flint, Michigan

One of the interesting events in the history of the Flint Branch occurred January 2 and 3. The Michigan Quorum of Elders held their annual meeting here, and the success of their sessions has given us added zeal to begin the new year. The meeting opened with a prayer service at 8 a. m., Saturday, January 3, William Collins and C. C. Whitford in charge. The quorum meeting, with quorum officers in charge, convened at 9.30. Many interesting subjects were discussed, among them "Necessity of reporting," "Pulpit department," "Benefits derived from being a member of a quorum."

Saturday evening a program was given, which was truly a credit to those in charge. Numbers consisting of readings, solos, male quartet and addresses were well rendered. Music was furnished by the Flint orchestra, assisted by Mr. N. C. Holden, of Dunbar's Municipal Band, who also rendered an excellent euphonium solo. Regular services of the branch were carried out Sunday morning. Sacrament service at 9 was well attended. After administering the emblems about half an hour remained during twenty-eight minutes of which time forty-three testimonies were given. The gifts were manifest, and all enjoyed the sweet Spirit's presence.

In the afternoon an experience meeting was conducted from two till five. The elders told some very interesting things relative to their work. Preaching at night was by B. H. Doty, closing a very profitable meeting, as expressed by all present. Not as many were present as were expected, and a more central place was decided upon for next year. Coleman being the objective point.

Other things of interest have occurred here. Christmas morning a few young people armed with boxes of carnations, took a walk of about twelve miles and showered old people, sick, and shut-ins. It was well worth the effort, seeing the unexpected joy brought to those unable to meet with us.

Sunday afternoon, January 10, the Woman's Auxiliary held a mass meeting of men and women. Interesting talks were given by Elder Doty and Grice and Howard Harder. Several papers and a discussion of "Amusements for our young people" completed the program. We are pleased to have Elder J. R. Grice home for a short time and also appreciate the visit made us by Elder B. H. Doty, both being young men, whose willingness to sacrifice home and loved ones for the advancement of the work makes us proud of our "Michigan Minute Men." The work is progressing nicely. New members are added quite often, and as we are beginning to see the end of the debt on our new church we are truly thankful.

The Flint Booster Club has been revived, membership about forty. As the young have been spoken to so many times of late in regard to their part of the work, they are indeed a willing band of boosters. Hopeful of the final triumph of the work.

H. W. H., CORRESPONDENT.

Bay City, Michigan

The Saints of Bay City are still striving to be earnest workers for the Master. We are wide awake, and this new year seems to bring to us new opportunities for work. The world needs the gospel and we find many in the city who are glad to listen, as well as many to oppose. But this only gives a chance to work.

Every department in our branch is busy. Our Sunday school, with Brother Charles Bellinger as superintendent, is doing a good work. We have just organized a Doctrine and Covenants class, which we find both interesting and instructive. The normal class is working; having passed the first examination, we are preparing for the second. The Religio work is advancing. About twenty-five of our members took a trip to Saginaw last Friday evening to visit the local there, rendering a program and spent a pleasant evening. We hope that it may be repeated.

Elder O. J. Hawn has been in the city, and through his preaching many are hearing the angel's message. The honest in heart are obeying, five being baptized in the font last Wednesday evening. All are trying to work as they are able. We find no time to be idle, and hope for success in the future.

EDITH A. SMITH.

706 North Linn Street.

And even yet we start up in the night,

Thinking he begged us turn his pillow, so
The coolness of the fresher linen might Make less his baby cheek's unwonted glow,

At each such memory our hurt hearts wince;
Thoughts are grown sacred past all thinking—since.

—Strickland W. Gillilan.

Corrections

In article "Review of a Fourfold Test of Mormonism," HERALD, February 3, page 113, under subhead, "Fruits of identification," second sentence, instead of "To this matter we attempt to reply," should read, "To this matter we will not attempt to reply."

Heralds Wanted

To complete the file of HERALDS in the editorial library, the Editor desires the following: Volume 3; volumes 9 to 14, inclusive; volume 15, numbers 4, 8, 10; volume 16, numbers 2, 11; volumes 17 and 18; volume 19, numbers 13 to 24 inclusive; volume 20; volume 21, number 23; volume 28, number 6; volume 29, number 1. Volumes 1 to 23, inclusive, are scarce, and when it can be done, should be collected before finally lost or mislaid, so as to have them placed where they can serve the general church. Therefore, aside from the HERALDS specified above, anything preceding volume 24 which might be sent in would be placed where it would do the best good. Send or write to Editors HERALD, Lamoni, Iowa.

Correcting Correction

On further information and investigation I find that I made an error in HERALD of January 27 about parentage of Brother C. E. Gaylord. My previous inquiries had been answered that he was of the John C. Gaylord family of Wisconsin. Now I learn that he was a grandson of John Gaylord, of Plano, the man who wrote The Future of Russia, a book published at Milwaukee, in 1855. I very much regret the mistake and hasten to rectify it. H. A. STEBBINS.
February 6, 1915.

Christmas Offering Closes

All who have not forwarded Christmas Offering for 1914 should do so at once, as we expect to close this fund on February 10, and arrange for publication. We do not wish to see anyone excluded, and give this final notice. Offerings should be sent to E. L. Kelley, Presiding Bishop, Independence, Missouri.

Organ Offered

Saints at Tacoma, Washington, have an organ which they are willing to furnish free to any needy branch or community of Saints paying transportation. They think $20 would pay crating, drayage, freight, etc., to any branch within reasonable distance. Address Mr. R. P. Mulvane, 1615 South M. Street, Tacoma, Washington.

Pamphlet Wanted

Anyone having copy or copies of the pamphlet, "Why I left the Baptist Church," written by W. H. Kephart, will confer a favor on the HERALD Editors by sending same to Editors HERALD, Lamoni, Iowa.

Book Reviews

"CARTOONS MAGAZINE."—What the various nations think about each other, as expressed in war cartoons which go deep down into the soul of the people, is told pictorially in the February Cartoons Magazine (Chicago). It offers a unique history of the war, written from many viewpoints. There are cartoons that make you laugh or weep, cartoons blazing forth the wrath of Germany and England, cartoons that reach the heart and preach sermons. Cartoons by French, Spanish, Austrian, Russian, South African, Australian, South American, Canadian and Japanese artists present an international symposium. Special articles include one on war-time humor in Great Britain, with illustrations by the leading London artists, one on Lincoln in caricature, accompanied by some of Tenniel's famous drawings, and a synopsis of Hansi's new Child's History of Alsace, with pictures by the soldier-cartoonist. Among other subjects treated, both in text and cartoon, are "America's Problem of Defense," the "Quickening Financial Pulse," "German Militarism," the "Soldier Life of the Cossacks," the "Italian Point of View," and an "Estimate of Emperor Wilhelm," by a South American writer, illustrated by cartoons from Spanish and Spanish-American newspapers.

What Our Friends Say

On every side, enemies of our church urge their malicious and untrue statements upon an ever-ready public. What our friends may say, not so persistently presented, goes unheard.

The truth should be presented. Our neighbors should be given an opportunity to know what is right.

The Bureau of Publicity gives you an opportunity to inform your neighbor—every person in your community, at a mere trifle of expense.

The editorial appearing in the "Kansas City Journal" of December 10, 1914, concerning the demise of our beloved President Joseph Smith and the church of which he was leader, should be presented to the people of your community as the views of one who wrote unbiasedly concerning something of which he was informed.

This is printed in leaflet form, entitled, "By their fruits shall ye know them." There is a fitting introduction by Elbert A. Smith. It is sent free, you paying postage only, as follows:

20 leaflets, 2 cents postage; 40, 3 cents; 60, 4 cents; 80, 5 cents. More than 80 must go at parcel post rates, and weigh as follows: 80 to 100, 1 pound; 150 to 300, 2 pounds; 300 to 450, 3 pounds; 450 to 600, 4 pounds; 600 to 750, 5 pounds; 750 to 1,050, 6 pounds. ### A SACRED CHARGE

NUMBER II—TO THE FLOCK

If my people will respect the officers whom I have called and set in the church, I will respect these officers; and if they do not, they can not expect the riches of gifts and the blessings of direction.—Doctrine and Covenants 125: 14.

We have considered the call and charge of God to the ministry. In so doing we have caught something of the sacredness thereof as pertaining to the important mission of the flock, or church of God called out from among the world to the performance of the great work of latter days. We turn to this flock, and note God's charge to it in relation to the ministry, which, under him, is to lead the church to deliverance and triumph.

The language quoted from the Doctrine and Covenants is expressive both of the place of the ministry before the church, and of the responsibilities and potentialities of the church in a proper respect for those whom God has called to perform the arduous work of leadership.

RESPONSIBILITY

Any commission under God places responsibility not only upon the one who is sent, but also upon the man or men to whom he is sent. If the servant is charged to minister the means of life, then the congregation is charged to give heed to that which is set forth; and as he shall be held to account for his faithfulness, so shall they suffer loss or realize good according to their diligence in the instruction given.

In the law of God provision is made for the blessing of every man in the line of his duty. If each performs well his part and is sustained by his constituency, God will supplement his human wisdom by the light of his divine counsel, if need be in the outward gifts and manifestations of the Spirit. Thus is provided the directing care of the Father over all his work and in every department.

In this way is made possible the promise: "If my people will respect the officers whom I have called and set in the church, I will respect these officers." That is, God will bestow upon them light, and wisdom, and direction, and through them upon the flock. On the other hand, if the people fail to honor the officer or officers, God will not bless these servants with "the riches of gifts and the blessings of direction," and the flock shall suffer for lack of the same.

This principle applies in all the work of the church. If the servant of God is a leader, indeed, he is in advance of the body of the flock. Out of the higher spiritual atmosphere of his life and calling there come encouragement, and warning, and direction, which may make for the advancement of those to whom he ministers. As the flock pay heed to his counsel when set out in the quiet and orderly ministrations of his office, as well as when in the gifts more apparent, they respect him, and through him honor the Father, who is the source of his wisdom and strength. And thus is opened up an avenue of continuous lifting light and power, which shall finally place the church in the way of peace and triumph.

AGENCY

It is seen then, that while the shepherd and his flock are suggestive of the spiritual leader and his congregation, the illustration is not parallel in all points. The sheep follow the shepherd in dumb submission. For them there is no alternative. If they are led into pastures green or into barren wastes, they feed upon life-giving herbage, or grow lean from want. In either case they have no responsibility. And for them there is no exaltation. But with the flock of God it is not so, for development therein comes only under intelligent compliance with law. To this end man has his agency. In the exercise of this divine gift he may heed or disregard the leadings of his superior officer. In honoring God he may come to advancement and profit; in disregarding his counsel, to loss and misery.

Hence under the responsibilities of gospel privilege the flock is justified in a careful consideration of the teaching and direction of the servants of God. And as the church is permitted to judge as to the soundness of instruction set forth, even in revelations given and to become a part of the constitutional law, so may every territory and congregation and all men pass upon the wisdom of him who is set out as their immediate teacher and leader. Thus by a proper and sufficient check upon the possible infirmities of leadership is provided a safeguard for the rights and good of the people.

Now the individual Saint and even the flock, or any portion thereof, no less than the spiritual leader, may err in judgment of the counsels of God. It is well to remember, then, that to be right and safe is to be dutiful and spiritual—to be near to God at all times and in all things. Unless the individual or the flock is conscious of worthiness and no other purpose than to honor God, it is well that he or they hesitate before setting aside the direction and warning of those responsible for such.

And if inefficiency, neglect, or flagrant disregard of the privileges of the people mark the ministerial career of one who in his calling is expected to exercise wisdom, and diligence, and faithfulness, the responsibility of the flock does not end with the ending of his usefulness. There is a lawful way open for his correction or removal. In the meantime, a time of peril, it behooves every man to stand firm and true, that the flock suffer no more than from the incapacity of him who fails in duty. Under such conditions the responsibilities of every man and of the flock become twofold, and failure on the part of either is more disastrous than under conditions of efficient and faithful leadership.

No man should seek justification for negligence of duty, for acts in violation of law, in letter or in spirit, or for participation in that which in effect leads from a life of consecrated service, on the grounds that his pastor or other leader or leaders manifests or manifest the same or like weakness. A man is no less human for being called to a place of trust. He has erred before, he will likely err again. He may not be by natural qualifications the best man for the place, but he may be the best man willing to occupy there, and whom God can use; not in his weakness, but despite his weakness. He is called not that men should follow him, but that he may point all to the one good shepherd, even the Master, the only one who ever lived or ever will live above sin. In his work and calling, if humble and true, he will be blessed for his own good and for the good of the flock. It is for every man to exercise charity toward him, even as he expects every other man and God to exercise charity toward himself. It is for each man to follow Christ; and the pastor is only to point the way. His direction is more certain if his life conforms to his teaching; but his teaching is none the less true if he himself fails in some points. The flock shall neither be condemned by his virtues nor justified by his infirmities. Hence they should not make of his shortcomings a cloak for their own follies.

No man speaks as God, and hence may not on every occasion properly interpret the law, or set forth the best wisdom. If, however, he encourages to good works and warns against special wrong, or supposed evil, it is well that the people consider his counsel. As the one who, under God, is first responsible, his direction, though to some not seemingly so, may be indited by the will of God. Especially should his advice be carefully weighed if it is supplemental to the clear instructions of the constitutional law of the church, or to the statutory law, or enactments of the church in assembly. If the church advises against certain activities, and if this advice is emphasized by one who in his calling is to stand between God and the people under the sacred charge, "feed the flock of God," it is well that the Saints hesitate before setting aside the counsel thus given; and in all things are they to exercise their best judgment and seek for wisdom, that they may be prepared to heed every good word of advice.

So in every relation between the leader and the flock the Saints may and should use their agency. As in any other gift, they are to realize good under a wise exercise of their privileges, or suffer loss under a disregard of the ordinations and ordinances of God.

POTENTIALITIES

God's cause can triumph only in a redeemed people. It is the work of the ministry to labor to this end; and it is the work of the flock to labor with them. Unto this work has the church been called, and with this responsibility are they charged, even the work of their own salvation and of the salvation of the whole world, willing to yield obedience to the mandates of heaven.

The call to be a Saint of latter days is the greatest calling that can come to mortal man. The call of the church to gather in a following and to adorn herself in robes of righteousness against the appearing of the Bridegroom is the greatest work in which men can engage in cooperative effort. As the Saints individually and collectively sense more fully the mission and the potentialities of the church of this generation and the glory of her certain achievement, they may more earnestly make ready for a greater spiritual endowment and the final execution of the divine provisions of the law, which preparation shall be crowned with the success promised in all ages.

In this work the people no less than the ministry have a part; and their part as well as that of the ministry shall be performed if they learn to move forward in faith and in diligence. Respecting the officers whom God has placed in the various departments of his cause, as these officers respect God in the work incident to their calling, officers and all will continue to receive line upon line and light upon light, until we shall finally move out into a power and an endowment which we have not hitherto known, and which shall eventually unfold into the fruition of the veritable presence of Christ and the millennial life.

Then let all work faithfully and harmoniously, "forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before" as we press on toward "the mark of the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

J. F. GARVER.

CURRENT EVENTS

SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

WHEAT SHORTAGE.—District Attorney Clyne in a preliminary report to the Attorney General on his investigation into the situation at Chicago advises an embargo on wheat exports to prevent a shortage.

NAVAL BILL.—The naval bill passed the House on the 5th, carrying an appropriation of $144,648,902 and authorizing the construction of two battleships, thirty-six torpedo boat destroyers, one seagoing submarine torpedo boat, eleven submarines, one oil fuel ship. This bill goes to the Senate.

TRANSCONTINENTAL TELEPHONE.—Direct telephone connection between Philadelphia and San Francisco was formally inaugurated on the 11th over the Bell system by three taps of Liberty Bell, which was a signal to a bugler at San Francisco, who played "The star spangled banner," the strains of which were heard at Philadelphia.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—Zapata is said to be advancing toward Mexico City. Villa and Carranza forces have been fighting in the vicinity of Monterey with the Villa army in possession of the city. Maytorena soldiers have occupied Naco, Sonora, recently evacuated by General Hill, after continued conference with Brigadier General Scott. Charging him with sheltering Angel de Casso, a Spanish subject accused of aiding Villa, Carranza ordered Jose Caro, Spanish minister, to leave Mexico City within twenty-four hours after midnight of the 10th. Caro left Mexico City at once. The Washington administration is said to have protested to Carranza against withdrawing responsible officials from Mexico City and depriving foreign diplomatic representatives an accredited agency to which to appeal for protection of their nationals. It seems to be Carranza's purpose to force these representatives to Vera Cruz.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.—The New York senate passed on the 4th a joint resolution for a woman suffrage amendment, which goes to popular vote. A similar resolution in Pennsylvania which passed the last legislature and must pass again this year, was passed by the house on the 8th and goes to the senate. The same situation exists in New Jersey where a resolution adopted by the legislature of 1914 passed the house on the 1st. The Massachusetts senate on the 4th passed a bill for an equal suffrage amendment. The West Virginia legislature took final and favorable action on a similar amendment on the 5th to be voted on at the regular election of 1916. The Tennessee legislature on the 4th adopted a suffrage resolution which must pass again two years hence and be submitted to popular vote. On the 12th the Iowa senate passed an equal suffrage amendment bill. In Texas and Arkansas woman suffrage resolutions are pending with favorable prospects.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.—The Dacia has been delayed at Norfolk, Virginia, refusal of part of the crew to continue service being given as the cause. Great Britain has seized the cargo of the Wilhelmina, consisting of foodstuffs for German civilians, and said cargo will be taken before a prize court. On the 8th the administration alignment in the Senate gained the advantage in the struggle over the ship purchase bill under a motion to recommit with instructions to report with amendments forthwith. Unable to recess or adjourn, the opposition held the floor until late in the afternoon of the 10th, when after 54 hours and 10 minutes of continuous debate, constituting the longest filibuster in the history of the Senate, by vote of 48 to 46, they forced an adjournment. The Senate has taken up unfinished business and the House is expected to attempt a compromise on the shipping bill. In an extended reply to the protest of the United States against interference with commerce at sea, Great Britain takes the position that foodstuffs, ordinarily conditional contraband, have become absolute contraband as a result of German control of all food supplies in the country. This note is friendly and conciliatory.

EUROPEAN WAR.—In the eastern theater of war the struggle continues with increased intensity. The Russians have strengthened their position in the center before Warsaw, and the Germans are said to have evacuated Lodz, after Warsaw the most important point in Poland. The Germans are thought to have withdrawn men from Poland to strengthen their position in eastern Prussia, where the Russians early in the week reported gains, but where later they seem to have fallen back for a re-formation of lines. Fighting for possession of the Carpathian passes is reported unprecedented, with advantage favoring the Russians. The deadlock in the west continues, with severe fighting, especially in Alsace-Lorraine and the Argonne. In the former territory the French have made gains, the British and Germans reporting slight gains elsewhere. In an attempt to cross the Suez Canal, Turkish forces were defeated by the British with heavy losses. A fleet of thirty-four aeroplanes and seaplanes attacked German bases in Belgium on the 12th to prevent development of submarine stations, inflicting damages.

General Maitz, south African leader in the Boer rebellion, is reported executed by the Germans as a traitor. The English House of Commons has voted supplies without limit for an army of three million. Premier Radoslavoff of Bulgaria announces that that country will remain neutral. By saluting the Italian flag, Turkey has given satisfaction to Italy for the attack upon the Italian consulate at Hodedia, and the arrest of British consul Richardson. An Albanian force is said to have crossed the Servian border, forcing Servian troops to retire.

UNITED STATES IN PROTEST.—The British steamship Orduna, outward bound for New York, flew the United States flag on January 31 while crossing the Irish Sea. The Lusitania of the same line flew the Stars and Stripes on the 6th while crossing the same waters, homeward bound. Protesting sanction by the British Government of the flying of the United States flag by the Lusitania, as alleged by Germany, United States authorities in a note to Great Britain say:

The occasional use of the flag of a neutral or an enemy under the stress of immediate pursuit and to deceive an approaching enemy. . . seems to this Government a very different thing from an explicit sanction by a belligerent government for its merchant ships generally to fly the flag of a neutral power.

Protesting announcement by Germany declaring the waters about Great Britain and Ireland a war zone and neutral vessels in these waters endangered because of alleged misuse of neutral flags, United States authorities in warning Germany against damage to United States vessels and citizens say:

The sole right of a belligerent in dealing with neutral vessels on the high seas is limited to visit and search, unless a blockade is proclaimed and effectively maintained, which this Government does not understand to be proposed in this case. . . . If the commanders of German vessels of war should act upon the presumption that the flag of the United States was not being used in good faith and should destroy on the high seas an American vessel or the lives of American citizens, it would be difficult for the Government of the United States to view the act in any other light than as an indefensible violation of neutral rights. . . . If such a deplorable situation should arise the Government of the United States would be constrained to hold the imperial German Government to a strict accountability for such acts. . . and to take any steps. . . necessary. . . to safeguard American lives and property and to secure to American citizens the full enjoyment of their acknowledged rights on the high seas.

Germany has a second time warned neutral vessels against entering the war area about the British Isles after February 18, except to the north of Scotland.

GOVERNMENT

NUMBER 1.—MONARCHY

BY S. A. BURGESS

[The series of three articles under this heading were written during the summer of 1912, and appeared consecutively in the Autumn Leaves in the year 1913. They are presented here as being worthy of repetition and a wider circulation. Allowance should be made for governmental changes since their first publication.—EDITORS.]

Richard Hooker says of the Law, "Her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the spheres, all things in heaven and earth do her homage—the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempt from her power."

As the law approaches this ideal, the more nearly perfect it becomes. Law is founded on reason. Yet in our present government and law, we find criticism from those who wish to ignore both, whether it be within the church or without.

OF VITAL IMPORTANCE

To the writer, the consideration of the science of government is of very vital importance to the church. Still we appreciate that all will not agree with us in this. We remember when recently called upon to speak on this subject, a member of the church wanted to know of what good it was.

"Well," we replied, "for one thing, we are living under a republican form of government, and in order to carry out the highest ideals of that government, we should be posted."

"Oh, pshaw, I am a Republican," was the ready reply. "No use of me bothering about anything like that."

"Well, then, there is the government of the church. We need to know the principles of government for that."

"Oh, let the general church officials do that. I don't believe in bothering about things like that."

"And then you know the Bible says the Saints shall judge the world."

"Not in your day, or mine; so what is the use of fretting?"

That day may be nearer at hand than some think for. In any event we are commanded to study laws and government; to seek out the best men for office.

How often we have wondered in days gone by, when in the public schools the thought of the horrors and terrors of the monarchical form of government was so strongly emphasized, and how thankful we should be that we live under a republican form of government, in "the land of the free and the home of the brave." But when we went to Sunday school or church, continually we heard of the "kingdom of God." Now if the kingly form of government is inherently bad, why should we have a kingdom of heaven?

OBJECTS OF GOVERNMENT

The objects of government are, first, to protect from enemies without; second, to secure justice within; and third, to promote the general welfare. The first two conditions have been fairly well carried out in the government of the world, but the consideration of the third belongs to our own age.

When we consider government in the abstract, we can at once see that if we secure the Konig—the man who can, the Able-man, the one who is strongest and best prepared, morally, mentally, physically, and spiritually to rule, we shall have the most efficient administration. The difficulty has been that when one such man has been found, the inclination of the people always is to put his children and his children's children, and the remote generations in the office for which perchance they are wholly unfitted.

The monarchial form of government has the advantage of centralized power, and so fixing the responsibility. It reminds us of the story of Philip of Macedonia. An old woman had petitioned him several times to hear her complaint, but he had put her off, and at last told her, "Madam, I have not the time to bother with your nonsense."

"Then you have not time to be king," was the quick response, and he, appreciating the force of the remark, never again gave the excuse that he had no time to listen to the complaints of any of the people over whom he ruled.

Hereditary monarchy will have the advantages: first, that blooded stock does tell to a certain extent, and there is more probability that the son of a brilliant man will be above the average than there is for the son of an average man; second, he has the advantage of environment and education, he can devote his time to preparing especially for the work of government; third, with the robes and paraphernalia of office, if he would just look wise and keep his mouth shut, the people will surround him with such a halo that he will be found to get along fairly well.

But the difficulty is that the probability that a gifted individual will continue to have gifted descendants above the ordinary, is relatively small. Some biologists place it at ten per cent above the average.

ORIGIN OF GOVERNMENT

On the question of the origin of government, there are three suggestions made. First, force; that the strongest men became more numerous, dominated the weak, and made laws for their own aggrandizement, and thus governments were started, and especially the monarchial form of government; secondly, that as men became more numerous they met and by agreement made tentative plans, and so have gradually developed the system of government; third, that the origin of government is the divine law, and that the origin of the monarchial form of government is the priesthood.

Now as we search the records of the past we are unable to find satisfactory evidence of either of the first two theories. We are not able to find a period in which mankind were developing any such a plan. But the earliest records show the idea of a primeval revelation from God to man with the priesthood and an outline of government. Furthermore, monarchs have claimed from time immemorial to reign by divine right. Great kings have taken upon themselves the name of the son of God. Furthermore, even down to the Middle Ages we find that the kings claimed the right to lay on hands to heal the sick, although by that time it had narrowed down to curing the king's evil. In the more ancient nations the king belongs to the highest priestly class, and the laws not only of Moses, of Manes and of Hammurabi, but of many others, claimed divine origin.

But when we say this we do not mean to infer that absolute monarchy, despotism, and tyranny have divine approval. We do mean to assert that the origin of human government is the divine law, and that the monarchy, by whatever name called is a corruption of the idea of priesthood. The true king is the true priest.

GOVERNMENTAL CORRUPTIONS

When in Utah some years ago we were privileged to attend a conference, and were much interested in noting the secretary stand up and read a long list of motions sustaining various officers, just rattling them off as fast as he could read them: Moved and seconded, that we sustain so and so to such an office,—carried. We made inquiry as to why this method was in force, and why a negative vote by an individual was as good as expulsion from the church. The reply was that the theory of the church is that the kingdom of God on earth is patterned after the kingdom of God in heaven. God speaks and all creation says, "Amen." On earth the president of the church speaks and all Israel with bowed head votes, "Aye."

"Well," we asked, "what do you think about it?"

"The church does not send me out to tell what I think, but to state what the church teaches."

We discussed it for some little time with similar results; but finally to another point-blank question, just between man and man, "What do you think of that method of government?"

"Well," he replied, "I am a democrat."

If in the short time of less than one century men can so far corrupt and depart from the divine plan of common consent, and establish so absolute a monarchy and so centralized a government, is it at all surprising that in the ages of the past similar corruptions have appeared, and that men have used the ignorance of the multitude to pervert the divine plan? It is the desire of people to be led, the majority of them, and they are quite ready for hero worship, as is pointed out in the introduction of this article. It is so much easier to let some one else do the work and so assume power.

GOVERNMENTAL DEPARTMENTS

In our system of government, three distinct departments are recognized. The legislative, which makes the law; the judicial, which interprets the law; and the executive, which enforces the law.

The word monarchy is derived from the two Greek words monos, alone, and archein, to govern. There are the two classes at least, the limited and the absolute monarchies. The absolute monarchy, no matter by what name called, not only exercises functions, but also the judicial, and often the larger part of the legislative. Laws are issued by edicts of the king or emperor. They are enforced by courts, of which he is the supreme court of appeal. Even to-day, in England, in theory, the minister represents the king in the legislative department, and no law of general nature can be introduced except with the sanction of the minister. But in fact the House of Commons determines whether the minister shall stand or fall, and can direct the character of bills introduced. In fact, this which was once a power has now so changed as to be a limitation on the monarch; in that he can not veto a bill, since in theory he has introduced it through his minister. Also the king originally was the sole court of chancery and the highest appellate court, but now the lord high chancellor and the keeper of the king's conscience does this work for him, and so relieves him of the mental strain.

In ancient Israel, we note many indications of a right in the people to vote on their laws and also to choose their kings. In fact, in the divine plan there was no king until the people insisted. The Book of Mormon tells us that it is unusual for the majority of the people to desire wrong, and Mosiah strongly advises his people against having a king. He well states the situation. (Although we may first admit that a good king, so far as government is concerned, is very efficient instrument of government, but the trouble is to get good kings.) When a bad king once assumes authority, the people mourn. Then there is the added feature, that even though called the kingdom of God his plan is for the development of mankind. In an absolute monarchy, however, good people lose interest in the science of government and retrograde.

It is because England had poor kings in the early days that a parliament became established, and gradually gained strength.

It is because France had good and wise kings in the earlier period of its history that the absolute monarchy became so thoroughly established that in the days of Louis XIV he made the apt and true remark "L'etat, c'est moi" ("the state, it is I"). If he wanted a million dollars, he only had to ask for it in the morning to have it by evening, no matter how the people suffered; and so the basis was laid for the revolt, which brought the French Revolution.

Yet there must be some good in the monarchical form of government, or else our heavenly Father would not establish a "kingdom" of heaven, nor would he make kings and priests. What it is, we shall discuss further in a later paper.

THE CHURCH OF CHRIST--WHAT IS IT?

Upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. . . . And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.—Matthew 16: 18, 19.

Are the "Church of Christ" and the "kingdom of heaven" synonymous? That is, expressing the same thing, conveying the same idea? We rarely find two words precisely synonymous; wave and billow are sometimes synonymous, but not always: "When we speak of the large rolling swell of the sea, we may call it a wave or a billow; but when we speak of the small swell of the pond, we may call it a wave, but we may not call it a billow."—Webster.

We are compelled to answer yes, to the same extent at least that the swell of the pond and the swell of the sea are synonymous, the one is at least an exact representation of the other, if only in a miniature form.

PILLAR AND GROUND OF TRUTH

When Jesus said, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness," he intended to present to the world the church of God, which in the language of the Apostle Paul, "is the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth." It is through the truth that men are to be sanctified, perfected, and saved; and the Psalmist David expressed beautifully the strength and the source of truth when he said:

I waited patiently for the Lord; and he inclined unto me, and heard my cry. He brought me up also out of a horrible pit, and out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings.—Psalm 40: 1, 2.

The horrible pit is undoubtedly the lost and helpless condition of darkness that man finds himself bound in, and is absolutely helpless to eradicate himself from; and recognizing in the Lord all power to save, David cried unto the Lord, the source of help and strength, and he heard, and set his feet upon a rock, the rock of eternal truth, and established his goings, in harmony with the golden rule of truth.

This is the same rock upon which Christ built the church, and made it (the church) the pillar and ground of the truth, that is, the supporter, that which sustains or upholds, that on which some superstructure rests; region, territory; therefore the church is the heavenly ground, territory, in which is found the eternal truth upon which the great superstructure or individualism, or the "new man," is builded; the only means by which the average man may be developed physically, socially, mentally, and morally so that he shall be able to meet all the demands of this complex age and ripen a soul for eternity. When the Psalmist found the rock, he said out of the effulgence of his heart, "And he hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God; many shall see it, and fear and shall trust in the Lord." (Psalm 40:3.) That is, many were to see, understand the truth, reverence it, and be made to feel the strength of God's love through trust in the Lord.

The church of Christ is the life-giving soil in which we grow to perfection and ripen in holiness for the spiritual kingdom, which is but the sequence of the work accomplished through the church on the earth.

For thou, Lord, hast made me glad through thy works: I will triumph in the works of thy hands. O Lord, how great are thy works! and thy thoughts are very deep.—Psalm 92:4.

The righteous shall flourish like the palm tree: he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon. Those that be planted in the house of the Lord shall flourish in the courts of our God. They shall still bring forth fruit in old age; they shall be fat and flourishing.—Psalm 92:12-14.

STAGE OF CHURCH DEVELOPMENT

There is no question but that the Psalmist uses the word house synonymously with "church," or "kingdom," the region, territory, where all the elements essential to a growth in righteousness are to be found, that we might be clothed in the livery of heaven and fitted to enjoy all the splendors of the "courts of God," the fullness of the completed church or kingdom of God, when we shall become a part of the retinue that shall march with Christ the great king into the presence of God the Father, and shall flourish in his courts.

This is why the Savior said to the world, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness." Make this your first duty, that you may become "fat and flourishing," and still bring forth fruit in old age; to show that the Lord is upright; he is the rock, and there is no unrighteousness in him.

We have heard it said that the church is the kingdom of God, in its embryonic state. Is it not more than this? I am persuaded that it is possible that the kingdom of God may reach this stage of life in the heart of the individual and be tacitly set up in the human soul. Embryon: In physiology, "The first rudiments of an animal in the womb, before the several members are distinctly formed; after which it is called a fetus." Is not the church in the fetus state or stage of development? The Lord has a time when, a place where, and a means by which he blesses and saves his people. The time when, is when the seeds of truth find lodgment in our hearts, and develop into life, through faith, the kingdom of God in its embryonic state is set up in the environment of the human soul, strengthened and nourished through the law of assimilation, until it is developed to the state of birth, or the taking on of form, and becomes as a result of the development of these seeds of truth the rock upon which the kingdom of God is built, fit material for the kingdom in its fetus state, the church, which is yet but the partially developed kingdom of God. But it has not had its final birth into the perfect environment and conditions of the spiritual kingdom when God and Christ shall rule in person, and perfection shall obtain. Fetus: "The young of viviparous animals in the womb, and of oviparous animals in the egg, after it is perfectly formed, before which time it is called embryo."

CHURCH ENVIRONMENT

Jesus Christ said, "Upon this rock I will build my church." The rock of truth, or revealed truth. I, as a direct curate of God, will place in tangible form this church or kingdom, which is to have the power of procreation, and become the procreator of spiritual life. So Christ took of those that had received the seed of truth, the souls in which the kingdom existed in its embryonic state, as he could not use dead material in the further evolution of life, and introduced them into the broader elements and environments of life, known as the church or kingdom of God; and while still shut up under the fetters of mortality, and the limits of human necessity, it took on a tangible form, such form as it will retain, but under the law of evolution will develop to the perfect strength, and ineffable splendor of its triumphant state.

In our mind's eye we have a picture of this kingdom in its developing stages and dispensations. Paul said:

I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service.

This sacrifice was to be a living sacrifice, one in which the life of the kingdom of God existed, and to be acceptable unto God, because it was holy. Does that mean this body as it is? Take me Lord, as I am, all this body, together with all its carnal desires, and its corrupt practices? Holy innocence is whole, entire, complete, sound, unimpaired. Properly, whole, entire, perfect, in a moral sense. Hence, pure in heart, temper, or disposition; free from sin and sinful affections. This is the condition in which we are to be presented to God, and the conditions upon which he will accept of the offering, or sacrifice. And now in order that we might grow to this condition of perfection, he points us to the efficacy of the church of Christ, the kingdom of God, the house of the Lord, in which if we are planted we shall grow to prosper in the presence of God.

Now the kingdom, the church, has taken on form in that Jesus became the head over all things to the church, which is his body; but as the husband is the head of the wife, even so is Christ the head of the church, and he is the Savior of the body, the church. As the woman was taken out of man, and became a helpmate, and through this union and the law of procreation man became a procreator of natural life; so under the direction of God, through Christ, the church took on tangible form, just such form as the kingdom will present in its perfected state, and Christ set in the church, apostles, prophets, sevens, high priests, bishops, elders, priests, teachers, deacons, etc., and called it the bride, the Lamb's wife, and through this union and the law of procreation the church became the procreator of spiritual life. And as the oviparous animal in the egg develops through the embryo state to the fetus, and when its parts are perfectly formed it receives its birth into the broader conditions and developments of life and perfection.

So the church is destined to help us to that state of perfection through which we shall pass from death unto life, and form within us that spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead; and if that spirit dwell in us it shall also quicken our mortal bodies, and we shall have a birth or resurrection into the spiritual kingdom of God in its triumphant state.

THE UNFOLDING CHURCH

Disraeli said: "I recognize in the church an institution thoroughly and sincerely catholic, adapted to all climes and to all ages."

In this I find my broadest and deepest conception of the church of Christ. I believe it to be a plant of God's own planting, whose strength and power was the strength and power of infinite wisdom, a wisdom so vast as to take in the deeds and requirements of the developing races through all the ages yet to come. So continuity of the church is assured. She must not decrease in power and importance; she must not lose any of her symmetry or perfection, but under the fostering care of a loving Savior, of whom it is said, He loved the church, and gave himself for it; that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, that he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish.

Listen dear readers, Christ, the loving Savior, gave his life to the institution of his love and admiration. He called into service in all ages the strongest and the noblest of the sons of God that through them the church and the truths which she contains should be perpetuated. These men, true to their trust, with a living sense of the sacredness of the confidence imposed, and of the never dying value of the life giving power to be found alone in this "holy ground," this "territory," this "region" of heavenly strength and beauty, gladly gave their lives as a sacrifice upon the altar of service and devotion that her truths might be perpetuated. And who shall say that after all this sacrifice, after all this expenditure of divine wisdom and human life, called forth to the beginning and completion of a thing of beauty, absolutely unique, when it has reached this stage of perfection, where human wisdom fails us and she becomes ineffable—shall it be set aside and be superceded and forgotten? Shall she not as a result of her preparation and her development, her growth, simply open up to a perfect environment, and receive her husband and her Father into everlasting converse, together with the millions of her subjects who have gone on before, and who through her inherent powers have grown to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ, and became heirs to celestial life?

These men that have in all ages sacrificed their lives for the truth have not done so in ignorance. They went to the fountain. They drank. They felt the thrill and sensed the life. They heard the call of the Leader and Commander. They followed the straight and narrow way. They loved, obeyed, were enlightened, tasted the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, tasted of the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, and because of this unerring evidence of the value of the truth of the principles sustained by the church they readily gave their lives for it.

For who knows not that truth is strong, next to the Almighty; she needs no politics, nor stratagems, nor licensings to make her victorious; those are the shifts and the defenses that error uses against her power; give her but room, and bind her not when she sleeps.—Milton.

It was this knowledge of truth, this reception of unerring power that has made the sacrifice of the ages possible; and after all the reverses, all the periodical defeats, she still survives, and still holds out to the hearts, the hands, and the feet, that have spurned her love and power, have ruthlessly destroyed, and fearlessly trampled her beauty beneath her feet, the power of life, and in the heavenly language of her King says:

Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls.

In Christ is found all the enduring, eternal elements of life and rest, and Christ is found in the church; therefore Paul said to the Gentiles, At one time ye were without God in the world, but now through Christ (God brought to the world), or in Christ, ye who were afar off are made nigh by the blood of Christ, who came and preached peace unto all, for through him all have access by one spirit unto the Father. Therefore, we are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow citizens with the saints (both here and hereafter), and of the household of God. Builded together for the habitation of God through the Spirit, God to abide with us through the Spirit, in this organized state known as the church, until under its expression of divine wisdom and power she shall grow to perfection and be prepared to receive her king, in her perfectly kingly state.

SERVICE THROUGH THE CHURCH

To what extent have our hearts been drawn out in love and sacrifice to the church? To what extent are we endeavoring to make ourselves serviceable to humanity through the church? One of the poets has said:

Thou must be true thyself,
If thou the truth wouldst teach;
Thy soul must overflow, if thou
Another's soul wouldst reach!
It needs the overflow of heart
To give the lips full speech.

Think truly, and thy thoughts
Shall the world's famine feed;
Speak truly, and each word of thine
Shall be a fruitful seed;
Live truly, and thy life shall be
A great and noble creed.

If this condition shall obtain in us it will be because the mind of Christ shall be found in us as an indwelling power and strength, that shall not only help us to be followers of Christ, but be as Christ. Will you all help me in spirit to sing:

Jesus, my Savior true,
Guide me to thee;
Help me thy will to do,
Guide me to thee;
E'en in the darkest night,
As in the morning bright,
Be thou my beacon light,
Guide me to thee.

Through this dark world of strife
Guide me to thee;
Teach me a better life,
Guide me to thee;

Let thy redeeming power
Be with me every hour,
Be thou my safety tower,
Guide me to thee.

May God help us to love Christ, and love the church, as Christ loved the church and gave himself for it, is my prayer. WARD L. CHRISTY.

A NOTE OF WARNING

CARE FOR THE YOUNG

Let him who is warned, warn each his neighbor!

We desire to raise a voice of warning clear enough, loud enough, and long enough to be heard by the parents of many communities; and heard, moreover, by the "ears that hear!" Christ found too many about him in the same comatose state, as we are finding to-day: "having eyes to see, they see not; having ears to hear, they hear not!" That is not the kind of audience we wish at this time, for we deem the matter of too great importance, and too vital in its bearing upon the life of the church, to be intrusted only to the attention of the deaf, the dumb, or the blind in our midst.

It is about our young people,—our hope of Zion, upon whom rests all our plans and aspirations for the salvation and upbuilding of the waste places. And right here let us remark that all the waste places of earth are not found in the deserts of the far East! Wherever darkness and low ideals are governing the lives and habits of people,—even our own,—there are waste places,—empty lots, barren ground, which might all, with care and effort on our parts, be turned into fruitful fields.

A COMMON PROBLEM

The problem is the same everywhere. Our young people, speaking of them as a mass and not as units, are not concerning themselves about the "Father's business." They are not lining up on the side of active, constructive right. They are not busying themselves with the affairs of the church, nor do they inform themselves about its problems or its undertakings. This is as much to be deplored as it is true, and that it is a fact no one who has taken the trouble to inform himself concerning the conditions will attempt to deny.

Some may say, "Well, our young people are preached to enough; they should know better than to let the things of the world crowd out their interests in the church!" Granted. Our children have heard a great many don'ts and musn'ts, and perhaps they do know better; but we have to deal, not with the ideal and wished-for situation, but with things as they are! True, many sermons are preached upon the evils and the dangers of the day, and many pastors and teachers of our young are very puritanical in their constant restraint and repression. Many things are singled out, one after another, and the young solemnly warned to leave them alone, and warned against doing this or that. But what we are firmly convinced in the matter is that what our young people need is not so much repression as guidance! Not so much a restrictive doctrine, as a constructive one! It is not enough to say, "You must not work there!" Our better policy would be to turn squarely around and say, "Come! walk here!"

We point out to other church members the flaws and the fallacies of their creeds and beliefs. How many converts to our faith do you think we would make did we not follow up that step with the kindly pointing to the light, "See! here is truth!" and the gentle invitation, "Come; let us reason together"? How many of us are as careful with our children? How many of us shake our heads and say, "No, you must not do that," and forget to add, "But you may do this, which you will soon see will bring you the greater happiness"?

AWAKE TO DANGERS

Oh, ye Saints, and ye parents, and all who have a young soul in keeping, as well as all who can reach out a helping hand to a stumbling child! Awake to the dangers! Awake, to do battle with all the powers at your command, against the enemies of our young! Open your eyes to all evil even when cloaked in the guise of innocence! Try to see that while many of the picture shows, for instance, are educational and uplifting, there are many more that are demoralizing and degrading in the influence and effect they have upon the impressionable minds of the youth.

As soon should a child be turned loose with a lot of "yellow-back," dime novels to read, with the hope that his innocence and inexperience shall guide him safely through their turbid depths, as to expect him to attend these cheap pictures, with their bandits, their robberies and intrigue, their murders and abductions, their train-wreckings and infidelities, and be able to sift out the good, if any there could be in such a company, and to eliminate the evil, banish the low suggestions, and put aside the daring thoughts which they engender!

Wake up, and realize, if indeed any of us can, the extent to which these things are forming the ideals and the incentives in the lives of our children! We groan because our children are not spiritual,—that they have low tastes and low ideals,—that they surprise us and disappoint us by acts of disobedience and misconduct, and yet we go on, shoveling out the nickels and dimes for them to imbibe still more at the fount of their education, and think our duty is done when we say, "Now be a good boy, and come home early!"

A TIME OF ACTION

Have we forgotten that youth, being a time of action (and it is only an abnormal child which does not thrive upon activity and busy-ness ( and needs to have pointed out to it safe outlets for that impulse? Have we realized what a real asset to ourselves as well as to the church this very activity may become? Many and many a problem of "How?" and "By whom?" would be easily solved if we but rightly valued the real help that is at hand in the young people. Given direction and guidance, their impetus will carry them, and us with them, into the realms of achievement in an incredibly short time.

Our young folk are not depraved entirely, nor all bad,—not yet! Their hearts are right, and their desires are to be and do good; but they are simply being left to themselves to find their own safe paths; to mark out their own course, in compassless and rudderless bewilderment! Temptations are about them, much greater and more numerous than at any previous time of the world. As parents, we seem asleep to these dangers, so far as getting out and meeting them on their own grounds concerned,—the only way effectual battle can be waged against them. We have, alas, felt that we were doing our full duty when we cried, "Wolf!" or "Shame!" and then went our own quiet ways, to church and to prayer-meeting, and what not, and left our young people to find their own amusements, and to decide many of life's questions by themselves; and then we wonder at their mistakes!

A CASE IN POINT

A certain good (?) brother thinks that a young girl should have no male friends at all. He is determined that no girl of his shall be silly enough to have a "beau"! The girl is not allowed to bring her boy friends into her home, nor is she allowed to go to other girls' homes where this careful (?) brother imagines such a pernicious thing is encouraged or permitted. He goes to church regularly, and is not averse to expressing himself in strong terms about the degeneracy of the times.

This girl, in whom God, through the divinely-appointed laws of nature is awakening the purest and noblest of human emotions, upon which the continuance and the happiness of the race depends, and who but dimly understands the meaning of her newly-awakened interest in the opposite sex and her desire for its society, we say this girl, who needs now if ever, the intelligent sympathy and wise guidance of loving parents, deprived of these, denied the legitimate association she craves, through its rightful and God-approved channel—the home—steals away from that house (for can we call it a home?), and taking the street car, finds her way alone, or in the company of some other rebellious soul, out to the public dance hall, there to be accosted by strangers, led into the dance, out for a walk, or—but let us not harrow our imaginations further! God alone, with his pitying angels, can keep that girl from going wrong, thrown as she is upon her own experience and ignorance!

And her "Christian" father at home asleep, in his self-righteousness knowing no alarms, believing himself to be an example of wisdom and prudence, making "no compromise" with sin, and "bringing up his children in the way they should go!" Oh, blind and foolish! If the boys and girls of such a father are saved to the church and to lives of morality and honor, it will be in spite of, and not because of their parents—who should be the guides, and not the jailers, of the precious spirits intrusted to their care! Let us add that this is not an imaginary, nor an isolated case.

LET US GET BUSY

Let us arouse to the dangers that threaten our young,—dangers from within as well as without the home; dangers which originate in lack of sympathy and mutual interests, from an attitude of harshness and "snap judgment" on the part of those who should begrudge neither time, effort, nor money if necessary, to keep their children close to them in the formative years of their lives and education. The paths are slippery enough. Let us not add to their unsafety by withholding our close and tender sympathy, that will ever seek to provide proper outlets for their natural tendencies; that will never say "nay" without substituting a "yes" in its place; that will put away our own quiet hour with a loved book or friend, and devote the time to the restless and otherwise anchorless activities of the young ones whose welfare is dearer to us than anything else in the whole world! Can we for one moment consider seriously the mud they track in, the noise or confusion they make, or the sacrifice of our own concerns, when they, and their safety are in the balance on the other side? No! and we are glad to believe that only through thoughtfulness on our part have things been brought to this pass,—that we have, through habit and custom, been drifting along, feeling secure in our own safety, and not recognizing that all is not so well with our children.

But now that we are waking up, that we find that while we slept the archenemy of our souls has not been idle, surely we will rise as one body, and, putting aside all thoughts of self, of ease or comfort, of criticism or reproach, get busy, and do something about it! Look around, or right in our own homes! The need is everywhere! We have only to open our eyes, and the opportunities to do, and to help, multiply upon our vision with startling rapidity! Gather your boys and girls, and their friends, about you; open wide your doors with a heart-welcome to these unfolding flowers; give them good times,—healthy, helpful and happy amusements and employments, not forgetting plenty of real hard work! Have debating teams for those competitive spirits; have athletics; have study clubs; have little home dramatics; take them to inspect industrial and manufacturing plants; teach the girls to sew, crochet or embroider, reading to them meanwhile from some good book that will help them to broader and higher ideals of life. Take them all out to study the great book of nature; the birds, the flowers or the trees; take them to visit places of historical or other interest; form them into singing classes; teach them the melody of poetry, the beauty of clouds, of sunrise and sunset; or the music of eloquence in book or lecture; form civic clubs, and town organizations, where they may learn their work as units, (but oh, what important units!) in the welfare of the community.

We have only touched the outside of the suggestions and ideas which will come in abundance to the thinker, as possibilities which may be turned into actualities by anyone who brings to the task the love and the unselfish consecration which is necessary to acceptable work in any field. We just must awake to action upon these things if we are able to meet successfully the attacks that are being made upon our ranks by the forces of evil!

May God, to whom we must look for guidance in all things, so help and inspire us that we shall be no longer idle hearers, but doers of his will in regard to all matters of such grave importance as this which we have been thus trying to bring before you!

AUDENTIA ANDERSON.

Of General Interest

THE CROCKER LAND EXPEDITION

On June 24, 1906, explorer Peary thought he saw through glasses from a mountain peak in Grant Land "the faint white summits of a distant land," which he named Crocker Land, and which has since made its appearance, with or without a note of interrogation, on most maps of the Arctic regions. In fact, the belief has prevailed rather widely that Peary saw the eastern margin of a vast continent or archipelago, filling most of the area that is now blank on Arctic maps.

In the autumn of 1913, when Vilkitskii's discovery of Nicholas II Land, near the Siberian coast, was announced, certain wild statements were published in the newspapers as to the probability of this discovery constituting part of the hypothetical continent, although reference to a map of the routes followed by polar explorers would have shown the authors of these statements that, if they were correct, Nansen's expedition in the Fram must have drifted over dry land.

In July, 1913, an American expedition sailed from New York with the object of visiting and exploring Crocker Land. It was backed, financially and otherwise, by a number of institutions and individuals, but especially by the American Museum of Natural History, and was commanded by Donald B. MacMillan. This party spent the winter of 1913-14 at Etah, Greenland, and in the following spring a sledging expedition was made by the leader and Ensign Fitzhugh Green, U. S. N., over the sea ice to a distance of one hundred and twenty-five miles northwest of Cape Thomas Hubbard, i. e., to the supposed location of Crocker Land. The main results of this journey have just reached the world, the principal one being that Crocker Land does not exist.

The sledge journey occupied two months, and appears to have been exceptionally difficult and dangerous. All details now available were published on November 25 in the New York Tribune, which is the accredited mouthpiece of the expedition. The news came by a somewhat indirect route, and not from MacMillan himself, whose narrative will probably not reach this country until next April or May, unless the attempts which the expedition has been making to send wireless messages from its base at Etah should prove successful before that time.

It is understood that this expedition, the only one from the United States now engaged in polar exploration, will henceforth concentrate its energies upon a journey into the interior of Greenland.—Scientific American, December 12, 1914.

RUSSIA SAVES UNDER PROHIBITION

London, January 25.—A dispatch to Reuter's Telegram Company from Petrograd says M. Kharitonoff, comptroller of the Russian treasury, speaking before the дума budget committee to-day, declared that owing to the great increase in the national savings, due to prohibition, the extraordinary outlay occasioned by the war had caused no great suffering as yet in Russia.

As proof of this, M. Kharitonoff said the national savings in December, 1913, which amounted to 700,000 rubles ($350,000) had increased to 29,100,000 rubles ($14,550,000) in December, 1914. He added that the total savings for 1913 amounted to 34,000,000 rubles ($17,000,000), as compared with 84,000,000 rubles ($42,000,000) for 1914.

Great duties are easier than the little ones, though they cost far more blood and agony.—Phillips Brooks.

Much to Encourage

How quickly the weeks fly by! Again it is time to send in the copy for our music department, and we are very pleased and thankful that we have in our hands several really helpful and encouraging articles. An editor is delighted with assurances that the material he is bringing before his readers is that which is satisfying to them and that which will prove helpful.

It has been our happy lot to receive of late a few letters of more than ordinary appreciation, and this has helped to confirm us in the thought that the cause of music is one which God is pleased to have us champion. This assurance gives us encouragement, and we feel that we are engaged in a good work, feeble and erring as may be our attempts to accomplish it.

One sister writes that she has found much uplift from the little sketches concerning well-known hymns; that they seem to have a deeper significance to her, and that a power for good seems to accompany their singing. She made these comments the burden of her testimony at a recent prayer service, giving a little description of the writing of "Abide with me," so well told by Sister Short in our last issue. At the close of the testimony a brother started the hymn, and a very recognizable power attended its singing! This is very gratifying, for it clearly points out to us one very efficient channel through which God designs our uplifting experiences to come to us. Brother Bond, in his excellent article in this number, emphasizes this conclusion.

We hear of Lamoni's enthusiastic preparations for the success of the conference music. That is good, and inspiring, and augurs well for a triumph in April. Independence, too, is bending every energy to the task of sending representative choir workers there, capable of helping to swell the united chorus of praise. Other choirs are not behind in this, and we know there are many isolated ones who are doing well in preparing themselves to take their places there.

We have heard nothing but words of praise and appreciation for the selections contained in the serial for 1915. Some of the numbers are real gems, and all are fine additions to the repertoire of any choir. Equally united are the expressions heard concerning the cantata. Its choruses are not difficult, and being very melodious are easily grasped by the average musician. We are looking forward to a great stimulus to be given the work through the mediums chosen for this year, backed by the earnest preparation so many are putting upon them.

We would like, here and now, to make a special request that anyone who has an idea or suggestion which he would like to see carried out in regard to our combined choir movement, or the work of the Staff, or the mission of music in general, will please pass on to us that idea or suggestion. "In many minds there is wisdom," it is said, and we feel that there are many who are in a position to see some things we are not, and we humbly ask the help of such. We want to make this column, as well as the general cause of music throughout the church, as valuable and helpful as possible, and we feel that to do that we must have the cooperation and the assistance of every willing and capable person interested.

Remember, the door is open to all! Come in, and find a heart-welcome!

The Power of Music

Some philosopher has said, "I would rather appreciate the things that I do not have, than to have the things I do not appreciate."

The writer makes no claim to being a musician, but is willing to assert that he is, in a measurable sense at least, capable of an appreciation of the value of music and of song when given in understandable terms.

Shakespeare said, "That man who hath not music in his soul, and is not moved by concord of sweet sounds, is fit for treason, strategem and spoils." It may be said that this is too severe an arraignment of the man who has little or no interest in or passion for music; yet, remembering what Carlyle has said, "The soul of all Nature's utterances is perfect music," and in harmony with this thought, we are forced to conclude that it is true that the man who has no inherited or acquired passion for music, is, to a large extent, out of harmony with that environment which the Creator has designed to accomplish the soul's highest development. The indorsement of this position is found in the command, through inspiration, to "cultivate the gifts of music and of song," which amounts to the force of an argument that we had failed to recognize the value of music in the gospel propaganda.

Music may be used to stimulate "war and its alarms," perhaps in a holy or justifiable cause; yet its possibilities for evil must be conceded also, as when it lends its powerful influence to lead men to destroy and lay waste for conquest or vengeance, or to develop the slumbering forces of the brute in man. In its better service, as we have already quoted, "Music hath charms to sooth the savage breast"; and its influence is reflected in gospel associations, as when the most wonderful proclamation ever brought to this world of ours, where sin and its product hold sway, was sounded by a choir from another world—that fadeless song of "Peace on earth, good will to men"! The shepherds, listening, rejoiced in the appropriation and absorption of that song and that message so far as their education and powers of appreciation permitted—wonderful "melody divine," which mortals as yet, generally speaking, have not been privileged since to hear, but towards which, according to our fine ideals, we may hope we are tending!

We have listened in the past to our choir in the Stone Church in Independence, and to the efforts of our musicians, young and old, and have thought of Brother Hoxie, Sister Anderson and others, and of their vicarious and effective work, combined with the tireless and unselfish support given them, and we have felt in our soul a sense of exhilaration and gratitude to God, that forces have been set in motion, and plans inaugurated, which have started the church at an accelerated pace, towards him and the "choir invisible," which is, as yet, to our mortal and beclouded vision behind the veil. We have wondered if at some distant day we should be privileged to listen to a union of these Independence voices with those of another world! Why not? So might it be, and let all the people say, "Amen"! for can we not conceive that, when the prayer of our divine Lord shall have had its complete answer, and his "kingdom" shall have "come" in any complete sense, the heavenly hosts will bring their choirs along with them, and the voices of earth and of heaven shall unite to sing the praises of the Eternal?

Since the appearance of the Staff in the columns of the HERALD, we have missed no opportunity to read the splendid articles, and to notice the rare gifts displayed by the various writers upon the subject of music. We have rejoiced in the jewels of thought contained in such soul-sensitive expressions as are to be found in the late article from the pen of Sister Lorena Leeka, if she will pardon the personal allusion. There are many others, too, but we felt strongly the spirit and force of this one. Have you read her "Art of expression" in HERALD of December 23? No? We were afraid not! Well, get after it, and try to understand! You will begin to grow! Note what she says in the eighth paragraph, "One soul can never reveal adequately to another its conception of the highest ideals except by suggesting them through the medium of art." "Some form of art is required to express the deeper relations; the soul's questions can not be answered with mere words; therefore we have been commanded to cultivate the gifts of music and of song, through which we may express more adequately the exalted state of the spirit."

Go back to Bethlehem and the plain! The heavens are resplendent with the jewels of God, the larger jewel in their midst, that in its movement led the magi to the Christ! And then imagine, if you can, that wonderful proclamation without its music! Imagine a strong-lunged, loud-monotoned angel single-voiced, through a large megaphone shouting, "Glory to God in the highest," etc.!

Most clearly, to our mind, has God designed that man can never be perfected in estate or condition without the soul-elevating and uplifting ministry of music and of song. Where these are not, heaven, as an understandable or complete term, does not exist. Their inevitable tendency, when rightly understood and properly interpreted, is designed to refine, and to purge the souls of men and women of all desire for carnal pleasure, and to lift them from the slough and mire of sensualism and wrong to the plane of real delight in all things that are holy and pure.

Ruskin has said, "A pure or holy state of anything is that in which all its parts are helpful and consistent." Is this not true? Then let us not fail to heed the advice and counsel to cultivate, encourage, and learn to place true values upon music and song. If "the song of the righteous is a prayer unto God," then may we not, under that interpretation which the Spirit alone can give, proclaim our gospel evangel from the choir loft as well as from the pulpit, thus combining the forces that God has commanded or suggested to be employed in the effort to redeem mankind from the bondage and curse of sin, and ultimate relief from the burden of its awful consequences?

Hymns We Love

"Awake, my soul, in joyful lays,
And sing thy great Redeemer's praise."

There comes, at times, into all our lives, an almost overwhelming realization of the goodness and loving-kindness of God toward us, and a corresponding sense of our own unworthiness. During such an experience, this joyous hymn of praise was written by Samuel Medley, of Hertfordshire, England. A better understanding of its origin will be gained by a brief sketch of his life.

He was born in 1738, and in his early youth received much religious instruction from both his pious father and grandfather, and was the object of many earnest prayers. All this teaching made no apparent impression upon him, however, and at the age of eighteen he entered the navy, where he led a profligate life. At one time he was wounded very seriously. "I am afraid," said the surgeon, "that amputation is the only thing that will save your life—I can tell to-morrow morning."

With the fateful words of the surgeon sounding in his ears, with disaster threatening him, and far from home, the teachings there received and the prayers that had been offered in his behalf came to his remembrance. In his extremity he turned to the God of his fathers, whose help was so sorely needed. Almost the entire night was spent in prayer. The next morning, to the surprise of the surgeon, such a favorable change had taken place that he said, "This is little short of a miracle!"

Young Medley resolved henceforth to lead a different life, but on his recovery fell into careless ways, forgot his good resolutions, and drifted back into his old ways of living.

Upon returning to his home, he again was given many admonitions and warnings. One Sabbath evening he asked a servant if his grandfather was going out to church. "No," was the answer, "he is coming to read a sermon to you."

"A sermon to me?" replied Medley, "he had better be anywhere else."

The sermon was one by Doctor Watts, from Isaiah 42: 6, 7. He listened to it at first with indifference, but his heart at last began to melt, and he was led to see the wonderful forbearance of God. The aged man left him without comment. After a reverie in which the young man traced his past wanderings, and thought with deep regret of his failure to keep the vows he had made in time of trouble, he fell upon his knees and turned again in supplication to God, asking forgiveness for his ingratitude. The love and long-suffering of Christ dawned upon him, and filled him with the assurance that his prayer of contrition was accepted. Then he could truly say,

"He justly claims a song from thee;
His loving-kindness, O, how free!"

The entire hymn is an expression of this blessed experience; nor did he again grow neglectful, recognizing that this was indeed the turning point of his life. He entered the ministry and was faithful to his calling unto the end, thus fulfilling his wish,

"Oh, may my last expiring breath
His loving-kindness sing in death!"

It will interest the Saints to know that this hymn was the favorite one of Joseph Smith, the Seer, and he was more often heard singing this than any other.

Masters of Music

LUDWIG VON BEETHOVEN

The world has come, through much experience and observation, to a full acceptance of the philosophy of compensation as taught by Emerson. The unconquerable will of a crippled Loyola, founder of the Jesuits; the majestic poetry of a blind Milton; the matchless literary charm of a consumptive Stevenson; or the haunting melodies of a deaf Beethoven,—these were examples enough, among the many, to prove that where an unkind Fate deprives man of any of life's sweetest gifts, Nature heals o'er the hurt with other blessings unmeasured. It is only one more statement of the law: that man is not a victim of circumstances, but always a favorite of them,—if he wills it so.

To each nation it is given to become the patron goddess of some art. Greece was the home of sculpture, and her models in stone and bronze will stand for all time as the highest achievement in line and proportion; Italy, with its golden age of painting, has been the teacher and inspiration of many nations, and through its influence on the Dutch alone will always be remembered; and in like manner it was given to Germany to first speak forth the soul of man in music. Music is the youngest of the arts, and already the richest of them. To the development of this art, Germany has contributed more than any other nation, and has given the world nine of its every ten great composers. This is the fourth in our series, all of them Germans.

Ludwig Von Beethoven was born in Bonn, Germany, December 16, 1779. Neither his birth nor his childhood were auspicious of genius. His father, while an indifferent musician, was also a drunkard, and instead of the harmony that might have been in the little home, even though it were poor, there was the discord of drunken curses. This was little Beethoven's first experience in a bitter world, but he grew and developed as nature would have him, despite it all.

His father, if a drinker, was also mercenary, and trained his son for music, as one would train a horse for driving,—to make money. The boy learned fast under the hard and tedious training, and—a gratifying promise to his father—won favor in every company, by his precocity and skill. When but a very young boy, he was bundled up by some musician and taken off to Vienna to play for Mozart, and to get a prophecy for his future. Mozart received him kindly, heard him play, but did not far commit himself in regard to the future.

A few years more back at home, driven by his father to unsuccessful teaching, and by his own inclination busy at study, and then we find him again at Vienna, this time with Haydn teaching him the piano. Haydn was a great teacher, but his young pupil did not take to him kindly. Beethoven seemed to learn more by intuition than from his instructor, and constantly wandered aside from directions. Genius was in him, and it grew according to its own nature. His gift was distinctive, and could not be crowded into set lines.

In a short time Beethoven had won favor for himself, and had a circle of friends about him who gave him much praise and encouragement. He was a marvel at improvising, and his erratic playing gave great interest to his concerts. It was easy to persuade him to remain in Vienna—there was little enough to call him home—and he took up permanent residence there among his new-found friends.

His first published work came when he was twenty-six years old, and was a trio for piano, violin and cello. Much of his work through life, one hundred and thirty pieces in all, was chamber music, though it included every other form also. Chamber music, then so popular, since so neglected, is again being taken up. The music columns are full of comment, and a great impetus is being given to this old and charming form of music. On these modern programs, the names of Mozart and Beethoven are always found.

Just at this time, when the rising young artist began to taste the sweets of life, a dreadful pall of silence fell over him; the casements of his soul were sealed up: he became deaf. It was a crushing blow, and the tragedy of it haunted him all the after years of his life. The brilliant, social Beethoven, popular in company, and a reveler in the smiles of his friends, was cut off, as by the hand of Fate, from them, and doomed to spend his days in loneliness. Even the one he loved deserted him in his time of need, and no woman's hand ever ministered to his bruised spirit. He remained a bachelor for life. Not until his will was read was he fully understood, and the following extract from it gives the true measure of his sorrow:

"Ye men who believe or say that I am inimical, rough or misanthropical, how unjust are you to me in your ignorance of the secret cause of what appears to you in that light. Born with a fiery, lively temper, and susceptible to the enjoyment of society, I have been early compelled to isolate myself and to lead a lonely life; whenever I tried to overcome this isolation, oh, how doubly bitter was the then sad experience of my bad hearing, which repelled me again; and yet it was impossible for me to tell people: 'Speak louder; shout, for I am deaf.'"

But while he lost, he gained. Cut off from the sound of a busy life around him, his ears were attuned to a higher melody. His hungry soul drank at another fountain, and it was the fountain of nature.

It is said that Beethoven wandered about much in the open country, and loved the fields and long roads. He felt free there, and could breathe deep of the pure air. He could muse to himself, or sing aloud at will, and not be subjected to the humiliation of his deafness. The music that he received thus through inspiration of the great outdoors he tried always to imprison in notes. His best compositions were the result. "The moonlight sonata," best known and most loved perhaps of all his music, was inspired by a night spent by the master out from the city, with the snow on the ground and the moon illumining all the wonderful scene with its magic light.

March 17, 1827, Beethoven died, and was buried in Vienna. His life had finished its rich service to the world, and was happier to be at an end. But he was not to die away into forgetfulness. His influence was to be deeply incarnated in another, and in Richard Wagner the world was to find one who had the spirit of Beethoven, and one who, inspired by that spirit, could carry his master's art to yet higher achievement.

Musical Notes

The first number of a new publication, The Musical Quarterly, was published by Schirmer on January 1, edited by O. G. Sonneck. The first article is by Waldo S. Pratt, entitled, "On behalf of musicology," a new word meaning "the science of music," but which is admittedly not to be found in Grove's, or any other dictionary of music—as yet. The subject is interestingly divided into musical physics, musical psychics, and musical poetics, musical æsthetics, musical graphics, musical technics, and musical practices, given in sequence. The writer concludes that no one person can hope to fully master all branches of musicology. The issue also includes an illustrated article on "The measurement of musical talent."

The February Etude offers a series of prizes for four classes of piano pieces, with four prizes ranging from twenty dollars to eighty dollars for each class. The contest closes July 1, 1915.

A genuine Cremona violin has recently been discovered in the hands of an Italian coal miner, who had it in the coal mines more than thirty years at Cumberland, Maryland, and offered it for a four-dollar-and-seventy-cent grocery bill, but was refused because it was so old, it is said.

The Milwaukee Insane Asylum has purchased a fine orchestration and placed it in the dining hall, with the expectation that it will have a beneficial effect upon the demented inmates there, as such effects have been noticed in various instances in the past.

It is announced that President Wilson's daughter, Margaret Woodrow Wilson, will sing at the coming May festival in Syracuse, the proceeds to be donated to the Home for the Blind and the Library for the Blind, in Washington. It will be her first public appearance.

The Emporia, Illinois, State Normal School plans to give musical instruction to all public school children, in the future, instead of to the few. The pupils will be divided into classes, the lessons to be supplemented by individual practice. In this way every child will have opportunity to learn music regardless of home conditions.

Independence Notes

On Sunday evening, January 24, Brother J. W. Rushton gave a very interesting lecture in the Stone Church, upon the subject of "Handel, the father of oratorio." The opening hymn by the congregation was one of Handel's, as also was the organ offertory number. After an interesting sketch of the life of the composer and a brief but comprehensive glance at the history of the time and place of his work, Brother Rushton gave an interpretative description of his best-known oratorio, the "Messiah." This was interspersed at proper intervals by solos, duet, organ and chorus numbers by the choir, and with the lovely setting Brother Rushton made for each number never were the listeners more delighted.

It is planned that more of these entertaining and educational programs will follow, the next one being an evening with Beethoven, scheduled for early in May.

Correction

In the Staff of January 20, under the title "Hymns we love," page 69, under subheading "Abide with me," third paragraph, line three, "Shelly himself," should read "he himself."

MARCH READING.—EXERCISE BY BREATHING

"There is no function of our daily life that is so essential to existence as respiration or breathing, and 'he lives most who breathes most perfectly.' . . . It is indispensable to health that the breathing apparatus should be free to vary its movements as special need in inspiration and expiration arises. . . . Robust health requires joyous activity and this very activity forms the habit of deep breathing. The baby cultivates it naturally, by crying, laughing, shouting and playing, and what we call boisterous games with children are more valuable than otherwise because they call for a continuous and greater supply of fresh air. The more exercise an adult person takes, the greater is the demand for air. Even in the state of comparative rest the need for it is very considerable, in fact, more than we realize. . . .

"Women by the wearing of stays, corsets, stiff supports and stiff clothing assail the vital energy of the body at its center, interfering with proper breathing and compressing the nerves of the part controlling the blood supply. . . .

"It has been proven that when the blood is poor in oxygen and when the vitality is low, the tubercular bacilli can be found in the blood. Increase the functional activity of the lungs and augment the oxidizing power of the blood and there will be a destruction of the bacilli even if they are to be found and this will assist in producing an antitoxin to destroy the germs. This is nature's method of protection when given a chance, especially if we add sunshine to the fresh air. . . .

"No greater mistake can be made or perpetrated on our bodies than to neglect the function of deep breathing. Diaphragmatic or abdominal breathing contains adequate means for obviating disease that already exists in different parts of the organism. . . . The cause of disease in the human body in most cases is a defect in the nutritive powers of the body. Oxidization has not been sufficiently intense in degree to eliminate the retained products and there is stagnation; autointoxication or self-poisoning ensues. Free and abundant oxidation then is needed to use up this morbid material, to burn up the coal and clear out the loaded grate of the system, so that the fire can burn brightly. . . ."

THE BREATHING MUSCLES

"The ribs or chest box are twenty-four in number, twelve on either side of the lungs, and are attached to the spinal column behind. The upper seven, known as the true ribs, are attached to the breast bone in front, while the lower five pairs are called the false or floating ribs, because they are not fastened to the breastbone, but are fastened by cartilages to the other ribs; the last two pairs have their ends free so as to give the lungs and body more freedom of expansion in every way. The thorax or part inclosed by the ribs extends from the neck to the abdomen and is occupied by the lungs and heart, and is generally called the chest. The ribs are drawn up and down in respiration by two sets of muscles called the intercostal muscles, or muscles between the ribs as the name implies, aided by the diaphragm.

"The lungs could not expand without these muscles, and if they are allowed to grow strong by proper use they tend to increase the amount of air and expansion of the lung at each respiration, and increase the vitality of the body by an increased supply of oxygen. These muscles are always illy developed in the consumptive, who is narrow-chested and has thin chest muscles. On this account a considerable portion of his muscles remains inactive and unused. Developing the intercostal and deep breathing muscles helps to equalize the circulation of the blood, and hence to better nourish the system in all its parts, as every part is dependent on a proper supply of blood. Weak and undeveloped lungs can not make use of the oxygen in the air that strong lungs can, as the vital power to absorb oxygen freely is lacking. . . .

"The respiratory act consists of two movements: inspiration, or taking in of air; and expiration, or expelling it.

"In inspiration the thorax is made larger by depression of the diaphragm, or muscle which elongates the chest cavity, and by elevation of the ribs, the chest enlarges laterally or from side to side. In consequence of this increased space, the air rushes in to fill the space thus created.

"The diaphragm is a strong, flat sheet-like muscle, stretched across the chest, separating the chest from the abdomen. It is automatic in its action like the heart, and this very suction action of the diaphragm assists in the circulation of the blood, drawing it on.

"In expiration the opposite takes place. The ribs are lowered, the diaphragm relaxed, and it is pressed upward into the chest by contraction of the abdominal muscles, pressing the blood out, aided by the elastic tendency of the lungs themselves.

"There are three kinds of respiration, including the parts rendered most active. When performed mostly by the diaphragm it is called diaphragmatic or abdominal breathing; when by lower ribs, intracostal or lower-chest breathing; and when by the upper part of the chest, supracostal or upper-chest breathing. The latter is seen in most women and is due to the fact that their mode of dress tends to bring this about. We do not see this prominent in youth, as their ribs, by their loose dress, allow free motion, while tight lacing prevents lateral or side expansion, as well as free abdominal breathing, and lessens the full play of the lungs."

COMPLETE BREATHING

"This includes all the good points found in high-chest breathing, mid-chest and low-chest breathing; in other words, it brings into play every part of the respiratory apparatus and gives one the maximum amount of good to be derived from the least energy. . . . It is the most satisfying form of breathing and is very quieting to the nervous system. . . .

"First fill the lower part of the lungs, which is accomplished by use of the diaphragm, which descends and exerts a pressure on the abdominal organs, pushing forward the front walls of the abdomen, then fill the middle part of the lungs, pushing out the lower ribs, breastbone and chest; then fill the high portion of the chest, lifting the ribs; the lower part of the abdomen will be drawn in, which gives the lungs support and helps to fill the apices or highest part of the lungs. This will be seen when you get used to it as one single breath, aiming to fill each part of the lungs. Do the breathing as evenly as possible. This will come with practice.

"Retain the breath a second or two. Exhale slowly, holding the chest firmly, and draw in the abdomen slightly, to relax chest and abdomen. . . .

"A good method is to inspire one breath on top of another until four or five are taken, and retain one half a minute to exercise the capacity of the lung, for we often find cases of unused air cell space of lung in people who are weak and do not use the lungs fully. Begin the exercise by exhaling first.

"Consumptives and weak persons are poor expirers of air, or in other words do not empty the lungs any better than they fill them, and especially do not fill the apices or upper part of the lungs, or the parts which are always attacked by this disease. The air will be taken into the lower parts of the lung, while the apices will not fill at all during inhalation. . . . The muscles of expiration drive the air upward, and the superior vocal cords, by their contraction having closed the glottis simultaneously with the contraction of the muscles of inspiration, must be driven apart by the air forced up. While it is escaping it is driven into the apices of the lungs. All my experiments have proved that the apices were always filled during the expiration of breathing. . . ."

NOSE AND MOUTH BREATHING

"It is a very important thing to breathe correctly, which always means through the nostrils. If one has contracted the habit of mouth breathing, see to it that it is corrected. Enlarged tonsils and adenoids have a good deal to do with this faulty habit. Our mechanism is so constructed that we can breathe either way, but it is the design of nature that it should always be right and it means a great deal to us which way we follow. One is for health and improvement and the other, the opposite. It is noted that mouth breathers are more liable to disease, infectious or otherwise. . . . Nature has prepared the nostrils with a large surface of mucous membrane and an abundant supply of secretion to overcome irritation, catch the dust and impure substances and clarify the air before it reaches the lungs where these foreign substances are hard to get rid of. Nature intended that the air should pass through the nose so that it should be warmed before reaching the lungs. Mouth breathing leaves a dry, parched feeling of unpleasantness in the throat and mouth. It also prevents the nostrils from cleansing themselves. . . ."

VITAL CAPACITY

"In a well-developed person the capacity of the lungs is about 320 inches. In ordinary respiration we use about 20 cubic inches, or not much more. After an ordinary expiration of the above amount it is still possible to force out 200 cubic inches more, but there always remains 100 cubic inches of air in the lungs which can not be expelled. This is called residual air.

"The vital capacity of the person is the amount of air that can be changed at a respiration. It can be greatly increased by training. . . .

"It is a fact that if we would double the amount of air breathed each day it would make a great change in our bodies alone by almost doubling the red-blood cells and increasing the capacity of the lungs. We must revivify ourselves by letting in outdoor air a number of times daily if we are to remain well. . . . If we would make good use of the air around us we should soon see the change taking place and become fond of the feeling of exhilaration produced by deep breathing. . . . Deep breathing tends to keep the lungs and chest wall supple and elastic so it will not stiffen, as in old age. . . . This is the great remedy for tuberculosis, weak lungs and low vital energy."—Good Health and Long Life, by William D. H. Brown, M. D.

DEEP BREATHING

"Not one person in a hundred is a deep breather. Civilized man is weak lunged. . . . The lungs must be exercised regularly in order that the breathing muscles may retain normal power, and the lung tissues may be in healthy condition. One person in every three above the age of fifteen dies of lung trouble. This terrible fact is disclosed by the vital statistics of the United States. . . .

"The breathing muscles are among the most powerful in the body. . . . Each breath (properly taken) means a powerful contraction of certain internal muscles. Each contraction means a corresponding pressure and action upon the vital organs,—the heart, lungs, liver, stomach, intestines, etc. This internal action has a powerful influence upon the circulation of the blood in the vital organs, and creates a constant message and kneading of the organs, especially of the digestive organs.

"There are also numerous voluntary muscles, other than those employed in deep breathing, that may be directly compelled to massage and knead certain abdominal organs. Thus it is quite easy to stimulate the functions of the organs of digestion, absorption and elimination directly. The importance of such exercises must be apparent at once, especially since they do not require much expenditure of time and nervous energy. . . .

"Develop your lungs. Learn to breathe deeply, so that your lungs may be well oxygenated. Stir up your muscular system both externally and internally. Strengthen your digestive organs so that the food you eat may nourish your flesh, blood and bones. Learn to breathe diaphragmatically, so that the refuse which accumulates in the intestines may be properly eliminated. . . . Indigestion, malassimilation, billousness and kindred abdominal disorders, when not due to the grossest violation of the laws of diet, are due mainly to lack of activity in the abdominal region. The liver, stomach and intestines lie adjacent to the diaphragm, and during diaphragmatic breathing they receive direct massage and kneading. Thus, if reasonable attention be given to the food we eat, we need but to acquire the habit of breathing diaphragmatically in order to correct the most stubborn cases of indigestion, billousness, etc. . . .

"Turn on the draft to the furnace that exists in you. How can you expect to turn food into blood, and blood into muscle and bone, unless you give your furnace enough oxygen to consume the food you eat? Eat less and breathe more. . . . A rational combination of deep breathing and light exercise will prove a regenerating process."—P. von Boeckmann, in Deep Breathing the Foundation of Physio-Culture.

BREATHING EXERCISES

"Stand erect with abdomen well out of sight, shoulders down, chest up. Bend arms and raise elbows to level of shoulders, touching shoulders with finger tips. Throw head back and draw in breath while sweeping hands and arms up, back and down to sides. Exhale, rest a moment, and again take first position. Spread the ribs and lift the chest and be sure the diaphragm does its part. Practice as of bursting the belt, after filling the lungs, will aid in this. Try passing a string or a strap around the floating ribs and observe how much they can be forced to expand. Practice daily and observe the increase.

"Holding a towel by each end, lean the head back upon it, fill the lungs and spread the chest, exerting the muscles to enlarge the cavity.

"Repeat each exercise five times at first. Some dizziness may be felt, but this will pass away, and the number of times may be gradually increased."

It is said that Marion Harland cured herself of lung trouble by adopting a rule of "ten times ten," which means that ten times a day she practiced a deep breathing exercise ten times.

The more nearly constant the habit of deep breathing becomes the greater the benefit will be. Every walk in the open air, every time one must sit and wait, every wakeful spell in the night should be utilized as a time for deep breathing. In fact, the first thing in the morning and the last thing at night, with as many times between as one can think of it, the lungs should be well emptied and well filled.

Children should be interested in this practice so that it will continue with them as they grow up. It may be engaged in as a game; for instance, while walking with an older person, when each may try how long he can continue to inhale. Measuring the chest expansion will also interest them. Because of the natural activity of childhood their present need is not so great, but the habit of chest expansion and deep breathing firmly established will be invaluable to them in the future.

Prayer Union

SUBJECTS FOR THE THIRD THURSDAY IN FEBRUARY

Pray that the mantle of the father may fall upon the son; that wisdom be granted him in measure equal to his arduous duties; and that the love and confidence given by his people to the father may also be given to the son, in order that his hands may be upheld.

Lesson, Isaiah 59: 20, 21; memory verse, Isaiah 51: 3.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYERS

Sister Seeley of the Saints' Home, Lamoni, desires prayers that her eyesight and hearing may be restored or improved.

Sister Jennie Fletcher, of Pawnee City, Nebraska, asks prayers for her sister Ellen Fletcher, who is suffering from gall stones. This afflicted sister is eighty-three years old and isolated from church privileges. May she be remembered and blessed.

Sister Josie Helms, Sweet Lake, Louisiana, requests prayers. She wishes to thank those who have heretofore remembered her, and states that she has been strengthened in body. In trying to assist in the housework she has been again afflicted and is confined to her bed. She desires that if it is God's will she may once more be strengthened. She also wishes the Saints to pray that conditions in her home may be improved.

Letter Department

COLUMBUS, OHIO, February 4, 1915.

Editors Herald: I regret very much that through circumstances over which I had no control I was forced to leave the Australasian Mission so suddenly. However, "Man proposes but God disposes." I had arranged my plans to remain there until the spring of 1916. It was gratifying to me that I was able to leave the mission in such good hands. Brethren Haworth, Miller and J. H. N. Jones have the general supervision of the mission, and all three men are able ministers and have the confidence of the Saints. Most of the local officers are quite active, and I truly feel thankful to them and the Saints for the hearty support that I received from them. Of course there are always a few who think that they must object to everything that appears to be in conflict with their idea of things. It is a good thing that this element is in the minority, or the church of God would not make rapid advancement in the world.

I felt perfectly at home among the Australian Saints, as they make you feel that you were welcome. I shall not forget them nor their kindness to me, no matter in what part of this wide, wide world my lot may be cast. I like Australia and its people. They are very enterprising, and in process of time they will become a great people and country.

I was made to rejoice many times to see so many of our young men fitting themselves for usefulness in the church; and most of the young sisters seem just as much interested in the Lord's great latter-day work as the young brethren. If those young men will continue to apply themselves to study and continue to be humble and prayerful before God, it will not be long until the Lord will have a great army to carry on his work of redemption throughout the commonwealth. There are great and wonderful possibilities before them. I earnestly pray that they will strive to keep within them the spirit of enthusiasm that they were imbued with during my sojourn among them, and as a natural consequence the kingdom of God will be extended and thousands upon thousands will be brought into the church in that far-off land.

At the time I received the cablegram announcing the illness of my wife and requesting me to return home (which was the first message during our married life of thirty-four years that I ever received from my family to come home). I was laboring up the north coast, accompanied by Brother John Jones, president of the New South Wales District, whom I found to be a congenial companion and ready to do his part when called upon. It is a great pleasure to be associated with such noble men in the service of the heavenly Master. Brother Jones wields a good influence with the Saints wherever he goes. While touring in those parts we met Brethren Robertson and Patterson. Both have acquitted themselves well as new missionaries, as they were well spoken of by the people in the places where they had been laboring.

I felt impressed to inaugurate the system of reaching the people with the gospel wagon, as in my opinion it is the best method of spreading the gospel truths among the people. Australia is a grand country for the gospel wagon, as the climate there is favorable for such a project. The gospel wagon can be operated to a far better advantage than a tent in the United States and at less cost, especially on the Pacific Coast and in the Southern States.

I was loathe to leave my colaborer, C. Ed Miller, on the other side of the Pacific. He seems as near to me as if he were my son. We have been associated together for about twenty-five years. I always found him to be a willing worker, and trustworthy. He is one of the men that can be trusted, and does his work well.

My wife is much improved, but far from being well, as she is just able to move a little around the house. We surely feel grateful to the many Saints in all the world who fasted and prayed for her recovery, also to our friends who waited upon her during her long siege of sickness. We truly realize that God spared her life in answer to the prayers of his Saints. The Lord be praised.

Since arriving in America I have been very busy waiting on the sick, and have also traveled considerably. Attended the funeral of our worthy and beloved president Joseph Smith, December 14. The Lord had shown me in a dream on board ship on the way home that he would soon pass away. He did not live a month after my arrival. I was also shown that the burden and the responsibility that had been carried by him would soon be transferred to his son, Frederick M. Smith.

I had been acquainted with president Smith for about fifty years, and thirty-eight years of that time I have been associated with him in the general ministry. I can truthfully say that during these years of association I found him to be a man of honesty, justice, mercy, love and patience. These beautiful attributes are worthy of emulation. No man who occupied the position for nearly fifty-five years as leader over a body of people was more loved and honored than the late President Joseph Smith by those of his faith. He was likewise loved and honored by those who were not of his religious faith, who admired his sterling qualities. The faithful service that he rendered to the church and the good example that he set before his people should never be forgotten by us.

We should all rejoice and feel thankful that our heavenly Father has pointed out through the late prophet that his worthy son, Frederick, is to succeed him in the responsible office of leader, seer, prophet and revelator. The Lord has not made a mistake in the choice that he has made; the one chosen is well qualified for the important position. It will be our duty to sustain and uphold him by our faith, prayers and confidence.

Praying God to bless all his people, I remain

Your brother in gospel bonds,

GOMER T. GRIFFITHS.

News from Missions

Leaving Palestine During War

After a journey of twenty-three days, Brother Greene, Brother Koehler, and myself were once more permitted to land on American soil. We could quite appreciate the privilege, too, coming as we did from a country sadly distressed from conditions of war.

Sad, sad we were, though, to turn from a country and dear ones that we had learned to love in our fifteen months' stay there. Of course the thought of meeting the loved ones at home is always gratifying, yet it pained us to leave behind at such a time those in whose welfare we had become interested. And yet in the face of such trying conditions we could not feel that at the close of this dark period of earth's history there would come a time when the gospel could find its way more readily to the hearts of the people, everywhere, than ever before. I feel this will be especially so of Palestine.

CONDITIONS PRECEDING THE WAR

Could we have seen through to the end of these distressing conditions, we would have been glad to have remained and continued our work at the earliest opportunity. But the plot deepened and darkened day by day, until we could not conceive when the end would come, or what the outcome would be. As for our personal safety we did not fear. While there had been some talk about massacres, the Mohammedan population of Jerusalem for the most part had been quiet. Whether it would be profitable for all of us to remain and pay the extortionate prices of the war for an indefinite period was a problem for us to decide at once. To get money into the country was an extremely difficult matter. We realized this fully, after waiting about four months to receive it. We had received money orders and bank drafts, but these were valueless immediately at the outbreak of the war in Europe. It was not before the latter part of October that the gold cabled through the United States Government reached us, and I can assure you it was a treat to even look upon it.

Up to this time we had been obliged to depend upon the checks issued by the German bank upon the Sunday school and Religio funds deposited there. Only one store in the city would receive these, and accordingly we were obliged to trade at this place, which necessitated our living much upon canned goods, which, to say the least, were not inexpensive. Occasionally the German bank would deal out a napoleon (4) or two to Brother Greene but that most sparingly. We were obliged to make this go as far as possible for other necessities of life.

As we went into town day after day, we found ourselves gradually entering upon famine conditions. The storekeepers would say to us, "What shall we do? Our supply of — is nearly gone, and we can not get more in the country. The soldiers were ordered here to-day, and took goods amounting to four thousand francs" ($200). Perhaps this had been the second or third raid. We soon were made to realize that the question, What shall we do? not only applied to the storekeepers alone, but to us also.

A few days before leaving, Sister Jenkins and I went in town to price white flour. After hunting all about town we found just one sack, which was fifteen dollars. We concluded we had better not take it then, anyway, until we knew exactly what we were going to do. There was the native dark wheat flour, resembling bolted corn meal, and if worse came to worse, we could use that. The same day we went to see about coal, which we found was selling from thirty to forty dollars per ton. We did not purchase coal, either.

WAR IS DECLARED

A few days afterward Turkey declared war. Banks of the allied powers were looted, the gold was confiscated, and the banks were put under Turkish guard. The English and French banks had been rendering some assistance to citizens. Just previous to this time these banks had agreed to honor drafts, providing the banks in London and Paris were agreeable. This built up our hopes, but they were crushed in a twinkling. The checks of these two banks had heretofore been accepted by nearly all storekeepers in the city.

We had been praying and meditating over the situation for several weeks, and at this time we did feel it expedient for some of us to move out, and the sooner the better, as it would cut our expenses there. We urged upon Brother and Sister Jenkins to leave first, as they were there when we arrived over a year ago. But feeling that much rested upon their shoulders in making arrangements to leave, and that for the time they only intended going to Wales, they decided to remain a while longer and take their chance in getting out. We then proceeded to make plans for immediate departure.

We heard the day before leaving that the Turks would not run the train from Jerusalem to Jaffa any more. So we tried to see what arrangements could be made to go to Jaffa by carriage. Twelve dollars was the price, and since we had learned from the American consul that there was a possibility that the train might run, we decided to wait a day or two.

TO JAFFA

By the time our passports had gone through the usual red tape to leave the city, and other necessary papers secured, we were able to reach Jaffa by train, but only just in time to see an Italian steamer leaving the port. We could get no news of the sailings of boats in Jerusalem, as the war had put practically every ticket agency out of business. As the result of losing this boat, we were obliged to remain in Jaffa ten days. And many thanks to a good friend of Sister Floyd! For we were able to get a room of her very cheaply, and provide our own food, and she did her utmost to make the time pass pleasantly for us.

While in Jaffa we attended a war demonstration. It was held in front of the courthouse, and speeches were made by Germans and Turks. The Germans were given the first opportunity, and then the Mohammedan sheiks had their turns. One sheik in particular was very fanatical in his remarks, and during his talk cursed the allies by all the prophets from Adam to Moses. Everybody interested clapped, of course, not only to this but to every fanatical remark. A fear crept over me, followed by an intense feeling of sadness, and for a moment I wished I were not there. I had felt that perhaps it was not wise to speak English when surrounded by so many fanatics. In fact I had been told so. The demonstration ended with a Mohammedan prayer to which at intervals the great crowd of people breathed a profound "Ah-meen," and the masses dispersed. We surely realized the real gravity of the situation from a Christian standpoint—brother against brother in the greatest conflict the world has yet known, and when shall the end come?

We often walked through the ghetto in Jaffa, and it was with great interest that we viewed the fine homes of the Jewish people, and the thrift the colonies displayed. We were impressed by the large Jewish University where one could attend and pursue almost any line of study preferred. The ghetto apparently lacked nothing other than the proper support from a good government. They surely were not getting it, and it was about this time that these homes were raided by soldiers, and gold and other valuables were taken. Since our departure many of these people were forced to flee to Egypt for protection, and our battleships were instrumental in getting them away.

We also visited a German colony outside of Jaffa. Here, too, as we passed the farms, we noticed the usual thrift which characterizes their work, and we could see great agricultural prospects that lie ahead of the land of Palestine. While much of the soil is rocky, there is hardly a spot that can not be cultivated in some way. Much of the rock is of lime formation, which in the process of decay fertilizes the soil.

We took frequent walks to the shore to have a look at the sea. Brother Greene kept an eye and an ear open to the sea all the time we were there. Those who are acquainted with his experiences on the water will probably understand the reason. However, it was not always necessary to go down to the water's edge, for often we could sit in our rooms and hear the roar of the sea.

ABOARD SHIP

The day for our departure finally came. We were at the customhouse early in the afternoon. The seas were rolling in heavily upon the shore, and not only the seas, but the ship on which we were to sail was rolling badly. There are no docks in Jaffa, so we were obliged to go out to the steamer in large rowboats. It took eight Arab oarsmen to get us out to the ship. It was so rough that at times we could not see other boatloads of people not far distant.

At last we reached the ship, and then we had to board, which I can assure you was anything but pleasant. At times there were many feet between the boat and the tiny landing platform of the ship. I was obliged to raise my arms while an Arab lifted me by the waist when the boat was on the crest of a wave. Another, who was standing upon the platform, reached down and pulled me up. As soon as I could stand I proceeded straight up the long flight of steps to the main deck, never once stopping to look behind. It was a long sigh of relief that I gave when I set foot on that deck, for I felt that the worst part of our journey was over, and it certainly was.

Such a crowd as we saw on that ship! All were refugees from Turkey. There were two hundred more passengers than the ship expected to accommodate. There were not enough berths to accommodate all, and the first night people slept on the floor, in chairs, and on the dining tables. Others who were more fortunate slept upon the cushioned seats in the dining room, and those who had steamer chairs used them on deck. The next day many left the ship at Port Said, so most of the remaining passengers were able to secure berths the second night.

EN ROUTE

The following day we found ourselves in Alexandria, and we found everything alive there. There were soldiers everywhere. While at the docks we saw Indian troops, and South African Scotch troops were boarding a transport. A train came in from Cairo loaded with Indian soldiers, and mules. We were obliged to stop over night here, which gave us opportunity to call upon the American consul to see if he were prepared to cash our drafts, which he did. This relieved our minds somewhat.

By the time we were ready to leave Alexandria we had formed many pleasant acquaintances, five of whom were missionaries. Four of these had come from the interior of Turkey. They also said they were recalled by their boards, because they could not get sufficient money to live upon, and carry on their mission work.

Our first port of call after leaving Alexandria was ancient Syracuse, on the island of Sicily. Here, too, almost the first thing we saw were Italian soldiers marching to the ancient fortress. Again at Naples the parks were filled with young recruits drilling. Store windows were draped with French and English flags. The street musicians were playing the "Marseillaise," and it seemed that Italy, too, was aflame with the war spirit.

When we arrived at Gibraltar we saw the battleships and torpedo boats that were patrolling the straits, both on the Spanish and African sides. Searchlights were playing from the sides of the fortress, and from torpedo boats. We received orders at Gibraltar that no lights would be allowed on the ship after leaving that port, as they did not wish us to be intercepted by a German cruiser. We were on a White Star Liner.

To say we were glad to see Boston is putting it very mildly. We felt at last we had gotten out of the trail of the war fiend, and we sincerely hope that the land of Zion will be able to remain at peace.

MISSION SCHOOL WORK

Before closing this letter, I feel I should say something of the work accomplished in Jerusalem. Immediately after our arrival in Palestine, I gathered a few scholars to start a class. Our equipment at the time was very poor, yet it was a start. The class grew until it numbered thirty-five. On account of conditions we could not take in more. English was the only subject taught. It did not seem expedient to teach anything in the religious line, for there was scarcely a boy who could understand English. Moreover, our school was principally Jewish, with only a scattering of Christians and Mohammedans. We knew that to teach anything of a religious character at this time would only be effective in keeping the Jews away. This we did not want, as it was our purpose to make them our friends if possible.

Because of not knowing the Arabic tongue, I was greatly handicapped at first, and consequently was obliged to do much object teaching. Fortunately, a little later a friend who had previously taught in an English mission school, offered her services as an interpreter. As we had no books, all reading was from the blackboard.

After a time the sons of Ishmael decided they could not agree with the sons of Abraham, and proceeded to get into difficulty at the close of school each night, until Brother Greene was obliged to inform them that any boy who persisted in fighting should not be allowed to attend the school. After the Mohammedans realized that we meant exactly what we had said, they dropped out until only two remained with us. I was very glad to hear the Jewish boys say that they did not mind having the Mohammedan boys in the class if they would only behave. But they did not care to carry clubs and knives around in their belts all the time to protect themselves against the Mohammedans, who were always similarly armed. After this difficulty was settled, we got along very well.

Shortly after this our hearts were made glad to know that the General Convention had appropriated a sum to be expended in furthering our school work there. We immediately set to work and had desks, seats, an extra table and a blackboard made. We also purchased books, papers, and pencils, and made plans later for the purchasing of other necessities, which on account of the war were not carried out.

After securing the new furniture we were able to form three classes, with Brother Jenkins, Brother Koehler and myself as teachers. We enrolled approximately seventy-five pupils. The boys attended quite regularly, and showed good interest for the most part.

By this time some were able to handle our newspapers and magazines, and took great delight in so doing. They frequently called upon us, and were becoming most friendly. One Jewish young man visited us regularly upon the Sabbath (Saturday), and usually took supper with us. His father was a cosher rabbi, too. I felt that the time was about at hand for these young men to be organized for social work in connection with our school, and had we remained Brother Koehler would have attempted it. Yet we were living in hopes that we might secure the services of Brother Schwartz of Philadelphia this last fall, who not only would have made us a valuable teacher, but a social leader as well. But our hopes were dashed to pieces when the war broke out.

It was our purpose this fall to study the geography of Palestine and the surrounding territory, and to begin the study of the ancient history of Israel, in connection with our work in English. It seemed with such a foundation to build upon, the gospel could be more easily taught at a later period. It was surprising to me to see how little they actually knew concerning the land given to their people for an everlasting inheritance. Neither had they a connected history of their race. They knew practically every little story of Bible history, but the setting for all this was lost sight of. The real moral or lesson to be gained from such a study was consequently entirely lost, and this surely is the very thing needed to bring them to the spiritual plane where they can best appreciate the gospel. I felt we had excellent material to work with, for most of the young men were in their teens.

Before leaving Palestine, martial law had been declared, and no one was allowed on the street after seven o'clock at night. This meant that we could have no more night school. It was a sorry crowd of boys that called to see us early in the evening on their way from work the first night the order went into effect, and they were still more sorry to learn that there was a possibility of our returning to America. We assured them, however, that the time would come when our missionaries would return and again carry on the work. They were also told that their names would be left on file, and that they would again be gladly admitted to the school by those in charge, if they made application.

Thus endeth the first chapter of our mission school work in the Holy Land, and may the Lord speed the time when the work may again be opened up. I do feel, however, that we did succeed in establishing ourselves there, and when our missionaries return they will not be looked upon as strangers to the city.

Let us not forget in our prayers those who were left behind, and let us also be ever mindful of their welfare, for they will need all the assistance we can possibly render through this trying time. We must remember that Palestine is suffering as much as any European country at present, as she is practically dependent upon Europe for sustenance.

In gospel bonds,

EDNA HOWLAND KOEHLER.

Australia

This has been a year of continuous movement from state to state, winding up in my arrival last month in this the most westerly of Australian states, also the last and least developed, from an agricultural and manufacturing standpoint, as well as in a spiritual sense, so far as the latter-day work is concerned.

We have only one church building in this large state, which was erected some two years ago under the supervision of Elders C. A. Butterworth and J. W. Davis, of the missionary force, who were aided materially by the efforts of local brethren, both in cash and labor. There are some fine, self-sacrificing Saints here, who give every aid in their power to the missionary, who are all too few at present for successful propaganda. It is to their credit that this church is free from debt, and all we need now is the living church to fill its seating accommodations.

This last need is harder to fill than the material building, for the people of the suburb in which the church is built are seemingly much prejudiced against the church, owing probably to the fact that the Mormons were in the same state, and are still here, advertising from house to house before the building was erected, and naturally this has added to the confusion already in the public mind in relation to the two churches. One lady whom we met tracting, lived for three years next the Mormon headquarters, and for all that time thought the little church building of the Reorganized Church was a Mormon church.

To tell you of the conditions, we need only mention that we have occupied three Sundays since our arrival, and notwithstanding some door to door work with tracts, not a single stranger has put in an appearance. We are credibly informed that some time ago a better condition prevailed than now, especially in regard to the attendance of Sundays, but at present it would not average over fifteen souls at all meetings, the best attendance being at Sunday school. Some have gone to the gold fields hundreds of miles away; some have lost interest and are hard to find; and the balance live everywhere but near the church, making it hard to focus the work, and most expensive for them to reach "central," the church.

We are kindly cared for by Brother and Sister Robinson, and by Brother Alma Robinson, who is most generous in his help to the missionary. Brother A. T. ("Frank") Robinson, has had a very hard time trying to keep together the drooping cause. He is a very zealous man, and will in the Lord's own due time prove his worth to the work. Conditions here seem to have conspired against his success, and I am told that the work has already gone down, even since the church was built. Hitherto they had gone on the streets every Sunday evening after meeting, after meeting in private houses in the afternoon; but since occupying the church the street services have been discontinued, and nothing has taken their place as a means of reaching the public.

Our present location is also most unfortunate for the work of raising the church in that locality, as we are about nine miles away and can not get accommodations nearer. This necessitates the payment of one shilling return fare every day we visit the locality, and besides that two hours traveling to and fro, and, if we eat, one shilling for lunch. We can not "run" out every day, so only go twice a week, Thursdays and Sundays. It is proposed to build an anteroom to the church, and we will batch there after Christmas.

In the meantime, we are doing some tracting around East Fremantle, and are shortly to start meetings in private homes. The people at the latter place do not seem so antagonistic as those near the church. This is no doubt due to the absence of Utah Mormons to confuse their minds.

A young brother from New South Wales, named J. M. Argent, is with us. This is his first mission. From present indications he will prove a good "tracter," but as a preacher he has yet to develop.

This is the hardest mission, except Adelaide, that has fallen to my lot; but I was then two years younger and am now very much weaker physically, in fact I sometimes feel that seventy work it too great a strain on me, and I long for more settled office work. I expect to cover this large territory before going back to my home in Geelong, Victoria. I hope by then to have done my part here, and to have made matters easier for those to follow.

We are looking forward to General Conference, wondering who will be appointed to take the place of Elder G. T. Griffiths, whose stay here was so sadly terminated. I am sure I voice the sentiments of a great majority of southern and western Saints, when I express the hope that Elder C. A. Butterworth will be permitted to return as missionary in charge. He is practically Australian, and understands us, our institutions, and our temperament better than any other man. Besides, he has a wider knowledge of the Australian continent and the conditions environing us than any other man could learn in years.

I trust the Presidency may be especially guided in this, and in their selection in all other missions in this the hour of the world's trial. Perilous times are upon us, as we are involved in the greatest war in history, and are sure to suffer greatly in days to come.

We hope to continue faithful, and with the redeemed come again to Zion.

In gospel bonds,

J. H. N. JONES.

FREMANTLE, WEST AUSTRALIA, 56 Glyde Street, December 9, 1914.

Mission Number Four

At the present writing I am at Berrydale, Florida. Came here last week from Dixonville, Alabama, where Brother Swen Swenson and I had been holding meetings. Expect to attend the Florida district conference at this place February 6 and 7, if all goes well, and then on to Mississippi. Shall likely be in Mobile after their conference at Theodore, Alabama, February 27 and 28, and then back this way again.

Am anxious to attend the General Conference this year, but I doubt if I shall be able to do so. The financial depression has hit the South hard, and the Saints, of course, are hard pressed for money, as are others.

I was in the vicinity of Red Level, Alabama, a short time ago, near where Brother Slover had held a discussion with one Dan Watson, a "Stumbling Stone" man. We had splendid audiences, considering the weather, and also good liberty, good attention, and good interest. I did not attend the debate and can speak only from what I saw of the results; but from the fact that it was the means of opening up new places in gospel work, removing much prejudice, and making many friends to the cause, I am compelled to believe it was a success, and that much good will result, if the proper labor can be done.

The missionaries seem to be busy, and good results are reported from time to time.

In the faith,

ISAAC M. SMITH.

The Bishopric

APPOINTMENT OF AGENT

The Saints of Southern California District, take notice of appointment of Elder Robert T. Cooper, Los Angeles, bishop's agent for the Southern California District in place of Elder Fred Adam, resigned. Communications touching business and financial matters should be addressed to Elder Robert T. Cooper, 1700 Trinity Street, Los Angeles, or the Presiding Bishopric, Independence, Missouri.

Brother Adam by reason of special demand of his time to personal business affairs is unable to give time to the work of the agency at the present, and we trust that he may be blessed as he faithfully devotes his time to his personal business and as a helper in the church work when possible, and that soon he may be fully relieved so as to give more fully his time as a worker in the Master's cause.

The Saints and friends in the Southern California District we trust will be found ready helpers of Brother Cooper in his extended work, and that the Lord may bless each one and the agent as all move forward to the helping of the cause of Christ.

Hopefully in the truth,

E. L. KELLEY, Presiding Bishop.

AGENT'S NOTICE

We are in need of money to meet the expenses of this Western Nebraska and Black Hills District. The Lord has said, This is a day of sacrifice and a day of the tithing of my people. Jesus taught and insisted that the law of tithing should be kept. (Luke 11:43.) He also said, Whosoever breaketh one of the least of the commandments, and teacheth others so to do, he in no wise shall be saved. Again he said that whosoever heard his sayings and did them, was like unto the wise man who built his house upon the rock. And again not everyone who said Lord, Lord, should enter the kingdom, but he who did the will of the Father.

Let us not think we may be saved by keeping a part of the commandments of God, thus deceiving ourselves. We are charged to observe these things without preferring one before another. If we desire full reward, let us render complete obedience. We must work for the Lord if we receive the final plaudit, well done.

Abraham honored the law of tithing, and Jacob said, Of all that thou giveth me, I shall surely give the tenth unto thee. This is the doctrine of our Lord and the practice of his people.

I am indeed thankful for the efforts made in the past to spread the great latter-day work, and trust that the Lord may bless and direct all in the future. Remit by check, draft, or express money order.

Yours in the faith,

COMSTOCK, NEBRASKA.

C. W. PRETTYMAN.

What Our Friends Say

On every side, enemies of our church urge their malicious and untrue statements upon an ever-ready public. What our friends may say, not so persistently presented, goes unheard.

The truth should be presented. Our neighbors should be given an opportunity to know what is right.

The Bureau of Publicity gives you an opportunity to inform your neighbor—every person in your community, at a mere trifle of expense.

The editorial appearing in the "Kansas City Journal" of December 10, 1914, concerning the demise of our beloved President Joseph Smith and the church of which he was leader, should be presented to the people of your community as the views of one who wrote unbiassedly concerning something of which he was informed.

This is printed in leaflet form, entitled, "By their fruits shall ye know them." There is a fitting introduction by Elbert A. Smith. It is sent free, you paying postage only, as follows:

20 leaflets, 2 cents postage; 40, 3 cents; 60, 4 cents; 80, 5 cents. More than 80 must go at parcel post rates, and weigh as follows: 80 to 100, 1 pound; 150 to 300, 2 pounds; 300 to 450, 3 pounds; 450 to 600, 4 pounds; 600 to 750, 5 pounds; 750 to 1,050, 6 pounds. ### PAUL AND TIMOTHY

Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ . . . to Timothy, my dearly beloved son: . . . without ceasing I have remembrance of thee in my prayers night and day; greatly desiring to see thee . . . when I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice; and I am persuaded that in thee also. . . . Stir up the gift of God, which is in thee by the putting on of my hands. For God hath not given us the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind.

A YOUNG MAN AND AN OLD MAN

One of the beautiful scenes of the past that we behold through the windows of the New Testament is "Paul the aged" and the young Timothy working together in love and sympathy.

Paul was an old man and Timothy is said to have been scarcely thirty-five when Paul addressed him in his second epistle as "my dearly beloved son." The two had worked together in bonds and affliction, and Paul had intrusted his young brother with some very important missions. The one had youthful hope and enthusiasm, the other experience and skill; what one lacked the other supplied. The gospel of Christ knit them together with a love that knew no limitations of mere age or mentality.

Paul had denied himself wife and children and home for Christ's sake, the character of his mission demanded it; but he was not a harsh old bachelor. His hungry heart went out to Timothy as to a child of his own. With loving care he taught the young man, and with insistent devotion sought to make of him a polished instrument in the hands of God.

AN UNFEIGNED FAITH

The apostle had come in contact with some whose faith was not all that they wished it to appear. He was familiar with the men who made long prayers for a pretense while they secretly devoured widows' houses; but in Timothy he rejoiced, finding "unfeigning faith." He was also of the opinion that a man's ancestry counts for something, and he did not judge Timothy by his own attainments alone. He says he is persuaded that his faith is unfeigned because he remembers how it dwelt first in Timothy's grandmother Lois, and also in his mother Eunice.

That was not a bad reason to assign. It meant something to be a Christian at that time. At the most it might mean the slave-galley or the dungeon or the lions' den or the "martyr's death of flame." At the least it meant an ostracism and disgrace that tried men's souls. Paul at the time when this letter was written was a prisoner in Rome, where the ill will of the Jews had landed him.

The family that for three generations stood for the faith of Christ in the face of all this had considerable force of character and moral rectitude. The grandson of the oppressed did not take up the martyr's cause except there dwelt in him unfeigned faith. Otherwise, Timothy would have said, as some say to-day, "I have seen what my mother and my grandmother suffered in the church, and what has the church ever done for them? I will keep clear of it."

A GLIMPSE OF HUMAN NATURE

What a glimpse Paul gives us of human nature! We can almost see the aged grandmother, Lois, sitting in the corner watching the mother, Eunice, go about her work. How glad she was for the record her grandson, the darling of her old age, was making. How she wept if word came that he was in prison, and how she rejoiced when he was free! If she was yet living when Timothy came home with this letter from Paul, we can imagine how the tears of pride stood in her eyes to hear him so commended by the great man. We can see the flush that mounted to the thin old cheeks as she heard her own name mentioned. We can imagine her extending a trembling hand to touch the letter that Paul the apostle had written.

Why should she not rejoice? Here was a man who saw what her prayers and her advice and her character had been to Timothy—at least he saw a part, and God saw the rest.

It meant something to Eunice also. It was part payment for her sacrificing in giving her boy to an unpopular cause.

It meant a great deal to Timothy to have a man like Paul address him as "my beloved son." It was high honor for a young man to have this letter that is now scripture addressed to him. Yet no higher than any young man may claim now; for unto as many as do the will of God is given power to become the sons of God.

POWER, AND LOVE, AND A SOUND MIND

One of the things that Paul congratulates Timothy on is that God had not given them the spirit of fear, but of power and of love and of a sound mind.

The contrast is strong. Where fear is there can be neither power nor love nor a sound mind, but rather weakness, dread, and a confused intellect.

The spirit of fear is not a gift of God but of the Adversary. The very first man to obey the Devil was baptized of that spirit. Adam met God without fear until he obeyed Satan, and then he went and hid himself; he dare not meet his Creator.

And ever since, all who are at all in the service of the Adversary have feared to meet God or one of his angelic messengers. And one who has ever seen another openly and violently possessed of the Devil knows what a cold and horrible feeling of fear accompanies the power of darkness.

Christ displayed the highest bravery when he met the raving maniacs from the tombs and calmly bade their captor depart. He did that, and his servants have done it, because his Spirit is a spirit of power. It is also a spirit of love, and perfect love casts out all fear.

It is a noticeable fact that those who deny that the Spirit must be received under the hands of a servant of God also deny that it carries with it the power of old. The giving of the Spirit is guarded because it is a spirit of power.

THE CHRISTIAN TEST

It was a spirit of love. It led these men of old to love one another. It is one of the tests by which Christ knows his own, that they love one another. We do not find Paul complaining of the youth and inexperience of Timothy, or Timothy saying Paul was an old man, in his dotage, his years of usefulness past. The spirit of love had knitted them together and each had charity for the failings and appreciation for the excellences of the other. That is the only way in which the differences of age and position and education can be wiped away and the people of God united.

It was a spirit of a sound mind. From the beginning there have been those who regarded the advocates of religion as foolish. Noah, Moses, Christ, all of them were regarded as somewhat deranged.

Paul himself had been so regarded, and Festus had told him to his face that much learning had made him mad. So Paul felt to make reply to this charge and declare that the Spirit of God conduced to a sound mind.

THE ONE SANE MAN

The fact is that when Paul stood before Agrippa's court his was the sanest mind present. The Jews were mad over their traditions, and the Romans were mad with power. Both alike looked on him and his cause with contempt, and heaped on his followers cruel abuse. They little thought that cause would outlive them.

No man now will defend their course, while popular opinion has long since cleared Paul. His mind was sound, theirs warped with prejudice.

We one time read a little anecdote in the daily papers, claiming to be true. It was said that on a steamboat running between Burlington and Fort Madison there was a steam calliope, and one note of that calliope sounded a most terrible discord. At length it became unbearable. The engineer attempted to correct it with a monkey-wrench and failed. So an expert was called in. He soon located the trouble. The note that sounded the discord was the only one in tune.

It was that way with Paul at Agrippa's court; he appeared mad because he was the only sane man present. That has been the case with many a Christian in the world ere this. The soundest mind is the one that has the most communion with the Spirit of God.

The Romans thought Rome eternal and the Jews thought Judaism impregnable. Paul saw that Rome would fall and the Jews be scattered, and that the only eternal, unchangeable thing on the face of the earth was the gospel of Christ. He was enabled to see this line between the transient and the eternal because the Spirit had given him a sound mind.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

GENERAL CONFERENCE ANNOUNCEMENTS

The Presidency has arranged for a series of lectures to the priesthood during the coming General Conference, after the plan pursued at the late conference in Independence.

Professor S. A. Burgess, President of Graceland College, will lecture on the subject, "The history of philosophy." Professor Floyd McDowell, instructor in Graceland College, will lecture on "The history of education." These lectures will be held in the morning hour, and the lecturers will alternate, as they did last year.

The work of Brother Burgess as a lecturer is already well known to the members of the priesthood, and we trust that of Brother McDowell will be equally well and favorably known at the close of the conference. He has specialized on this subject in the University of Iowa, and Clark University, giving it years of close study.

Arrangements have also been made for a class in grammar. This will be conducted by Sister Lydia Wight, under the auspices of Graceland Extension Institute. This grammar class will probably meet at some place to be arranged down town, probably at some hour after the close of the afternoon business meeting each day.

At this conference, delegates will be furnished with delegate cards and badges. Both delegates and exofficio members will receive these cards and badges. This evidence of delegate and exofficio membership in the conference will be required in order to entitle them to place on the floor. Consequently, all delegates and exofficios coming to the conference should at the earliest possible opportunity call upon the credential committee in the historian's office in the Herald Publishing House, sign up, and receive their credentials and badges.

The credential committee consists of Heman C. Smith, C. I. Carpenter, and L. G. Holloway.

CURRENT EVENTS SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

SHIP PURCHASE BILL.—The House on the 16th passed the ship purchase bill in an amended form, limiting government ownership. The opposition in the Senate opened a new filibuster to prevent action and the bill was sent to conference.

LAND PARTY.—The Land Party is a new political organization effected recently at New York. Its platform declares that land is rightfully common property; that all men have equal rights to its use; that the annual rental value should be taken for public purposes.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.—The proposed woman suffrage amendment has passed the Massachusetts house. Already passed by the Senate, it goes to popular vote in November. A similar bill has passed the New Jersey Senate. The House having previously passed this bill, it will be voted on by the people in September.

TO PROTECT CHILDREN.—The House by a vote of 232 to 44 on the 15th passed a bill to bar from interstate commerce products of any mine or quarry employing children under sixteen years of age, or any mill, factory or workshop employing children under fourteen, under sixteen if working more than eight hours per day.

MICHIGAN WOMEN WORKERS.—The Michigan Minimum Wage Commission reports that twenty-one per cent of the wage-earning women of the State are paid less than six dollars per week, eighty-one per cent less than eight dollars, which "constitutes a menace to the welfare of society." The commission recommends a minimum wage law and a minimum wage commission.

CHINA AND JAPAN.—Negotiations under way between China and Japan since the fall of Kiaochau, involving demands by China not made public, have resulted in rejection by China of said demands, reported to include: No ceding or leasing of Chinese coast or islands to another power; employment of Japanese in Chinese army, police and financial departments; calling upon Japan alone for preservation of Chinese integrity; half the arms and ammunition purchased in Japan; establishment of a Japanese arsenal in China; equal privileges with other nations in schools, churches, etc.; joint control of certain iron works and mines; railway concessions. Japan assures the United States that all demands are commercial and not political.

PROHIBITION.—On the 6th Governor Hayes, of Arkansas, signed a state-wide prohibition bill, to take effect June 1, allowing licenses already granted to run until January 1, 1916. On the 9th a bill to prevent anyone from receiving more than one quart of liquor a month from outside the State on failure of Governor Henderson to sign or veto the same became a law in Alabama, effective June 1. The Colorado prohibition bill on the 9th passed on the third reading in the Senate. The senate of the Iowa Legislature on the 12th passed a constitutional prohibition amendment, and voted to repeal the mulct law, to become effective January 1, 1916. On the 18th the house passed the bill repealing the Mulct law. This law granted saloon licenses on petition, for a money consideration. The French Chamber of Deputies on the 12th adopted a bill to prohibit the sale of absinthe, to apply also in Algeria and the colonies. The bill goes to the Senate. The Utah senate on the 11th passed a state-wide prohibition bill.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—Foreign representatives at Mexico City are said to have issued a circular letter recommending their withdrawal from the city. This action seems to have been provoked by Carranza's discourteous treatment, and because of conditions at the capital. Carranza is reported to have ordered his subordinates not to discuss diplomatic relations, in order to force representatives to Vera Cruz, in an attempt to affect tacit recognition of his government. Various governments have instructed the representatives to use their discretion about leaving the capital. Vera Cruz papers suggest that diplomats transfer their activities to Vera Cruz or leave the country. Secretary Bryan announces that John A. Stillman, special representative of the United States at Mexico City, will go to Vera Cruz. Fighting between contending forces continues. The United States Government has protested against and demanded punishment for insult to United States consular agent W. O. Jenkins at Pueblo, Mexico, who was saved from execution by Carranza forces only on the arrival of a Carranza officer.

EUROPEAN WAR.—The Russians have continued to retreat before the German attack in Prussia, until the Germans claim that this territory is clear of the enemy, who are represented as sustaining heavy losses. At the other extreme of the extended eastern line, the Austro-German forces claim to have regained the province of Bukowina, in southern Galicia. Germany also announces the capture of Plock, north of Warsaw. The allies are reported aggressive in the western fields with slight gains to their credit. Germany also claims gains here. Albanian attack on the Servian frontier forts are reported developing along the entire border. A Norwegian tank steamer was struck by a mine off Dover, England, and beached. The steamer Vile de Lille and the British collier Dulwich have been sunk by German submarines. Report from Dieppe, France, is that a German submarine without warning torpedoed the French steamer Dinorah near there on the 19th, the vessel being towed to port. Forty British and French aeroplanes and seaplanes attacked German positions in Belgium the 16th, reporting advantageous results. Report from Rome is that on condition of Italy entering the war at once on the side of Germany and her allies, she has been offered certain concessions, including the cession by Austria of Trent, rectification of the eastern Italian frontier, and the concluding of a new treaty strengthening Italian Mediterranean interests. The Greek minister has been recalled from Constantinople because of Turkish insult to a Greek attache.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.—Germany has announced that shipments of foodstuffs to her civilians would not be seized for war purposes. In answer to the protest of the United States against interference with her shipping, England states in her second note, just made public, that taking ships to port for search is only the adaptation of existing rights to modern conditions. In reply to protest by the United States, the British Government disclaims advising the general practice of flying neutral flags on the part of their merchantmen. Answering the protest of the United States against the German declaration creating a war zone about the British Isles, Germany stated that the British Government had intercepted neutral shipments to German civilians, had armed merchantmen to oppose German search and attack, and that these merchantmen were trying to conceal their identity, making search impossible, and that Germany proposed to wage relentless warfare on English shipping, all of which seriously threatened neutrals, since by mistake damage might occur to neutral ships and shipments. Germany proposed to enforce her decree unless England should rescind her purpose to prevent importation of foodstuffs into Germany. This England declined to do, contending that control of foodstuffs by the German Government made inoperative international usage and agreement making foodstuff shipments to civilians noncontraband. Germany refuses to assure the United States Government that American citizens and vessels will not be molested in the war zone otherwise than by visit and search, reiterating the danger and for the reasons formerly presented. At midnight of the 17th the German decree went into effect. Travel between England and the continent was on the 19th reported suspended by the British admiralty until further notice.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

PICTURE OF PRESIDENT SMITH.—We desire to call attention to the advertisement appearing on the last page of this issue announcing for sale a portrait of the late President Joseph Smith together with a booklet containing his message to the church. We have received from the Ensign Publishing House copies of the picture and the booklet and find that both are very fine specimens of the printer's art, and no doubt will be cherished by many of the Saints.

MOST REMARKABLE.—Some time ago arrangements were made to reprint the splendid editorial on the life and character of the late President Joseph Smith appearing in The Kansas City Journal. The editorial was reprinted with an introduction, under the title, "By their fruits ye shall know them." It was and is offered free for distribution, postage only being asked (see advertisement in this issue). It strikes us as most remarkable that so few, comparatively, have availed themselves of this opportunity.

SCANDINAVIAN MISSION WORK.—In a report to the First Presidency, Brother H. N. Hansen writing from Copenhagen under date of January 1 states that Brother Alexander Kippe in his labors in Germany has baptized three, confirmed seven, blessed two children, ordained one teacher and one deacon, during the quarter ending December 31. Brother Hansen adds:

It will be seen notwithstanding the disturbed and troubled conditions in Germany that the work is making progress in that land, and at present promises to become the most important part of the field. The outlook for the work in the Scandinavian countries is fair, however, and there seems to be no cause for discouragement; but it will require a steady and continuous effort to overcome the terrible existing prejudice that we have to contend with. . . . It is possible that the reports from Germany are not as complete as they should be, and that more have been baptized than are here shown, as it is with some difficulty that I communicate with the brethren, as I know so little of their language.

GOVERNMENT

NUMBER 2—THE DEMOCRACY

BY S. A. BURGESS

[The series of three articles under this heading were written during the summer of 1912, and appeared consecutively in the Autumn Leaves in the year 1913. They are presented here as being worthy of repetition and a wider circulation. Allowance should be made for governmental changes since their first publication.—EDITORS.]

When we speak of a "democratic government" or a "republican government" some people at once think that we are talking about the Republican and Democratic parties. Such people are like the man, who, when a reformer was trying to get him to vote the opposite ticket as a "Citizens' Ticket" for the purpose of "turning the rascals out," persistently refused, upon which the following conversation took place.

"No, sir; my father was a Republican; my grandpap was a Republican, and my great-grandpap a Republican, and I am a Republican, too."

"Huh! and if your father was a horse thief, and your grandfather was a horse thief, and your great-grandfather was a horse thief, what would you be then?"

"Wal, in that case, I guess I'd be a Democrat."

He is very much like the other party who was a Democrat, whose father was a Democrat, whose grandpap was a Democrat, whose great-grandpap was a Democrat, and on and on and on, "back to the original baboon that swung by its tail from the first coconut tree."

Now you may note that either of these stories is adaptable, and contains no reflection upon either of the great parties. When we speak of democracy, however, we do not have any reference to party lines; but consider democracy as a government in which the people rule, as opposed to aristocracy, in which only the "best people" have a share in the government, or monarchy, in which one reigns alone. When we speak of a republican form of government, it is now generally understood as referring to a representative form of government, and so being one branch of the subject of democracy. It is a government in which all the people have an interest in res publica, or the public affairs.

FORMS OF GOVERNMENT

The government of the children of Israel presented many democratic features, until the people themselves cried for a king. Though the judges were pointed out—as God-selected men—still the people had a share in the making the laws, and to a certain extent in the choosing of their leaders, although these latter were in many instances the patriarchs of the family.

Among the Greeks there were four classes of people: the king, the council, the agora or common free men, and a small class of slaves. The cities were each independent and self-governing, and made war and peace at their own will. Sparta took one of the forms of an aristocracy, while in Athens after a monarchy the people for a number of years were the source of government, till in the seventh century before Christ the government took the form of an oligarchy.

The weakness of democratic government is shown by some stories handed down from that time. Pisistratus took the part of the common people in Athens against the aristocrats, or at least so claimed. He then came before the popular assembly bloody, with his clothes torn and seemingly in great haste, and claimed that he had been set upon by the aristocrats, because he had taken the part of the people. The assembly at once voted him a guard of fifty men, with the privilege of raising them himself. He raised not fifty alone, but many times that number, seized the citadel and made himself tyrant of the city. A tyrant is one who rules without form of law.

Also the story is handed down that Demosthenes appeared before the popular assembly at one time, to deliver an address on some public matter, but the people shouted and would not hear him. He turned as if to go away and said quietly, "Oh, I was just going to tell a story."

Those nearest heard the remark and it was quickly passed over the hall, so that before he left the stage there came a uniform cry and demand for the story. He then began thus:

A certain youth hired out in the summer time a donkey to go from hence to Megira. About noon when the sun was very hot, both he that had hired the animal, and the owner, were desirous of sitting in its shade. They each tried to force the other away. The owner argued that he loaned only the animal, but not his shadow. The hirer replied that since he had hired the donkey, that all that belonged to him was also his.

At this point Demosthenes started to leave, but the mob called him back for the rest of the story. He then began with this retort:

What! How comes it that you are desirous of hearing a story of the shadow of a donkey, and refuse to give ears to matters of greater moment?

He was then permitted to continue without interruption.

If space permitted, it would be of interest to analyze the form of government they then enjoyed. Rome also after the expulsion of the kings enjoyed a democratic form of government, until the substance was lost in the empire. After the fall of Rome the feudal system prevailed in Europe, save only in certain cities, and the cities became, on that continent at least, the strongholds of liberty, though not at all in the sense in which the word is used today, as then it meant the guilds; now, the people.

THE LEAVEN OF LIBERTY

When after the War of the Revolution Washington had been offered a throne and refused it, and the colonists had set forth to establish a united state, a republican form of government, the general prediction of the time was that it would result in certain and hurried failure. This opinion was based not only on the condition of the world at that time, but also because in ancient times the substance of democracy had so soon been lost and a mere shadow left to the people. And also because attempts to federate states before had usually been defeated by jealousy.

The Constitution of the United States is a most remarkable document in many ways, although a large part of its provisions are founded on the common law of England and are a development of the experiences of the English people. It was not long after the establishment of the Constitution before France attempted to follow, but the people there were not prepared by previous training, and the result was the Revolution; then for over eighty years a series of republics, empires, and kingdoms. After the Franco-Prussian War of 1870-71, however, the present republic of France was established, and has continued ever since; the longest any government has continued since the States General sat at the opening of the French Revolution. In the meantime, the cantons of Switzerland had gained their independence, and modeled a government upon that of the United States of America. Their constitution is very closely fashioned after that of this country, but they soon added the initiative and referendum.

But the effects of the movement towards political liberty in this country have not stopped with the few republics formed, but have reacted throughout the world. The constitution of the German Empire is fashioned closely after that of the United States Government, and there the socialist and liberal parties are much stronger than in this country. In fact that is the case in all three of the stronger governments of western Europe. Greece has gained her freedom from the Turks; Russia has abolished serfdom and made some effort towards a constitution and popular assembly (the Douma). Japan has established a most liberal constitution; China has also proposed a written constitution; Turkey has overthrown the absolute monarchy in very recent years and established a limited monarchy; as has Persia. In fact, we might call the roll of the governments of the world and show how this leaven of political and individual liberty has continued to work, and is still working among the nations of the world.

GOVERNMENTAL CHECKS

The presumed weakness of a democratic form of government is that but few men have the time to make a thorough study of the systems of government, and that the people are too easily influenced by demagogues (demos agogos: a leader of the people). This same objection has been made to every added power to be placed in the hands of the people, and is still made now on the question of the recall, the initiative and referendum, especially the recall of judges. There is something of truth in the objection—if there were not, it could hardly have persisted so long; but whether it is a justifiable excuse, requires a very thorough analysis of history. History shows that kings have made mistakes. That oligarchies have also erred in many instances, and democracy has also made its blunders; but it is written, It is not common that the voice of the people desireth anything contrary to that which is right. (Mosiah 13:35.) Certainly it is not common for them to continue to desire that which is against their very best interests, individually and collectively.

The essential points of our system of government are a division into the three general departments, the executive, the legislative and the judicial. Yet in fact, the executive has the power to veto, and the judicial acts as a check on both of the other departments, in its power of declaring a law or act unconstitutional, while the legislative has the power of ratifying the appointment of judges, and in the making of laws the limiting and forming of its powers. In fact, each department has been made to a greater or less extent, a check upon the other.

EXPRESSING WILL OF PEOPLE

The next essential feature is that the will of the people should be expressed in the government. The framers of our Constitution did not believe the common people had sufficient intelligence to select a president of the United States or senators for the higher house of Congress, but they were willing to concede to the people the ability to select their representatives, who would in turn select the president, and in the state legislature their senators. The Constitution has become a dead letter so far as restricting the rights of the people to elect their president is concerned. The electors meet as provided. Every letter of the law is carried out, but an elector would hardly dare to vote contrary to the candidate for whom he was selected by the people. There has also for some time past, (a decade or two,) been a growing demand that the Senate should be brought more closely in touch with the people, instead of with vested interest. (This has now been accomplished by an amendment to the Constitution.) Our system of government has secured us political and civil liberty, as well as religious liberty. It remains for us to secure economic liberty as well.

Of the new questions that are confronting us in addition to the popular election of senators we have the initiative, which means the right of a certain percentage of the people to have proposed at a general election for approval or disapproval, any law they may formulate. If a majority of the electors vote for such law, it becomes the law of the state, with equal force as if passed by the legislature, and without the power of veto in the governor.

There has also been passed in many States a constitutional amendment permitting of the referendum, which is the right of a certain percentage of the people, usually a smaller number, to require that any law passed by the legislature be submitted to the people at a general election for their approval or disapproval. When once such a petition has been filed with the proper officer the law is no longer subject to veto by the governor, but must be submitted for the approval or disapproval of the people.

Both of these laws have in a less number of instances been made applicable to cities, and especially has the right of referendum been reserved in recent charters so far as any act of the city government may concern the granting of a franchise. It may be noted that if the people have these two powers, it will not ordinarily be necessary for them to exercise them. The fact that they can vote upon and nullify any law passed by the legislature, which is displeasing to them, or that they can propose or enact any law that they persistently desire, will necessarily exert its influence on the legislature. It has been found, in fact, that so far such questions need to be submitted with comparative rarity. Also that the people are slow to vote for radical measures.

There remains to consider the recall. That term signifies the right of the people to discharge a public servant if he is found inefficient or unworthy. There already exists the power of trial after impeachment, so that any officer of government may be tried for malfeasance in office, and if found guilty, removed from office. So far, the right of the recall has usually been restricted to a petition signed by a comparatively large percentage of the electors, and in such instances as it has been exercised it has sometimes been followed before a vote was taken, by the flight of the individual in question. It can readily be seen that such power ought not to be lightly brought in question by a very small percentage of dissatisfied individuals. But it presents a very powerful appeal on the grounds of the common interests. When the people can nullify a franchise, can refuse to confirm a law, can discharge at any time an unworthy officer, it would hardly seem that it would pay a bribe giver to offer any substantial temptation, since the bribed might in such case be recalled and his acts nullified.

There is one added development of our Government, and that is the commission. We now have the interstate commerce commission, the tariff commission, the pure food commission, and so on for quite a list. These commissions are not subject to the direct vote of the people, and can only be reached through the representatives of the people in the President and Congress. It is a development the other way, worthy of consideration in comparison with the three movements of the initiative, the referendum, and the recall. Still, when composed of experts, the plan should prove advantageous.

These federal commissions, however, ought not to be confused with the commission form of government, which has been adopted by so many cities of this country within the past few years. It has sometimes been referred to as the Galveston Plan, and sometimes as the Des Moines Plan, in connection with some other city, according to the section of the country in which the discussion takes place. The essential elements are: the people elect the commissioners and hold them responsible for the government of the city; the commission passes the necessary ordinances; each one is the head of a distinct department, and is held directly responsible for results in his department. This plan has not yet been adopted by any very large city like Chicago, Saint Louis, or Kansas City, but has worked quite well with many cities of one hundred thousand population or less.

Democracy, then, means a government of the people, or, as Abraham Lincoln described it, a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people."

Department of Education

THE JUNIOR COLLEGE

We are very much pleased to be able to present this month the following article by Floyd M. McDowell of the Department of Education of Grace-land College. Professor McDowell is dean of the college of Liberal Arts, and has spent several years in specializing in the subject of education, its history and principle. He took his A. B. at the State University of Iowa, 1911, and spent three summers in special work there. The year 1913-14 was spent at Clark University, where he received his A. M. His special subject of research was the small college. So he is exceptionally well informed on this topic. Brother McDowell was recently called and ordained to the eldership in the Lamoni Branch, as he is thoroughly devoted to the church and its interest, and it is because of this interest that he has made a special study of the small college.

With his conclusions we heartily agree: three years ago we urged upon the board that no attempt should be made to handle more than two years of college work. This policy is outlined on page twelve of the catalogue. In January the Board of Trustees passed a resolution making Graceland College definitely a junior college, so that our future catalogues will not offer third or fourth year college work.

The place and need of the junior college is thoroughly recognized. Its convenience, personal contact with the students and the religious influence makes it a well-recognized institution of our educational life. There is much that has been written about the universities which has been exaggerated. But it is true that the religious life is not usually given as much consideration, as in the small Christian colleges. The need of Graceland College is very manifest, its work is apparent and it should work where we need it, that is in a thorough college preparatory department and is giving acceptably the first two years of college, which are naturally allied in character with the preparatory work.

To our mind the policy which should be pursued is very careful and economical management of the college at all times; that as rapidly as possible the debt should be paid; that as additional means are available they should be used to strengthen this junior college and preparatory work. Our policy is to advise frankly what work can best be taken here and to encourage students to go where they can secure their work to the best advantage. We believe that this early work can be handled better at Graceland College than elsewhere.

GRACELAND A JUNIOR COLLEGE

A recent change in the administrative policy of Graceland College is, we believe, of sufficient importance to be mentioned in these columns. For various reasons, many of which will be mentioned below, it has been thought expedient to place a definite limit upon the amount of work of college grade that should be attempted. Accordingly it has been decided that for an indefinite period Graceland should be known as a junior college, i. e., a college which offers only the first two years of the course of a standard college of liberal arts. We believe this change to be in accord with present educational thought, and respectfully request its careful consideration on the part of all who are interested.

HIGHER EDUCATION IN UNITED STATES

The United States is unique in its control, or rather lack of control, of higher education. In Europe, universities are supported by governmental appropriations and directed by a cabinet minister. In the United States neither the national nor State government has accepted the responsibility of providing adequately for higher education. The recent development of the State-supported universities is of course an exception to this general statement. The situation in the United States is well summed up by the General Education Board as follows:

Generally speaking, it may be said that in the United States there is a wide-open door in so far as higher education is concerned. Individuals and organizations are free to establish and support institutions of higher learning, and it is expected that they will do so. This expectation has not, as a matter of fact, been disappointed. In the first place, religious bodies have plentifully planted colleges and universities in order to protect their several denominations and to secure a competently educated ministry. From these foundations, ecclesiastical in origin, many of the strongest and broadest of our higher institutions have developed in a comparatively brief space of time. Again, a majority of the States themselves created universities by way of rounding out their several public school systems. Finally, a small number of strong institutions, independent alike of religious denominations and the several States, have been endowed by single individuals.

This denominational, political and local rivalry has in many respects brought waste and confusion to higher education. With the growth of the country the tendency has been to form new institutions rather than strengthen existing ones. This is doubly serious since these superfluous institutions are not only often unqualified themselves but tend to interfere with the nutrition of those that are really needed. A few figures will suffice here.

There are in the United States about 600 institutions calling themselves colleges or universities. Of these, Ohio contains 40, Missouri 34, Pennsylvania 41, Iowa 32. It seems certain that institutions in such numbers can not be properly manned and supported to do standard college work. In fact, in some cases little more than good high school work is attempted, while in others three years of graduate work are offered. It is clear that these institutions should assume titles appropriate to their respective spheres of activity and thus check one great source of confusion and disorganization.

As a step in this direction it has been thought necessary by college associations and State legislatures to state just what kind of an institution should be considered a standard college and to thus answer the frequent query,

WHAT IS A STANDARD COLLEGE?

A review of these enactments will show that it is now generally agreed that a college, to be considered standard, should meet the following requirements:

1. The completion of a full four-year high school course should be demanded as a requirement for admission.

2. A degree should be granted only upon the completion of four years of regular college work in addition to this entrance requirement.

3. Instructors should have at least a bachelor's degree and have completed some definite and standard graduate study. In many cases advanced degrees are demanded.

4. There should be at least 10,000 or 15,000 volumes in the library, exclusive of public documents.

5. There should be from $10,000 to $15,000 invested in scientific apparatus alone.

6. Each institution should have a permanent endowment of at least $200,000 ($500,000 preferred) or a fixed and assured income of from $10,000 to $25,000 annually.

PRESENT STATUS OF SMALL COLLEGE

During the years 1913-14 the writer made a careful investigation of the present condition of the so-called small college in the United States as measured by a standard similar to the above. It was found that a majority of these institutions conformed, in name at least, to the first two of the above requirements. In material equipment, however, at least fifty per cent of them were found sadly deficient. This simply means that there are in the United States no less than two hundred institutions calling themselves colleges or universities wholly unprepared to give standard college work. The conclusion seems inevitable. Either these institutions should increase their material equipment or limit their work to an amount that can be covered creditably.

THE JUNIOR COLLEGE

While a few will be able to meet the first of these alternatives a majority will be compelled, sooner or later, to choose the latter. Many have, in fact, already done so. This has led to the formation of the so-called "junior college," that is, a college which offers only the work of the freshman and sophomore years of the regular college course. This change is in accord with the recommendation of the Commissioner of Education which says:

There is need both that colleges with small incomes and meager equipment should cease to try to do advanced work requiring large faculties and costly equipment and that students of the freshman and sophomore years, who constitute a large majority of the college students, should be given more consideration than they are now given. To this end two or three hundred of the smaller colleges should become junior colleges and give all their strength to the work of the first two college years.

Some of the advantages claimed for this class of institutions by various writers are:

1. Less work will be covered and consequently it will be covered more thoroughly. Under present conditions a majority of the time of the best instructors and most of the means of the institution is directed toward the improvement of the work of the upper classes. When all of this is used in the first two years it is apparent that the efficiency of the work of these years will be more than doubled. Moreover, a survey of the present courses of study offered by our colleges will demonstrate that there is far less need of library and laboratory facilities for the first two years than for the last two. This makes it possible for colleges of this class to offer practically standard work.

2. They now become honest institutions by no longer pretending to give a college education. In the stress of the competition incident to this multiplication of institutions much misrepresentation has occurred, that whether intended or otherwise is very like dishonesty. There is a need that we accept the same standard of morals here as in the business world. Each institution should offer only what it can do well and not pretend to be what it is not.

3. The student not fitted for advanced work can stop naturally and honorably at the end of the second year. There are undoubtedly many students that would come under this classification. This period of two years becomes, in the mind of the writer, a period in which the student should find himself. Small classes and close contact with instructor make the small college especially adapted to this task. No one who has known the average freshman and sophomore will deny its importance.

4. They supply the needs of those who wish to go no further than to fit themselves for later professional work. A survey of the entrance requirements of our professional schools shows that a majority required, for entrance, two years of regular college work. It is evident that there will be a desire upon the part of many students to complete these entrance requirements near at home at a minimum expense. The junior college meets this need.

5. Students can remain at home until a greater maturity is reached. Prominent educators are now recognizing the fact that the leap from the strict control of the home and the high school to the individual freedom of the large universities and colleges, coming at the critical period of life, is far too great. They are almost unanimous in the opinion that some readjustment is necessary. Many show that a large percentage of the failures and immoralities of college life can be traced back to this change. Again the small college with its Christian influence and intimate contact between teacher and student finds its task defined. Is it not a worthy one?

FUTURE OF GRACELAND

These, then, are the reasons for our change. Graceland as a college, must conform to such requirements as are deemed reasonable and fair by the educational world. If we do not do so voluntarily the time will come when we shall be forced to comply. These requirements, these changes do not mean the defeat of the Christian college. On the contrary they make its future sure. Its place is now defined. What is needed now is that it awake to its opportunity.

Some time ago the writer was permitted to attend the Association of American Colleges, held in Chicago. The dominant theme of the sessions was "Christian education." Several prominent speakers emphasized and reemphasized the thought that there never was a time when the Christian college was more needed than now; that there never was a time when Christianity was so in need of intelligent and Christian young men and women. Not only do these churchmen say this, but their acts show that they believe it. Several of the denominations are appropriating hundreds of thousands and in some cases millions of dollars annually for the support of their colleges. Some of them are maintaining more than a hundred of these institutions.

The Christian college is here to stay. Graceland as a Christian college will succeed. Surely if other denominations can support a hundred colleges we can support one. Can we, as Latter Day Saints, face the world and do otherwise?

F. M. MCDOWELL.

GRACELAND HOME-COMING DAY

At the alumni business meeting of last spring it was decided to hold an alumni reunion during the General Conference of 1915, and the provision for this was left to the executive committee of the Alumni Association. A reunion of this kind had been anticipated for several years and once had been voted for, but through a misunderstanding was not carried out.

After meeting in company with the president of the college, Brother S. A. Burgess, it was unanimously decided that this should be a bigger and broader affair than merely a reunion of the graduates of the college; for many of the former students who have never graduated from any course have been in attendance longer and therefore become more thoroughly in touch with the college work and the college spirit than others who may have been here only for the short period of time necessary to graduate from a one-year course. Accordingly it has been decided to hold a Graceland Home-coming Day at which time we hope and expect that all former students of the college will make every effort to be in attendance and help to celebrate the twentieth year of Graceland's usefulness to us and to the church.

The entire program for this day has not been decided upon as yet, and if any of the former students have any suggestions to make with regard to it we shall be glad to consider them. One feature, however, will be the regular college program in the evening, which this year will be given by the alumni and former students of the college. We want to have enough present at this meeting of the old students of Graceland to completely fill the rostrum of the church and at least half the main floor.

Another feature which we feel certain will be enjoyed by all students of Graceland, past and present, will be a ball game between this year's team and a team made up of former students under the lead of Brother J. F. Garver.

The date for this Graceland Home-coming Day as decided upon by the committee and the First Presidency of the church has been set as April 7, 1915. Let us all be present and help make this an event in Graceland's history.

RUBY E. BAGULEY,

FREE SCHOLARSHIP

Special attention is called to the offer by the Woman's Auxiliary for Social Service of a free scholarship to the one writing the best essay not to exceed one thousand words on the subject, "Why should I get an education?" This contest is limited to those at least sixteen years of age. The best paper will be determined at the next General Conference, and the winner will receive a free scholarship good for the collegiate, college preparatory or the commercial department.

A free scholarship is also given to the winner of the oratorical contest held at the college each spring.

There are no other free scholarships. There are a couple of small funds from which students may borrow a limited amount to be repaid after finishing school work and which draws no interest if paid promptly when due. There is also the industrial department which permits a limited number to work for their board.

Of General Interest

THE REORGANIZED CHURCH

[The following from the American Church History Series, 1893, pages 170 to 174, by H. K. Carroll, LL. D., and published by the Christian Literature Company, New York City, is furnished by Elder Philemon Pement, and is given here as an interesting and unbiased discussion of the history and teaching of the Reorganized Church.—EDITORS.]

Like the Mormons of Utah, the members of this organization, sometimes called nonpolygamous "Mormons," trace their origin back to the movement begun by Joseph Smith in 1830. They claim to represent this movement and to be true to the principles and doctrines proclaimed by him, and insist that those who followed Brigham Young were led away from the truth into error. They deny that the revelation concerning polygamy, which was communicated to the church in Salt Lake in 1852 by Brigham

Young, was genuine, and declare that the true successor to Joseph Smith in the presidency of the church was not Brigham Young, but Joseph Smith's eldest son, Joseph. It is said that none of the members of the family of the first prophet have united with the Utah branch, but all have become members of the Reorganized Church.

The first conference was held in 1852, and it was then that the leadership of Brigham Young, James J. Strang, Sidney Rigdon, and others was disowned and the society organized. Its headquarters are at Lamoni, Iowa, where it has a large publishing house.

The Reorganized Church accepts three books as of divine origin: first, the Bible; second, the Book of Mormon; third, the Book of Covenants. The latter consists of the revelations given to the church in the present century as a guide in church government. The Book of Mormon is accepted as a history of the ancient inhabitants of America and the revelation given them by God, beginning at a period two thousand years before Christ and continuing until four hundred years after Christ.

In doctrine they adhere to the Trinity, to the atonement of Christ, to the resurrection of the dead, to the second coming of Christ, and to the eternal judgment, believing that each individual will receive reward or punishment in strict measure according to the good or evil deeds done in life. They hold that men are to be saved by faith in God and Christ, by forsaking sin, by immersion for the remission of sin, and by the laying on of hands. They believe that revelations of God are still given by the Holy Spirit for the guidance of the church, and that the gifts, blessings, and powers of the Holy Spirit in Bible times are continual.

Their order of church government is such as they find authority for in the New Testament, and such as they understand that the apostolic church observed. It includes the presidency, consisting, when full, of three persons, which has jurisdiction over the whole church as its chief presiding authority; twelve apostles whose special duty is to take charge of all missionary work abroad; one or more quorums of seventy, who are set apart from the body of elders and assist the apostles; high priests, who have charge over States and districts; priests or pastors, teachers and deacons, and bishops, of whom three are set at the head of the business affairs of the church. Other bishops and agents assist in collecting the tithes.

As to marriage, they believe that it is ordained of God, and that there should be but one companion for man or woman in wedlock until the contract is broken by death or transgression. They characterize the doctrine of polygamy or plural wives as an abomination.

RUSSIA'S DELIGHT IN SOBRIETY

Russia has been sober for the brief period of the war, and her criminal statistics already show the wisdom of the Czar's action in banishing vodka from the land. In thirty-three precincts of Moscow for the first half year of 1914 there was an average of 896 criminal cases a month, while for the first "sober" month there were only 406. Crime was thus reduced 54.7 per cent, says the Russkiya Vyedomosti (Moscow), and the decrease was almost as great in Moscow county. In four districts for the first half year of 1914 there was an average of 160 cases monthly, while for the sober month only 93. "This is particularly significant," it is observed, "since the prohibition of the sale of alcoholic drinks in the country districts is not as effective as in the capital in view of the secret traffic in liquor." Though vodka has been one of Russia's worst scourges, the profits from its sale constituted a large item in the Empire's budget, liquor being a government monopoly. . . . Of the results already observable, Mr. M. Menshikov speaks in the Novaye Vremya (Petrograd):

The experiment of the last few weeks has shown that if the treasury loses something because of the ceasing of drunkenness, the people gain enormous and priceless advantages. . . . From all sides come telegrams and letters describing the wonderful transformation of the life of the people, the extreme decrease of crime. Detention houses and jails, police courts and offices of examining magistrates are empty. Hooliganism in some localities disappeared entirely, street begging has been considerably reduced. Cities and villages have assumed a quiet appearance. . . . Temperance has infused modesty and serious dignity into the conduct of the people. If we are now more or less certain of the outcome of the war, we owe it first of all to the excellent order with which the mobilization has been completed. This order would not have prevailed had the liquor shops been open. Recall to mind how in the Manchurian War the reservists were called to the colors: their march was accompanied by the destruction of villages, railroad stations, and even towns, and it was necessary to subdue the rioters by armed force. . . .

Whatever may be the end of the present war with the Germans, we must be eternally grateful to it for the first extensive experiment in public temperance. It is true that the Government's fight against drunkenness was decided upon long before the war, but owing to comprehensible caution we began with compromises and half measures. . . . The war compelled us to act more resolutely. . . . As early as two weeks after the closing of the wine shops Russia felt as if resurrected. . . . All saw that perfect temperance was possible, that it was easily attainable, that vodka was not a necessity to anyone. . . .

There is great hope that if the experiment in involuntary temperance continues as successfully as in the past months the Government authorities may gather sufficient courage to put an end to this inveterate public evil. Oh, what a great saving deed that would be! It would be more than throwing off the Tartar yoke or the abolition of serfdom; it would be the destruction of the Devil's power over Russia. . . . We do not yet know what the Russian nation is as a sober nation. . . . From times immemorial has alcohol been poisoning our blood. What will our future be, then, if our Government shall undertake the pious feat and actually sober the people? To lift an enormous populace from the abyss of drunkenness is not very easy. However, the power of God is immeasurable. This power has already been revealed in the fact that the people themselves welcome temperance. They themselves demand the checking of drunkenness and impose upon themselves the temporary burden of all privations. . . . Truly, no sermon, even apostolic, could turn our people toward piety as much as temperance. No education, no authority, could revive the nobility and the greatness of the national spirit to such an extent as temperance.

The same journal speaks editorially of the benefits observed:

The stoppage of the sale of strong drinks was at first undertaken for the time of mobilization. This measure, however, has produced entirely unforeseen results—the possibility of total temperance. The voice of all has been raised in favor of extending the period of temperance, and now this popular wish has been granted. The Emperor has issued the order to stop the sale of alcoholic drinks for the time of the war.

The beneficent results of this measure are innumerable. In the expectation of a final victory over the external enemy the Russian people will conquer a not less merciless internal enemy which has hindered our material and spiritual prosperity not less than the Germans. The good habit of temperance will become fixed during the war, and Russia, at the end of her external trials, will resume her internal work with a resoluteness of which it was possible only to dream before. —Literary Digest, December 5, 1914.

The Children's Home

EDITED BY HEMAN C. SMITH AND CALLIE B. STEBBINS, LAMONI, IOWA

Responsibility

To every creature of intelligence responsibility is attached in a measure. The discharge of that responsibility not only affects the one discharging it but in a greater or lesser degree every other creature within the realm of his influence.

The board of trustees and each of them feel that to them attaches great responsibility, and that the community, the whole church, and to some extent the world is concerned in having the duties attaching properly discharged.

The board, however, does not feel called upon to assume responsibility clearly belonging to others. This would be wronging the one so relieved, as responsibility is necessary to the proper development of the one bearing it.

The responsibility of providing for and teaching the child primarily belongs to the parent, and the Children's Home should never assume it so long as the parent is competent. The mission of the home is to meet emergencies where the parent is dead or disabled, but should never set the parent aside. It seems that some have the impression that they can legitimately be released from the duty of caring for their own, and that the mission of the home is to give them relief from care.

Sometimes parties write us: "My boy has grown out of my control, and I wish you would take him and place him under the discipline of the home for a year or two." If we suggest that such boy be delivered to us, the parents releasing all claim upon him, they indignantly resent the proposition to give away their child. We do not blame parents for being loath to give away their children; but should not the rights of the home be also considered? and should the home be expected to take children from parents who confess their inability to govern, spend time, anxious care, and money in training them to return them into the hands of incompetency? We think not. Parents should keep their children, do the part of a parent by them, endeavoring to rear them up to follow the paths of honesty, and virtue; but if in this they are failures allow the home to take them and to find places where they may have what the parents confess they can not provide.

There may be special cases where temporary charge by the home will be proper and the best policy, but this can not be in all cases. Nor will it be proper to fill the home with home interfering. The board should be the proper judges in all cases. Nor will it be proper to fill the home with these temporary charges, so that others will find no room when applying.

The private home where the husband loves the wife, the wife reverences the husband, the children obey the parents, and the parents bring up the children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord is the ideal home. Maintain such home so long as your best and earnest effort will do so, for the public home can never be made to fully meet this demand. The best we can do is to come to the rescue when there is a failure to maintain such a home, care for the children at the public home as best we can until we can find a better place, but never send them back to the home of confessed failure unless conditions materially change. Should conditions so change, the board may and will gladly return them, notwithstanding they may have had sole charge and possession in the interim.

The Importance of Love

(We gladly insert the following clipping handed us by one of the Children's Home trustees as illustrative of the thought that love is the important element needed in every home, including the Children's Home, yet we must not forget that expression of love exhibited in kindly acts and generous donations are necessary to the sustaining of the home.)

THIS LOVE BEGETS LOVE

A little fellow, four years old, was brought from the slums to a Chicago orphan's home. This is how The Life-Boat tells the story:

When he was brought up to be put in bed, had his bath, and the matron opened up the sweet little cot to put him between clean white sheets, he looked on in amazement. He said:

"Do you want me to get in there?"

"Yes."

"What for?"

"Why, you are going to sleep there."

He was amazed beyond description. The idea of going to sleep in such a place as that he did not know what to make of it. He had never slept in a bed in his life before, never. He was put to bed and the matron kissed him good-night, a little bit of a chap, only four years old, and he put up his hand and rubbed off the kiss. He said: "What did you do that for?" But the next morning he said: "Would you mind doing that again—what you did last night?" He had never been kissed before and did not know anything about it. It was only a week later the matron said that the little fellow would come around three or four times a day and look up with a soft look on his face and say: "Would you love a fellow a little?"

After a few weeks a lady came to get a child, and was looking for a boy, so the matron brought along this little chap, and the lady looked at him. She said: "Tommie, wouldn't you like to go home with me?" He looked right down at the floor. She said: "I will give you a hobby-horse and lots of playthings, and you will have a real nice time and I will give you lots of nice things to do."

He looked right straight at the floor, did not pay any attention at all. She kept talking, persuading him, and by and by the little fellow looked up in her face and said, "Would you love a fellow?"

What tremendous pathos!

If we do not love one another, we do not love God, we do not know God, and God is not in us (1 John 4: 16, 20). Do you recall the testimony of the heathen to the early Christians? "Behold, how they love one another."

Would such be said to-day of your community, of your church? What a power to overcome the world if Christians but loved each other as God loves them. The world would swing into light if we but believed and practiced this wondrous sentence: "God is love."

Important

Those having children whom they would desire to have received into the home should under no circumstances bring or send them here until arrangements are made with the board and notice given that the child has been admitted. If brought here without such preliminaries it may subject parties concerned to much inconvenience, and possibly to failure to get the admittance sought.

We appoint no agent authorized to do this work. The ministry and others are cautioned that, under no circumstances, should they advise the disregard of this regulation.

Millennial Dawn Theories a Delusion

I have seen the photo-drama of Creation, put out by Pastor Russell. It takes two hours for each part, eight hours for the four parts. It was nice to see and it is free. The angels in the pictures had wings, showing it was all man-made. The talking was done by talking machines. It was stated that angels had charge of the world before the flood, and that the same angels married the daughters of men, as stated in Genesis 6: 2, 5.

Now, notice, the angels were once enlightened, they were the sons of God. (Genesis 6: 2, 5.) These angels became fallen angels and God put them in the prison. (Judges 1: 6.) This is the way the Millennial Dawnites interpret the Bible, and that these fallen angels are the ones Christ went and preached to (1 Peter 3: 19, 20), "Which sometime were disobedient, when once the long suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a-preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls were saved by water."

Christ said the sin against the Holy Ghost shall never be forgiven in this world nor in the world to come. The angels certainly had received the Holy Ghost and were once enlightened. Would the Millennial Dawnites please tell me what good it would do for Christ to go and preach to those angels when they sinned against the Holy Ghost, and that sin would not be forgiven in this world nor the world to come?

Genesis 6: 2, 5 does not mean the angels, but those that obeyed the law of God; they were all the sons of God, those that rejected God's law were not known as the sons and daughters of God. Read chapter 8: 12 in the Inspired Translation. Paul in his letter to the Romans said, "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." (Romans 8: 14, 15.) Now to 1 Peter 3: 20, "Which sometime were disobedient . . . wherein few, that is, eight souls were saved." Anyone can see this means the people and not the angels. It is stated, wherein few, eight souls, were saved, not eight angels, but eight men and women, all the rest were drowned,—few were saved but many lost. Read the Inspired Translation, 1 Peter 3: 19-21. Those eight souls were saved by water, the like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us. It can not mean the angels, for only eight would have been saved, and Jesus said he could call twelve legions of angels.

Here is another delusion. I heard it fall from Pastor Russell's own lips, and read it in volume six of his books, and also in daily papers: That Matthias was not accepted of God when the apostles chose him. And here is their argument: If he was accepted of God, why doesn't the Bible speak of him after that? Let us see if the Lord accepted him. "And Matthias was numbered with the eleven." (Acts 1: 26.) He was filled with the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost. That will be proof enough for any man that God accepted him. He was numbered with the eleven, he himself made the twelfth. Now turn to Acts 2: 14, "But Peter standing up with the eleven . . ." etc.

Here we have Peter standing up with the eleven, he himself making the twelfth one. How plain! If there were only eleven it would read, Peter standing up with the ten, he himself making the eleventh. Now Matthias was numbered with the eleven, he making the twelfth. The Holy Ghost came to all and they spake in tongues. Then Peter standing with the eleven; did you notice who Peter was standing with? Eleven, and he made the twelfth. God did not wait for Paul, as Russell states.

What a tangled web they weave, who practice to deceive. When I heard Russell preach, he said, "Believe the Bible, it is true; look out for the higher critics." Then he read about Matthias being numbered with the eleven. "But, friend, God did not accept him in that office." The Bible said he was accepted, Pastor Russell said he was not. But Russell said, "Believe the Bible," so I do, and must reject Russell.

The Millennial Dawnites do not say the end of the world was to come in October 14, 1914, but they do say that would be the end of the gospel age, as it is written in their books and tracts. Listen to Christ, Matthew 24: 14: "This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come." So we see that theory is a delusion. I have before me a tract given to me by a Millennial Dawnite. Anyone can get it free, or any other tract free from them. The name of this one is "The End of the World in 1914, not Russell View." He states in this tract Christ came in 1874 to his church or elect, and in forty years from then he will come to all, 1914. That is, all the world will know he is here. About three weeks ago I was with Elder Jasper O. Dutton when we met a Millennial Dawnite and Elder Dutton said to him, "Are you still on earth?" He said, "Yes, and the end has not yet come." The gospel of Christ was to be preached, beginning at Jerusalem. (Luke 24: 46, 47.)

In the great gospel sermon record in Acts 2 we are told what we must do, be baptized for remission of our sins. There is one gospel, as Paul said in Galatians 1: 6-8, and woe be to him who denies that gospel. It is the same to Jews and to all people. Millennial Dawnites say baptism is not a saving ordinance. But we read of only one gospel, and that gospel required men to be baptized (Acts 2: 38, John 3: 5), and the same gospel in the last days was to be preached in all the world, then the end would come.

So we see the Millennial Dawnites have not the gospel, but a counterfeit.

Active Service

In the word service is represented that which governs the daily conduct of every man and woman in the world; no one is immune, and all come under one or the other of the following categories: self, others, the Devil, one's country, mankind generally, or God. Under which heading do we come?

I am reminded just here of a remarkable declaration of the Apostle Paul, that whether we live, we live unto God; or whether we die, we die unto God. So whether we live or die, we are God's.

I am sure there are very few men who realize that no matter how they are living their lives it is not just because they themselves decide on a certain course of action, and as a result of their human conception of things their desires are attained, or ambitions realized. True, every one has a will of his own. But the power of that will to choose good or evil was given by God; and on the death of our mortal bodies our spirits will return to God who gave them, and we will be held responsible for the way we have used that will, and consequently how we have lived our lives; and whether we like it or not, we are on active service for something or somebody.

This aspect of life has been pressed home to me very forcibly since this horrible war broke out, and I ask myself the question, Who or what am I serving? And on reviewing the list I dismiss self as being outside the pale of a Latter Day Saint's service; others, by which I mean a few intimate friends, I dismiss for the same reason; the Devil I dismiss because we can not serve God and Mammon, although I am conscious of many failings which Satan would and probably does regard as victories; my country I can not dismiss so easily, for although a noncombatant in the strict military sense of the word, I am nevertheless in the active service of my country, contributing my small quota in her defense from the ravages of the foe.

How the heart of the Savior of men must bleed as he sees all the terrible evil in our midst, and yet if we believe his word all this has to be. He issued a decree. His word has gone forth, and it can not return unto him void. "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my word shall not pass away." These things must come to pass before the end.

Have been trying to present this line of thought to a few of my shipmates who have been inclined to listen, and in spite of many perils, at times quite imminent, have felt like being on active service in a three fold sense, for country, mankind generally, and God above all.

I was reading a few days ago something of the wisdom of Solomon and two passages seemed to condemn me. "Rejoice not when thy enemy falleth and let not thine heart be glad when he stumbleth." And, "Be not glad at calamities." I had been guilty of this when reading about the calamities coming upon our enemies, and I wondered whether Solomon knew how his words would burn into one's heart and mind, nearly three thousand years after he uttered them. I believe the Lord has forgiven me just as freely as I repented of the same, but I can not help feeling jubilant at the thought that God is hastening his own work, and that for the elects' sake the days of this visitation will be shortened.

No religion, philosophy, or science can be of any avail unless based on the pure and simple doctrines and gospel of Christ; otherwise they are all false, and it is because the religion of the world is not Christ's religion that it has failed to bring about the change of a greater and larger hearted brotherhood.

Martin Luther, after all is said and done, was a Roman priest, and, as such, a product of the mother of harlots and abomination of all the earth; how idle then it is to say that because he pioneered the Reformation movement the Christian religion became at once pure. Nearly everyone I speak to on the subject is under that impression, forgetful of the fact that it was the Roman church pure and simple that was reformed and not the church of Christ, while the scoffers hold Christianity up to ridicule and try to tell me that it has stopped the march of progress, and the advance of learning and civilization, putting the clock back a hundred years, thereby doing the very thing that Paul warned Timothy against, viz, the substitution of a kind of religion that is false, as against the truth. I try to tell them that just as through the first act of disobedience in the Garden of Eden God cursed the whole earth, so also because he foresaw that when the light should come into the world in the revelation of the glorious truth, the world would likewise reject it, and refuse to obey its call, the curse would remain, just as we see it in force by these present-day calamities, until his object has been accomplished.

The fulfillment of all things is my favorite theme, and, as I try to tell my friends, when that is done there will be no more wars or rumors of wars; swords will be beaten into plowshares, spears into pruning hooks, perfect peace will be established by the Prince of peace, and the kingdoms of this world will become the kingdoms of our God and his Christ. How near we are to that end I am sure must be realized by all the Saints. The signs of the times are very portentous in their vivid reality, and we need to be prepared for his coming, to be ready like the five wise virgins, with lamps trimmed and burning brightly. And it is in this light that every one of us can be on active service for God and his kingdom; breaking down the barriers of pride and prejudice; attacking in front, rear and flank; allowing the spirit of righteousness to inspire the little army of Saints, and reversing the motto of Satan, making it, "Right is might" pouring a withering fire into the enemies' ranks, demoralizing him into retreat, and following up the advantages gained.

I wish to assure all my friends among the Saints in England, Australia, Denmark, and America that I owe much to the latter-day revelation for the glorious liberty I now enjoy, for the light, peace, and comfort of the restored gospel, and to let them see something of what is passing through my mind whether right or wrong, in accordance with the precepts of the latter-day work and the spirit of Christ's church on earth.

Fraternal greetings to all,

WILLIAM MOORE.

OWEN SOUND, ONTARIO, December 14, 1914.

Editors Herald: If any distant member of the Owen Sound Branch happens to read this letter I would like very much to get in communication with him. There are those who are still recorded as members of this branch, although we have not heard from some since they left the place. There may be a word of advice or encouragement that would perhaps help some brother or sister over some of the rough places in life's journey. God knows we need one another's help and prayers these days.

We are progressing as usual. Sometimes our hearts are light and we feel glad with the thought that our expectations are almost realized, then something happens and everything we have hoped for falls to the ground, and all is dark before us. Frequently strangers hear our sermons and seem to be greatly interested, then all at once their interest seems to lag for some reason and we do not see them again. Perhaps some day when the morning breaks and the shadows flee we will understand why all these things occur.

Elder Benson Belrose, president of our branch, preached last Sunday night to nearly a full house on the interview

Nicodemus had with Christ, recorded in the third chapter of John. There were a number of strangers present, and all seemed greatly interested. Brother Belrose emphasized the fact that Nicodemus came to Jesus by night. He spoke of many who would embrace the gospel of Jesus Christ if they could only do so at night so that the world could not see.

I was not unlike Nicodemus in some ways. Though not a ruler of people, or by any means educated, I had reached a stage in life bordering on infidelity, and when I was persuaded by a good brother of the church of Jesus Christ, who has since helped me over rough places in life—I say when persuaded by this brother to change my way of living, I went by night. I did not want the world to know that I was so much as inquiring about the gospel of Christ, especially through the Latter Day Saint Church. However, right was triumphant over wrong, and I kept on going to hear the word of God and final salvation expounded, with the result that my wife and I have joined the church, and two of our boys will be following in our footsteps shortly.

For all this I am thankful to my heavenly Father. The spirit of God strove with us until we united with the church of God. I have since covenanted with God that I will consecrate my life in his service, and try during the remainder of my life to atone for my past transgressions and sins against the law of God.

Toronto District convened at this place October 2 and 3, as did the Sunday school and Religio conventions. We had a most enjoyable and profitable time. We entertained about three hundred delegates and members from various parts of the district. Many of us had the pleasure of meeting for the first time Elder J. F. Curtis, who makes the gospel so plain by his demonstrations that a child could understand. Elder Ellis, of Michigan, and Bishop R. C. Evans were also with us. Elder Ellis preached Sunday morning, Bishop Evans Sunday afternoon, and Elder Curtis Sunday night. Elder Curtis stayed over and preached for us on Monday night to a large and attentive audience, on the parable of the laborers, recorded in Matthew 20, using a chart. A number of strangers remarked after the meeting that they never before had the pleasure of listening to such a discourse. As I have said before, it is astonishing the apparent interest which arises at times and then, for no apparent reason whatever, lapses.

I read the HERALD eagerly, and have been blessed many times by the inspiring messages contained therein.

Your brother in Christ,

1168 Avenue West.

R. J. WILCOX.

ORCHARD, NEBRASKA, December 14, 1914.

Editors Herald: Admid the turmoils and tribulations of life, we are still trying to keep the camp fire burning. This latter-day work grows brighter as the days go by. We have been identified with the Clearwater Branch ever since we came into the church. Though we are not many in number, at times we have a spiritual feast. We were made glad when Brother and Sister Charles Sodersten were baptized last fall by Elder J. F. Grimes.

We had the pleasure of assisting Brother O. R. Miller part of the time in a series of meetings at Inman, Nebraska, last fall. Brother Miller is an able defender of the work, and though none were added to the church, we believe much prejudice was removed. We are looking for Brother Miller back to his field of labor again.

Elder J. F. Grimes was with us two weeks and preached in a schoolhouse two miles north of Clearwater nearly every night. He was well received, and we would be glad to see him back again. Brother Kester and the writer have been holding forth in that place Sunday nights since Brother Grimes left.

Brother Rutledge kept the services going at the church when the Saints attended. As branch workers, we are trying to tell the story we love so well, though handicapped to some extent by the cares of life. Brother Kester is on a farm, also the writer, and Brother Rutledge has a rural route.

Sunday last was a gloomy day, the weather and roads being so bad we could not attend church, as we live ten miles out. Realizing that the Saints at Independence were laying the mortal remains of our beloved president in their last resting place, my heart was drawn back to the many wise and loving instructions to the Saints of God by this pure and noble servant. Truly, it can be said of Brother Joseph that the world has been better by reason of his being here. He has been able to live to see the church reorganized with a few scattered members, and developed until to-day it is wielding a powerful influence for good at home and in foreign lands, and in the islands of the sea. While we shall no more behold his face at our conference or gatherings, his memory will still live on and be cherished by the children of God for the faithful discharge of every known duty intrusted to his care.

May God comfort and bless the family in their sad hour of trial, as they realize that he finished his work and fought a good fight, kept the faith and entered in to receive the reward of the true and faithful. We shall continue to pray that God will bless him who is to take the responsibilities and duties laid down by his father. May he be guided and directed in all his deliberations as he occupies in the same humble, prayerful way which was the way of his father.

Hoping to continue faithful to the end, and asking an interest in the prayers of all God's people, I remain,

Your brother in bonds,

F. S. GATENBY.

NEW LISKEARD, NEW ONTARIO, CANADA, Dec. 15, 1914.

Editors Herald: I am in this northern country, where the handiwork of God is displayed on every side in forest, rocks, mountains, rivers, and lakes. Here hidden among rocks no doubt, are gold, silver, and other ore in abundance awaiting the hand of man.

While I have been in nature's realms, my heart has burned within me. I have been made to know and see many hidden things most precious and strengthening to me. Tears have flown in gratitude to God for his loving watchcare over me, and who has given me many remarkable gifts by which I know that God liveth, that the Book of Mormon is true, and that the gospel of Christ is preached in latter days. I stand as a living testimony of the truthfulness of these things. I have received knowledge not of man but of God, for his Spirit beareth witness with my spirit and I know that if I am faithful I shall see him as he is.

I also know that the prophets of old were the true servants of the Master. God answereth me in the joy of my heart and showeth me many plain and precious things; therefore, I owe him my life service. My ambition in life is to meet with his approval, that good may be accomplished, and that many souls may be brought into the kingdom by my faithfulness. Truly God is great and powerful and will fulfill his promises unto those who ask in faith.

May we all be faithful in this great latter-day work, and eventually find rest in the kingdom of God.

In gospel bonds,

THEODORE STONE.

IOWA FALLS, IOWA, December 17, 1914.

Editors Herald: There is no branch here and no other Saints except ourselves that we know of. We get the HERALD every week, and reading the letters of brethren and sisters is like what we read in Proverbs 25: 11, A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver.

We have been blessed in every way since coming here, and feel that God in his infinite mercy and wisdom has indeed been with us. We had Brethren E. E. Long and D. J. Williams with us three weeks, holding meetings one week in the Christian church and the rest of the time at our house. They scattered good seed, which if followed up is sure to bring forth good fruit. Brother Long tells us he will be back here the first of the new year if not otherwise directed, and we hope he will come to us, for there are some I feel sure will come into the church if they can hear a little more of our doctrine. We are anxious to interest enough to have a branch organized. We started a Sunday school and prayer meeting when Brethren Long and Williams were with us, and have had very good success so far.

Since coming to this place we have been brought to realize a little of what the Saints and missionaries in the early days had to endure, when, as Christ said, They shall persecute you and say all manner of evil against you falsely for my name's sake; and when he said, Ye shall be hated among all nations for my name's sake. But we can see that this feeling is gradually wearing away, and that the people no longer look upon us as an enemy.

We are earnestly looking forward to the time when this work will be established here and people will know the difference between the Reorganization and the Salt Lake apostasy. The scoffs and scorns are sometimes hard to bear, but we should ever remember that if we have no cross there will be no crown. Our Savior had these things to bear, and we must also bear them with meekness if we wish to be like him. I speak from sad experience when I say there are those who by their carelessness in former years brought upon themselves conditions under which they can not do that which their conscience tells them is their duty toward God and man. I pray that the time will come when these conditions may be overcome, and we shall stand approved before our Father and our fellow men.

Realizing as we do the conditions as they now exist throughout the world, we should be the more ready to see the necessity of living up to the laws and ordinances of God.

In gospel bonds,

C. S. OLIVER.

HILLSBORO, IOWA, December 17, 1914.

Editors Herald: Many of us have our time so filled with the cares of life that we fail to realize that we have been called of God to help carry on his work. We have gone on unheeding, and when trials, trouble, and affliction came we have been found wanting. Money, fine raiment, etc., are no help in times of great trouble. Let us praise God with deeds of kindness. I realize now where I have come short of duty in the past, and how I have lost by neglectfulness. With others, I wish to be more careful how we serve in the work that has been given us to do.

I am isolated and my husband is not a member of the church. He is a good man; a business man. He is well respected and honored among his business friends. He seems to think that to be a church member would be a disadvantage to his business, and yet he believes in a Christian life. He has seen me brought from the bed of sickness by prayer and faith; he has felt the healing power of God, still he holds back for some reason.

I take the HERALD and Journal of History and enjoy reading the letters and sermons. I delight to hear of the many who are growing better through this work.

I ask an interest in the prayers of all, that God will give me strength to bear the trials that come to me from time to time. I want to let my light so shine that those around me will be led to see the same. Pray for my husband that he may obey the gospel. Oh, that we could commune together in that one blessed love and faith. May God bless all of his weak and forgetful children, that all may be speedily awakened to their duty, is my prayer.

Your sister in Christ,

ZULIAH CLAWSON.

BLY, OKLAHOMA, December 18, 1914.

Editors Herald: I enjoy the letters in the HERALD, especially those from foreign fields. I wonder if any of the missionaries of Germany have met Arthur Slaten, my brother. He is a Baptist minister. The last I heard from him he was at Leipzig. That was over two years ago.

Our lives have been strangely separated. He was an infant and I was only four years old when our mother died. He was adopted by foster parents, and I never saw him again until he was twenty-one years old. When I met him at the train I knew him by the family resemblance. He was then living in Kansas City. I only saw him a few times. He went to Scotland and Germany.

His foster parents were good people. They always had a desire for him to be a preacher and brought him up that way. He is yet studying and in school. He hopes some day to become a great preacher. He once wrote me and asked me how I would like to see LL. D. attached to his name. I then thought it would be grand; but since I have heard the angel's message I wrote him that I thought there were other things better, that I had come to a realization of the truth and had been baptized into the Reorganized Church. He never replied to this. I am still praying he may come to know the right way.

When I think of the great conflict in Germany I wonder how he is faring. I ask the Saints to remember him in their prayers.

I pray that God may bless his people everywhere, and that we may ever be lead by his Holy Spirit and be worthy of his power.

In gospel bonds,

SISTER E. J. LUMM.

WAGONER, OKLAHOMA, December 20, 1914.

Editors Herald: I feel sad over the loss of our dear President Smith. We know him to have been a noble brother, and to have fought a good fight. While we are distressed by his passing, we know that he is only asleep in Jesus for a little while.

It means something to live for Jesus, as this our brother has done. Blessed are those that die in the Lord.

Your sister,

BELLE LENON.

BUFFALO, NEW YORK, December 20, 1914.

Editors Herald: Our work here still moves on, slowly but surely. We have a very good interest, and a feeling that we are one family, all working for the advancement in the world of what we have in the gospel. As the Christmas season and the new year draw near, we feel that we must draw nearer to our Savior in order to resist all that the future may bring to-lead us away from what is right.

We are pleased to report that the president of our branch, who has for some weeks not been able to attend to business, has resumed his duties much improved. Since last writing we have had some added to our list by baptisms and letters of removal.

Your sister,

208 De Witt Street.

AGNES B. BATCHELOR.

WALLACE, FLORIDA, December 20, 1914.

Editors Herald: I was sorry to learn of the passing of President Smith, but I glory in the promise to those who do God's will. We must all soon pass beyond the vale, and it is a grand thing to say at the close of life that we have fought, a good fight, and that there is laid up for us a crown of righteousness. Can we all say this?

In reading the commission given by Christ to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature, do we understand that this command is being obeyed? I wonder sometimes if it is. I have not heard a Latter Day Saint preacher speak for ten years, and not because I do not wish to go to church either. I live in a fairly well-settled country with plenty of churches. I think the people here are just as precious to God as in any other place. Many might believe and be baptized if they could only hear the word. In my boyhood I thought the good work was being begun, and it did quite well, but the elders stopped coming this way. I would be glad if some could come here, as well as go into foreign countries.

I send best wishes and regards to all.

Your brother,

D. C. BEEDE.

Northern Indiana During Holidays

The clipping from the Fort Wayne, Indiana, Journal-Gazette indicates the transparencies, or intellectual microbes floating in space at point indicated. The lectures referred to commenced December 8, and continued six evenings, with extra service on Sunday morning. The cost of hall for the services was $25, and one hundred and fifty chairs, 1 cent each per evening, $9.50; advertising $6, total $40, the brethren paying the cash. We understand the series are working great good. The attendance was very fine. Angola is the seat of the Tri-State School for the Disciples, and Professor Bailey is connected with it.

Answering a long distance call over the telephone, we occupied the auditorium at Salem, Indiana, just eleven miles southwest of Angola. Both of these are new openings. At Salem we held a series of six, between Christmas, and January 3. The audiences were large, some attending for the closing services from fourteen miles distant. Sleighing first class.

The last service, a gentleman arose before dismissal and asked the privilege of a remark. Granted. "Ladies, and gentlemen," said he, Mr. Scott has been with us for six evenings and has asked nothing for his services, while you will agree with me, that he can make his $50 per night on the lecture platform. His eloquence has pierced the armor-plate of Salem, to her good, and I suggest a collection. I appoint Mr. Dorr, and Mr. Clay to pass the hat, and Ed Higbee to guard the door." This brought down the house, as Mr. Higbee is a bachelor. 'Twas a fine collection of $14. He that clothes you, or feeds you, or gives you money, the same is my disciple, if he obey mine ordinances. The same may be said of Angola. Mrs. Kimsy presided at the piano, and the meetings were enjoyed.

Before we concluded at Salem, a letter came from Knox, Indiana, with check for carfare, stating we were announced to give a series of lectures at that place—the papers so announcing—to begin on Saturday evening, before we concluded the Salem series.

We began at Knox, January 13, and concluded the 22d. So at other points, the attendance was larger. I do not remember of such a large attendance there since the days of debate with Clark Braden. A fine interest. One gentleman informed me he came forty miles one evening to hear the prophetic outlines of the latter days. More interest centers there than usual just now.

But while I write, word comes from Flint, Indiana, that Reverend Trowbridge, Disciple, in revival services, has assaulted the Saints, and affirms he "can prove Joseph Smith, the Martyr, practiced polygamy." Another letter from Sylvania, Ohio, states that a Methodist Episcopal minister wishes discussion with the Saints, and he will permit the use of the house for preaching, but we must be prepared to prove up.

So there, now, the big guns are heard on the American side—theological forty-two centimeters!

We can not cope with the calls in the old home district, so here goes to London, and the king's dominion.

Hopefully,

S. W. L. SCOTT.

COLDWATER, MICHIGAN, January 26 1915.

ANGOLA, INDIANA, January 7, 1915.

Editor Journal-Gazette: During a series of lectures here in the Armory hall by Elder S. W. L. Scott, who has been doing ministerial work the past year in the Dominion of Canada, a wrong impression was made current as to the proper attitude of the church which the speaker represented. It can be better appreciated by a conversation which occurred by phone between two representative citizens.

"Hello, Professor Bailey, this is Mrs. Cassel."

"Oh, yes, yes."

"Mr. Bailey, do you know we are having some lectures up in Armory hall?"

"Yes, yes, I know it."

"Well, say, Mr. Bailey, are you coming out to hear the lecture to-night?"

"No, I can't go. I'll be busy, but I intend to come and hear him one night."

"Yes, try and attend one, the lectures are fine."

"Say Mrs. Cassel, do you know what that man is?"

"Yes. He is a minister."

"He is a 'Mormon,' Mrs. Cassel, and is dangerous."

"You don't mean to say he is a Mormon! He is a very smart man."

"He is a smart man all right. He has the cutest, cunningest, craftiest way, but I tell you he is a dangerous man."

"You don't mean to tell me he belongs to the Utah Mormons, do you?"

"Of course he does. That is the reason he is dangerous."

"Well Mr. Bailey, does he believe in polygamy also?"

"Of course he does."

"Does he practice it?"

"I can't say as to that."

"Is he not the man who held a debate at South Scott with Reverend Clark Braden?"

"Yes, yes, he's the man."

"Mr. Bailey, are there not quite a number of these people living around here, and do they believe in polygamy?"

"Yes, there are a number living around here and at South Scott, and they believe in polygamy."

"Well, do they practice it?"

"Oh, no, they don't practice it, They are a nice people. I have the greatest respect for them as a people."

"Well, don't you believe some one should get after him for preaching such a doctrine? Then, Mr. Bailey, why don't you get after him?"

"Oh, I can't, I'm too busy."

Up went Mr. Bailey's receiver, and he didn't even say good-by.

The fact is, Mr. Editor, Mr. Scott represents the Reorganized Latter Day Saint Church, a church which has fought the Mormon Church with its polygamy, and kindred evils, from the beginning.

The church which has done more against polygamy than all other churches combined. A church that stands as the legitimate continuation, in the courts of the land, to the one established agreeably to the laws of this country in 1830.

In the Reed Smoot investigation at Washington, District of Columbia, to establish the eligibility of the Utah senator to a seat with the honorable body, Honorable J. C. Burrows of Michigan, as chairman of the committee, makes the following declaration:

"The courts have repeatedly declared this to be the legitimate successor of the original Mormon Church and its adherents numbering some seventy-five thousand peaceable, patriotic and law-abiding citizens scattered throughout the United States in small church societies, conforming to the laws of the country wherever they may be, and adhering to the faith of their creed, repudiating and denouncing the doctrine of polygamy and its attendant crimes. Without temple, without endowment house or secret order—worship in the open like other church organizations, unquestioned and unmolested."—Congressional Record; also speech pamphlet page 5; see also speech of Senator Dolliver, also Senator Dubois, also Senator Carlyse. We also cite Senator Berry before the Illinois State Historical Society.

Facts have convinced these legislators and judges of mature minds and national repute that the Reorganized Church has been unjustly treated.

Mr. Burrows quotes from Judge Philips in the Temple Lot suit, 1894, in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Missouri. His opinion, involving the title to certain real estate, is as follows:

"Beyond all cavil, if human testimony is to place any matter at rest, this Reorganized Church was one in doctrine, government and purpose from 1830 to June, 1844, when its founder was killed. It had the same general head, governing bodies and faith. During this period there was no schism, no dissension, no parting of the ways in any matter fundamental or affecting its oneness."—Congressional Record, vol. 41, pp. 241, 242.

Mr. Bailey of telephone fame, should make himself acquainted with truth—the facts—before he creates a sentiment against a people, or its representative. In this age, blessed with the facilities for knowing everything, especially of such universal import, if Mr. Bailey don't know any different of the people he seeks to accuse falsely, it is a reflection upon his intelligence. If he does know better, it is a reflection upon his honor. He did not come to hear one of the lectures, which were posted and advertised as follows:

"First night—'Bible prophecies of a latter-day work.' Second night—'Are these the latter days?' Third night—'American archæology.' Fourth night—'Evolution and the Bible.' Fifth night—'European conflict seen through the tubes of prophecy.' Sixth night—'Post mortem repentance.'"

MRS. DELLA CASSEL.

Northeastern Nebraska

This is the second year the writer has labored in the Northeastern Nebraska District. Coming as I did a stranger to the district, it seemed rather hard to accomplish much. There seemed a lack of interest and few opportunities for opening up the work. However, we did the best we knew how.

In the fall, with the aid of some of the Saints near Decatur, we made an effort in two different schoolhouses about five miles from town. One of these proved unsuccessful; the other developed some degree of interest. We held forth at the latter place every night for two weeks, the attendance being all the way from half a dozen up to as high as forty. They were of a refined class of people; we could not have asked for better order and attention. There was not a word or whisper in the room; everyone seemed to feel that it was a sacred place. They were not inclined to talk, but came regularly, and seemed to enjoy it. We were blessed with an unusual degree of liberty and received assurance that there was something there worth working for.

On closing we received an invitation to return, and thinking it best to keep close watch on the place, I concluded to call again before coming home for the General Conference, which I did the latter part of February. On asking for the schoolhouse I was somewhat disappointed to find that the Methodist minister, Reverend Wash, of Decatur, who had attended one meeting during our first effort, had tried to shut us out by asking for the schoolhouse whenever I wanted it. However, we succeeded in getting it for one week, as he did not seem to be ready just then. I have since learned that he used it only one night after I quit.

Upon returning to the field this year, I had hoped that we might accomplish something there, so have made three attempts finding an opportune time beginning during the holidays and closing January 17. Again we enjoyed the power of God's Holy Spirit in presenting the word, spending most of the time on such subjects as "Restoration," "Book of Mormon," "Joseph Smith, was he a prophet of God?"—about three nights on each of these subjects.

Our hearts were made glad presenting the truth with the assistance of the Spirit, men, women and children came to the light. One man approached me with the statement, "I must confess, I was skeptical of this work when I began coming to these meetings; but when a man can prove the work from the scriptures, that ought to be enough for any man, and I will have to give up." This gave me great encouragement, yet I thought best to let him take his time and not urge him to be baptized. Others were taking notes and asking questions. I sold two Books of Mormon.

On Sunday, the 20th, we troubled the icy waters of Elm Creek near Decatur, cutting through about ten inches of ice. Three precious souls were buried beneath the icy wave, Brother A. E. Anson, wife and sixteen-year-old daughter. Others may follow. We feel this will make a fine addition to the branch here, as Brother Anson has six children, some of whom are old enough to be baptized when the weather becomes warmer, and they will likely all attend the Sunday school when summer comes.

The work is progressing rapidly in this part. We have spent some time among the Indians, or Lamanite brethren, this winter, and find them to be quite interesting. There are prospects of some additions among them in the spring.

Last Wednesday evening the Lord spoke words of cheer and comfort to the missionaries and Saints, Brother Knisley having come in time to help in the confirmation of those who had been baptized, which was greatly appreciated. We feel to rejoice more and more in the work, the Lord assuring us that, if faithful, the way will be opened up that the honest in heart may be gathered in.

We believe it pays to follow up an interest we find, even though it is small, and though it takes a long time for results.

That we may all labor together with our might is my prayer.

W. E. SHAKESPEARE.

DECATUR, NEBRASKA, January 22, 1915.

Roseland Mission, Chicago

The Holland mission at Roseland, Chicago, is a live wire at present. We have special meetings here, with Brother J. W. Wight as the speaker, with a good crowd. Our reading room is open daily from 9 a. m. to 5 p. m., except Sunday. This part of our work is much enjoyed in this neighborhood. We are sorry that we have no Dutch publication, and no funds to print tracts or papers. We have a Dutch printer only one block away.

We try to help the homeless in giving them free lodging and one free meal a day. Because of impossibility to find work at present, thousands are without means in our neighborhood. We have already come to the bottom of our provision barrel, and shall have to turn away the poor if financial assistance is not soon forthcoming. These poor victims have read many of our papers. Sorry that we have so few books on file, and so few tracts, about half a dozen kinds. "Mary Morgan" has been read by all, some having read the same over and over.

On March 1 we have to meet our rent, and coal, and gas bill, to the amount of $40.

We seem to be upon the threshold of a spiritual uplift among Dutch- and English-speaking people. God is blessing us spiritually, and we trust material needs will be added. We do not need papers at present.

Yours in the faith,

ELDER AND MRS. SOLOMON M. DULJZERS.

ROSELAND, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, 101 West One Hundred and Fifteenth Street.

'Neath the Southern Cross

The annual conference of the state of New South Wales has just closed, and we are pleased to report that it was a highly successful gathering of Saints. The weather was perfect, not too hot nor too cold; time was conserved because the meals were all served in a hall handy to the church; and a happy combination of business sessions and educational programs left no time for trouble-making while engaged in business making. All business was attended to with promptitude and dispatch; the first session being a business one entirely, the succeeding business sessions being limited to one hour each.

At this conference the district was divided, so that there are now two districts in the state. The Northern District contains five branches, and is presided over by Elder John Jones, who has associated with him in the presidency Elders Amos Ballard and G. H. Parker. Elder Parker is also the district secretary. Its next conference will be held at Tun-curry on Christmas Day and the following day, 1915.

The Southern New South Wales District contains seven branches. Its president is Elder G. W. Stewart, who has as counselors Elders A. J. Corbett and N. Williams. Elder W. H. Broadway is the secretary. The next conference is to be held on New Year's Day, 1916, and the following day.

An inter-district reunion is to be held at Bulahdelah on Easter Sunday and Monday, 1915. The Sunday school and Religio associations hold conventions the two preceding days.

This conference indorsed the proposal of the Australasian Board of Publication to erect a printing office and mission headquarters on the vacant land next to the Saints' church, Rozelle. A strong building committee has been appointed and the work is already in hand. We have had to borrow some money, but that is preferable to paying rent. We secured advantageous terms. This will mean a great forward move for the mission. We will soon have our printing office free of debt, and our publications will then be more successful. Rent has been a heavy item in the past.

A feature of the conference was the "Missionary meeting." Quite a number of our young men had volunteered for service in the mission field. They were full of enthusiasm, so we gave them an opportunity to address the Saints. A number of short speeches were delivered covering such subjects as "Tract distribution," "The use of gospel wagons," "Open-air preaching," "How I prepare a sermon," etc. Solos, duets and quartets by the missionaries, each with a missionary flavor, were interspersed, and the whole succeeded in imparting to the assembled Saints a realization of the earnest spirit in which these young men are going forth.

The result was that everybody wanted to help the tract club to provide tracts for the missionaries and the gospel wagons, and to help in other ways. The writer does not remember ever being in a more inspiring meeting than this one. It was simply grand to listen to these young stalwarts telling of their love for the cause and of their desire to further its interests. It gave us some idea of the value of Australia's resources along the line of missionary raising. God bless the young men and make them mighty in his hands of doing much good on this island continent!

The Saints were also very enthusiastic over the prospects of success with the gospel wagons. They will be successful provided we have men sufficiently devoted to work them, and provided the Saints respond and keep them well supplied with ammunition—literary, temporal, etc. We have good, energetic men to start them out and we look for success.

I am pleased to report that two of our newest men, who went to an entirely new field, send good reports of the way in which they are being received. They are young and inexperienced, but full of faith and courage, and it is possible may do even a greater work than more brilliant men who have neither faith nor courage. May God bless their efforts and give us more such men.

The news of the death of our beloved President was somewhat belated in coming to us. Had the cable people not mixed his identity with that of Joseph F. Smith, we should have known probably before many of the American Saints, but, owing to such confusion, we were in uncertainty for nearly a month. While the news came as a shock, we are reminded of the frailty of mortal existence, and feel to bow to the inevitable, uncomplainingly. We thank God for President Smith's life of usefulness, for the good he did for the church, and for the honorable record he has left behind. We shall as willingly support the successor as we have his father. It is the work of God we are engaged in, and they are the leaders of the men of God.

Our mission work is not likely to suffer by the general war depression. The bulk of our people are in the country, following agricultural pursuits, and have had splendid rains, hence a good season. Prices for all kinds of produce are high, hence the farmer is doing well. We trust that they will remember the Lord's work in their prosperity. Notwithstanding five months of war, we start the year financially stronger as a mission than at the beginning of last year.

Our publishing house is suffering from the slackness of trade. It is in the city, and there is some depression in the large cities. The move to erect a building of our own should relieve the pressure somewhat.

I am preparing for a journey through my end of the mission, which includes New South Wales and Queensland. Unfortunately we are not able to prosecute our work in New Zealand. Elder Savage is still in America, and the other brother who was appointed there has failed us. We trust that ere long Brother Savage may be able to take up his mission among the Maoris, and we will try to assist him with some younger brother from this side, provided no one can be spared from America.

Brother Miller has returned to Victoria. He was with us during the conference. He is a general favorite here. The Saints love men who are active and who show a disposition to push the work energetically. He is making a great sacrifice, and we honor him for it. It is no trifling matter to be so far away from one's dear ones for a lengthy period. Our brother evidently feels it very much, but he "cracks hardy" and never "lets on." May God bless him and his dear ones. They are all "true blue."

Yours fraternally,
WALTER J. HAWORTH.

News from Branches

Saint Louis, Missouri

We are pleased to report a decided spiritual improvement at this place. Prayer meeting attendance is much better than last year, and strength and encouragement have been received.

Brother Wardel Christy has been the speaker most every Sunday morning and evening since the first of the year, and words can not express what our ears have heard and our hearts have felt, in listening to the inspired instruction as he delivered the message from on high to our hungry souls. One honest seeker for truth said she was made to realize while listening to Brother Christy that our ministers were what we claimed, inspired of God. She said she knew they could not speak as they did of themselves. Our worthy pastor, Brother Elliott, and also Brother Archibald, have also spoken words of life to our edification.

The missionary spirit seems to have taken hold of a number which we trust will meet with rich results. Beginning Sunday evening, February 1, and continuing through the week, Brother Christy, with some good assistants, will conduct nightly services. Advertising is to be done, and all are urged to assist in making the effort a success. Two of our young married sisters desire to do what they can in a missionary way by distributing tracts, visiting, etc. May the work be blessed, and continue to move forward.

Our district choir deserves mention because of practice for the beautiful cantata they intend to give during our district conference. Brother Bell has been giving four nights a week to practice, in Lansdowne, Belleville, Saint Louis, and one other of the district branches.

Your sister in Christ,
2739 Greer Avenue. E. M. PATTERSON.

Burlington, Iowa

While we have had something of a "beehive" for the past months, much of our work has had its chief interest locally. We have had some exceptionally good meetings, and good interest in the work of all departments. The gift of prophecy has been manifested in our prayer services three or four times since our last report, and we feel assured that the future is rich with promise if we continue humble and steadfast.

Our pastor, Brother G. R. Wells, has been an active helper in the Sunday school and Religio, and those of our number engaged in the work of these departments are thankful for the direction that sent us such a helper. His clarinet, together with two violins, form an orchestra which has helped materially, both with instrumental selections, and with congregational singing. We are looking forward to the addition of other instruments.

Our Sunday school is fast becoming crowded for room, and we are more than dreaming now of a Sunday school room,—are looking forward to that also as a probable necessity. We understand there is talk of a bazaar later in the season, with such improvements as this in view. The Religio is sharing in the general interest and advancement, and officers and committees are doing good work. Our corresponding secretary has reported the organization of the ladies' class, and within the past few weeks the young men's class has also organized.

Brother Wells has been obliged to leave us for a part of the time in connection with his work as district president, at which times our priest, Brother G. E. Schweers has taken charge of the services, and the presiding deacon, Brother Bauer, also spoke once. Brother Bauer has children and grandchildren growing up in the Sunday school, is himself the teacher of the men's senior class, and his cordial support is encouraging and helpful.

The district conventions and conferences were held here, closing Sunday evening, the 7th. The attendance was not so large as last February, but the interest was good, and we believe the time was quite generally enjoyed. The convention sessions indicated progress and activity. Among other things, the Sunday school convention voted unanimously to voice a desire for some form of teacher's help. One school reported as second grade under the standard of excellence adopted in October, and another reported as qualifying on nine of the ten points and aiming at the tenth. Cradle roll work in the district has been stimulated by the election of a district cradle roll superintendent.

The Religio convention also adopted a standard of excellence for locals, and a committee was appointed to devise ways and means of increasing attendance at convention sessions. There is a tendency to look higher in the program work, which we believe will aid in this direction.

Conference business began Saturday morning, Brother Wells and Brother Herbert Salisbury (vice president) in charge. In addition to routine business, the question of reunion for 1915 was considered, and authority given our member of the committee for the tri-district reunion association to correspond with the Eastern Iowa District with a view to ascertaining their attitude, the Kewanee District having voted to withdraw on a year's notice. A resolution was adopted expressing to our delegates to the General Conference our confidence on the faithfulness and steadfastness of Brother Frederick M. Smith as successor to his father, provided the call of the Spirit to him and to the church indicates that it is now time for him to accept that office.

Saturday evening Brother O. R. Miller, formerly pastor of the Burlington Branch, was the speaker. Sunday there was a young people's prayer meeting at 8.30, Sunday school at 9.30, preaching at 10.45 by Brother C. E. Willey, who was here for a few days from his field in the Kewanee District. Prayer and sacrament service was held in the afternoon, when a message of admonition and promise was given. Brother James McKiernan preached the closing sermon in the evening. We heard expressions of appreciation of the sermons of the conference, and of the other services and sessions as well, and felt that as a whole, it promised well for the coming year.

AGENTS' NOTICE

I am still receipting for tithes and offerings, but have changed my address from Howlett, Michigan, to 1197 Fourth Avenue, Detroit, Michigan, just across the street from the church. In sending money by postal order, draw order on Detroit instead of Howlett as before. I hope to be in a position to see all who come to the city. Those who do not come may send to me.

We can do more for God than in the past. The magnitude of the work is getting greater, and, as it is an individual warfare, let us not shrink our duty. We have some noble workers in our district, and God is blessing them. Let us all try to see what we can do this year by way of assisting what we can with our mite, helping to swell the tide. God alone knows what good can be done to us as well to those who are assisted by our means.

Doctrine and Covenants 65 tells us this is a day of tithing. Therefore let us be earnest in our struggle, remembering the promises in Malachi 3, so that we lay up treasures in heaven instead of on earth. Let us have the faith of Jacob who trusted God. Read Genesis 28 and 29 and see what God did for Jacob after he trusted him. God is no respecter of persons. Let us try him.

W. F. SMITH, Bishop's Agent.

General Conference Visitors

For information of those planning to attend General Conference, Lamoni, Iowa, beginning April 6, 1915, as also Religion and Sunday school conventions, beginning April 2, the committee appointed by Lamoni Branch wish to say:

The Saints of Lamoni will have a first-class dining hall in operation, serving meals to all who wish them at the following prices: Club breakfasts 10, 15, and 20 cents; dinner 25 cents; supper 20 cents.

Those in charge of dining hall wish to get in touch with a forelady who will take this position during the time it is open for meals. There are also a few opportunities for those wishing to serve tables in payment for their meals. Send these applications to Amos Berve, Lamoni, Iowa, at once.

Entertainment in homes will cost those who make such arrangements $4.50 per week, board and lodging. Lodging and breakfast will be served in homes to those unable to go out to breakfast, at reasonable prices.

Rooms in private homes will be $1 per person per week.

In order to the best work by the committee, those contemplating attending should not delay in letting the committee know that they are coming, fully informing the committee of their needs and wants. CHURCH OF THE SOCIAL REVOLUTION.—Bouck White. Church of the Social Revolution, 42 Washington Square, South, New York. 25 cents. The author of this book is the founder and leader of the Church of the Social Revolution of New York City, which holds services each Sunday afternoon at Bryant Hall, and invites the people, "Come, sing with us the folk upheaval and grow a Socialism of the heart." This little fifty-six page book is a socialistic appeal coming from the man who figured so prominently in agitations in the city of New York during the past winter, when the problem of the unemployed assumed such a critical phase. If we remember correctly, this is the man who, with others, was clubbed and maltreated by policemen and others, because he ventured into the church known as Rockefeller's Church, and ventured to ask certain questions of the pastor. In his opening pages the author says: "Here at the start-off, we tell you that ours is a dangerous and contraband cause. Therefore if you are of the faint-hearted, the unspirited sort, come not. You belong not to us. Nor we to you. If slippers and the chimney corner are to your taste; if you understand life in terms of comfort and sordid indulgence; if you would that all men should speak well of you; if jibes and the assembly of the mockers, turn your face into paleness; if the prospect of prison bars gives you weakness of knees; if, you deem life, with slave status, rather to be chosen than death and the company of the freeborn—then come not. Turn your back to us and not the face. You are not of us. We are not of you."

CAN WE STILL BE CHRISTIANS?—Rudolf Eucken. Macmillan Company, New York. $1.25. Rudolf Eucken is professor of philosophy in the University of Jena, a Nobel prizeman of 1908. The book is translated by Lucy Judge Gibson of Cambridge. In his introduction the author says: "But despite all its reputation and influence, Christianity is being assailed by a passionate movement of protest which is growing in intensity and carrying all before it. It is not the tame and timid doubt which all ages know so well, not a mere failure on the part of individuals to live up to the heroic mood which religion requires of them. No! The antagonism that meets it to-day goes much deeper and is vastly more dangerous. Unbelief was once confined to the few, and those chiefly in the upper strata of society; to-day it lays hold on large masses of people, plunging them now into dull indifference, now into a passion of iconoclastic hate. Figures prove conclusively that the interest in church services and observances is constantly decreasing and that the faithful are rapidly becoming a minority. In our great cities—in Germany, at least—every attack or even aspersion on Christianity meets with rapturous applause. Is such treatment of religion—the religion we ourselves profess—a natural and normal occurrence, and can we find any parallel to it outside of Christianity?" In his closing paragraph, the author reaches this final conclusion: "Our question was whether to-day we can still be Christians. Our answer is that we not only can but must be Christians,—not, however, on the one condition that Christianity be recognized as a progressive historic movement still in the making, but that it be shaken free from the numbing influence of ecclesiasticism and placed upon a broader foundation. Then here lies the task of our time and the hope of the future."

What Our Friends Say

On every side, enemies of our church urge their malicious and untrue statements upon an ever-ready public. What our friends may say, not so persistently presented, goes unheard.

The truth should be presented. Our neighbors should be given an opportunity to know what is right.

The Bureau of Publicity gives you an opportunity to inform your neighbor—every person in your community, at a mere trifle of expense.

The editorial appearing in the "Kansas City Journal" of December 10, 1914, concerning the demise of our beloved President Joseph Smith and the church of which he was leader, should be presented to the people of your community as the views of one who wrote unbiasedly concerning something of which he was informed.

This is printed in leaflet form, entitled, "By their fruits shall ye know them." There is a fitting introduction by Elbert A. Smith. It is sent free, you paying postage only, as follows:

20 leaflets, 2 cents postage; 40, 3 cents; 60, 4 cents; 80, 5 cents. More than 80 must go at parcel post rates, and weigh as follows: 80 to 100, 1 pound; 150 to 300, 2 pounds; 300 to 450, 3 pounds; 450 to 600, 4 pounds; 600 to 750, 5 pounds; 750 to 1,050, 6 pounds. ### NUTTING REPLIES TO EDITORIALS

Our readers will remember that nearly a year ago two editorials appeared in the SAINTS' HERALD in reply to a tract written and circulated by Reverend John B. Nutting, secretary of the Utah Gospel Mission, of Cleveland, Ohio. Marked copies of the numbers containing these articles were mailed to Reverend Nutting at the time, but evidently did not reach him. Recently we have received from him the following communication:

A BRIEF REJOINDER

TO THE EDITORIAL IN ISSUES OF MARCH 11 AND 18 LAST, CRITICIZING STATEMENTS OF MY TRACT AND LETTER

By Reverend J. D. Nutting

The above issues of the HERALD were not seen until loaned one of our missionaries in Idaho, last August. They have just been received from the publishers, and lest it be thought that "silence gives consent" I will take time for brief reply.

The matter in controversy is the basic "revelation" of Mormonism, in which Joseph Smith (in 1820) states as follows: "I was answered that I must join none of them, for they were all wrong . . . that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt; that 'they draw near to me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me; they teach for doctrines the commandments of men, having a form of godliness, but they deny the power thereof.' He again forbade me to join with any of them. . . ."

My comment in the tract on this passage is that not one statement is true, hence it could not possibly be from God; the churches in 1820 were not all wrong, their members not all corrupt, their creeds contained the very truths Christ taught and hence could not possibly be an abomination; the church members were the best people on earth and hence could not possibly be the false hypocrites which the above statement makes them out to be: and that to put such false statements into the mouth of the Almighty was blasphemy as well as falsehood.

The reply argues that the statements above, unlimited and universal though they clearly are, do not mean what they say; that certain ministers of the denomination to which I happen to belong—one of them known widely as extreme in his "social" views of the mission of the church—hold that the church is not where it should be, by far; and that certain changes have been made in doctrinal statements of my denominational councils.

I submit that the statements quoted above are all universal, or at least generally characteristic, in form, and must be so understood; to use them in any other way is taking unwarranted liberties with the text. When the Lord is said to have said that the churches were "all wrong" people who believe in a Lord who knows grammar are compelled to take the words just as they read, and they can not possibly mean less than that the churches were as a whole and characteristically wrong; while they might even mean that every single one was wrong in every single respect. I take it in its lowest possible meaning for the present use; and it is proven clearly untrue by the facts of church history, even in this best possible phase in which we can look upon it.

So with "all their creeds were an abomination in his sight"; it may mean that every item in every creed was thus; the least it can possibly mean is that all the creeds of all Christian churches in 1820 were characteristically abominable in their teachings; nothing less than this meaning is possible to the expression. I take it in this best possible meaning, again, and it is clearly again false. The creeds of 1820, as now, were the best human condensations of divine truth from the Scriptures that earnest Christian men could make; they embodied the very truths which make the very body of the Scriptures and of the teaching of Christ and his apostles; they were not "an abomination in his sight" at all, however faulty in some statements. A child honestly and heartily trying to understand his father's letter is not "abominable" to him, but the very opposite, no matter how many minor or even great mistakes he may fall into.

As to the phrase "professors . . . all corrupt," the reply argues that the expression "undoubtedly referred to the professional clergy," or indeed to only a part of them. But the only way to determine the meaning is to study the passage itself and the use of such expressions at the time is similar religious connection. It has always been common during my lifetime of over sixty years to call members of a Christian church "professors" of religion; doubtless it was so in 1820. It has never been customary to call ministers "professors" at all, to the best of my knowledge; and I was born and brought up in the East about twelve miles from Joseph Smith's birthplace amid usages doubtless similar to those common in 1820. I do not believe that one single instance can be found in all literature where "professors" is used of ministers as a class or as distinguishing them from other Christians. It has no such meaning here, at all; but designates just the membership of all the churches of Christ, whom it characterizes as hypocrites, as stated above. If it did refer to ministers instead of common Christians it would be only so much the worse. It goes without saying that my characterization of such language as utterly untrue is correct; and that no untruth can of course be accepted as from God. The "reply" to this point is the best that can be made, but it side-steps and is without foundation in fact, to say the least.

Throughout the reply on these points the effort is to make the words above mean less than they can possibly mean, according to the accepted rules of interpretation in courts and everywhere. They must and will stand according to those rules, in their ordinary sense as above, without any special pleading to minimize them; and thus they will never be accepted by thinking people as other than the imposition they are clearly seen to be.

To disprove my statement that not one fundamental change could be found in any important or generally accepted creed in proof that they were abominable in 1820 as stated, the reply quotes a credal statement formulated over two hundred and fifty years ago (one hundred and sixty-two years before Joseph Smith's statement above) and states that this statement "was in force" in 1820. So were many others in the same denomination; and not one was binding on any but the local church which adopted it. From this very old statement he takes items on creation from nothing, God a spirit, God invisible, etc., and by comparing them with a late statement in which says nothing on either point he gathers that the former points have been abandoned! Surely this is a strange way to argue! It so happens that the latest statement of the same denomination, adopted at Kansas City last year, has the following statement in its prelude: "And declaring the steadfast allegiance of the churches composing the council to the faith which our fathers confessed, which from age to age has found its expression in the historic creeds of the church and of this Communion. . . ." Here is the official utterance of the very denomination in question, made since the "reply" was written, stating just what I did and the opposite of what the reply affirms!—that in all fundamentals they adhere, with all other Christian churches, to the same great truths formerly enunciated in their statements of belief. The churches of Christ have not been floundering around in darkness and doubt as to what the great fundamentals of Biblical teaching were (2 Peter 1: 16).

Nineteen hundred years ago Christ promised to his disciples, through all the ages that the Spirit should guide them into all truth. He has done so as to all fundamentals; the churches of Christ are not divided, and have not been so these many years upon such points, though upon minor ones they differ, somewhat,—the points upon which the word and Spirit have not spoken clearly. I do not doubt that it was God's wise purpose that such points should be left for human study and discussion, to develop interest and study and thought, which would be stifled were everything revealed on a dead level of certainty. It has taken time to reach this substantial agreement, and much study; and at present some are departing from it individually, under stress of wrong theories of the Bible; but substantial unity of the faith still remain, and will continue to do so to the end.

Two doctrines are singled out as refutation of my challenge to show fundamental changes in creeds; creation out of nothing and predestination, from the creed of one hundred and sixty-two years before Joseph Smith; and two persons are cited to prove that neither point is held in the denomination to-day. As to both points the statement already quoted from last year's creed of the same church is sufficient: they are essentially held to-day, though the latter with modifications in form.

No generation can think just like a predecessor of two hundred and fifty years before. I have consulted at the moment two theologies, of different denominations, on the creation point, and also two commentaries; and all four assert creation out of nothing, or that the Genesis account affirms the real origination of matter itself, as other Bible passages also teach clearly. "Science," which the reply says denies such creation of matter, does not do so at all, it can not, because it has no knowledge about such matters at all; it can only deny that man can create anything; but about God it can only sit at the feet of inspiration, which says, "In the beginning God!"—in the "beginning," not some point later on.

As to the predestination doctrine, there has no doubt been change, though the doctrine is stiffly held by the strongest men, and I believe by all others in proportion to their knowledge of the facts, though thought of in less arbitrary form than that quoted, as further Bible study has led men to see the truth more clearly. Two hundred and fifty years ago facilities for Bible study were far fewer than since, and of necessity there must be change in statement, and somewhat in content of one's belief, on abstruse points like this.

But such points do not come within the range of my challenge at all. I wrote the word fundamental in my challenge advisedly. The fundamentals of a creed are those upon which the Christian edifice of truth and life is founded; not the things built upon such truths. If the creeds had stated that God was a being of flesh and bones, thus necessarily having sex and limited in place and power and everything instead of being infinite, formerly human and consequently sinful, thus making Christ a sinner and incapable of any atonement whatever, such statements would be fundamental, and changes proven would have met my point. But on no such point can any change of doctrine be found. The teaching about God in his essential nature, as Spirit only, holy, eternal, invisible, omnipresent, omnipotent, omniscient, Father and love, though, also consuming fire, are just what they always have been since creeds began, save possibly improved in statement; the same is true as to the statements about the nature and work of Christ, the Spirit, sin, salvation, eternal life and death, etc. No adherent of the Bible can study it faithfully and come to any very different views on these matters; and the word is the source of Christian beliefs. In details where the word is silent men will of course differ in religious matters as they do on all others which depend on human judgment alone.

In view of these facts I still must maintain that the basic so-called "revelation" of Mormonism can not be believed, because it is contrary to the facts. The churches of Christ were not "all wrong;" their creeds were not an "abomination" to Christ, because they taught just what he did in essentials; the members of the Christian churches were not "corrupt" or hypocrites, but were the truest followers of Christ and the best people on earth, though of course still with many imperfections as were the immediate disciples of Christ himself when on earth, and the churches which were planted and fostered by Paul, and the other apostles. It seems to me that no thoughtful student of the facts can ever accept the so-called "revelation" quoted above as really being anything more than a very unwise and untrue statement of some man, whoever he may be. We are told to "try the spirits, whether they are from God;" and the first way to do this is to compare them with truths already known, in history, etc. By this test the statement quoted surely fails of credibility, even as a human one; much more does it fail of possible belief as divine. For my part I wish with all my heart that everybody would drop all else and get back to the simple but all-embracing truths of the Bible itself, the very word of God! I have nothing but the best of wishes for those who honestly believe differently from myself; but perhaps the above is the best wish, for it includes all others, for both worlds!

CLEVELAND, OHIO, 1854 East Eighty-first Street, January 27, 1915.

Reverend Nutting is positive and aggressive in his attack, but withal courteous, as he is also in his private correspondence with the HERALD Editors. In the same spirit we reply. It may be necessary for us in doing so to reaffirm some of the arguments and republish some of the quotations appearing in the former editorials, as time may have caused our readers to forget them in part, and the effort of Mr. Nutting is to minimize their force.

THE CHARGE AGAINST THE CHURCHES

Quite naturally the charge against the churches contained in the initial revelation to Joseph Smith is resented by Mr. Nutting. No doubt there were men in Laodicea who bitterly resented the revelation to John on Patmos:

I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot: I would thou wert cold or hot. So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth. Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased in goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked.

Mr. Nutting's plea that the churches were and are all right, in perfect accord and good fellowship on all fundamental questions, and composed of the very best people on earth, is quite like the plea put up by the Laodiceans. But now comes one of Mr. Nutting's own associates, one of the very foremost Congregationalists of the day (not the man referred to by him as extreme), the man chosen to preach the sermon at the late National Council held in Kansas City, Doctor Charles E. Jefferson, pastor of Broadway Tabernacle, New York City, and says:

A favorite name for "church" in the early Christian centuries was "Brotherhood." Alas, that it was ever lost!

When we close the New Testament and look around us, we find ourselves in a different world. There is a change in the atmosphere, which is chilling. . . .

The new commandment is the standard by which all churches must be measured, and in the light of this standard the church universal knows herself to be poor and blind and naked. Many city churches are made up of people who do not even know one another, and who do not want to know one another. Too many village churches are composed of people who know one another, and are sorry that they do. The very thing which the New Testament asserts to be the one thing needful, and without which the world can not be won for Christ, is the thing which is to-day least abundant.—The Building of the Church, pp. 49, 52.

WERE ALL THE CHURCH MEMBERS CORRUPT?

Well, that was the atmosphere that Joseph Smith found around him in ecclesiastical circles. For the statement that the churches and the creeds of the day were wrong we have no apology to make. They were not wrong on all points, but they were wrong on numerous vital points.

But the statement, "Those professors were all corrupt" must not be applied as Mr. Nutting applies it. It will not bear such construction. In his tract he says, "Those professors' can mean nothing else but ALL the church members." It means nothing of the kind.

The statement concerning the churches was that they were all wrong. And they were, on many points of doctrine. But the revelation did not say that all professors of religion everywhere were "cor-

CURRENT EVENTS

SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

DIVORCE IN NEVADA.—The Nevada legislature has passed and Governor Boyle has signed a bill reestablishing the six months residence provision, thus restoring the already notorious Reno "divorce mill."

CHINA AND JAPAN.—Negotiations in the matter of demands by Japan on China continue, with the report that the Japanese Government has indicated that such demands as are distasteful to China will not be insisted upon at this time.

PROHIBITION.—The Iowa House on February 23 passed the bill previously passed by the Senate, to submit to popular vote a constitutional prohibitory amendment. Governor Clarke has signed the bill repealing the mulct law, operative after January 1, 1916.

PLUMBERS CONVICTED.—Thirty-six members of the National Association of Master Plumbers have before a jury in the Federal District Court at Des Moines, Iowa, been found guilty of conspiracy in restraint of trade, in violation of the Sherman anti-trust law, said offense being established by resolutions alleged to have been passed by the National Association.

GUN VERSUS ORGAN.—Because the younger members of the congregation installed a piano in a Church of Christ building at Kokomo, Indiana, which his father had deeded to said congregation with the restriction that no musical instruments should be used therein, James McKippie, according to press dispatches, took possession of this church and with a shotgun proceeded to guard it against its desecrators. Arrested for trespass, he gave cash bond for appearance in court and continued his vigil. These people represent the no-organ faction of the Christian Church.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—Reports from Mexico continue to be confusing. Villa forces seem to be successful in the west. In the States of Tamaluipas and San Luis Potosi, troops once loyal to Villa are said to have gone over to Carranza. Word from Mexico City is that Carranza authorities have imprisoned all native Roman Catholic clergy for a ransom of two hundred fifty thousand dollars, and ordered all foreign Catholic priests to leave the country. Secretary Bryan has instructed Consul Canada at Vera Cruz to intervene in behalf of the imprisoned priests.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.—The American steamers Evelyn and Carib have been sunk off the German coast, supposedly by mines. The life of an American assistant engineer was lost with the Carib. The Washington administration has ordered an investigation of the sinking of these vessels. The United States is reported to have submitted notes simultaneously to Germany and Great Britain in the hope of adjusting conditions incident to the naval and trade policy of these countries. The administration is represented as having declined to join the Scandinavian countries in joint opposition to these same policies. In the event of failure on the part of Germany and the allies to insure neutral safety at sea, an embargo on foodstuff shipments to these countries has been suggested in some quarters.

EUROPEAN WAR.—Land action of the past week is overshadowed by activities at sea under the new style of warfare on the part of Germany in connection with the "war zone," in effect since February 18, and by reported victory at the Dardanelles. Since last report in these columns a British collier, a British transport with troops, four British steamers, and an Irish steamer are reported sunk by German submarines and mines. A Norwegian tank steamer is said to have been sunk by a German submarine, whether by design or mistake is not known. Two German submarines are reported missing. The Anglo-French fleet has reduced the forts at the entrance of the Dardanelles. The British admiralty on February 23, announced the Irish Channel and the North Channel, between Ireland, England and Scotland, restricted waters. The Russians state that the German advances from Eastern Prussia have been checked, and that a new battle line has been formed by the Russians on grounds selected. The Russians deny heavy losses in their retreat from Eastern Prussia, and claim success in the Carpathians, with the Austrian right flank endangered. Germany claims gains in Northern Poland. On the western front the deadlock continues with little change. Reports from Berlin via London is that the attitude of Italy, practically on a war footing, is a matter of much concern there. The Austrian Government is confiscating foodstuffs throughout the country. Sir Edward Grey is reported as announcing in the British House of Commons that "with Russia's desire for access to the sea, England is entirely in accord."

NOTES AND COMMENTS

GOODRICH CHANGES ADDRESS.—The Editors are in receipt of a letter from Brother V. M. Goodrich, pastor of the Los Angeles Branch. Brother Goodrich has been confined to the hospital for some time, but is now at home and convalescing. He has found it necessary to change his location in Los Angeles, and the Saints will take notice that his address is now 3511 East Fifth Street Boulevard.

ELDER WALLER VISITS SAN FRANCISCO.—By private letter from Brother G. J. Waller we learn that he had left Honolulu and sailed for San Francisco. His letter was written enroute, February 13, on board the steamship Matsonia. He expects to remain in San Francisco with his family for some weeks. Elder James W. Davis was left in charge of the work in Honolulu during his absence.

EXPRESS CONFIDENCE.—The Lamoni Stake in conference at Lamoni, Iowa, February 27, by unanimous vote passed an expression of confidence in President Frederick M. Smith as the one appointed to succeed his father as president of the church. The Nauvoo District recently passed a similar resolution on a like occasion. The Lamoni action reads:

Resolved, That this body express to their delegation to the General Conference their confidence in President Frederick M. Smith as the divinely appointed successor of his father as president of the high priesthood of the church.

PYCOCK IN DISPATCH.—We have just received a copy of the Sunday edition of the Pittsburg Dispatch for December 20, 1914. In this number Elder James Pycock has an article entitled, "Church of the Latter Day Saints." This article occupies an entire page, and is illustrated. It gives an historical account of the church, the restoration of the gospel, and the origin of the Book of Mormon; also sets forth our ideas on polygamy, church organization, eternal judgment, and other doctrinal points. Brother Pycock is to be congratulated on securing such a hearing through a paper of such wide circulation, and also on the very able way in which he has occupied the space thus placed at his disposal.

MISSION SUCCESS.—Elder Rudolph Etzenhouser is meeting with excellent success in mission work in South Dakota, particularly at Spearfish. In the Spearfish Enterprise for January 30, 1915, he appears with a two-column article, which he introduces as follows:

On Friday, January 22, there were immersed in Spearfish Creek seventeen persons—nine adults and eight young people over twelve years of age. Several of these were members of the local Methodist Church and nearly all the rest attendants. That people should go from an institution well established as a local congregation, and of the popular denominations, to one yet to be established in this locality and under the bar of general public prejudices, is at once a question of interest as to why they should do so.

With this excellent opening he proceeded to set forth good reasons why one should unite with the cause that we represent, even in opposition to prevailing public sentiment. The Queen City Mail for February 3 also contains an editorial mention of Brother Etzenhouser's work and in explanation of the difference between the Reorganization and the Utah church.

Half the world is on the wrong scent in the pursuit of happiness. They think it consists in having and getting, and in being served by others. It consists in giving and serving others.—Henry Drummond.

NUTTING REPLIES TO EDITORIALS

rupt." Instead of using the term all it used the term those, clearly referring to a certain number, or class, as distinguished from all.

And that class included the teachers of doctrine. It did not apply to the laity in general, the world over—men, women and children, good old pious grandmothers and innocent blushing maidens, as Mr. Nutting would argue. It applied to the men who made it their business to define and "teach" the doctrines of the day; to all those of whom it was said, "they teach for doctrines the commandments of men." They were corrupt; not everyone who was a member of some church.

God would not have made such a charge against all church members; and Joseph Smith would not have invented such a charge, for his own mother, brothers, and sisters were at that time members of one of the leading churches.

There had just been a demonstration of the corruption of certain of the clergy. They had joined in apparent good-fellowship in holding a great revival service. But at its close the mask of brotherly love was stripped away, and they fell into an unseemly and ungodly quarrel over the division of the spoils,—the converts. The great lack of love deplored by Mr. Nutting's distinguished associate, Doctor Jefferson, was at once manifested.

As we said in our former editorials of the language quoted:

It might logically be held to refer strictly [and solely] to those particular clergymen who had been conspicuous in holding the revival, at that time just closed, during which the attention of Joseph Smith was attracted to religion. Their doctrinal controversies and ungodly strife he had in mind when he went into the forest to pray for divine light that he might know which one of the contending parties was right. But we are not averse to having the meaning of this language extended to include anyone in any denomination who was then or is now guilty of "teaching for doctrine the commandments of men," and honoring God with his lips while his heart is reserved for other service.

THE "SLIDING SCALE" IN CREEDS

We come not to a discussion of the alleged change in the creed of Mr. Nutting's church, the Congregationalists. It will be remembered that in our former editorial we referred to his challenge in a private letter dated August 20, 1913, in which he said:

I challenge you to produce one fundamental point upon which one important or generally accepted creed of a Christian church has been essentially changed.

Mr. Nutting's own denomination was accepted for the test.

Passing by the other points we take up that of predestination. Replying to us, Mr. Nutting seems undecided what course to pursue regarding this very troublesome old skeleton in his family closet.

He assures us that this doctrine of his church is something formulated over two hundred and fifty years ago, indicating that it is something very old and outworn, a thing of the dim and distant past,—as it certainly should be.

Later on, however, he reconsiders, and declares that it is still held without essential change, indicating that it is something vital, unchanging, worth hanging onto from generation to generation.

But still later he assures us that it is not a fundamental matter, being a negligible quantity, not worth mentioning as between gentlemen and friends.

He reminds us of the lawyer who was defending a client accused of borrowing a copper kettle and returning it in a badly cracked and damaged condition. The lawyer said, "I will prove, first, that my client never borrowed the kettle; second, that he returned it in good condition; third, that it was cracked when he got it."

THE KETTLE AS IT WAS IN 1820

Now as to the presence of that doctrine in Congregationalist creeds in 1820 and later: We quote from a work entitled Creeds and Platforms of Congregationalism, by Williston Walker, Ph. D., professor in Hartford University, a work to which we were referred by the head of the Andover Theological Seminary (Congregationalist) for an authoritative statement. The quotation refers to the Savoy Confession of faith of 1658, and is as follows:

Adopted by Massachusetts Synod at Boston in 1680 with a few immaterial modifications, and similarly accepted for Connecticut at Saybrook in 1708, its doctrinal confession long continued a recognized standard for the Congregational churches of America. They have never formally set it aside, and though in Congregational polity a general creed has binding authority only in so far as local churches accept it, this Savoy Confession, as slightly changed in 1680, was declared by the Council of 1865—an assembly representative of the whole body of the Congregational churches of the United States—to embody substantially the faith to which those churches are pledged.—Creeds and Platforms of Congregationalism, p. 353.

This confession of faith, then, was not a thing solely of two hundred and fifty years ago. It was vital and in force as late as 1865. The plea that each local congregation is bound alone by its own creed will not suffice. This creed was indorsed by the Great Assembly of 1865, representing "the whole body of the Congregational churches of the United States—to embody substantially the faith to which those churches are pledged."

That confession, still in force when Joseph Smith had his first vision, 1820, and in force as late as 1865, "representative of the whole body of the Congregational Churches of the United States," contained this statement of faith:

By the Decree of God for the manifestation of his Glory, some Men and Angels are predestinated unto everlasting Life, and others foreordained to everlasting Death.

These Angels and Men thus predestinated, and foreordained, are particularly and unchangeably designed, and their number is so certain and definite, that it can not be either increased or diminished.

Those of mankinde that are predestinated unto Life, God, before the foundation of the world was laid, according to his eternal and immutable purpose, and the secret counsel and good pleasure of his Will, hath chosen in Christ unto everlasting Glory, out of his Meer free Grace and Love, without any foresight of Faith or good works, or perseverance in either of them or any other thing in the Creature, as Conditions or Causes moving him thereunto, and all to the praise of his glorious Grace.

As God hath appointed the Elect unto Glory, so hath he by the eternal and most free purpose of his Will foreordained all the means thereunto: Wherefore they who are elected, being fallen in Adam, are redeemed by Christ, are effectually called unto Faith in Christ by his Spirit working in due season, are justified, adopted, sanctified, and kept by his power through Faith, unto salvation. Neither are any other redeemed by Christ, or effectually called, justified, adopted, sanctified and saved, but the Elect only.

The rest of mankinde God pleased, according to the unsearchable Counsel of his own Will, whereby he extendeth or withholdeth mercy, as he pleaseth, for the glory of his sovereign power over his Creatures, to pass by and to ordain them to dishonor and wrath for their sin, to the praise of his glorious Justice.

A CHANGE OF FRONT

Their creed of 1883 does not contain that doctrine, nor does any creed adopted since that date, so far as we know; notwithstanding the affirmation of the late National Council declaring the allegiance of churches composing the council to the faith which the fathers confessed. That is a blanket affirmation. The doctrine itself is omitted. Its presence in the creed in 1820 marked the creed as wrong and certainly very objectionable to God.

As directly opposed to the original statement in force in 1820 that a certain fixed number of men God had been "pleased" to pass by and foreordain to dishonor and wrath, the creed of 1883 said: "We believe that God would have all men return to him." What a change of front!

In personal letters to the HERALD Editor Reverend H. A. Bridgman, editor of the Congregationalist and Christian World, Doctor Charles E. Brown, of the Divinity School, Yale University, and Doctor Charles E. Jefferson, all prominent Congregationalists, frankly admit that those old views are not now held by the Congregational churches to-day.

MOVE OUT INTO THE LIGHT, BROTHER NUTTING

Mr. Nutting may still cling to his old ideas. On this question of predestination, W. Arthur Wright, Ph. D., D. D., says:

We will need to say little of that limitation of the atonement which has been attached to the doctrine known as Calvinistic, which limitation was in regard to the number of those who were intended to receive its benefits. That doctrine has been the cause of an age-long battle in the theological field. Probably no influential thinker in the world now holds it. It may be believed in some belated and benighted corner of the earth; but even there it will disappear when that deprived section shall come into contact with the present world's thought.—The Problem of the Atonement, p. 79.

If Mr. Nutting is still in a belated and benighted corner of the earth he should move out into the light. The fact is that there has been a marked change of belief, constituting a tacit confession that the creeds were wrong, as the revelation said they were. If there has been no change, the charge that they were wrong still stands, and the change should be made at once so that they may conform to the changed ideas of the great unwritten creeds.

MOHAMMEDANISM VERSUS CHRISTIANITY

Nor will it do to argue that this is not a fundamental point of doctrine. Apparently Mr. Nutting would regard some statement about the body and form of God as fundamental and terribly vital. But he does not consider of importance a dogma that made God to appear in character as a monster of injustice, a partial, vengeful, unreasoning deity, such as Clarke says is set forth in the Mohammedan tradition:

According, when God—so runs the tradition,—I had better said the blasphemy—resolved to create the human race, he took into his hands a mass of earth, the same whence all mankind were to be formed, and in which they after a manner preexisted; and, having then divided the clod into two equal portions, he threw the one half into hell, saying, "These to eternal fire, and I care not"; and projected the other half into heaven, adding, "And these to paradise, and I care not."—Ten Great Religions, part 1, p. 479.

Opposed to this is the true conception:

For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Savior, who would have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth.—1 Timothy 2: 3, 4.

Space will not permit a discussion of the question as to whether or not God created matter out of nothing. Be it remembered that the statement is, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." It is not said that in the beginning God created matter or substance. We believe in the declaration that the "elements are eternal," as God is eternal.

On this point, Sir Oliver Lodge, president of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, at once scientist and believer says:

We can not conceive the origin of any fundamental existence. We can describe the beginning of any particular object in its present shape, but its substance always existed in some other shape previously . . . ultimate origin or absolute beginning, save of individual collocations, is unthinkable.—The Substance of Faith, p. 71.

With Mr. Nutting we find a point of agreement in the wish that the day may soon dawn when men everywhere will drop all man-made creeds and doctrines and turn to the word of God for direction and salvation.

GOVERNMENT

NUMBER 3.—THE KINGDOM OF GOD

BY S. A. BURGESS

[The series of three articles under this heading were written during the summer of 1912, and appeared consecutively in the Autumn Leaves in the year 1913. They are presented here as being worthy of repetition and a wider circulation. Allowance should be made for governmental changes since their first publication.—EDITORS.]

SUMMARY

We have already considered in a general way the monarchial and democratic forms of government. The monarchy literally means a government by one man, and may be either absolute or limited. A limited monarchy is sometimes limited by a constitution, and is called a constitutional monarchy. Democracy is a government by the people, and may take either of two forms, direct government by the people, as in the case of the New England town meeting, the Russian Mir, and in the Grecian states in antiquity; or it may be a republican form of government, which term is used and now applied to representative governments, although it is not literally to be so taken.

For instance, in the United States, the legislative work is done by Congress and the State legislatures, to which the people elect their representatives. The judges are in some instances directly elected, and in some instances appointed by the executive. The executive officers, that is, the government of the States, are usually elected directly. The president of the United States is elected by our representatives, the electors from each State. In theory we have nothing to say about the election of the President. In fact, it is doubtful if an elector would dare to vote contrary to his instruction, so that, in fact, we do directly elect the president.

It is worth while looking beyond the form of government, since in this country we have a representative government by the people, in form a democracy, yet in fact the instances have been too often multiplied to show that our representatives do not really represent us. At the date of this article the most important instance before us is the national conventions of the various parties. Such things have been going on for years, but we are only just coming to realize them; so of late years the papers have been full of instances of misrepresentation by the various State legislatures, Congress, and the municipalities.

England, on the other hand, is a monarchy in form, yet in fact very democratic, since the House of Commons is elected by the people, and that house determines the ministry absolutely, and the ministry governs in the name of the king. Since the ministry, which represents the majority of the House of Commons, propose all general bills in the name of the king, he has not even the right of veto. The force of the democracy there has been shown in the extension of the pension system to old folks, and in the taking from the House of Lords the power of veto.

In addition to these two general forms there is also the oligarchy or aristocratic form of government. This is supposed to be a government by the best people, the nobility, but if it were in fact such, it would no doubt have proven much more stable than history shows it to have been. It has suffered in two ways. One is, that an hereditary nobility does not always represent the best people, the ablest men. And, on the other hand, there is a continuing tendency to narrow the limits of the governing class, until it becomes monarchial.

A TWOFOLD PROBLEM

Now the problem that confronts us in government is twofold. One is to secure a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. The other is to secure the fit men. All theorists concede that it should be a government of the people, and also that the government should be for the highest good, or for the people. A government by the people means a democracy. For this we should not need an argument, but may cite the free agency of man; the need for an individual intelligent growth; that under an absolute monarchy the people do not learn government, and then the argument as set forth in Mosiah 13: 24, 28, 35. We can not always secure a good king, and it is unjust to throw the whole weight of government and decision of great questions upon one man, or a very few; the people should bear the responsibility for their own acts and their own government.

On the other hand that government will be the best, other things remaining the same, in which the ablest men are placed in power. This does not mean that the ablest man to sell goods should be made president, or the ablest farmer should be placed on the supreme bench. It means the man best qualified as a farmer is to be a farmer; the man best fitted as a merchant is to act as a merchant; the man best fitted by training and natural gifts to govern should be elected to preside or rule over the nation; and the man best qualified by judicial temperament, and otherwise should be placed on the supreme bench.

That this is a grave problem was recognized as early as the time of Plato, who favored in his "Republic" an aristocracy of experts, an oligarchy of scientists, men highly trained, but devoted to the common welfare. They could not transmit authority or privilege, but were recruited from every social stratum in which ability could be found. These men had unquestioned power; redistributed wealth; transferred children to the class to which their own aptitudes assigned them; censored literature and the drama; in fact, made all decisions and imposed them on the masses, but could not own private property.

This goes farther than we would care to follow, since it places these men in absolute power and has always the danger of selfishness, in that they might seek to use their power to perpetuate their descendants in their privileges. This was guarded against by prohibiting them to own private property, the state providing an inheritance for the children, since the fathers belonged to the state. Yet strong men do not always obey the spirit of the laws, for the temptation is great to use power for selfish profit. Also we are not strongly in favor of too great censorship. But this plan does on the other hand clearly recognize the need of securing the ablest men, and it has the continual privilege of securing the knowledge and experience of the able men to be placed at the service of all. It will be seen that Plato considers heredity as a negligible item, and as we have noted before, modern biology appears to agree with this conclusion as does also history, that the probability that a brilliant man will be succeeded by a brilliant son and a brilliant grandson is very slightly more than it is for the average man.

In Germany, although an empire composed of several lesser states, and so in outward form a monarchy, they have an assembly patterned after our Congress; the lower house, the Reichstag, representing the people; the higher house, the Bundesrath, representing the states. In their municipal government they have taken a most advanced step. They elect their councilmen direct; the council then advertises for a burgomeister, corresponding to our mayor. He must be a man who can show his fitness and qualifications for general government. They also seek out specialists to take charge of the various departments of the city government, and elect and employ them on a suitable salary to secure their best services. These men are elected for a term of years, but are subject to recall at any time, if found unfit, and the council will then fill the vacancy. After serving for a term of years, twelve if memory serves us right, the burgomeister may be pensioned, so as not to continue him indefinitely in the office. This system has an exceptional feature in its logic of government, seeking not for the boss-elected men, seeking not for a business man's administration, but for government by experts, men trained for the special work which they undertake.

Monarchy, as we have already suggested, has the advantage of heredity, so far as that applies. It also has the advantage of trained men. It fails because it does not always secure the best man and because heredity fails of absolute success.

Fisher Ames suggests:

Monarchy is like a merchantman; it sails well, but sometimes strikes a rock and goes to the bottom; democracy is like the raft; it never sinks, but your feet are always in the water.

Now how can we in government secure at once the safety of the raft and the splendid sailing powers of the merchantman, and yet keep our feet dry?

THE KINGDOM OF GOD

Now what is the government of the kingdom of God? We note it is spoken of in the sense of a kingdom and so a monarchy. Yet in the beginning, man's free agency was not only conceded but declared. The principles of common consent are shown in Jewish history, and especially in the earlier part. Also among the earliest revelations to the church in this day is the principle of common consent. Every possible effort seems to have been made to conserve the interests of the people, and to insure a government by the people.

HEREDITY

Now from our previous argument we would expect heredity to be recognized to a certain extent, but by no means exclusively, and we find this to be the case. A certain right recognized in sons to take up the work of their fathers. This provision has the advantage of heredity, the slight probability that such a man will be more able than a man from an ordinary family, and elsewhere. It has also the advantage of training to a certain extent in the family and the interest aroused in taking up a father's work. Yet this right is limited by qualifications and fitness, and it is the humble opinion of the writer that the church will call a man three times because of heredity alone, because he is his father's son, where our heavenly Father will not call him once. This element of fitness must be first declared by revelation or call from God, through the proper authority. Also if we read the record correctly, the work is intrusted to the men of the church and their descendants, not a few families only, as a hereditary autocracy. Children brought up in that general environment, children, who are descendants of Latter Day Saints for two or three generations, that is, presuming that Latter Day Saints have lived their religion will have through the cleaner lives of their ancestors a great advantage over the children of the world. They also will have the teachings of the church from their very earliest recollection, so would be trained to consider all the problems and work lying before the church; yet this by no means excludes fit men, who may come from the world. The church and work of God deserves the best.

We have many times found young men who were fearful that they would be called and forced to act in the same positions that their fathers have occupied in the church. In the first place we can hardly conceive of their being given the responsibility until they have been fitted for the work, and therefore, it need not be a matter of anxiety in the earlier years of life. It need not prevent them from playing ball as boys, or leading natural, wholesome lives. When the time comes, if the Lord wants them he will make it known and see that they appreciate the necessity. But further, history does not sustain the idea that the son will always succeed his father. First, only one son could succeed at one time to any one position; in the second place, even that has happened but rarely; and in the third place, they are called upon to engage in the work to which their fathers have devoted time and ability, to-wit, the work of God, so there should be no excuse for wrong living, for every son should follow in the footsteps of his father in devotion to the interests of the church, even though it be not always in the same position of responsibility.

The history of the church, as we study the officers of the leading quorums, shows in the first place a number of men who have come directly from the world and have been ordained to prominent positions in the church. It shows but very few instances where a father has been succeeded by his son. To our mind this does not reflect upon the morality of the son or upon his qualifications for citizenship in the kingdom of God; but it is just possible that our heavenly Father with an all-seeing eye may choose the most fit man for the work that lies before the church, taking every qualification into consideration. For in studying the history of the kingdom of God in ancient times, as set forth in the Holy Scriptures, and also of the people on this continent, as set forth in the Book of Mormon, it appears but rarely that the principle of direct heredity has been applied and the father has been succeeded by his son in the same office for long dynasties. In the church in these days the most marked instances are the descendants of Joseph Smith, the Martyr, acting in the First Presidency. Otherwise, the instances are few. It would appear both from the law and history that the principle of heredity should be considered, but it is not conclusive; for that by divine call God will choose the fit man ultimately for the work, if we will permit him.

And further, in considering the First Presidency, we have in a sense the idea of monarchy carried out, since they hold office for life, other things being equal, and since we find the First Presidency are not only the chief executive, but preside over the highest judicial court, and also act as a legislative body: centering, therefore, all the three fundamentals of government in the one body. In their executive capacity they also have jurisdiction over the finances and other interests of the church, as well as over the spiritual, and as prophets of course they act in a way not generally considered in the law of government, that is, receive revelations for the church.

Yet it is the First Presidency and not one man. There are three to the quorum. Secondly, each man is not only called, but also the revelation calling him must be accepted by the church in General Conference assembled. Even after ordination any member of the First Presidency may be called in question before a distinct court, to-wit, the Presiding Bishop and his counselors and twelve high priests. Further, the church as represented in General Conference has the right to sustain or to refuse to sustain any member in the Presidency. Nor is this an idle vote, as we can see in the case of Frederick G. Williams; so that yearly the tenure of office may be terminated by the body. Further, in the judicial capacity there are two courts to consider a case before it reaches the High Council, as only in a few cases does the High Council take original jurisdiction. Also in the legislative capacity there are two other quorums, the Seventy and Twelve, and finally before it becomes a law to the church it is submitted to the General Conference for their approval or rejection.

On the administrative side the great bulk of questions is decided by branch, district or stake presidents; high priests, elders and members of the lesser priesthood acting in executive capacity. Even in the case of a revelation from God, it is submitted to each of the quorums separately, after being presented by the Presidency, and must then be presented to the church in General Conference for acceptance or rejection.

In the first article we suggested that the idea of a monarchical form of government was derived from priesthood, and there related a story in which the argument was set forth that the kingdom of God on earth is patterned after the kingdom of God in heaven. In heaven God speaks and all creation says, Amen. On earth, the First Presidency speaks and all the church says, Aye.

Now, from what we can learn of the kingdom of God in heaven, our heavenly Father does not require a blind and unanimous amen. He granted to man his free agency. Lucifer fell, because he desired not only the glory of God, but also to use that power and glory to compel all men to be saved. That does not appear to be the divine plan so far as it is set forth in Holy Writ; but rather that our heavenly Father permits both on earth and in heaven, to each individual his free agency to choose or reject his word and will. The consequences, of course, will follow a rejection. And the Father, while weeping over the suffering of his children, still will not interfere—because he wants not a blind, terrorized submission, but the support and obedience of an intelligent entity, a son, who shall keep the right because it is good, and who will keep his commandments, because he loves him.

So in the Presidency of the church and kingdom of God on earth, there is no call for a blind submission, but at every point there is a check, the power of approval or disapproval, the power of recall in the body and its officers.

These principles, which have been set forth in regard to the highest office in the church, apply to each and every officer therein. The general officers, the Twelve, high priests, including bishops and evangelists, and the seventies must not only be called, but also approved by the church in General Conference. On the work of each one there is in the law a check by representatives of the body, and finally by the body itself, as those who have attended the General Conference with open eyes can not fail to see. To no man is there granted absolute power, nor to any set of men. Yet there is an effort to use not only the best intelligence within the church, but also divine inspiration as well, to designate the fit men for the several works.

Also in the most absolute office in the church in a sense, (the president of a branch), the man who comes immediately as a priest after the order of Melchisedec to speak to the people as God, to pronounce a curse upon them, if they do not do exactly what he says (we are not presenting this as a universal or even a usual picture, but only an occasional one, as in our experience we have found more of this spirit of dogmatism in branch administration than in the First Presidency, or any other of the general officers of the church)—even then, in the branch the branch has the right to elect or refuse to elect any individual at regular intervals. They have also the right of appeal to the district presidency, and from the district presidency to the missionary in charge, and to the First Presidency, in the case of usurpation in office, or any matter of administration requiring further consideration, in which earlier satisfaction has not been secured. And every man who is called to office, whether deacon, teacher, priest or elder must first be called by a man having authority from God through the revelation of the Spirit of God to him, and is then presented to the church for their acceptance or rejection; and as a further protection a man is not to be called to the office of elder in districts without the approval of the district conference, as well, and especially of those men holding Melchisedec priesthood.

To the writer the plan of the kingdom of God both for the government of the church of earth, and elsewhere so far as it is revealed, presents and preserves the very best in the monarchical form of government, while rejecting those parts which in the history of man have proven undesirable. It also presents the best democracy, the fullest protection of the people, and at the same time protects against the inherent weakness of democracy, as shown through long tests, and secures at once the able man. It should be remembered that, as set forth in first article, this plan of government was laid down first, and the errors of men in government have been, in a sense, derivatives therefrom.

GOVERNMENT FOR THE PEOPLE

The government of the people, no ruler, monarchical or otherwise would question. All government is of the people. Government by the people has just been considered above. There remains now, government for the people; and it is in this particular that the governments of men have come the nearest to a failure, and have been the weakest, as selfishness has hindered any government for the people.

And there was also a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest. And he said unto them, The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors. But ye shall not be so: but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve. For whether is greater, he that sitteth at meat, or he that serveth, is not he that sitteth at meat? but I am among you as he that serveth.—Luke 22: 24-27.

Other passages might be quoted to the same effect. Thus when we consider the temptations of Jesus on the mount: First, he was tempted to make stones bread; to exercise his power to satisfy his fleshly passion, but in a more exact sense, a utilizing of the divine gift, the special power from God on self. Next it was the test of vain show to cast himself from the pinnacle of the temple, to use divine power in self-glorification for show. But finally comes the test to which we wish to especially refer, where the Spirit took Christ into a high mountain, and Satan came and showed him all the kingdoms of the world, and offered them to him if he would fall down and worship him. Take it as we may, it was a temptation to betray his holy gift, whether he was to use his own power, or whether it was from some gift of Lucifer, to make him a ruler over the nations of the earth.

Now was this wrong, that he should desire, or that he should be a ruler over the nations of the earth? Not at all; for prophecy has declared that he should sit on the throne of his father David, and again that the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ. It was the divine will that he should rule. But there is this fundamental difference; Satan wished him to use his special knowledge and gift from God for self-aggrandizement, for self-exaltation,—to use a gift for his own glory that was placed in his hands for the blessing and healing of the nations.

In the divine plan, Christ rules not as the Gentiles rule, as one who exercises dominion, but because he is the one best fitted and most qualified in every way to rule, because his rule would be the highest possible type of government; because he would sit not alone as a ruler, but also for the blessing and healing of the nations, and for service to humanity. Hence, he went through the bitter test of preparation, that he might be fitted and tried in all things. This is the difference between ruling for the benefit of self and a government for the people.

And so in the priesthood, the privileges of the priesthood are in the highest and best sense a service. Whether it is the deacon to care for the house of God, to be a doorkeeper in the house of the Lord; the teacher, to leave his family, to visit the Saints, to correct iniquity and help the return of the erring one to right; the priest, to visit the home of each member to instruct and teach, and to administer the sacrament ("Which is the greater, he that sitteth at meat, or he that serveth?"), or in bitter, cold weather to enter the waters of baptism, there is a joy in the good accomplished, but not, especially in the wintertime, a physical pleasure in such an office. And the elder, in addition to these duties already set forth, is called forth by day or by night—to administer to the sick, to bless children, confirm new members—all is for others. If this work is rightly performed it is not as a privilege, but it is a service to God for the people. So can we consider also the work of the patriarch, both as an evangelical minister, and in blessing of the Saints; it means a joy that comes from a work and service well done.

All through the priesthood, from the lowest unto the greatest, there is this thought of service, and not of honor to the individual or self; nor is there, even where the principle of heredity applies or is set forth, the idea that the individual has the right to the honors and powers of the priesthood, so much as there is the calling of the most fit individual for the service of the body.

AN IDEAL GOVERNMENT

So, in conclusion, to our mind the government of the kingdom of God is ideal, and the nearest approach to perfection of any that has ever existed on the face of the earth. Through error men have corrupted one principle or another, and so have made, in time, various forms of government, which are good, so far as they approach the ideal. And as ancient Israel was called to be the nation of kings and priests unto God, so do we take it in a similar sense when it is declared,

Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters?—1 Corinthians 6: 2, 3.

Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; and whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant.—Matthew 20: 26, 27.

This leaves no room for personal ambition, but only for a preparation as Saints of God, and for whatever special service he may desire at our hands.

The true king is the Lord's anointed priest, i. e., a minister and servant of the people.

SOCIAL CONDITIONS IN GERMANY

The pangs of hunger are beginning to be foreseen in the Fatherland, to judge from official and unofficial utterances in the German press. The Prussian Ministry of Commerce and Trade has prepared a remarkable proclamation adjuring the people to observe a Spartan economy. Governors of provinces have been instructed to display it conspicuously, and it is ordered to be posted in railroad depots, schools, law courts, in factories and mills, and, "in short, everywhere there is a large traffic of persons." This proclamation is . . . cast in a form not unlike the ten commandments. The last three of them are the most remarkable, and, according to the Berlin Lokal Anzeiger, run:

8. Eat war-bread (Kriegsbrot). It is recognizable by the letter K. It satisfies and nourishes as thoroughly as any other kind. If we all eat it, we do not need to be anxious as to whether we shall always have bread.

9. Whoever first peels potatoes before cooking them wastes much. Therefore cook potatoes with the jackets on. Thou savest thereby.

10. Leavings of potatoes, meat, vegetables, etc., which thou canst not use, throw not away, but collect them as food for cattle. Such leavings will gladly be called for by the farmers.

The Berlin Woche publishes a strong article in which it admonishes all patriotic Germans to confine themselves to bread made from potato-flour, as "wheat is scarce and corn may soon become scarce," It continues:

As a matter of fact, the Government points out, there is no reason why the people should object to semi-potato bread—only prejudice can prevent its general use. And in this respect we appeal to the patriotism of the German people. The man or woman refusing to eat the new bread is lacking in patriotic duty.

It is from the Socialist papers we learn most of conditions now prevailing in the Fatherland, for they have a habit of being perversely outspoken. Thus the Berlin Vorwärts says:

Business in many towns is completely closed down. A small part of the men thrown out of work are leading a miserable life, with paltry wages, at emergency jobs. The remaining thousands and ten thousands have nothing but the trifling support of their trade-unions, which is hardly enough to stay the hunger of their children with dry bread.

The most remarkable account of the privations following upon the present economic conditions in Germany is found in an article in a Socialist woman's paper, Die Gleichheit, published in Stuttgart, which admits that the war will last a long time, and that a heavy burden has fallen upon the women. It runs, in part:

Like a child's soap bubble which bursts at a touch, so has the legend been dissipated that the war would be a short "military promenade" to Paris and Petrograd. We know that we are in the midst of a world war which will last a very long time, and we must face the fact that Germany for many months to come will remain cut off from commercial intercourse with other nations, and will be compelled to feed her own people from her own reserves.

Therefore we women must be as economical as possible and must husband all existing resources. More than that, we must see to it that these resources are equitably and widely distributed. It does not benefit the farm laborer or the small official to tell him cheerfully that the harvest of corn and potatoes is said to have been large enough to feed the Empire until next summer if the price he has to pay for his meals continues to rise to breaking-point. The war has robbed many families of their chief support; it has shaken the economic fabric of the nation to its foundations, and has brought unemployment and low and uncertain earnings to many. Millions of women, children, aged parents, and people in weak health must henceforth rely for their means of existence upon the pittance they receive from public funds and charity. . . .

The cattle are fed—the poor man can not buy food.

Millions are in want; millions more trembling before the menace of greater hardships still to come. In the hour of the greatest danger speculators are profiting by the wretchedness of the poor.

These facts are officially confirmed by the efforts of municipalities and some military authorities to regulate prices—that is, to fix maximum prices for the staple articles of food. At last, too, after representations from newspapers, corporations, trade-unions, and so forth, the imperial Government has taken similar steps and has issued regulations to fix a maximum price of bread.

And we must of course accept this. Better something and late than "nothing never." Everybody agrees that the Government measure comes limping far enough behind the rise of prices. The delay has brought about untold suffering. The famine prices of to-day are now becoming normal prices, and as such are quoted to-day in Berlin.—Literary Digest, January 9, 1915.

THE BEAUTY OF THE YOSEMITE

No temple made with hands can compare with Yosemite. Every rock in its walls seems to glow with life. Some lean back in majestic repose; others, absolutely sheer or nearly so for thousands of feet, advance beyond their companions in thoughtful attitudes, giving welcome to storms and calms alike, seemingly aware, yet heedless, of everything going on about them.

Awful in stern, immovable majesty, how softly these rocks are adorned and how fine and reassuring the company they keep: their feet among beautiful groves and meadows, their brows in the sky, a thousand flowers leaning confidently against their feet, bathed in floods of water, floods of light, while the snow and waterfalls, the winds and avalanches and clouds shine and sing and wreath about them as the years go by, and myriads of small winged creatures—birds, bees, butterflies—give glad animation and help to make all the air into music.

Down through the middle of the Valley flows the crystal Merced, River of Mercy, peacefully quiet, reflecting lilies and trees and the onlooking rocks; things frail and fleeting and types of endurance meeting here and blending in countless forms, as if into this one mountain mansion Nature had gathered her choicest treasures, to draw her lovers into close and confiding communion with her.—From John Muir's "The Yosemite."

Sunday School Paper

We are all sure that the world needs the gospel; and we also know that it is only when people wake up to a realization of that need that they reach out for it and let it bless their lives.

Similarly, we are sure that our general, district, and local officers and every teacher in the association needs a medium of communication and instruction in the form of a quarterly or monthly paper.

Do they all realize that need? If they do, how can we know what it is? Would it not be worth while to send in your views? You can not all come to convention, and your delegates may not have time to arrive at a consensus of opinion. All can not speak at convention. Why not tell your general officers? We are under obligations to offer something by way of suggestion at the coming meeting, since we took upon us the responsibility of suspending the Exponent between conventions. We would like to make such suggestions as represent the present need of the workers everywhere.

We would like to speak for you. We have not been privileged to travel among the schools everywhere and ascertain from first-hand knowledge the kind of information and the kind of a paper you need most. The executive would be greatly assisted if every district and local superintendent would try to consult his workers and write us the results of his investigations. We would even appreciate letters from teachers direct. Give us your views.

1. In what way did the Exponent fail to meet your needs?
2. What kind of matter do your teachers need most? your officers?
3. Are you willing to support a monthly publication?
4. What price are you willing to pay?

We are preparing a proposition as to size, cost, etc., and we feel we would be able to speak clearer and give to convention something more mature if we had your views on this matter. We know of no other way to get it, at present time, than through this department to ask you for it. We haven't your name and address, or we would write you direct.

Do you realize the need of a paper? Do you want one?

Write. Do it now. We must know right away.

Address us at 710 Louisa Street, Burlington, Iowa.

The Teacher

(By Mrs. Earl D. Rogers, before the reunion at Sandwich, Illinois, 1914.)

The teacher has not only a great responsibility, but a great privilege. Christ was the greatest teacher that has ever lived, for he had perfect love and sympathy for all.

The first requirement for a teacher is love for God and his pupils. It means an entering into the things that interest them—their pleasures and their trials—with at all times a sincere desire to be a help to them.

Christ taught by means of parables. He always used the things at hand to impress upon his hearer the deep spiritual truths.

The teacher must keep mentally awake and grasp every opportunity to draw out the pupil; for teaching is really not learning facts but developing from within; going from the known to the unknown.

Another important factor is the teacher's example. He must walk as he expects to have his pupils walk. A college professor once gave his pupils a lecture on the bad effects of tobacco. The next day one of the boys came suddenly upon the professor smoking a cigar. The boy said, "Say, mister, do you want us to do as you say, or as you do?"

The teacher had strength enough to reply, "As I say, and as I shall do hereafter." It is very natural for our pupils to feel assured that it is all right for them to do the things we do.

Above all, the teacher must strive to follow the leadings of the Holy Spirit, and endeavor to bring his pupils into a realization of the sweetness and peace of a life that is given over to Christ. The teacher's light should so shine before the pupils that the Father in heaven may be glorified by that light.

The following illustration will show how the teacher, like this mother, may be able to reveal something of the infinite love of God.

When Whittier was a little boy of seven, he was taken by his mother to see a girl who had lost her character, and who was now dangerously ill. The pious people of the village let her severely alone, but the poet's mother, who was a Quaker woman with a very kind heart, did not allow herself to be influenced by common prejudice. Whittier never forgot how his mother addressed the sufferer as, "My dear girl," gave her food, and attended to her comfort. "After a while," Whittier says, "I went out doors and looking up to the blue sky, I thought that the God who lived up there must be as good as my mother. If she was so helpful to wicked people, he could not be less kind. Since that time," he added, "I have never doubted the ultimate goodness of God and his loving purpose for the world."

Thoughts on Primary Pupils

(By Mrs. Cleve Petterson, before Plano, Illinois, reunion, 1914.)

There comes a time in the life of every individual, rich or poor, when his babyhood days are over, and he is called to take his first steps out into the great world. This is what we might term the school age. Those who have been reared through the first few tender years of their lives must now step forth to face the trials and temptations that beset this life, unaided by the constant, kind advice and loving watch-care they have had while under the protecting care of a loving mother.

We feel this is a very important turn in the life of a child, as he will now have so many different things to battle with that he did not have while at home. Unless he is properly understood by his teacher, the school may appear very dull to him.

In order to head the child aright we must understand him. And that means that we must study him to know something of his thoughts and feelings. We must understand the nature of the soil we are cultivating, and into which we are to cast precious seed. We are treading on holy ground. We would not knowingly offend or hinder one of God's little ones in the unfoldment of its best. We should note that the child goes to school with its mind undeveloped, and that the teacher has the privilege and great responsibility of assisting in its development.

We never think of disturbing the rose in its growth; yet how often the heart and soul of the child is torn asunder. When we stop and think that man is the greatest achievement of God's creation, we are made to feel and appreciate the importance of guiding the footsteps of the young in that path in which God would have us go.

There are many examples of how this true leading of the child is done, and of the noble results which follow in the child's life.

First, we must try to believe that in his heart he is trying to be his best self; for if he knows that we expect this from him in thought and deed, he will try harder than ever to come to our expectations. Our proper attitude is a stimulus to him. Children like to be valued as individual human beings, and fully respected according to their age. They like to have their rights regarded just as we expect them to regard ours. If we expect love and respect from the children, we must first give them both. We must prove our theory in our own lives, not demanding one thing of the child and utterly neglecting the same rightful demand on the part of the child, on the grounds of the right, the good, and the true when it comes under our own acts.

We must lead the child to see that he can make himself what he chooses; that it lies in his own hands. We must not suppress his powers, but allow them full expression. Let him unfold and find out the talents he has within himself. Allow him to do certain things in his own natural way. Then those in charge can lead him on to a realization of his ability. The child has a right to his God-given powers, and no one has a right to trespass upon them, or destroy them, or so crush him that he can not be his best self and express the power within.

How grand a work it is for a father, mother or teacher to lead a child like this! In fully doing our duty in this line, we are made to know the full meaning of joy, peace, and freedom, according to each stage of development: The child, the boy or girl, youth, and manhood or womanhood.

We often hear the question asked of a child, "What are you going to be in this world?" and we feel it is a very important one. All may not be able to rise to any great distinction, but as one of our aged men has remarked, "It is more important to make a life than to make a living." All acknowledge the truth of this statement. We know that if we fully accomplished the making of a true life as Christ would have us be, each one of us, great or small, has before him a life work.

In order to do anything of much importance, there are many things worthy of our consideration. And as the primary pupil approaches the age when God has said he should take upon himself the covenant through baptism, we should be able to impress him with the need of starting right. In order to do this, we must impress upon him the need of cultivating the habit of decision.

First of all, they should make a decision as on which side their life's battle is to be waged,—on God's side or against him. This greatest of all decisions will help to set the character tendency, and the habit of decision on the right side will become stronger as the child grows older. This decision must be made some day, why not now?

We read in the Bible how the boy Samuel was awakened by a call in the middle of the night. It came three times and would not be silent until the boy answered it. All may not be called in this way; the call may be loud, or it may come in the stillness of the night. It may or it may not be repeated often. Once it reaches the conscience, it is a matter that rests with us. The importance on our character, of making a decision on the side of right and conscience is very great.

I have heard it stated that most people possess three hands: A right hand, a left hand, and a "little behind hand." If any of us would be called into the service of God, we must learn to be on hand, as it were, at the right time, each day doing those things which our heavenly Father would have us do, in order that when life is done we may hear those blessed words, Well done, thou good and faithful servant. Thou hast been faithful over a few things. I will make thee ruler over many things. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

We feel that one of the most important things in the life of a child is that he may be started in the right way. This can only be done by the parents feeling that it is their duty and pleasure to see that their children are taught to see this. As the Sunday school is designed to assist in this work, help them to study their lessons. The instruction of early life will stay with them longer than the same thing taught in later life. If they should stray, this knowledge will bring them back again. Let each child have the privilege in later life of thanking God that they had God-fearing parents who started them out in the straight and narrow way.

The duty of teaching the child is laid on the parents. They should therefore see that they learn their lessons at home. It will then be a pleasure for both the Sunday-school teacher and pupil to go over the lessons.

It is character, chiefly, that makes a life. A person may be right in one or two ways; he may be upheld by the strength and conscience of others; or he may stand erect because he is true within. As Psalms says, "He speaketh the truth in his heart."

There are many who are unable to express the emotions of their hearts. But we are thankful that there is a just God above who knows our every thought, although unable to express it, and that he will reward us accordingly.

Let us teach our children that in that still and secret place, the heart, where we all live and commune with God alone, we can keep and guard the precious truth which will make our lives as God would wish us to have them.

Teaching Junior Pupils

(By Chris B. Hartshorn, before Plano, Illinois, reunion 1914.)

Junior pupils are children nine to twelve years of age. However, this age is set as a guide, not as an arbitrary law.

The promotion of the child into the junior grade, or from the junior into the intermediate, depends upon his mental rather than his physical status. When the pupil can read the Bible without difficulty, he should be placed in the junior grade.

It has been determined that both on entering and leaving this period the girl will be about a year in advance of the boy; that is, the girl of twelve is mentally and physically on a par with a boy of thirteen.

UNDERSTAND YOUR SUBJECT

After learning who our juniors are, I now call attention to some facts which should be known and understood by the teacher who would succeed.

Some think that a boy is "just a boy," and a girl "just a girl," and that is all there is to know about them in Sunday school work. But all principles of reason and logic demand that we should thoroughly understand what we are working with to get the best results.

Things will appeal to the child at this age in an absolutely different light than ever before. To teach them things which would have been gladly received and in a way that would have been enjoyed in the primary class would now produce disgust. In like manner, the problems of adolescence, as dealt with in the intermediate grade pupil, would destroy interest when taught to the juniors. So I say again, we must understand our subjects, to teach them successfully.

Mentally, this is not so much a period of growth as of development. Curiosity finds satisfaction only in facts. A boy of this grade must always be on hand "to learn how," when any new thing is done. Fables and fairy tales have now lost their all-absorbing interest, and are specially disliked by the boy, being supplanted by a love of reading adventure and biographies of great men. The arrangement of a map or the sequence of events in history now arouse interest.

The memory is more accurate and retentive at this period than at any other time in life. It is, therefore, apparent that this age forms the golden opportunity in human existence to win the soul to Christ.

Biblical characters may be presented in hero style that will form lasting impressions. The teacher should select chapters for the pupils to read at home. Urge them to write about those characters, that they may never forget the faithfulness and devotion of such as Elisha, Samuel, David, and Daniel. Their interest in this direction will very likely be increased by arranging to have their essays read before the class or school.

Since the memory is stronger and more accurate than at any other time, that which they learn should be more valuable. It can not be expected that they will make their Bible their whole library. Both the teacher and parent should be well informed as to books which are worthy substitutes. They should be such as will not lessen the desire for the Bible, on account of their sensational nature.

The trait of acquisitiveness is strongly manifested in juniors, and it should be employed for good by the teacher. A few cents spent for mottoes, pretty cards, or little testaments which the children will treasure, will return a hundred fold on the investment. You can, at least, assist them in gathering a collection of colored stones from the brook, or stamps, or quilt blocks, or in whatever way this trait may turn their fancy for treasures. It will prove a means of deepening your influence in their affections.

SOCIAL AND MENTAL TRAITS

The nature of the child's mind in these respects should be well understood. Sex instinct will during this period manifest itself in repulsion. The boys will want to chum with the boys, and girls will play only with girls. Strong friendships arise, and for weeks the chums can hardly be separated. It is therefore better to have separate classes for the sexes. It makes but little difference whether these classes are taught by a man or a woman teacher; either will be efficient when devoted to that purpose.

In the earlier periods below this, "right" is what the child is told to do; while "wrong" is what is forbidden. While there is not yet the highest regard for principles in conduct, yet in this age there is a clearly defined moral sense. With it is found the sense of justice which demands "fair play." Boys or girls are quick to perceive wrongs and resent them. They are also ready to respond to an appeal for that which is right and just. Hence it is important that an appeal be made to the junior pupils that will enlist their sympathies in the cause of Christ. Inasmuch as they are sensitive and quick to resent slights and wrongs, we should continually strive to work an adjustment so as not to permit the trivial injuries and imaginative wrongs to stunt their spiritual growth or separate them from the ennobling work of their Master.

See that the juniors have something to do for the church. You will always find them ready and willing to devote their energies, even to self-denial. On "social night" they can run errands. At Christmas time the teacher can get her class together to make popcorn balls or string cranberries.

In such ways a teacher can exercise a dominating influence over her class for good. When a child puts in even one year's time in whole-hearted service to Christ, with mind and hands both employed, it should be comforting to think that "when he is old he will not depart from it."

Teaching Intermediate Pupils

(By Blanche Fairbanks, before Plano, Illinois, reunion, 1914.)

There is a great responsibility resting on each and every teacher in the Sunday school, but we think the teacher of the intermediate grade must study this duty carefully and prayerfully if he is to meet with the success he looks forward to.

The ages range from twelve or thirteen to seventeen. The girls are entering young womanhood; the boys are becoming little gentlemen. They realize this, and most of them have their feelings injured if they are considered little boys and girls.

Some grow faster than others. They feel awkward in company; their feet seem to be every place but where they want them, and their hands do not seem at ease in any position. The teacher will have to use tact in this respect and try to make them feel comfortable. Keep them busy and interested, and after a time this will gradually be forgotten.

One thing that seems a disadvantage is making one class of boys and girls at this age. They are more or less bashful now, and more benefit can be derived if they are put in separate classes.

A young lady teacher, one in whom they are interested and have confidence, seems to have good influence over girls. We believe if she does her duty she will be successful. They can have heart-to-heart talks. She can make herself one of them, and in this way draw them near her. Boys would feel about the same way toward a young man, of similar qualifications. And we think he could have the same success with them.

If the teachers will arrange for class socials, picnics and similar entertainments, these will tend to draw the class together and thus unite their interests.

This is a romantic age. New ideas spring up in the mind, sometimes not always good ones. If we can keep the interest during these years, give the pupils something to do and think about that will develop their minds in the right channel, in all probability they will remain active members of the church.

We often hear of young men "sowing their wild oats," and perhaps some of our girls are a little wild at times, also. At what age do they usually start this? I think we will notice in most cases they are about fifteen or sixteen years old. Is it necessary for them to have this wild time in order to settle down in after years? We say, No.

If the parents and teachers do their part, the young man and woman will pass these years all right, and afterward see the folly of such actions as characterize many of the young.

Another characteristic of this age is independence. Many feel that they even have better judgment than their parents, and know much more. Hence, we can not be too careful how we deal with them. If we show too much authority, our efforts may result in driving them away, but by working with them, listening to their ideas and weighing them, we may be able to give advice and counsel in such a way they will heed, without realizing the fact.

Mothers' Home Column

Courage to the Mother Who Fails

As this subject is not often touched upon, a few ideas might be presented with the hope of awakening a trend of hopeful thought along this line. For how many mothers there are who feel that they have failed in this noblest of all callings!

But let me suggest to the discouraged mother who often feels that all her plans for her children were to end in failure, her prayers have not been heard, her schemes of goodness and kindness, for the conversion of her loved ones and friends, her unselfish zeal is all in vain, take courage from the truth: God's recognition of earthly success is not as man reckons. Pray on, work on, be faithful to the end. Often the efforts that seemingly have been futile are only opening the way to success. Put your trust fully in God. Confide in him, and do not worry. His plans like his plants, grow in the night. Sooner or later you will see that faithfulness is success.

Sometimes we see mothers who remind us of the one so well portrayed in the Two-Story Book, who had talked and prayed, but with seemingly no results. One evening after reading her daily chapter and kneeling to pray, all she could utter from the depths of her despairing soul was: "Oh Lord, save Jonas! I can't do anything with him."

God is not in as much of a hurry as we are. Patience and fidelity,—these are heroism and victory in his sight, and some day will be so in the sight of everyone.

There may be a few mothers who from a sense of foolish pride have failed to impart needed instruction and counsel; if so and they discover their mistake, it is far more worthy to acknowledge it than to go on just trusting everything will come out right anyway. True heroism is doing what is right, no matter what it costs, no matter how much it is worth.

Failure can be a greater friend than foe, and prove of sweeter uses than success; for our lives both as parents and children were given us for development, working together; the parent learning from the children and vice versa, the supreme object being to learn how to again dwell with the Creator, the source of all knowledge. Let us remember also failure is never an absolute word—always relative; and the only real failure is inside; not outside. It is not being true to the best we know. Inside failure is the only calamity. Outside failure may be the greatest blessing.

Mothers, let us be loyal to plain and providential duty, true to the best we know, and what seems failure will prove to be a means of knowledge, development, and not seldom the bud of success.

For instance, it is hard to see the children going contrary to our wishes, apparently unheeding the advice and counsel of their parents, but it is going to affect them some time. Do not think it is ever lost, for it is as true to-day as when uttered: "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."

Tracing the thought along these lines in relation to self-knowledge, strength and success, by God's help we shall get some new light on our dark clouds, difficult problems will seem easy of solution, love will come into our lives and transform our own as well as our children's precious lives, and we will go on our way with a stouter heart.

Let us stop and remember, when disappointments come thick and fast, and the heart sinks almost in despair, that Christ tasted all of this; his life's work judged from man's viewpoint was a supreme failure and yet it was the supremest victory.

"He did not fail, neither was he discouraged." Faithful unto death, he cried, "It is finished!" and in the cry taught us that every life that seeks in love and loyalty to do the will of God, is a complete and perfect life, no matter how or where it ends; that to be faithless is to fail, to be faithful is to succeed.

In the comfort and hope of this glorious truth let us give ourselves anew to God and to the doing and bearing of his will, quietly leaving the issues with him, saying, "My judgment is with the Lord and my work with my God."

May every mother look up to God who says: "Well done, good and faithful servant!" Doubt not, faint not, "abate not one jot of heart and hope, but still bear up and steer onward and upward."
SISTER URSULA.

Prayer Union

SUBJECT FOR THE SECOND THURSDAY

Parents' Day.—Prayer for our families and for the families of each other; for the conversion of kindred; that we may all have a greater growth in spirituality; that the homes of Saints may be model Christian homes. Pray for all sick and afflicted.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYERS

Prayers are requested for Willard Maddison, of Pennsylvania, who seems to be afflicted with cancer. The letter, sent by Sister Tilly Mellon, also requested prayers for one who is dear to her, and who has been stricken with paralysis.

Sister Julia Hagesty, Fort Dodge, Iowa, requests prayers for her daughter Eva, who has acute Bright's Disease. This child is thirteen years old and desires to be baptized at her first opportunity. There are no elders at Fort Dodge.

SANDWICH, ILLINOIS, February 5, 1915.

Mrs. Callie B. Stebbins,
Lamoni, Iowa.

Dear Sister: Will you kindly send me instructions regarding the "Sisters' Prayer Union"? We wish to unite with the rest in prayer but do not know the requirements.

Yours in gospel bonds,
ABBIE ELWOOD, Sec'y of Aid Society.

Box 326.

ANSWER

The Prayer Union is a very simple matter. It is free to anyone wishing to pray for the subjects presented each week. The only rule is that there shall be no meeting together, nor testimony; just praying for the subject in concert at as nearly the same time as may be, alone or with your own family as in family prayer.

Subscribers for Beatrice Witherspoon

Since I can not respond to all in person, I take this way to answer some questions that relate to all. Books will be sent from the Herald Publishing House where they will be printed. I have nothing at all to do with sending the books, or receiving the money for same. All that is done at Herald Publishing House, Lamoni, Iowa.

I am informed that the work has commenced on the book, and that they will do all they can to put the book out as soon as possible, but owing to the great bulk of work at the office it will be some months yet, can not tell just how many. We must remember that Conference will be held at Lamoni this year, which will make quite a break in the usual routine of work, so all will be patient.

I will continue to receive names till word is sent out from the Herald Publishing House that the book is ready, after which all must go to the office. When sending money, please be particular to send name and address, also number of books wanted,—just as full and plain as when you sent them to me, so as not to put those at the office to the extra trouble of looking all through the long list of names for the needed address. Sisters should sign themselves Miss, or Mrs., as the case may be, and not Sister.

The price of the book will be one dollar. As to expressage, there will be none, at least on a single copy. The business manager, Brother A. Carmichael, will give all needed instructions when he sends out the call to the subscribers.

The intention at first was to publish but one thousand; unless, as the business manager said, the names came in lively enough to indicate that more than that number would be wanted. About seven hundred of that one thousand are already subscribed for. I have given this information so that everyone can secure a book if they wish to.

I thank the many Saints for their ready response to Sister Macgregor's appeal. Not only because it will bring forth the publication of the book, but also because it has brought to me so many good words and good letters from many that I otherwise would never have heard from. It has been impracticable for me to respond to all or half as many as I would like to! but know by this that I appreciate your goodness, and pray God that he will bless you even with the rich blessings that you have asked of him for me.

Yours very truly, and very gratefully,

EMMA B. BURTON.

Diction, Phraseology, Idiom

A list of eleven questions under the above heading appeared in the HERALD for December 30, 1914, upon which we offer the following thoughts.

Taking the questions in their order, our views are given, and the reader is referred to that issue of the HERALD for the full text of the questions.

1. Why do we in addressing our heavenly Father always fall back on the diction of the sixteenth century, as, thee, thou, thine, ye, yea, nay, etc.?

It is purely a matter of individual preference, and the evidence is not conclusive that those terms originated in the sixteenth century. It is the prevailing thought that they more nearly approach the manner of reverential speech employed by the Lord when among men.

2. Those expressions represent in prevalent mental concept the most sacred speech which has ever fallen from lips of flesh, and for this reason they convey more sublimity to the average sense of responsive feeling than more modern words about which no such hallowed memories cluster. It is true that prayers should not be uttered merely to be heard of men, but an intelligent prayer, to be offered where it will be heard by others, must be in words, hence the more suitable and appropriate those words are in the ears of those who hear, the more deeply will their spirit of devotion be stirred. So far as the acceptability of our address to the heavenly Father is concerned, the yearning of the soul toward him in secret prayer without formulated words of any kind is of equal value with the most eloquent speech.

3. Is the development of our language retrograding?

Yes, in all probability it is farther from the one pure language than when the first departures were made from the divine original, unto which we are yet to return.

4. This question implies that the ancient manner of speech is "worn-out" and should be entirely obsolete merely because it is old; but we observe that a beautiful song never grows old; a beautiful melody retains its power of inspiration; and that in the same manner speech is not to be despoiled by time.

5. Yes, there is a sacredness clustering about those expressions, as is further emphasized in the sacramental prayer which we are enjoined to use as, "We ask thee to bless and sanctify this wine," etc. (Doctrine and Covenants 17:23.)

6. We do not address any of our friends in those terms because none of them are so eminently worthy of our most profound deference.

7. There is nothing especially coarse or vulgar about the words you or yours in themselves; but a vehicle of expression upon occasion, other terms may convey a greater eloquence and propriety. There is nothing especially vulgar about a nicely finished dray wagon; but a good carriage fit for conveying passengers, if available, is better for that purpose.

8. This question implies the superiority of new usages because they are new; but the very slang of to-day may be, and often is, the accepted form of to-morrow—thus the word kid as a slang expression applied to young children is now accepted in some recent dictionaries and defined: "Kid; a young goat, or sometimes applied to a young child." Yet we would hardly think it proper when invoking a blessing on the children to say, "Bless the kids." However, if we are to keep abreast of the times by selecting the newest terms for fear of becoming antiquated, it may be that by the arrival of the year 1950 the above expressions shall have acquired sufficient dignity to be entirely appropriate for use in prayers, and that the use of the word children will be obsolete.

This with apologies to our esteemed brother and author of the article under discussion, and with a feeling of assurance that it will be received in the purely jovial strain and good will in which it is given.

9. No.

10. If Enoch should be constrained to grief because his prayer as recorded in the Doctrine and Covenants, 36:11 is translated in terms of you and yours instead of thee and thine, his depression of spirits is no doubt largely mitigated by the fact that Genesis 5:32 to 53 of the Inspired Translation gives his speech there in the regular decorous forms, thee and thou, of holy usage.

11. Will some one please tell us where we can secure a version of the Bible translated into the modern English language instead of the phraseology of the Dark Ages.

Answer: We can not, nor do we feel the need of such, for this speech which is said to have done service during the Dark Ages has surely been the vehicle of thought during some light ages as well, and even yet, when the Spirit speaks with most loving and powerful suasion in the congregations of the Saints, in interpretation of tongues, or by direct prophetic diction, this same hallowed form which in itself links the thoughts with many sacred associations is employed.

With love to our brother, and to all Saints, I am,
Yours in holy fellowship. JAMES E. YATES.

Editors Herald: I have found only one member of our church at this place, Sister M. A. Hughes. If any of our missionaries come this way we would be glad to have them call on us. I do not know what opportunity there would be for preaching here. We came here one year ago last November. Sister Hughes told me to-day that Mr. Cannon was going to lecture here in the Methodist Church the 19th of this month, at 7.30.

Any of the ministry stopping here may inquire for the store of Mr. Henry Harnagle, who is my son-in-law, and who would direct visitors to us. MRS. I. LAWSON.

VINAL HAVEN, MAINE, December 14, 1914.

Editors Herald: Our little band of Saints is only thirteen in number, and are scattered over the island. Some of these are too aged to attend meetings. Brother Archie Begg, a priest, has held meetings at Ayers Harbor every Wednesday evening in the schoolhouse, but closed on account of being so far distant from the place of meeting and on account of bad weather. Brother Herbert Raymond began a series of meetings at Calderwoods Neck Schoolhouse, October 11, closing December 6. A good interest was manifested. These brethren and such others as can attend have a meeting every Sunday evening with good interest. We also have a sacrament service the first Sunday of each month at Creeds Cove Schoolhouse.

Elder William Anderson came October 27 and stayed until November 23, preaching thirty-two sermons, six at Ayers Harbor, twelve at Creeds Cove, four at Calderwoods Neck Schoolhouse, five at Granite Island Schoolhouse, and holding one sacrament November 1, at Creeds Cove. We all enjoyed his work very much and hope he will soon be with us again.

We have a Sunday school and Religio home department.

We hope these few lines will encourage some isolated Saints to band together and with God's help let their light so shine that others may see there is a reality in the latter-day work. We need your prayers that all obstacles may be removed from our path so that we may soon have a branch organized here.

Yours for Zion,

ORMAN BEVERAGE.

WHEELING, WEST VIRGINIA, December 15, 1914.

Editors Herald: The activity of the silent reaper, and the swiftness with which time speeds onward in its flight sound a solemn warning to everyone to be busy in the service of the Master while opportunity is still ours.

The entire church now mourns the loss of our beloved President. Yet glad we are that in his long service to the church his record is one of self-sacrificing devotion to the cause of truth and right; and it can not be truthfully said that he ever did that which would cause any member of the church to ever feel ashamed of having been associated with him as a coworker. His long faithfulness should encourage each one to greater energy and zeal in the Lord's work.

Two of the oldest members of our branch recently answered the summons home. First, Brother William Lucas, of War-nock, Ohio. Having passed the third quarter of a century in mortality, he moves to the other side to be clothed upon with immortality. He was a true Saint, and lived a noble life that reflects credit upon the church, and leaves behind him a valiant testimony in righteousness, for the restored gospel. Before the end came he called his children all home, and told them he was going to leave them; that his time had come and that he was ready and anxious to go. Brother James Craig preached his funeral.

On Sunday evening, November 29, the choir of our branch had arranged to give a sacred concert. The church had filled with people, and just two minutes before time to begin, Sister Rachel S. Hughes, having walked to the church from the home of her daughter and taken her place in the audience, suddenly, without a struggle, without a warning to anyone, leaned forward in the pew and expired. She was in her seventy-seventh year, and had been a Latter Day Saint forty-seven years. Of her eight living children, five were present, besides quite a number of grandchildren. Nearly all of these were to have taken part in the concert. The funeral was from the church, the speakers being Brethren James Craig and G. T. Griffiths. Brother Griffiths spoke of the long period of faithful service she had given to the Lord, and the fact that all of her living children are in the church, and many of her grandchildren, following her good example. One son, Brother F. J. Ebeling, having been in the ministry for some years, was called here from his mission field in Maine. Another son, Joseph E. Ebeling, living in Colorado Springs, also came home for the funeral. The largest number of people that ever attended a funeral at our church were present to attest the high esteem in which our sister was held. To have raised a large family and brought them all into the church; to have one son and one grandson in the missionary force, besides other of her children and grandchildren occupying important places in the church, and altogether furnishing an array of workers seldom seen in one family, is a record to which her friends may point with pardonable pride. At the close of such a life, she leaves to her posterity not a fortune in this world's goods, but a legacy in righteousness that can not be purchased with money; and while we feel sad for the separation, we are sure she will reap the reward of the righteous.

All these events but serve to make the gospel more precious to us, and we take courage to press on, striving to be faithful to the end that we may meet with those who have lived for Christ and died in his service.

Your brother,

O. J. TARY.

HILLSDALE, MICHIGAN, February 13, 1915.

Editors Herald: We are praying for the upbuilding of God's work in this place and elsewhere. Myself and companion are among the isolated ones. We were baptized into the fold and kingdom of God on December 12, 1897, by Elder Jacob Kaplinger, at Freesoil, Michigan, where with our two daughters we enjoyed the blessings of God, which have confirmed our faith in this great and glorious cause.

On November 11, 1913, we left Freesoil en route to Moonsville, Indiana, to visit one of our daughters. From there we came to Hillsdale where our other daughter lived, near where we now have a pleasant home. Any elders of Northern Indiana and Southern Michigan will be able to find us. Would like to see a Latter Day Saint once more. We have not seen one since we left Freesoil to our knowledge, and are becoming hungry for the gospel. We read that those who hunger and thirst after righteousness shall be filled. There seems a good chance for an opening here.

We let our neighbors take the HERALD and church books, such as the histories of the church in early days, Joseph Smith Defended, etc. There are some who seem to be interested and who ask questions which we answer the best we can. We feel our weakness in doing this, but feel strengthened when we see others interested. Even though we may not preach like Peter, or pray like Paul, we can tell of the love of Christ who died for all. If we can not cross the ocean to heathen lands, we can find the heathen nearer here, even at our door. Truly, there are many who, if not heathen, are ignorant of the true gospel, who seem to know nothing about the latter-day work except in connection with the Utah Mormons.

Our doors are open to any of the elders who may come this way. If any of the Saints of this district will write I will answer. We ask the prayers of God's people, even as we pray for the welfare of Zion.

DOVER, NEW HAMPSHIRE, February 15, 1915.

Editors Herald: I have never subscribed for the HERALD, but it was sent to me by a kind friend in the church for one year. On suggestion from him a year ago, I told him that conditions were such that I could not pay for the HERALD, so he sent it free of cost. I thank him for this act. I have taken much comfort from the HERALD.

I used to look for Brother U. W. Greene's letters the first thing when he was in Palestine. I am personally acquainted with him and always enjoy his writings. Two years ago this month Brother Greene was called to my home to administer to me. I was very ill from blood poison. One of the best doctors of the city had been to see me twenty times, and had brought another doctor with him. They told my son that they did not expect me to live, and that if I did they did not expect me to be able to do much work. But through administration I was restored. Sister Summerfield, of South Portland, Maine, stayed with me a week during this time.

I praise God for his goodness to me. I have been able to do my work now for near two years. I have been afflicted for some time and the doctor informs me that I may have a tumor, and that I may need to be operated on. I ask the Saints to pray that I may be restored from this affliction without operation.

Your sister,

MRS. CLARA J. YOUNG.

HARDTNER, KANSAS, February 19, 1915.

Editors Herald: This place is ten miles west of Kiowa, Kansas, in the extreme southern central part of the State. My father, E. A., and I are the only Saints located in this community. He has been staying with me this winter. I had the pleasure of entertaining my Brother E. L., president of the branch at Toledo, Ohio. His time was limited when he was here, so we were unable to secure a place for him to preach. This was at the Christmas season. He spoke a few nights at my place.

We would like very much to have an elder stop here and preach on his way to or from the General Conference. I will do all in my power to have the gospel preached at this place. We have a place for a man to sleep, plenty for him to eat, and some car fare in exchange for the gospel.

We learned of the dedication of a church near Alva, Oklahoma, seventeen miles south of here. Would like to meet with some of these Saints. Would like to have them arrange a team and help us in some of the services which I am hoping to bring about here in the near future.

Your brother in Christ,

CHARLES ULRICH.

News from Missions

Southeastern Illinois

I am glad to say that notwithstanding the very bad weather we have been having the prospects here are encouraging. On December 3 in company with Brother Rushton we left Independence, Missouri, for Casey, Illinois, where we were met by Brother Matheny and taken seven miles south to his home. From here we went to Bellair where we were entertained by the children of Bellair Sunday school at the closing service of the Sunday school convention.

On Saturday morning the conference of the Southern Illinois District convened, Brethren Rushton and R. H. Henson presiding. The business of the conference passed off nicely, and on Sunday morning the church building at that place was dedicated, Brother Rushton preaching the sermon. On Monday morning about 4.30 thirteen of us tumbled into a wagon drawn by four horses and were taken twelve miles through the mud to Hidalgo, where we took train to our various destinations, myself in company with Brother Clemens going to Rinard, where we arrived at about five o'clock p. m. Here we were met by Sister Clemens. After supper with her daughter we were taken through mud and darkness to their home, a distance of six miles.

The following evening a series of meetings were commenced at Brush Creek, about four miles west, which continued about one week. In company with Brother Henson, district president, we came to Springerton and conducted a series of meetings which lasted about one week with good interest. However, rain and freezing weather set in, so we were obliged to close until the weather was more favorable.

On December 24 we came to Bungay where we started preaching, continuing every night until January 10, with an intensely interested audience. The last night our little church was packed to the doors, some not being able to get in. Conditions at this place are looking bright, and I am expecting soon to trouble the waters.

On the 12th I went to Mill Shoals where I held a series for four nights in the Christian church to an interested audience. Mill Shoals is a village of about seven hundred population, and on one or two evenings there were fully five hundred people out to hear the message of the gospel.

On the 27th I went to Tunnel Hill, but on account of bad weather and other conditions my trip was not so fortunate. On the 28th the sad news reached there of the death of Sister R. Webb, wife of Brother Daniel Webb, and mother of Sister McMahan, who passed away in Oklahoma and was brought to Tunnel Hill for burial. She lived a noble life and has entered into her rest. May God help us all to so live that we may fill our lives with noble deeds, so that it can be said of us, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them." I preached one night in Tunnel Hill, but on account of bad weather I thought it advisable to postpone our series there until better conditions existed.

Ever praying for the welfare of Zion, I remain,

Your brother in the conflict,

THOMAS NEWTON.

Southern California

Bishop E. L. Kelley has been in the district the past couple of weeks, after an absence of nearly five years, and as usual has been quite a source of spiritual strength and benefit to the work in general.

A series of meetings were held at the Los Angeles church during the last week in January and the first week in February, with excellent interest and effect, but the heavy rains happening at the same time seriously interfered.

A meeting of the general committee of the Convention Park Reunion Grounds was held, at which the Bishop was present. The grounds have been recently improved by planting the permanent grove on three acres of the land and repairing the damage done by the heavy rains of last year. The company is in excellent condition, equipped with cafeteria, comfort station cots and mattresses for the use of campers at reunion, and tents, cots and mattresses and bedding for the missionary forces and their families. Cafeteria service is also furnished to all General Conference appointees and their families, and the cafeteria goes behind just about that amount, but it is practically balanced by the revenue from the cots and mattresses rented to the people. Building the auditorium this spring was considered, but in view of the late revelations about being careful not to spend money for buildings not actually necessary for church uses, it was decided with the Bishop's approval not to attempt it, but use the large tent again and get the balance of indebtedness entirely cleared. It was also decided to put a little more land on the market, as it seemed there was more land reserved than was needed.

R. T. COOPER.

Maryland

This country has once been a solidly wooded country. Even now a trip through Delaware and Maryland from north to the south takes one through extensive wooded tracts, and much primitive country.

While this may not be as good a farming country as Iowa and Missouri, as far as I have tested it, it would be hard to beat it for a gospel field. There is both planting and harvesting to be done.

From January 27 to February 3, inclusive, I was in the extreme southern part of this State, on the Atlantic coast. We have a small band of Saints at Girdle Tree, and I had promised the missionary in charge that I would pay them a visit. I had been so busy since coming to Elk Mills that I had not found time to fulfill the word given, but I finally "took time." In no other way could I have made the visit.

We had a rainy week, but as it is a sandy country we kept the meetings going every night and twice on Sunday, with two the last night there, at one of which we organized a Sunday school and administered the sacrament. The Saints had had a Sunday school some time before, but had, partly on account of sickness, permitted it to lapse. We hope they will be able to keep it going now. The only member there who holds the priesthood is Brother George Morris, a priest, advanced in years and in ill health, so assistance should be given them. It looks as though that would be a good point for an effort with the gospel tent.

The work at Elk Mills is moving forward, if but slowly. One thing is certain, there is plenty to occupy our time and to employ our talents. Yesterday was a busy day with us. We began the day with an 8 a. m. prayer service, and the good Spirit was with us through six services, including a sacrament, a priesthood, and ending with a preaching service, though the enjoyment of the day was marred by the illness and death of the infant son of our presiding priest, Brother Ira Humes. All was done that our faith and the doctor's skill could do, yet without avail, and the mother and father are desolate, though not forsaken.

Our night school is still moving along, and we purpose to give an entertainment and oyster supper, including a candy sale, the evening of the 13th. The ladies will probably make a valentine affair of it. We hope by this effort, ere we go from this point, to assist in raising funds to pay the indebtedness of last year's operations. We are not creating a deficit in our operations this season, but are meeting the expenses as we go.

We are due in Philadelphia the 15th, and between that date and this have thirteen services scheduled, besides some extra work necessitated by the preparation for the funeral, also the entertainment. At least, there is no stagnation in the work here.

We could not do this work were it not that we have the loyal assistance of the local force, not only of the priesthood, but many of the nonofficials. All honor to those who help to roll on the "marvelous work and a wonder."

From the 15th we are scheduled to assist in a series of special meetings at the First Philadelphia Branch. These will culminate in the district conference, February 20 and 22 inclusive. We hope to meet Brethren F. M. Smith and U. W. Greene at this function, and from what we hear among the Saints these brethren will be given a hearty welcome. Many had been anxiously watching for news from our missionaries in the Holy Land, and when word came that they had landed safely in the "land of the free," there was a general peon of thanksgiving sent up from this branch.

From Philadelphia we think to go to New York City for a few days, and then homeward to get acquainted with the family once more and to be in attendance at the General Conference.

When we are counting our blessings, not the least of them is the privilege of working in this cause. May the Master hasten the day for Zion's redemption, and assist us to help in this consummation.

Sincerely,

A. M. CHASE.

News from Branches

Independence, Missouri

The past few weeks have been full of busy interest with the Saints here in things pertaining to branch and auxiliary matters. Besides the other preparations for the work of the new year, there has been a renewal of diligence evidenced by both old and young. Important work long contemplated is being done on social and domestic lines by way of improving conditions, especially among the poor, looking after the Sanitarium necessities in the nurses' department on the part of the patronesses, and an effort in consideration of the welfare of the young, inciting an increased uplift in spiritual things.

Concerning the last-mentioned feature, the efforts put forth by the elders in the pulpit should receive more fully the attention of the children and parents than heretofore. The impressive and interesting reminiscences of Brother T. W. Chatburn in connection with the remarkable spiritual manifestations witnessed at the house of David Whitmer, and the plain, wholesome teaching by Brethren Joseph Luff and William Sparling relating to the evil tendencies to worldliness among the young, and the lack of parental discipline, together with good sound doctrine by Brethren Seigfried, Parsons, and others, has lately stirred our minds and hearts to a greater meditation of our spiritual needs.

At a recent branch election, Elder George Harrington was elected president for the ensuing year. D. J. Krahl was chosen by the Sunday school as their superintendent. A new society was organized February 11, a most important one formed for the betterment of the homes of those who are in need of efficient domestic service, and who are willing to avail themselves of instruction in social and home work. As the executive committee of this organization, Sisters A. L. Yingling, Joseph Smith, and G. E. Harrington were chosen. These, together with leaders of the Laurel Club, and classes of the home department, all interested in mental and spiritual culture, and the Religio with an average of two hundred members, constitute an army fully equipped and duly called to service for the Master.

On the 16th another movement was set on foot by a large number of Saints who filled the basement of the church, the object being the betterment of the young, or to increase to a degree the spiritual, mental and physical capacities of those who are willing to avail themselves of this liberal, wide-spread and all important opportunity to gain a higher culture.

May our efforts for good prosper in this the central place of Zion, and may the endeavors for righteousness on the part of all Saints everywhere be crowned with success. May our afflicted ones be remembered.

ABBIE A. HORTON.

Omaha, Nebraska

"How beautiful it is to be alive!

To awake each morn as if the Maker's grace
Did us afresh from nothingness derive

That we might sing, How happy is our case,
How beautiful it is to be alive!"

Our district conventions and conference were quite well attended, interesting and instructive. District officers elected were as follows: President, M. A. Peterson; secretary and treasurer, Margaret A. Hicks; member library board, T. A. Hicks. Sunday school: Superintendent, H. A. Scott; assistants, P. M. Craig and W. E. Shakespeare; secretary, Sister M. A. Peterson; treasurer, Sister Ira C. Lewis; member library board, P. N. Craig; superintendent home department, Sister P. N. Craig. Religio: President, David Lewis; vice president, Sister Chloe Norris; secretary, A. C. Schwartz; treasurer, Sister C. C. Coffeen; member library board and superintendent temperance department, Sister Gertrude Kirkpatrick; superintendent home department, Clara L. Lewis.

We were glad to see some visitors from the Southern Nebraska District. Those occupying the pulpit and giving us good instruction were: J. W. Wight, Alvin Knisley, H. A. Higgins. At the prayer meeting Sunday afternoon there appeared to be a depression, or darkness, during the first of the meeting, as a sister expressed it, "A black cloud passed over the audience." The remainder of the meeting was very spiritual; an admonition from the Lord was given to come up higher, stating that those would suffer loss who were not living up to their privileges.

Elder Alvin Knisley occupied Monday and Tuesday evenings following, giving some good thoughts regarding the Holy Ghost and revelations. Sunday, February 21, Patriarch F. A. Smith gave us a remarkable sermon on Saints' duties, and "loving our neighbors as we do ourselves." J. W. Wight in the evening portrayed in glowing terms the necessity of the coming forth of the Book of Mormon.

"Thus ever towards man's height of nobleness
Striving, some new progression to contrive;
Till just as any other friends, we press
Death's hand; and having died feel none the less
How beautiful it is to be alive!"

Presidents of the Seventy meet in hall above Barrow's drug store, Lamoni, Iowa, March 27, at 10 p. m.

An effort has been made to secure joint meetings with First Presidency and Twelve, which we have assurance will be favored, if time permits.

The council have through correspondence decided to consider the following in joint assembly with seventy, so far as time will permit:

1. What should be the action of the general assembly or the General Conference relating to the choosing of a temporary president of the church?

2. The missionary work as related to that of the standing minister.

3. What, if any, is the difference between the functions of the office of seventy and the office of the elder, when both are appointed to travel?

4. What should be the attitude of the church in caring for seventies who are released from missionary work?

5. Methods of prosecuting missionary work. (a) In organized districts; (b) In new fields.

6. What are the duties and responsibilities of a seventy traveling in the field as to teaching the law of temporalities?

7. What should be the attitude of the seventy in baptizing those who have been cast out of the church for the second offense of adultery?

8. Should the men have some personal knowledge of their calling previous to ordination?

9. The financing of the church work; (a) For promoting internal development; (b) For missionary work.

12. How to prepare for and conduct a series of preaching services.

13. Latest archæological discoveries relating to our work.

We have the promise of some of the Bureau of Publicity being present with us to assist in considering numbers 5 or 12.

Seventies who are not to be present at the conference please select a subject from the above program and write a paper, sending it to the secretary of presidents of seventy not later than March 22.

We request each seventy to specially prepare for the consideration of each number on the program.

Because of the great importance of the coming conference, and the hastening times in which we labor, the council and the seventy are requested and urged to prepare themselves by special prayer and fasting that God may direct in all things, and that we may fully sense the importance of our special work at this time.

Time and other items of detail in hands of local brethren will be announced. Splendid success of meetings and untiring efforts of local brethren to make visitors comfortable will not be forgotten by those there last year. We trust all will make an effort to be present this year. T. A. Hougas, Macedonia, Iowa, for committee.

Oklahoma Saints

In attempting to correct records of Western Oklahoma District we find 40 to 90 names on branch records while there are no more than half the number living in the vicinity of branch. In some instances those holding priesthood have moved away, still their names appear. Will those who have moved write and secure letters to unite with nearest branch in compliance with General Conference resolution? There are a number in the district who hold certificates of baptism but who have not united with any branch. Will these connect themselves with nearest branch? There are others who have moved into the district who have not letters. These should unite with nearest branch.

The March St. Nicholas

The March St. Nicholas opens with "A page of Bearn," a tale of adventure in France in 1563. The author, Laura Fitch McQuiston, has drawn a very lovable hero indeed in the clever lad who brings a message safely to his queen in spite of many difficulties. The illustrations by Reginald Birch are in the spirit of the story. Mabel Albert Spicer takes her readers for "A visit to the home of the Indian elephants," and narrates the capture of the elephants from the elephant's point of view. Louise Brigham, who has been telling St. Nicholas readers how to make furniture from boxes, shows how some fascinating toys can be made of the same inexpensive material. Boys who like to make their own playthings will be interested, too, in, "sailing on wheels in New York City," a description of the wind-wagons, or wheeled boats, some ingenious youngsters in New York City have invented. The serials are carried forward with increasing interest. Tommy has another adventure on the "Wishing stones." Hildegard Hawthorne, in her "Books and reading" tells about that favorite among children and grown-ups, "Uncle Remus." As usual, there are many pictures and some clever verses.

Book Reviews

THE TRAIL OF THE SANDHILL STAG.—Ernest Thompson Seton. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. This is one of Mr. Seton's inimitable stories of wild animals, of especial interest and value to boys. It is in the class with the other books by Ernest Thompson Seton, such as Wild Animals I have Known, Lives of the Hunted, etc. The illustrations are by Mrs. Grace Gallatin Thompson Seton, and constitute a most interesting and valuable feature of the book.

and Mayan civilizations of pre-Spanish America." It deals with the religion, social customs, trade, crafts, dress, daily life, etc., of these people. In the preface the author says: "The object of this small book is to summarize shortly the extent of our knowledge concerning the life and culture of the Mexican and Maya peoples of pre-Spanish America. It has no pretense whatever to finality; indeed, the time is not within sight when a complete elucidation of all the problems connected with this most fascinating area can be put forward. At the same time it is useful to pause occasionally and summarize results, if only because attention is thereby drawn to the more serious gaps in the data available, and it becomes easier to direct the course of future investigations." The book concludes with the statement: "The question of the ultimate origin of the American population lies beyond the scope of this book, but it is an evident fact that the Americans physically stand in comparatively close relation to the Asiatics. That being so a somewhat similar psychology is natural, and this would lead, subject to modifications produced by environment, to the evolution of a culture and art in which certain analogies might be expected to appear. But what I have elsewhere written of Peruvian culture applies with equal force to that of the Mexicans and Maya. The onus probandi must necessarily be upon those who wish to prove that contact with the external world existed, and the evidence which we possess points rather to the undisturbed evolution of Mexican and Maya civilization on American soil, and that civilization may therefore be regarded as in every sense American. The volume is profusely illustrated, and altogether an attractive book.

The glory of love is brightest when the glory of self is dim.
 And they have the most compelled me who most have pointed to Him.
 They have held me, stirred me, swayed me—I have hung on their every word.
 Till I fain would arise and follow, not them, not them—but their Lord.—Ruby T. Weyburn.

So we, in words of love, O king of Kings,
 The lives which seem so poor, so low,
 The hearts which are so cramped and dull,
 The baffled hopes, the impulse slow
 Thou takest, touchest all, and lo!
 They blossom to the beautiful.
 —Susan Coolidge.

When the clouds of sorrow gather,
 And the billows o'er me roll,
 Safe within his blest pavilion
 He will hide my weary soul.

GOD'S CALL TO YOUNG MEN

This is the age of the young men. The railroads and all the other great enterprises are discriminating against age in favor of youth. The greatest money concerns are managed by young men. The highest offices are open to them.

The wisdom and experience and caution of age are valuable in the world's work; but the enthusiasm of youth is invaluable and seems to carry success, at times, where the others fail.

Age is cautious and concerned with saving that which it has; it is the autumn, the harvest time. Youth is the sowing time, the time of pushing out in new ventures.

So the world moves on, the one class as the conservative and saving element, the other as the aggressive and constructive element.

Even so in the kingdom of God—there is a work for both classes—the cautious and experienced, the enthusiastic and aggressive.

We are quite prone to think of all the old Bible characters as venerable and hoary-headed patriarchs. That is a mistake. God spoke to the aged Abraham; but he also called the youthful David. He sent Paul "the aged" and young Timothy out to work side by side.

Jacob was but a young man when he took his journey to Padan-aram; yet stopping at the place afterward called Bethel he saw the ladder reaching to heaven and angels ascending and descending, and God spoke to him in covenant.

Samuel remembered his Creator in the days of his youth, for we read of him that he "ministered before the Lord, being a child." God spoke to him when he was yet a boy and told him the fate that awaited Eli. He became one of the greatest prophets of Israel. He it was who pointed out and anointed the youthful Saul to be king. He it was who later came to Saul in the days of his wickedness and might and told him that his kingdom should be taken from him and given to another. One who as a lad communed with God, in maturity did not fear kings.

David the youth, fresh from the tending of his father's few sheep, was a mighty man in the hands of God to the overthrow of Goliath, of Gath, "whose height was six cubits and a span," whose spear shaft was "as large as a weaver's beam."

Daniel became a mighty man at the court of the kings of Babylon, and a prophet in the hands of God. To him was revealed the whole future history of the world. All of his greatness was due to the fact that as a young man he kept the law of God and refused to break it even at the command of princes. He chose water to drink and pulse to eat when they tried to force upon him the king's meat and wine. So when he and his young comrades came before the king he found them "in all matters of wisdom and understanding . . . ten times better than all the magicians and astrologers that were in all his realm."

Farther back than most of these was Joseph, who when only seventeen years old received heavenly dreams and visions.

Then there was Nephi, who because he was faithful in youth, became such an instrument for good in the hands of God.

For that matter there was Christ himself, who felt that he must be about his father's business at a time when most children think only of play. His work as a man was done at a time of life when many young men are still putting off their duty until they are "a little older."

In the restoration of the gospel, God used a young man who felt the need of wisdom and went to him for it. In the Reorganization there was a time when the youthful E. C. Briggs was the only elder in the field. The man who was called to take his father's place at the head of the church did so while young. In fact God has always used the young men who were properly prepared and properly called. Their enthusiasm and energy is needed in the church as badly as in the world.

You will notice that these men of old were called of God. They were called because they had certain qualities that fitted them for the work. With God rested the choosing power, and he pointed them out as his servants and then proceeded with the education.

In many instances the world proceeds along slightly different lines now.

The young man carefully compares the advantages of the various professions and trades. He considers the social disadvantages and financial gains that he may look for as a civil engineer, a doctor, a lawyer, or a minister. All things considered, he decides on the ministry, or maybe his parents decide for him. They have one son who is in politics and another in the army and they think a distinguished minister would add prestige to the family.

So the young man is sent to a theological school and "made into a minister." When the work is done they virtually say, "Here, Lord, take him. We have called him and fitted him, now you may take him." Is it any wonder that no Daniels come from such a school?

Of old Christ said, "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you." Where does the modern proceeding leave an opportunity for God to choose—accepting or rejecting? God does not appear in the transaction at all—unless it be as a "silent partner," bound to acquiesce in all the decisions of humanity.

To complete the comedy, after picking out the man and saying to God, "Here he is, take him," they turn to us and say, "It is no longer a day of revelation, God speaks no more." So how could God reject the man if he wanted to? or how manifest to him that he was accepted? The man must spend his life in labor and not till after death really know whether or not he was called.

The output of such a system must be discouraging, for Bishop Joyce, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, said at their conference, at Great Bend, Indiana, September 4, 1903, "I do wish all theological schools would create a new chair and call it the chair of common sense. It is needed in the training of young men for the ministry. Some of them actually lose their best traits by too much book learning."

Common sense is wisdom, and the theological school is not the best place to get it—"If any of you lack wisdom let him ask of God.

A minister to represent God as a preacher must be called of God; but there are many things that the young man may do who has not the call to preach. The Religio and Sunday school will suggest avenues of labor.

Young men who are conscious of a call to help in God's work often adopt a mistaken policy of waiting. They think they will have a season of pleasure, and "remember their Creator" in the days of their middle-life or old age. In reality they forfeit a good deal of true happiness for a little doubtful pleasure. It is a poor trade.

There is a vast difference between pleasure and happiness. The Devil may give a person pleasure; but God alone can give him happiness.

Pleasure is as Leah—she is to be had for the asking. She forces herself on the notice. She beckons from every theater and dance hall and saloon and Sunday excursion.

Happiness is as Rachel—she is for those who are willing to work for her. She knows her value and sits aloof from the excited crowd. She is found in the home, at church, among good men and women, and among good books, in fields and forests.

There is a great deal of pleasure in the world that has the sting of death under it. There is none too much happiness, because men love pleasure more than they love God.

"The preacher" exhorts men to remember their Creator in the days of youth ere the evil days come. Those who think to serve God by and by should remember that they have no assurance that they will have a by and by. No man knows how soon the "silver cord will be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken, or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern."

Even if a man's life is spared he may be in poor condition by and by to take up the work that he should do now.

A great many successful farmers late in life move to town and invest in business; and many of them fail, for the very good reason that they were not trained for that business earlier in life.

Some city men have an ambition to spend their declining years managing a farm; but when the chance comes they are rarely among the money-making farmers. Their education has not included wheat and cows.

So, also, there are many men who in old age are not very helpful in God's cause because their early education failed to fit them for the practice of godliness.

We hear a great deal now about the partitions being broken down between the churches; but they take the debris and pile them higher between us and them. We should cultivate charity for all people and treat them with consideration, being slow to attack, yet it is useless to ignore the fact that all denominations are arrayed against us and our message. That means that our young people must be loyal to the church and its institutions.

Other denominations may offer one greater social advantages in many localities. They may offer one finer edifices in which to worship. But God loves the man who is loyal to his people even though they must meet in caves and dens, as of old.

Stand by God's people. There is no sadder spectacle than those sons of Latter Day Saints who are ashamed of the religion of their fathers. They have no pleasure or fellowship in the church, and the world despises them because of their ancestry. Pity that class. Do not waste your pity on the young man who is actively at work as a Latter Day Saint—even though it may bring some little persecution or loss—congratulate him. ELBERT A. SMITH.

CURRENT EVENTS

SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

CONGRESS ADJOURNS.—Congress adjourned the 4th. An early extra session is not anticipated.

NEW HAITIAN GOVERNMENT.—General Guillaume, leader of the revolution which unseated President Theodor, has been formally elected President of Haiti.

MINE EXPLOSION.—One hundred and eighty-two miners were entombed by an explosion in a mine near Quinnimont, West Virginia, March 2. Rescue parties have met with extreme difficulty, and at this writing few men have been removed alive.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—A serious crisis is said to have arisen at Mexico City, where thousands are out of work and where the scarcity of food threatens starvation. Report from San Luis Potosi is that a wealthy Spaniard has been executed because he failed to raise a ransom.

AMERICAN LEGION.—Theodore Roosevelt, jr., and five others are incorporating in New York State an organization to be known as the American Legion, to be composed first of men who have had army and navy training, and then of others, to constitute the first line of reserve for instant call in case of war.

REPORT ON COLORADO STRIKE.—In a report submitted to the House of Representatives on the 2d, the mines and mining subcommittee criticized many of the acts of operators involved in the recent trouble in the Colorado coal fields, including alleged violation of State laws, and arraigned the Colorado National Guard for its treatment of striking miners and their families. This report recites:

Absentee owners or directors by their absence from the scene of such disturbances can not escape their moral responsibility for conditions in and about properties in which they are interested.

IMPORTANT DISCOVERIES.—Two important discoveries are reported by Secretary Lane of the Department of the Interior to have been made by Doctor Walter F. Rittman, mechanical engineer of the Bureau of Mines. One is expected to increase the output of gasoline two hundred per cent; the other to make possible the production from toluol and benzol bases for dyes and high explosives. Doctor Rittman has applied for patents to prevent monopoly, and will dedicate these discoveries to the people.

PROHIBITION GAINS.—Governor Alexander of Idaho has signed a bill making the sale and manufacture of liquor unlawful in that State after January 1, 1916. Governor Hammond of Minnesota has signed a county option bill. Adopting the report of a conference committee, the Colorado legislature has passed the bill to enforce the state-wide constitutional prohibition amendment effective January 1, 1916. The Utah prohibition bill passed by the Senate has been passed by the House. The North Carolina legislature has passed a bill to be submitted to popular vote August 1. The New Jersey Senate has passed a provision for a referendum on the question of local option, when thirty per cent of the municipality request a special election.

FOREIGN SHIPPING.—The Dacia, transferred by purchase from German to American registry, has been seized by the French, and it is expected will be taken before a prize court. England and France have filed with the United States a joint note in retaliation of the recent action of Germany declaring a war zone. After discussing the German action, the Anglo-French note recites:

Her opponents are, therefore, driven to frame retaliatory measures in order in their turn to prevent commodities of any kind from reaching or leaving Germany. These measures will, however, be enforced by the British and French Governments without risk to neutral ships or to neutral or noncombatant life and in strict observance of the dictates of humanity. The British and French governments will, therefore, hold themselves free to detain and take into port ships carrying goods of presumed enemy destination, ownership or origin.

The German embassy at Washington announces that the American steamers Evelyn and Carib, sunk by mines in the North Sea, were lost because they failed to heed "advice contained in the notice to marines," taking their course outside the lines of direction as given. In reply to the note of the United States suggesting agreement to lessen danger to neutral shipping, Germany states that she will accede to the suggestions and the demands of the United States except in the matter of the planting of anchored offensive mines, on condition of the abandonment of the use of neutral flags by merchantmen of hostile nations, and the arming of such merchantmen.

EUROPEAN WAR.—The struggle in Poland continues. Przasnysz, north of Warsaw, has been taken twice by each side, being now held by the Russians. Germany seems to be in retreat all along the line in northern Poland, except at Ossowetz, concerning which point reports differ. The Russians are said to have again gained the advantage in Bukowina by driving the Austrians from the capital. On the western line, severe fighting is reported in the Champagne regions, with the French making important gains. Slight gains have been made elsewhere by both lines. Sharp fighting is reported in the Vosges. Two German submarines have been sunk in British waters, and a German submarine is reported taken by a British collier. The allied fleet continues the attack on the Dardanelles, and is now bombarding the inner forts, some of which are reported silenced. The Federal grand jury at New York City has returned two indictments against the Hamburg-American Steamship line and five officials for conspiracy to defraud the United States Government by violation of the custom laws in furnishing supplies to German cruisers. The Italian Government has prohibited popular meetings to discuss Italian participation in the war. Italy is summoning reserve officers to the colors. A Bucharest report announces that Roumanian reserves are to be called out on the 13th. A loan of twenty-five million dollars is being arranged from the Bank of England to the Bank of Roumania. Many Servians are said to be on the verge of starvation. Limited passenger traffic is reported as having been reestablished between the British Isles and the continent.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

DEMISE OF C. W. DEUEL.—Elder W. A. Brooner, writing of the demise of Elder Charles D. Deuel, at Tulare, California, February 24, says:

Brother Deuel and the writer had been laboring together and recently went to Springfield. Finding everything closed on account of scarlet fever, he went home February 23, and on the 24th, while at supper, was stricken with paralysis, passing away just before eleven o'clock that night.

Brother Deuel served the church faithfully as a missionary in recent years.

PASSING OF I. N. ROBERTS.—Word reaches us of the demise of Elder I. N. Roberts at his home, Independence, Missouri, February 28. The burial occurred at Stewartville, Missouri, March 2. Elder Roberts was a man of faithful and diligent service. A long-time missionary and a familiar figure in the General Conferences for many years, his passing as one of the "old guard" will be marked by universal sadness.

SEND IN CREDENTIALS.—Brother R. S. Salyards, Church Secretary, informs us that only about one half of the General Conference credentials are in hand. Those whose duty it is to forward General Conference delegate credentials should attend to that matter immediately, so that they may be placed in the hands of the credentials committee. They must be arranged and published before the convening of conference.

CONFERENCE VISITORS.—Those contemplating attending the coming General Conference should turn to the announcement of the reception committee found in the miscellany department of this issue of the HERALD, and note carefully the details of the same. Any expecting arrangements to be made for their entertainment should communicate their needs to this committee at once, so as to give ample time for the work necessary for the convenience and comfort of the visiting Saints.

CONFERENCE DAILY.—Orders are coming in with every mail for the conference daily HERALD. This early response is a source of much convenience to the office, and if followed up will insure a reasonably good service. If you wish the conference daily, cooperate with the management by sending in your order at once. A delay will impose a hardship on the clerical help, and make prompt and unflinching delivery uncertain. Immediate order will give time for a careful preparation of the list, and so far as the Herald Publishing House is concerned will make possible a satisfactory service.

NEWS FROM JERUSALEM.—Rees Jenkins writes from Jerusalem under date of December 27, 1914:

We are still here, and according to present indications we shall be here for some time, how long we can not tell. May God direct. And if he directs all will be well, whether we are here or there. Present indications, however, seem to indicate that it was best for us to stay. We have earnestly sought for divine direction and have endeavored to follow accordingly. We trust that our remaining will be for the best interests of the work. If we had consulted our own feelings in the matter we would have been gone. Whatever may be said of our action in this matter, we are here. Please remember us in your prayers. So far as we are able to find out, financial aid must come to us through the state department.

IMPROVING OPPORTUNITY.—We note in the Burlington Gazette, of February 4, a detailed announcement of the Nauvoo district auxiliary conventions and district conference, held February 5 to 7 inclusive. The same issue contains a brief, pointed, and suggestive communication from our Brother G. R. Wells, over his signature as pastor of the local Reorganized Church there, in support of a proposed bridge across the Mississippi River at Burlington. Brother Wells also seized the occasion of the conference at Burlington to write up the affairs thereof for the daily press. The Burlington Hawkeye for February 9 contained a column article from his pen, giving a very favorable report of the conference and setting forth some facts concerning the church that should be of interest to the public. This is the kind of publicity work that counts, and opportunity to get into the papers along the lines covered should be improved without fail.

PRESIDENT F. M. SMITH ON POLYGAMY.—The following item is taken from the Somerville (Massachusetts), Journal, February 12:

President F. M. Smith, of the Reorganized Church of the Latter Day Saints, spoke in Pearson's Theater on Sunday afternoon last in one of the sessions of the Massachusetts district conference which was well attended and enjoyed. . . . In his address referred to, Mr. Smith again placed the church on record in no uncertain terms as being first last and all the time unequivocally opposed to the doctrine of plurality of wives, and other doctrines which are taught by the people of Salt Lake, with whom the Reorganized Church is sometimes confounded by the uninformed and malicious. Said church never did, does not now, nor never can believe and teach them, because of the constitution and fundamental principles of the body itself. In the matter of the sale and use of liquor, he also used positive language in stating the policy of the church. From actual experience in contests over the rum traffic, the church in its individual membership had so conducted herself as to make it safe for him to state that ninety-five per cent of the voting membership can be depended upon to cast the ballot against the business in any form, in any proper vote that may be taken.

A LETTER OF INSTRUCTION

[This "Letter of Instruction" was first published in the SAINTS' HERALD for March 13, 1912. It is reproduced here for the benefit of those who may wish to reread it before the convening of the coming General Conference.—EDITORS.]

In presenting the following letter of instruction, to the readers of the HERALD, I have deemed it advisable to do so by a series of questions, having in consideration the subject matter of the position, privilege, and duty of the Quorum of the First Presidency in its several parts contingent upon the death or deposition for cause of the President of the church, denominated in the law as the president of the high priesthood. In answering the several questions the following premises should be remembered and observed.

First. Priesthood, delegated authority, is conferred for the expressed purpose of accomplishing, by human means, the work of the divine mind, for the benefit of mankind.

Second. Office in the priesthood is intended to designate the general and specific work that the individual called, chosen, and ordained to the office is to do.

Third. Office in the priesthood is not conferred to increase the importance of the individual or as a means to self-aggrandizement or personal emolument.

Fourth. All offices in the priesthood are equal in honor before God, the honor of each as to the individual holder resulting from the manner in which the duties of the office are performed.

This is evident from a consideration of the statement made by the Apostle Paul:

For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called. . . . That no flesh should glory in his presence.—1 Corinthians 1: 26-29.

Fifth. It is equally essential to remember that in using the terms, called, appointed, chosen, and ordained, referring to any person chosen and ordained by the body to any office in the priesthood, the worthiness, fitness, and qualifications to act in such office should be understood and conceded without a constant repetition of these terms.

Sixth. It is the axiom of the church, that persons ordained to office in the church are so ordained because they are called of God by revelation.

This follows the injunction of Paul to the Hebrew brethren, "And no man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God."—Hebrews 5: 4.

1. In the case of the death of a president of the church, or his removal from office for cause, what would be the position of his counselors?

To reply to this question intelligently it is necessary to ascertain to what office they have been called and ordained. Doctrine and Covenants 104: 11 reads thus:

Of the Melchisedec priesthood, three presiding high priests, chosen by the body, appointed and ordained to that office, and upheld by the confidence, faith, and prayer of the church, form a quorum of the presidency of the church.

In section 17: 1, Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery were called and ordained apostles. In section 87: 3, it is stated that Sidney Rigdon and Oliver Cowdery were equal to the president in "holding the keys of this last kingdom."

By provision in section 99: 6, the three high priests who were chosen as the Presidency of the church are rated as equal in authority to preside over the high council. In section 68: 2, these three presiding high priests are distinctly authorized to officiate in the ordination of those who are called and appointed to act as bishops in the church, either of the order of Aaron or by virtue of holding the office of high priest.

In the church articles of incorporation, Article 1, in the government of the church, there is provision made that the church should be presided over by a First Presidency, consisting of a president and two counselors. We have already seen how these counselors are chosen.

From what is given from the authorities cited above, it is clear that in authorizing the organization of the church the Lord provided an ample safeguard against imposition upon the people from the improper aspiration of any of the leading authorities of the church, by establishing three quorums as checks and counter checks upon each other, the three being equal in authority in matters of importance, neither one of the three being paramount to overriding the authority of the other two. It is therefore reasonable to suppose that in case of a vacancy occurring in either of the quorums, unless such vacancy was of such a character as to reduce the membership of the quorum below the permissible majority provided for in Doctrine and Covenants 104, where it would be impossible to secure an undivided quorum, such quorum in which the vacancy occurred would still hold its unity of power, a majority existing, providing there was a unity in the remaining members of the quorum. Or in other words, that a quorum broken by death or by deposition, providing a majority still remained, would hold its quorum authority intact, and could not be deprived of its quorum authority and privileges unless it should be overruled by a unanimous decision of the other two quorums. It would not therefore be reasonable to suppose that the Quorum of the First Presidency would be so completely broken by the death or removal from office for cause of the president of the high priesthood that such quorum would cease to exist, as a quorum, or its duties to the body as a quorum cease upon the death or removal of the president. The provision is an ample and wise one, as anyone can see by examining the proposition devoid of prejudice, the result of wrongdoing in the past.

It would then seem clear that the members of the First Presidency who would survive the death of the president would still hold the office of presiding high priests over the high priesthood and be authorized to act in such duties of the presidency in a similar manner that they may do during the life of the president, restricted only by the exceptions found in the law, the most important of these perhaps being the restriction as to the right of receiving revelations and presenting them to the church for the government and guidance thereof. It would further seem reasonable that as these officers were high priests those whose priesthood warrants the belief that they might receive revelations from God, it would not be impossible that the Lord might speak through one of those who remained in the quorum after the death of the principal, or his removal from office for cause, as it is the privilege of the Lord to speak through whom he will. There could be no danger of the church being misled by such revelations, these revelations being subjected to the same scrutiny by the quorums as those given by the president himself.

2. When would their term of authority cease and what would be the extent of their duty pending the appointment of a successor?

Their office as counselors merely would cease at the death of the president, for obvious reasons; but their office as members of the First Presidency to which they had been ordained after being called and chosen would not pass until a successor to the deceased or deposed president was chosen, upon which choice properly made by the body a reorganization of the Quorum of the Presidency would be requisite, their office passing at their report and laying down their office, awaiting the action of the body.

3. Would their right to act as presidents cease at once upon the death of the president or would they be authorized to continue to act as presidents until a successor was chosen?

Being chosen and ordained as presidents of the high priesthood forming a quorum, and not as counselors only, they would be authorized to continue to perform the perfunctory duties of presidents until a successor was chosen or other provision made for an acting presidency. This is agreeable with Doctrine and Covenants 107:39:

I give unto him for counselors my servant Sidney Rigdon and my servant William Law, that these may constitute a quorum and first presidency, to receive the oracles for the whole church.

This shows clearly that the intention of the Great Organizer was to create a quorum, and not simply to institute two men as counselors with no responsibility attaching to them, in case of the absence by death or deposition of the president. It would seem that divine wisdom would not so loosely form a three-fold cord, like that made by the three quorums, the Presidency, Twelve, and Seventy, that one of them would cease to exist if one of its members was to be removed, leaving the other two intact to perform quorum duties. It is safe to assume that when these three forming the Presidency were appointed by revelation, and chosen and ordained "as three presiding high priests," they would be qualified to perform the necessary duties attaching to their office as members of a quorum, with equal authority under the law.

4. Should they report the death of their principal officially to the Quorum of Twelve through the presiding officer of that quorum?

Yes. They should not only report to the Quorum of Twelve, but also report to the Quorum of Seventy, through its president, these quorums holding concurrent jurisdiction in matters of decision. This they should do, not only as a matter of courtesy but as a matter of right.

5. Or should they report to the next ensuing session of the Annual Conference and continue to act as presidents until such conference convenes and their report be made?

They should report to the next ensuing conference and should continue to act in their office as presidents of the high priesthood until the successor of the deceased president should be chosen, and the First Presidency as a quorum reorganized. They should consult with the presiding officers of the two quorums, Twelve and Seventy, and if upon such consultation it would be deemed advisable to call a special session of conference, they should make report to such special conference, in conjunction with the officers of the quorums referred to.

6. Would either of them be eligible to be chosen as president to succeed their principal by virtue of their holding the office of the high priesthood to which they had been ordained as counselors?

Yes. The same as they were eligible to be chosen as members of the First Presidency when such presidency was formed by their accession to it.

7. If the death of the president should be reported by these counselors to the Twelve, would it be the duty of that quorum to at once assume the care and direction of the affairs of the church?

The Quorum of Twelve would not be authorized to traverse outside of their duties as "a traveling, presiding high council," and take absolute direction and control of church affairs, if the remaining members of the Presidency were in agreement and showed no disposition to assume arbitrary control, without proper recognition being given to the two other quorums holding concurrent jurisdiction in matters of decision. Should there be disunity among the remaining members of the Quorum of the Presidency, and confusion and strife as to authority arise between the counselors, the Quorum of Twelve should then be recognized as authorized to secure a proper unity of action in the church in connection with the Quorum of Seventy, holding equal authority in matters of decision. It is not in accordance with sound reason that either quorum would have the right of absolute dictation over the authority and jurisdiction of the other two ruling quorums, these all three having been made equal by organic law. The assumption of arbitrary power and control by either one of these three bodies, declared in the organic law to be equal, would give rise to opposition and active protest, and confusion would inevitably result.

8. Or should they await the sitting of the next ensuing Annual Conference to which report should be made by the counselors and then assume the direction of affairs and proceed to secure nomination and election of a president to fill the vacancy created by the death or removal from office for cause?

They should await the action of the ensuing Annual Conference unless by agreement referred to above an earlier conference is called, at which report of the death of the president should be officially made, when their right to assume temporary control should be accorded them through their presiding officer, subject to voice and vote in the usual form of opening conference.

9. What should be the course of procedure in securing such choosing and sustaining of one to fill such vacancy?

Conference should be opened in the usual manner by choosing a president pro tempore and the necessary secretary, by nomination and vote, whereupon the report of the remaining members of the Quorum of the Presidency should be presented by them, and the conference proceed to act upon said report, or to set an hour on that or a succeeding day, at which the report would be taken up and acted upon. The setting of an hour, as suggested, would give time for the appointment of credentials committee and the hearing of their report, that the conference might be fully prepared to vote viva voce or by a yea and nay call of delegates. There would be no need for friction, if there was a disposition upon the part of all to grant the courtesy and rights to others that they would make demand for themselves, in the spiritual understanding that it is not for the purpose of self-aggrandizement or self-laudation that they are met, but to do business which will conserve the safe interests of the entire body.

10. Should the Quorum of Twelve by one or more of their number by virtue of their office preside at the conference next ensuing after vacancy in the Quorum of the First Presidency occurred?

No person has the right, either in custom or law, to demand the prerogative and rule of authority to preside over the conference of the church when met for business, at a stated period, and arbitrarily assume control without the choice of the assembly obtained by nomination and vote.

11. Or would it be legal or expedient for the conference to choose some one to act pro tempore by usual nomination and vote?

It would be lawful for the conference to choose by nomination and vote any qualified person holding the Melchisedec priesthood to preside pro tempore, but Paul's adage, that "all things are lawful unto me, but all things are not expedient," would be in force in such instance, and the wiser and safer course would be that the president of the Quorum of Twelve or some one of the quorum, or other, whom he might suggest, should be chosen to preside until the First Presidency as a quorum was reconstructed.

12. Could one of the counselors be so chosen by nomination and vote and preside until the vacancy referred to was filled?

Yes. The rule of expediency suggested in the answer to the preceding question would be of force and value in this issue. The remaining members of the Quorum of the First Presidency would be persons directly in interest in the pending business of choosing a successor to the removed president, and the same propriety that causes a presiding officer to vacate the chair when matters in which he is in interest are being considered would suggest that neither of these counselors would desire to preside, under the circumstances governing in the case. If adverse criticism or opposition be made touching the work of these counselors during the interim between the death of the president and the convening of the conference, they should be left free from presiding responsibility, to meet such conditions free from other responsibility. It would seem safe to infer under such conditions that the counselors would decline to accept the duty of presiding, while the matter of succession was being considered. Not until the Quorum of the Presidency is reconstructed would the position of these remaining members be definitely ascertained, as they may or may not be chosen to succeed themselves, and the will of the body may otherwise dispose of them, as to their office.

13. Would it be considered imperative that such vacancy in the Presidency should be filled at the next ensuing conference after such vacancy has occurred?

It would not be imperative, but the rule of expediency would require that if such vacancy could be filled in the spirit of peace and good will it should be done. It would be advisable that the church should know as soon as practicable who should assume definite control of the affairs of the church, for if there should be friction, by reason of contention between individuals as to rights and prerogatives an interim without the choice being made would only serve to sow distrust and disaffection in a wider field. In this as in many other things, precaution is the parent of safety. It is safe to presume that under the ordinary circumstances of church work the conference assembly would be as prepared to act at such ensuing session as they would be at any succeeding period of time, and the risk of unavoidable difficulties occurring would not be incurred.

14. If not, would the Quorum of Twelve in their organized capacity direct and administer in the care of the church until such time as a successor was chosen?

The office of the counselors as members of the Quorum of the Presidency not expiring until the quorum is reconstructed, they would continue to act as stated in answer to question two, and the Quorum of Twelve justly could not take arbitrary control of the affairs of the church outside of their office work as a traveling high council, except upon agreement between the three quorums involved, accepted, and acquiesced in by the voice of the conference. If such agreement was reached and the Quorum of Twelve so installed the counselors would at once cease to act, leaving the quorum vacated, as if their office as counselors expired at the death of the president, they could not hold office as counselors to either a president pro tempore or to the Quorum of Twelve. If they did not exist as a majority of the Quorum of the Presidency, their identity as active officers would be lost to the church, except they should act by sufferance or by courtesy. Strenuous contention as to the rights and prerogatives would be out of place and incongruous under such conditions, and the church has a right to expect that such will not occur.

15. Does the statement, your priesthood hath remained with Christ in God, as given in Doctrine and Covenants 84:3, given to the elders of the church by revelation, taken with other passages of scripture and the revelations found in the Doctrine and Covenants, justify the belief in the right of the sons of those acting in the offices in the priesthood to succeed their fathers who have been or are acting in offices of the priesthood?

The clear understanding of this passage is that the priesthood had remained latent, "hid with Christ in God," but the office in such priesthood depends upon the manner of call by revelation, choice, and ordination. Call, choice, and ordination presume worthiness, fitness, and qualification.

16. Does the law of primogeniture inure to the first born?

Yes. The church, however, is dealing with living entities and the eldest living son is, so far as church work is concerned, to be considered eligible as the first born.

17. Are such first-born sons eligible to be chosen to succeed their fathers, other qualifications of fitness to act in the office being equal and satisfactory to the church?

Yes, without question.

18. Do the terms occurring in Doctrine and Covenants 104:18, wherein the office of patriarch is mentioned, refer to the priesthood as other officers included in the priesthood called Melchisedec, the words being, "This priesthood was confirmed to be handed down from father to son"?

The words, this priesthood, occurring in the section referred to, apply to the Melchisedec priesthood and not to any office in the priesthood. The patriarch is an office or an order in the priesthood. There is a division of labor under different offices in the priesthood, but no division in the priesthood is created when a person is ordained to an office. One of the earliest teachings of the church, and most substantial, is that there are but two priesthoods. The multiplication of the offices could not create an additional priesthood.

19. Is this priesthood referred to in this paragraph the same as that which appears in section 104:3, wherein the provision for the choosing of a president of the high priesthood is given?

Yes. The quotation referred to makes it clear and decisive that the priesthood from which the presiding officers are to be chosen is the Melchisedec priesthood, and not from any specific quorum or office in the priesthood.

20. Is there just reason for believing that the words designating the class and number of such class of officers refer to and include only the members of the apostolic quorum?

The value of this question will be seen when it occurs to the reader that there is an organized body professing belief in the priesthood as given by revelation to the church, who construe the language occurring in Doctrine and Covenants 104:11, designating the class of officers from among whom the three presiding high priests constituting the Quorum of the First Presidency are to be chosen as applying to the apostolic quorum only, assuming that the words "three presiding high priests" mean only those who have already been chosen and ordained as such presiding high priests. Acting upon this interpretation of the language, they have assumed the right to confine the choice and ordination to the Presidency to those who have previously been ordained apostles of the Quorum of Twelve.

The term "three presiding high priests" who were to constitute the Quorum of the First Presidency applies to the three chosen and ordained after such ordination has taken place to the office of three presiding high priests over the Melchisedec priesthood, and by no means indicates that the appointment by revelation from God, and the choice and ordination by the church, are to be confined to the apostolic quorum only.

21. Or is the number there referred to inclusive of all the members holding and occupying in offices of the high priesthood?

The choice by revelation is at the disposition of the Lord. He has the right to designate whom he may choose; but when the matter is left to the action of the body, those holding the high priesthood, known as Melchisedec, whether members of any quorum or not, would be eligible.

22. Do the revelations given in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants justify the belief that a son of a president of the church, duly called by revelation and ordained and sustained by the church, is eligible to succeed his father as president, other qualifications of fitness being equal, with other members of the high priesthood? Do such revelations justify a belief that such a son should be chosen to succeed his father as president?

Following the legendary teaching of the eldership and the precedent established in the reorganizing of the church, based upon the revelations which were accepted and on record at the death of Joseph and Hyrum Smith, the eldest living son of a president of the high priesthood acting as president of the church would be eligible under the considerations named in the question.

Unless such action was contravened by revelation directing otherwise, such son should be chosen. This would be in harmony and consistent with the precedents of history and the legendary teaching referred to.

23. Do the revelations point out with sufficient clearness that such a son is appointed by revelation as the proper one to be chosen and sustained as successor to his father, his father having died in office while being sustained by the faith, confidence, and prayers of the church?

Yes, unless such action upon the part of the church is prevented by revelation directing otherwise.

24. Or do such revelations require that such a person to succeed should be appointed or named by the incumbent prior to his death in order to justify the church in making such person their choice of successor?

In the absence of direct revelation, otherwise the church would be justified in choosing and ordaining such a person to succeed a president removed by death under conditions named in the question.

25. Would the church be justified in choosing and electing such a person under the direction of present and existing revelations or does the spirit of revelation and wisdom in the various quorums and members of the priesthood sufficiently point out or designate such person as should be chosen to fill the vacancy in the Presidency caused by death, without such previous designation being so made by the existing incumbent in the office of president?

In the view of the subject thus presented, as shown by the precedent, established in the choosing of a president of the church in 1860, it would appear clear that the church would be so justified; for the reason that the spirit of revelation and wisdom as manifested to the one chosen in 1860 and to the members and officers of the church then in partial organization, there was sufficient coherence as to justify the action of the church upon that occasion. There is now, as there was then, evidence of a supervising Spirit working upon the different members of quorums and workers in the church, pointing to such a consummation, should the occasion arise demanding action upon the part of the church.

26 and 27. By whom should the nomination for the choosing (and electing) of a successor to fill the vacancy in the Presidency by death at the conference meeting to choose such successor be made? Would such nomination be confined to the Quorum of Twelve in their capacity as a quorum under the provision of the law which says, "they shall regulate and set in order," etc., as found in Doctrine and Covenants 104, on priesthood?

When the conference has assembled and has been duly called to order, and the business properly stated, the common rule would permit any member of the assembly entitled to voice and vote to make such nomination; but a custom of courtesy having been established in the church, a priority of privilege should be cheerfully accorded to the one holding highest office by ordination; and if there should be two or more holding office alike in this regard, seniority in point of age should be considered, and by common consent he be privileged to make such nomination. If, however, the question should have been considered in quorum capacity by the leading quorums of the church and an agreement reached by such quorums as to the person to be nominated, it would be proper for such nomination to be presented by the Quorum of Twelve by the president of that quorum, by consent of the quorum or by some person to be named by them, either from among their own number or one from either of the quorums holding the Melchisedec priesthood.

This course of procedure in nominating would prevent any disturbing question of right or priority from occurring, the end to be reached being the good of all and not the gratification of any personal self-interest.

28. Is there just reason to believe that a successor to the present incumbent of the office of president of the high priesthood is sufficiently clearly designated to warrant the church in making a choice in case of the death of such incumbent?

The right to give revelation belongs to God. Necessarily the giving or withholding of revelation is determined by his wisdom, and is not governed by the desires of those who believe in revelation, nor by the necessities and exigencies of the church judged only by the wisdom of men. Hence, in the light of what has been stated, in answering the questions going before there is just reason to believe that if no further revelation should be accorded the church, more specifically directing who should be chosen to succeed, in case of the removal of the present incumbent by death, the church would be justified in proceeding to make such choice upon what has already been vouchsafed, bearing upon the subject.

It must be taken for granted that He who has watched over the church since its establishment in the days of Adam and of Enoch up to the present must be accredited with the all-pervading wisdom that provides for every exigency through which the church may be called to pass. It is upon this fact that the confidence of the church must rest, to the effect that apparent direction for the accomplishment of certain designs has been given, and further and more definite direction does not follow, the church is justified in pursuing that course which is to it justified by the spirit of wisdom and revelation resting with it in its various quorums and organizations, for the various works of the church. As we are distinctly told that our ways are not like his ways, our thoughts are not like his thoughts, the church is justified in doing that which is necessary to be done, by the wisdom that may be given it at the time such work is to be done, if no specific direction is given how such work shall be performed, and there is abundant evidence to justify the belief that if the church will pursue such principle the Lord will not permit the work intrusted to their care to suffer from failure upon his part to give such specific direction, much as his people may have desired it should have been given.

One of the reasons why it is difficult to answer the foregoing questions, with apparent satisfaction to all, is that the only precedents established by the church are those incident to the choice and installation of Joseph Smith, jr., the first president, and the choosing and ordination of his successor in 1860, so far as the choice of the president direct is concerned.

The choosing and appointing of a presiding officer by those engaged in the Reorganization can scarcely be regarded as a precedent, except so far as a recognition of the rightful successor, by the choosing of one to represent him, and the many spiritual manifestations connected with the choosing of such a representative and his associate officers of the church.

It will be remembered by those conversant with the action taken by the Reorganization, and those who have read the history of those events, that the spirit of prophecy accompanied the various efforts of those who had held the priesthood through ordination and administration of the martyred president and patriarch, and foreshadowed each successive movement. In answer to prayer those men were, by revelation, directed to the Book of Doctrine and Covenants as containing the rules of law in the observance of which the foundation and superstructure of complete reorganization could be safely accomplished. The effect of this recognition of the revelations given during the formative period of the church and that which was done under the observance of the instructions therein given, practically reduced the interregnum which it is charged interrupted the onward sweep of the church in its office work, from the sixteen years elapsing between 1844 and 1860, to the eight years elapsing between 1844 and 1852; eight years instead of sixteen.

It is a fortunate circumstance that the conference of 1852 was held fully two months before the promulgation of the so-called revelation on plural marriage, and the action taken at that time shows beyond successful dispute that the supervising spirit of the work had wisely forestalled the spirit of the adversary which sought to destroy surely the spiritual building of the church organized in 1830. Each successive step following that conference up to the April Conference of 1860 strongly confirms the line of instructions given in answers to the questions above stated.

The church is not at liberty to accept or to follow the precedent supposedly established by the action of the Quorum of Twelve in the fall of 1844, in the Twelve taking absolute charge of the administration of the affairs of the church, which culminated in 1847 in the installing of a Presidency by taking three from the then nine adhering members of the Twelve existing at the death of the Prophet, and installing them in the Presidency of the church with Brigham Young as their chief, which action was followed by public proclamation of the plural marriage dogma with its concomitant corruptions of the doctrines of the church, through the revelation and the restoration of the gospel.

This precedent and those established by James J. Strang, Lyman Wight, William Smith, and others, are of no value in directing the action of the church, other than they serve as warnings against deviating from the letter and the spirit of what had been given to the church prior to the death of Joseph and Hyrum Smith. They are but precedents showing what the church may do in safety.

In the organic law given in Doctrine and Covenants 104 it is clearly pointed out that the Lord intended to provide a sufficient safeguard against a possible contingency in which there might be an effort made by one or more ambitious men, more mindful of self-exaltation and aggrandizement than for the good of a spiritual people, to so far obtain control in authority that mischievous and pernicious theories and doctrines, in either faith or organization, by which the symmetry of the whole might be virtually destroyed. This was done by authorizing the establishing of three quorums holding equal authority in matters of extreme decision, forming a three-fold cord in spiritual affairs and in fact that could not easily be broken. The same organic law provides rules by which when these quorums are once established, they may be kept intact in so far that no one of them may under ordinary circumstances become so disorganized as to prevent its working in connection with each of the others in harmony for the good of all. This provision is found in the direction that a majority may perform service if it is impossible that the entire body of either quorum be present; or in other words, that if it should be impossible that the whole of each be available for the important service.

This view is held to be applicable to the Twelve and Seventy by some, who in the absence of specific instructions in the law assume what may be called a logical or constructive interpretation of various provisions of the law. There is no reason in law or logic nor the common renditions of prudence and wisdom why the same principle of completeness in majority should not apply to the leading quorum known as the Presidency as well as to those of the Twelve and Seventy. The ordination of those chosen as presidents of the high priesthood constitute the three thus ordained as a quorum. Citations from the law are given in two or three answers to questions in the foregoing list which clearly and definitely determine this point.

That one of these three high priests thus chosen to constitute a quorum should hold the office of president of the high priesthood with the prerogatives of receiving revelations for the government and guidance of the church when conditions require that such direction and guidance are necessary and are asked for, as well as to be in place for the discharge of such duty if the wisdom and will of the supreme Law-giver has such wisdom and guidance to give to the church, does not so far impair the apparent intention of making three quorums equal as to destroy the completeness of such quorum, if that individual be taken from the quorum, by either death or transgression, providing that the remaining members are a unit in belief and decision. To assume that the two other than the principal are but counselors to the one, and that upon his death or deposition the Quorum of the Presidency is hopelessly and helplessly broken as one unit of the three equal quorums, and that the functions of their office were only advisory as counselors, and so ceased at the death of the principal, thus ending their responsibility and authority, is to strike at the symmetry of the whole structure and leave an unfortunate, weak spot which evidently was not intended to exist by the great Master Builder.

But there is another provision of the law to which attention is called, that should the emergency arise by the death or defection of the incumbent of the Presidency and the death or deposition of one of the remaining members of the Quorum of the Presidency, leaving but one in minority, that it would be well for the church to remember and bring into operation, if serious necessity should occur. It is distinctly stated in the law that the high council, presumably the standing high council of the church in Zion, is in equality in its decision with that of the Quorum of the Presidency or that of the Twelve, supplying the third member of the three-fold principle in spiritual control, if either of the quorums of the established order might be lost to the economy of the church by death or defection of either one of the important component parts of the three-fold cord, constituted by the unity of the Presidency, Twelve, and Seventy. (See Doctrine and Covenants 104.)

By accepting the fact that those composing the Quorum of the Presidency are ordained unto the equal functions of authority as a quorum, with the exception of specific duty imposed upon the president, the quorum is not in danger of dissolution by the death of either of its component parts; but will continue its work as a quorum so long as a majority of the quorum remains intact, and may carry on the work unto which they were ordained as presidents of the high priesthood until the quorum shall again be reconstructed and full membership established. By accepting this view there is authority for the continuation of the quorums acting together in unity, or if divergence of opinion occurs an equilibrium in the principles of action between either two of the quorums is preserved, and the work go on smoothly.

By assuming that two of those ordained to the office of president of the high priesthood are but counselors to the one, and that at the death of the one the office and authority of the counselors cease, the equilibrium is destroyed. If they were counselors only, and not entitled to act in any other role or capacity, they being counselors only to the president removed by death or deposition, they can not as such counselors act in association with either the Twelve or the Seventy or the High Council in Zion, they not having been ordained as counselors to such offices.

There is no rule of law or logic that warrants such a construction of church procedure, and it would performer be a singular stretch of courtesy that would continue them as counselors to living authorities when their office as counselors had passed by reason of the death of their principal. As such counselors they could not demand that the president of the Twelve or the seven presidents of the Seventy should accept their offices as counselors, nor could these authorities demand their presence and assistance upon the supposition that their ordination to their dead principal had given them warrant for such demand.

As members of the Quorum of the Presidency, continuing in the discharge of the duties as presidents of the high priesthood, according to the terms of their ordination to such office until such time as the office made vacant by the death or defection of the president of the church is again filled by revelation, choice, and ordination, and themselves or others chosen as associate presidents of the high priesthood, there need be neither difficulty nor danger of a lapse of unity or a fear of conflict of authority. There is danger if other course of action is taken. Observing the premises laid down at the beginning of this letter of instruction, there need be no hesitancy in accepting the views expressed in these answers and adopting the course therein set forth.

Assuming the right seemingly conferred in the revelations contained in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, and conforming to the safer principles enunciated in the legendary teaching of the eldership, I, Joseph Smith, the present incumbent of the office of president of the Reorganized Church, definitely designate my eldest living son, Frederick Madison Smith, as the proper person to be chosen by the church as my successor in office, believing as I do that the Spirit of revelation and wisdom has manifested to me that such choice should be made as directed by the Spirit of the great Master Builder. The present incumbent of the office of president of the Reorganized Church states further that he has trust and confidence in that Spirit which called him to the position which he has held for the last half century of time, and more, that such manifestation will be given to the several eldership of the church as will confirm the advice and direction herein given.

He, therefore, submits this letter of instruction to the careful consideration of his associate officers and members of the church in the work intrusted to the care of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

The Children's Home

EDITED BY HEMAN C. SMITH AND CALLIE B. STEBBINS,

Love

It has been said that "love is the fulfilling of the law," and in a large if not a complete sense it is true. It is the key to all that is good and great and pure. The influences of love move the world. No man or woman ever became great or good without it. Mentally, his thoughts become more acute and sensitive and he fathoms depths, ascends heights, and enlarges the bounds of his comprehension through the influence of love. Physically, his blood flows more freely, his pulses thrill with healthier glow, his heart beats with more health-giving throbs, his voice becomes more tender, his accents more suggestive of sympathy, more full of pathos, and harmony when quickened by the influence of love. Morally, love lays a restraining hand on excesses, tones down the asperity of one's nature, causes character to bud and bloom in full fruition of glorious purity. Let love do its perfect work and enmity, hatred, jealousy, must disappear; for the soil where love grows will not produce such crops. Love for the creature increases love for the Creator. It is an antidote for infidelity, skepticism and sin. The heart full of love must worship, and to convince such a one that there is in the universe no being worthy of his full devotion, reverence and trust would be to destroy his hope, his trust, his love, aye, in the very best sense his life.

Selfishness, on the other hand, dwarfs the intellect, feeds and fosters disease, morally and physically, and renders the soul too impure for spiritual peace. Selfishness is a noxious weed that grows and flourishes without effort; but love is a tender plant requiring careful cultivation.

But if not blinded by selfishness there are so many unfortunate ones to incite our sympathy and love that our capabilities for love must be enlarged, and when we reach forth the helping hand to the needy they are reciprocating. They are supplying us with the means for our best development. They are as necessary to our good as we are to theirs.

It was love—love for the homeless, destitute, helpless children—love grown great—ripening in the hearts of our beloved Sister Walker and her noble band of helpers—love grown too great to brook restraint that suggested the building of a home for children. It was love that swept like a contagion through the ranks of the church until the men and women were brought into such close rapport with God that they heard the voice of inspiration directing that the efforts of these sisters should be consummated. The forces of love swept on and on until the Children's Home was an inevitable result.

In the building of the home there was, and in the conducting of the home there is, no selfish desire, no selfish purpose, no selfish thought, no selfish impulse. While in a sense the home stands to-day a monument to those loving mother hearts that waited through long years of labor and sacrifice with the eye of faith fixed steadily upon this object, it is in a higher and better sense a monument to love.

Is there anywhere a heart so dead that it is not moved by the sweet impulses of love, as this grand procession sweeps on? No, no, it can not be! Those who can will take one or more of these little ones into their bosom, to love, cherish, and care for, and give a chance to become angels of mercy to them. Those who can not do this will contribute to this great work. They have done so. They will continue to do so. The Children's Home is founded in love and can not fail. It is an assured success. "God is love," and that which is founded in love is of God.

Erratum

The next to the last paragraph of the article "Responsibility," in Children's Home column in HERALD for February 24, page 188, is not intelligible as it appears in HERALD. The sentence reading "Nor will it be proper to fill the home with home interfering" reads in the manuscript as a continuation of the preceding sentence: "Where incompetency to govern is the reason for the home interfering."

A Fruitful Field

We heartily commend the following selection, and ask for it a careful study. When putting in loving practice the sentiment contained therein, among other demands neglect not the demands of the helpless children. Surely there is no field needing cultivation more, or none promising greater returns. It was the Master who said: "Occupy until I come."

YOUR NEEDY BROTHER

- O all of you that hold the gates of vision,
Fling wide your doors to these without that wait,
And lead them through the highways of your city,
And through its temples, ere it be too late.
- O all of you that know earth's orchard closes,
Bend down the boughs for those beyond the wall;
Gather for them all your wealth of blossom,
And shake the branches, that the fruit may fall.
- O all of you made stewards of earth's treasure,
Give while you may the gold that is your trust;
For you shall lie at last where is no giving,
With helpless hands close folded in the dust.
- O all you dwelling in the house of learning,
Set forth your pages that the poor may read
The gathered wisdom that the years inherit,
In haste before you pass beyond your need.
- O all you that know the wells of gladness,
And sing beside them, share, while yet you live,
Your pitcher with the thirsty, ere, hereafter,
You hear them cry and be too poor to give.
- Ah! give. The road you tread has no returning,
But stretches on into the endless night;
Then give your life, your joy, your gold, your learning;
Lift high your lamp of love and give its light.
—Selected.

Practical Suggestions

Doctrine and Covenants 82: 2 gives us to understand that widows, orphans, and the poor shall be provided for by the church.

You who have children, and are financially able, do you not wish to aid another child, as you would that others might provide for your child if circumstances were reversed?

Do you know that when you give cheerfully to any good cause, it helps you, morally, spiritually, every way?

Are you touched by the innocence of youth? have you a desire to do good to those who grow up under adverse circumstances? if so, is not a help to Children's Home a good way to express yourself?

The home should have continuous help, it should have systematic support. How may this be done? Let every aid society plan to contribute at least once each year.

Let every branch through a hustling committee or officer, collect funds in the branch from those able to assist. Let the sisters in each branch plan a social supper or something and send in.

One district has collected about two hundred dollars each year the past three years, and yet not more than one in ten has contributed.

Do you know the spirit of the age in the United States today is one of helpfulness? Shall the people of the world be in advance of the members of the church in charity or giving?

Prohibition and Laws

The well-being of social life is largely dependent on laws and their observance. The name of Moses assumes a leading place in repressive measures and prohibitory laws. Moses stood sponsor for laws that distinctly embodied the clause, "Thou shalt not." Studying the time and the people he dwelt among, two things are noted: Their social ideals, and the wisdom of the laws enacted to deal with them.

The comfort and well-being of social conditions now, in every phase of our existence, have multiplied and expanded a thousandfold. Still the need exists. Common to all mankind, individually and collectively, men must be ruled much the same way yet.

In the evolution of time, another lawgiver came, in wise provision for the manifest needs of an advancing intellectual and spiritual life. He placed before the world higher ideals. "Thou shalt not," is superseded by what, in concrete form, means, I will not. Christ clearly and beautifully showed by his teaching on the mount the spirit of the law, in contrast with the letter.

The significance of this teaching is the attitude of man in relation to law, outlined in no uncertain way. The creative mind purposed a development that would be supreme in every situation in life, and building on this is responding to the call, "Come up higher." The human element in the added nature given us involved personal responsibility, calling into exercise the ruling powers of mind and will. Hence, "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he."

These spiritual convictions the Master sought to instill by his teaching would more truly justify the belief, in a broader sense, that man is made in his image, and after his likeness.

Riley-Heiner Debate

This debate grew out of a series of meetings held at Siloam Springs, Arkansas, by Brethren Dubois and Erwin, and was signed up to be held in the Baptist Church, between Elder Riley and Reverend Heiner, who came as a representative of the Missionary Baptist Church.

The usual church propositions were under consideration. The debate was of six days duration, two sessions a day, two hours to the session, sessions divided into two half-hour speeches each, to begin November 2. The Baptists finally refused to allow the debate in the church, thinking there could be no other place secured. We got together and rented a building that would seat about five or six hundred people. The discussion was held in this place. The debate was a complete victory for us.

The Reverend Heiner commenced to sling mud at the very beginning. He was the weakest debater I ever saw; but as a mud dauber he fills the bill. While our propositions were on trial he would say, "I do not charge my opponent nor his moderator with being polygamist, but the church they represent is a polygamous church, and they are a polygamous outfit." He tried to show that the Book of Mormon was a fraud; said it was written from the Spalding Romance. Brother Riley showed the fallacy of this argument. When their propositions were placed on the dissecting table, Reverend Heiner failed to establish his position, but did the best he could, and tried to trace their church back to Christ, even to John the Baptist. In this he failed utterly.

Brother Riley is a competent debater. All through the discussion he manifested the spirit of the Master; at the same time his opponent threw dirt and mud from the commencement of the discussion.

Feeling at this place has been very bitter, but this debate has removed considerable prejudice that never could have been lifted otherwise. The Baptists certainly went down in defeat. At the close, Brother Riley led three precious souls into the waters of baptism. We feel that much good can be done here if the work is kept up. We ask the prayers of all God's people that we may have a portion of his Spirit, to be able to live worthy of being called Saints, and worthy of redemption when the Master comes to claim his own.

We pray for the welfare of God's people and the upbuilding of his kingdom on earth.

The writer acted as moderator for Brother Riley.

ARNETT, OKLAHOMA.

Editors Herald: When I came to Oklahoma six years ago this winter, we had been living at Andover, Missouri, near Lamoni, and that summer I had thought at times I would be willing to do anything or go any place if I could only be a means of helping others who had not heard the gospel. Often I would sing the lines beginning, "Send me forth, O blessed Master." I desired to go into homes that knew not the gospel and tell them this beautiful story. Yet little did I understand what it would mean to me.

I remember telling Sister Estella Wight at the reunion of 1908, that it seemed that the Lord was near when I was at prayer. She replied that perhaps this was preparing me for greater trials. In my patriarchal blessing I was told that trials more or less should come all along the way, but that the light which I would receive would enable me to abide in the faith.

My husband had been a sufferer for years. We were in straitened financial circumstances, and he desired to come to Oklahoma to be with his married children. It was my desire to remain near Lamoni, for this place and all the country round about was the dearest on earth to me. The Saints also were dear to me.

Within a few hours after we reached this place, the married children sent for the doctor, as my husband had grown much worse. Amidst my trouble that first year it seemed that God had forsaken me. Our crop was blighted by hot winds, and the two little children and I stayed alone weeks at a time in a one-room dugout, with no one nearer than three quarters of a mile. My home had been filled with grown-up children for some years past, and now I seemed far away from the Saints and from some of my children. It seemed that God refused to hear or answer my prayers.

In the fall Brethren A. M. Chase and H. F. Durfee came and administered to me, as I had been sick for some weeks. It seemed that the cloud was partly lifted. They preached a few sermons. That was in 1909. At this time we lived eighteen miles southwest of Arnett. For the last four years we have lived nine miles north and east of this place.

Although at first I did not see as I did later, I now realize that I have had that granted me for which I so earnestly longed that summer while at Andover, and of which I have spoken. At first I only talked to those who came within my home of the gospel. Later I went to other homes, some where want and care were known, and some the homes of sinful men.

I stood by a dying boy, fifteen years of age, who the last rational morning of his life arose earlier than the rest that he might learn the Lord's prayer, so that he could repeat it to Mrs. Adair the next Sunday at Sunday school. The father of this child cursed God and said, "Show me a God who will let a child suffer like that." This same man asked me to come into his home the next day and pray. For thirteen days I cared for a burned child in this same home, the father, mother, and baby sister having been burned to death. Later I went with her to a hospital at Kansas City, Missouri. I stood at an open grave and led a song and offered a prayer, when a gray-haired man not twenty feet away was swearing because he was angry at the child's father.

For three years I have been superintendent of a Sunday school. I have succeeded in making this people understand we are not Brighamites, and have also gotten some to read our papers, books, and tracts. I have fasted and asked God to guide me and give me wisdom and divine grace. Often I have been made to see my weakness and wherein I have failed. Yet God has been merciful. When crops failed and sickness overcame my companion, I was given strength to go forth and earn that which ministered to the comfort of loved ones.

One year ago, in July, we attended the reunion at Woodward. It seemed good to be among the Saints. Brother Hubert Case baptized my youngest child, Lyman, while there, and my husband was administered to. He has gradually grown stronger ever since, and now, though nearly sixty years of age, is stronger than he has been for years. None but our heavenly Father knows what a change has come in our home. To him be all the praise.

I have learned to love many of these people and to pity them all because of the darkness which has settled over them. My earnest desire has been that God in his own due time would send some one of his servants to preach the word to them. Though I have waited long, at last I can report a meeting which has been of particular interest. Tuesday, November 24, Brother J. H. Baker and Brother and Sister Kelley, of Dunlap, came to our place, and the next evening he began a meeting two miles west and two miles north of our home, just about twelve miles south and east of Gage. Brother Kelley and wife stayed two nights, after which they returned home. About thirty-five to sixty were present to hear, and the people helped us with the singing, and different ones played for us. Brother Baker preached thirteen sermons. The interest was unusually good for the crowd who came. Both men and women took down quotations which were used.

The third night the Church of Christ people became enraged. They came forward and asked for a sign, and challenged Brother Baker to heal a person twenty-seven years old, and who has never talked or walked. He met them calmly and answered them as best he could amidst all their clamor. I suggested to both the men and women, perhaps with more candor than charity, to what generation the sign seekers belong. One large, burly young fellow shook his finger under Brother Baker's nose. This with other things enraged a man by the name of Byron Webb until he pulled off his hat and offered to settle it at once. But Brother Baker said, "Come, let us act like men." And at last they shook hands with the elder and went out.

Once the Pentecostal Nazarenes, who had been told that God was not the author of confusion, and that order was the first law of heaven, became enraged also. This was followed by an attack from the Baptists. At times it seemed that men intended to strike him, but Byron Webb and Will Adair always stood near. One night two Nazarenes came forward. One especially was angered, and while positively affirming he lived above sin, his face was ashy pale and he trembled visibly. After talking some minutes one of them said, "Let us pray." They both prayed, thanking God for sending this aged man to show them greater light. I followed, earnestly praying God to lead these people in the light of the glorious gospel as it was revealed in the last days. As we arose from our knees Brother Baker, with tears running down his cheeks, bore testimony of the goodness of God to his children and of his watchcare over them by sending servants to minister among the children of earth in these latter days. One of the Nazarenes said, "I believe what you say is true."

The next morning Brother Baker met one of these men in the road and asked permission to come to his home and talk to him. He said that he had had enough of all that, and he would not consent for him to come. The other returned one more night, and after the meeting talked to Brother Baker for a long time, saying he supposed he might expect the Lord to send old lady Adair over to his house any time with a revelation to be baptized. Brother Baker informed him that would hardly be necessary, as God had sent his authorized servant with this message. May the Lord bring this man to see the light.

The Nazarenes finally challenged our people for a debate, and the matter was referred to Brother Hubert Case. Byron Webb was baptized Monday, December 7. His wife wept and said she made such a failure when she joined the Nazarenes that she wanted more time to investigate. One member of the Christian Church said the same thing. Many are investigating and were very friendly, asking Brother Baker home with them and when he went plying him with questions for hours at a time.

May the heavenly Father bless his children wherever they are and help them to be faithful.

DOUGLAS, ARIZONA, December 21, 1914.

Editors Herald: We just closed, Thursday night, a four-session debate with the Salt Lake church representatives. The Gentile attendance comprised nearly one third of the audience, and demonstrated in our favor, observing that we had the best of the argument. Some who before the debate were ignorant of and indifferent to our work, are inquiring about it now.

Elder Robinson, the Brighamite disputant, said he was glad the Reorganized Church brought to light the Inspired Translation, because it was the best one in existence, evidencing the divine calling of Joseph the Martyr. We reminded him that the Reorganized Church was God's instrument in preserving the manuscript, and was fulfilling the prophetic mission of teaching the Inspired Scriptures to all nations, kindred, tongues, and peoples, according to Doctrine and Covenants 42: 15.

One night my opponent said that the establishment of Zion in the mountains of Utah fulfilled scriptural prediction, and was much preferred to the mud flats of Missouri. But the following night he admitted that Missouri was pointed out by revelation as the gathering place, and that they were all going back there some time. We reminded him of his change of front, and told him that as yet they remained the rebellious, cut off out of the land of Zion, and cited him to Doctrine and Covenants 64: 7; 107: 13, and stated that on their return if repenting of polygamy and kindred faults they would be welcomed only on the authority of the Reorganized Church already established in Zion.

At the closing session after supplying proper quotations, a chart on succession was presented, showing on the one hand the Reorganized Church position, with a president of proper lineage, appointed by revelation and ordained to teach revelations. This chart showed further the fatherhood of God, and that our position was that Christ was the immaculate one, and that we had spiritual endowments; that we were directed by the scriptures, contending that the atonement of Christ was all sufficient; that the gathering place was Missouri; that the church was governed by common consent, and that monogamy was the Reorganized teaching on marriage. Over against this, in opposite column, we placed the Brighamite position, which is that the senior apostle becomes the president, which is merely custom, (Reed Smoot, volume 1, page 368.) Their position with reference to the Adam-God theory was set forth, as was their teaching seeking to show that Christ was not immaculately conceived. As against spiritual endowments, their position was shown with reference to secret endowments. Against the scriptures as a standard, were placed living oracles; against the atonement of Christ, human atonement; against Missouri, the Salt Land; against common consent, priestly dominion; against monogamy, polygamy.

Brother S. D. Condit is familiar with the Brighamite position, and was a great help to me and an excellent moderator.

Your brother in Christ,
W. H. MANNERING.

NEW LISKEARD, ONTARIO, December 24, 1914.

Editors Herald: Having been appointed a missionary and commissioned to labor in New Liskeard, by request of Brother Ellis, I visited the few isolated Saints about one hundred and sixty miles from my home at Burks Falls and found them trying to keep the work alive; but with no officers and only occasional visits from an elder it seems rather discouraging. Prejudice was at par, but after four weeks of labor much of this was removed. We preached in the house of outsiders. Some were interested and others wished to be baptized, but conditions were not favorable at the time. We trust that they may be in the future.

Returning home, I went north to Thornloe, where I have baptized about thirty, all living close together, with some good Saints among them. I think here would be a good place for a branch. They hold Sunday school and prayer meetings. I also visited Earlton, Uno Park, and Beancamp, where I had good attendance and where several were interested.

The people are anxious in many places in this new country to hear the gospel and will open their homes for meetings, but many are on homesteads and have only small houses. However, we make the best of conditions. It seems that people are more approachable in these surroundings than when they become more comfortably situated.

We have a branch in New Liskeard of about ninety members. In the fall of 1912 we met together and considered the advisability of building a church. When we examined our bank account we found we had only forty dollars. Some of the members exhibited great faith, saying that if we tried and did our best we would receive the necessary aid. So a building committee was appointed. We purchased a lot for one hundred and seventy-five dollars. We made our payments on this lot and built a nice little church, on which property we now owe only about thirty dollars.

We do not think we could have accomplished this in the time we did had it not been for the aid we received from the Shepardson Lumber and Building Company, all four of whom are our brethren in the church, and who run a factory where we could secure everything needed. These men furnished the material and waited until the Saints were able to pay for the same. So it is largely through their efforts that we have been able to secure our building. Members of the branch did all the work of erecting this building, even to the installing of the electric lights. We expect to have the church dedicated in June or July, and also to have a two-day meeting, of which due notice will be given.

The thermometer at this time registers forty degrees below zero. I have preached to good crowds with the thermometer sixty degrees below.

Ever wishing and praying for the welfare of the work,
Respectfully yours,

HENRY RIBBEL.

MANCHESTER, ENGLAND, February 18, 1915.

Editors Herald: I am about to leave England in order to be in attendance at the General Conference of the church, at Lamoni in April. I do not know whether I shall succeed in getting through the "blockade" which is now supposed to be in force around these isles, but I have arranged to sail on the 24th inst., on board the White Star liner Arabic. So if anything should happen you will know just where I shall stand, at the time, at least. I certainly wish that times and conditions were more favorable, but I have faith to believe that we shall get through all right.

Perilous times are the order of the day without a doubt, especially in this land at present. Living is becoming more difficult daily; food and clothing, and in fact even boot laces have gone up in price. Workmen are contending and striking for more wages, and, in some instances, tradesmen can not get goods to provide for the wants of the people. Our coal merchant could not let us have only one half of our coal supply yesterday, and there is even a famine for firewood. So one may have some idea how things are likely to be should our resources be cut off.

I feel to say this morning, "My times are in thy hands, my God, I wish them there." I therefore commend us all to the care of a loving Father. We have not anything to fear, for even in death we live. Yes, life is eternal; that is the one message of the gospel above all others. Death is but the passage, not the end of our existence. The world may wish for death, and I believe many do, but they must live, "Thy dead men shall live."

Oh, that we may be able to sense the humane life as ordained by the Father of life and light, peace and good will, companionship, and brotherhood. What a different world we should see and realize. Lord hasten the day when men shall desire and call for light, and may our experience be as thine—"and there was light."

Your brother,

W. H. GREENWOOD.

Extracts from Letters

F. L. Sawley, Post Oak, Missouri: "I just closed a twelve-night debate with Elder John Giddens of the Christian Church. Several are wanting books. The debate has created quite an interest, and some are near the kingdom, a few having given names for baptism. I baptized six before the debate. I have been laboring here since November 16 and have created an excellent interest at Post Oak and in the regions round about. I am feeling well after my long siege of affliction at Independence, am enjoying my work and very busy as a missionary, for which I am thankful to God. My case is like the old saying, enjoying the sweet better after having endured the bitter."

J. E. Yates, Phoenix, Arizona: "We have what seems to be quite an improvement here in the way of tracting. Instead of the house-to-house method, we deliver open-air discourses upon a thronged thoroughfare every day, and at the close of each sermon the people are eager to get the tracts. In this manner we are sure that a much larger percentage of the literature will be read than in the former method of distribution. We have splendid audiences and better order and attention than I ever saw in street work. As Phoenix is a sort of geographical hub-center during the winter months, it is thus possible to reach many distant points as well as to advertise the gospel locally."

Edwin T. Dawson, Lamoni, Iowa: "I desire to mention the good spiritual prayer meetings and gospel sermons we have at Lamoni. I love this gospel restored to earth in these last days by an angel from heaven through Joseph Smith."

Matthew Umphrey, Bentley, Michigan: "We just closed a series of meetings which resulted in a grand success. Elder G. W. Burt came here a little over a year ago, at the request of the only Saint living at this place. There is now a membership of twenty-four, with a well-organized branch. We can truly say that such little missionary experience as we have had has been grand. Should it not be so, when we see men and women with a desire to obey? We have opened meetings about seven miles from where we formerly held forth, with a fair-sized crowd."

Gomer T. Griffiths writes from Columbus, Ohio, under date of March 1: "The three district conferences, namely, Ohio, Pittsburgh, and the Kirtland conferences respectively, were a great success in every respect. There was a large crowd present at all of them, especially at the latter. It proved to be a great task to take care of the visitors at Akron. In fact, they do not have a church building large enough to seat all that attend the conference in that district, and if half of the Saints in the district would attend they could not care for them. We have over fifteen branches in the district and some more about ready to be organized. I returned home last evening and found my wife quite sick at the home of my married daughter. She had a very bad spell last Friday, and was very ill for two or three days. However, she is some better, but did not rest very well last night, so my daughter phones me this forenoon. I feel very much discouraged over her condition. She does not seem to get strong in body, and has a terrible time with her heart. I fear at times she will never get real well again."

In a personal letter to Brother Elbert A. Smith, from Woodbine, Iowa, dated February 9, Elder C. A. Butterworth says: "I received your Christmas greeting and thank you very much for all your good wishes. The same I extend to you, and I pray that your days may be lengthened into many years, as a blessing to Zion. I often remember you and F. M. Smith to the Lord, that sufficient wisdom may be given you to carry forward the great work now before us. The calm, gentle Spirit seems always to say to me, All will be well, although the dark, heavy clouds seem to hang low, and are threatening at times. I broke my record for January, 1915, although it was cold and stormy by preaching thirty-six times. Conference closed here Sunday with a good interest. I held five services before it convened and am continuing here this week, and then go to Dow City for Sunday. All my family are well; but the war and drought has made everything very high there [in Australia]. It is over a year now since I left home."

Nauvoo

Our district is made up of a dozen or thirteen counties, of which eight are in southeastern Iowa, two or three in north-eastern Missouri, and two in Illinois, in which (Hancock County) is located old historic Nauvoo, from which the district takes its name. It was once called the Nauvoo and String Prairie District.

We have seven branches. Once we had more. The district has suffered much from Saints moving westward, many of them to Independence and Lamoni. Nearly all our branches are badly in need of officers, as well as members. Elder James McKiernan of the Seventy is presiding over two branches, and the writer also has the care of two.

This district may be called one of "the waste places of Zion." But we feel that it can not long remain so. We believe when those Saints who went to Canada and the Northwest to better their financial position get ready to return to the "regions round about," they will not all crowd into big branches, but will first investigate the merits of historic Nauvoo District, where they will find that their help as officers and members is needed so very much, and where, too, it counts for so much more than in the big branches of the strong districts. They will consider whether some of the other waste places have not been fairly well started on the road to being built up.

This district needs recruits; it wants to regain some of its losses, and then the rebuilding process will proceed as it should. There is a theological theory that the creative power made something out of nothing. Latter Day Saints never did believe that, so we must have the material before we can build. We hope to develop a few young men to fill the depleted official ranks, but even then, we have not enough to go round.

We ask the Saints who are expecting to locate in the center districts or stakes to consider the claims of Nauvoo in the fulfillment of prophecy. Happy and safe are those who place themselves in a position to be the instruments whereby prophecy makes good. "Zion shall not be moved out of her place, notwithstanding her children are scattered, they that remain and are pure in heart shall return and come to their inheritances; they and their children, with songs of everlasting joy; to build up the waste places of Zion." (Doctrine and Covenants 98:4.)

We have some of as good farm land as there is to be found, close to good markets. Bishop Lambert, Ferris, Illinois, will be glad of the opportunity to give information. The schools are first class. We can speak for Burlington, where there isn't a teacher with less than eight years' experience, and the majority with from fifteen to twenty-five years. The high school is rated away up among schools of that class.

The big dam at Keokuk, one of the greatest in the world, is destined to exert a powerful influence on the industrial development of the district, especially in the towns and cities located along this great river—cities which though inland yet have some of the advantages and blessings of those on the great lakes or ocean. Many of them are already lighted from the big generators in the power house at the dam. Fort Madison, twenty-four miles away to the north, is one. They have about nine thousand population, and we have here a little church and a small branch with only a teacher and a deacon. The Santa Fe Railroad has its shops here. Division point. Burlington, nineteen miles further up, is another, with twenty-five thousand population. Its street cars are moved with power from the dam, and many of its big factories also use the power. And there are many others, and still others yet to get in touch.

On account of the war, the power company has not been able to mature all of their plans. I understand they expected to dispose of some of their stock in foreign countries, but that is stopped for the present, and the company is marking time, and making no further extensions. But with power and light easily accessible, as it will be in the near future, the industrial development is assured. This means a large working population to feed, and farmers and truck gardeners will have a market right at their doors, getting better all the time. Interurban lines will increase, which with a network of telephones and good automobile roads will make this district as desirable as any to live in.

For years, Nauvoo has been an unimportant river town, without a railroad. Many surveys have been made, but shelved, sometimes through the influence of the big roads. But we think we now see very good indications which point to something better for Nauvoo.

It is natural for some to think only of a curse hanging over the place because of the mistreatment of the Saints from 1844 to 1847. But that must not be charged to the city of Nauvoo. The persecutions came from outside the city, though aided by a few disgruntled or unworthy members who had been disfellowshipped for bad conduct. It is the people that make a city, and most of this city were Saints. Vindictive feeling can never rebuild the waste places. The center stake is not being occupied in that spirit.

We believe a better day is dawning for old Nauvoo. We were there for the first time last fall during our tri-district reunion. Beautiful for situation is Nauvoo! We enjoyed that splendid view of the river from the temple site, and we have since stood on the Iowa side and noted that it is a city that can not be hid. We always thought of it as a broken-down town, unattractive and on slightly rising ground, and were surprised to find a neat, modern, substantial little town, built mostly on the old "Wells Addition" back of the temple site, and the ground of much of the old town used for growing grapes, with here and there some old-time homes still standing, and most of them occupied. Between the temple site and the river is quite an area, the temple site being on the top of the rising ground, much higher than I had pictured.

We confess to peculiar feelings when we found near by that old historic spot two very substantial Roman Catholic schools for boys and girls, with heating plant, laundry, etc., and a big church, the whole costing fully as much as our own Graceland College, dormitories, etc., and, like our church school, heavily in debt, according to information given us by an outsider. And yet we are inclined to feel towards the old place somewhat like the Jews feel about Jerusalem.

Every town is entitled to dominate the trade that lies in a sphere approximating a circle of which it is the center. On account of the big river, Burlington has only half of its circle. For years a wagon and foot bridge has been repeatedly talked of. But now its business men are determined to go after the other half of their melon. It certainly seems that a bridge is in sight. Foundation tests are now being made through the ice, while stock is being taken up, and the city is enthused with the new plans, which provide that by a small tax the city become a share-holder, and in a course of years it may take over and operate the bridge.

If the bonds are voted, it is expected that it will be open for traffic by next Christmas, available, by toll, to vehicles, foot-passengers and street cars. Then with unlimited, cheap power from the big dam, it is expected that interurban railroads will be built in several directions. We understand a company is prepared to build a line from Quincy, by way of Nauvoo to Burlington, as soon as it is possible to get across the river.

Those who are not familiar with the ground will be helped to understand the situation by noting that Burlington is on the west, or Iowa side of the Mississippi, while Nauvoo, Carthage and Quincy are on the east, or Illinois side, south, thirty, thirty-two and seventy miles, respectively.

My colleague in the presidency of the district, Elder Herbert S. Salisbury, ex-president of Graceland College, has recently moved his family to Carthage, some twenty miles east of Nauvoo, where Joseph and Hyrum Smith were assassinated. Fifty-five years ago last August the citizens of this town assembled and passed a resolution protesting against the Saints resettling at Nauvoo, and it goes without saying they were as unwelcome at Carthage. Now Brother Salisbury, a blood relative to the prophet, has settled among them, and he writes me that he has been well received both by people and press. He is a member of the Illinois State Historical Society, and in a position to serve us well in bringing about a better understanding among the people. The people in those stirring times of 1844 were unable to get a proper view—the facts pleaded in vain for recognition. It was the time of heated passions and blinded prejudice. When human passion has subsided and calm enlightened judgment is allowed to act, true history may have its place. Brother Salisbury is even now engaged in writing history of those early days in Illinois for a Chicago firm.

"Carefully gather together, in one region as can be consistently with the feelings of the people: and, behold, I will give unto you favor and grace in their eyes, that you may rest in peace and safety . . . and I will soften the hearts of the people. (Doctrine and Covenants 102: 7, 8.) We met with equally good feelings, on the part of the people of Nauvoo at the last reunion. The only disappointment we had was that there was not so large an attendance of Saints as might be expected from the three districts holding the reunion.

It is well to be sure it is wise to go, before moving into the large center branches. Many have buried their talents in so doing. They thought their troubles would be over if only they could get there, and they found that large branches have their peculiar problems as well as small ones. They also found that one's individuality is swallowed up in the crowd and it is easy to settle down to an inactive unspiritual life. "Woe to them that are at ease in Zion." They were really needed in the smaller districts, like this one, where their children would find something to do in Sunday school and Religio, and develop into useful members. People always develop faster and are happier where they realize their services are needed and they feel responsibility. Don't go where you may realize neither of these. GOMER R. WELLS.

BURLINGTON, IOWA, February 3, 1915.

Southern Indiana

The missionary force in this district have been greatly hindered in their labors in rural places by reason of rainy weather; also schoolhouses are not used here for other purposes than school. We have confined our efforts to cottage meetings mostly. At present Elder Jacob Halb and the writer are holding forth here with a good degree of interest. Crowds range in number from twenty-five to one hundred. We have good liberty. We are cared for by the Thompson people mostly, two sons of Brother and Sister Alonzo Thompson, of Kirby, Indiana.

We hear our colaborers say they would like to attend the General Conference. This may sound selfish, but we plead guilty, and if the way opens we expect to attend.

We can say for the people of this district that they are as kind as any we have ever met. My wants have been duly supplied, and of their hospitality I have partaken. I earnestly pray and ask the Lord to pay them for their kindness.

In my associations with my colaborers, J. W. Metcalf, Jacob Halb, and L. C. Moore, I have enjoyed myself in the best sense of the term. On the whole, experiences common to missionaries, exclusive of the unpleasantness, have been ours to enjoy.

Ever desiring to assist in the great cause, I beg to remain,
Your brother,
F. A. ROWE.

FREDERICKSBURG, INDIANA.

Northern Wisconsin

We had a time worthy to be mentioned at our Northern Wisconsin conference, which convened at Porcupine. The Saints seemed to enjoy the spirit of the work, and unity prevailed. The attendance was the largest of any like occasion in the district, except at reunion time. Business was attended to for the Sunday school, Religio and conference. The remaining time was devoted to edification and pleasure.

We note a good showing for Sunday school work, and the missionary effort is slowly pushing ahead, with the Religio not so far advanced. Some become discouraged because they do not achieve at once, but the kingdom of God is as the leaven hidden in the meal. We hope the district Religio organization will grow into a good work.

After the conference, meetings were continued by Brother J. F. Curtis and the writer, and good interest was manifested. The first night of our meetings fulfilled a prophecy given at Porcupine, when it was stated that the time would come when the church here would not hold all the people. Brother Curtis had a full house, and I at a schoolhouse across the road had a good crowd also, in an overflow meeting. Four were baptized and others interested. We look forward to the time when they will also embrace the gospel.

We are glad to get acquainted with the noble band of Saints at Porcupine. Their kindness will long be remembered. The work is progressing in the district. The harvest is great. Let us put forth a greater effort for the final accomplishment of the work required of us. If there ever was a time when we should stand in holy places it is now.

Ever praying for Zion's cause, I am,

In gospel bonds,

LYMAN W. FIKE.

Eastern Colorado

I have been busily engaged lifting my voice in declaration of the unsearchable riches of the gospel of Christ in the various regions of this country, and in many instances have been signally blessed.

During the fore part of this year Elder C. W. Prettyman and I held a series of meetings in Wray, Colorado, and I feel sure that the faith of the Saints was confirmed by reason of such meetings. A number of outsiders were in attendance and heard the word.

Strange as it may appear, though our people have been known in Wray for nearly thirty years, yet there is an undercurrent of prejudice against our work, the result of an organized effort upon the part of Methodists, Campbellites, etc., and especially the women of such organizations, who meet and study that wholesome (?) product of Bruce Kinney, The Islam of America. However, after their diligent search for something with which to besmirch the character of the "great angel message," yet they have not the spontaneity to meet the sisters of our organization, and tell them freely the wonderful truths (?) they have gleaned from said work; but rather in a clandestine manner try to influence people to stay away from our church by telling them the awful things they have learned about the Saints. And I may say, without one feeling of restraint, that there is as fine a little band of Latter Day Saints at Wray and in that vicinity as I have ever met, generally speaking.

I feel sure that I should rather meet the open and armed prejudices and hostility toward the work than the low, somewhat smuggled, and insinuating feature of program that Satan has devised of late years. In this particular locality there seems to be but little prejudice toward us, and the attendance at our meetings has been splendid and the attention excellent.

South of Otis, Colorado, we have effected a very promising opening, and there are some there who have placed their belief in the work, and who will obey ere long we feel sure. At a place called Mount Hope, south of Vernon, Colorado, there is good interest, and those who are convinced of the truth.

The demand at present upon our time is far greater than we can meet, and we often feel to pray, "O, Lord, increase the holy desire upon the part of thy people to comply with the well-known law of the Lord; to bring all the tithes into the storehouse that there may be means to supply the poor and needy, and to support more servants in the great vineyard." I meet Saints who are well to do, but who have never, even in part, complied with the law of tithes and consecration. After they have known their whole duty in this respect, and yet do not comply, I wonder what they think their answer will be to Him to whom they must render an account of their stewardship.

Dear Saints of God, how may the much-needed institutions in the church be sustained, such as the Saints' homes, about five of them now I believe; the Children's Home, the Sanitarium, and last but not least, the college, if we withhold our means? Some of the Saints say, "Yes, I will pay my tithing when I get out of debt." But notice: In many instances when these are just to the place where they can emerge from their indebtedness they see an opportunity to buy another piece of land, and when they have yielded to that temptation the result may be that they are more deeply in debt than they were before. And so we witness procrastination, until a more suitable time. But the Lord says, He that is tithed shall not be burned at his coming. The antithesis of the above statement may be easily deduced. Colorado, as I view conditions, is becoming a much better place for missionary labor, as the country is more generally settled up.

Very recently I learned of the passing away of our much esteemed, tried and true laborer, Elder O. B. Thomas. Brother Thomas was a very assiduous laborer, and a man much admired by Saint and friend in this State. He has gone to a much-needed and well-earned rest.

The coming General Conference will no doubt be one fraught with the greatest concern to all the Saints of any held since 1860. I can not express with pen the disappointment it will be to me to not be able to attend. But whenever I go East to either Lamoni or Independence in the spring of the year, I am troubled so with asthma that I am in misery all the time I am there.

There is a place southeast of Wray about ten miles where the archaeologist might find a good deal to interest him; there on the farm of Brother Fenner Bullard is a canyon in which at some remote period of the past there has been deposited by flood, as it seems, people and animals all thrown in together; above this strata where such deposit has been made is solid rock. The teeth of the animals represent beasts that must have been fully as large as the elephant. From the appearance of the different strata of earth and stone above it would seem as though the catastrophe came upon the people in such manner as to throw them all together—man and beasts. This deposit covers a wide range, from the eastern part of the State to a distance of fifty miles west, anyway. I have wondered what age the geologists might place upon the matter referred to.

The conference of eastern Colorado will convene in Denver, about March 5, but owing to the demand upon my time, as well as circumstances, I will not be able to attend.

May the loving Father bless Israel everywhere, I pray,
In bonds,

HAPPYVILLE, COLORADO.

Western Maine

My last writing was from Vinal Haven, having just landed there. I remained there for four weeks, preaching in four schoolhouses, having good attendance and interest. Quite a number there are about ready for the water. I am looking for a branch to be raised up there in the no distant future. I put in a very busy time while there, preaching every night and visiting and studying by day.

Vinal Haven is one of the old camping grounds for the elders of the early days of the church. I saw the spot where the elders under the Martyr used to hold forth, and was told that the meeting place was in a barn. Some of the older residents have told their stories of the "Mormons" coming to their town. One aged brother tells of his mother calling in the elders who administered to his elder sister who was healed. That was about 1840. So we see that our work is not strange on the island.

While there I was told of a small burying place that stood a little back from the road where there were some Latter Day Saints buried. I took the time to visit it and found the following on stones erected there:

"James S. Pierce. Died December 23, 1843, age 34 years. Being a regular member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. Being led to repentance went forward and obeyed the commands and ordinances of the gospel of Christ. Died in full assurance that God requires the obedience to the gospel of Christ as he did when the Church of Christ was first organized on earth, in order to obtain eternal life."

"Elizabeth Pierce. Died February 6, 1850, age 78 years, 7 months. Being a regular member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. Through the proper order of the gospel of Christ, and of the lineage of Ephraim, claim the privilege of adoption in the seed of Abraham according to promise."

"Thomas Pierce. A native of Boston. Died August 14, 1851, age 79 years. I know that my Redeemer liveth, and because he lives I will live also. Being a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. Through a proper order of the gospel of Christ and the lineage of Ephraim claim the privilege of adoption in the seed of Abraham and according to promise."

As I sat writing these words I thought of the history of the past and the sufferings of the church in those early days.

I am told that two elders are buried in another place on the island but the place is not marked so I was unable to locate the spot. It is said they were missionaries; the name of one was Hyde, if I remember rightly, the other I have forgotten.

My stay on the little island was pleasant. The few Saints there are struggling to let their lights shine and are ably cared for by Brethren Begg and Raymond, priests.

From Vinal Haven I went to Stonington. Finding Brother Hanson there holding a week's series of meetings, I assisted him. From there we went to the district conference at Mountainville, where we had a pleasant time with the Saints. Our Sunday school was scheduled to meet at the same time. Only a few were able to get there, it being very hard to get around among these islands unless some of the brethren have time to go with a boat; the trolley men are out on strike here. We are hoping for a better time and larger attendance at our spring convention. The conference voted to look with favor on giving over the Saturday night meeting for Sunday school work, so we hope to be able to have a good program.

From the conference I went to Little Deer Isle and tried to hold some meetings, but the weather man was against us and we had to close. From there we wended our way to Stonington, where we held some meetings. The attendance being mostly Saints, we had some heart to heart talks with them and we think good resulted. I find that the Saints need education and encouragement, and I enjoy my labors among them very much. What a holy calling to be a teacher among God's people!

From Stonington I went to Portland, thence to Westbrook, where I was to look up a matter for the bishop's agent. While in Portland I enjoyed the hospitality of Brother W. S. Powers. While there we called on Brother and Sister Summerfield. We hope to be able to open up the work in that place this coming summer, if returned to this part of the field. I am told the Utah Church has a stronghold there.

Finishing our errand there, we boarded the boat and started for home, arriving there a few days before Christmas, glad to be reunited with loved ones once more. We spent an enjoyable time, and visited some of the near-by branches, preaching for them Sundays and renewing old acquaintances and making some new ones. The time for saying good-by coming all too soon, on January 28 we left home folks and started on our return to duty, stopping at Boston and meeting with the Saints there in prayer service, and having the privilege of shaking hands with Brother Greene after so long a time of absence.

Arriving at Stonington, we stayed there for a week or two, holding some meetings with the Saints, as well as before some large crowds at Sunday night meetings. While there Brother Koehler dropped in on us and we had some very interesting talks on the Holy Land.

From Stonington I came to this place, Sargeantville and have been talking with the people here, a little band that is struggling to keep the banner aloft. They are to be commended on their effort to erect a place of worship. They have endeavored to get their building without going in debt and thus far have succeeded, though they have not yet completed it so they can meet in it, and it will be some time yet before they can do so, as they are few and poor. Yet it is a demonstration of what can be done by united effort.

There are several openings ahead, but weather conditions somewhat hinder. The time has come when we are beginning to wonder what our fate will be for the next conference year. We have always tried to say, I will go where you want me to go. The work of the Master grows brighter all along the line, and we are glad that we are found worthy to be one of his representatives.

With best wishes for all, I am,

Yours in the conflict,

STONINGTON, MAINE.

WM. ANDERSON.

Gallands Grove District

This district has been doing gospel work for the Great King over a half century. The volume of work done may not have been as large as in some districts, yet it has been active, and judging by the number of young men ordained to the priesthood last year a still greater work can be accomplished. The writer has attended every quarterly conference held in this district for fifteen years, and with but two or three exceptions, peace and good will have characterized every session.

Our last conference recently held at Dow City was harmonious and instructive. Brother John Jordison of the Coalville Branch was ordained to office of elder at this session. The preaching was by Elders C. A. Butterworth, D. R. Chambers, and J. B. Wildermuth. Three social services were held. The financial report was above the average. Sister Floy Holcomb, secretary of the district Sunday school and Religious societies furnished favorable reports of their work.

By invitation of Brother and Sister John Salisbury, I held a week's meeting at Farnhamville, Iowa, where they reside. They secured the use of the Congregational chapel; bills were printed, circulated, and the house warmed and lighted at the expense of those extending the invitation. Although the weather was cold and very stormy at times, we had fairly good attendance and splendid interest. The last evening a Methodist preacher interrupted the meeting by questions and statements five times, but they only added interest to the service, which lasted two hours.

During our stay there, Chief Red Fox, of the Sioux Nation, gave a lecture in the town. Feeling an interest in the Lamanite chief, he was invited to visit us at Brother Salisbury's home, where we read and talked to him five hours. He seemed deeply interested and bought a Book of Mormon, etc. The chief and his wife may attend General Conference, in order to study the church and its work more thoroughly. He has been to Europe, Australia, and New Zealand. If soundly converted to the gospel, he could be of special worth to the Lamanites.

Massachusetts

A splendid conference in the Massachusetts District was held Saturday and Sunday, February 6 and 7. I have had the pleasure of presiding over this district for three years, and to me it was the best conference we have held during that time.

On January 24 I was on the train en route to visit the Cranston Branch, and, being tired, was nearly asleep, though my mind was occupied with thoughts of the coming gathering of the Saints. Suddenly, like a voice speaking, the impression came to me that upon my return to Boston I should present to that branch the idea of having President F. M. Smith speak in a theater on the subject of "The policies of the church" during the Sunday of the conference. The details came immediately to my mind, as afterward carried out, even to the naming of the brethren who should have charge of the service.

The following Wednesday evening at the prayer and social service I presented the matter, naming the committee as they had been suggested to me, to have charge of procuring the theater and the advertising, etc. The Boston Saints approved the idea heartily, and Elder H. J. Davison, the pastor, was appointed chairman of the committee. To our surprise the theater was procured at the nominal price of five dollars. President Smith consented to serve and we advertised quite extensively.

The service was well attended for conservative Boston. The Saints attending the conference were greatly blessed, and those not of our faith were heard to express themselves as being well repaid for attending. The music rendered by the Boston choir was highly complimented, and from all sides we heard the remark, "I never heard Elenora sing better than she did to-day." Sister Elenora Whiting is our district chorister, and leader of the choir in Boston. I trust all the branches in the district will give her their hearty cooperation and help. This is the first time to my knowledge that we have attempted anything like that meeting in the district. We are assured it is but the beginning of greater things in our section.

Besides President Smith and wife, we had with us Apostle U. W. Greene, lately returned from Palestine, Patriarch H. O. Smith, and A. B. Phillips and R. W. Farrell of the seventy. Our business was done in a lively manner, but withal the spirit of forbearance and love was present. The same officers were elected for another year.

The prayer and sacrament service was spiritual, the gifts being enjoyed.

The sermon by H. O. Smith in the morning was very interesting and instructive, as was the lecture on Palestine, illustrated by U. W. Greene in the evening.

The meals Sunday were served in the basement of the church, the Saints visiting like one large family.

Just a personal word of myself. Though holding the office of a seventy, and having had the pleasure of nearly ten years' service on the firing line, I have found it necessary to labor locally for some time. I have found plenty to do however, and am busy in the Master's service. I hope to be in the general ministry again soon, for surely the harvest is great and the laborers few.

Brother and Sister George Whitehead, of Syracuse, New York, are here visiting their son, Morris. Being isolated from the church, they have greatly enjoyed being here at this time, and the Boston Saints are trying to persuade them to make their home here.

In gospel bonds,

C. H. RICH.

News from Branches

Jonesport, Maine

The work is progressing nicely here under the instructive as well as inspiring sermons of our missionary, Brother F. J. Ebeling. He is the right man in the right place, respected and beloved by all who know him. He is ready to meet an issue when sent out by pretended authority, as was proven last week when a Reformed Baptist preacher, on the Isle of Beals, arose in all his purity, to for ever put an end to Mormonism in that place.

Reports of his attack upon our people there, and his intended lectures reached Brother Ebeling. He with some of the branch officers called upon the would-be lecturer and talked the matter over. He agreed to hold a debate in his church, taking one hour, and allowing Brother Ebeling one hour each night, as long as the Baptist preacher desired. Papers were drawn up to that effect, and signed by both parties. Brother Ebeling had not been away from his house twenty minutes when he phoned to him, saying, "I will have nothing to do with you. You can do anything you please with that paper, I will go on with my lectures." So he lectured or "talked" from his pulpit five nights, using Shook's history, R. B. Neal, Eliza Snow and literature from Utah.

Brother Ebeling replied to what he said from his own pulpit the following week. The house was filled to overflowing every night. The first night the Baptist preacher was there, but alas! it proved too much for him. He could not endure to see his cherished bubbles so easily blown into air. He was crushed beneath the truth the first night, and was conspicuous by his absence the remainder of the week. One said she wanted to hear both sides, but one night was sufficient for her.

In his attack upon the Book of Mormon, the minister made great sport of the words "and it came to pass" which suggested to Brother Ebeling to compose and read a little poem.

He did not seem to do us much harm, for during the time there were two baptized. The Saints were especially edified, more united and stronger in the faith than ever.

The following Sunday night, our large vestry was full and chairs were carried from the near-by houses to accommodate the people. Brother Ebeling is to deliver some special chart lectures before leaving for Ohio and the General Conference. The Saints are looking forward to a feast of good things. We regret that the time is so near for him to go, because there is intense interest manifested among those outside of the church.

Thus endeth the first real attack upon the work in Jonesport. When will this turmoil cease, and universal peace reign upon the earth? Oh, how I long for Zion to be redeemed with the Saints in a gathered condition. Let us be more faithful, prayerful and diligent in this great work which our heavenly Father has intrusted to our care, and let us see to it that we strive harder to occupy in our own place, however humble it may be, thus molding and fashioning our crude characters for the niche which we shall be expected to fit into when the whole shall be fitly joined together, when that for which we pray shall have had its fulfillment, thy Kingdom come, thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven.

In gospel bonds,

CORA B. ROGERS.

Independence, Missouri

Sunday, February 28, was a day full of interesting features. The exercises in the forenoon were given over to the Religio-Literary home department work, in charge of W. A. Bushnell, president. The afternoon was occupied in presenting the same line of work. The program consisted of addresses by a number of workers. Music and oratory were also represented. In the evening the subject of temperance was discoursed upon by a representative of the Anti-Saloon League, of Kansas City. This division of the national temperance movement disclosed some very interesting and telling statistics through the able effort of Mr. Fleet. The Saints gave a visible token of their appreciation.

The musical features of the gospel service in this part of the vineyard are gaining ground rapidly, as shown by the willingness of both vocalists and instrumentalists to magnify their callings in this already important part of church and auxiliary service.

Preparations are being made for a goodly attendance of earnest representatives at our stake conference, as well as the coming General Conference. A strong move forward is being made by our young people and by the older ones to make themselves helpful in the way of higher spiritual, intellectual, moral and physical life.

The various departments of women's work is being increased in number and strengthened and united in love and good works. What more can the Saints desire than to be blessed as they are through the opportunities and resources offered through this glorious gospel of latter days?

Your sister in the faith,

217 South River Boulevard.

ABBIE A. HORTON.

A knocking at my heart—and what art thou?

"I was the unforgiven; from your door

You spurned me once and bade me come no more.
I am the ever present suppliant now." . . .

A sweetness at my heart—and what art thou?

"I am the kindly deed you quite forgot,

The joy bestowed that you remember not.
I am your angel of forgiveness now."

—Theodosia Garrison.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYERS

Prayers are requested for one not of the church, that God may give him understanding so that he may accept the gospel. His wife feels that she needs her husband's help in teaching their children as they should be instructed.

Brother R. Newby, Fairview, Montana, requests prayers for Sister Sandage, of Glasgow, Montana. It is desired that those who feel to do so fast and make special petition March 14. This sister is severely afflicted with heart trouble.

Sister C. H. Cudney, Marion, Michigan, requests prayers for her sister-in-law, Pearl Cudney, of same place.

Brother William W. Hanson, Cisne, Illinois, requests prayers that he may recover from a sore affliction and spend his life in righteousness.

Will you please join me in prayer for a young man that God will strengthen his mind that he may resist the temptations of this world, and change his heart in a way so he will realize the way he should live in these latter days. He does not belong to the church.

I also ask an interest in your prayers, that I may always do God's will. From a sister known unto the Lord.

General Conference Visitors

For information of those planning to attend General Conference, Lamoni, Iowa, beginning April 6, 1915, as also Religio and Sunday school conventions, beginning April 2, the committee appointed by Lamoni Branch wish to say:

The Saints of Lamoni will have a first-class dining hall in operation, serving meals to all who wish them at the following prices: Club breakfasts 10, 15, and 20 cents; dinner 25 cents; supper 20 cents.

Those in charge of dining hall wish to get in touch with a forelady who will take this position during the time it is open for meals. There are also a few opportunities for those wishing to serve tables in payment for their meals. Send these applications to Amos Berve, Lamoni, Iowa, at once.

Entertainment in homes will cost those who make such arrangements $4.50 per week, board and lodging. Lodging and breakfast will be served in homes to those unable to go out to breakfast, at reasonable prices.

Rooms in private homes will be $1 per person per week.

In order to the best work by the committee, those contemplating attending should not delay in letting the committee know that they are coming, fully informing the committee of their needs and wants. Should one who is badly crippled be assigned a place which would put him out of reach of the conference, the committee could not be justly blamed if proper information had not been handed them. Will you, therefore, write your letter along the following lines:

1. When are you coming, and how long do you expect to remain.

2. Give the full names of the persons for whom you write.

3. If man and wife, and you must stop at same place, do not fail to so state, or you may be put in different places.

Committee will meet all trains and see that you get to your stopping places if they are properly informed along the lines indicated.

Committee consists of: C. F. Goode, chairman; R. J. Lambert, secretary; F. M. Weld, C. I. Carpenter, W. G. Badham, Arthur Church, Moroni Traxler, Vaughn C. Bailey.

R. J. LAMBERT, Secretary.

Cannon, of South Chicago, was born February 12, 1886, at Syracuse, Indiana, departed this life December 29, 1914. She had been a constant sufferer for seven years. Her exemplary Christian life of kindness, patience, and self-sacrifice was a blessing to all, which makes the blow fall heavily on family and friends. To know her was to love her. She was baptized at Knox, Indiana, July 11, 1896, and remained faithful and devoted to the end. Services at Chicago, December 31, and at Syracuse, January 2, by David Dowker, burial in Syracuse Cemetery.

"Dearest Glena, thou hast gone
 To thy well-earned, happy home;
 Free from pain, thy suffering o'er,
 Thine the rest for evermore.
 Like a sunbeam, through our dwelling
 Shone thy presence bright and calm;
 Now our hearts are rent with anguish,
 And we need the healing balm.
 Consecrated to thy Master,
 Was thy life so pure and true,
 Deeds of mercy, love and kindness
 Was thy portion to bestow."

BARR.—Elzina Hendry was born at Jackson, Steuben County, Indiana, December 25, 1838, died at Lamoni, Iowa, February 22, 1915, after a long illness. Married Charles Barr, April, 1855. To this union six children were born, five of whom still live. Baptized February 20, 1874, by E. C. Briggs. Funeral from the home, February 25, John Smith in charge, sermon by Elbert A. Smith.

DEUEL.—Charles W. Deuel died at his home, Tulare, California, February 24, 1915, aged 62 years, 8 months, 27 days. He was a faithful and successful missionary, and carried with him a spirit that made all who knew him love him, and respect the message he bore. He leaves wife, 1 brother, 1 sister, 2 half-brothers. Services by W. A. Brouner.

Food economy now, more than ever, demands the purchase and use of those food articles of known high quality and absolute purity and healthfulness.

THE TRUMPET AND PITCHER

CONTRADICTIONS FOUND IN "ANTI-MORMON" WORKS

And the Lord set every man's sword against his fellows.

Gideon came against the hosts of Midian at night with his three hundred men. At the prearranged signal each man broke his pitcher, held his light aloft, and blew his trumpet. Confusion ensued in the camp of Midian. The soldiers fell to killing each other. The record says: "And the Lord set every man's sword against his fellows."

At the sounding of the trump of the restored gospel a somewhat similar condition has obtained among our opponents. They are very much in the dark, very much confused, and in his blind zeal each man stabs his fellow.

To prove this we propose to quote from a number of leading books, all written by the opposition, all put forth as reliable, showing only a few of hundreds of contradictions.

JOSEPH'S MOTHER EXPECTED HIM TO BE PROPHET

Clark Braden, in the Braden and Kelley Debate, published by the Christian Publishing Company, Saint Louis, and put forth by them as a thoroughly reliable work, says:

She prophesied, at the time, that Joe, then seven years old, WOULD BE A PROPHET, and give to the world a new religion. JOE WAS RAISED WITH THIS IDEA BEFORE HIM. All the family were taught and believed it. . . . This accounts for Joe's peculiar gravity when but a child, and as a youth. He was to be a prophet, and he must not act as other children and boys did.—Braden and Kelley Debate, p. 46.

JOSEPH'S MOTHER DID NOT EXPECT HIM TO BE PROPHET

That looks bad, for it might argue that the whole career of the modern prophet was the result of maternal suggestion. But at the sounding of the trumpet Braden is slain by his own colleagues. In a large and pretentious work written by Reginald and Ruth Kauffman, recently published in London, we read:

His appearance was NOT, as one might have expected, heralded by any mystic portents, and his earlier childhood was, EVEN IN HIS MOTHER'S EYES, in no wise remarkable. Indeed, Mrs. Smith had never expressed the opinion that her son "Joe," as he was called, would be the founder of the faith of which she dreamed. Her visions had brought her to NO SUCH CONCLUSION. They had, nevertheless, impelled her to the belief that a new prophet should appear, and, assuming a more or less personal application for her revelations, after the manner of seers, she gave out hints that ALVAH, HER ELDEST SON, WAS THE DIVINELY APPOINTED. But Alvah, according to unkind gossip, was a greedy boy, and, one day, eating too many green turnips, died. Thus did the mantle descend upon Joseph.—The Latter Day Saints, by Reginald and Ruth Kauffman, pp. 21, 22.

These wild imaginings are amusing, but are easily understood. Braden wished to argue that Joseph Smith was the result of maternal suggestion. So he manufactured history to suit his theory. The Kauffmans on the other hand were desirous of proving Lucy Smith a false prophet. So they manufactured history to suit their taste. Neither cared for exact facts in the case. Others have pursued a similar course. The insignificant fact that Lucy Smith never had a son named Alvah was not to stand in the way of the theory. One must be created and later killed with green turnips.

JOSEPH HAD NO ENERGY OR PERSISTENCY

Frank J. Cannon assures us:

Joseph Smith was not the man to surmount great obstacles and compel great and lasting changes by his own unaided force. He lacked ENERGY, diplomacy, and STEADFASTNESS for such a task.—Brigham Young and His Mormon Empire, by Ex-Senator Frank J. Cannon and George L. Knapp, chap. 2, p. 20.

HE WAS VERY ENERGETIC, PERSISTENT, ABLE

Others tell a very different story:

But, with all these drawbacks, he was much more than an ordinary man. He possessed the most INDOMITABLE PERSEVERANCE, was a good judge of men, and deemed himself born to command and he did command.—Recollections of an Old Pioneer, P. H. Burnett, p. 66; as quoted in Founder of Mormonism, p. 6.

His eloquence, rude but powerful—his letters, clever and sarcastic—the manifold character and boldness of his designs—his courage in enterprise—HIS PERSEVERANCE DESPITE GREAT OBSTACLES—his conception and partial execution of the temple of Nauvoo—these and other things mark him as a man of more than ordinary caliber.—The Mormons' Own Book, and Life of Joseph Smith, by T. W. P. Taylor, p. LI.

The REMARKABLE TENACITY OF PURPOSE which he exhibited under discouraging circumstances, and the apparent sincerity of his professions, have been suggested as evidence that he was really a religious enthusiast, who became the victim of his own delusions.—Utah and the Mormons, by Benjamin G. Ferris, at one time Secretary of Utah Territory, pp. 130, 131.

BOOK OF MORMON TAKEN FROM SPALDING ROMANCE

Mr. Charles Shook, whose work R. B. Neal says will "shake the foundation" of Latter Day Saintism, has this to say about the Spalding Romance theory:

Gentiles, with few exceptions, believe that the BOOK OF MORMON IS ONE OF SOLOMON SPALDING'S ROMANCES, which somehow fell into Smith's hands and was altered to suit his purpose. No matter what others may think, I AGREE WITH THOSE WHO ARE OF THIS OPINION; although I have not always done so.—Cumorah Revisited, by Shook, p. 25.

BOOK OF MORMON NOT TAKEN FROM SPALDING ROMANCE

Mr. Shook, who was thus to shake, does not get far with his opinion, for at the breaking of the pitcher, Reverend D. H. Bays, the man who studied "Mormonism" for forty years, and was hailed by Mr. Neal's associates as a "child of Providence," immediately downs him with this:

The long-lost Spalding story has at last been unearthed, and is now on deposit in the library of Oberlin College at Oberlin, Ohio, and may be examined by anyone who may take the pains to call on President Fairchild, of that institution. . . . THE SPALDING STORY IS A FAILURE. Do not attempt to rely upon it—IT WILL LET YOU DOWN.

The entire theory connecting Sidney Rigdon and the Spalding romance with Joseph Smith in originating the Book of Mormon MUST BE ABANDONED.—Doctrines and Dogmas of Mormonism, D. H. Bays, pp. 24, 25.

Professor L. Woodbridge Riley comes to the support of Bays in the following:

In spite of a continuous stream of conjectural literature, it is as yet IMPOSSIBLE to pick out any special document as an original source of the Book of Mormon. In particular, the commonly accepted Spalding theory is INSOLUBLE from EXTERNAL evidence and DISPROVED BY INTERNAL EVIDENCE.—The Founder of Mormonism, p. 172.

JOSEPH SMITH IGNORANT AND FEEBLE-MINDED

We are assured by various writers that the founder of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints was ignorant and dull-witted:

His UNTUTORED and FEEBLE INTELLECT had not yet grasped at anything beyond mere toying with mysterious things.—The Prophet of Palmyra, Thomas Gregg, p. 4.

The young people of the town considered him NOT QUITE FULL-WITTED and, with the cruelty of youth, made him the butt for their practical jokes.—The Latter Day Saints, Kauffman, p. 23.

The extreme IGNORANCE and apparent STUPIDITY of this modern prophet.—Mormonism Unveiled, by E. D. Howe, p. 12.

JOSEPH SMITH BRAINY AND INTELLIGENT

Again the "child of Providence," charges through the camp of Midian and attacks Messrs. Gregg, Howe, and Kauffman:

He was confessedly illiterate, but nature had endowed him with a CLEAR, STRONG BRAIN, and by sheer force of his INTELLECTUALITY he was from the very beginning of his career a leader.—The Doctrines and Dogmas of Mormonism, by D. H. Bays, p. 19.

JOSEPH SMITH A COWARD

Mr. Shook again arises to shake, and declares:

Time made some changes and the tow-head became a light auburn but the moral traits continued the same and secretiveness, untruthfulness, dishonesty and COWARDICE followed him to his assassination.—The True Origin of Mormon Polygamy, by Shook, p. 21. (Old edition.)

JOSEPH SMITH VERY BRAVE

We have no time to resent the charge of cowardice, for Mr. Smucker and Doctor Wyl, other "well-posted students" leap forward when the light blaze up and overthrow the "shaking Shook":

The Smiths are not without talent, and are said to be as BRAVE AS LIONS. Joseph, the chief, is a noble-looking fellow, a Mahomet every inch of him.—History of the Mormons, by Smucker, p. 147.

It must be admitted that he displayed no little zeal and COURAGE; that his tact was great, that his talents for governing men were of no mean order.—Ibid. p. 182.

He had physical COURAGE, FOR HE DIED GAME.—Dr. Wyl, quoted in Word of Truth, June 4, 1913.

HE SHOOTS FOUR MEN

The Kauffmans, Ruth and Reginald, now regale us with a wonderful story, as follows:

It appears that Joseph Smith DIED BRAVELY: "he stood by the jamb of the door and fired four shots, BRINGING HIS MAN DOWN EVERY TIME."—The Latter Day Saints, by Kauffman, p. 47.

HE KILLS NO ONE

We are disturbed by this gory tale about four dead men, until another author of equal rank and vast research assures us that no such thing occurred, it was merely a matter of wounding one man slightly in the elbow, in the region of the "crazy bone," where we imagine numbers of these writers have been injured:

Guns were thrust in and discharged, and Joseph, with a revolver, returned two shots, HITTING ONE MAN IN THE ELBOW.—The History of the Mormons, by Lieutenant Gunnison, pp. 123, 124.

HIS ANCESTORS VERY BAD PEOPLE

Mr. L. B. Cake affirms:

Seventy reputable men who knew, stated under oath that this Smith family was ignorant; that the males were drunkards, blasphemers, liars, thieves; who put in their time digging for hidden treasures of the Captain Kidd kind, and defrauding their neighbors. Reputable citizens aver under oath that these Smiths were a low, wicked household and Joe the worst of the lot.—Peepstone Joe and the Peck Manuscript, by Lu B. Cake, chap. 2, p. 9.

ANCESTORS GOOD, RELIGIOUS AMERICAN PATRIOTS

Mr. Cake is upheld in this charge by other writers, but when the trumpet sounds one Josiah F. Gibbs, another Midianite, who assures us that he has spent the best part of his life investigating this question, and is an ardent opponent of "Mormonism," turns upon Mr. Cake quite unexpectedly and runs him through verbally:

Lucy Mack Smith, the mother of Joseph Smith, was a woman of UNUSUAL STRENGTH OF CHARACTER, UNQUESTIONED PIETY and of an intensely visionary mental organization.—Lights and Shadows of Mormonism, by Josiah F. Gibbs, p. 23.

Solomon Mack, the father of Lucy, was very likely of English extraction. He participated in the War of the Revolution and was in every sense a TYPICAL AND PATRIOTIC AMERICAN. He was deeply RELIGIOUS.—Ibid., p. 23.

From his mother's side of the family he [Joseph Smith] inherited a strong DEVOTIONAL TEMPERAMENT, supplemented by admirable persistence of purpose and MAGNIFICENT COURAGE.—Ibid., p. 38.

Joseph Smith, sr., who was of a modest, unpretentious and easy-going, yet withal HONEST and EARNEST nature.—Ibid., p. 49.

JOSEPH SMITH NEVER READ ANYTHING

With the greatest assurance, John Hay tells us:

Joseph never read Moliere,—NOR ANYBODY ELSE.—Secretary of State John Hay, in The Mormon Prophet's Tragedy.

Such a picture of profound ignorance and illiteracy is very painful to contemplate. But wait!

HE READ VERY COMPREHENSIVELY

There is another authority who knows all about the matter, the Reverend W. L. Crowe.

"And this ebony bird beguiling

My sad fancy into smiling," says:

He read COMPREHENSIVELY, and as he advanced in reading and knowledge he assumed a spiritual aspect. He FREQUENTLY PERUSED THE BIBLE, AND BECAME QUITE FAMILIAR WITH ITS CONTENTS.—The Mormon Waterloo, by W. L. Crowe, p. 9.

There you are, Hay-Crowe, Crowe-Hay,—take your choice.

VERY DAMAGING AFFIDAVITS

Thomas Gregg has the following, in The Prophet of Palmyra:

Mr. E. D. Howe, in his valuable work, Mormonism Unveiled (Painesville, Ohio, 1834), presents the testimonials of eighty-one persons, neighbors and acquaintances of the Smith family, all attesting to their illiteracy and generally worthless and disreputable character, especially that of the son "Joe," as he was called.—The Prophet of Palmyra, p. 11.

AFFIDAVITS OF JEALOUS NEIGHBORS NO GOOD

These eighty-one affidavits are very disturbing to some minds, but now comes Professor I. Woodbridge Riley, at one time of the University of New York, and assures Messrs. Gregg and Howe (as we have often done) that they are of no value as evidence. Hear him:

Concerning this unpleasant fact NO RELIANCE is to be placed in the MULTIPLIED AFFIDAVITS OF JEALOUS NEIGHBORS, who swore on oath that there was much intoxication among the Smiths; PEOPLE IN THOSE DAYS HAD THE AFFIDAVIT HABIT.—The Founder of Mormonism, p. 66.

THREE WITNESSES RENOUNCE TESTIMONY

The Reverend W. A. Stanton in a booklet published by the American Baptist Publication Society, entitled, Three Important Movements, Campbellism, Mormonism, Spiritualism, declares that the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon repudiated their testimony:

In 1830 the book was printed, and with it a sworn statement by Cowdery, Harris, and David Whitmer that an angel of God had shown them the plates of which the book purported to be a translation. Some years later these three men renounced Mormonism, AND DECLARED SAID STATEMENT FALSE.—Three Important Movements, p. 35.

WITNESSES DID NOT RENOUNCE TESTIMONY

It is not necessary for us to expose the fact that the Reverend Stanton is in error; Professor I. Woodbridge Riley saves us that trouble:

Up to his DYING DAY, Cowdery believed there was NO "FICTION AND DECEPTION" either in this manifestation, or in the plate vision.—The Founder of Mormonism, p. 218.

Whitmer's ENTIRE FAITH in the reality of the vision of the plates is PERPETUATED BY THE INSCRIPTION ON HIS TOMB. . . . "The record of the Jews and the record of the Nephites are one. Truth is eternal."—The Founder of Mormonism, p. 219.

In a letter written by him in 1870, he [Harris] said: "No man ever heard me IN ANY WAY deny either the Book of Mormon, or the administration of the angel that showed me the plates, or the organization of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints under the administration of Joseph Smith, jr., the prophet, whom the Lord raised up for that purpose in these latter days, that he might show forth his power and glory. The Lord has shown me these things by his Spirit, and by the administration of angels, and confirmed the same with signs following FOR THE SPACE OF FORTY YEARS.—The Founder of Mormonism, p. 220.

SIDNEY RIGDON FOUNDER OF MORMONISM

Three gentlemen who are put forward as reliable authorities tell us that Sidney Rigdon was the real author of the Book of Mormon and founder of "Mormonism":

We therefore, must hold out Sidney Rigdon to the world as being the ORIGINAL "AUTHOR AND PROPRIETOR" of the whole Mormon conspiracy, until further light is elicited upon the lost writings of Solomon Spalding.—Mormonism, by E. D. Howe, p. 290.

A religious man, however erratic he might be, who had been trained in the Bible and in theology, was needed to give the bogus system some kind of religious setting. The only man connected with the scheme FROM ITS VERY BEGINNING, long before the public organization, who had any such qualifications, was the Reverend Sidney Rigdon.—Reverend R. G. McNiece, for twenty years pastor of First Presbyterian Church, Salt Lake City, in The Fundamentals, vol. 8, pp. 111, 112.

For months the translation languished and then a "mysterious stranger" appeared at the Smith home on various occasions. This was Sidney Rigdon.—Mormonism, the Islam of America, by Reverend Bruce Kinney, p. 51.

SIDNEY RIGDON NOT CONNECTED WITH BEGINNING

This is a pretty theory, but it is spoiled by the Reverend Davis H. Bays, who assures us the Book of Mormon was in print and the church organized before Rigdon ever heard of "Mormonism":

In order to the successful refutation of the Mormon dogma it is not at all necessary to connect Sidney Rigdon with Joseph Smith in its inception. In fact, such a course will almost certainly RESULT IN FAILURE; and the principal reason why it will fail IS BECAUSE IT IS NOT TRUE. . . . As a matter of fact, Sidney Rigdon was an EARNEST AND ABLE ADVOCATE OF THE REFORMATION CONTEMPORANEOUSLY WITH ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, and pastor of a church at Mentor, Ohio, at the very time Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery were propagating Mormonism in New York and Pennsylvania. Sidney Rigdon had never heard a Mormon sermon, nor had he ever seen a copy of the Book of Mormon till he was presented with one by Oliver Cowdery and Parley P. Pratt IN THE FALL OF 1830. It is an historical fact that Mr. Rigdon became a convert to the new religion through the preaching of these gentlemen during the visit referred to above.—The Doctrines and Dogmas of Mormonism, pp. 22, 23.

DISAGREEMENT EVEN ON DATE OF BIRTH

Joseph Smith was born at Sharon, Windsor County, Vermont, December 23, 1805.—Origin of Book of Mormon and Rise and Progress of Mormon Church, by S. J. S. Davis, p. 23.

Just here a little sketch of the history and character of Joseph Smith may be in order. He was born at Sharon, Vermont. The date of his birth is not exactly known, but it is supposed to be about the year 1798.—Positive Proof that Mormonism is a Fraud and the Book of Mormon a Fable, by Reverend J. E. Mahaffey, p. 5.

Hundreds of contradictions similar to the ones here reproduced might be collected with a little research from the mass of confusion, error, and falsehood put forth in the sacred name of truth in opposition to the latter-day work. You will not gather grapes and figs of truth and fact from the brambles of error and deception. ELBERT A. SMITH.

CURRENT EVENTS SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

THAW ON TRIAL.—Harry K. Thaw is at this writing on trial at New York City for conspiracy in escaping from the State hospital for the criminal insane at Matteawan.

CONDITIONS IN SPAIN.—Economic conditions in Spain, affected materially by the European war, are said to have assumed a serious aspect, notwithstanding the efforts of the government to solve the food problem. Riots have occurred, protesting the increased price of bread.

RAILROADS SUSTAINED.—Annulling the North Dakota lignite coal rate law as applying to the Northern Pacific, and Minneapolis, Saint Paul and Salt Lake Marie railroads, and the West Virginia two-cent passenger rate law as to the Norfolk and Western, the Supreme Court at Washington on the 8th held that it is beyond the power of a State to require a railroad to carry any commodity or class of traffic at a loss or nominal profit, even though adequate profit is obtained from its business as a whole within the State.

FOREIGN SHIPPING.—After a checkered career of several months, aiding German warships and preying on commerce, the Prinz Eitel Frederick, a German merchant vessel, transferred at Tsing-Tao into an auxiliary cruiser, put into Newport News the 10th, having on January 28 sunk the United States sailing vessel William P. Frye in the southern Atlantic, bearing wheat from Seattle, Washington, to Queensland, Ireland. The captain of the William P. Frye, on board the Prinz Eitel Frederick and put off at Newport News, states that the vessel was sunk under the claim that the wheat was contraband. The destruction of this merchantman under the circumstances stated creates complications requiring adjustment. The matter will be taken up by the Department of State. The United States Government has submitted to the governments of Great Britain and France a joint note of inquiry with reference to the proposed plan for cutting off German trade and its effect on neutral countries.

UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.—Demands on the part of the United States Government for relief for foreigners and protection of foreign life and property in that part of Mexico under the control of Carranza, especially in Mexico City, accompanied by the statement that Carranza and Villa would be held personally responsible for any outrage, and emphasized by the ordering of United States battleships to Vera Cruz, and the statement that unless conditions were improved steps would be taken to obtain the protection necessary, were followed by denials of interference in the matter of relief reaching Mexico City, and of inflammatory utterances by Obregon likely to incite the populace against foreigners, and by Obregon's withdrawal from the capital on the 11th, the city being occupied by Zapata forces. The situation at Mexico City had seemed so serious that Secretary Bryan urged United States citizens to leave there. On entering the capital, Zapata soldiers are reported, in revenge for his alleged shooting of comrades during their former occupancy of the city, to have shot and killed John B. McManus, a citizen of the United States, in his own house and under the United States Flag. Demands for reparation and punishment for this offense are expected.

EUROPEAN WAR.—The French report further gains in the Champagne regions. Fighting elsewhere on the western front has been hindered by snow. The Russians have made gains in northern Poland. The Germans are said to be preparing for another advance in this territory; they claim gains near Przasnysz. The struggle in the south continues with little change. The Turks and Kurbs in northwestern Persia are being forced southward by the Russians. A British collier has been sunk. Three

THE SPALDING MANUSCRIPT

NOT BASIS FOR BOOK OF MORMON

There are many who seem to think that the Book of Mormon had its origin with the Spalding Manuscript, not knowing that this manuscript is now in the library of Oberlin College, Oberlin, Ohio, copies of which are printed and for sale by the Herald Publishing House, Lamoni, Iowa.

This is evident from the fact that several lecturers and debaters have so advocated, and because of this, and for the further fact that some pamphlets and books have been issued of late still advocating this erroneous origin of the Book of Mormon, it is considered time well spent to present a clear chain of title for the Spalding Manuscript from the time it was written till the present by evidences obtained from those who are in no way friendly to the claims made by the Latter Day Saints for the Book of Mormon.

The wife of Reverend Solomon Spalding wrote in 1839, as printed in the Boston Recorder:

In the town of New Salem (sometimes called Conneaut) were numerous mounds and forts.

Mr. Spalding . . . conceived the idea of giving an historical sketch of this long-lost race. His sole object in writing this historical romance was to amuse himself and neighbors. This was in 1812.

From New Salem we removed to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Here Mr. Spalding found an acquaintance and friend in the person of Mr. Patterson, who . . . borrowed it for perusal.

At length the manuscript was returned to the author. . . . Mr. Spalding deceased in 1816. The manuscript fell into my hands and was carefully preserved.

The excitement in New Salem became so great that the inhabitants had a meeting and deputed Doctor Philastus Hurlbut . . . to obtain from me the original manuscript of Mr. Spalding. . . . This was in 1834.

Mrs. M. S. McKinstry, daughter of Reverend Spalding, wrote April 3, 1880, as printed in Scribner's Magazine, August of that year. From this article we extract:

During the war of 1812, I was residing in a little town in Ohio, called Conneaut. . . . There were some round mounds of earth near our house which greatly interested him (Mr. Spalding). . . . He talked with my mother of these discoveries in the mounds, and was writing every day as the work progressed. Afterwards he read the manuscript which I had seen him writing to his neighbors.

We removed from Conneaut to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania.

In 1816 my father died at Amity, Pennsylvania, and directly after his death my mother and myself went on a visit to Onondaga Valley, New York. . . . We carried all our personal effects with us, and one of these was an old trunk in which my mother had placed all my father's writings which had been preserved. . . . There were numerous sermons and other papers, and I saw a manuscript about an inch thick closely written. . . . On the outside of this manuscript was written the words "Manuscript Found." . . . I was about eleven years of age at this time.

In 1820, she (Mrs. Spalding) married Mr. Davison of Hartwicks, a village near Cooperstown, New York, and sent for the things she had left at Onondaga Valley, and I remember that the old trunk with its contents reached her in safety.

I believe it was in 1834 that a man named Hurlbut came to my house, at Monson, Massachusetts, to see my mother, who told us that he had been sent by a committee to procure the "Manuscript Found," written by Reverend Solomon Spalding, so as to compare it with the Mormon Bible. . . . On the repeated promise of Hurlbut to return the manuscript to us, she gave him a letter to Mr. Clark to open the trunk and deliver it to him. We afterwards heard that he did receive it from Mr. Clark at Hartwicks, but from that time we have never had it in our possession, and have no present knowledge of its existence.

I have now traced the existence of the manuscript that has been made to do service in opposing the claims for the origin of the Book of Mormon, from the time it was written in 1812, to 1834, when Hurlbut obtained it.

Mr. D. P. Hurlbut wrote August 19, 1879, from which I extract:

I visited Mrs. Matilda (Spalding) Davison, at Monson, Massachusetts, in 1834, and never saw her afterwards. I then received from her a manuscript of her husband's, which I did not read, but brought home with me, and immediately gave to Mr. E. D. Howe, of Painesville, Ohio, who was then engaged in preparing his book, Mormonism Unveiled.—Braden and Kelley Debate, p. 91.

Mr. E. D. Howe wrote July 26, 1881, to Apostle T. W. Smith, in which letter is the following: "The manuscript that came into my possession I suspect was destroyed by fire forty years ago."—SAINTS' HERALD, vol. 28, p. 269.

Mr. L. L. Rice wrote from Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, March 28, 1885, to Joseph Smith, from which I extract:

The Spalding Manuscript in my possession came into my hands in this wise. In 1839-1840 my partner and myself bought of E. D. Howe the Painesville Telegraph, published at Painesville, Ohio. The transfer of the printing department, types, press, etc., was accompanied with a large collection of books, manuscripts, etc., this manuscript of Spalding's among the rest. So you see, it has been in my possession over forty years.

Mr. Howe says when he was getting up a book to expose "Mormonism" as a fraud at an early day, when the "Mormons" had their headquarters at Kirtland, he obtained it from some source, and it was inadvertently transferred with the other effects of his printing office.—Manuscript Found, p. 6.

In a letter written May 14, 1885, to Joseph Smith, Mr. Rice says:

I shall have it deposited in the library of Oberlin College, in Ohio, to be at the disposal for reading of any who may wish to peruse it, but not to be removed from that depository.—Manuscript Found, p. 8.

Mr. Rice wrote to President James H. Fairchild of Oberlin College, June 13, 1885:

Herewith I send you the Solomon Spalding Manuscript, to be deposited in the library of Oberlin College, for reference by anyone who may be desirous of seeing or examining it.—Manuscript Found, p. 9.

President James H. Fairchild wrote July 23, 1885:

I have this day delivered to Mr. E. L. Kelley a copy of the manuscript of Solomon Spalding, sent from Honolulu by Mr. L. L. Rice to the library of Oberlin College for safe keeping and now in my care. The copy was prepared at Mr. Kelley's request, under my supervision, and is, so I believe, an exact transcript of the original manuscript, including erasures, misspellings, etc.—Manuscript Found, p. 10.

E. L. Kelley sent this prepared copy of the Spalding Manuscript to W. W. Blair, one of the presidency of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and one of the editors of THE SAINTS' HERALD, July 24, 1885, with the following note:

Herewith I transmit to you the copy of the Spalding Manuscript prepared by President Fairchild, as attested by him, together with his certificate and photograph sheets.—Manuscript Found, p. 11.

This copy has been printed, and is on sale under the title of "The Manuscript Found," at the Herald Publishing House, Lamoni, Iowa, for twenty-five cents.

Those who have secured this book and compared it unprejudicially with the Book of Mormon have concluded, as did President James H. Fairchild and Mr. L. L. Rice. President Fairchild said in 1885:

There seems no reason to doubt that this is the long-lost story. Mr. Rice, myself, and others compared it with the Book of Mormon, and could detect no resemblance between the two, in general or in detail. . . . Some other explanation of the origin of the Book of Mormon must be found, if any explanation is required.—Manuscript Found, pp. 5, 6.

Mr. L. L. Rice said in 1885:

Upon reflection . . . I am of the opinion that no one who reads this manuscript will give credit to the story that Solomon Spalding was in any wise the author of the Book of Mormon.—Manuscript Found, p. 7.

A BIBLICAL NECESSITY

To those who have become satisfied that the Book of Mormon did not originate with the Spalding Manuscript, and that its contents are pure and moral, comes these queries: What is the need of the book? Is not the Bible sufficient?

The word of God contained in the Bible is complete and sufficient when the promises and prophecies contained therein are fulfilled, and the principles advocated therein realized. When this is the case there must be a record of it, either written or unwritten, and it is like God in all the past to have a written record of all such important events. Such a record would be of great value in this age of skepticism and infidelity to support the claim made for these biblical prophecies, promises and divine principles, and being of value is a necessity.

In Acts 17: 24-27 is a declaration of divine principles by the Apostle Paul:

God that made the world and all things therein . . . hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation; that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him, though he be not far from every one of us.

The Book of Mormon claims that the people who came to the American Continent from the tower of Babel, and also from Jerusalem, are of the same blood as those on the Eastern Continent; that they found the Lord and were blessed of him whenever they felt after him; and that he gave them many reasons why they should feel after him.

In Genesis 11: 1-9 is an account of how the Lord from the tower of Babel in the "plain in the land of Shinar" "scattered them abroad from thence upon the face of all the earth." The Book of Mormon gives a brief record of a people who came to the American Continent from the tower of Babel, how they came, and of their experiences while here.

In Ezekiel 34: 1-6 is a prophetic statement made 587 years before Christ, relating to Israel, in which is the following: "My sheep wandered through all the mountains, and upon every high hill; yea, my flock was scattered upon all the face of the earth."

The Book of Mormon gives a brief history of some of the house of Israel who came to the American Continent about six hundred years before Christ, and who found the Lord and were much blessed of him when they hearkened to the voice of angels, the Holy Ghost, and his son Jesus Christ, whom he sent unto them at different times to invite them to feel after him. This record is a necessity to support the principles that God created man to dwell on all the face of the earth, and that wherever man dwelt God was found of him and man received blessing from him; and since the Bible claims that from the tower of Babel, men, and afterwards "the children of Israel," were "scattered upon all the face of the earth," a record of such events is of great value to supplement these statements and prove their correctness. Investigating minds demand such proof, hence its necessity.

Before Jacob died he blessed his children prophetically (Genesis 49: 1), telling them briefly what would be the experiences of their posterity "in the last days." Joseph was the most beloved of his children, both by him and the Lord, because he was the oldest son by his loved and only legitimate wife. Upon him was this patriarchal blessing pronounced, thus designating to his seed "the bounds of their habitation."

Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well, whose branches run over the wall.—Genesis 49: 22.

The blessings of thy father have prevailed above the blessings of my progenitors unto the utmost bound of the everlasting hills: they shall be on the head of Joseph, and on the crown of the head of him that was separate from his brethren.—Genesis 49: 26.

The progenitors of Jacob were Abraham and Isaac, unto whom God had promised Canaan as "an everlasting possession" (Genesis 17: 8; 26: 3). Jacob received a greater blessing of earthly possessions, one that extended unto the utmost bound of the everlasting hills; the greater blessing was conferred upon Joseph.

Moses, the man of God, blessed the children of Israel before his death (Deuteronomy 33: 1), bestowing a great blessing upon the tribe of Joseph.

Blessed of the Lord be his land, for the precious things of heaven, for the dew, and for the deep that coucheth beneath. . . . And for the chief things of the ancient mountains, and for the precious things of the lasting hills, and for the precious things of the earth and fullness thereof, and for the good will of him that dwelt in the bush: let the blessing come upon the head of Joseph.—Deuteronomy 33: 13-16.

The only land that will fully answer the description of the blessing of Joseph given by Jacob, "to the utmost bound of the everlasting hills"; and by Moses concerning "the dew, and for the deep that coucheth beneath," "the chief things of the ancient mountains," "the precious things of the lasting hills," "the precious things of the earth, and fullness thereof, and for the good will of him that dwelt in the bush," is the land of America, hence it must be the land upon which Joseph's posterity would dwell.

The Book of Mormon gives a brief account of the seed of Joseph, who were brought to America by the direction of God, and who dwelt in this land,—the progenitors of the peoples who dwelt here when Columbus discovered this continent. This record came forth in fulfillment of what the Lord foretold B. C. 587 through Ezekiel:

The word of the Lord came again unto me, saying, Moreover, thou son of man, take thee one stick, and write upon it, for Judah, and for the children of Israel his companions; then take another stick, and write upon it, for Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and for all the house of Israel his companions: and join them one to another into one stick; and they shall become one in thine hand. And when the children of thy people shall speak unto thee, saying, Wilt thou not show us what thou meanest by these? Say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will take the stick of Joseph, which is in the hand of Ephraim, and the tribes of Israel his fellows, and will put them with him, even with the stick of Judah, and make them one stick, and they shall be one in mine hand. And the sticks whereon thou writest shall be in thine hand before their eyes. And say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God; behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land: and I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all; and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all.—Ezekiel 37: 15-22.

The twelve tribes of Israel have never been "one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel," neither have they been subject to "one king" since the death of Solomon, when they were divided into two kingdoms under Rehoboam and Jeroboam (1 Kings 12: 19-21); neither is it foretold that they will again be one nation under one king till Jesus Christ shall be given "the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end" (Luke 1: 32, 33).

The Book of Mormon was first printed in 1830, since which time God has favored the land of Israel with its dews and former and latter rains, which almost altogether had been withheld for nearly seventeen centuries. He has moved the nations to favor Israel socially and financially, and they are permitted and assisted to gather back to the land of their fathers in safety. This book is the only book that claims to be written "for Joseph . . . and all the children of Israel his companions." It is now, 1914, too late for such a record to come forth, and be put with the only record that claims to be written "for Judah, and for the children of Israel his companions," the New Testament, because these records were the only ones in the hands of God's representatives before Israel began to gather.

The Lord in Isaiah 29: 9-24 presents a statement of prophetic facts. He says a people will "cry out" and "stagger," unto whom he gave no prophets, seers or spiritual rulers; who will draw near the Lord with their mouths, with their lips honor him, but whose fear toward him is taught by the precepts of men. Under these conditions, and at such a time, a sealed book will be delivered to an unlearned man, the words of which are delivered to one that is learned; and associated with it God will do a marvelous work and a wonder, insomuch that "the wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid"; "the deaf hear the words of the book, and the eyes of the blind shall see out of obscurity, and out of darkness. The meek also shall increase their joy in the Lord and the poor among men shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel," "they also that erred in spirit shall come to understanding, and they that murmured shall learn doctrine." All these things shall take place when "Jacob shall not now be ashamed, neither shall his face now wax pale," and "Lebanon shall be turned into a fruitful field, and the fruitful field shall be esteemed as a forest."

The Book of Mormon was a sealed book, sealed up from the knowledge of men, its existence made known by an angel, and its contents translated by the power of God; and it is the only book of which such a claim is made, coming forth at the time just previous to Lebanon becoming again fruitful, and Jacob again prospering and gathering back to the land of Israel. This book and the work associated with its existence have caused and are causing more marveling and wondering than any other book that has ever existed; and all this because that God sent an angel to show where the plates were deposited from which the contents of this book was translated, although it is a scriptural truth that angels have always assisted when God has done a work on the earth,—that an unlearned man gave the translation through the Urim and Thummim—anciently used by seers (Nehemiah 7: 65); and because associated with the people who believe this book is what it claims to be is the power of the Holy One of Israel manifest as in former times, through which the deaf hear, the blind see, the lame walk, the sick are healed, they that erred have come to understanding, and many have learned the precious doctrines of Jesus Christ, so plainly taught in the Book of Mormon, and through which many have come to an understanding of the precious truths taught in New Testament times, about which there has been, and is so much murmuring and contention.

God's word shall "prosper in the thing whereto I sent it," (Isaiah 55: 11), and every word must be fulfilled.

The Book of Mormon comes in fulfillment of prophecy, as has been clearly proved, and sustains the unchangeability of God and every principle relating to the purpose for which man was created. It also supports the principle that Jesus is "the light of the world," (John 8: 12); that to the civilizations that have existed upon the American Continent came the light, or intelligence of the Christ by which they were taught the ways of the Lord, the "narrow way, which leadeth unto life" (Matthew 7: 14), to walk therein; and also was fulfilled John 10: 16, the sheep of Israel, not of that fold at Jerusalem hearing the voice of Jesus Christ, and such as hearkened were led into the fold, the family of God.

THE OFFENDER

Moreover, if thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone: if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church: but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican.—Matthew 18: 15-17.

The steps plainly are, First, tell him between thee and him alone; second, before one or two witnesses; third, tell it unto the church; and the church has interpreted this to mean, tell it to the elders, as prescribed in the church rules and procedure.

Assuming that all proper efforts at reconciliation have been made, in humility, with sincere desire for reconciliation, allowing reasonable time for subsidence of feelings, prayer, willingness to forgive and to be forgiven, conceding that, I may be wrong, tendering material restitution if the case should require it, what would be the duty of the "other party"?

We have here the legitimate presumption that the "other party" did the wrong. The party wronged or offended is the innocent party. Why should the innocent, injured party be required to do all the work of reconciliation when he did no wrong? Should the burden all rest on him? How can he effect the reconciliation, of which restitution should be the basis, if he has been robbed? Is it not evident the party who did the wrong or injury should at least assist in the reconciliation? If he has defrauded, should he not make restitution or at least try? He having offended should he not try to make amends? Should he try less than is required and prescribed for the innocent injured party?

To all these queries the answer seems obvious, and the remedy seems to have been supplied by the Master himself in Matthew 5: 23, 24:

Therefore, if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift.

Should not he then take the same steps to effect this reconciliation as are prescribed for the innocent party in Matthew 18: 15-17, above quoted? Can we devise a better plan for him to follow?

If the law of the sacrament is so sensitive that one feeling hardness of heart should not partake lest he eat and drink condemnation to his soul, even though such hardness may have been caused by the injury suffered, should the one who committed the injury or wrong partake without having done his part to effect reconciliation, as indicated in the two references quoted?

When should he begin? As soon as he becomes aware that he has offended.

How may he know he has offended? First, of his own knowledge; second, by the call of the injured party; third, by notice from a proper officer of the church.

If the grievance is a really imaginary one, or by a real misunderstanding, then the party offended is, or may be, the real offender, and the one most innocent, the one really offended, and Matthew 5: 23, 24 would apply to him, to be applied as set out in Matthew 18: 15-17.

After becoming aware that "Thy brother hath aught against thee," the duties prescribed for adjusting difficulties in Matthew 18, as quoted, apply to and devolve equally upon both parties.

The necessity of refraining from the sacrament should by right fall upon the guilty one, or the party giving the offense, as soon as he becomes knowing to the offense, as much as it applies to the one in whom the offense may have caused a hardness of heart. Wisdom should be exercised as to whether the situation is serious enough to warrant abstinence from the sacrament.

However, abstinence on the part of the one offending would manifest an earnest desire for reconciliation and a courteous respect and solicitude for the other's feelings, which would materially assist in convincing him of the sincerity of the effort for reconciliation, overbalancing the loss of one material enjoyment of the emblems.

Of course having exhausted the provisions of the law for a reconciliation which might fail by lack of response of the other party, one should again feel entirely free to participate in the sacrament service.

For the offended party to tell his associates or "friends" about his grievance, or how he had been wronged or offended, whether real or imaginary, would be a real wrong on his part, for the word says, "Go and tell him his fault between him and thee alone."

PROHIBITION AND RUIN

Here are a few facts that show how the adoption of the prohibition amendment by Arizona is bringing ruin upon the State:

The Valley Bank of Phoenix, which suspended early in November, reorganized and opened up for business stronger than ever on the day the liquor traffic died in Arizona.

The Citizens' Bank, another financial institution, was organized by Phoenix capitalists and opened for business after the saloons were voted out of Arizona.

The Central Bank of Phoenix, a strong institution with a capital stock of $100,000, organized by eastern capitalists after the election, filed articles of incorporation three days after the saloons closed and will be open for business in an "empty building" in the next few days.

A branch of the Anchor Trust Company, of Wichita, Kansas, has been established in Phoenix since Arizona voted dry.

All of the liquor establishments put out signs before election to this effect: "This building and twenty-seven others like it will be for rent if the dry amendment carries." Now, however, their proprietors refuse to give up their leases to those who have been waiting to secure good locations for legitimate business enterprises. Some of the saloon men have started drug stores, some billiard halls, some soft drink stands, some restaurants.

A "Prosperity Dinner" was given by over three hundred business men following a "Prosperity Parade" the day after the saloons closed. This parade was led by a drum major at the head of the First Regiment band who had just lost his job as bartender in one of the saloons that had been closed. Those attending the parade and banquet had bitterly opposed the amendment during the campaign, and the banquet was held at the Hotel Adams, whose proprietor had been loud in his denunciation of the amendment and had declared that it would necessitate the closing of his hotel. He responded to the toast, "Why not prosperity?" Two of the attorneys for the wets were on the speaker's list.

The day after the saloons closed all of the bakers and grocers sold out of bread for the first time and the meat markets were depleted likewise. The people bought bread instead of booze.

For the first time in the history of Phoenix there were no drunks in police court. The arrests for drunkenness the past year averaged twelve per day. —Deseret Evening News, January 22, 1915.

A Conference Greeting

It is a great pleasure to greet you at this time, and to realize that before another issue of our columns is out the joys of our union of hearts and voices in conference assembled will have become a reality.

Our message is short, this month, but please feel that it is full of good cheer and hope; for never were our hearts more filled with a desire to get very near the musical interests of our people, in a helpful way. Would we were better qualified to help, but such as we have we freely offer.

We are to have a musical institute! Yes, really! Last year when the Sunday school convention divided itself up into classes for the purpose of considering the separate or individual needs and possibilities of the various departments, there was no place made for the choristers. It seemed that the Sunday school people considered the music of the Sunday school was a very inconsequential part of that service, for it could not have been that they thought the music department had attained the heights of perfection, or that those having it in charge needed no counsel, had no difficulties to solve, no problems to work out.

However, we are to have an institute, and the program outlined is here published. We would invite you, if you are not to have the privilege of attending conference, and yet have some questions to ask, some problems to solve, to send in those questions by mail, that they will be given attention, discussed, and you may get some help in that way secondhand.

Singers who are coming to conference, be sure to read the chorister's announcements; and whatever else you read, carefully study the analysis of our cantata, presented by Brother Paul Craig, who responded to our request for this in a most inspiring way. Read his description of the scenes and the music, and be thrilled with the spirit of the whole work, so that when we sing it together we may LIVE in it, and make it ours!

AUDENTIA ANDERSON.

Chorister's Annual Message

The time of recapitulation draws near. The workers in God's vineyard form a habit that becomes fixed after years of service, of regarding April 1 as the first day of a new year. Personally we are beginning to do likewise, and these last few days we have been summarizing the commissions filled, and those left undone, and naturally looking to the work just ahead. We marvel at the accomplishments of the three years of general choir movement activities, and humbly thank God for the broadened view he has given us for the yet unfulfilled vision of its newest possibilities. Oh, gifted friends, God has placed within our hands the most wonderful gift of all times—the blessed gift of music and we wish we were able to impress upon you all the necessity of using it aright in the service of God.

What has it meant to you who have been in close touch with the situation? to you who have been within the pale of our activities? What is it going to mean to you, now that bigger possibilities loom up? Have the feeble and the strong efforts alike thrilled you with a desire for greater and better service? Have you given all your best possible talents to the cause? Have you endeavored to bring out the talents of others?

The past year has been the best from the standpoint of progress. From localized efforts we have succeeded in making our work nearly national in scope.

From the Sunny South a cry of longing comes: "It is as natural for us to sing as it is to be hungry, and our souls long to learn more of music and its application to the work of the gospel." We can understand you, friends of the South!

Then comes a letter from the North, from our warm, devoted, Canadian friends: "We are ready to appoint our district choristers; we recognize the value of the choir movement work and we want to join in the effort." Of course you do, Canada, and we commend you for your willingness.

The East joins hands with the North and South, and we had the glorious privilege of helping a good sister realize that her place was with the Saints, and we look to Massachusetts for results that thrill! A short trip lands us in another restless camp of plodders; New York and Philadelphia strengthens the eastern boundary, and if our readers could have witnessed the result of a few weeks of consecrated effort, when the combined choirs of the above district rendered service at its February conference, they would say that Zion is indeed beginning to put on her beautiful garments.

On the straight road West we also find consecration and preparation. Bishop Becker shows us he is on the firing line, and while his orders for books show that some choirs in his districts are pathetically small, they are brave enough to get to work, and form at least a nucleus for the combined efforts at reunions.

We can well afford to stop a moment in Chicago, after taking a detour of Michigan. Sister Plato has kept things stirring. Flint and others show they are ready to do. A ride on the sleeper brings us to Saint Louis, and Edward Bell, constancy itself, has caught the spirit of combined effort and his reward is sure. Did we mention Taylorville, Illinois? Yes, we passed through, and it is now on the map with Brother Richards swinging the big stick.

Then another night's ride and we alight at Kansas City. Sister James surely does things at Central, and Sister Anderson in Independence, tireless with pen as well as baton, swinging both in a way that impresses all. We haven't time to journey down to Atchison, but with our ear to the ground, we learn of the activities of Sister McNichols, while Sister Brocaw keeps a watchful eye over all proceedings. Then Lamoni, with Brother Burgess at the helm. His letters are volumes of good works and encouraging situations, and we do not overlook Sister Skinner as stake chorister, both guiding and counseling.

A skip and a jump brings us to the side of Paul Craig, an apostle of good music, art, and everything that is noble. Where he is there are many to be found who think likewise, and the programs and hints betray him to be in a role we love to see him enjoying.

It's a long way to the coast (unfortunately we can not stop in Denver this year, somehow), and here we find the planted seed has taken root. Everybody should sing in California, and we feel sure they will, for the good letters show that they are learning as well as teaching. Having circled the entire country, we must not leave out Oregon, by the way. We stand there on the shore, the expansive shore, of the Pacific with a longing in our heart that we might be as Jonah for a bit, and take a trip to Tahiti and help Brother Christensen in his deep desire to teach the natives there the songs of Zion, that they might be able to mingle with ours their glad voices when the day of triumph comes. The reading of Brother Christensen's letter was one of our happiest experiences this year; it came at a time when we needed something to kindle anew the coals of enthusiasm to a glowing fire, and it did!

Thus, this splendid band of choristers, working hand in hand unselfishly, and making, as it were, a chain across the country, is becoming an influence felt in the church. And now as this conference period approaches we want to open the gate wider, that we may have a bigger and broader view of our possibilities. They seem limitless, my readers, and with a proper cooperation, and an active field force, we can not but be the means of leading many to the throne of God who are willing, as we should be, to throw all to the consecrated services of the Most High.

Many have given valiant service in the furtherance of our cause, but we want much more. This will reach the eyes, and we pray the hearts of many, who, unfortunately, have not yet touched the outer edges of the influence of our music. For these we want to give our prayers, that they may receive the seed that in time will surely bring rich returns. To these we want to speak in the first person and ask: "What are the possibilities of your joining our ever-spreading movement, to place yourselves among those who are as the corner stones, the foundation of our upbuilding?"

Your complaint may be, "We have so little to offer, but the more discredit to you for not giving that! From small endeavors (for in the eyes of the Lord our every effort is very small) we are building up, and trying to perfect our movement. Bring yourself to-day, then, to see the knowledge of a new way, and wonderful, of serving God through the power of music.

We want our district choristers to be always on the alert for opportunity and new possibilities. How many unworked fields comprise your district? Why not, right now, give them your attention? Go to them; work over them; encourage, and bring out music. It is there, music is everywhere. Lay the foundation, inspire your followers! Inspiration comes to our door often, but results never come by waiting. We must compel the first factor to work in us, then, lo, and behold, result will be standing at our door. Lack of musical knowledge may be a drawback, but consecrate what you have and God will give the increase.

How we wish we might give you a dozen concrete examples of the valiant work of our little corps of choristers! Feebly the results came at first. Some were lacking even a musical training, but ambition, for the sake of Christ's cause, has by cooperation and dint of effort helped them to come into their own, and has carried others over to their enthusiasm.

So if you lack a musical head let your district suggest to us who is capable of saying to the multitude: "Come ye who have a heart to sing. We have learned a new song. It is yours also to learn, if in the service of God you are willing to try." That is a leader! We want scores of them—those with the deep desire to make singing one of our church institutions. We have that kind, many of them, some of whom came first in fear and hesitation; yet now, with confidence and hope they are organizing and building, leaving the personal side out—just God's service showing! Their service seems summed up in the God-thought:

Whatever thou givest beside thyself is of no value in my sight, for I seek not thy gifts, but thee; offer up thyself, and thy gifts shall be accepted.

Our purpose and our ever-constant prayer is to encourage music throughout the church—music of a stately and beautiful character, to be sung by humble, consecrated servants of God.

ALBERT N. HOXIE.

Chorister's Announcement

We are endeavoring to make arrangements for the appearance during conference of Percy Hemus, the famous New York baritone. Mr. Hemus is touring the country at that time, and his appearance at Lamoni would be a genuine treat to all lovers of good music.

During the conference there will be held three special meetings or institutes in the interest of the general choir movement. These programs will be under the direction of Brother Paul N. Craig, and the tentative program should prove of interest to a great degree.

On special occasions the ladies of the choir are expected and requested to dress in white.

We hope to make the cantata study an outlined work in our programs. We know of many groups that take it up from the purely vocalization advancement it gives; some go even so far as to establish cantata societies on a small scale at first. One little body started with four members, and six months later had thirty members, half of them being not of the faith. We have a number of business men, as friends, who come to our rehearsals mentally exhausted from their day's efforts, and many times have different ones remarked that an evening of study of this character afforded them rest.

So why not look after the needs of a thousand and one Saints who are looking to satisfy the longings of their souls? We know that there must be thousands who have an earnest desire to unchain that inexpressible longing for something. Who knows but what that something is music?

There seems to be an opportunity we have not grasped as a means of spreading our efforts broadcast. The doings of workers in Oregon might easily be known to those in Maine if an editorial center were established, and this opportunity is awaiting our many branches in the shape of the Staff column of the HERALD. This column is a part of you, or should be. You are asked to periodically report the activities of your district—musicals, conferences, socials, etc. Even go so far as to appoint a recording secretary and make it a positive point that he or she shall report to Mrs. Audentia Anderson every month, and that before the fifth of the month. This is a very real way of spreading enthusiasm into the unknown fields, and a stimulus to those consecrated to the work. A vote of thanks to those that are awake and who do contribute now to the columns.

District and local choir leaders and members, kindly register with the general chorister upon arriving at the conference. Your ability to sing must be accompanied by a deep desire for true service. Make the choir movement a subject of your daily prayer. Prepare yourself for this service that our work may have the true spiritual ring to it.

ALBERT N. HOXIE.

From "Olivet to Calvary"

"'Olivet to Calvary' recalls simply and reverently the scenes which mark the last few days of the Savior's life on earth, and some of the reflections suggested thereby." The story covers the period from the Messiah's triumphal entry into Jerusalem on Sunday, to his death shortly after noon on Friday.

The music of which our Savior is the theme stands in a class by itself. No other person in the history of the world offers such inexhaustible inspiration to the greatest of our artists in all the field of art. Other characters there are who have lived, and given the masters great ideas; but they are always circumscribed, and in the work which they have inspired one is always made to feel the fallibility of the subject, and with it a sense of disappointment which invariably accompanies a portrayal of the limited types of character. But Christ has given that unlimited supply of material, which, drawn from by the masters of music particularly, keeps the soul of the listener uplifted to the end, and leaves him still uplifted, making him feel that he has been touched by something inexpressibly holy and pure.

Love and hate and their associated feelings have ever been the inspiration of the artists, and whenever characters in myth or history have been peculiarly marked by the one or the other, artists have selected them as subjects for their works. It is the natural thing, then, that in our Savior as a theme the great artists should recognize the acme of all artists' endeavor, for he had the solution of all life. He stands out as a beacon in the dense darkness; the master of love and hate, the perfect ideal; the hope and salvation of humanity.

The text of this cantata should be carefully studied in order to understand it perfectly. It is in the narrative style and the poet in relating the story has paused occasionally to meditate, and draws us with him in reflecting on the mission of our Master and the all-part he has in our lives. He makes the appeal go home in the sympathetic directness of the thought and the personal manner of applying it. The introduction of the hymns occasionally emphasize this thought also, and are no doubt intended to bring the congregation more closely in touch with the matter of the text, thus making the whole production peculiarly vital to all.

The composer has adopted a very simple and impressive style in interpreting this beautiful text. One is impressed by the lack of profusion or ornamentation in the building of this work. The story is interpreted in an earnest and a graceful manner, each note and movement being full of thought and inspiration. It is melodious and full of interest, carrying one in the spirit of it to the end.

There is no lengthy prelude, but the composer, with a short introduction, has started immediately with the text, and devotes his work strictly to it throughout the cantata, with the exception of one impressive place to which we will refer later. He has observed strict economy in distributing preludes and interludes, making them short and to the point. The accompaniment, though simple, requires considerable sympathetic skill in the accompanist, especially in following the soloists. Though fairly technically accurate, he may spoil the solos by not interpreting with the singer.

The brief introduction with its succession of modulations immediately awakens interest, and one enters into the spirit of the grand march of the multitude as it accompanies Messiah to its Salem. What could equal the unusual sight and wonderful sound of the multitude as it greeted him, shouting hosannas and casting before him palms and flowers. These hungry disciples, having long expected their Messiah, who, as they supposed, would deliver them from bondage, were ready to obey the first word of command from this meek personage, who had fed them, had healed them and had stood before them as a wall of righteousness, counseling them with such assurance and understanding. They were now accompanying him to their Holy City, believing that he would there throw off his meek guise and assume the leadership in miraculous display at the celebration of their greatest feast day; and what more proper and opportune time could have been selected! So they were greeting him as they had greeted their earthly kings before, and escorting him royally to the Holy City. All this should be felt in the singing of this opening chorus. The singers should be moved with the enthusiasm of the multitude as the chorus proceeds, working toward the climax at the close, attacking it with an accelerando of spontaneous, joyous hosannas!

The chorus should not leave the spirit of the thing at the close of their parts, but should continue by following in the spirit of the solos, thus forming a background of sustaining, sympathetic interest.

The scene that next takes place—the pause of the Messiah as he comes in sight of the proud city of Jerusalem, beholding it and lamenting over it—is pictured in tenor and baritone solos. These two solo voices take up the thread of the story again, which changes now to the scene in the temple where Jesus “cast out them that bought and sold therein.”

The next chorus is a direct appeal to us who are witnessing this song-picture; “Another temple waits thee, Lord divine, the temple of my heart, O make it thine!” The music is full of the spirit of anxious yearning, and consequently abounds with crescendos, diminuendos and accelerandos, etc., all of which the chorus is to carefully observe and interpret with natural feeling.

“Not of this world, the kingdom of our Lord.” Thus the tenor solo continues with the story, and is followed appropriately by one of the most impressive choruses of the cantata, picturing the Savior in his favorite retreat, on Mount Olivet. He is alone, and it is night; he is weary and is lonely with that loneliness that only great souls know. “The beasts have lairs, the birds have nests, he had not where to lay his head.” The chorus is in slow movement and should be sustained throughout, each note being given its full value. There are wonderful pianissimo parts and equally beautiful swells and crescendos. There is a marked change of spirit from the preceding choruses, and the sublime, reverential feeling should be carried out faithfully.

“He was despised and rejected of men” continues the tenor solo, and yet “He came to die that erring souls may live in sinless joy.” The baritone then introduces the statement of the Master’s, which has set thousands of burdened hearts to singing joyously, “Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden,” etc. The first part of the cantata closes with the well-known “Just as I am,” in which the congregation is intended to join.

The baritone solo opens the second part by relating the scene of Jesus washing his disciples’ feet and the giving of new commandment, “that they love one another as he loved them.” This is followed by an unaccompanied semichorus. It is very effective and expresses one of the meditative moods into which the author of the text so often takes us in the endeavor to impress us with the need of Christ. Probably the most pathetic scene in the history of our Lord is portrayed in the baritone solo which follows, his agony in the Garden of Gethsemane. It is a simple solo, but full of expression. The hymn, “Thy will be done” follows very fittingly.

The chorus is used to tell of the approach of the mob coming to seize Jesus in the garden. The tumult and excitement of the mob can be plainly distinguished in the sudden loud burst of quick, staccato music, as suddenly dying away in a pathetic lament over the faithlessness of his disciples who forsook him and fled, while Jesus was forced away in the midst of the retreating mob. The tenor solo following is filled with feeling, expressing the Savior’s loneliness in the trying hours that he now passes through—despised and rejected! It is also an appeal to us to turn to him for relief from the bondage of sin.

In a decidedly martial and majestic strain the next chorus announces the coming forth of Jesus from the judgment hall, wearing the crown of thorns and the purple robe. Pilate proclaims, in the baritone solo, “Behold your King!” Many years, generation after generation, had the Jews spent in eager anticipation of their coming Messiah. The times indicated that his approach was at hand, and now more than ever they longed for their liberator. This man, decked in mock kingly apparel, had claimed to be he. “King,” indeed! What! that living, debasing parody on the hope of their hopes? That—he? Urged on, incensed and infuriated by Pharisees and others, the mob, in whom the elements of passion commingled and generated lust for murder, cried out saying, “Crucify him! Crucify him!”

The style of music used as a medium of expression here is startling, and the singers should enter into the spirit of it freely. It requires abandon to the imaginative faculty to get into the mob spirit, snapping off the staccato passages, putting venom in the attacks, and giving the tumultuous cry of the enraged multitude. It is all there in the music, and it is for the chorus to bring it out. Can you be a Jew a few moments and feel the irony in the question, “Shall I crucify your king?” and hurl back bitterly, “We have no King but Cæsar! Away with this man! Crucify him!”

Reluctantly Pilate yields.

We now come to the impressive instrumental part to which I referred at the first of this article. Simple to the extreme, it takes a valuable part at this point, telling, as it laments in its few sweet notes, the tale of grief to the imaginative ear. It is intended to fill in where words fail, and get one into the spirit of the march to Calvary which follows. The pathetic strain is gradually woven into the music of the march and can be plainly distinguished throughout the whole chorus. The march is quite decided and never once gives up its relentless tempo. It carries one with it in its motion to the end. The monotony that might result from so strict a tempo is dispelled in the pianissimos, crescendos, etc., which frequently occur and color it throughout.

The most impressive of the baritone solos is that which tells of the crucifixion. It is somewhat dramatic and pictures the wonderful things that transpired on Calvary at this time with the characteristic sincerity in which the cantata is written. The closing chorus meditates upon the finished work of the Master and at the conclusion contemplates with an outburst of joy.

"Love, holiest love,
Shall earth and heaven atone,
In fadeless day,
From Christ's eternal throne!"

The concluding number is the well-known hymn, "Rock of Ages."

It must be remembered by those who take part in this song-picture that the body is the means of expression, and that in order to represent the picture truthfully they must feel actual emotion. We are not doing justice to the cantata nor to ourselves when we merely sing the words to the tune. We may make a beautiful noise, true! But why limit ourselves when there are such wonderful results to be attained through concentration and study? Between now and conference time let us study the text with the musical interpretation and also read the more full account in the scriptures and live the thing. That which has made our greatest singers great is the ability they have acquired to lose their own personality in the character they are temporarily representing. This can not be done on the spur of the moment, but takes time and training of the imaginative faculties, one of the greatest gifts we have. Let us be a part of the multitude that escorts the Savior triumphantly to the Holy City, and then let us walk with the Savior on the lonely Mount of Olivet, feeling his loneliness with him; with bowed heads and concentrated thought we will be able to get into the spirit of it more aptly. How different our feeling as we join the mob with the bitterness of hatred burning in them and cry out in rage, "Crucify him!"

Come, let us do our best and make the cantata live.

Musical Notes

A bill providing for registration of music teachers has recently been introduced in the New Jersey State Legislature. It contemplates a state board of music examiners, with whom all acting teachers of music must register. Applications must be made certifying, on oath, to qualifications, study, etc. A certificate will then be granted by the board, renewable annually. After six months all who are not registered must pass an examination. Violation of the provision is punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both. The California legislature recently introduced a similar bill.

Milwaukee is to have an orchestra library, if the plans recently sought to be executed there bear fruitage. The Milwaukee Musical Society, to help the effort, has offered its musical library, valued at ten thousand dollars, for three hundred dollars. About seventeen hundred people attended a special concert given for the purpose, and considerable interest has been aroused.

It is claimed that about thirty thousand Americans go to Europe annually for musical instruction, and incidentally pay six million dollars to the transportation companies, and about nine million dollars for music lessons and board. The average stay there is about twenty weeks. Conditions this year are very different, however.

The Scranton United Choral Society, which won the first prize at the Saint Louis Exposition, will send a hundred singers to the Panama-Pacific Exposition, in response to an invitation of the directors of the exposition. A symphony orchestra of eighty-five musicians will play there also, at the "Old Faithful Inn," which is a reproduction of the one at Yellowstone Park, supplied by the Union Pacific Railroad Company. Besides the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Creatore, Sousa, Thaviu, and others, will conduct band concerts there at various times.

Boston was favored with a magnificent concert by a band of four hundred musicians, led by John Philip Sousa, in Mechanics Hall recently. Thousands were in attendance, and demonstrated their enjoyment of the exceptional music.

Choir News

INDEPENDENCE NOTES

Since our last issue, we have the good news to report that a junior choir or chorus has been organized. There is a charter membership of about twenty-five, and a constitution and by-laws have been adopted energetic enough to prove that these young people mean business, and plenty of it. The minimum age of the members is fourteen, and a live committee tries the voices of applicants, which, with an initiation fee and fines for absences, seem to insure the fact that the membership shall be composed of those able and willing to do good work along this line.

Brother Eugene Closson is the president, and Brother R. C. Smith, son of our late church President, is the secretary. Sister Fred B. Farr is the director, and is bringing to this work such abundant enthusiasm and ability that its success is assured. We shall hear more of this organization, we feel sure, and we wish for the "Euterpean Chorus" of this place unqualified success.

The Mount Zion Sunday School orchestra gave a concert in the Stone Church on the evening of February 23. The program contained a varied selection of pieces, and proved immensely pleasing to the large audience which greeted the organization on this occasion. A collection of nearly twenty-seven dollars was taken up, which is to be used for a good cause, in keeping up the rapidly growing library of music belonging to the orchestra. Brother Eaton is still director, and the organization is composed of about twenty members.

LAMONI

The spirit of the work is among us, and everyone is willing to do his or her part. Brother Harold Burgess, our chorister, is the man for the place; seemingly his whole heart is in his work. He makes all singers feel welcome and anxious to come again.

Our lookout committee is deserving of much praise also, for by their works is shown that they feel there should be no sleeping soldiers in our army.

An efficient orchestra has been added to our choir, and it certainly has been a wonderful help to us in putting the spirit into our songs.

Since we last wrote, the choir, with Brother Burgess as director, has prepared and rendered the cantata "Daniel" and it was pronounced a grand success. By taking up a silver collection at this time we were enabled to pay for our new anthem books.

All work and no play is not thought to be profitable by our band, so occasionally we enjoy a social affair.

We are now busy with our music for General Conference, and so anxious are we to be ready that we meet two evenings each week for practice.

We hope always to keep up the interest in the choir movement, and that you will find us ever willing to do our part.

REPORTER.

FROM OMAHA

Our choir has been working the most of this winter on the cantata, "David, the shepherd boy," music by George F. Root. It is to be given in the church on Friday evening, March 19. The music is quite simple but tuneful. The choir are committing it to memory and will act out the parts. It is excellent work for us, and we expect it to be a means of developing our powers of expression. There is no better way to get into the spirit of music than to act it out. We are fortunate in having Sister Lorena Leeka with us to direct us in expression, as she has made a special study of that art. We are advertising the cantata considerably, and hope to realize a good sum from it for the benefit of the choir fund and the church debt.

The choir has been doing good work this winter. We have made good use of the collections of anthems compiled by our general chorister. We have enjoyed them. We have had occasional musical programs at our evening services and on special occasions, also some congregational song services, which have been very enjoyable.

We have had several new additions to our choir and our membership now numbers thirty-five. We do not have this number regularly, for it is quite impossible for many to be on hand always, situated as we are. The choir has developed commendably in its work, in reading and expression particularly. Some of our number expect to attend the General Conference, and are looking forward to getting some good musical treats from the big choir.

READING FOR APRIL—PHYSICAL EXERCISE

Special systems of physical culture are advertised in almost every periodical, and many books and magazines give written and pictured directions for taking certain physical exercises.

Busy persons are inclined to pass by everything of the kind with the thought that it is not for such as they. In thinking this it is possible a serious mistake is being made, for the busy person needs the greatest efficiency, and it is held by many who have put the matter to the test that even a few minutes of daily special exercise suited to the needs of the individual prove a wonderful aid in maintaining the health and strength and enduring powers of the body.

"To secure the full benefits of proper exercise, it must be accompanied by proper breathing, proper bathing, and proper eating. It is only one means of physical salvation, but it is an important one."

WHO NEEDS IT?

After asking this question Professor Edward B. Warman in Health Culture adds, "Who does not need it? That is the question." And in answer he enumerates, among others, "the business man, the clerk, the teacher, the lawyer and the preacher, and he leads the list with "the housewife." Of her he says, "The housewife thinks she gets enough work in her daily duties; so she does, but as they are purely automatic they do not furnish the results to be obtained from a regular, systematic course of physical exercise." To the clerk he says: "More activity, more health, more usefulness. These follow proper exercise as surely as the night the day." To the teacher: "Too tired when night comes? Why, bless your heart! there is nothing in the world that will so rest you as proper exercise. When taken in the morning it prepares you for the day; taken after school it rests you from your mental labors, puts you in condition for the enjoyment of your six o'clock dinner and of your friends . . . and insures your readiness for lectures and entertainments; taken just before retiring, the overloaded blood vessels of the brain are relieved and sweet, refreshing sleep is yours.

Shall delicate people exercise? Delicacy is simply inactivity of some organ or organs. Give them the needed exercise and get the whole machinery in good working order. Then the organs call for nourishment and this means increased appetite for nutritious food, improved digestion, better circulation, and little by little, in proportion to the exercise taken, new and better tissues will be formed.

"Perfect circulation means perfect health; in other words, where it obtains there can be no disease. Perfect circulation allows no congestion of any organ, no sluggishness, no collection of poisonous substances, but, instead, perfect absorption, oxygenation, oxidation, assimilation and elimination. What will bring this great boon to humanity? Proper food, fresh air, pure water and exercise—exercise—exercise. If unaccustomed to it, begin very carefully and work gradually. Just a few moments at a time and only a few of each exercise."

John Mason Tyler in his work on Growth and Education says: "Most adult women lead a sedentary life and take far less muscular exercise than is for their good. Their health 'flies out through the nerves faster than it can come in through the muscles.'"

"To increase the size and strength of almost every muscle of the body physical exercises tending to flex and contract them afford the most effective means.

"But may not this vigorous muscular exercise, which tends to produce hard and knotted muscles in the man, take away the softer and more graceful lines which are essentially feminine? If exercise were kept up for hours together, as in the case of the blacksmith, it undoubtedly would. But that is a thing a sensible system of exercise would avoid as studiously as it would the weakness and inefficiency which result from no work. . . . Without that hardness and solidity which are essentially masculine, there still comes from proper exercise a firmness and plumpness of muscle to which the unused arm or back was a stranger. Instead of these being incompatible with beauty, they are directly accessory to it."—William Blaikie in How to Get Strong.

"The beautiful body is the muscular body. By this I do not mean the body all knotted and gnarled with huge muscles. I mean the body with muscles developed coordinately and in proportion; the body with muscles under perfect control, and to obtain this there is but one means—exercise."—Anna Pavlowa in Physical Culture.

BREATHING OF UTMOST IMPORTANCE

"Exercise induces greater circulation of the blood and hence makes one breathe deeper and with more regularity. So breathing is a fundamental of exercise and of physical perfection." But unless there is a conscious, intelligent effort to enlarge the chest and to strengthen the action of the diaphragm and other breathing muscles in full breathing the lungs may still be hindered from performing their life-giving part. Doctor William D. H. Brown tells us: "It is a known fact that all parts of the body waste if not exercised, and it is also true that overexercise will exhaust and destroy the vital force. It is a known fact that most of the greatest athletes of the day have broken down and become a prey to heart disease and tuberculosis; and why? Because the muscular system was exercised at the expense of the general vitality."

The respiratory specialist, P. von Boeckmann, referring to this same breaking down of athletes, asserts that "this loss of life is entirely needless and is due to a failure to develop the respiratory muscles commensurately with the voluntary muscles. Had a balance been maintained, he argues that the health would not have suffered, but on the contrary would have been greatly benefited by the muscular training." He tells us that "twenty minutes daily devoted to scientific breathing gymnastics is of more physical value than hours devoted to ordinary physical exercise. The main aim of every form of physical exercise is to stimulate the vital organs, the heart, lungs, liver, stomach and intestines. . . . But a week woman or a fat man can not exercise vigorously enough to reach the vital organs without collapsing from fatigue. Common sense dictates therefore that we should reach the vital machinery directly through deep breathing and internal exercise. Exercise the breathing muscles and the lungs through deep breathing. Stir up and massage the vital organs directly through internal exercise."

WHEN TO EXERCISE

"I would suggest light exercise the first thing in the morning—just enough to quicken the circulation. Take this before, not after the morning bath. Just before retiring, take the stronger muscular work. It will rest the brain, rest the tired part of the body and give flight to insomnia. . . . Midway between breakfast and the noon hour is the best time, physically considered, for any form of vigorous exercise."

"Proper exercise will rest you when ordinarily tired, if not too much exhausted. When one is tired it is seldom that he is tired all over. If this be true, then one set of muscles has been overworked. Rest them by working some other set. . . . When the brain is tired work the body."—Professor Edward B. Warman.

"Half an hour's exercise each day affects the whole character of the body, the mind and the day's accomplishment. It wakes you up and makes you feel energetic in the morning; and at night it sends you to bed feeling alive instead of 'just nearly dead.' No matter how tired one feels, whether it be from housework, office work, or social or domestic strain, the chances are ten to one that only a small part of one's powers are really exhausted."—Harriet U. Andrews in Physical Culture.

"Active exercise should never be taken directly after meals, as the blood is drawn from the stomach to the muscles and digestion is robbed of its supply and its action delayed. Judicious exercise shows its great value by balancing the circulation and restoring the equilibrium of blood supply. When an organ like the brain is at work, as in people doing a good deal of brain work, the blood flows to it and if continuous the brain is flushed with blood daily, so there may be danger of not getting rid of the surplus or congestion. In exercise we have the safety valve. It draws the blood to the muscles and the brain is thereby relieved. We see the same in the overworked digestive organs filled with fluid and blood. . . . Here again exercise is of value after the meal is digested, to move along the fluids and get rid of the excess of blood and then bring it to where it is needed, relieving the congestion to purify the stream. If the brain and the digestive organs are used freely at the same time, the individual suffers; one should rest while the other works."

"An hour of judicious exercise daily, divided up so as not to tire one, of walking and special exercises with plenty of deep breathing is invaluable."—Good Health and Long Life, by William D. H. Brown, M. D.

"Exercise should be taken in moderate doses, frequently repeated, to have the best effect."—Tyler.

"If a man who habitually works too long without a rest would every hour or so, turn lightly from his work, for even sixty seconds, to some vigorous exercise right in his office, or even in the next room or hallway, until the blood got out of his brain a little and the muscles tingled with a hearty glow, he would go back so refreshed as to quickly make up, both in the quantity and the quality of his work, for the time lost."—William Blaikie.

Is not this advice equally good for the woman who bends over her sewing or other confining and perhaps perplexing work until her nerves are strained and she is weary from head to foot? If, in addition, she would each time step to the door or window and take several deep, full breaths of fresh air, she would finish the day in much better condition.

A recent number of the Outlook tells of the welfare work for the employees of a large department store in New York City where, in the roof garden gymnasium at the noon hour, a girl may take a few minutes' "setting up" drill which will cause her to "feel rested and capable of attending to the wants of the most exacting Christmas shopper."

"The instructors teach the girls how to relieve their tired muscles and how to walk and stand so that they may rest themselves while at their work."

"Continuance of any set of exercises is what will bring good results. . . . I started exercising twenty-two years ago and I have kept at it every day since, so you see I believe firmly in 'stick-to-itiveness.' I have never taken a vacation because I keep always in perfect physical trim and hence need no period of rest. . . . I advise against violent exercising because it tends to overdevelop the individual muscles. I try to exercise all the muscles of my entire body in a gentle manner. This keeps all muscles developed in like proportion and hence means greater muscular health. . . . From ten to twenty minutes' exercise each day is ample for most persons."—Anna Pavlowa, in Physical Culture.

"Exercising with apparatus is optional. . . . Gymnasiums are all right in their place but their place is not always convenient nor accessible. It takes time to go, time to dress, time to return, and then it takes inclination and—money. . . . To meet the needs of the day we must meet them where they so often exist, at the home."—Professor E. B. Warman.

CAUTION

"One should be careful to go at exercise easy at first, until the heart and lungs are used to the change, for if the heart is not strong undue exercise might cause dilation of its walls and blocking of the heart. . . . This shows us all the more the value of keeping up deep breathing and being accustomed to some exercise daily. . . .

"The true object to be obtained is not to see how much exercise we can take and develop monstrous muscles, but to take sufficient daily, and of a kind to secure for us true physiological benefit; and to this end any system of easy, graceful movements that develop symmetrically all parts of the system, including the organic muscles, is what we need. In this way we shall strengthen the centers while doing the same for the surface muscles, and thus balance the two. At the same time we shall balance the equilibrium between the different nervous systems, as the spinal cord, the center for influencing the muscles of motion, and the sympathetic and pneumogastric nerves, the centers for influencing the organs of the body. . . . If the above idea be carried out, there would be no embarrassment of the system, no friction and less waste, greater freedom and ease of movement and no exhaustion, but an upbuilding in every way."—Doctor Brown.

A mother consulted the physician to the church in regard to gymnasium work for a delicate girl. His counsel was, "Go slow with gymnasium work." Doctor Brown says, "Our gymnasiums have ruined many a boy put to too vigorous work for his heart to stand." We might here repeat with profit the advice quoted in our January reading from Doctor Montessori: "A really physiological system of gymnastics requires that those movements and those exercises which are least easily performed should be practiced according to special methods until they have strengthened the less developed functions, without ever causing illness or producing harmful reactions."

FREEDOM AND FRESH AIR FOR EXERCISE

"The body when exercised cries out for freedom, and unless given that freedom the exercise is only partly efficacious. . . . I am opposed to corsets being worn at any time and unalterably opposed to corsets or tight-fitting gowns being worn during periods of exercise. . . .

"Some women need corsets but I do not believe any woman needs one of those sets of 'armor plate' . . . which have been so much in vogue recently. A girdle with plenty of elasticity will do quite as well for most women. . . .

"No matter if you slump together like an armful of dough when you take your corset off, exercise will educate your muscles, until they can take the place of steel props. And, moreover, only when you exercise persistently and faithfully, do you have the joy of seeing your abdomen recede, your chest fill out, and your shoulders straighten.

"Never in any circumstances should exercise be taken with a girdle or corset on. The gown should be loose and flowing and not too long."—Anna Pavlowa in Physical Culture.

"Exercise should be taken in a well-ventilated room," for as we have seen, fresh air is one of the first essentials in any effort for the upbuilding of the body.

Preserve this reading for reference with exercises to be given next month.

Bronson-Corbley Debate

Just a few items as to the Bronson-Corbley debate, held at Okanogan, December 10 to 19, which was a grand success; judging from the expressions of the audience, and the results that followed. Truth will prevail, especially when you have a good man back of it, and one that is endowed with the spirit of the work. The usual church propositions were discussed, including the divinity of the Book of Mormon, and the conscientious existence of man after death.

Reverend Corbley represented the church of God, of the faith of Abraham. He is president of his organization, west of the rockies. He is a man of ability, and has a spirit of stick-to-it-iveness, else in my opinion he could not have held out through the nine nights of two speeches each. He was not a "mud slinger," such as we usually meet, and deserves credit for trying to be fair. He did not try to confuse us with the Utah Church; hence did not accuse us of polygamy, or other false doctrines of that church, but manifested a spirit of fairness all through. The spirit of brotherly love characterized both speakers.

I must speak a few words of praise for Judge J. W. O'Keefe, who acted as chairman. He is a very prominent and well-known man, the mayor of the little town of Okanogan. His knowledge of parliamentary usages, and his years of experience as judge, made his services valuable to us. At the beginning of the debate, he told us he rather leaned toward the other side but would deal fairly with both sides, as he did. At the close of the debate he was leaning our way, and desired to purchase the Book of Mormon, and other reading matter. He said that in his opinion we had the best of the deal.

It all came about like this: Brother Bronson was holding a series of meetings in Okanogan last August, with good interest. Reverend Corbley appeared on the scene, and desired a debate then and there. Brother Bronson being satisfied with the interest in his meeting and not desiring to interrupt it, signed up propositions for a later date. Corbley remarked before the discussion, that his guns were always loaded, and that he was ready for business. But to his surprise, before proceeding far he discovered that he had loaded his guns with the wrong ammunition, especially on the Book of Mormon proposition (this was admitted). His principal hobby was the total annihilation of the wicked after death, which, of course, was easily upset by Brother Bronson.

As for Brother Bronson, I must say that his efforts were excellent. He is an able defender of the work. When his turn came, he would arise and clear away the confusing argument produced by his opponent, and present the gospel in its simplicity, in a way that was convincing to many.

At the close of the debate (just before dismissing) a gentleman arose and stated his appreciation for the opportunity of attending the debate, and that light had come to him, also that he was convinced that we had the truth, and that he desired to unite with us. Baptism was arranged for the following Sunday. A great-grandson of Brigham Young was also convinced, and asked for baptism. He is a bright young man, and a leader among the boys at school. We have hopes of our young brother, Raymond Young.

Last, but not least, we would mention our worthy brother, Dana McDole, who for the past four years had been employed as cashier of the leading bank of Okanogan. He had a large circle of friends, and is highly esteemed by all. It was through his noble efforts and those of his good wife, that the work was opened up at that place. He is going to organize a Sunday school, and hold regular services every Sunday. Thus we see the good work going on, and souls being born in the kingdom.

Rejoicing in the gospel, I remain,

Your brother,

SIDNEY M. GRAY.

SPOKANE, WASHINGTON, 231 South Smith Street, December 26, 1914.

OMAHA, NEBRASKA, December 25, 1914.

Editors Herald: The many people of our Nation are no doubt celebrating the holiday in divers manners. It is now about three o'clock p. m., and I have confined myself to my cozy room to write this message.

While my wife and the "dearest boy in the world" are hundreds of miles away, I have no complaint to enter. While it is impossible to be with them, the next best is to know we have many good Saints who are willing to do all reasonable to make the lonely missionary happy. With all that friends can do for one who is away from loved ones, it is very necessary that he or she occasionally treat with an application of "mental therapeutics." Happiness comes from within, you know, and some can be miserable while the beauties of happiness surround them.

The seventy is sometimes called "the traveling missionary." Well, I have been one in reality this conference year. I was appointed to labor in the Central Nebraska District. I have been in the district about a month up to this time. I wonder if I'll be among the "down-and-outs next spring." That is neither a slap nor a stab. The Quorum of Twelve may make mistakes in this "culling out business," but I want to go on record with a big, loud amen for their start in the direction of a better qualified ministry! Now after that sweet compliment they surely won't drop me.

Here is a condition I observed once, and it is only one of the many existing. A pastor was quietly doing his work. He had not been in all homes yet, but had made a special effort to visit those who needed it most. A missionary came to the branch, and at once got busy at the "visiting business," and at the same time took pains to tell the folks the pastor should visit more!

I am going to come right out flat-footed and confess my weakness in that "visiting program." (Maybe that is the reason I'm sticking up for the pastor.) I have long since concluded that if some would do a little more studying and prepare to give people a little "lightning" instead of so much "unconnected, bombastic thunder" there might be fewer dropped; and if those so wonderfully blessed with visiting qualities would occasionally visit the shut-ins, the aged, and the sick instead of dropping around where the picking is good, and attending "ladies aid and pink-tea parties" there would be less such phrases as the following in our church publications: "Elder So-and-so dropped for cause."

Some may wonder why I stated that I have this year been a traveling missionary in reality. I mean I have unavoidably donated quite freely to the railroad companies. However I have, under some very trying conditions, done about as much church work including preaching as the average missionary. I was in Omaha about two months this summer unable to be on my feet much, but studied hard all that time. When I became able I conducted a series of meetings here, by request of the Saints and consent of Brother Gillen. I then went to my field of labor and did about one month's work, when I was called to Independence, Missouri, my wife being there in the Sanitarium. I remained in Independence more than a month, and was given plenty to do during my stay. The meetings conducted there at various places have been freely spoken of through the church papers, but I want to state that I never enjoyed a series of meetings better.

In small branches we find some who are not living up to their privileges. There being so many gathered at Independence, one may find a great many who are stumbling-blocks and side-steppers, but as some have misconstrued some of my statements as delivered in sermons, and have seemingly tried to make me "an offender for a word," I want to emphasize the fact that there are many, many zealous and clean Saints in Independence as any age has ever witnessed, with the possible exception of Enoch's city of old. We too frequently judge the multitude by a few hypocrites and floating chunks! I never in my life received a warmer welcome from any people than I did from the great multitude of Independence Saints and some nonmembers. If they appreciate your work they let you know it, and such encouragement is priceless if taken sanely.

No sooner had my wife left the Sanitarium than I took ill and was taken there and remained about one week. The care I got while there shall never be forgotten. My wife and I often speak of the Sanitarium and its noble band of pleasant workers.

There is one institution in Independence I seldom see mention of only in a general way, and that is the Order of Enoch House, a place for the weary traveler, a place where one is made welcome even though he has neither silver nor gold, a place where the atmosphere is Christian in reality—service to man! I learned to love every noble heart that beats under its roof, and upon leaving, tears were shed when good-bys were reluctantly said. Brother and Sister Gurwell can not be praised too highly for the service they are rendering the church in running this institution. We may laud and praise the man who can thrill a congregation with music or oratory, but let us not forget there are those who are quietly, unassumingly serving the church, who need our support and praise. Brother and Sister Gurwell, your noble example and words of encouragement shall never be forgotten by me.

Later I took my wife and child to her folks who live near Cincinnati, Ohio, and there they will remain till after General Conference, when we hope to get located. Returning from the East, I stopped at Chicago for a few days. On a Sunday morning I attended services at the South Side Church. We partook of the Lord's supper and drank in the peaceful influence of his Holy Spirit for more than an hour. I spoke at the First Church in the evening to a splendid congregation, and how glad I felt to see so many noble young people joining with the older ones in making the work a success.

In my ministerial experience I never enjoyed myself better than I did during this short stay in Chicago. While in the city I made my home with Brother and Sister Dowker. I must say they understand the art of making one feel freely at home. If a person can't be happy in their presence he ought to be at home or some other seaport town. Brother Dowker knows the city of Chicago from A to Z, therefore proved himself a guide. Leaving Chicago for the West, I fell in company with Brother Arthur Allen, which made the trip to Kansas City the more pleasant.

Before continuing my trip toward my field I learned of the death of our noble President. I remained over and attended the very impressive service, with its many good-bys to one of God's noble sons. At the time I was delivering some lectures and sermons at the Stone Church, Sister Smith invited me to the house. I accepted, and for the first time visited with the Prophet in his humble home. I shall never forget the pleasant feeling that accompanied our conversation. A few days later Sister Miller and I returned to his home with our son Duane, and the aged Prophet blessed him. He was the last child he blessed, a matter of history to hand down to our son. His name is Melville Duane. When we gave Brother Joseph the name, he wittingly replied, "He is rather young to be an M. D." The hearty laugh that attended the joke rings in my ears to-day.

I came to Omaha shortly before the holidays, and Brother and Sister Walter Lowe invited me to spend the holidays with them. (My birthday being on the twenty-ninth, I have an extra one, you see.) If all the Saints in the world were as free-hearted and sociable as they, the breakers o'er which the missionary sails would be calmed for ever. I must not forget to mention that by invitation I spent Christmas eve with Brother Mormoy's family, of this place. I was not forgotten when the presents were delivered from the tree. The spirit that surrounded the useful little gift made the moment sweet.

The missionary in charge has kindly asked me to visit Lincoln, Nebraska, and deliver a few sermons before I proceed to my field. I shall respond.

How cruel we sometimes are in judging our fellow men without knowing the motive that prompts them to action. I am glad the missionary in charge has known my every move, and why I made it, and that he is considerate and kind. It does one much good to know that the one in charge of a mission tries to be a coworker, and not a boss.

Some of the most serious trials of my life have been during the past year, and yet the greatest success of my missionary experience has at times gladdened my heart. I have not baptized many, but I have spoken to the largest crowds ever, and have rejoiced to see men of learning and refinement declaring that we have the best thing going in the way of religion. People are getting tired of "myths" and "nuts," and as we eliminate hobgoblins and ghosts and come out plain about some so-called "inspired absurdities," and stand first of all for scriptural ethics and practical Christianity—I repeat, as we begin to do this we will see scientists, philosophers and many men of renown begin to listen and investigate. We have a message for them, and I think they have souls to save as well as the miserable sinners in the gutter and the loafers on Market Square!

I believe in trying to solve the problems of the day instead of creating more for the coming generation to solve. In fact, there is enough of the scripture that we already understand if put to practice would leave no time for mystery hunting.

When God Almighty declared unless you are equal in temporal things you can not be equal in spiritual things, he spoke a truth, which if complied with would drive out for ever greed, class hatred and their result—war! If men and women in the church believed that statement sufficiently to half way comply with it, it would begin to eliminate division, erase the circles that divide society, and for ever blot out the "four hundred" spirit. In a word, it would enlist one and all in the army of the Good Samaritan. If we do not willingly bring this about we will suffer!

Paul hit the keynote when he stated that the love of money is the root of all evil. If many of the members of our church did not so dearly love the dollar the missionary would not have to be running all over the country trying to find a place to leave his wife and children with relatives. People so often say, "I feel so sorry for the missionary." That helps some, but it does not fill the stomach or clothe the body. A minister should not be asked to accept a smaller allowance or live cheaper than any other member of the church. There is not a jot of law for any such absurdity! Some of the younger men have begun to wonder if all this talk about equality, inheritance, etc., is a huge joke or just a failure.

To utter a doubt is inviting accusation of infidelity. To speak the truth is to be a crank. We sometimes hear criticisms galore. Some are constructive; some would be destructive if we allowed them to worry us; others are amusing. Quite frequently a kick is a boost. The man who growls has sometimes only been jarred loose from hibernating, and even though he snaps and snarls, thank God, he can't bite! for he has lived the life (?) so long as he has lost his teeth. If men do not agree with you, that's not so bad. If they accuse you, well, they also accused the Christ. Be honest even though you are a heretic.

Your brother in the onward march,

O. R. MILLER.

MARLIN, TEXAS, December 27, 1914.

Editors Herald: On account of unfavorable weather the Saints here have not had the privilege of meeting together for five weeks. We have enjoyed good times the past fall and summer. We had Brother W. M. Aylor with us in the summer, who gave us good advice. He will find a hearty welcome any time he wishes to return.

The writer has done some traveling in behalf of the church this past summer and has baptized eleven since July 4. We look for others to be baptized when the weather moderates. I desire to see the good work go on.

We had the best reunion and conference in Central Texas District this year that we have had in fifteen years. In one of the prayer services the interest was so marked by the Spirit's presence that the time was extended over the morning preaching service. This meeting will long be remembered. The promise of God at this time in encouragement to the Saints is being fulfilled. The work is handicapped here as elsewhere by some who do not do all their part.

Our house burned on September 9, yet we saved some of our things. The loss was about two hundred dollars. The house was burned while I was away from home trying to adjust church matters. Our neighbors helped us with twenty-two dollars and twenty-five cents, for which we are thankful. We trust there will be some way provided in which we may get along.

If we wish to see Zion redeemed we must obey all the law as well as the first principles. May we learn what there is to do and then do it.

That the Lord may bless his children everywhere, is my prayer.

Your brother,

B. F. SPICER.

WEST JONESPORT, MAINE, December 29, 1914.

Editors Herald: I am still rejoicing in the restored gospel, the angelic message, and the great plan of salvation designed by the Master for the redemption of mankind. How the soul thrills and the heart rejoices at its sound. The happiness, peace and contentment it gives can only be realized by those who have complied with its requirements and felt its teaching and vibrating power. When thinking of the years I have been a member of this church and of the little progress I have made, I sometimes feel unworthy to be called a child of God. Nevertheless, I have never regretted the step, and can truly say that the best moments of my life have been those devoted to the Master's cause.

Had it not been for the hope I have had in the gospel, there have been times when I think I would have given up in despair. But the power which accompanies this work is sufficient to bear us up under all conditions of life, no matter how painful or disagreeable; and though rough the journey and steep the pathway, and though we may falter at times and fail to accomplish that which we intended, yet deep down in our hearts there is that still, small voice whispering peace to the weary soul and the troubled mind, and we feel, as it were, the protecting arm of God about us, and trustingly place our hands confidently in his and say, "Thy will O Lord, not mine be done."

The closer we draw to God the nearer he will draw to us, and the obstacles which seem to bar our progress in divine life are removed and we can go on our way rejoicing. If ever a people had cause to rejoice this people has, for they are favored as the chosen seed of Israel.

It makes our hearts glad to see others seeking the kingdom. December 6, Brother H. O. Smith led two precious souls into the waters of baptism. Brother Smith is an efficient man and wields the sword of righteousness with skill. God grant he may live to a good old age, and bring many more into the church. We have missed Brother Ebeling since he went away. He was called home by the death of his dear mother. We have missed his live-wire sermons. He presents the words of God with such plainness that a wayfaring man though esteemed a fool need not err therein.

We are thankful that the gospel has been restored and that God once more has established his church and kingdom here upon the earth. It is my desire to remain true to the covenant which I have made with my heavenly Father, and that I may set a good example before those with whom I associate, causing them to see that the gospel has had a profiting influence upon my life.

Ever praying for the prosperity of God's people, I am,

Sincerely yours,

MRS. LEWIS A. FAULKINGHAM.

Extracts from Letters

Brother Clyde F. Ellis writes from Papeete, Tahiti, under date of February 8: "Everything is moving along very well in the islands considering the war conditions in the East, which are affecting the islands financially to some extent. The church here in Taronia is well near completion, which when completed will assist in beautifying the church property. Brother May's are preparing to leave here in March, so that they may be able to attend General Conference, a privilege they well deserve. Trust that the Spirit of the Master will predominate throughout the coming conference."

Sister J. Charles May writes from Papeete, Tahiti, under date of February 10: "Brother May and myself are anxiously awaiting the March steamer which will carry us to America once more, after an absence of five years from our loved ones. Kindly remember us that we may arrive safely, as it is very dangerous traveling on the ocean these days. The native Saints throughout this mission are mourning greatly over the death of Brother Joseph."

Sister Whiteside, of 73 North Thorn Street, Wabash, Indiana: "Environment in the city is bad, and we wish to locate somewhere in the country. My son is twenty-five years old, and a good farmer. He longs to be among the Saints where he can have church privileges and do his duty. He is working in the paper mills at present, and the confinement is not good for him."

In a personal letter from Columbus, Ohio, dated February 3, Elder Gomer T. Griffiths says: "I returned home from Dayton last Monday where I baptized two, a man and his wife. My wife is not able to move about the house as yet. She is gaining a little every day, but slowly. We will have three district conferences to attend this month. I will start west the first week in March, as I want to call at Canton, Illinois. My sister is still very poorly and I want to visit Bevier and see another sister who is about seventy-five years of age, also see my mother's and father's graves. I also have a brother living there. The Twelve meet in Independence on March 18. The time will soon pass by. I fell on the ice last night, hurt my arm and hand, hence am not feeling very good to-day. I was quite sick for about three hours this morning. Am feeling much better at present. I do not have much sickness as a rule. The Lord has been kind to me,—hardly ever have a pain. The weather has been very bad here for a long time. Snow and rain most of the time. It is quite a contrast from the Australian summer with lovely weather."

Sister Josie Helms, Sweet Lake, Louisiana: "I read God's word and understand most of it. I wish I could have the pleasure of being with the Saints, and wonder if the time will ever come when I can take my children among them, where they can be taught to live a pure life. I would like to hear from any of the Saints. I would enjoy reading a few Autumn Leaves if they could be sent to me.

Elder F. G. Pitt, Columbus, Ohio: "I am still at Columbus, but close our meetings to-night, a series of ten meetings, which have been quite successful. A splendid interest maintained throughout. I trust some good is accomplished. If so, to God belongs all the praise. We leave for Akron tomorrow to be present at the district conference."

Palestine

Since Brother Greene and Brother and Sister Koehler left us, conditions seem to have conspired to keep us here. We made the matter an earnest subject of prayer, and we believe the Lord has been directing us; we have no fears of the final results. We find however, that a fireless hearth is very cold and uncomfortable in winter, and we wish spring were here. But that does not bring it nearer. So we must wait and watch and pray and be thankful that things are as good as they are.

Our chief trouble just now is to obtain financial aid. In this we can not help ourselves. We are dependent on those at the other end of the line, and we shall be thankful if some means is found by which we may obtain money. We also ask an earnest interest in the prayers of the Saints.

Services are held as usual: preaching and prayer and testimony meetings, Sunday school and Religio.

"When dark clouds of trouble hang o'er us,
And threaten our peace to destroy,
There is Hope smiling brightly before us,
And we know that deliv'rance is nigh;
We doubt not the Lord nor his goodness,
We've proved him in days that are past,
We know we can trust him at present,
His peace will be ours at last."

We shall be glad to hear from our friends and others whenever they may find the opportunity. We are all enjoying good health at present, for which blessing we are very thankful. We trust that the way will soon open that the message of "peace and good will" may go forth among all nations; that a knowledge of God and the Redeemer may come to those who are still sitting in darkness.

The world seems to be groping in greater darkness at present than it did some years ago. The new theology seems to be taking hold of many. And to the question, "What think ye of Christ; whose Son was he?" the answer is, "Joseph's." Whereas Jesus himself says: Blessed art thou Simon, son of Jona, because the Father has revealed unto thee that Christ was the Son of God.

To others, and perhaps to this same class, the atonement seems to have become a stumblingblock. To them Jesus simply suffered as many others had done before and after him for truth's sake. So it seems the ministry of the church must in the future meet these questions and meet them intelligently also. May we prepare ourselves to do the work intended of God.

In bonds,

REES JENKINS.

Eastern Montana

Calls for preaching are coming faster than I can begin to fill them. This is certainly a hard field to labor in, as many of the Saints are homesteaders and this is their first year. I find many good, honest souls, however, who make the missionary's heart rejoice, and who are always willing to do all they can to help push the work along. When the Lord comes to gather in his jewels I am sure these will be found among the wise virgins. And again, I find others who have plenty of this world's goods but who are not so ready to help.

I would that all could partake of the same spirit as did one sister I met. I went to her place to hold meetings and when I was leaving she asked me to accept two dollars. I told her I would not. Tears came to her eyes and she said she wished it were more. She seemed to think I declined because she had such a small amount. I told her I could not accept of any amount from her.

These people had just sold all their seed grain in order to pay what they owed. Her husband does not belong to the church, but he certainly would be a good example for some of the Saints to follow. He was as anxious for me to take the money as the sister was. I pray the good Lord to bless them in every way. If this sister continues she certainly will have a crown.

I opened up nine new places this year where the gospel was never preached before. Just received a letter from Red Stone, a place I opened up last summer, where I baptized three and organized a Sunday school. They have sent for me to come and baptize five more. So the good work goes on.

One thing I regret to note is that in many places the Saints do not take the HERALD or the Ensign. This, in my judgment, is a mistake. If there is anything that will keep the Saints up spiritually, it is contact with the church through the church papers.

I often meet people who have been brought into the church by reading the papers. I met one sister on my last trip who told me that the first time she ever saw an Ensign she was reading a sermon, and when about half through a voice spoke to her and told her that the man after whom she was reading was the one who would baptize her. She looked up to the heading and saw the sermon was by Joseph Luff. Two years after this her presentment was fulfilled. This is only one of many instances where people have been brought into the church through the papers.

Wishing the HERALD success in its mission, and praying for a good spiritual conference, I remain,

Your brother and colaborer,

R. NEWBY.

FAIRVIEW, MONTANA, March 2, 1915.

Western Oklahoma and Panhandle in Texas

Butterfly snowflakes are merrily dancing in the air, being tossed about by the wind, while the earth wears a robe of whiteness; indicating that old "King Winter" has not yet released his grip on Mother Earth. The precipitation has been heavy for Oklahoma. We have not been permitted to see the face of the sun for a whole week, and in this land of sunshine this is quite an exception.

The last two nights the rain has prevented our meeting, since about the time of service the rain began to fall, which continued all night in both instances. While the weather is a little too wet for preaching in the rural districts, it is quite cheering to the farmer, since it means a favorable seedtime for him.

While our work in this field is not what we would like it to be, it is encouraging to us to find people who are anxious to hear the gospel. We are also glad to see our young men coming to the front in church work. It is men we are needing in this field, men who are not afraid of work, and who are ready and willing to sacrifice personal desires for the universal good of humanity.

It is indeed gratifying to see the spirit of altruistic service growing in the church. Men and women are beginning to grasp the spirit of the Master's words: "It is more blessed to give than to receive." True service is the only thing that will give life to the church. May each find his place, and then develop until the highest state of efficiency has been reached.

Hopefully,

J. E. VANDERWOOD.

WOODWARD, OKLAHOMA, March 4, 1915.

Oregon

The writer has just concluded a series of meetings at this place. Just before it, one was held at Bandon. Each lasted for about two weeks. There was only one night's intermission between them. The two efforts embraced thirty-four sermons. Rainy weather hindered some of the services, but on the whole the attendance and interest were good.

Some believe there is not as much interest in religion in this country as there used to be, and especially when it comes to revivals or protracted meetings. My experience here appears to contradict this supposition. When I was in Indiana, however, last year, I saw unmistakable signs of spiritual degeneration. Much depends, no doubt, upon the effort made to attract the public notice. We had bills printed for advertising our meetings here.

Six were baptized during the meetings at Bandon. None have been baptized here of late, but quite a number are intensely interested. I feel encouraged in relation to my work in Oregon so far. In the main, I have enjoyed excellent liberty in presenting the word, and my labors in general have been attended by divine light and joy. What a pleasure it is to preach the gospel, and otherwise work for the Master!

I note with pleasure the news from the Australian Mission. The church has some excellent material over there. This is especially true of the young people, and it applies to both sexes, too. I am glad that Brother Griffiths was sent there. His long experience in apostolic work and his well-known ability as an organizer would enable him to be of assistance to the work. The Australian young men have always been willing and even anxious to do missionary work.

The Australian brethren have not always had a fair representation in the matter of baptisms. The American missionaries, especially if they remain a short time, baptize people that the older missionaries and local workers have prepared, and yet these converts sometimes appear as if they were instantaneous. I baptized twenty-five people during the first three months I was there, and they were all, or nearly so, prepared by Elder G. R. Wells. Since my return to America a brother missionary said: "You did much better when you first went to Australia than you did toward the last. You baptized more people." It was true that my outward showing was greater at first. Soon after Elder Wight and I arrived there was a large number of baptisms, and a general increase in church activity. The church historian called it "a revival." The same happened under Elders Pitt, Davis, and Robertson, and again under Brethren Griffiths and Miller, but those who have remained there for years know how much hard work it takes to make the revivals possible. As a matter of fact, I did more hard work during the latter part of my stay than at any other time.

The conference of the Southwestern Oregon District was held here February 20 and 21. Elder F. J. Chatburn was elected district president and Elder A. A. Baker vice president. Both of these brethren were formerly missionaries. All parts of the district were represented, and there was the usual attendance. The district is small, there being only three branches, and one of these is not active. One important feature of the conference was the organization of a district Religion association.

I am thinking seriously of the General Conference, and will probably be there. In gospel bonds,

A. C. BARMORE.

News from Branches

Omaha, Nebraska

Sunday, February 28, J. W. Wight occupied in the morning, and F. A. Smith in the evening. We are surely being blessed with excellent sermons. Brother C. T. Self was ordained to the office of priest under the hands of J. W. Wight and P. N. Craig.

The church choir with a number of the Sunday school children will render the cantata, "David, the shepherd boy," in costume, at the church Friday evening, March 19. Much time has been spent in practicing, and an excellent entertainment is anticipated.

Sunday, March 7, Rudolph Etzenhouser delivered two interesting lectures on "Book of Mormon characters." The sacrament service was postponed until 2.30 p. m., and was very well attended. The branch officers had mailed a number of invitations, and were well pleased with the result. Many spiritual testimonies were given, and Brother J. C. Howe spoke in prophecy to a number of the Saints, also to the body that the Lord was pleased with their meeting together, but admonished them to come up higher.

CURRENT EVENTS

British steamers and a British auxiliary cruiser have been sunk by German submarines. The destruction by Russian vessels of important Turkish coaling ports on the south coast of the Black Sea is reported. A German submarine has been sunk by a British destroyer. Further successes on the part of the allied fleet in the Dardanelles is reported. The allied fleet at Smyrna is said to have given the Turkish garrison twenty-four hours in which to surrender, under threat of bombardment. Supplementing an act at the beginning of the war allowing governmental control of all works where munitions of war were made, the House of Commons on the 9th authorized the British Government to take over control of all works capable of being used in the manufacture of arms and ammunition. Premier Venezelos and cabinet of Greece have resigned because King Constantine did not approve their policy to enter the war on the side of the allies, and a new cabinet has been formed, pledged to neutrality. Speculations with reference to the probability of the countries of Roumania, Bulgaria, and Italy entering the war have been revived with the success of the allied fleet at the Dardanelles, with the opinion expressed in many quarters that their interests in the near East may furnish the determining factor in their final action.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

ELDER GREENWOOD REACHES AMERICA.—We have received the following from Elder W. H. Greenwood, minister in charge of the British Isles Mission:

"On Board S. S. Arabic, March 13, 1915.

"Editors Herald: Just a word to say that I arrived in safety in New York on the above date. I am feeling well in health, and I am also thankful for a safe journey across the great deep. The passage was a pleasant one, though somewhat rough in point of weather."

RAILROAD RATES TO CONFERENCE AND CONVENTIONS

Interstate tariffs, increasing fares, which were to have been effective March 1, have been suspended by the Interstate Commerce Commission pending a hearing, so that all rates covering the East and Middle West remain at two cents per mile: "and that is as low as can be made and as low as are made for any other conventions of any kind in any other cities."

Rates from Pacific Coast territory are not granted because of limited attendance therefrom; however, usual spring rates to Missouri River and points further east may be taken advantage of. Make inquiry of local and general agents.

Certain roads make limited reductions to ministers and lay delegates from Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, and at times from Pittsburgh and Buffalo. Such will be duly announced if secured. Persons interested should consult Brethren E. H. Fisher, Winter Hill, Boston, Massachusetts; E. B. Hull, 1339 Prospect Place, Brooklyn, New York; W. W. Smith, 112 West Ontario Street, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. Buffalo and Pittsburgh, consult passenger departments of railway lines.

The Burlington Route will furnish sleeping, chair, and special car service from Chicago, Saint Louis, and Kansas City to Lamoni, Iowa, to parties sufficient in number to justify such special service, provided delegates are grouped and travel together in required numbers, and if notified in time to make arrangements therefor. If those who heretofore have gathered such parties together, from Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Canada, and adjacent territory will notify Mr. P. S. Eustis, Passenger Traffic Manager, Burlington Building, Chicago, Illinois, or the undersigned, such provision will be duly made. Eastern representatives have been communicated with and advised to make such arrangements.

Take notice that trains numbers 111 and 112 running between Chariton, Iowa, and Saint Joseph and Kansas City, will run direct to Lamoni, Iowa, April 1 to April 8 inclusive. Such trains will also be run to Lamoni during certain closing days of the General Conference. This service with trains numbers 113 and 114 to Lamoni from the same points, and with trains numbers 109 and 110 running to Lamoni to and from Des Moines through Osceola, Iowa, will furnish desirable train service direct to place of meeting.

The following is for the information of missionaries and others from the East: New York Central, single trip fare New York to Chicago, $21.10; party of ten using one ticket, $18.15; clergy rate $10.55. West Shore, single trip fare New York to Chicago, $19.10; clergy rate, $10.55. Pennsylvania, single trip fare New York to Chicago, $21.10; party of ten using one ticket, $18.15; clergy rate $10.55. Baltimore and Ohio, single trip New York to Chicago, $19.10; party of ten using one ticket $17; clergy rate $10.55. Erie, single trip fare New York to Chicago, $19.10; party of ten using one ticket, $16.75; clergy rate, $10.55. Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, and Lehi Valley, single trip fare New York to Chicago, $19.10; clergy rate, $10.55.

The Delaware, Lackawanna and Western and the Baltimore and Ohio will issue trip permits to ministers who have not annual clergy permits, on application to passenger departments of said roads; other roads may do so. All are supplied with General Conference Minutes showing appointments.

For rates Philadelphia to Chicago, see agents of various lines, and consult W. W. Smith, as above.

R. S. SALYARDS, Church Secretary.

To Whom It May Concern

Unless clear divine intervention shall occur to forbid, it is probable that my official work as Church Physician will cease ere the close of the General Conference in April next, as my resignation is already in the hands of the proper authorities. Without here assigning reasons for this, I hope credit will be given me for being at least conscientious in it. I have appreciated the honor and tried to honestly meet the obligations of the office; but what service I render as a physician to the Saints or others hereafter I prefer shall be without the official title that has heretofore attached.

As long as I continue in practice, however, my treatment by mail, my rules and my rates will remain unchanged. Everybody—inside or outside the church, will be welcome to any service I can render as a physician, and to medicine, regardless of whether they can pay or not. All missionaries and the portions of their families dependent upon their church allowance, who may wish my services, and all poor persons will be treated without charge. The object of this advance announcement is to emphasize this fact, lest some should think I resign to escape this class. They are my special desire, and my intention is to be a physician to the church and to mankind (unless God shall direct otherwise) as devotedly as I have been, with only the difference that the official title shall not be mine. If the motive and the work be acceptable to God, the absence of the title will not forfeit his blessing upon what I do after that title is surrendered. If more faithful service from me than heretofore, in this or any other line, to the church and humanity, be possible for me in the future, I expect to render it, such being my only life object. I wish all to feel that they will have the same claim on me as heretofore, not, however, because I am "Church Physician," but because I am a brother.

Earnestly praying that the divine benediction which alone sanctifies with success, may attend the work of whoever may hereafter carry the official title I am dropping, as well as upon the continued unofficial services I may render, I remain,

Yours for the good to be done,

JOSEPH LUFF.

Graceland Home-coming Day

It has been decided to celebrate Wednesday, April 7, 1915, as Graceland Home-coming Day in commemoration of the 20th year of Graceland's work as a school. We hope all former students and alumni will make a special effort to be present on this day and renew their college life and acquaintances as well as assist to keep alive the true Graceland spirit. We are sure all former students will enjoy this one more day at Graceland. Do not forget the date, April 7, but get here in time to celebrate with us.

RUBY BAGULEY, Secretary Alumni Association.

General Conference Visitors

For information of those planning to attend General Conference, Lamoni, Iowa, beginning April 6, 1915, as also Religio and Sunday school conventions, beginning April 2, the committee appointed by Lamoni Branch wish to say:

The Saints of Lamoni will have a first-class dining hall in operation, serving meals to all who wish them at the following prices: Club breakfasts 10, 15, and 20 cents; dinner 25 cents; supper 20 cents.

Those in charge of dining hall wish to get in touch with a forelady who will take this position during the time it is open for meals. There are also a few opportunities for those wishing to serve tables in payment for their meals. Send these applications to Amos Berve, Lamoni, Iowa, at once.

Entertainment in homes will cost those who make such arrangements $4.50 per week, board and lodging. Lodging and breakfast will be served in homes to those unable to go out to breakfast, at reasonable prices.

Rooms in private homes will be $1 per person per week.

In order to the best work by the committee, those contemplating attending should not delay in letting the committee know that they are coming, fully informing the committee of their needs and wants. Should one who is badly crippled be assigned a place which would put him out of reach of the conference, the committee could not be justly blamed if proper information had not been handed them. Will you, therefore, write your letter along the following lines:

1. When are you coming, and how long do you expect to remain.
2. Give the full names of the persons for whom you write.

March 13, 1915.

In All The World No Trip Like This

It's almost a man's duty as an educational process, to take his family, while the railroad fares to California have been cut in two and visit the great Expositions at San Francisco and San Diego; seeing on the way out the marvelous Mountain Scenery of Colorado—Denver, Colorado Springs, Pikes Peak, Pueblo, the stupendous and world-famous Royal Gorge, and Salt Lake City. Then you should return by way of the North Pacific Coast and either Glacier or Yellowstone National Park. You will never have the same opportunity and if you use the through Pullman service of the Burlington Route (C. B. & Q. R. R.) or join one of those comfortable, economical and care-free Personally Conducted Excursions, you can see the wonders of Colorado without extra cost, for you will pass all those most interesting points by daylight. Don't forget that. Here's the idea! Sit right down and write or come in and tell me how many expect to make the trip, just when you want to go, the points you want to visit, how long you expect to stay, and I will plan a trip especially fitted to your time and needs—then you will know all about it. If you decide to go, I will make arrangements for your complete trip, when the time comes for you to start. Do it to-day—before you forget it.

Resurrection

By Grace Baughman

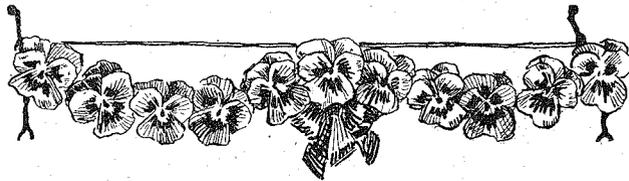

Night o'er the hills of Judah---darkness and gloom and death
Down in the storm-racked city, lying in awe beneath
The shadow---when lightnings quiver---of Calvary's thorn-crowned cross,
To wake in the unborn future and know of its bitter loss.

Numb were the hearts that loved him; drowned in the depth of fears
Was the faith that centered 'round him. The joy of the coming years
Was rent as the temple curtain. The hopes of the time to be
Were lost in the cry of the Savior, "Why hast thou forsaken me?"

Yet ever there comes before me another---a scene of light,
The dew drenched morn and a wild bird singing away the night;
The stone rolled back and the women trembling in awe and fear,
At the words of the guarding angel, "He is risen. He is not here."

Ah, Master of all, thou camest that morning to Magdalene;
And again on the road to Emmaus the light of thy face was seen:
Cheered by thy loving presence was the faithful eleven's board
Reproached by thy mild upbraiding, consoled by thy gentle word.

O soul, that in pain is groping in Calvary's darkest night,
Look up where the stars are watching: to-morrow will come the light;
The shadows will flee and tremble in the blaze of eternal day,
And from the door of the spirit the stone shall be rolled away.

JESUS AS THE RESTORER OF SIGHT TO THE BLIND

(Synopsis of a sermon delivered by Elbert A. Smith at Lamoni, Iowa, January 25, 1915.)

Lesson reading: The healing of the blind man at Bethsaida, Mark 8: 22-25; the healing of blind Bartimæus, Mark 11: 46-52; the healing of the blind man at the pool of Siloam, John 9: 1-25.

Text: The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovery of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord.—Luke 4: 18.

A SABBATH DAY IN NAZARETH

Our text takes us back to Nazareth. It is the Sabbath Day. The men and women of Nazareth are wending their way toward the synagogue. Thither also goes Jesus of Nazareth; known to us as the Son of God, known to the Nazarenes only as the son of Joseph the carpenter, and Mary.

His is a familiar form on the streets of Nazareth, for this is his home town, the city where he has spent his boyhood days. His face is familiar in the synagogue also, for the record tells us that it was his custom to go to the synagogue on the Sabbath Day. In other words, he is a regular churchgoer. He does not come at intervals only,—he comes every Sabbath.

He enters the synagogue. It is much like all other Jewish synagogues. The interior is merely a large, plain, rectangular room. The men sit at one side; the women, heavily veiled, sit at the other side, behind screens. The eyes of the young men will not be distracted from the preacher to gaze upon the fair maidens of Nazareth. There will be no exchange of written notes or whispered confidences.

At one end of the room stands the ark or chest containing the books of the law, and by its side a raised platform with a desk on which the reader may rest the books or scrolls of the law and the prophets. It is the custom to read first an extract from the law and second an extract from the prophets; the reading being arranged to cover the law in a cycle of three years, with consecutive readings from Sabbath to Sabbath.

JESUS IN THE PULPIT

On this occasion the ruler of the synagogue invites Jesus to read for the people. He comes forward, receives the book from the minister whose duty it is to care for such things, and, because the selection from the law has already been read, or because he chooses to omit it, he turns to Isaiah and reads the passage contained in my text.

Having read standing, as the custom is, he hands the book to the minister, and seats himself to deliver the discourse, again observing the custom.

His first words are charged with meaning: "This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears." Thus he announces his Messiahship, explains his mission, outlines his program.

He says in substance: I am he of whom the prophet spoke when he said, The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor, he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovery of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord.

At first the people listen with astonishment, mixed with pleasure; but as the full meaning of his first announcement dawns upon them, and particularly as he proceeds to rebuke them for their faults, a change comes over them. They are filled with wrath. They rise up and tear him from the synagogue and thrust him from the town, attempting to fling him down the steep hillside to his death. But his time has not come, and he passes safely through their midst and is gone.

NEVER TO RETURN

Never again, so far as the record shows, did he return to Nazareth. Never again, so far as we know, was his voice heard in that old synagogue. He too up his residence in Capernaum. He and his message had been rejected by his own people in his own home town.

It is a dangerous thing to reject the message of Jesus, even when it comes in rebuke. Let us not make that mistake here.

Many themes are suggested by this text: Jesus as the preacher of the gospel; Jesus as the healer of broken hearts; Jesus as the liberator of captives; Jesus as the restorer of sight to the blind.

We can consider only one of these themes, and have selected the one last mentioned: Jesus as the restorer of sight to the blind.

WHAT WOULD IT MEAN TO YOU TO BE BLIND?

Did you ever stop to think what it would mean to you to be blind? You have pitied blind men; did you ever stop to think what it would mean to you never again to be able to look upon the beauties of nature?

I was sick for some time while in California, some years ago, on the occasion of my first visit there. I was shut up for a time in a dark room. I did not expect to recover. But I had a desire to get out of doors, and it seemed to me if I could get out even for a few moments and look up into the open sky, out over the green fields, and at the distant blue mountains, I could die happy.

I did not die; but when I got out again I was happy. I could realize what Emerson meant when he said, "Nature is too thin a screen, God breaks through at every point."

What would it mean to you never again in this life to be able to see the faces of those you love? I stood at the bedside of an aged man, (known to you all) who was dying. He said, "I bid good-by to my family, whom I have not seen for four years." The physician who stood by his bedside, (a man also known to you all) said, "I would give everything I have on earth to be able to cause him to see again for fifteen minutes."

That power remained with a greater physician, and for some good reason he did not choose to exercise it in that case.

I repeat, What would it mean to you to have perpetual, impenetrable darkness come down upon you,—never again to see the faces of your loved ones? You, father,—you, brother or sister,—you, sweetheart or lover,—you, mother, who must strike a light at midnight because you can not wait until dawn to see the face of your baby!

What a wonderful thing to heal the blind! What a wonderful blessing to be healed of blindness!

MEN AS TREES, WALKING

Let us now consider how Jesus went about his mission of restoring sight to blind eyes,—first to those physically blind, second, and, most important, to those spiritually blind.

I have read in the scripture reading of three instances where he healed those physically blind. In the narrative of each event significant statements are made.

In the case of the man at Bethsaida, Jesus administered to him once, and then asked him if he could see aught. Looking up, he replied, "I see men as trees, walking."

He began to see, but his vision was obscure. He saw men, but they were vague, distorted, monstrous.

Again Jesus administered to him, and then he "saw every man clearly." Remember those statements.

HEALED BY FAITH

In the case of Bartimæus, Jesus said, "Thy faith hath made thee whole."

Reverting to the man at Bethsaida, we remember that it is said, Jesus took him by the hand and led him out of the town, before administering to him. It was necessary for him to take the hand of Jesus and follow him and obey him. Faith and obedience are necessary in order to receive such a great blessing.

In the case of the man healed in the pool of Siloam, when irate neighbors upbraided him because Jesus had healed him,—and, awful crime, had done it on the Sabbath, and when they told him Jesus was a bad man, he waved them aside.

He answered them with this irrefutable argument: "One thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see."

However, let all schools of so-called divine healing take notice, Jesus did not stop there. He did not leave the man content with physical healing alone. He followed him up and announced to him his own sonship, and preached to him the gospel.

The physical healing was a sign, great itself, but a sign of something much greater. A healer without the true gospel is no true representative of Jesus.

CAST OUT OF THE SYNAGOGUE, TAKEN IN BY JESUS

The old religious associates of this man were so incensed that they cast him out of the synagogue; or, as the marginal reading says, 'excommunicated him,'—cut him off. You have received a blessing from Jesus, you can not stay with us.

How many men and women now Latter Day Saints have had that experience! Jesus has blessed them and revealed himself to them, and then their old religious associates have risen up and cast them out.

But then it was that Jesus hearing that he had been excommunicated, sought him out and made him a follower. He was cast out of the synagogue, but was taken in by Jesus. But how much better to be with Jesus and see than to remain in the synagogue, blind.

Let all remember that if called upon to choose between Jesus and old friends or religious associates, better be with Jesus and see than remain in the dear old orthodox church, blind.

THE SPIRITUALLY BLIND

Let us pass now to a consideration of that other part of the mission of Jesus: The bringing of sight to the spiritually blind. Do not think that because the language is figurative the condition is less terrible than physical blindness. And that it is well recognized in scriptural terminology we shall discover by noting certain Biblical statements.

When Moses set before the children of Israel the commandments of God he told them the conditions that should follow disobedience, and among other things said: "The Lord shall smite thee with madness and blindness. . . . And thou shalt grope at noonday, as the blind gropeth in darkness." (Deuteronomy 28:28, 29.)

That prediction was fulfilled, and later Paul wrote: "Blindness in part is happened to Israel."

Jesus said to the Pharisees: "Ye fools and blind." Every one of them had two good eyes, so far as we know, yet they were blind.

Peter recounts the Christian graces, and adds: "He that lacketh these things is blind, and can not see afar off." (2 Peter 1:9.)

The church at Laodicea was told: "Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind." (Revelation 3:17.)

THE GREATER MIRACLE

Is it not clear that men are spiritually blind who follow a course that debauches and ruins them and their families and all who come under their influence? Blind to right and wrong, to duty and God, to morality and honesty.

I doubt not there are men in this town, as in every community, who are ten times worse off than blind Bartimæus the beggar, yet they have eyes.

Individuals may be thus afflicted. Jesus healed Peter and Mary Magdalene and many others of this class. The miracle that took Peter the obscene and profane fisherman out of the sea and made him the inspired apostle was greater than the miracle that made the man of Bethsaida to see all men clearly.

WHOLE NATIONS BLIND

Whole nations may become spiritually blind. Some of them are in that condition to-day. All were in that condition during the Dark Ages, as we call them. Gross darkness covered the minds of the people. The light of intelligence burned low. Religion and education were forgotten.

It was the work of Jesus to heal the race of that affliction. His is a world work. John tells us that he is the light of the world. He "lighteneth every man that cometh into the world."

In the days of the Reformation he began to heal the people of their blindness. I think that we will agree that men like Luther, Huss, Wesley, Calvin, and others received a considerable degree of light. At the same time there was a quickening everywhere in all lines of human activity and aspiration,—in art, literature, and science. That is the way God works. When he is at work in the world he by no means confines the influence of his quickening spirit to a few church men.

AGAIN, MEN AS TREES WALKING

But note this thought. The man at Bethsaida was only partially healed of his blindness at the first administration. He saw, but not clearly; he saw men as trees, walking.

Thus it was during and following the Reformation. You will note the simile in all the departments mentioned. There was a wonderful quickening in the realm of art and literature. Great and good things were done. Men began to see once more; but not clearly. There was a visual aberration. It still persists, to an extent. There are many perversions and monstrosities.

These agencies should serve God and ennoble man; but too often writer and artist alike are not only debased and demoralized in their own private lives, but they debase and demoralize all who come under the influence of their art.

One of the most popular novels of the day, The Eyes of the World, by Harold Bell Wright, deals with that fact.

In the field of science many notable achievements are to be recorded. Here, too, men began to see again; but not clearly. Many absurd and conflicting theories were promulgated, only to be abandoned. Even yet the vision is not fully clarified. Men look at the works of God but do not perceive the evidence of his handiwork. A great scientist, Sir Oliver Lodge, has said that a man trying to understand the universe with the aid of his five senses only, is like a dog in a picture gallery.

The dog sees the paintings. Yet he does not see them. He sees the canvas and the color; but he does not see the beauty and the lesson; seeing, he sees not, like many men. Thus men gaze at the wonders of the universe, and study it very intently, yet by no means see all, or even the greater thing that might be seen.

Again in the realm of theology, and perhaps most notably here, the healing was only partial. The reformers began to see, but not distinctly. They saw men as trees, walking, in some details at least, the vision was vague, distorted, monstrous.

Thus we understand why Calvin mixed the awful doctrine of predestination with many wholesome and true doctrines.

Thus we understand why Christianity, so-called, is divided into so many conflicting schools, sects, and denominations. That so many men saw and yet see things so differently is evidence of imperfect vision.

THE RESTORATION; CLEARER VISION

By and by God moved further and the work of restoration began. Men received a clearer vision. Like the man at Bethsaida, they began to see all men clearly.

They began to see the doctrine clearly, and understood the doctrine and gospel of Jesus Christ as it was taught of old, so strangely overlooked or seen in part by the Reformers.

They were given a new vision of social justice. Eighty years ago they began to preach equality. They saw that men must be equal in temporal things. They perceived the brotherhood of man.

They obtained a clearer vision of God. Whereas the reformers had seen a vague, distorted being, without body, parts, or passions, who had done a work in the world and retired, one who no longer revealed himself, these men beheld a personal, unchangeable God of love, and of present revelation,—an immanent God.

Thus they began to see clearly the true doctrine; also the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God.

In the world, too, as we might expect, there has been granted clearer vision as God's Spirit of healing has worked in connection with the restoration of the gospel. Men everywhere understand better the meaning of social justice. They understand the nature of God better. The old idea of predestination, for instance, now has few supporters. In doctrine there has been a wonderful change. Such doctrines as the second personal coming of Christ, that were hidden to the eyes of the theologians, are now perceived clearly by many.

That the healing was not more marked and rapid is due to the fact that the men who came after the reformers were many of them satisfied. They said, Jesus has done his work. Revelation is ended. There is nothing more for us.

Had the man at Bethsaida turned back after the first administration, content with his partial healing, refusing more, he would never have reached the condition where he could see clearly.

YOU CAN SEE, BUT NOT ALL

Here, however, we must take thought to ourselves. God has wonderfully blessed Latter Day Saints, through the restoration. But not all Latter Day Saints have been entirely healed of blindness. Jesus told his disciples of old, "Ye are clean, but not all." So now, he might say, Ye can see; but not all can see.

Some, alas, seem nearly blind. Others are only partially healed. They see men as trees, walking. They but dimly perceive their duty. They do not properly apprehend the church on the one hand and the world on the other, and the line that separates them, as well as their legitimate points of contact.

Jesus, thou Son of David, heal such men of their blindness!

When we speak of clear vision and complete healing, of course we use those terms in a comparative sense. Compared with the vision that will be ours later, few men now see very clearly. Paul recognized that fact. Stricken blind by the miracle that converted him, he was healed under the hands of Ananias of blindness both physical and spiritual. Yet later he declared: "Now we see through a glass, darkly."

But he added: "Then face to face; now I know in part, but then shall I know even as also I am known." (1 Corinthians 13:12.)

AS GOD SEES US

To see as we are seen and know as we are known! Robert Burns said:

Wad some power the giftie gie us,
To see oursel's as others see us.

I do not care to see myself as others see me. That would not be a correct standard, for perhaps no two see me exactly alike. I would like to see myself as God sees me. That would be the truth.

When I was in Omaha some months ago, I held my arm before an X ray machine and looked through clothing and flesh to the bone. As easily God looks through man and discerns his heart. We can not hide behind brick walls so that he will not see us and read our thoughts. His vision penetrates the assumed smile, the polite air, the fine clothing, the "bluff" that we put up, and sees us as we are. That power of vision will be ours some time.

An old Scotchman was boasting to an American tourist of the clarity of bonny Scotland's atmosphere and the great distances at which objects could be discerned. Finally the American, to tease him, said, jocularly, "I suppose on a clear day you can see America from Scotland."

The canny Scot is hard to beat, and the old man replied "Fayrther nor that, mon, fayrther nor that."

"Indeed, how far can you see?"

"Weel, on a fair nicht, we can see the moon."

John on Patmos was able to see clear into heaven. But it was not because of any special clarity of the atmosphere. His associates probably could not see the Greek mainland. The change was in the man.

We need a better environment, a clearer atmosphere; but most of all we need a change in ourselves to give us broader and clearer vision. Let us, like the man at Bethsaida, permit Jesus to take us, intimately by the hand and lead us on until we see clearly as we are seen, and know fully as we are known.

MINISTERIAL ANECDOTES RETOLD

One of the patriarchs, who is noted for his slight frame, strong voice, and logical mind, tells of a compliment received by him that left him somewhat in doubt. He had preached with excellent liberty, and one sister listened with rapt attention. When he had finished and come down from the stand she greeted him with the remark, "Well, that was fine! I never supposed you had so much sense in that little head of yours."

Another elder also recalls a "compliment" bestowed upon himself that left him breathless for a little while. After preaching one evening he remarked to a sister that he had forgotten to use his text. "I thought you started out differently than usual," she replied, "you started out like you meant business."

Elder Elijah Banta, one of the men prominent in the founding of Lamoni, was afflicted with a slight impediment of speech. But there was no impediment to his wit. On one occasion he was passing a house that was in course of construction. He paused to address the man in charge: "What are you b-b-b-uilding." The rude reply was, "We are building a house for stuttering men and skunks." Quick as a flash came back the suave rejoinder, "G-g-g-good, there will be a place for b-b-b-both of us!"

It is related of Elder Lorenzo Powell that on a certain occasion he was holding a debate with a Christian or "Campbellite" minister. Elder Powell was quite young and rather small in stature. His opponent was neither. The Christian minister said, at the close of his opening speech, "I thought they would send a man to meet me, but I find this boy. I'll just pin his ears back and swallow him. That's what I'll do with him."

Elder Powell opened his speech thus, "Friends, brothers, and sisters, I admit that I am young and not large in stature, and now this gentleman says he will swallow me." Turning to the minister he went on with vehemence, "You said you would swallow me, did you?"

"Yes, that was what I said."

"Well, then, all I have to say is that you may swallow me, you are big enough, but if you do you will have more brains in your stomach than you ever had in your head." Then he proceeded to make a speech that convinced the people he had made no idle boast.

At one time while preaching in Canada, Elder R. C. Evans was met by an opposing gentleman who in reply ridiculed the idea of this restoration by revelation of which we talk so much. "The idea!" he he said. "The idea! An angel revealed himself to Joseph Smith? Impossible! There can be no such things as angels now, and as a consequence there can be no such thing as revelation."

Brother Evans said to him, "My dear sir, I read in the New Testament Scripture that at one time there was a kind of warfare against the Savior, and he said to some that were disposed to fight for him, 'put up the sword. Know ye not that I could pray my Father and he would presently give me more than twelve legions of angels?' Twelve hundred and sixty men was a Roman legion. How many could be summoned? Twelve legions. Now, Mr. Preacher, will you please tell us, has there been an epidemic in heaven, and have all the angels died off?"

The Editor one time raised some sunflowers which attracted the attention of one of his neighbors who requested the gift of a few of the seeds. The request was complied with the following spring, much to the pleasure of the neighbor. He seemed to think that some return for such kindness was necessary, and expressed himself thus: "My wife, she is sick, I not think she live very long. If she die you get a job. I get you to make the sermon. You get a dollar that way anyway."

Some years ago, when coming one morning from Canton, Massachusetts, to Boston, after a great freshet, the train went apparently into a large pond, the track and the wide meadow being all concealed beneath the water from an overflowing river. But the cars went confidently down into those waters, for underneath were the iron rails and the solid track. When life's path meets the deep waters, the Christian may confidently enter therein, for "underneath are the everlasting arms."—T. S. Robie.

SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

IN EXPLANATION.—Because of going early to press in issuing this magazine number of the HERALD, and on account of temporary handicaps the items of this column is limited and not brought up to the usual time before date of publication.

WOULD REMOVE LINDSEY.—Bills providing for the naming of an extra district judge to handle juvenile court work, doing away with the work of Judge Ben Lindsey, and which have passed the Colorado House, are likely to be reconsidered, following investigations by a grand jury into charges involving Representative Howland, active in the fight against Judge Lindsey.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—The State Department has appealed to Villa for relief of conditions at Mexico City, and for the reestablishment of railroad communications between there and Vera Cruz, Carranza having agreed to furnish transportation over the section of the road held by his forces. Relief has been promised but seems not to have been given, since United States citizens and others are asking the department for transportation to Vera Cruz. Carranza, urged by the Washington administration, has abandoned the blockade of Progreso. A split between Villa and Angeles is anticipated in some quarters.

THAW CASE.—Harry K. Thaw was on the 13th acquitted of the charge of conspiracy to escape from the Matteawan Asylum. Application for his return to New Hampshire from which State he was extradited for trial was denied, and he was, under his original commitment, ordered returned to Matteawan. This order was stayed by a writ of habeas corpus, served on Warden Hawley of the Tombs. Thaw is to go before Judge Bijur, who will determine whether or not he is legally detained.

EUROPEAN WAR.—General activity has increased in the West. Reports from Paris that the Belgians have improved their positions in Flanders, and that the French have added to their gains north of Arras and in the Champagne regions are in part if not entirely denied by Germany. The British claim gains in France. Russia announces gains in Northern Poland and in the Carpathians. The siege of Przemysl, Galicia, continues, with its fall expected soon. A Swedish steamer has been sunk, probably by a mine. The British Steamer Leeuwarden has been sunk by a German submarine. The German cruiser Dresden was on the 14th sunk by British vessels off the coast of Chile. A lull in the operations against the Dardanelles is reported, supposedly in preparation by mine sweeping for the 4th stage of the forcing of this strategical waterway, that of bombarding the formidable forts at the narrowest point. Allied forces have been disembarked and are supporting the fleet. Turkish troops have been called in from the frontiers, and wealthy Turkish families are leaving Constantinople for Switzerland. Suffering for lack of food is reported from Vienna. Parleying between Italy and Austria concerning the proposed ceding of territory to Italy on condition of Italian neutrality continue. Italy has suspended exchange of telegraphic money orders with Austria-Hungary and traveling postoffices on trains bound for Austria.

FOREIGN SHIPPING.—It is thought that the French Government will purchase the cargo of cotton aboard the Dacia, which vessel must go before a prize court. A British order in council was made public the 15th decreeing retaliatory measures to meet the German declaration of a war zone. The British declaration states that no merchantman sailing from her port of departure after March 1 will be allowed to proceed to a German port, and no vessel sailing from a German port after that date will be allowed to proceed to her destination. Vessels sailing after March 1 to ports other than German, and carrying goods with enemy destination, or which are enemy property, will be intercepted, as will vessels from ports other than German and having enemy origin or being enemy property. This order is not to prevent relaxation "in respect of the merchant vessels of any country which declares that no commerce intended for or originating in Germany or belonging to German subjects shall enjoy the protection of its flag." Requested by the United States to define "a radius of activity" under this declaration, Great Britain and France replied with the announcement that operations would not be conducted "outside of European waters, including the Mediterranean."

NOTES AND COMMENTS

LONG AT PERRY.—Elder E. E. Long has been conducting a very successful meeting at Perry, Iowa. The press of the city is liberal in commenting on this effort and in allowing space for announcements, etc. Among other press reports we note the following:

It's the only place in Perry where the great truths of biblical forecast are being presented. . . . The great Bible truths are the magnetic forces that draw.

It is only a question of time till the "little white church" will have to give place to a larger structure where the constantly increasing audience can have the greatest message that ever came to Perry.

DELEGATES FROM EAST TAKE NOTICE.—By telegram, Bishop J. A. Becker notifies us that delegates from the East are requested to meet in Chicago on April 1. Special train service to be arranged for to leave at six o'clock in the evening on Burlington.

AMONG OUR POETS

In the Mountains

BY T. W. CHATBURN

Oh, for a home where the mountains range highest,— Close by a snow-crowned peak,
Where earth and sky approach nearest,
And the clouds and the earth oft meet;
Where the wind through the pines is moaning
The songs of its long unrest,
And the trees reply, ever groaning,
When swayed at the gale's behest.

Away up where the cool, limpid fountains
Gust from the towering crags,—
The nectar of God gives to the mountains,—
Pure and unsullied of dregs;
Where the odors of balsam and heather
Make fragrant the warm summer air,
And vine-tangled jungles of cedar Oft hide the fierce cougar's lair.

Oh, the joy of the long summer evening
As the sun sinks down to his rest,
The trees all aglow with his gleamings,
And the crags all gilt to the crest;
Where the moon soars proudly o'er the summits
Where evergreens bask in her light,
And night-birds warble sweet sonnets,
Fit requiems for the night.

Oh, for a home where the deep, mighty gorges
Rend the iron-ribbed cliffs in twain,
And the wild, flaming flood ever surges
Its way to the beautiful plain.
Far up where the sky comes the highest,
And men to the Father's own knee,
Up where the mountains range highest,—
What a home for my loved one and me!

The Oak

BY FRED H. JOHNSON

Down with the oak! Its living days are done,
Apply the ax and saw—and work ye well,
Until it topples toward the setting sun,
Its fall awakening the silent dell.
An hundred years the fiercest storms have tried
With winds and thunders to destroy its pride,—
Without avail—to man's weak hands give all
To glory of this lofty monarch's fall!

Down with the oak! and let the loud blows ring
Resounding thro' the forests of the land!
Where now it stands, triumphant,—lord and king,—
A puny man shall walk, with drill in hand;
And in the soil, that nurtured it till now,
A field of grain to every breeze shall bow.
So is mankind (of shallow brain) elate
To shatter that which it can not create!

Down with the oak! Heed not the winds that sigh
In sorrow through the bough so nobly borne
By massive trunk an hundred feet on high—
Naught but a stump shall greet the coming morn!

And when it falls, set to with might and skill
To sever limbs and trunk—your purse to fill.
For that which stands and points toward the skies
Is too suggestive for thy worldly eyes.

Down with the oak—and down with all that stands
For honor, strength and truth, where'er man's voice
Is raised in petty strife and base demands;
The God that made us sighs—and imps rejoice.
God's word is like that tree—that, rooted deep,
Against the adverse winds its ground did keep,
And, boughs outspreading, sheltered all who sought
Its peaceful influence, so subtly wrought.

And they who cried, "Down with the oak!" were they
Who failed to see the havoc thus begun:
They struck the blow, and, when the monarch lay
Outstretched upon the sward, betrayed, undone,
They swiftly piled, to reap what gain they could—
And some took the boughs and some the firmer wood;
And others twigs, to deck their fireside—
And leaves alone were scattered far and wide.

And so, to-day, of that once noble shaft,
The beauties have been lost to mortal eyes;
Its fragments are so mixed with worldly craft
That God himself could hardly recognize!
But list to this: A few there were who mourned
The fallen tree, and, though by others scorned,
They gathered round, and watered by their tears,
A new tree from those self-same roots has grown!
And will still grow, throughout the future years—
A perfect tree—enjoyed by them alone.

A Prayer

BY RALPH W. FARRELL

Lord, thou who knowest well the inmost thought,
Bear with me still, nor pass me by;
Let not my pleadings be forgot,
Hear thou my cry.

Before thy holy presence, Lord, I bow;
My eyes are dim—I can not see;
Hold fast my hand, and be not thou
Weary of me.

And may I ever feel that thou art near,
To guide the step, to touch the heart,
To wipe away the falling tear,
And heal the smart.

The Eve of Baptism

BY EARNEST A. WEBBE

Out of the darkness into the light;
Out of weakness born to might;
Out of the glare of the world's broad street
To the path worn smooth by the martyr's feet.
Out from the mire to the clear, bright stream;
Out from the gloom to the starlight's gleam;
From the forest depths to a rolling plain

That laughs in the light of the heavens again.
 Out from a cave of stalactite thorns
 I steal to a light that ever dawns.
 Away from the world and its ill-spent care
 I turn to him—my hope is there!
 Out of darkness into light;
 Out of weakness born to might.

Song of the Lilies

BY ADAM J. KECK

A song of the fields in their verdure reposing
 And smiling at heaven o'erflowing on high,
 At morn or at noon or when daylight is closing,
 The fields smile at heaven which smiles in reply;
 A song of the brook as it flows to the river,
 And sings on in darkness as well as in day;
 A song of the lilies that lift to their Giver
 Their faces of beauty and smile while they may.

A song of the kingdoms of men and their splendor,
 Of Solomon clothed in his regal attire,
 The throne and the crown and the glory they render,
 The gold and the jewels of kingly desire;
 A song of a Wise One who scorned elevation,
 Whose soul saw the soul in the lily's sweet face,
 A beauty unrivaled in Solomon's station,
 In kingly adornment of person or place;

A song of the souls of the king and the flower,
 Of laws that are made for a world or a seed,

Of God through his laws giving souls richest dower,
 Of heavens that smile on each soul's worthy deed;
 The lily abides in the law of its Maker,
 While garments of purple hide sin on a throne;
 Of glory of king or of flower be partaker,—
 My singing is finished, the moral's your own.

Gathering In

BY ANNA SALYARDS

They are gathering in from every land,
 From every clime under the sun;
 Guided and led by our Father's own hand;
 They are gathering in one by one.

In manhood's pride, with locks turned gray,
 And some with life but just begun,
 They are gathered in from field and highway;
 They are gathering in one by one.

The aged come worn with toil and care;
 The young, from their laughter and fun;
 They come the name of Christ to bear;
 They are gathering in one by one.

They come from the homes where plenty smiled,
 And from the homes by sin undone,
 But they seek a home that is undefiled;
 They are gathering in one by one.

God bless them—the Saints of latter days!
 May the truth bind them closely in one,
 Till they press through beautiful gates of praise,
 In multitudes—not one by one.

HISTORICAL AND BIOGRAPHICAL

HISTORICAL SKETCH OF THE QUORUM OF TWELVE

BY HEMAN C. SMITH, CHURCH HISTORIAN

As early as June, 1829, nearly a year before the organization of the church, provision was made for the selection of a quorum of twelve apostles, and Oliver Cowdery and David Whitmer were chosen by revelation to select those who should occupy in that position, and given instruction as to how they could know them. But the quorum was not organized or its members selected until 1835, for the evident reason that the men who were to occupy had not yet united with the church. At the time the first selections were made, in 1835, Oliver Cowdery stated:

Our minds have been on a constant stretch, to find who these twelve were: when the time should come we could not tell; but we sought the Lord by fasting and prayer, to have our lives prolonged to see this day, to see you, and to take a retrospect of the difficulties through which we have passed.

THE FIRST TWELVE

The selection of the first quorum occurred February 14, 1835. Martin Harris had been selected, by what authority is not clear, to assist Oliver Cowdery and David Whitmer, and took part in the choosing. The selections made at this time were: Lyman E. Johnson, Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball, Orson Hyde, David W. Patten, Luke S. Johnson, William E. McLellin, John F. Boynton, Orson Pratt, William Smith, Thomas B. Marsh, and Parley P. Pratt. Three of them were ordained on that day under the hands of Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer, and Martin Harris, and six were ordained the following day. Orson Pratt, Thomas B. Marsh, and Parley P. Pratt were not present. On February 21 Parley P. Pratt, having returned, was ordained under the hands of President Joseph Smith, David Whitmer, and Oliver Cowdery. Orson Pratt and Thomas B. Marsh were subsequently ordained, the exact date not being known to us.

Subsequently they were arranged to rank according to age. They then stood in their order as follows: Thomas B. Marsh, David W. Patten, Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball, Orson Hyde, William E. McLellin, Parley P. Pratt, Luke S. Johnson, William Smith, Orson Pratt, John F. Boynton, and Lyman E. Johnson.

Thomas B. Marsh was chosen president and the quorum remained as at first organized until 1837. John F. Boynton was disfellowshipped in 1837, and Lyman E. Johnson, Luke S. Johnson, and William E. McLellin in 1838. In a revelation given July 8, 1838, John Taylor, John E. Page, Wilford Woodruff, and Willard Richards were called to occupy the places made vacant. (Church History, vol. 2, p. 166.)

On December 19, 1838, at Far West, Missouri, John E. Page and John Taylor were ordained under the hands of Brigham Young and Heber C. Kimball; and on April 26, 1839, at the same place, Wilford

Woodruff was ordained; and at the same time George A. Smith was ordained an apostle to fill the place of Thomas B. Marsh, who had previously apostatized. By what authority George A. Smith was chosen we have never been able to determine. Willard Richards was at the time of his call absent on his mission in England and did not receive ordination till April 14, 1840, at Preston, England, at the time that the majority of the quorum visited that country.

On October 25, 1838, David W. Patten was killed by a mob at Crooked River, Missouri. His successor was not named by revelation; but permission was given on January 19, 1841, for the selection of another, the language of the revelation being, "David Patten I have taken unto myself. . . . But verily I say unto you, another may be appointed unto the same calling." (Doctrine and Covenants 107:40.) Acting upon this instruction, the General Conference held at Nauvoo, Illinois, October 7, 1841, selected Lyman Wight to fill the vacancy.

At the council of the quorum held at Preston, England, on April 14, 1840, Brigham Young was selected as president of the quorum to succeed Thomas B. Marsh. This selection was approved by revelation on January 19, 1841. (Doctrine and Covenants 107:41.)

QUORUM DISORGANIZED

The quorum continued without further change until the death of Joseph Smith in 1844. The rejection of the church as an organic body carried with it the disorganization of the quorums; and hence at this time the Quorum of Twelve became disorganized.

Nine of them claimed the right of the quorum to preside after the death of Joseph Smith; but three, namely, William Smith, John E. Page and Lyman Wight, demurred.

QUORUM REORGANIZED

The quorum remained disorganized until the reorganization of the church in 1853. By command of God previously given, a committee of three, namely, Cyrus Newkirk, Ethan Griffith, and William Cline, were selected at the April conference of 1853 to choose seven men to constitute the majority of that quorum. They selected Zenos H. Gurley, sr., Jason W. Briggs, Henry H. Deam, Reuben Newkirk, John Cunningham, George White, and Daniel B. Rasey. Jason W. Briggs was at this time chosen president of the quorum. Henry H. Deam and John Cunningham were expelled on October 6, 1854; and on April 7, 1855, David Newkirk and Samuel Powers were selected to fill the vacancies, and were ordained under the hands of J. W. Briggs, D. B. Rasey, and Z. H. Gurley.

On April 6, 1868, John Shippy was expelled; and on April 8, 1870, Charles Derry resigned; and on April 15, 1885, Josiah Ells died. On April 10, 1886, Jason W. Briggs and Z. H. Gurley, jr., were released at their request. The quorum had no regular president subsequent to the release of Jason W. Briggs until 1890, when Alexander H. Smith was selected

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF SYLVIA C. WEBB

A STORY OF MOST REMARKABLE EXPERIENCES

(Should mistakes in names or dates appear in the following, let the reader remember that this aged sister has dictated every word from memory. She has not a line of written data of a diary of any kind to which to refer. We have written this brief sketch at her request.—Ellen Sherard Adair.)

AT THE DEDICATION OF KIRTLAND TEMPLE

I, Sylvia C. Cutler, was born August 28, 1832, near Forestville, New York. My father was Thaddeus Cutler, son of Alpheus Cutler. From my earliest recollection my parents belonged to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

While I was quite young my parents came to Kirtland, Ohio. One of my earliest recollections was the dedication of the Temple. My father took us up on his lap and told us why we were going and what it meant to dedicate a house to God. And although so very young at that time, I clearly remember the occasion.

I can look back through the lapse of years and see as I saw then Joseph the Prophet, standing with his hands raised towards heaven, his face ashy pale, the tears running down his cheeks as he spoke on that memorable day. Almost all seemed to be in tears. The house was so crowded the children were mostly sitting on older people's laps; my sister sat on father's, I on my mother's lap. I can even remember the dresses we wore. My mind was too young at that time to grasp the full significance of it all, but as time passed it dawned more and more upon me, and I am very grateful that I was privileged to be there.

MOBBED NEAR FAR WEST

Time passed, and I was baptized at eight years of age by my grandfather. We were now in Ray County, Missouri. Father owned a grist mill. A mob came by our house on their way to Far West. It was evening when they came. Rain was pouring down. They took possession of the barn, carried father's timothy hay and put it in the mud for bedding for their horses, and used it for beds for themselves. They shot down some of his cattle for beef. The officers came to the house and ordered their meals. My mother and Aunt Lois Cutler cooked, while they ate as much as they liked. Next morning they mounted their horses, turned their heads toward the house as they formed a line in the turnpike, and called father to come to the fence. He put his arms across his back and walked out and stood facing them, expecting to be shot. They fired a volley into the mill, shooting out all the front windows. Then wheeling their horses, they rode away toward Far West, where they joined the rest of the mob.

TEMPLE BUILDING IN NAUVOO

When the Saints were driven out we went to Quincy, Illinois. Here he helped put up the first brick houses that were built there. Later we joined the Saints at Nauvoo. Here my Grandfather Cutler worked in the tithing office. He weighed such things as went to the stone cutters, carpenters, and other laborers. He rang the bell each day at 7, 12, 1 and 6 o'clock for the men to begin and cease their labor. I often stood beside him and listened to the sound of the bell. It had a great charm for my childish ears. And many times in later years in the lonely hours of night I fancied I heard it ringing as in the long ago.

I often watched the men work, and yet remember how Joseph often admonished them to be faithful, to keep the law and finish the Temple, lest they be rejected and their temple also, with their dead, for many began to be careless about their tithing, some bringing in old, broken-down horses and worthless things as tithes. Thus the laborers could not be fed, and the work was hindered. We see God is not mocked. He suffered persecutions to come upon them.

JOSEPH AND HYRUM KILLED

I can remember (I shall never forget) the day when Joseph and Hyrum were assassinated at Carthage. It was the darkest day of my life; no scene before nor since has struck such terror to my heart. Joseph, when living, often patted my head and said, "You're a little Ephraimite." How I loved that man! And I know now even as I knew then, that he was a man of God, a true prophet, and people will do well to heed his warnings.

I recall one instance which I never forgot. A man by the name of Reynolds Cahoon became rather ambitious, and Brother Joseph remonstrated with him, exhorting him to humble himself and forsake his evil ways, stating that if he did not the Lord would send a curse upon him in the form of a running sore on his forehead. After a time the word he spoke came true. Being a child, I thought this was a terrible punishment for "Grandpa Cahoon," and it led me to understand more perfectly that the word of the Lord was sure, and that he will bring to naught the proud and disobedient. When in Utah years afterward, I saw Reynolds Cahoon with the sore upon his forehead.

Our father took his children through the Temple before we left Nauvoo, saying it perhaps would be the last time for us. This was a short time before the persecution began. We were the greater part of a day going through, and almost every detail is yet fixed in my memory.

TO THE GOLD FIELDS

Some years later I married a young man by the name of Elisha B. Webb. He also had been baptized in his childhood. After we were married a few years we started to the California gold fields. The church was scattered, and we were like sheep without a shepherd. Emigrants went in wagon trains because of the Indians. There was a captain over every fifty wagons. Our captain's name was Hugh Sheffleton. There was also one large bus loaded with women and children. There were with the train five hundred head of loose cattle and horses.

We were in the last wagon, far out on the plains one day when something frightened our oxen, and they darted past the other teams. Elisha made a leap to try to catch them by the horns, but they flung him against the wheel of the nearest wagon, and on they went, causing a general stampede. Soon oxen were running in all directions, wagons were overturned, many were hurt. Myself and two little children were being carried helplessly over the plains, expecting at any moment to be thrown out on the ground among cactus, hostile Indians, or to meet most any fate. When the oxen had exhausted themselves they stopped. Expecting them to start again, I sprang from the wagon with my little ones. I was too much shaken up and excited to stand upon my feet. I knew not how far I was from the others, or how long I should be compelled to wait. After hours my husband came up. He had run until he could not speak a word. His throat was parched and dry. He fell upon the ground exhausted. Each was expecting to find the other badly hurt or killed. You can imagine our joy that neither was injured. It took two days to gather up the wagons and cattle and get ready to start again.

We traveled the old Fremont California trail until we came to the dividing line, one trail leading south, one north. The north trail went through Utah. Here Elisha met his Brother Edwin Webb and family, and here we camped two weeks on Greene River, to rest our cattle. Cold weather was coming on, and we had dropped out of our train, and dare not go on alone. Contrary to our expectations, no more trains came through, so we were compelled to wait all winter. We stayed a while at Snider's Mill, the two brothers getting out logs. We finally drifted into Salt Lake City, then our doom was sealed, for there was no escape. No letters ever went back to friends, none came to us. There we were hemmed in by the mountains, guarded by the Danites.

MEETING BRIGHAM YOUNG

Since our childhood we had known Brigham Young, and after a time he sent for me to come to the tabernacle, as also did Heber Kimball. I had heard how Brigham was pretending to fill the place of a true prophet, and knew this was or could not be true, as grandfather had taught us none but young Joseph could ever fill that place. This right was conferred upon him by the laying on of his father's hands. I had heard of the language Brigham had used in addressing other good, true women, so I said, "No, sir; I don't care to see him, or either of them, for that matter."

One woman said, "How dare you speak against the Lord's anointed?"

I said, "I'd tell him to his face. And if ever I do have to go I'll take a pistol in my pocket."

I felt desperate while there, and had my mind made up that if we tried to escape and they killed my husband they would never carry me and my children back alive. I would sell my life dearly, and not be worth taking back. We went to Payson City to live. The Danites were always snooping around watching us.

We were here at the time of the Mountain Meadow Massacre. The train, the richest that ever passed through, went right past our door. The young ladies were riding large, black horses. They had beautiful side saddles and lovely riding habits. I was making ladies' gauntlet gloves and sold several pairs to them. In a short time all were plundered and murdered. Soon the soldiers came. They raided even the small towns, seeking evidence. Brigham had prophesied that no soldier should enter Salt Lake City. He had fortified Echo Canyon so strongly he felt perfectly secure. And while he was sitting back saying, "Soul, take thine ease," the soldiers entered from another way. The Mormon leaders were thrown into such confusion they never stopped to make choice of how they went or in what conveyance they rode. Brigham and a load of young wives went thundering past. I never saw so scared a man in my life, and I laugh yet when I recall what I said:

Brigham with a load of wives,
Running away to save their lives.

I had lived in constant fear, but now I laughed like mad. Brigham was naturally a sneak and a coward, and an oppressor of the needy, while pretending to fill the place of a man who would divide his last loaf with his brethren.

EASTWARD BOUND

An old lady by the name of Jones lived in Salt Lake City. One of her sons had accompanied one of their spiritual wives home from a dance, and they had unsexed him for the act. When she heard of the soldiers coming they came out to Payson City, hoping to join themselves to them at some time, and when the great rush was made the Danites came on that night, and we stood in our door and saw them shoot into her little temporary abode, and heard her screams. They killed her two sons. She was kneeling as if in prayer when killed.

Elisha turned to me and said, "We will get it next." We both stood with our loaded revolvers in our hands awaiting their coming, but I suppose they had not time to do more, for they hurried by. We both had to give evidence against them, and after that dare not leave the soldiers. We left our home and stayed under their protection till the first of the next May, when we left Camp Floyd.

We crossed the big mountain the second day of May. It was covered with melting snow and ice, thus making it dangerous to ride in the wagon. With others, I walked and carried my babe four miles up and five miles down the mountain slope. That babe is now Sister Myra Burgess, of San Jose, California. Young men and boys helped the children of the train along, while mothers carried the little ones. It began to rain before night, and the river was greatly swollen because of the thawing snow. A band of friendly Indians followed us. Our men tied their wagon boxes to the running gears and plunged in. The horses swam straight across. When all were safe on the opposite side, the Indians sent a whoop out across the water, then all plunged their horses in and crossed also. We soon struck camp. The Indians dragged logs together with their ponies, and made us a roaring campfire. We sat up all night drying our bedding and clothing, so as to be ready to follow the soldiers next day. The Indians only went with us a few days, but the Danites followed for many days. We stayed with the soldiers till we reached Fort Laramie, Colorado.

In Utah, Elisha often met Mark Forscutt and Charles Derry. I was much pleased when I read a letter from Brother Derry, dated March 17. It was like hearing from one of my own brothers. But to return.

A PRAIRIE FIRE

Later we took a claim in Nebraska, near where Grand Island now stands. It was on the old gold mine trail. The sunflowers and grass were very tall, as there had been no prairie fire for two years. My husband had a blacksmith shop and was shoeing oxen and horses for the emigrants. On the day of which I write, he had gone to the island for a load of wood. A fire had been started a mile or two away by some men putting up hay. My husband had sent our boy, twelve years old, with a load of dry cottonwood, the bark hanging loosely. I saw the fire, and the child coming ahead of it, the bark of his wood on fire behind him. I ran and called to him to jump, at the same time knocking the ring off the tongue with the ax, letting the cattle loose. We ran them across a small stream, or branch. We then got the four little children and ran across with them, and threw water on the ground about us to save ourselves from perishing. Not a vestige of anything was left. Large houses and barns were burned near us.

This was in September. Our thirty tons of hay, stable, and all were gone, and we had no place to lay our heads. The ground was covered with burned grass. We were covered with smoke and black ashes. A woman, a friend of ours, who lived back of the burned region, thought of us and came running across the prairie. When she came up she was covered with soot and black ashes, but we were more than glad to see a friendly face. We remained in her home until my husband could prepare us a place to go to. Suffice to say, he worked hard at the shop; I had my cows left, and soon got more chickens, and sold butter and eggs to the emigrants.

ESCAPE FROM INDIANS

Time passed and finally we were prospering. Myra was now past four years of age, and she began crying at night from fear of the Indians. She would say, "I see them peeping in the window. I hear them around the house." Her father would carry her in the yard and around the house, but all to no avail. At last we became alarmed about her nervous condition, and I told my husband if he would get the light wagon ready I would take the children and go to Omaha and stay a while and see if she would not become better. He at once prepared us for the journey, but at the last moment would not let us go alone. So getting his brother, who had come from Utah with us, to promise to stay and look after things, we started.

We were only gone two days when the news reached us that our home had been plundered and our cattle driven away. Seven men had been killed. One of our neighbor boys had crawled a mile with arrows through his body before he reached his home to die. Wesley Webb escaped, and later with his family reached Omaha also. Thus again our property was gone.

BACK TO NAUVOO

After this we went back to Nauvoo, my beloved Nauvoo! Here we both united with the Reorganized Church. This was during the War of the Rebellion. Here we found Brother Charles Derry and Brother Mark Forscutt. They had beaten us back, although we left first. The spirit of wickedness seemed to be overcome, and we felt free indeed. Here I found my father's people. Joseph and his first wife, Emma, were there, as were Alexander and Lizzie. David was still living with his mother and stepfather. Oh! the joy of it all—to be among those I loved once more, loved and trusted.

I felt as though I should never want to leave Nauvoo again. But my husband was of a roving disposition, and after a couple of years we went back to Omaha to look after our land.

One time at a Gallands Grove conference I heard a sea captain sing in tongues. I have heard many tongues, but none so beautiful as that one. At a semi-annual conference at Council Bluffs an aged couple had walked a long distance to be present. She being blind, he led her. They reached the grove about ten o'clock. During the services he arose and said they had come that she might be baptized. Next morning a big crowd was at the water's edge to witness the baptism, which was attended to by Elder E. C. Brand. She came forth praising God, for she had received her sight. I have seen many healed, have heard tongues, and interpretations, and prophecy, and have seen them fulfilled.

The last twenty years of my life have been spent in Indian Territory and Oklahoma. I am still firm in the faith, and as I grow older I see more to confirm my faith in this gospel restored. "By their fruits ye shall know them," and I know Brigham Young was a usurper, and that Joseph Smith was a true prophet; the Spirit has been witness of this to me all along.

IN THE HOPE OF ETERNAL LIFE

I have outlived most of my family. Only three of my children of a family of ten are living. My husband passed from this life Thanksgiving Day, five years ago. My home is near my son Byron, the youngest of my children. I have been driven from my home when a child by the mobs; I have been driven therefrom by the Mormons, and by the Indians. I have labored, others receiving the benefit.

I shall soon go to the other side and join the throng who there await the resurrection, and if I am worthy I hope to be one who shall live during the thousand years' reign of peace on the earth.

I would say to all who have children, stay among the Saints. The salvation of your children is more than money to you. Could I have had my way I should have adhered closely to this. My prayer is that all may live so as to be accounted worthy when the sifting time shall come.

I am now past eighty-two years of age, and most likely this will be my last message to you. As brothers and sisters in Christ, I remember you all in my prayers. The Lord has heard my prayers, and one week ago I saw my son Byron go down into the waters of baptism. I thank my heavenly Father in thus remembering me.

[Editor's Note.—We have a personal letter from Elder Charles Derry, in which he states that he knew Sylvia C. Webb, her husband also, and knew her to be an intelligent, pure woman, possessed of an excellent reputation for veracity, as her autobiography indicates, a woman of high moral courage who would dare to do right and speak out against the wrong, at any cost. He states that her experiences were somewhat similar to his own, while in Utah. He knew Reynolds Cahoon in Utah and often saw the sore on his face, and always thinks of the sore when the name is mentioned, though he never knew the cause of it until he read the foregoing article.]

A TALK TO BOYS

BY C. ED. MILLER

"A fellow's mother," said Fred the wise,
With his rosy cheeks and his merry blue eyes,
"Knows what to do if a fellow gets hurt
By a thump, or a bruise, or a fall in the dirt.

"A fellow's mother has bags and strings,
Rags and buttons and lots of things.
No matter how busy she is, she'll stop
To see how well you can spin your top.

"She does not care—not much, I mean—
If a fellow's face is not quite clean;
And if your trousers are torn at the knee,
She can put in a patch that you'd never see.

"A fellow's mother is never mad,
And only sorry if you're bad;
And I'll tell you, then, if you're only true,
She'll always forgive you, whate'er you do."

Say, boys, how much do you think she's worth? Not in money, but in figures. Let's think and see. Suppose when a fellow is born he weighs nine pounds. His mother would carry him around at the least on an average of three hours every day for, say six months of his baby life. Three hours a day in seven days would be twenty-nine hours; twenty-nine times thirty equal six hundred and thirty hours every month; six hundred and thirty times six equal three thousand, seven hundred and eighty hours, or one hundred and fifty-four days a fellow's mother has carried around, lifted up and down between eight and ten pounds of a squirming, kicking, crying, laughing piece of humanity.

She probably walks across a fifteen-foot floor, back and forth, in and out, equal to fifty times a day, and upstairs about three times a day, or with two feet she walks at least one thousand and eight hundred feet every day. In ten years she will have walked two hundred and ninety-two thousand feet. Some of you can tell how many miles that will be.

When she has to begin to cook for a growing boy or girl, beginning at three years of age—although a good hunk of nice bread with lots of butter and "lasses" on it tasted good before we were three years old—she cooks one thousand and ninety-five meals a year, or in ten years ten thousand, nine hundred and fifty meals.

What a whopper of a clothesline it would take to hold all the clothes a fellow's mother has washed for him in ten years! It would fly a kite as big as the side of a barn so high that you couldn't see it with a spyglass.

Say, boys, did you ever watch a friend of yours run a race, or jump, or fight? Didn't you strain your muscles while watching him? I have seen two boys fight, surrounded by their friends, these friends circling around the boys that were fighting, swinging their arms and clinching their fists out of sympathy for their friends who were fighting. That is exactly the way with a fellow's mother. Every time she sees you fall or hears you cry it is a strain on her because of her sympathy and love for you. It often hurts her more than it does you when you get hurt. She had been strained this way hundreds of times and you didn't know it.

Don't she often look tired and worn out? And sometimes you think she is cross. Just think what she has been doing all of these years. Suppose there are three, four, or five children in the family to be waited on. My! what a pile of work she does, the many miles she walks, the many words she has to say, the stockings she has darned, the clothes she has mended. Maybe about election time many of you were cheering for Bryan, and many for Roosevelt, but let's remember mother; all get together, boys and girls, no matter if it is Sunday; now, three cheers and a "tiger" for poor, tired, patient, hard-working mother!

AN ARROW FROM THE BEYOND

BY JOSEPH LUFF

(From a sermon.)

We are told that when an immense chasm was to be bridged on a certain occasion, an arrow was shot across it, unto which was appended a thread, and at the end of which was a cord, and at the end of the cord, was appended a rope, at the end of which rope was appended a cable of stronger texture; and thus in the line of development and increase they moved until we are permitted to go to-day from one side to the other and learn and enjoy.

If it be confessed that beyond that line that is drawn by death we can not by the human eye see, we can not comprehend, it is but reasonable to suppose that in this state if it is necessary for us to know in regard to it, there shall be shot from the other side the arrow that shall contain the thread, utilizing which we may gain the stronger evidence, until the line of communication shall be established as shall be determined in the wisdom of the other side, from whence it is claimed the power of our being originated.

I think I appreciate the statement of Job made away back yonder when the inspiration of God rested upon him and he said:

Oh, that my words were now written! Oh that they were printed in a book! That they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever! For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth: and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God.

And I am ready for the next revelation of this same Spirit as it floated down through the ages and rested upon the Psalmist, when he made the declaration that "God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave, for he shall receive me."

I trace on along the line and discover the movements of the Spirit until it comes later on upon the head and heart of Isaiah and is noted in the twenty-sixth chapter of his book. I am ready to receive that music to my waiting spirit, and it is in rapport as he states:

Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake, and sing, ye that dwell in dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead.

Is there no comfort for me and for other mourning ones from such a statement as this, associated with the claim that, "as we have borne the image of the earthly, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly," for in our God's hands rests "the issues that are from death"?

I see that inspiration moving along further until it rests upon Ezekiel. There are a number of people there who are mourning because of their conditions of bereavement, separated from their friends, dying out, and seemingly forgotten of God. His promise seems to have died from his own remembrance, and mourning and sad they deplore this condition in which they find themselves, when God by that Spirit comes upon Ezekiel and takes him hastily away off and puts him in a valley that is filled with dry bones and tells him what this was, what it meant, and after he has accomplished his work he says: Go now and explain to this people, that though they shall say we are actually cut off from our parts, and our bones are dried and are dead, say to them that the power of the Highest is not limited to the brief period this side of the tomb, but presses its force and dominion beyond it, bursts the fetters that hold the clay, and will bring them forth out of their graves and then unto the land upon the mountains of Israel, and the earth shall know that I am the Lord, the God who hath accomplished this work, that my promise holds good through a thousand generations.

Daniel got hold of the same inspiration and said, "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt."

Following on till the dispensation according to the New Testament record was ushered in, the great theme startled some of those who had not prepared themselves for it, when Jesus as a representative, voicing in practice and in theory the philosophy of the heavens, said:

I am the resurrection, and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die.

Turn to his statement as recorded in the fifth chapter of John. After he had startled some by the peculiar announcement that some should hear his voice, he says:

Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation.

So this feature of philosophy is expressed all the way through. The gospel of Jesus Christ contains the substance of our hope, and it presents this thought to our minds in such a way as to leave it impossible for man's confidence to be destroyed by the arguments that are arrayed against it in this world.

A LETTER FROM THE PAST

REMARKABLE VISION OF PRESIDENT JOSEPH SMITH.
ORIGIN OF THE WELL-KNOWN HYMN, LET US
SHAKE OFF THE COALS FROM OUR GARMENTS

BY ELDER W. W. BLAIR

Brother Sheen: I must tell you something more of the good time we had last October, in visiting around with Brethren Joseph, Alexander and David Smith, and Brother William Davis. I think the incidents which I shall relate will be duly appreciated by the Saints.

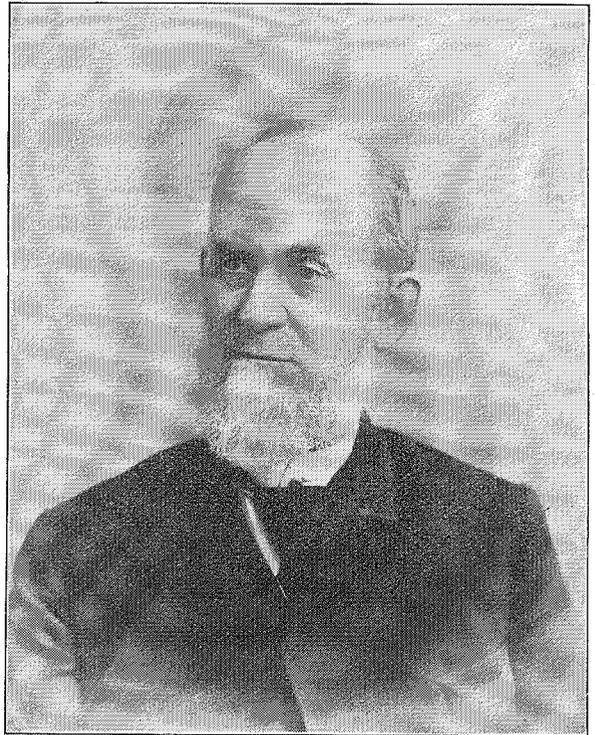

On Friday, October 16, I accompanied the brethren to Gallands Grove. We stopped at the house of Brother Alexander McCord. That night Joseph had a remarkable night vision, which he told in the morning. He said:

I saw in my dreams a woman, whom I was to receive into my charge, and under my watchcare and counsel, and she was almost wild, having been held captive a long season by barbarism who had degraded and dishonored her. She was nearly naked. The clothes that were upon her were tattered and torn, and very filthy withal, and her whole appearance was that of extreme wretchedness.

In her pitiable condition, she looked with distrust upon all around her, especially on me, apparently fearing lest I, too, would abuse and disgrace her. My heart was deeply moved with her deplorable condition. I ordered that she be washed, her hair combed, and that suitable apparel be given her, including clean underclothes. My request having been complied with, I now saw her again. But how changed, how entirely different from what I saw her last. Her garments now were of spotless purity, her eye beamed with joy and delight, her fears and misgivings were entirely banished, and she expressed her unbounded gratitude to me, as her friend and benefactor, while she clasped her arms around my neck, and imprinted upon my cheek a multitude of kisses, with all the tender affections of a mother.

I said when I heard it that the dream or vision was of the Lord, and that the woman was the church, her captors a corrupt ministry; her wild, ragged, dirty condition represented her sinful, demoralized state; her distrust represented what is being said by many of the Saints in Europe and America, that is, that by and by Joseph will lead into the same corrupt doctrines and practices as Brigham Young, Strang, and others; the clothing, in clean apparel, represented the redeeming of the Saints by righteousness; the balance is easily understood. How plain this points out Joseph's mission, and what will be done. . . .

From Gallands Grove we proceeded on to Bluff City, to Glenwood, and thence to Plum Hollow, eight miles north of Sidney. David, who for the past ten days had been sorely afflicted with a sore throat, now began to feel like himself. He "tuned his pipes," and with his brethren, and Brother Elijah Gaylord's and Noah Green's families, who are sweet singers, sang the songs of Zion, many of them his own composition, till we all forgot the sorrowful world without, and felt that paradise was well-nigh regained, and we were made to rejoice in the blessedness of our heavenly prospects, and present joys. May the Lord minister many such happy seasons to his Saints. From here we went to Manti, and here is a cluster of the "true vine." Our venerable Brother Wheeler Baldwin, whose head is whitened by nearly eighty summers past, presides over this people with ability and discretion. . . .

At Manti we had a joyous time. In one of the evening prayer meetings Brother Joseph spoke in prophecy, relative to the work the Lord had lately begun in that place; immediately upon this David arose in the congregation, and in the Spirit of the Lord, sang the first two verses of the following beautiful hymn, which he afterwards wrote down:

Tune: "Fading Flowers."

Let us shake off the coals from our garments
And arise in the strength of our Lord;
Let us break off the yoke of our bondage,
And be free in the joy of the word;
For the pebble has dropped in the water,
And the waves circle round with the shock—
Shall we anchor our barks in the center,
Or drift out and be wrecked on the rock?

Let us waken our songs in the morning,
And let them at noontide resound;
Then the evening will find us rejoicing,
While the law in our hearts will be found;
For the Lord is remembering Zion,
And bringing her comfort once more,
Shall we anchor our barks in the center,
Or drift out and be wrecked on the shore?

Thank the Lord for the plan he has given,
That will render us pure as a child,
That will change this cold earth into heaven,
By his Spirit so holy and mild;
And the hope of a portion in Zion,
Shall cheer us till trials are o'er,
Let us anchor our barks in the center,
And be safe from the rocks on the shore.

The congregation seemed spellbound, as with eagerness they listened to catch the heaven-inspired song, as it fell from his lips in all its richness and power. Every soul was thrilled, and every heart melted under the sweet, peaceful influences of the Holy Spirit, which attended and bore witness to the word. Our visit was, to all, I trust, a feast of fat things, the mention of which, in times long to come, will awaken many happy, joyous recollections. . . .

TROUBLE

BY JAMES E. YATES

What is trouble? Who is free from it? What part of the usual troubles of men and nations could be avoided? If so, how? Here is an array of questions supplying material for profitable reflection.

Ordinarily defined, "Mental agitation, distress, or worry" is trouble. But do these terms amply define? Words, of course, can not express all that burdened hearts feel when trouble spreads her somber curtain. As a mistress, she is a dame whose sole ambition is to lay heavy burdens upon the shoulders of those who make here acquaintance.

She does not gain her notoriety by laying the heaviest burdens in open sight of all men; for her most distressing compliments are paid to patrons in secret; and trouble in the unseen chambers of the heart is more bitter when it dare not be divulged.

But if it were not possible for even the bitterness of this dame's cup to ultimately contribute to the best health of the world, despair would be her inseparable companion.

If it were not possible that thrusts from her goad be found in the end to have been the very spur of achievement, misery might well be counted complete, and woe be permitted to claim us all as her own.

However, it is not only possible that the cup of bitterness may have place as an elevating element, but it is a very certain truth.

Spiritual-minded persons in all the past have so regarded it, as for instance, read Hebrews 12: 11, 12:

Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby. Wherefore lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees.

They who learn this truth may be subject to trouble without distress, to adversity without despair, to sorrow without woe, and to the bearing of heavy burdens without loss; and may even grow in grace thereunder.

Reading from Corinthians 4: 8, 9, 17, we have the thought in this language:

We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed. . . . For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

That none are exempt from traveling along some of the unpleasant roads between here and glory, is evident from the statement concerning even our Lord:

Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered; and being made perfect, he (thus) became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him.—Hebrews 5: 8, 9.

From the fact that no one in this world has ever yet been excused from making, at least some small acquaintance with the uncertain, yet certain, mistress, Mrs. Trouble, her coming is certain, though the particular kind of vehicle in which she will approach is not; and arrivals have been known where the trip was made on foot.

The experiences narrated concerning the life of the great, good, and patient man, Job, set forth in a cold, historical way, the descent of trouble, the bitterness of which no setting of words could portray; yet, in the midst of all, an unexcelled example is set out before all the world, in these words of integrity, Job 5: 17:

Behold, happy is the man whom God correcteth: therefore despise not thou the chastening of the Almighty: for he maketh sore, and bindeth up: he woundeth, and his hands make whole. He shall deliver thee in six troubles: yea, in seven there shall no evil touch thee.

Note, the statement is not that the Lord will cause his people to be entirely free from trouble, but that at the proper time, whether it be at the end of six troubles, seven, or many more, he will deliver thee. It is evident, then, that so far as the "mental agitation" part of the definition is concerned, it is regarded in the Holy Scriptures as a needful exercise; even though the said exercise be of a very uncomfortable and trying nature.

Dividing the definition between the terms "mental agitation" and "distress," we find that the latter is the part that we may learn to avoid entirely. How? By obedience to the commandments of God! Why? Because the wrongdoing of others may cause us trouble, but our own sins produce distress.

The universal law of cause and effect applies here also,—and this, too, was embraced in the treatise by Job upon the subject, as follows: "Although affliction cometh not forth of the dust, neither doth trouble spring out of the ground" (Job 5: 6).

And so the strongest force of a lie is its own reflex action which strikes the liar himself, and sooner or later (generally both soon and late), causes distress.

The reflex action of habitual drunkenness strikes the drunkard with "snakes."

The adulterer sears his own conscience with a hot iron, and sears the most choice of all which God has put in his keeping, namely, virtue and chastity.

The murderer lays a black stain upon his own soul, and opens a relentless stream of distress which shall beat upon his poor, miserable head until he learns that the wages of sin is death.

The thief, and they who wickedly gather gains at the expense of the suffering poor, may enjoy their spoils for awhile, but unless they repent their distress waiteth not, and their damnation slumbereth not.

Parents who set a wicked example before their children sow to the wind, and later reap to the whirlwind, when the results of that sewing come back with compound interest.

Any youth may fly from the home tree and cause sorrow to the parents by his misdeeds, but deeper distress is theirs who are conscious that justice lays the responsibility of their children's sins upon their parents' shoulders.

But as it is true that God's judgments of retribution follow the wicked unto the third and fourth generation, it is also true that righteous parents bestow grace upon their children, to the end that the children, and the children's children, are absolved from many troubles. Parentage may also receive a divine guarantee as to the welfare of their posterity, which it is a joy to possess.

So, in every trouble, the path of safety is to do as Job said, "I would seek unto God, and unto God would commit my cause" (Job 5: 8). Doing so, we have this promise uttered by the same man of God: Thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field: . . . and thou shalt know thy tabernacle shall be in peace; . . . thou shalt know also that thy seed shall be great and thine offspring as the grass of the earth. Then shalt thou come to thy grave in full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in in his season (Job 5: 23-26).

Come then, O troubled soul, be in league with stability, with the "stones of the field," with the mountains and with the everlasting hills,—even in ultimate peace, will furnish an ever-present guarantee that all the completeness of their felicity shall surely be yours.

THE CHURCH IN RURAL COMMUNITIES

BY CHARLES FRY

(The above is the title of a paper read before the Quorum of Priests at the late conference, and which upon request of the bishops was referred by the quorum to the Order of Bishops, by whom it was returned with attached report. The original paper having been hastily prepared, the quorum upon request of the writer consented to its being rewritten, and the following is the result. It is by request of the quorum referred to the EDITORS of the SAINTS' HERALD.)

There was a time in the early days of the Reorganization when rural settlements furnished the most inviting soil for the sowing of the gospel seed and the establishment of the church; but during the fifty years that have intervened many changes of condition have taken place both in country and city, which necessitate a different procedure than formerly if the church is to make its proper development. It is of the rural part of the gospel field especially that we wish to write.

CHANGED CONDITIONS

However well or poorly the former methods of extending and maintaining the gospel work in rural communities may have been, it has become apparent that they will not answer for the present time. The world around us has changed. A new social ideal has taken hold of the country, and the people are becoming awakened to their needs. The old condition of isolation for the rural population no longer satisfies, and better conditions are being sought, though largely without success. The increase of wealth, the advance of civilization, the marvelous developments in machinery, transportation, and communication, have tended to lessen the defect of isolation; but, on the other hand the country has suffered a drainage of its created wealth toward the cities, as also of its population, while the ownership of much of the land is passing to wealthy city men, with the result that many more of the rural population are becoming renters who can ill afford to en-of idle church buildings and decaying or dead congregations equally with other churches.

CAUSE OF FAILURE

Protestantism has failed to meet the country's need because no provision is made in its creeds for meeting the social or collective needs of the people, and also because of its division into sects, which makes any united effort impracticable. Nevertheless, the Protestant churches have for some years been making frantic efforts to meet the needs, moved by a desire for self-preservation, but in this they have found their most difficult problem.

The failure of the Reorganized Church to meet these needs is not due to a lack of laws governing, but to other causes, for the revelations to the church point out the work to be done, and furnish sufficient of the plan of procedure to justify a start being made in the establishment of an advanced social order. We believe this new social order under the gospel is to begin with small communities organized under both the law of the land and the law of the church, and there is no other field so inviting as the rural community.

RURAL PROBLEMS

Our rural churches need help. They are usually composed of a small membership, scattered over a wide territory, and intermixed with a much larger number of nonmember neighbors, many of whom, though good citizens, are not in sympathy with our religion, and whose influence is such as to draw away the interest of the young of the church from the faith of their fathers. Their scattered condition renders it difficult for them to meet regularly together in religious service, or in the occasional social gathering. Often the members are tenants upon rented farms with no assurance of permanency, which renders them indisposed to give with any liberal hand for the building of houses of worship or the maintenance of those already built. This, with a general indifference upon the part of other members, leaves the church property ill kept, making it uninviting. Quite often the branches are imperfectly organized, lacking in the essential officers. Then too, the call of the city with its offers of work and pleasure draws a considerable portion of the young life away from the rural communities.

Besides the rural branches there are many individual members, families, and sometimes several families in a place located here and there throughout the land having no church privileges, and are known as "scattered members." These also need the help of the church and its fostering care. Occasionally some of these, desiring to gather, either with or without counseling with the bishops, move into one joy the advantages of the progressing times. Thus the distinctions of wealth and poverty (for there are many prosperous farmers) are apparent in the rural districts as well as in the cities.

Interests in religion in the country has declined. There are eight hundred abandoned church buildings in the State of Ohio, and twice that number in Illinois, many of which are in the rural places. What is true of these two States is to some extent true throughout the land, for the methods of all the churches regarding rural religious work have been found to be inadequate, and new methods are being tried from time to time in the vain attempt to solve the difficult problem of "the country church."

Our own church has accomplished little more than others, either in caring for its rural membership or in improving rural conditions, and has suffered from the same conditions, and to-day it has its proportion of the stakes, too often to find themselves as isolated as before, not finding always a convenient opening within the limits of an organized branch.

THE DIVINE SOCIAL PLAN

We think it must be conceded that the church has not had the success in gathering in new members and building them up in the gospel that the character of our cause would seem to warrant. So far our work has been individual and not social or collective; yet it is well known that the revelations given at the time of the restoration provided for a social and economic system that would meet the many needs of the rural communities as well as the towns and cities. But we have failed to put it into operation, and the world has seen little, if anything, in our work that is superior to that of other churches.

It seems to us to have been a part of the divine purpose in the establishment of the church that the Saints should gather together in rural communities, rather than all in any one place. The divine social plan must of necessity take in the rural life, for agriculture is the basis of all industry, and without the country the cities could not exist. While the industrial life of the city has remained far short of the divine standard, that of the country has been no less so. In one the social privileges is abused to an extreme degree, pleasure and sin being indulged in to the neglect of the more essential things—virtue, justice and mercy, while wealth is multiplied through industrial oppression; in the other the social life is largely unprovided for, and wearying toil holds both man and woman without the opportunity of proper recreation for mind and body, with intellectual and moral development.

What then is the duty of the church? and what is its opportunity? Organization under the law, is the only answer. It is the key to the gathering as applied to rural communities. It will open the gate to a happy and prosperous rural communal life. Without it Zion can not be established, and God's people can not be saved in a collective capacity:

It must needs be that they are organized according to my laws, if otherwise, they will be cut off.—Doctrine and Covenants 51: 1.

The divine counsel immediately after the organization of the church was:

Missouri . . . is the land which I have appointed and consecrated for the gathering of the Saints: wherefore it is a land of promise, and the place for the city of Zion. . . . Independence is the center place . . . wherefore it is wisdom that the land should be purchased by the Saints [in that place]; and also every tract lying westward. . . and also every tract bordering by the prairies. . . . Buy land in all the regions round about, inasmuch as can be in righteousness.—Doctrine and Covenants 57: 1, 2.

And every church in the eastern countries when they are built up, if they will hearken unto this counsel, they may buy lands and gather together upon them, and in this way they may establish Zion.—Ibid. 98: 10.

It must be apparent from these statements that the center place was not the only place for the gathering of the Saints, but that communities could be built up in the outlying places by the gathering together of the Saints in groups, being organized according to the law. The gathering in communities is further declared to be the proper order of procedure in the revelation given on Fishing River:

Carefully gather together, as much in one region as can be consistently with the feelings of the people.—Ibid. 102: 7.

In more recent years, as if to counteract the effects of a false anticipation of the Saints to all gather to the center place, and to show the proper way to gather, the Lord said:

The great variety of callings, avocations, and professions will present difficulties precluding the practicability of all settling and living in near proximity to each other.—Ibid. 128: 6.

It must be understood that the term regions round about must mean more than a small area of country round about the central spot, and that the necessities of the great majority of the church in gathering together can only be provided for by settling carefully together as many in one region as may be practicable and profitable and in accordance with the feelings of the people under the laws existing in the places where such settlements are to be made.—Ibid. 128: 5.

The gathering together in the various communities was to be by organization under the proper officers of the church, rather than by individual action, which aims at nothing for the general good and accomplishes little more:

The conditions . . . require that the bishopric be authorized to take such measures as will bring to pass the organization of those who are desirous and willing to form parts in colonization under the terms of association in different localities where settlements may be made.—Ibid. 128: 1.

POSSIBILITIES

We do not wish to discuss the methods of procedure in organizing,—these must be left to experience and to the bishopric to work out; but we may notice some of the possibilities. The following is not presented as a result which can be realized in every detail, but as a suggestion of the ideal which may give a stimulus tending toward a forward movement.

Should a number of scattered Saints who desire to place themselves under the law of Christ in gathering together appeal to the bishopric for advice and counsel in seeking a location, and under the direction of the bishopric authorize one or more of their number, or other trustworthy and wise person, or persons, to go and carefully purchase land in the place selected, the money for which being placed in his or their hands, or made available to his or their order by those interested, these persons entering these lands under an organic union according to the law, ample provision being made for every man so far as possible, a community organization would be established; and if the place selected was one having already a number of Saints residing there, or perhaps an organized branch, such Saints being willing to cooperate with the incoming brethren, the work would be somewhat easier. A nucleus thus formed would be the beginning of continued gathering in that community, both by other Saints coming in and by the conversion of their neighbors, until the organization should become as large as could be properly managed within itself. The full organization must be of necessity a development perhaps of years, but there must be a beginning.

Suppose that under this plan the Saints should own all the land, or even a majority portion of it in a school district; this would place enough families in close proximity sufficient to maintain an active, live branch or organization, perhaps owning their own place of worship, and having control of their own public school, and with social opportunities better than are usually found in the country. Should such a colonization society extend to include in its territory a township, it would enjoy advantages which could not be enjoyed under a smaller organization. A civic center could be formed near the center, including a church building of suitable proportions and conveniences to meet the necessities of the community; a school beginning with the first grade and ending at least with the fourth year of high school, or even including an industrial school where the various trades could be taught; a public assembly hall, gymnasium, athletic park, and, if necessary, stores, mills, factories, and other things that go to make up a village or rural town.

A township of the usual size, six miles square, or thirty-six square miles, would have, counting forty acres to a family, five hundred and seventy-six families, which, counting five to a family, would contain a population of two thousand eight hundred and eighty. These five hundred and seventy-six families of landowners could well support a civic center as described above. Under the inspiration which would attend such a community living under the divine law, educational work could be carried to a point far beyond what is now common in the rural school, or even in the cities. With such a population there would be sufficient talent of various kinds to maintain auxiliary organizations covering every phase of social, educational, and religious life. The children could be furnished transportation to and from school as is now being done in many townships in different parts of the country, and at less expense than it costs to maintain separate schools. The average distance of all the families of the community to the center would be three miles,—not so far but that all could go.

The possibilities for development and enlarging upon the activities of life are almost unlimited in such a community. The young finding the advantages for social life, recreation, entertainment, and refinement equal or surpassing those found in the cities now would not be drawn away by the latter, and the community spirit would bind all together so strongly that few would care to leave. Perhaps all the land in any certain district could not be purchased; but with the Saints exemplifying the law of Christ in a practical way, the better class of their neighbors would be constrained to come in and be numbered with them.

Such a community would prosper. There is scarcely a part of the country anywhere that is not increasing in wealth rapidly, but under present conditions the created wealth goes largely to landlords, speculators, and others outside to be made the basis of further extortions. Under the organization here mentioned, however, the wealth created would be largely retained within the community, providing means for public improvements and for the support of the church work, the helping of the poor, etc. The protection which the organization would afford against loss by fire, sickness, accident, or death, the common treasury being a guarantee against necessity upon the part of every member,—would reserve within the community most of the money which is now being paid out for insurance, etc.

Of necessity the Saints in such communities must buy many things from outside markets and in turn sell to the same. The Lord has said:

They can not withdraw themselves so completely from a qualified dependence upon their Gentile neighbors surrounding them as to be entirely free from intercommunication with them; yet it is incumbent upon the Saints while reaping the benefits of these organizations to so conduct themselves in the carrying into operation the details of their organizations as to be in the world but not of it, living and acting honestly and honorably before God and in the sight of all men, using the things of this world in the manner designed of God, that the places where they occupy may shine as Zion, the redeemed of the Lord.—Ibid. 128: 8.

SALVATION—TEMPORAL AND SPIRITUAL

Such gathering and cooperation of effort of our rural membership would be their salvation, temporal and spiritual. The young, so many of whom are now being drawn away from the church and the gospel by the overwhelming influences of the world, would be not only held within the church, but the church would have their whole-hearted support. The talents which are now left dormant in many would find opportunity for development and expression in all. With the whole gospel of Christ put into actual practice, every man having his work, dealing honestly and justly, the gospel rule operating to maintain a sane and workable system of equality, and the gospel work, both local and general, receiving ample support, these would cause the windows of heaven to be opened for the outpouring of such spiritual blessing as the church has not hitherto received, under which multitudes would be constrained to seek God and yield obedience to his laws. They would indeed "shine as Zion, the redeemed of the Lord." In such a community the church organization could be made more perfect than is now usual; and the duties of the various officers more effectually carried out to the good of all.

We must look for higher things than we have yet known. The greatness of the latter-day work has but feebly dawned upon our minds. It is to be a marvelous work; and if we are to accomplish what has been intrusted to our care it must be by different methods than we have hitherto used, not forgetting personal righteousness, which is the beginning of all true progress. We again repeat: Organization according to the law is the divine plan under which the membership of the church may, with the divine blessings of temporal prosperity and spiritual power, carry to completion the great work of the last dispensation preparatory to the ushering in of the millennium.

ACTION OF BISHOPRIC

To the Quorum of High Priests; Brethren: In reference to the matter contained in the paper written by Charles Fry, and which was referred to the Order of Bishops for consideration and report to your body, suggesting any definite outline by which real settlements may be made in keeping with the spirit of the revelations to the church as affecting colonizations and the gathering we submit the following as the opinion of the bishopric:

1. We believe that the time is now for the purchase of lands for the settlement of Saints.
2. That these lands should be purchased in the stakes and districts surrounding the central place, known as Independence, Missouri.
3. That in the purchase of these lands it should be had through the management of the bishops and such other church officers whose duties lie in the direction of settling the Saints, thus precluding the possibility of isolation and depriving the Saints from proper association in the matter of settlement.
4. However desirable the condition might be, were it possible or practicable to secure whole townships for such settlements, we can not withdraw ourselves from our Gentile neighbors so completely as to be entirely independent of them. It is written that "the Gentiles shall assist in rebuilding the waste places of Zion."
5. It is our opinion it is essential for numbers of Saints to settle in sufficient nearness to each other to establish religious, moral, and educational centers, thus influencing for good the entire community.

6. We believe further that the work in outlying branches and districts should not be neglected by the workers in such branches and districts, and that they should continue their labors there until such time, in consultation with the bishops and such general church officers as may have authority, they are advised to move into the "regions round about."

We respectfully request that in the event of the publication of Brother Fry's paper, the foregoing report accompany such publication.

Respectfully submitted,

J. A. BECKER, Secretary of the Bishopric.

In All The World No Trip Like This

It's almost a man's duty as an educational process, to take his family, while the railroad fares to California have been cut in two and visit the great Expositions at San Francisco and San Diego; seeing on the way out the marvelous Mountain Scenery of Colorado—Denver, Colorado Springs, Pikes Peak, Pueblo, the stupendous and world-famous Royal Gorge, and Salt Lake City. Then you should return by way of the North Pacific Coast and either Glacier or Yellowstone National Park. You will never have the same opportunity and if you use the through Pullman service of the Burlington Route (C. B. & Q. R. R.) or join one of those comfortable, economical and care-free Personally Conducted Excursions, you can see the wonders of Colorado without extra cost, for you will pass all those most interesting points by daylight. Don't forget that. Here's the idea! Sit right down and write or come in and tell me how many expect to make the trip, just when you want to go, the points you want to visit, how long you expect to stay, and I will plan a trip especially fitted to your time and needs—then you will know all about it. If you decide to go, I will make arrangements for your complete trip, when the time comes for you to start. Do it to-day—before you forget it.

BAKING POWDER

ABSOLUTELY PURE

Makes the food finer in appearance, more delicious to the taste, more healthful. Royal is the aid to many a cook's success.

Requests for Prayers

B. Heber Thomas, of Greenfield, Michigan, is threatened with consumption, but is needed by his wife and family. He is a brother to Elder E. H. Thomas, of Pittsburgh Branch, who sends this request in his behalf. Elder Thomas requests his friends among the ministry to remember him.

Brother and Sister John Lang, sr., of Pittsburgh Pennsylvania, Branch request prayers for their two daughters who sorely need the Lord's help. Sister Elsie has been ill for six months with heart and stomach trouble, and the doctor seems helpless to do any more for her. She seems to be sinking gradually. Sister Amelia, her sister, is affected mentally. This home is very deserving of the favor.

General Conference Visitors

For information of those planning to attend General Conference, Lamoni, Iowa, beginning April 6, 1915, as also Religio and Sunday school conventions, beginning April 2, the committee appointed by Lamoni Branch wish to say:

The Saints of Lamoni will have a first-class dining hall in operation, serving meals to all who wish them at the following prices: Club breakfasts 10, 15, and 20 cents; dinner 25 cents; supper 20 cents.

Those in charge of dining hall wish to get in touch with a forelady who will take this position during the time it is open for meals. There are also a few opportunities for those wishing to serve tables in payment for their meals. Send these applications to Amos Berve, Lamoni, Iowa, at once.

Entertainment in homes will cost those who make such arrangements $4.50 per week, board and lodging. Lodging and breakfast will be served in homes to those unable to go out to breakfast, at reasonable prices.

Rooms in private homes will be $1 per person per week.

In order to the best work by the committee, those contemplating attending should not delay in letting the committee know that they are coming, fully informing the committee of their needs and wants. Should one who is badly crippled be assigned a place which would put him out of reach of the conference, the committee could not be justly blamed if proper information had not been handed them. Will you, therefore, write your letter along the following lines:

1. When are you coming, and how long do you expect to remain.
  2. Give the full names of the persons for whom you write.
  3. If man and wife, and you must stop at same place, do not fail to so state, or you may be put in different places.
- Committee will meet all trains and see that you get to your stopping places if they are properly informed along the lines indicated.

A PLEA OF THE SUBSTITUTE

It frequently occurs that one seeking to purchase some well-known and reliable article of commerce is met by the dealer with the statement, "We are out of that; but we have something else just as good at a lower price."

That is the plea of the substitute, and as a rule it is false, because if the article were as good as the original it would stand on its own merits instead of posing as a substitute, and it would command a price equal with that of the original.

In a somewhat similar manner in religion and ethics, when some one has outlined a true and correct principle of conduct, some one else recommends another which is "just as good, and a great deal easier." Unfortunately, too, the appeal is successful in many instances.

This was illustrated in a striking manner in the case of the Galatian Saints, to whom Paul wrote, "O, foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth."—Galatians 3:1.

Christ had been set forth before them, but afterward some one had recommended some substitute for his gospel and they had accepted it; because Paul said, "I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another gospel: which is not another."—Galatians 1:6, 7.

Paul touched on the weak point of the substitute. It is not, and can not be, what the original is. In this case the substitute for the gospel of Christ was not the gospel of Christ at all, and no matter how easily it was obeyed, it was not worth the price.

Will there be any substituting in our day? It is written, "They shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables."—2 Timothy 4:4.

That is why people to-day plead the thought that some other baptism is just as good as the baptism of John and of Jesus, and much more convenient.

That is why we are told that some other form of church organization is as good as the one outlined in the New Testament Scriptures.

That is why some have abandoned the principles of the doctrine of Christ and substituted creeds that are just as good—"Because it does not matter what we believe if we are only honest."

That is why some, who do none of these things, in matters of personal duty substitute something else for that which God requires.

We must learn that almost right is not right; that almost truth is not truth; that almost duty is not duty. There is no substitute for truth, or right, or duty. The plea of the substitute was first made in the Garden of Eden; it was a fraud then, and it is still a fraud.

ELBERT A. SMITH.

CURRENT EVENTS SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS

BOAT SINKS.—The United States submarine F-4 has from causes unknown been sunk outside the harbor at Honolulu with the entire crew on board. Efforts to get a signal from the crew have failed. The craft is being towed to shallow water.

CHURCH PUBLICITY.—Following an address by Doctor Tallcott Williams, director of the School of Journalism of Columbia University, the Presbyterian Social Union at Chicago, on the 24th, appointed a committee to develop plans to utilize the newspapers as a means of reaching the community with the message the church has for it.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—The United States has protested the collecting from foreigners of a part of a special tax levied at Monterey. Living conditions at Mexico City are said to have improved. Fighting between Carranza and Villa forces is reported favorable to the latter. General Blanco has been executed after trial for treason on order of Villa. British Consul Pierce and French Consul Ailloud have been expelled from Yucatan by order of Carranza. European nations and Japan urge intervention on the part of the United States, while South American countries advise against it.

UTAH PROHIBITION.—Following the recent adjournment of the Utah Legislature, Governor Spry vetoed the Wootton state-wide prohibition act. Giving his reasons, Governor Spry said: The legislature did not submit the question to a vote of the people, as members were pledged to do; supporters of the bill would not listen to suggestions, especially with reference to compensation for owners whose property would be made valueless; sections of the act conflicted and nullified its intent; local option would be strengthened; the bill would abolish the saloon and make the druggist the dispenser of alcoholics on a physician's prescription.

CHINA AND JAPAN.—The United States Government is said to have protested Japanese demands on China as violating the principles of equal opportunity as per agreement. Report from Peking is that China has agreed to the following concerning Manchuria: Japan's consent before a loan by a third power involving taxes in southern Manchuria; and before permission to a third power to build a railway, or when a loan is arranged for the building of a railway in southern Manchuria. Consultation with Japan when China employs advisors or instructors in southern Manchuria for political, financial or military purposes; transfer of the Kirin-Changechun Railway to Japanese control for ninety-nine years. Asked by China why Japanese soldiers were moved to China, Japan announced that it was for the relief of present Japanese garrisons in China, but that these garrisons would remain until the conclusion of present negotiations.

EUROPEAN WAR.—Russia has gained on her northern line. Memel, an important German Baltic port, has been taken, the Germans claiming to have retaken it. Przemysl, Galicia, has surrendered to Russia after a siege of six months, fifty thousand Austrians being taken prisoners. This is considered an important victory for Russia and the Allies. The Russians claim advances in Bukowina and the Carpathians, where furious fighting is reported. Lack of reports indicate a lull in the campaign in Belgium and France. Two British steamers have been sunk by German submarines. Four other British vessels have been torpedoed, two having been sunk. Two Dutch steamers have been taken to German ports. The Dutch Government has asked for an explanation. The Dutch steamer Medea is from London reported sunk by a German submarine. A Danish cargo of oil has been confiscated by Germany. It is reported from London that a Spanish ship laden with iron ore and proceeding to a German port has been captured by a British cruiser. The British battleships Irresistible and Ocean and the French battleship Bouvet have been blown up in the Dardanelles by floating mines. A French submarine has also been sunk. Reinforcements are en route to these waters. The British admiralty announces the probable sinking of the German submarine U-29. Attack on Smyrna is calculated to prevent Turkish troops from proceeding to the Dardanelles. The governor of Smyrna threatens the massacre of Christians. Massacre of Christians is reported from Persia, bread shortage and rioting reported at Vienna. Relations between Italy and Austria are thought to be more unsettled. Austria continues to fortify her frontier. Germans have been warned to leave Italy. Dispatch from Rome via London reports that all is in readiness for a general mobilization of the Italian army. A British prize court has ordered payment on American shipments of flour and wheat borne by Norwegian and British steamers and delayed. Attorney General Gregory has instructed the United States district attorney of Porto Rico to institute libel proceedings against the German steamship Odendwald, which had attempted to leave San Juan without clearance papers.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

HANSEN AND PARTY REACH AMERICA.—Under date of March 23, Elder H. N. Hansen wrote from New York City informing us that he and Brethren O. W. Okerlind and Peter Muceus had arrived at that port on the steamship Hellig Olav of the Scandinavian-American line, from Copenhagen, Denmark, and Christiana, Norway. They enjoyed a comparatively smooth and pleasant voyage, all were feeling well and "glad to stand once more on the shores of Joseph's land." They expect to meet with the Saints at General Conference.

THE TWELVE GOOD MATERIAL.—We forwarded to the Quorum of Twelve complimentary copies of the magazine number issued last week containing pictures of the members of the quorum and a history of the quorum. The quorum acknowledges receipt of these copies and compliments us on the good appearance of the portraits, but the secretary of the quorum adds that some credit must be given for the splendid material with which we had to work. With this of course we are happy to agree. But think of the good judgment the editors displayed in selecting such material!

PRESIDENT F. M. SMITH RECOVERS.—Following an operation for enlarged tonsils, President Frederick M. Smith was taken down with a severe attack of bronchitis accompanied by high fever. He was prostrated for some time by this illness, but at last report was rapidly recovering. He had returned to his temporary home in Worcester, Massachusetts, from Somerville, where he was at the time of his illness. The Saints everywhere will be pleased to hear that he is recovering, and will join in the wish and prayer that he may be restored to full vigor and health of body and mind for the coming General Conference.

YE JOTS MAN.—On the cover of our magazine number issued last week there appeared an excellent picture of Elder T. W. Chatburn, known as the "Jots Man," from his contributions, "Jots by the Way-

DESIGNATION OF SUCCESSOR TO THE PRESIDENT

The right of the president of the church to designate his successor is generally recognized in the church. This right is consistent with the rights and powers belonging to the president by virtue of the office which he holds and with the law governing in the matter of succession. We do not understand that the right to designate a successor is an arbitrary one, but one that belongs naturally and of necessity to the office of president in view of the gifts and powers bestowed upon him in his ordination. The revelation says:

And again, the duty of the president of the office of the high priesthood is to preside over the whole church, and to be like unto Moses. Behold, here is wisdom, yea, to be a seer, a revelator, translator and a prophet; having all the gifts of God which he bestows upon the head of the church.—Doctrine and Covenants 104: 42.

The selection of Joshua by Moses to lead Israel was made according to the direction of the Lord and not by the arbitrary will of Moses, as may be clearly seen by reading the 31st chapter of Deuteronomy, and the selection thus made was confirmed by the Lord, for we read, "And Joshua the son of Nun was full of the spirit of wisdom; for Moses had laid his hands upon him." (Deuteronomy 34: 9.) If the president of the church occupies his office in a similar manner as Moses did, it is to be presumed that his right to designate his successor will be exercised in the same way that Moses did,—by the direction of the Lord. Such designation would properly come within the bounds of his duty, occupying as he does as a seer, a revelator, and a prophet.

That such designation is understood by the church to be by inspiration or revelation is definitely shown by the statement in the minutes of the organization of the high council in 1834, which was adopted as the rule and law of the church in connection with the revelations in the Doctrine and Covenants in 1835. This statement reads:

The president of the church, who is also the president of the council, is appointed by revelation, and acknowledged, in his administration, by the voice of the church.—Doctrine and Covenants 99: 6.

Acting under the duty and privilege of his office, the late president of the church, Joseph Smith, who yielded his sacred office in death on December 10, 1914, after filling it in honor for nearly fifty-five years, had previously designated as his successor, his son—Frederick M. Smith. That such designation was made in harmony with the position already stated, viz, by the direction of the Lord through the Spirit of revelation is apparent from the evidences presented below.

At the General Conference of 1902, held at Lamoni,

Iowa, on April 19, when the acceptance of the revelation presented to the conference was under consideration, President Joseph Smith said in an address:

I have been importuned to settle the question as to who should be my successor. We have advanced upon the hypothesis of lineal priesthood in this regard, and while I believe in it, I believe it is connected with fitness and propriety, and no son of mine will be entitled to follow me as my successor, unless at the time that he is chosen he is found to be worthy in character. I should not expect it. I now state to you, brethren, under the influence of, to me, the Spirit of God, that should I be overtaken by death before some of the things which are anticipated shall be wrought, you have my successor in your midst. I do not say that he should be chosen; if at the time that this emergency should occur he is found to be worthy let him be chosen, if unworthy let him be rejected and another chosen from the body as the revelation provides. And should he be found unworthy and another of my sons found worthy, let the line descend, as I believe that it ought to; for a man should be called to the office to serve in the church who had proved himself to be worthy of confidence and trust.—General Conference Minutes, 1902, p. 541.

His eldest son, Frederick M. Smith, at the time this statement was made, occupied a seat at the reporters' table but a few feet from the speaker, and was evidently the one referred to.

The statement quoted shows clearly that President Smith understood that his right of appointment was not arbitrary, and further that whoever might be designated must be worthy to the satisfaction of the church before being set apart to the office and in case he should not be found thus worthy another should be chosen in the order provided for in the law. President Smith also affirms that the authority for the designation, reservedly expressed as it was, was the Spirit of God. The careful reserve with which the statement was made was probably due to the fact that the son referred to was at the time but little known to the church and was but just beginning his active work in the ministry. The revelation then under consideration called this son to be a counselor to his father in the presidency of the church,—an office which would give him actual experience in the work of the presidency.

Four years later, 1906, a revelation accepted by the church included the following paragraph:

Inasmuch as misunderstanding has occurred in regard to the meaning of a revelation hitherto given through my servant Joseph Smith in regard to who should be called to preside in case my servant should be taken away or fall by transgression, it is now declared that in case of the removal of my servant now presiding over the church by death or transgression, my servant Frederick M. Smith, if he remain faithful and steadfast, should be chosen, in accordance with the revelations which have been hitherto given to the church concerning the priesthood. Should my servant Frederick M. Smith prove unstable and unfaithful, another may be chosen, according to the law already given.—Doctrine and Covenants, 127: 8.

This designation is specific, and came by revelation through the proper officer to receive such.

On March 13, 1912, President Joseph Smith published in the official organ of the church, the SAINTS' HERALD, a lengthy document entitled, "A Letter of Instruction," setting forth his views of the law of succession and the procedure that should be followed in case of a vacancy in the office of president. In concluding this document President Smith wrote:

Assuming the right seemingly conferred in the revelations contained in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants and conforming to the safer principles enunciated in the legendary teachings of the eldership, I, Joseph Smith, the present incumbent to the office of president of the Reorganized Church, definitely designate my eldest living son, Frederick Madison Smith, as the proper person to be chosen by the church as my successor in office, believing as I do that the Spirit of revelation and wisdom has manifested to me that such choice should be made as directed by the Spirit of the great Master-builder. The present incumbent of the office of president of the Reorganized Church states further that he has trust and confidence in that Spirit which called him to the position which he has held for the last half century of time, and more, that such manifestation will be given to the several eldership of the church as will confirm the advice and direction herein given.—SAINTS' HERALD, March 13, 1912; republished March 10, 1915.

Thus it is clear that the late President, in purview of his official authority as a legal representative of the Lord and of the church, and in accordance with his duty and responsibility, did specifically point out his successor. Opponents of the church may attempt to discover in the appointment of his son a personal or family interest, or selfish motive, but since the law adopted by the church, even before Joseph Smith became a member of it, provided that succession in the priesthood should be by lineage, it becomes apparent that he was not responsible for the law, and that such criticism can not be justly made. So long as he had a son competent and worthy of the office, the law of the church did not permit him to go elsewhere to make the appointment.

A successor designated in the manner shown above must yet secure the approval of the church by its vote in General Conference, and be ordained by men holding the authority of God and the church before he can officiate in the office. By this rule the rights of the body are acknowledged and conserved.

THE COLLEGE

WHAT HAS IT COST US AND WHAT IS IT WORTH?

In the first place the amounts spent upon the college from the beginning, including overhead charges, and neglecting the fact that the college owns assets worth over $80,000, is quite comparable with the amounts spent in one year for the missionary force. We suggest this just to get a basis of comparison.

Consider it in another way: The endowments and offerings and expense of the college to the church is not over four per cent of the total amount donated for general church purposes.

The amount as a whole is not large, when we consider that it covers twenty years of work, and when we consider also the amount of good accomplished. Over thirteen hundred different individuals have been students at Graceland. Most of them have attended two or more years. The total attendance has been well over twenty-eight hundred.

Or if we consider the expenses of the church institutions, the average cost for each person baptized by the missionary force has been estimated at something like $200.

The old folks Home and Children's Home mean an expenditure from $70 to $120 for each person cared for. The Sanitarium, of course, has a much heavier cost per patient per year, but allowance must be made for the character of the work. We are not criticizing these facts, nor questioning the needs of these different departments. But when we discuss the heavy expense of the college, we should remember that it averages only about $40 per student per year.

In the report to the conference dated March 11, 1915, the budget shows that from various gifts, offerings, endowments and other external sources, about $9,500 is needed for the year. It should be remembered that all of the money received from the church or general Bishop is charged as an indebtedness. There has been no charging off of the account, but every cent received above the offerings and endowments is shown in the form of an indebtedness. During July 1, 1913, to July 1, 1914, the donations were exceptionally liberal. About $1,800 was collected by J. W. Wight. The Lamoni Branch in addition to what they gave to that collection donated about $500 more than usual in the College Day collection; Sister Helen M. Merrit, of Red Oak, willed the college $500; and Sister L. S. Schmutz willed to the college $292. In addition to this money individuals gave gifts of articles instead of money; such donations as a silo by Mrs. M. E. Hougas; donations from the Patroness Society, of bedding, table ware, and other furnishings; and donations of needed books to the library; in fact, many, seeing the need of the college and realizing that the money would not be used by us for the purpose of such articles, donated the needed articles.

We have further taken the position that no expense that could possibly be avoided is justified on behalf of the college under existing financial conditions. On this account many of those working for the college made donations by paying for articles needed for the administration of the college, but which we did not consider it just to purchase out of the college funds. These gifts in total amount would come around $2,000. The depreciation charge was nearly $1,700. Yet the increase of present worth is over $1,300. This shows the extent of the addition to have been slightly in excess of $3,000, but the greater part were gifts, and of the remaining lesser part needed repairs represent the greater share. The attendance was better for that year, and the result is that the amount of donations for all purposes and from all sources and the change in the amount of our indebtedness indicated running expenses of $9,000 in excess of tuition and internal receipts.

We use this term "internal receipts" to designate the income from the running of the college itself. All that is given by way of gifts, offerings or endowments, or received outside of the college students and college work proper is considered as external. This year the difference will be larger, and at present indications will be about $11,000. We have taken pains to be accurate in this statement. Hence we consider that $9,500 is a conservative estimate of the amount that should be received from offerings, endowments, gifts of all sorts, or from the church in some form or another.

But we state in our report that it could be done for less. The question at once arises, how? In the first place, it costs no more to teach a class of twenty than it does a class of two. Our rooms are large and the care given the Lamoni High School shows that we can take care of additional students. If Grace-land had three times the students she now has, it would mean almost pure gain. It would require a very slight if any increase in the faculty. The increase could take the form of clerical help by the students, and so help additional students to earn their way through college.

[We wish to emphasize this point, because some have the idea that the college is so crowded that additional students mean a corresponding additional expense and additional debt. Such is not the case. Additional students would make the administration easier from a financial standpoint.

It is true that for the year 1913-14 the girl's dormitory was full a good part of the time. This year, however, there has been room to spare. It is true that the boy's quarters or dormitories are very near filled, and often there is no additional room there. But nearly all of the faculty reside in Lamoni, and there are many private families who would take suitable pay borders. Again, the offer has been made by parties, who would be willing when the demand justifies it, to pay all expenses of a new dormitory and take their pay from the receipts. Two separate parties have made this offer, as a business venture on their part. We are clear that no such investment should be made by the college without first securing the approval of the General Conference.

But that is speculative and doubtful. The certainty is that the college could teach additional students without additional expense.

But there would remain the added problem of providing work for those who need work. And this is one of the gravest of our problems—to supply work for those who must have it in sufficient quantity to earn their board, if they are to be permitted to attend the college. It is noteworthy that in the year 1911-12, when the enrollment was two hundred and twenty-eight, the deficit was less than $6,000, which was more than covered by offerings and endowments.

Another possible economy of the future is, when the college debt can be paid and kept paid we shall be able to save the large amount paid as interest. For the year ending July 1, 1914, this item was about $1,500. This has to be figured with the expense of running the college each year.

Another expense item that could be saved is that the college is not able to buy for cash in purchasing supplies. The ability to pay cash promptly would mean marked saving in the running expenses, at the hotel, the farm and in purchasing material for repairs. Some have stated that the amount that could be saved would be equal to the interest, but we have not attempted to verify this, though we are sure the saving would be worth while. These two items, however, would have to await the paying off of a good part of our present indebtedness.

We will at once concede that when the debt is paid and the attendance increases to five or six hundred that there are some things the college needs, which we shall urge upon the conference. But we believe that the required amount of endowments or other help can be kept below its present figure through increased attendance and through the savings above indicated. And so far as the future years are concerned, we should be able to meet their problems frankly. For the present the above does admit of more economical management, through the proper support in new students and the payment of the debt.

We have emphasized the matter of cost amounting to $40 per student in excess of what is paid by the student. And it should be remembered that the amount paid by the student is much in excess of this, for living expenses as well as tuition. Now what does the college mean to us? We will concede that it does not make as ready an appeal as do the other institutions, but this is because we do not look far enough. We have all been babies, and a small child makes an immediate appeal. We all hope to live to a good old age. All have been sick or are afraid they may be sick, or both. But not all have been to college or expect to go. Yet for the future of the church it is difficult to see how any person can consider the matter fairly, and not see that the college means more to the church and its future than any other institution.

The young people who come there come from all over the world.—They are the ones, as a whole, who are anxious to assist in this work. They are the ones who will be of service in the missionary field, in local work, in the auxiliaries, in actively trying to extend to others what they have gained. From among them are those who will be local leaders and active workers for the church. So far as the income from the investment is concerned, comparison is hardly possible. The energy and devotion required to come and shovel coal, dig ditches, wash dishes, work in the laundry, to secure an education is that which means successful workers for the Master.

But could they not go to other schools and receive the same benefit? Educational leaders are coming to recognize the necessity of putting the whole man to school, physically and spiritually as well as mentally. But this is not universal. There is a decided tendency towards agnosticism. We need our young people to make that step from a simple child-like faith, which accepts everything and asks nothing, to a faith which is founded upon knowledge. This requires care and watchfulness. It demands personal attention. We can not spend money to a better advantage than in keeping our young people under our own care through this critical period. We want to hold them on the basis of truth, that they need not shrink from the investigation of any truth. But there is a time intellectually and physically when the support of a strong hand is needed. On this topic alone a book might be written.

Education should be the development of the natural ability in preparation for life service. If it is not humble, it fails of its purpose. From our college and from those who have had educational advantages elsewhere the influence is felt in our General Conference, in the missionary field, and in our branches throughout the church. Even those who can not come receive a benefit.

Nor is our work founded on selfishness. It would be best if that were the only way for us all to sacrifice for one man, that he in turn may help up others, and those still others, until the whole body was raised, rather than to continue always in the one treadmill without advancement. It is by such sacrifice and such devotion for the common cause that our work will progress.

But we concede that it is not enough for one man to be advanced. That has been done, many others have been helped, and now we have advanced to the time and condition where an effort is being made through the Extension Institute and in other ways to extend this benefit as widely as possible to all who desire to better fit themselves for service in the work of God. The college is only one force in that purpose of preparation. The Extension Institute, the quorum meetings, priesthood meetings, auxiliary work, and later the school of the prophets, are all very vital features of that work of preparation. But the college is a vital and even as essential part of that work of preparation.

So sure is this duty of the church to itself and to its young people, that the Presiding Bishop has informed us that if we had no college, or if our college should be closed, he would have to spend more money every year than at present to educate the young people of the church who deserve such help, and with the additional disadvantage that they would not have the possibility of personal care. In other words, many more would be lost to the church so far as effective service is concerned. We have this to remember, that if we can keep our young people for the church the gain will be greater than has yet been shown by bringing in others from the world; and with this additional gain that, brought up in Latter Day Saint families, they are better prepared to live and teach the ideals of the church. This does not mean for one moment that we should either stop or lessen our missionary efforts. We hope to see these efforts rather increased, that the honest in heart of all people may be called to the kingdom of God on earth. But we would emphasize the importance of keeping the young people whom we already have.

When this need, when this work, when the vital importance and essential character of this work in and for the church is appreciated there will be less need of begging for funds to strengthen and carry on our college work. Frankly, the work should not stop there, and we do not expect it to stop there, but hope to see it continued to and through the school of the prophets. But unless our judgment greatly errs, there must needs first be men meek like unto Moses, men learned in all learning of the Egyptians, men who have gone down to Arabia and have been taught of God before it is possible for the school of the prophets to be established and its work carried on, as it should be. It is not a work apart from the church. It is so vitally interwoven with her heart beats that some fail to see because of its closeness to their eyes.

S. A. BURGESS.

QUESTION BOX

Q. Would it not be better to close the college until the indebtedness is paid and then reopen?

A. We have given this matter very serious attention a number of times, but come repeatedly and strongly to the conclusion that it would not be better, if it can possibly be avoided. In the first place, the educational work must go on. To stop it would mean too great a loss to the church. There is what it means to the church to be considered first of all. If we turn all of our young people out we shall be turning them from us. And it would take some years to secure an equal number of new students.

Further than this, the Presiding Bishop has suggested that if the college were closed that he would have to spend as much or more to take care of those to whom the church owes such help. Of course it would not then appear directly as Graceland College. It might not even be set out separately, as it could quite properly be included in the family allowance, or the amount paid to the missionaries, or, in the case of a poor boy or girl, to the poor.

In the third place, it is doubtful if the college closed it would receive as much as by way of donation, or near as much, as it would as a going concern.

Fourth, while several of our faculty would be glad of the opportunity to accept a position elsewhere at a higher remuneration, it is very doubtful if we can afford to let them go. It would be much easier to let them go than it would to secure their return when we decided to reopen. It would mean setting back the college work for five years, and we believe would hinder likewise the work with the church.

Q. Do you not consider the agitation over the college an injury to the church?

A. Some of the discussion has been injurious, as it has been personal. But we must recognize that this continued discussion has aroused a new interest in education, and has caused people to think about it, who would not have done so otherwise. We should remember always that education means preparation for life. It means the leading out of the natural ability of the student, the unfolding of the embryo life and ability. We can remember the time when going to an institution of learning was discussed in the same way as a descent to the lower regions. There is coming a recognition that something valuable may be gained from the work of other men.

We are always glad to have the questions, comments, criticisms, or an article discussing the problems before us, pro or con.

The Children's Home

EDITED BY HEMAN C. SMITH AND CALLIE B. STEBBINS, LAMONI, IOWA

The Home Family

Another inroad has been made into our home circle. One boy who has been with us for several years, and has arrived at the age when the State Board of Control says children are no longer inmates of this institution has gone out from us. His mother came for him and he will now be subject to other provision to be made by his good mother. The prayers of those who have been charged with his care go with him, trusting that he will ever remember the teaching received here, and that in the hour of temptation it will ever be a support to him.—H. C. S.

Little Children as Teachers

Much is said about the duty of parents and guardians as teachers of children, but there is another and better side to the subject. The person who has never been a pupil and sat at the feet of childhood to learn lessons of love, faith, and duty has lost the tenderest and sweetest experience of life. Well did the Master say, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven and except ye shall be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." No one can become as a little child without coming in close touch with children, and learning from them. This is why we insist that the childless man or woman lacks the means of full development unless they take a child into their bosom to love, cherish, and provide for, and in return receive from the child the lessons of tender love and implicit faith.

We know a little girl who was received from a public home into a home that until her advent was a childless home. She grew into the affections until she was as dear to them as she could have been had she been born into the home circle. As her conception of purity and cleanliness became more acute through the teachings of the gentle mother, she became conscious that the father had contracted an unclean habit. With child-like faith she kneeled in prayer and said: "O Jesus, bless my papa; help him to quit chewing bacca," then opening her eyes and looking in the face of her father she said: "Now, papa, you come and kneel here by me and ask Jesus to help you." The father, already touched by her simple prayer, could not deny her, and with tearful eyes he plead for the necessary strength, and obtained it. The most powerful sermon ever uttered by man could not have accomplished what this simple child did, nor could the voice of an angel touch him so deeply.

We know another little girl who had been received into a childless home where the mother was a faithful member of the church, but the father had not made a profession. The mother and the child's Sunday school teacher had taught her that she should be baptized when eight years old, and one day witnessing a father baptize his own child, she said: "Papa, when I'm eight I want you to baptize me."

He said: "I can't because I am not baptized, and have not the right to."

"But, papa, you can be baptized, and if you do what Jesus wants you to then he'll let you baptize me."

This man had heard many sermons on the necessity for baptism, but never one that affected him as deeply as this.

Again this same little girl was sick and suffered with a burning fever for several days and at her request the elders were sent for. They prayed for her and administered the ordinance provided for such cases. Instantly the fever left her, when she arose to a sitting posture, and pointing her finger at her mother said, "Now you see that is just what you ought to have done yesterday."

Promptness in duty was taught by the boy who on the morning he was eight years old said: "Father, I am eight, I want to be baptized."

The father says, "All right, we will arrange for it in a few days."

"A few days!" exclaimed the boy, "If Jesus tells you to do anything do you do it then or wait a few days?"

Faith and trust in God was expressed forcibly by the little boy who appeared unmoved while a terrific storm was raging around the home. Two older children were greatly frightened and gave way to sobs and cries, when the little five-year-old exclaimed, "Oh, stop your bawlin'! Don't you s'pose God knows his business."

Mr. Richard L. Metcalfe, himself one of the tenderest of men, relates the following story illustrative of the effect of a child's example upon strong men.

In a Pullman car going out of a western city the berths had been made down and many of the passengers had retired. A party of convivial spirits had concluded its session in the smoking room, and its members were making their way to their berths. The foremost man found his passageway along the narrow aisle checked by a pair of tiny legs, and looking down he saw a little child kneeling at its mother's berth. Profound silence reigned in that car. The men in the rear pushed forward in order to see what had checked the progress of their leader. Exchanging significant glances, all of the members of this party removed their hats and reverently bowed their heads while there floated through the car—and doubtless upward and onward, and onward and upward—the sweet childish treble of:

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray Thee, Lord, my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake,
I pray Thee, Lord, my soul to take."

The same author, speaking for himself, expressed this beautiful sentiment:

"Men may learn much from these little ones. Unfortunate, indeed, is the man who does not know what it is to be greeted by a little child; who has never felt the warm embrace of two little arms, and who has not been privileged to gather inspiration in the presence of the great love and the perfect sincerity of 'one of the least of these.'"

"The prettiest stories that have ever been written have been about children; the most beautiful songs that have ever been sung are the children's songs. Art and literature are heavily indebted to the inspiration of the child, and in the more practical life the busy man who has learned how to live finds his best recreation in the companionship of children. 'I love these little people,' said Dickens, 'and it is not a slight thing when they who are so fresh from God love us.' Some one has said that children have not been sent for the mere purpose of keeping up the race but that they were given to enlarge our hearts; to make us unselfish and full of kindly sympathies and affections; to give our souls higher aims; to call out all our faculties to extended enterprise and exertion; and to bring round our firesides bright faces, happy smiles, and loving, tender hearts. 'My soul,' said the same writer, 'blesses the Great Father every day that he has gladdened the earth with little children.'

"How often, in the homes of the world, has that same song of gratitude been sung! How often have careless men and reckless women been drawn from the danger line by the recollection of the little one whose future is dependent upon them! . . .

"The Sweetest Singer of all ages gave to men the sweetest song of all the years when he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them and blessed them, saying: "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God."

"They are idols of hearts and of households;
They are angels of God in disguise;
His sunlight still sleeps in their tresses,
His glory still gleams in their eyes;
These truants from home and from heaven
They have made me more manly and mild;
And I know now how Jesus could liken
The kingdom of God to a child." H. C. S.

Practical Suggestions

The "Big Brother" movement is splendid. The missions, homes, orphanages, free hospitals, the Gideons, all proclaim growth in giving. Shall our little band of twenty-five or thirty in the "Children's Home" go neglected?

We can afford to enlarge the home until every orphan and child whose needs can be better met at the home shall have an opportunity.

There is one brother and his wife who give five dollars per month.

There are two children of eight and ten years who were very poor. Their mother recently remarried. Now they are in comfortable circumstances. They are giving two dollars each annually to help others in the condition as they formerly were.

Most of us are in line in sentiment, in sympathy, in good wishes; these are good as far as they go, but it takes cash to buy bread and clothing. Faith without works is dead. Let us show both faith and works and do it now!

In a letter from H. R. Leman, manager of Christian Home at Council Bluffs he informs us that the average number of children in that home is about two hundred and sixty. "The value of home property is $250,000; the annual cash receipts are $40,000," to say nothing of the large amount of fruits, vegetables and clothing donated. They receive frequent bequests of $5,000 and $10,000, and smaller amounts. They received one of $45,000. Remember this is done outside of church affiliation. Then should not our people be easily able to support our home?

Editors Herald: I have been in this work fourteen years, having obeyed it in my youth. I have received many blessings from the hand of God. Through faith and earnest prayer I was healed of a severe affliction in my childhood. I have been blessed in dream and vision. I had a dream recently that was very strengthening.

My desire is to live worthy to be called a Saint, and to mingle with the redeemed of earth when God shall have established Zion.

In the faith,

Editors Herald: This city is the place of my birth. I was born, cradled and grew to manhood within a few miles of where I now write. I was brought up a Roman Catholic, both my father and mother being of that faith. And now, after nearly fifty-four years have passed away, I find myself sent back here to declare the message of light and life to those with whom I once communed. And I must say that my feelings are like those that inspired the great Apostle Paul when he declared, "Brethren, my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved. For I bear them record that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge. For they, being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God." (Romans 10:1, 3.) When I view the massive structures raised toward heaven, where devout men and women wend their way to worship the God from whom they have never heard, and are not even taught to hope to hear in the manner the children of God have heard in Bible days,—surely it is enough to fill the heart of the true disciple of Christ with sadness and sorrow beyond expression, when manifestations of such zeal abound on every hand.

Here you will find Catholic arrayed against Protestant; the spirit of recrimination filling the hearts of men, the one toward the other; hatred manifest in their conversations about each other, both worshiping him whom they call the God of love, and forgetting that he made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth.

Here I am in a city of one hundred thousand or more; the only member of the Reorganized Church that I know of. The Province of Quebec lying across the Ottawa River with over two million Roman Catholics forms a part of my missionary field. Saints, were it not that I know that the work is the Lord's, and that he has declared that he was able to do his own work, and that the nations of the earth shall bow to it, I certainly would feel like going back home, and giving up in despair. But never will I do such a thing, for I know that Jesus Christ has called me to his work, and I will fight till I fall, and when I do, my face will be to the foe.

Soldiers are not made or developed in the barracks and on parade. The firing line where shot and shell fall like rain is where men's hearts are tried. In a communication I received from President Elbert A. Smith, this morning, he says:

"You are certainly up against a hard proposition in a city of that size without other Saints or local church organization to back you up. You have our moral support and prayers in this undertaking, and trust that you will be successful. Pioneer work of this kind does not always bear immediately visible fruits; sometimes the fruits are not seen until years later when they appear in a most remarkable manner."

True it is that "moral support and prayers" are elements of a most helpful kind; but if the soldiers on the war-swept battle fields of Europe had only the cheering words of their respective rulers, without the equipments of warfare, they never could win battles to sustain the contention of their respective countries. It takes more than faith to save, it also requires works.

We need a tent that will hold about two hundred people, equipped with seats, etc. We want to start now to get ready for the coming summer's campaign. We need a printing outfit so we can print tracts in the French language. We need HERALDS, Ensigns, Autumn Leaves that you may have lying around, not doing any good to anybody. This kind of literature is too valuable to have lying around, provided you are situated so that you can place it in the hands of those not of the faith. I have twenty-four hours a day to distribute tracts, papers, and talk gospel; that is my sole business, and I want to be at it all the time I can. Literature should be sent by parcel post, and it will come duty free. Do not send it any other way.

I want to gratefully acknowledge a handsome contribution received from Sister M. C. Warlick, of Chicago, Illinois. She says, "Brother Pement, I am going to wind up the last day of the year by writing you a few lines, and sending a little remembrance which I am sure you will be able to use in some useful way." Thank you, Sister Warlick, that is going to spread the gospel of Christ, and in the great summing up day he will know just how much good it has done. It was a glad surprise to me.

I desire to hear from all those who would like to see the gospel of Christ planted among the people of Ottawa and Quebec, and who would like to have part in that work.

Editors Herald: I was thinking to-day of success as the world views it. What is success? From the worldly standpoint, success is so often used as a synonym for happiness that the terms might be interchangeable were the term success truly applied. The man is commonly called successful who has won great fame, made a few million dollars, or seems to have secured some position of commanding power. These things are not, however, necessarily success in and of themselves. True success lies in the quality of life, in the simple, upright, generous, and loving nature. It is just as much success to live a life of integrity and aspirations, as to realize some striking achievement.

Happiness should lie in service and usefulness, rather than in winning fame. He who is living in touch with the divine life can not be unhappy. He has gained a peace that the world can not give or take away. The cheerful play of love and hope and courage, these are indeed the elements of the higher felicity of life. The thought may not infrequently suggest itself, How would one live if he knew his part in this life was limited to one day? In a haunting bit of verse occur these lines:

"We should fill the hours with the sweetest things
If we had but a day;
We should only drink at the purest springs,
On our upward way.
We should love with a lifetime's love in an hour,
If our hours were few;
We should rest, not for dreams, but for fresher power,
To be, and to do."

That one shall reap what he sows is as inevitable as the law of gravitation or of attraction. The differentiation of life is not in circumstances, but in the quality of the personal power brought to bear on circumstances. He who sows of the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; he who sows of the Spirit shall reap life everlasting, and it rests with one's self whether he sows to the Spirit or to the flesh.

Well may Whittier say, "I know not of his hate; I know his wisdom and his love." Indeed, so all-sufficient is the simple faith in Christ, unattended by theory or explanation, or larger comprehension, that it is always possible to say of it alone, "It is sufficient for our pilgrimage here."

Hoping and praying for the salvation of all people wherever they may be found. MRS. MINNIE ROCKHOLD.

Editors Herald: I am to go to a hospital in a few days for a very serious operation. God alone knows if I will survive. The doctor tells me this is my only chance.

I feel that if I could have been living where I could have attended our church I might have been better. Only the isolated ones can know how hard it is to try to live a good life when all are against you. I have been a member of the church for six or seven years, and in all that time have only heard four or five sermons. When I first came into the church I did not understand the work as I should have. God pity all in my condition.

I would have given up many times, but I felt all the time that God was really caring for me. When I was with the Saints I did not feel the force of the Devil's power and had more strength to overcome, but I have been sick for seventeen years, until my strength is gone. I am nervous and give way before I can think. I wonder sometimes if it is possible that God will and can forgive me. Yet he knows I wish to do right, and knows my weakness and the cause thereof.

I have thought and firmly believe that I have been shown that this is the work of God, and I wish to impress upon the minds of all that I am fully convinced of this fact. Though weak in body, I am strong in faith in God. I always wanted to meet with the Saints at least once in General Conference, but do not know if I can ever do so. If I could only know I was to come back to raise my dear little baby girl, and to be able to go to conference even once, I would gladly go to the hospital. I will try to leave all in the hands of God, for I know he will do what is best.

I pray to him to guide and protect my children from the snares and pitfalls of this life, and to lead them and their father safely home. I have tried to tell them the best I know of the gospel, but it has been little I could do. God knows why I have been placed in this condition. I wish all the Saints would pray for me that if it be his will I may return safely home again to be with my children and to help them to live right. And also that they may all be brought into the true church of God.

May God bless all his Saints in all their needs, is my daily prayer. With my last breath I will tell of God's goodness in bringing me into what I know to be the right way.

COPEMISH, MICHIGAN, March 20, 1915.

Editors Herald: There are a few isolated Saints in Cope-mish who do not have the privilege of attending regular branch meetings, yet who have many opportunities to speak a word in behalf of God's cause. We seldom have the privilege of attending preaching service, only when some of the servants of the Lord come through here. Then we must meet in a private house, as prejudice runs high, so we can not secure a church to hold meetings in.

My mother, Sister Mary Williams, is quite ill and would be glad to have some of the elders come to see her. I do not think she has ever been privileged to partake of the sacrament. She lives with some relatives at 182 Commonwealth Street, North Chicago. She may wish to be administered to; she did a while ago. If this can be attended to by some of the Chicago brethren it would be appreciated very much.

Though poor in this world's goods, I rejoice in the gospel many times. I am a widow and have children to care for. I want them to see more fully the need of obeying the gospel, which they believe.

Pray for us, and may God bless the efforts being made to advance his work everywhere, is my prayer.

In gospel bonds,

BORDER, WYOMING, March 20, 1915.

Editors Herald: I arrived here on the 17th inst. from Snake River Valley, Idaho, where I had been laboring since January 15. I visited and labored in the following places: Pocatello, Blackfoot, Aberdeen and Felt. Also visited Saints and friends at other points and did what I could to interest and encourage them in the true faith. At most places visited I succeeded in arousing a greater interest in the gospel of Christ, and many were the invitations I received to visit them again, which I hope to do in the near future.

At Blackfoot I baptized seven precious souls. There were some at other points who wanted to be baptized but as they were a long distance from water they concluded to wait until the canals were filled in the spring. I found one branch in a deplorable condition. I did all I could to bring about a better situation, and trust my efforts were not in vain.

The prospect for doing effective work in the Snake River Valley is good, and I hope that efficient laborers will be sent there the coming conference year.

To those among whom I have labored in various fields in the past I wish to say I am just as much interested in their welfare as I was when I was with them, and would be pleased to hear from all who care to write to me. My address is Border, Lincoln County, Wyoming.

A. J. LAYLAND.

DES MOINES, IOWA, March 10, 1915.

Editors Herald: It may be thought that I have forgotten our much-prized paper, because I have not written oftener of late. This is not so. I do like to write something of an encouraging and inspiring nature, and for the last two months and more I have not had anything of that kind to write unmingled with much of distress and suffering.

On January 4, I tried to comfort the mourning friends of Sister Seddon, wife of Brother Joseph Seddon, of Persia, Iowa. Truly the Father gave comfort, and brought the God of our fathers nearer to many people, judging from what I heard afterwards, and the desire that I should return and preach a series of sermons, as they wished to hear more. I made an appointment for different dates, and finally had to withdraw all appointments on the account of continued illness in my family.

On January 8 I was called by telegram to Remsen, where my youngest daughter had been stricken with erysipelas in the face and la grippe. I nursed her for ten days, before she was able to be brought home. I was permitted to bring her home on January 19, somewhat improved. During this time I visited and preached for the Cherokee Saints and friends several times, with the most excellent liberty, and as many said, in a way that did much good.

When I arrived at home on the 19th, I found my wife had fallen and had to be cared for by the neighbors, and then I had the two to nurse. On the following Saturday, the 23d, my eldest daughter came home with a severe attack of acute rheumatism following a serious attack of tonsillitis. I then had three to care for, my wife improving, as well as the youngest daughter, who was soon able so that she felt she must return to her school work. About March 1, the oldest daughter thought she should return to her work, though not well, and on Saturday in the night my wife was attacked with a severe case of muscular rheumatism, with which she has suffered since, at times helpless. On the following Friday the oldest daughter was brought home, being helpless for two days before I could get her home, and she has been at home since in a serious condition at times, but, thank God, she is freed from any suffering, and is feeling well enough to return to her school work, where she will go to-morrow. My wife is improving, but not able for me to leave her yet.

So it will be known where I have been spending my time, not to my choosing. During the time of our trial we have found some of the best of friends, those whom we would never have known had we not have been brought under such conditions. Thank God for friends.

I have not been idle, when I was awake enough to be able to act, and had time aside from nursing the sick. Have done some literary work that I trust will be of some value as a means of promoting the missionary work in the world. And I have by correspondence sought to enlighten and encourage others when I felt that I needed much encouragement myself.

I have kept in touch with the work in the city of Des Moines while at home, and can see in some ways some improvement, and wish I could in every way. But that condition will not come this side of the millennium, by either a transformation of some conditions or a transformation of my way of understanding things.

I listened to a lecture by Frank J. Cannon before the legislature of Iowa, and it was what I would call a tirade on the people whom he says he loves. Do not think that he impressed the legislature very favorably. He did not refer to the early times of the church, but only referred to conditions now existing and what he would consider a remedy, although the remedy was not very clearly outlined. He seemed to wish the legislature to favor—and to express that favor—a constitutional amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting polygamy, believing that such an amendment should be adopted. I thought that he might have been informed of the fact that we as a church adopted the first measure looking to that end, as early as 1902.

I have now received all but nineteen of the reports of the First Seventy, and all but three on foreign missions, or those who have been on foreign missions. From these reports we are informed of great trials endured by many of my brethren, and yet in nearly every case more of the Spirit of God attending the preaching of the word than in any year previous. One of the most faithful ones has fallen by the shaft of death while in his field, Brother Orlin B. Thomas. He had expressed a desire to make this year the best of all the years in the past in the way of sermons preached, and the day he died he preached in the forenoon the one sermon that exceeded any other year's work in the number of sermons. He had also expressed a desire to die in the harness, and this was granted him, for he continued the work of preaching and encouraging those around him till but a few minutes of his departure to his well-earned reward. The thought of the children is "Who of the family will occupy his place, and a wish that they were better prepared to thus occupy?" A few are growing old, and express themselves that they realize that their active work is nearly past, but that they wish to occupy where they can do the church the most good.

I have enjoyed the year's work and never have been more blessed in many ways than this year, but I regret that environments may restrict my labor for a time. God knows that I would that I could be more free to wait upon my calling, and this same wish is with my companion, but age and affliction combined make a bad complication, and oftentimes hinder us doing what we would we could do.

We speak of this as the hastening time. It is. The people are hastening in more ways than one. As a people we should hasten our preparation for the coming of the Lord of glory. But are we? I may not see clearly, but it seems to me that too much time and means is being expended for local conveniences, and not for actual needs, both in the branches and in the homes of the Saints, and this expression is being voiced by many.

As I view it, there are too many organizations and too many ways of securing means from the Saints than that which is given of God in the law. Then church buildings are being used too much for other than sacred purposes, the principle being largely represented that the end justifies the means. We of all people can not afford to do this, and thus indorse what has been condemned by us in other churches, and condemned by the Lord.

The thought of promoting entertainments and things for pleasure is becoming more prominent each year, and, like it was at Nauvoo, pleasure seeking is prevailing with too many, although I do not, can not think, that it will result as seriously in some ways as it did there. God forbid that it should.

The endowment is to be the great advertising means of drawing men to Christ, for no man can come to Christ except the Father draw him. The Father will use his Spirit, and the means used by the world of display is not necessary. We note that some of the churches are having operatic entertainments at the churches to hold their members, and I have even heard the same thing advocated for our people, and for the same reasons. For us to substitute such things for the work of the Spirit will lessen the possibility of the church being endowed as soon as it otherwise would. God save us from such conditions prevailing.

With increasing faith in God, and less faith in the ways of man, I am hopefully laboring for the haven of the overcomer.

Your brother in Christ,

1205 Filmore Street.

J. F. MINTUN.

MIDDLETON, OHIO, March 9, 1915.

Editors Herald: I arrived home in time to spend about a month with wife and baby before departing for General Conference. However, I have not been altogether idle here. I have an invitation from the president, Brother Countryman, of the Middletown, Ohio, Branch, to speak each Sunday while here, if possible.

Sunday evening, February 28, I delivered a lecture entitled, "The inconsistencies of infidelity." We announced this in both city papers, and enjoyed a good attendance. A number of infidels from Excello, a suburb town, attended. I did not learn that evening how they received the lecture, but Monday evening they sent a party to ask me if I would repeat the lecture at Excello. I agreed to do so the following Wednesday night.

They procured the Baptist church building and did the advertising, and at the appointed time we were greeted with a packed house. The audience was a mixture of atheists, infidels, Methodists, Baptists, et al. The only saloon keeper in town closed his business and attended. These infidels did not invite me because they agreed with me on all that I said, but they felt there were declarations in the lecture that the citizens of the little town needed.

Well, to be plain, I have found more broad-mindedness and liberality among the infidels and agnostics than in the throng of Catholics and Protestants, yes, and some so-called Latter Day Saints are immediately to arms and ready to denounce a whole sermon if they can not see all points just as they are declared.

I am tired of hearing the expression, "Why do not the men of the ministry get together and agree so they can go to the Saints and the world with one interpretation?" Well, I can tell you one way such can be accomplished: Find a "Mohammed" and put him at the head, and everyone fall in line, repeating, "me to, me to!" Men of brains will never agree on all points as long as they are finite! To have to declare alone what other brains have produced is nothing short of priestcraft and brain slavery! Men can only find support for such "oneness" by straining and torturing Christ's statements.

The two infidels that arranged for the lecture wanted to do something religious, so they grabbed their hats and got busy. They got exactly five dollars and gave it to me, and payed the heating and lighting expense themselves.

These efforts were advertised and helped to draw a large crowd for us at the church at Middletown the following Sunday. The subject, "Who's to blame for infidelity?" was announced in the papers, and elsewhere in other ways, and Sunday evening the church was packed. Extra seats had to be brought in to accommodate the crowd, which consisted of atheists, infidels, spiritualists, socialists, Campbellites, "Mormons," et al. I have enjoyed good liberty in all of these efforts. Have been requested to speak in the school building at Excello one evening this week and next Sunday afternoon and again at Middletown Sunday evening.

How one enjoys speaking to people who think. It is as difficult for a speaker to successfully deliver his thoughts to a lazy audience as it is for an audience to listen to a lazy speaker! Some folks think. Some think they think. Others would think if they had courage to get out from under the thumb of priestcraft, while there are those who are mentally lazy. Some people doubt to their sorrow. Others' doubts inspire them to activity and growth. The latter class usually doubt, then doubt that they doubted. There may be a few thinkers who are always absolutely free from doubt. May we who doubt use them to deepen our study and broaden our view of life.

Fraternally,

O. R. MILLER.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI, March 4, 1915.

Editors Herald: Another year of missionary work has drawn to a close and eternity alone can tell the effects produced. My mind goes back over the narrow path of our last year's journey, and in some respects it has been more pleasant and satisfactory than usual. The field was new, the conditions strange to me; yet we have found friends, both in and out of the church. My health and that of my family have been good, and for the degree of prosperity enjoyed we feel truly thankful.

I was at home when our venerable President passed from this life. We believed that the time had come for his departure, and felt no fears for the church. I dreamed last spring that I saw a strongly-built platform about three feet high and twelve feet wide, extending quite a distance north and south. On this platform was a table the length of the platform, loaded with the choicest food. There was a large number of the brethren standing on the platform around the table, all in good spirits, eating the food. There were no chairs. President Joseph Smith was standing at the south end of the table. I came up on the west side and got on the platform near him and began to eat, greatly relishing the food, as I was very hungry. Soon Brother Joseph indicated that he desired to get down, and was helped from the platform. In the feeble, deliberate manner, so characteristic of him during his last years, he said, "I now leave it with you," speaking to the brethren.

There was no commotion nor disturbance of any kind. We realized that he was gone, but none were affected by his going. I understood by this dream that our beloved President would soon leave us, and expected that it would take place during this conference year. The important part was that the church would not be affected by his going. Conditions have been wisely controlled by the Lord, so the church is properly prepared for the change. This is another evidence of the divinity of the work.

We were interested in the report of the secretary of the Order of Enoch, especially that part which informs us that the order had requested the Bishop to turn over to it certain church property, and that the Bishop had failed to do so, because he was too busy to spare the time. We are in hopes he will find enough to do to keep him just as busy till this question has been decided by the General Conference.

It must be borne in mind that the Order of Enoch is an organization entirely independent of the church, and that the church has no jurisdiction whatever over it, no more than it has over the Jackson County Bank. How many of us are willing to place or give church property to such an organization? But if the order will legally assume as much of the church debt as the property is worth, it would be the same as a sale, and no objections would be made. I believe the Bishop would find time for that. [The Order of Enoch expected to assume equivalent liabilities. The order was not looking for a gift.—EDITOR.]

The Order of Enoch, as we call it, has been enshrouded with so many impractical theories that it is almost impossible to get the Saints to unite with it. When we succeed in stripping it of the vagaries of the utopian dreamers we will see that it is a very practical, businesslike system of cooperation.

It does not require great wealth for its beginning nor for its successful continuance. It requires righteousness and wisdom, two things that we lack a great deal more than we do money. It is for the poor, especially, and it can be operated by them. A dozen men who are able to support themselves can form an Order of Enoch and succeed, if they have the required righteousness and wisdom. Some day we will learn that the cooperation that our late President advocated and urged so earnestly, but with little or no effect, in his younger years, was simply the much-talked of Order of Enoch.

If we can understand some of the basic principles that will govern "these organizations" (Doctrine and Covenants 128: 8), we will be better prepared to work out the details. The words, "These organizations" and "after you are organized, you shall be called the united order of the stake of Zion, the city of Shinehah (Kirtland). And your brethren, after they are organized, shall be called the united order of the city of Zion" (Doctrine and Covenants 101: 9), give us to understand that God intended to have as many distinct and separate "organizations," as the varied conditions of his people demand. In fact it is the design of God to have "all churches" (branches, Doctrine and Covenants 51: 5) thus organized, which will be done as soon as we as Saints are prepared for this advanced condition.

"These organizations" will exist "under terms of associations (Doctrine and Covenants 128: 1) according to the laws of the land, and each one is independent of all others and the church. This is shown by Doctrine and Covenants 101: 9, where one order can "loan" money to another. See also Doctrine and Covenants 51: 3.

It would be according to the spirit of the age to have one grand organization, with its head in Independence, Missouri, controlled by a few men, with its arms, octopus-like, reaching out, encircling, and controlling every organization in every branch of the church, but it is not so represented in the revelations.

The property does not belong to the church and never will. In fact, the church is not a business corporation. It owns more property now than it can manage. Pray that we may sell it at par value, instead of trying to get more.

The "inheritances" and "stewardships" are to be given by "these organizations." "These organizations." will be directed by the Lord through the president of the church (Doctrine and Covenants 101: 10), and "inheritances" and "stewardships" be thus designated. Even then the "united consent, or voice of the order" (Doctrine and Covenants 101: 3) must be obtained before the inheritance or stewardship designated can be obtained.

The bishop will also be directed to appoint "inheritances" and "stewardships" (Doctrine and Covenants 58: 4), but as with the president it must be ratified by the "united consent" of the order, or the "order" may appoint them.

Some have complained because the rich have not thus organized and given them something for nothing. That is the feeling that proclaims in thunder tones that such are not worthy to belong to the order. These are like the Indian who was willing to be baptized for three dollars.

The one who is prepared to belong to one or more of "these organizations" is the one that is planning to help the order and the church, instead of asking, How much can I filch from the treasury? No man is eligible to membership unless he can make a living for himself and help the order a little, at least. These organizations will be brought into existence as we are prepared for them.

There is no provision in the revelations for the Order of Enoch to take charge of the property or finance of the church. But it seems to me that a number of our business men could be appointed by the conference to form a committee or council to work with the Bishop in caring for our financial affairs. It seems that something of this kind was designed when the Lord said "that the temporalities of the church were to be under the charge and care of the bishopric, men holding the office of bishop under a presiding head acting for the church," etc. (Doctrine and Covenants 129: 8.) This does not refer to the Order of Enoch as organized.

Could not this council or committee of bishops "under a presiding head" be incorporated according to law, as a benevolent society to help the poor of the church?

The Lord "hath . . . decreed wars, . . . and the wicked shall slay the wicked . . . and the Saints shall hardly escape." (Doctrine and Covenants 63: 9.) "And thus with the sword, . . . and with famine, and plague, and earthquakes . . . shall the inhabitants of earth be made to feel the wrath . . . of an almighty God, until the consumption decreed, hath made a full end of all nations." (Revelation, December 25, 1832.)

Reports come that many of the Jews have been driven from Jerusalem. Is it possible that they have been a little premature in their settling in Palestine again? They will be "restored" to "the lands of their inheritance." But when has been the important question with them ever since Jerusalem was destroyed by Titus, A. D. 70.

We are told that "when the day cometh that they shall believe in me, that I am Christ, then have I covenanted with their fathers that they shall be restored in the flesh, upon the earth, unto the lands of their inheritance." (2 Nephi 8: 12.)

The gospel will be preached "unto the Gentiles first, and then, behold, and lo, they shall turn unto the Jews." (Doctrine and Covenants 87: 3.) Then when they "believe" the Lord will "restore them to the land of their inheritances." They that believe will join the church and be under church control the same as other converts. Only a few comparatively will be converted and they will be called the remnant; "and the remnant shall be gathered unto this place (Jerusalem); and then shall they look for me." (Doctrine and Covenants 45: 6.) They will not be gathered by the Lord "until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." (Doctrine and Covenants 45: 3.)

When the time comes for us to "turn unto the Jews," it is safe to believe that the Lord will tell us of it through the president of the church. We, like the Jews in Palestine, can be a little premature.

The grandeur of this work consists in the inspiration connected with it. Without this it is nothing but the work of man. It is so arranged that no one need "trust in the arm of flesh, but that every man might speak in the name of God." (Doctrine and Covenants 1: 4.) What a splendid opportunity! Each member and officer, high or low, is absolutely independent in his sphere, as long as he observes the law. Each entitled to inspiration and guidance from the Spirit in his work. Must not trust in some one else for support and guidance in his work as member or officer, but entitled to obtain help direct from God. When one assumes to dictate or interfere he invariably does harm.

To illustrate: The Twelve has authority to assign the seventy his field of labor. He may have several missionaries in this particular field and assign one as assistant missionary in charge. This missionary in charge has no right to interfere with the assistant so long as he is in line of duty. The assistant is entitled to instructions direct from the Spirit. Then when he has assigned the men under him to their particular localities, he has done his work and should let them alone. They are entitled to instructions, how to carry on their part of the work, direct from the Spirit. Whenever one who is placed in charge magnifies his importance to such an extent that he thinks he must direct or interfere in everything in his field, he misunderstands this work and will soon find himself shorn of his official position.

The Lord and brave men despise a tyrant. The president of the church has authority to regulate, through his officers, every department in the church. In this respect his authority is almost unlimited. Yet he has no authority to interfere with the work of anyone that is in line of duty. Each is absolute and independent in his sphere. Let us learn the duties of our spheres and faithfully perform them and recognize the rights and authority of others.

As a church we have greatly lacked in this respect.

With confidence of Zion's triumph, I am,

Your brother in Christ,

W. E. PEAK.

News from Missions

Little Sioux, Iowa

I have had a year of wonderful experiences and have truly enjoyed the work. Have received many blessings and have had the greatest experiences of my mission work. Since coming to Boomer I have held a series of meetings, and God in his infinite mercy and wisdom has been with me. The Boomer Branch has had careful attention of Brother D. Parrish, who has been held in highest esteem by all, although he had grown discouraged over the outlook of the work, and questioned the wisdom of my trying to hold meetings here. He said he did not believe the people would come out to hear me. I begged him to give me a chance. I felt sure there was good to be done, for I had felt directed to come to this place.

Brother Parrish said, "We will drive around and see what the people think about holding meetings here now." The people seemed delighted to have me preach for them. When we came in sight of the church Brother Parrish turned to me and said, "That is our church on the hill, but is only a short while until we are going to have to disorganize our branch." I seemed to hear a voice saying, "The time is now come for a work to be done in this place." I repeated this to him, and he answered me rather doubtfully. I felt confident that it would be only a short while until some would come into the church.

I threw my very soul into the work and tried to live prayerfully so as to receive the light and power I needed to assist him in the Lord's work. The first Sabbath I was shown by the power of the Holy Ghost that there were several who would come into the church. The second week of my meeting six noble souls came into the church. Night after night for nearly three months I saw the Lord working on the hearts of the people and making choice of them until thirty-three had given their names for baptism. There are others who will be baptized soon, I feel sure. So the glorious work is onward at this place.

A Lutheran church with a large membership is located just across the way from our church. God in his love and pity has shown many of these dear people the beauty of the gospel, and they come to me for baptism. They can not withstand the power of God.

Perhaps it is useless for me to tell you my efforts have caused great confusion in the Lutheran Church. The priest who had charge of the church here began to rage. He was not satisfied with his own work, so sent for another priest to help him, but their efforts were of no avail. The people were nearly all Danish, and were of the very high class. They stand by me nobly in my efforts to meet the priest. He threatened to run me out of the country, organized a mob, and went to a judge at Council Bluffs to get his advice in the matter. He told them to let us alone, that our religious rights were equal to theirs. This caused them to call the deal off.

It became necessary for me to publish the priest's misrepresentations, which were so rude that it was a hard blow on him. He called me a tramp, false prophet, and liar. Now he says I am a good man, only I am in the wrong church, and feels to pity me. He has sealed himself up like a book and will not respond to any call. He seems to be going through quite a mental strain.

I can see now where my mission work has been a failure in the past when I have not stayed long enough in one place. Sometimes I have left a good interest in order to make as many places as possible in one conference year. I have sometimes left souls who were ready for baptism and said I would return, but when I returned it often took an effort to build up the work again.

I have led fifty-two into the waters of baptism during this conference year. I am as happy as I can be and truly rejoice in the great work of the Lord. I never felt a greater need of full consecration of my life to God in all of his work, which is worthy of our best efforts.

BOOMER, IOWA, March 22, 1915.

Your brother,
W. E. HADEN.

New York

As the conference year is drawing to a close, we take a retrospective view of our district and of what has been accomplished. We find there has been considerable activity manifested in various parts of the field. Some of our scattered Saints have been located who were hitherto lost, as it were. Others who have sidestepped have been assisted to return to their Father's love, with a seeming willingness and a determination to better serve God than ever before. Three branches have made substantial gains in membership as well as spiritual gains. In all, there have been twenty-five added to the fold during the conference year, God manifesting by his Spirit's presence the acceptance of those taking upon themselves the name of the Master.

One of the interesting features of our work during our winter campaign was the cutting away of the ice on the beautiful lake near Fulton, New York, February 21, to induct into the kingdom of God four precious souls. While the weather was extremely cold, four stalwart followers of the meek and lowly Nazarene went down into the watery grave with a firm determination to follow the Christ wheresoever he would go. At the meeting following the Spirit of God was manifested in a marked degree in confirmation of those who had made the wise choice. The Spirit of the Master has surely been manifested in our district the past year.

After spending eleven days in Fulton and South Granby, I returned to Buffalo, finding the work there alive, with a goodly number of strangers in attendance at the services, which speaks well for the efforts made by the Saints of this city.

Sunday, March 7, was a day of activity and blessing to the Saints. The sacrament service was one of comfort and spiritual enjoyment, God manifesting his Spirit in a great degree of power. The Saints were strengthened and edified. There was an excellent attendance, showing the desire of the Saints to meet with the Lord and feast at his table where spiritual strength is to be gained.

In the late afternoon the priesthood were called together, and were blessed by an abundance of God's directing power and Spirit. The members of the priesthood were blessed and strengthened for their work.

The evening preaching service was well attended by Saints and a goodly number of outsiders, who gave the best of attention. The Spirit was present still to bless and edify.

Hence in my closing work of the conference year in the New York District are seen brighter prospects for the future than heretofore. The Saints of the district, also the friends of the cause, have manifested the true Christian spirit toward God's servants. May the Master reward them abundantly for their unselfish attitude toward him and those he has sent out to labor with the few souls who yearn for the truth and righteousness of God.

Ever praying for the onward progress of God's work, I am,

Sincerely yours,

BUFFALO, NEW YORK, March 8, 1915.

Eastern Texas

I have been active on the firing line, engaged in numerous skirmishes with the enemy, the weakness of whose position has been manifested. We have opened up several new places and have met opposition in doing so, which, however, only increased or manifested the strength of our position. Verily, if our cause could not be maintained it would be a sad predicament we would find ourselves in. When we consider how unpopular the work is and how bitter the opposition against it, the mighty and strong of our cause gives us courage, and we fear not, though the powers of darkness and men rage. Under the leadership of Jesus Christ we rejoice in battle. So the war is on.

Do we wish to share with the redeemed and righteous? If so, let us not shrink from the battle now. We must sacrifice for the cause. The women of the nations now at war in Europe are selling their jewelry to raise money to subscribe for their cause. Shall we in our cause be less zealous and self-sacrificing? Shall the missionary go into a new place to preach the gospel, and from place to place, without sufficient to carry him on his way? Is it just to expect to get through without sharing the burden with others? Christ sacrificed much for us; he left the glorious presence of God for us; the earth is the Lord's, yet he had no place to call his own while he dwelt here. Let us not allow our salvation to slip from us by reason of our greed. Let us sacrifice with Christ, and then reign with him.

I have covered an extensive territory this year. I have baptized quite a number and have rejoiced much in the work. With Brother James M. Smith, we are awaiting the arrival of some Baptist ministers who have attacked the work. We know not what the result will be.

We have recently moved to Sulphur Springs, Texas, Route 5. My parents are now residing there.

May God bless his people, and may we all be faithful to him.

In gospel bonds,
GLAUD R. KUYKENDALL.

Utah

On January 18, I received a request to come to Malad City and conduct the funeral of old Brother Thomas Jenkins. Not receiving the notice in time for the evening train, I arrived at Malad too late for the services, which had been held in the Mormon Tabernacle. Brother E. E. Richards also arrived too late for the funeral, having received word too late to be on hand. We then made arrangements and began holding services every evening, announcing a memorial service for Sunday evening at half past seven for Brother Jenkins. Our meetings were well attended, considering the cold weather. Sunday evening we had a large crowd of people, the pulpit and Brother Jenkins' chair being nicely decorated in mourning. He being a priest and a man of sterling character, thought dead, yet speaketh, like Abel; our subject for the occasion was the resurrection, upon which we had excellent liberty of thought, and interested the audience.

A prominent lady asked if we would meet a man of her church and discuss the difference between the two churches. She being a Mormon, we answered, Yes, providing he was a representative man. So arrangements were made for the following afternoon, at two.

Brother E. E. Richards and myself were on hand at a private house, filled with people anxious to hear. The gentleman being a high priest in the Mormon Church, also somewhat noted for his ability to overthrow a "Josephite," asked us how we would like to proceed. We told him to select his own line and proceed. After some preliminaries, he began by using a book by J. F. Smith, jr., against the Reorganization.

He began his attack against William Marks, and tried to show he had lost his priesthood by joining in with J. J. Strang, C. B. Thompson and others, and that he was the one who had ordained Joseph, and that he (Marks) could not give what he did not have, as a consequence of which there was no priesthood in the Reorganization. He made, as he thought, a strong case against us.

In our reply we scored him for using second-hand argument; cited him to certain misquotations in his book, showed him his book was unreliable, and then pointed out the necessity of adhering to the law as a rule of evidence and the only safeguard for the people of God. We then took up the question of the priesthood. I admitted that if we were dependent upon Brother Marks or any other man to transfer priesthood by ordination alone we would be in a sad plight indeed, even like unto our Mormon friends. But thank God, we were not in that condition.

Young Joseph did not receive his priesthood through an ordination alone by William Marks, and others, as has been asserted, but held the priesthood by virtue of the law of lineage. William Marks and others only ordained him in harmony with the law, (Doctrine and Covenants 17:17) to an office of that priesthood, and further, an ordination alone does not give the priesthood as claimed by our Mormon friend, from the fact that if that position be true, then the present pope has the priesthood, for they make the claim of an unbroken chain by ordination back to the Apostle Peter, just as clearly as our Mormon friend can back to Joseph Smith. I intimated that a man might be ordained a thousand times, and not have a smack of the priesthood of God.

Is it possible, my friends, that a man holding the true priesthood may at the same time teach a false doctrine, and practice unauthorized dogmas? No, no; it is true that Oliver Cowdery ordained Joseph Smith an elder, April 6, 1830, but he did not give him a priesthood. Joseph Smith received his priesthood from God, through Peter, James and John, before Oliver Cowdery ordained him. Evidently Joseph Smith was ordained in harmony with a resolution that passed that day by Oliver Cowdery. Young Joseph was ordained by William Marks and others, after the same manner; those men simply acted as the servants of God, and of the church, and ordained him in harmony with the provisions of the resolution that obtained that day (Doctrine and Covenants 17:17). Young Joseph obtained his priesthood from God through the law of lineage (Doctrine and Covenants 68:2, 83:3, 104:18, 107:18). I dwelt on Doctrine and Covenants 107:18 to some length.

The brother then took the position that the blessing put upon the head of Joseph Smith and his seed was to be fulfilled in that they were to have a place in the boarding house at Nauvoo, and that was all there was in that anointing and blessing, or even intended. I replied that if that position were true, as stated by our brother, that if Joseph Smith and his posterity were to live in that house for ever, that it would have to be enlarged somewhat by this time. And it would appear to me as rather peculiar that the Lord would anoint and bless a man to live in a boarding house for ever. This anointing put upon his head, was put upon the head of his posterity after him. As I said unto Abraham, concerning the kindreds of the earth, even so I say unto my servant, Joseph, in thee and thy seed, shall the kindreds of the earth be blessed, (not in a boarding house). It is true that Joseph and his seed were to have a place in that house, as watchmen upon Zion's towers, but to assert that this anointing and blessing was only physical would be silly and absurd.

The Apostle Paul in Galatians 3:16 shows clearly that this blessing is with a promise, which promise is Christ, to be fulfilled under the great spiritual administration of Jesus Christ, and to be enjoyed when he shall come and reign in harmony with the Psalm 2:8, "Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost part of the earth for thy possession." Just as the Lord blessed Abraham, he also blessed Joseph; just as he promised one, he promised the other; the anointing and blessing is the same to each; the promise is equal. If Joseph Smith was to receive the right only to live in a boarding house with his seed for ever, pray tell me something about the boarding house Abraham and his seed were to live in for ever.

At this point the brother arose and bore his testimony that he knew Brigham Young was a prophet—that he was right with God I know for myself, and no "Josephite" has the priesthood. I replied to him by reading John 5:31, where Jesus says: "If I bear witness of myself, my witness is not true," and I take it, my friend, that if any man bears witness of himself alone, his witness is also not true. A man's testimony, to be of worth, must be at least in harmony with the law to be of any force or value. It does a poor case but little good if any to bear witness to support it. Why not appeal to the law?

The next day we were invited to meet at the home of a sister to answer questions. Quite a number came, and we spent the afternoon very pleasantly, talking of our faith and hopes.

News from Branches

Perry, Iowa

Brother E. E. Long finished a four-week's meeting here March 14. He baptized eight, leaving three others ready as soon as their companions will consent. The interest in the work is steadily increasing. The Lord is surely working with the honest in heart in Perry. There have been twenty baptized here in the last thirteen months. Our Sunday school and Religio and Woman's Auxiliary are in a healthy condition, adding to the force of our branch work.

The district conference will convene here in June. We are planning on a four- or five-week's meeting just prior to that time, with the district tent, on which occasion we expect to make a more extensive campaign than ever before to spread the gospel. We feel that if the Saints are humble and faithful the Lord will bless their efforts with success. We will be glad if Brother Long is sent again to this district, but will faithfully support whoever may come.

Brother Long has presented the gospel from the pulpit and through our two daily papers in a way that has thoroughly shaken the foundations of sectarianism in this city, making the ministers nervous. A minister of one of the popular churches told me he wanted to have a heart to heart talk with us soon. I want to keep myself fit for the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, so that by that Spirit I may be able to reach the intelligence of men with a ray of light, as with others I yield myself as an instrument in God's hand.

Our little branch has nearly doubled in numbers in the past two years by baptism and letters of removal, greatly increasing the responsibility of those chosen to act in official capacity, requiring more time in our secret closets asking for divine wisdom.

May the Lord help us all to be faithful and full of love, until surmounting every difficulty, our work is accomplished.

Saint Louis, Missouri

Words can not express the deep joy we have felt in the spiritual uplift we have experienced since last report. This has been due to the untiring efforts of Brother Wardell Christy, coupled with the cooperation of the local officers and choir, not excepting the valiant members.

A series of meetings was held closing February 14, with the best attendance and interest we have had for some time. Brother Christy delivered every discourse, and the blessings of the Spirit was felt as he forcefully brought to our minds the beautiful words of life.

In a vision previous to this meeting Brother Christy was shown that if the Saints were united in the effort a number of strangers would be in attendance and at least ten would be baptized. This has been fulfilled, as a goodly number of strangers were very much interested and thirteen were baptized, most of whom were adults, three being children of Saints seen in the vision. We are not only rejoicing in the new converts, but also that the lethargy has been taken from the membership, many of whom were as those in Paul's day, needing conversion again. Brother Christy's success was due to much visiting, studying, fasting and prayer. We trust he will be returned to this district to continue the work he has done.

Our district conference convened here March 13 and 14, as did the Sunday school and Religio conventions. The meetings were encouraging and the attendance made one think of General Conference. Our next conference will be held at Saint Charles in June. Brother H. O. Smith, en route for home on his way to General Conference, visited son Arthur and wife a few days and was pressed into service Sunday, preaching in the morning and addressing the priesthood at one o'clock. He gave five patriarchal blessings. In the evening the choir of seventy-five voices gave evidence of much practice in the rendering of a beautiful cantata. The attendance was so large many had to stand.

We were all encouraged and trust that the revived interest will continue and that others seeing our good works will be led to glorify the heavenly Father. Your sister,

ELIZABETH PATTERSON.

Saint Thomas, Ontario

This branch is still progressing both in numbers and spirituality. Several have joined us since last report. The enemy, of course, tries us sometimes but we soon get in line again. We presume he will continue to try us until we become perfect. We are often blessed with the gifts of the gospel, occasionally in loving rebuke. We hope to value these sacred things as much under correction as when we receive approval.

Our young people have organized a society for mutual improvement. They do not admit any of the older or married members, thinking they will work better and express themselves better when they are alone. May the Master bless their efforts. The young people gave a splendid concert recently. They did well. Outsiders were heard to say that the program was well worth twice the price of admission.

Brother R. C. Russell has been at home the past two weeks, and was a welcome visitor. He left this morning on his way to General Conference.

We are much pleased to hear that a reunion will be held at Kirtland this year. There will be a goodly number attend if all goes well. We love the old historic place.

Yours in faith,

CHARLOTTE PEARSON.

Independence, Missouri

Elders returning from their fields on their way to General Conference are improving the time by ministering to the Saints in the missions of the suburbs. Their presence in the mid-week prayer meeting and the Sunday school and Religio conventions and stake conference, which occurred March 12 and 14, lent interest to these occasions.

There was a fine representation of schools and branches at this season, and the spirit of unity prevailed in all our assemblies. This Spirit has also prevailed in the labors of the executive and presiding officers of both branch and Sunday school work for the past six months. There is a general feeling of satisfaction expressed, and few changes were made or contemplated. The increased efficiency of service and fuller consecration among all the active workers are facts surely visible.

One thousand and twenty-three attended Sunday school the 14th. Fourteen dollars and forty-nine cents was the collection, one dollar and sixty-nine cents in birthday offerings. The Saints spent a very profitable day on this occasion. The services were full of instruction and spiritual profit. To some who were privileged to attend this conference, especially the Sunday services, there was imparted unusual uplift and enlightenment.

The longest day will wear until its close—
Then, heart, look up, nor faint beneath the weight;
God in his own good time will stanch thy tears,
And for thy sufferings shall compensate.

side." No name was attached, but the well-earned title, "A member of the old guard," was appended. Brother Chatburn is an old and honored landmark to thousands who have attended the General Conferences, and he is known over an extremely wide area where he has traveled as a missionary. But there may be some who have never met him and will not recognize the picture. They perhaps will be glad to turn again to the magazine number and identify the picture of "Ye Jots Man."

BUST OF PRESIDENT SMITH.—During the summer and fall of 1914 President Joseph Smith frequently visited the studio of Mr. Jorgen C. Dreyer, a prominent artist, of Kansas City, Missouri. On these occasions he sat for Mr. Dreyer, who modeled a life-sized bust portrait in clay. The last of these sittings was made just a few days before President Smith's fatal illness began, and the work was completed about that time. From the clay model a cast was made in bronze which will be placed in the Sanitarium at Independence, later to be given place in the church offices when they are erected. Also three plaster casts were made in exact duplicate of the bronze. These were bronzed to give them a better color and make them more permanent. One of these casts has been received at Lamoni, and has been placed in the Historian's office in the Herald Publishing House building. Conference visitors and others will be interested in seeing this bust, which is now on exhibition and may be seen by those who care to visit the office.

REQUEST FOR PRAYERS

Sister Julia E. Hensen, Dunlap, Iowa, requests prayers that she may be restored to health. This sister feels that she is needed by her family, yet is reconciled to abide the Lord's will. She is suffering from heart trouble.

Don't forget that. Here's the idea! Sit right down and write or come in and tell me how many expect to make the trip, just when you want to go, the points you want to visit, how long you expect to stay, and I will plan a trip especially fitted to your time and needs—then you will know all about it. MEXICAN AFFAIRS.—Villa forces have been besieging the Carranza garrison at Matamoras, opposite Brownsville, Texas. Secretary Bryan announces the payment by the Villa-Zapata government of an indemnity of twenty thousand dollars to Mrs. J. B. McManus, widow of the late McManus shot by Zapata soldiers on their entering Mexico City. In the hope of securing permanent protection for the twenty-five thousand foreigners in Mexico City, the United States Government has proposed to the warring factions that the capital be declared neutral and outside the field of operations. The Villa-Zapata forces have agreed, and will vacate the city if Carranza agrees to the proposal.

Announcement from Petrograd is that the Russian Baltic fleet has inflicted losses upon German naval units. The bombardment of the Dardanelles continues at

The British steamers Vosges, Falaba, Augilia, Crown of Castile, Falaminian, Seven Seas, and the French steamer Emma have been sunk by German submarines, the Dutch steamer Amastel by a mine. Many lives were lost. Leon Chester Thrasher, a United States citizen, was aboard the Falaba and is reported among the missing passengers. The British cabinet is considering the propriety of putting a ban on alcoholics during the war. The grand vizier of Turkey has issued orders that all inhabitants in Persia, including Christians, must be protected. Italy has called out frontier forces, organized especially to defend mountain passes leading into the country. The German steamer Odendwald has been libeled for attempting to leave San Juan, Porto Rico, without clearance papers, and is in the custody of the United States authorities.

Brother Jeffries was a member of the High Priest Quorum since April 13, 1896, having been ordained by Alexander H. Smith. The funeral was held at Vales Mill, Ohio, March 25; sermon by Elder A. B. Kirkendall.

BISHOP EVANS MEETINGS.—We are in receipt of intelligence from Toronto, Canada, to the effect that Bishop R. C. Evans closed his series of meetings for the winter on the night of March 28. This closed his eleventh winter campaign in the theaters of Toronto. The report states that every seat was taken sometime before the opening of the service, and that it was necessary to take the scenery down and open the stage for the audience. Many were turned away. At this writing Bishop R. C. Evans is expected in Lamoni to begin a series of meetings in the Coliseum to continue during the entire conference. Ere this appears in print his meetings will probably have been under way.

Religio Convention

FRIDAY, APRIL 2

9 A. M.

The twenty-first General Convention of Zion's Religio-Literary Society convened on April 2 under very favorable circumstances. The day dawned dark, lowering and foreboding, with flurries of snow which seemed to presage a disagreeable season, but the first session, an excellent prayer meeting at 9 o'clock, in charge of T. J. Elliott and B. J. Scott, opened with a burst of warm sunshine and amidst the harbingers of spring.

10 A. M.

The first business session was introduced at 10.15 by singing number 99 in Zion's Praises, with President Gunsolley in charge, and prayer by G. R. Wells.

The report of the credentials committee was adopted subject to revision, and the convention was open for business. The president, J. A. Gunsolley, and vice president, T. J. Elliott were chosen to preside, and the program as submitted by them was made the order for the convention. The courtesies of the floor were extended to all present. An additional report from the credentials committee was approved.

The general secretary, Sister M. A. Etzenhouser, was chosen secretary of the convention, and empowered to choose assistants. She chose Arthur McKim and Sadie Radmall. Sister May Skinner, Mabel Carlile, Alta Mather and H. C. Burgess as appointed were approved to direct the music, and the presidency were authorized to further perfect the organization.

The following resolution was lost by a vote of 31 for to 65 against:

Moved that this body elect a committee of three to confer with the Presidency and Twelve relative to any suggestions of this body concerning whoever they may feel led to nominate for presidency of the association.

At this juncture the convention was entertained with a vocal solo by Sister M. A. McConley.

Sister J. A. Gardner, historian, reported:

The general work of the Religio has moved along much as during the late years. Its successes and failures are much the same. . . .

We are endeavoring to bring the history up to date as quickly as possible, in order that it may be revised and published soon. We wish to cooperate with the officers, superintendents and editors in reporting current events in their separate departments. In fact, we urge the attention of all Religians that they may take notice and report to us any item of historical interest to the society, whether in large or small locals.

We have completed manuscript covering the first eight years of the Religio history.

Probably the most noted change in the ranks of Religians has been in the loss of our ex officio member, the late President Joseph Smith, who at various periods of the society's history has given messages full of encouragement, inspiration and hope, and we are looking forward to the same cooperation and approval from our presiding officer, Frederick M. Smith.

A committee consisting of M. C. Fisher, W. W. Smith and R. S. Salyards was appointed to draft articles of condolence in memory of the late President Joseph Smith.

F. M. Sheehy at this time addressed the convention on the theme, "In loving remembrance," of the late President Joseph Smith, giving a number of instances occurring in his personal experiences with President Smith evidencing his tender consideration and service for others, and his greatness as a man.

E. F. Robertson, J. R. Grice and Thomas Williams were appointed as a notification committee to wait upon the First Presidency and Quorum of Twelve to inform them of the sittings of the convention, and invite any suggestions they might have to make.

Number 147 was sung, and T. J. Elliott dismissed the meeting.

2 P. M.

After the singing of number 26, Granville Trowbridge led in prayer. Minutes were read and approved.

Committees were announced by President Gunsolley in charge: Resolutions, A. M. Chase, J. O. Dutton, Granville Trowbridge; Burton McKim, Wardell Christy; appropriations, F. M. McDowell, J. F. Rudd, J. A. Becker, J. E. Wildermuth, M. A. McConley; press, J. F. Garver, Charles Fry.

The report of President Gunsolley included the following:

Such time as could be spared from duties legitimately growing out of my engagement with the college has been devoted to this office. It has not been much, compared to what might have been given with profit to the work of the society, I believe. . . .

PARLIAMENTARY LESSONS

These parliamentary lessons have run during the life of the Quarterlies and one more lesson will make 13 years, or 52 lessons, just enough for a lesson once a week for a whole year. Whether it is a feature of our lessons that should be continued has been a serious question many times in my mind, but having raised the question more than once, it has seemed advisable to continue them. . . .

FIELD WORK

Referring to field work, will just say that practically my vacation from college work was spent in the field. First, a trip north into Minnesota and Wisconsin attending reunions of Clitheral and Chetek, thence to the Southeastern Mission, attending the reunion at McKenzie, Alabama, and visiting, before and after the reunion, nearly all the branches in the mission, comprising about fourteen branches located in parts of Florida, Mississippi and Alabama. Most of my work in this mission was lecturing on Sunday school and Religio work mostly, but including education and social purity. At the reunion, however, a number of institute sessions were held and children's hour provided for. This field is worthy being cared for, as its needs are apparent, and promise of fruit from labor bestowed is abundant. . . .

NOBODY'S BUSINESS

Does anyone wonder that we are not growing and making advancement? The wonder is, not that we have not progressed, but that we have done so well as we have. Has anyone thought that the officers are asleep and are not awake to the situation? The fact is that not one officer can give more than a passing thought to the matter, for he is compelled to give his working hours to earning his daily bread, and the little time actually given to it is time he should be asleep or is borrowed from somewhere.

Is it any wonder that, seeing that the increasing demands incident to the changing conditions of the times are not being met, organizations are being formed in various localities having in view the caring for just such interests as could be provided for by the Religio? In one district we hear of an association being formed for the purpose of directing the activities of the young people in benevolent work and self-improvement; also in the same district an organization for handling the literature distribution is formed, the funds to be handled by the Bishop, a work that has been distinctly a feature of this society from the first.

In another place a mutual helpfulness association is formed, to follow up something like the following line of work: relief, sanitation, hygiene, home economics, and reading. In this same place is another association covering art, literature, domestic art, lectures, personal hygiene, vocational training, etc. While some of this work may not be specifically provided for in our present plans, it could very appropriately be provided for by slight modifications of our committees and their work, for the spirit and genius of the Religio certainly covers all such.

These are only evidences of one of two things, either the full scope of Religio work is not sensed, or that it is not living up to its opportunity. It may, possibly, be both. But can we meet these demands under present policies? A letter came from an active district officer asking what are we going to do next? This question was provoked by some realization of these conditions. Your presiding officer has realized them to some extent for some time, and offered a suggestion one year ago along this line. But can your executive, whether constituted as at present, or of new officers, successfully cope with the situation? To move out successfully along these lines will require investigation and thought, consultation and cooperation. Can we expect men and women who must come up to the standard of efficiency as employees, to meet our requirements in these respects as officers?

This is a serious question. Can the convention by electing those who have more time or more ability bring relief? If not so, then is it possible to loose the hands of at least one person, or more, so that the Religio work can be made some one's business? Would it be wise and prudent to use some of our funds for the purpose of furthering our interests as a society, so as to be able to do larger things, by providing for the just wants and needs of some one, or ones, whoever that might be, even if we must do less in the way of aiding foreign missions, translating, and the like?

YOUNG PEOPLE'S ACTIVITIES COMMITTEE

A committee should be continued upon the matter referred to the Presidency of the church and the executive committee, since the matter is susceptible of further development and is important.

QUARTERLIES AND QUARTERLY EDITORS

Charles B. Woodstock was appointed editor of the Junior Quarterly, Brother Farrell feeling that he must be released, but continuing with the senior lessons. Brother Farrell has completed his course of lessons on the revelations in their historical setting and written a little more than two quarters' lessons on topical study of the Doctrine and Covenants. He has done an excellent work in this series of lessons, and deserves a unanimous vote of thanks of the convention.

Brother Woodstock is giving us an excellent series on the Book of Mormon. They are enjoyed by the juniors and some of the seniors. . . .

WORK. PRESENT PLANS

While this report emphasizes attention to present demands in order to future growth and development, it must not be thought that more efficient working of present undertakings would not be a good thing. From some quarters comes the information that but little attention is given to program work, and may it not be possible that our Sunday sessions will have a tendency to lessen the attention given to this sort of work? It will be fatal to the interest of a large percentage of our young people to allow the program work to lag. It will be equally detrimental to neglect the social work. Social committees have opportunity to be a source of great strength to the work of the society. The new department of temperance affords a slightly new outlet to pentup activities, but since we have always had temperance committees it is not altogether new. What we need to do is to study our present objects, plan our work in harmony therewith, and then work our plans with energy, looking forward to anticipate new demands and how to meet them effectually.

Vice president T. J. Elliott reported:

The great amount of good that we know is being accomplished among our young people, especially where the principles and practices of the society are really being carried into effect, make us appreciate more and more the true value of such an organization, its wonderful influence and power for good, and how fortunate it has embraced so many of our members, and we are permitted the very gratifying and pleasurable experience of being colaborers therein.

We have not had the good fortune to have seen opportunity for extensive field service during the past year; but there has come upon us almost imperceptibly a yearning and a greater inclination to fill the measure of this requirement, and trust if permitted to continue in this work we shall be able to make this feature of our work one of greater activity. . . .

I approve most especially the closer contact in which our society is drawn to the great head—the church. Its deeper consideration in our behalf; our mutual and united purpose to work with greater harmony for the general good. This is one of the very best strides in years. Now we no longer feel we are left in our work to the struggle of our own feeble efforts, but we move out with greater confidence and assurance under the more direct influence and supervision of the church. The action bringing this about I consider but a first step to be followed and superseded by others that shall bring us more in harmony with the divine law.

Let us set in every way possible our house in order; let us honor the full and complete law, and then as an organization triumphant within the great kingdom we shall truly lift up our heads and rejoice.

All to the honor and great glory of God.

The secretary, Sister M. A. Etzenhouser, submitted a statistical report compiled from reports from 53 districts and 14 locals not in districts, showing active locals 284, loss 5; total enrollment 11,335, gain 58; home department members 2,402, gain 158. The following, commenting on the statistical report, was submitted by the secretary:

We will first glance down the line of active locals in districts. You will note that Mobile, Alabama, Utah, and Southern Wisconsin report but one local in their district. Under the ruling a district must have two or more active locals. We find that the Mobile, Alabama, District for the last two years has reported but one, Bay Minette, so the district should be declared disorganized.

The secretary of the Utah District writes me that the work is dead everywhere but Salt Lake City, and that they expect to declare their district disorganized at their next convention. Southern Wisconsin has two locals, but only one reported this year.

You will next notice the four districts that have not reported. Manchester, England, Ohio, Southwestern Oregon and Central Oklahoma. In a letter received about a month ago from the secretary of the Manchester, England, District he tells me that report would be delayed because some of the local secretaries were at the front engaged in war. Since then I have been informed that both the district president and secretary have enlisted, hence no report from England this year. Last year they had four active locals, with an enrollment of 91.

The Ohio District was organized just prior to last convention, but was not reported. The husband of the district secretary was appointed to a foreign mission last year by the General Conference, and the secretary accompanied him. I received a letter from Sister Booker that nothing had been done in the district until last February, when new officers were elected. She is now the district secretary and sent credentials but states that it is impossible for her to give the enrollment as she does not know what it is, no reports having been received.

About three weeks ago Southwestern Oregon notified me that a district had been organized and delegates elected, but no report was sent me. Upon inquiry I learn that this district has but one local that has received a charter, Bandon, Oregon, the other, Myrtle Point, not having made application for charter. We hope to induce Myrtle Point to ask for charter so that district may be legally organized. Central Oklahoma has not answered repeated request for report.

We will now take the loss column. Australia shows a loss of 77. This loss is mostly the Balmain Local. Last year they had an enrollment of 55 with an average attendance of 43; this year they report an enrollment of 13 and an average attendance of 11. Colorado's loss is in the home department.

Central Illinois shows the greatest loss. This can be explained. Last year they reported Taylorville with an enrollment of 161, and an average attendance of 54; this year they report an enrollment of 54, and an average attendance of 50. Taylorville's secretary evidently has been cutting out the dead timber.

Eastern Michigan District shows quite a loss; this is another case of weeding out the dead members. Last year their enrollment was 524, with an average attendance of 250, this year their enrollment is 439 and their average attendance 250. They show quite a loss in their enrollment, their average attendance is but 8 less than last year. Spring River District shows quite a loss; Pittsburg, Kansas, failed to report this year though they are very active; last year Pittsburg reported a membership of 168. If they had reported this year Spring River District would have shown a gain instead of a loss.

If we had received reports from England, Ohio, Central Oklahoma and Pittsburg, Kansas, we would have shown a slight gain in locals and added about 450 to the gain in enrollment as shown by printed report. Last year we were asked to make report to the First Presidency of the church by March 1. Both last year and this we note that urging early reports from districts so that we may report to the First Presidency has caused incomplete reports to be sent us, as it hardly gives the district secretaries enough time to get reports from locals; this of course can not be avoided.

Last year our home department showed a loss, this year we are pleased to report a gain of 158. There have been 3 new districts organized, and 30 locals have received charters.

The secretary submitted a financial report showing receipts of $30.05, expenditures $30.05.

Treasurer J. A. Becker reported total receipts, including balance, $3,987.28, expenditures $1,067.42, balance $2,919.86. This report, together with the report of the auditors thereupon stating same and the books to be correct, was approved.

Librarian S. A. Burgess reported, in part:

As librarian we beg leave to report that we have acted as a member of the Library Commission, though we have been able to give less time than heretofore to that work. Just prior to the last General Convention we had revised a list of over five hundred books including church publications arranged in alphabetical order under author and title, giving a description of the book, the suitable age, price, where it could be secured and Dewey classification number. At the college and church libraries we have also assisted as time permitted. A more complete report will be made through the Library Commission.

As a general officer of the association we have attended two reunions, Joplin and Stewartville, and have met with the executive committee. As a member on maps for the South Sea Islands we have had nothing to do, as we have been informed that the matter has already been adjusted to their satisfaction in another way. . . .

Home department superintendent Sister Eva Holdsworth reported:

Most of the reports are very encouraging. The home department is growing in numbers and in usefulness in most districts. Nine locals have been organized from our ranks and many of our members have been transferred to local organizations, and still there is an enrollment of 2,402, or a gain of 158 over enrollment last year.

We have striven earnestly to impress upon all home department superintendents the necessity of reporting the year's work, and that our effort has succeeded to some extent is evidenced in the fact that most superintendents have reported. The superintendents are energetic and progressive, and we see only success ahead of the department.

We visited the Spring River reunion last fall and presented the work as best we could, and enrolled a number of new members who were anxious to take up the work of department. . . .

The home department superintendent reported total receipts $11.65, expenditures $8.05.

Superintendent of temperance department, B. J. Scott, reported, in part:

Results are not what we expected, but considering the actual time we have been working in a prepared state it is most satisfactory. Ten of our fifty-two organized districts have reported appointment of their Temperance Superintendent: Little Sioux, Northeastern Nebraska, Northeastern Illinois, Northeastern Kansas, Saskatchewan, Ohio, Minnesota, Far West, and the Lamoni and Independence stakes.

Some of the superintendents report the locals are taking up the work, and three or more say they expect every local to be in line in a few weeks. Some have put on the Lincoln-

Lines of Encouragement

WRITTEN UPON HEARING OF THE DEATH OF OUR BELOVED PRESIDENT, JOSEPH SMITH, FOR THE COMFORT OF HIS SON AND SUCCESSOR, FREDERICK M. SMITH.

The Fatal Hour has come! God's will be done!
 Thou dost not weep alone, the little flock,
 Which under Christ he was the chosen one
 To lead and feed with the true bread of life,
 With bleeding hearts, bow to the will divine,—
 They share with thee the pain and feel the loss
 Of one so lov'd for the noble virtues of his life,—
 His kindly words, his loving acts, his firm,
 Unfaltering, and undaunted soul amid
 The battle's strife with evil and its hosts
 Who seek to tread mankind in sin's dread mire.
 He firmly stood for God and Christ, the great
 Shepherd of our souls, who by his precious blood
 Redeem'd our fallen race from sin's dread pow'r.
 May we as firmly stand as he, upon
 The rock of truth eternal, truth divine.
 Stand close to God,—and we will stand by thee,
 And by his grace hold up thy hands by faith
 And works of love and truth, as those of old
 Upheld the hands of him whom God had call'd
 To lead Israel hosts on to victory.
 Lead on, where the Christ has mark'd the way
 With bleeding feet and heart aflame with love
 For fallen man; and by his grace divine
 We will follow in "his steps," though rocks and Thorns obstruct the way, and by his boundless grace
 Will surely give thee strength that work to do.
 He who has called thee to his work divine
 Will surely give thee strength that work to do,
 Upon thy soul his glorious light will shine;
 Trust in his love, he'll bring thee safely through.

CHARLES DERRY.

Old Friend of Mine

If charity, unselfish giving,
 If noble life be worth living;
 If eager helpfulness unbought,
 If kindly deed, if loving thought;
 If gentle wish to soothe, to share
 Another's sorrow, pain, or care;
 If cheerful word, if sunny smile,
 In this sad world are worth the while;
 If heart from pride and envy freed,
 If quick response to every need,
 If outstretched hand, if willing feet,
 If love, if sympathy, be sweet;
 If shining attributes like these
 Entitle one to sweet surcease
 Of toil, to lasting joy and peace;
 Then, surely, dear old friend of mine,
 Such blessed recompense is thine.

The Master knew how you would grieve,
 Should grim death order you to leave
 Your weeping loved ones here behind;
 He silenced death, did Master kind.
 He knew that parting such as this
 For you would shadow heaven's bliss;
 So he decreed that at the end

You'd fall asleep on arm of friend;
 That vanquished Death, robbed of all sting,
 To you but rest and peace should bring;
 That tired eyes should see no more,
 'Til they beheld on golden shore
 Your other loved ones gone before.
 Oh! surely, dear old friend of mine,
 A blessed recompense is thine.

A DOUBTFUL TRADITION

To disturb enjoyable reflections is not pleasant, and yet, when truth demands, it becomes a duty to do so, especially when there is a misconception regarding the facts of history.

Beneath the hill upon which stands the far-famed Kirtland Temple, there stands a substantial two-story house, bearing the marks of years upon its weather-beaten walls. It is conceded that the lower story of this house was occupied in 1831 by the mercantile firm of Gilbert and Whitney, and it has been supposed that the upper story was occupied by Whitney as a residence.

Each of these merchants became identified, and somewhat prominent in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. Algernon Sidney Gilbert was prominently and intimately associated with the early movements of the church in Ohio and Missouri, and Newel Kimball Whitney became one of the prominent bishops of the church, following its fortunes through the vicissitudes in Ohio, Missouri, and Illinois.

When Joseph Smith and his family came to Kirtland from New York in February, 1831, they moved into the home of Newel K. Whitney. Of this Joseph Smith writes:

The latter part of January, in company with Brothers Sidney Rigdon and Edward Partridge, I started with my wife for Kirtland, Ohio, where we arrived about the first of February, and were kindly received and welcomed into the house of Brother N. K. Whitney. I and my wife lived in the family of Brother Whitney several weeks, and received every kindness and attention which could be expected, and especially from Sister Whitney.

From this circumstance it has been supposed that their son, subsequently President Joseph Smith, was born in one of the upper rooms of this building. This was the first part of February, 1831, and Joseph Smith was born November 6, 1832.

It is hardly safe to conclude that the "several weeks" spoken of would extend over twenty-one months. Then Mrs. Whitney, Bishop Whitney's wife, according to her grandson, speaks of the residence being across the street from the store. He says:

About the first of February, 1831, a sleigh containing four persons drove through the streets of Kirtland and drew up in front of Gilbert and Whitney's store. The occupants of the sleigh were evenly divided as to sex. One of the men, a young and stalwart personage, alighted, and springing up the steps, walked into the store and to where the junior partner was standing.

"Newel K. Whitney, thou art the man!" he exclaimed, extending his hand cordially, as if to an old and familiar acquaintance. "You have the advantage of me," replied the one addressed, as he mechanically took the proffered hand. "I could not call you by name as you have me."

"I am Joseph the Prophet," said the stranger, smiling. "You've prayed me here; now what do you want of me?"

Mr. Whitney, astonished, but no less delighted, conducted the party (who were no other than the Prophet Joseph Smith, his wife Emma, and two servants, just arrived from Fayette, the birthplace of the church) across the street to his house on the corner, where he introduced them to his wife. She shared fully his surprise and pleasure. Joseph says of this episode: "We were kindly received and welcomed into the house of Brother N. K. Whitney. I and my wife lived in the family of Brother Whitney several weeks and received every kindness and attention that could be expected, and especially from Sister Whitney." Says she: "I remarked to my husband that this was the fulfillment of the vision we had seen of a cloud, as of glory, resting upon our house."—Biographical Encyclopedia, pp. 223, 224.

So if they did remain in the family of Newel K. Whitney until their son was born it was not in the store building but across the street from the store. The record shows that they left the residence of the Whitneys, returned and left the second time several months before the birth of the son. But little if anything is said about where the family resided until September 12, 1831, when they removed to Hiram, Portage County, Ohio, where they resided in the family of John Johnson.* (See Church History, volume 1, page 217.) They remained in the home of Father Johnson until March 25, 1832, when the mobbing took place, recorded in Church History, volume 1, pages 239-243.

April 1, 1832, Joseph Smith started on his second trip to Missouri, in company with Newel K. Whitney, Peter Whitmer, jr., and Jesse Gauze. After starting on this trip, Emma Smith, his wife, returned to Bishop Whitney's in Kirtland, but did not remain there. Joseph says of this:

After we left Hiram, fearing for the safety of my family, on account of the mob, I wrote to my wife (in connection with Bishop Whitney), to have her go to Kirtland and tarry with his family till our return. She went to Kirtland, to Brother Whitney's, and Sister Whitney's aunt, Sarah Smith (who was then living with her) inquired of her niece if my wife was going to stay there; and, on being answered in the affirmative, said she should go away, for there was not room enough for both of them; accordingly Sister Whitney invited my wife to leave, which she did immediately; having enjoyed about two hours' visit. She then went to Brother Reynolds Cahoon's, and father Smith's, and Doctor Williams's, where I found her very disconsolate on my return.—Millennial Star, vol. 14, p. 161.

So in April, 1832, before her son was born in November, Emma Smith spent two hours at Whitney's. Joseph found her elsewhere very disconsolate upon his return from Missouri, which was in June, 1832. (See Church History, vol. 1, p. 251.)

Mother Lucy Smith in her History of Joseph Smith the Prophet and His Progenitors, page 207, agrees with the statement quoted above. She says:

During her husband's absence, Emma Smith lived with William Cahoon and Brother Williams, occasionally spending a short time with us.

On the twenty-fourth of April, Joseph arrived at Independence. He made haste to attend to the business that lay before him, and on the sixth of May following, he, with Brothers Whitney and Rigdon, left Independence for Kirtland. When they arrived at New Albany, Brother Whitney had the misfortune to get his leg broken. This detained Joseph, who remained, in order to take care of him, four weeks, at Mr. Porter's public house in Greenville. While they were at this place, Joseph had poison administered to him in his food, which operated very violently upon his system, but he soon recovered, and the next morning they pursued their journey again, and arrived in Kirtland some time in the month of June. When Joseph got home, he immediately procured a house for his wife; and after making his family comfortable, he went on a mission to the East, leaving his family in the care of Hyrum. Shortly after he left, Joseph Smith the third was born.

Joseph Smith the son of the Prophet was, then, born in the house "procured" by his father after his return from Missouri in June, 1832.

Considering the treatment she had received the April previous, the Whitney residence would be the most unlikely place that he would provide for her, and that was across the street from the building where tradition says the boy was born.

The one possibility remaining to make this tradition true is that Joseph procured rooms above the store and left his wife there in the care of his brother Hyrum. If there is any record of other evidence that such was the case we would be very glad to be referred to it. Or if there is any testimony by which the place of the birth of Joseph Smith can be designated we would be glad to hear it. But with our present information we do not think it safe to point out the old store building as the birthplace on the bare and unsupported supposition that these were the rooms procured by Joseph Smith after his return from Missouri in June, 1832.

HEMAN C. SMITH.

EDUCATION AND PERSONAL QUALITIES

SUCCESSFUL LITERARY WORK

One of the first things to be done in getting ready for church work of any kind is to get a clear and definite idea of the scope and purpose of church work. In looking about for a reason why the church was established, it will be found that it was raised up to be an instrument in the hands of the Lord for the salvation of men. Men are saved through obedience to the truth, and in order that the truth may be obeyed it must first be learned.

The church is ordained to be an agency through which men may learn the truth. Men learn the truth from the messengers sent out by the church to preach the word of truth. They also learn it by means of the literature scattered abroad among the people in the form of tracts, papers, pamphlets, and books. Both of these agencies have been wonderfully blessed of God in bringing men and women to a knowledge of truth.

Experience has abundantly proven that the putting of printed matter into the hands of the people is a very effective auxiliary to the preaching of the word. A great many people have been brought into the church by this means; hence the publishing of papers and magazines should receive ample encouragement, and the writing necessary for the production of tracts, pamphlets, and books, be duly stimulated.

The expansion and development of the church are greatly extending the opportunities for literary usefulness. The organization of the Sunday school and Religio associations and the Woman's Auxiliary, as auxiliaries of the church, has immensely widened the sphere of those who may be qualified to write upon the things of the kingdom. The increasing number of church periodicals in addition to the first and leading organ of the church, the SAINTS' HERALD, have been doing a noble part in the literary education of the membership of the church.

FIELDS OF USEFULNESS

But so far as the youth of the church are concerned, special attention is directed to the great field of usefulness that has been occupied by Autumn Leaves. Without, for the present, taking into consideration the great amount of useful, instructive, and entertaining matter that has appeared in its pages from year to year, and its influence for good upon both the young and the old, it is enough to consider how many of those who are now competent writers for the church press received their first encouragement from the editors of this magazine. Name after name comes to mind of those whose early attempts at composition appeared in its pages, young men and women of worth whose native modesty would scarcely have permitted them to offer the productions of their pens elsewhere. In this way it has done a vast amount of educational work for the church, work that can not be too highly appreciated, and its columns still stand open for the same purpose.

Now let those young people who desire in their hearts to become useful in the church in a literary way take advantage of these opportunities to acquire aptitude in expressing their thoughts and ideas on paper. If any are too diffident to make an effort to compose for the Leaves, let them begin with the Hope, or Stepping Stones. Let them write in simplest words their observations on things around them in every-day life.

Another excellent opportunity for development in this line is found in the literary exercises of the Religio. If our young people are wise they will allow no chances of this kind to slip by without improvement. Facility in literary matters, like everything else, is acquired by practice. No matter how much native ability and talent a person may possess, practice is still necessary; and practice only will make perfect. The young writer should not expect to do great things at first. He should be satisfied with a simple beginning. If he waits until he can do great things the chances are that he will wait for ever.

GETTING READY TO WRITE

Perseverance as a necessary qualification comes in right here. No one knows how well he can do until he has tried and has persevered in trying. First attempts may be discouraging and may seem like great drudgery, yet if the effort be persisted in the reward will eventually come. By the reading of well-selected literature, with a careful observation of the manner in which facts and ideas are stated, a vocabulary and style may be acquired which will enable one to commit his thoughts to writing intelligently. If there be some degree of the use of words, phrases, and sentences, continued practice will give facility and preciseness of expression. Then if one has worthy ideas in store his writing will be profitable and instructive, providing his heart is in his work.

Then, having got himself ready to write, how shall one decide what to write about? He should write about those things in which he is interested and with which, therefore, he has made himself familiar. He should not attempt to write until he has given his subject long and serious thought with an earnest endeavor to arrive at the truth with regard to it. If he be sincere in this, the Spirit of truth will come to his help and give him clearness of understanding; and if he cultivates the presence of the Spirit he will be able to write with inspiration. Let it not be thought that the man who is to write by inspiration needs to give no previous thought to his subject. On the contrary, previous study, with prayer, is the best means of securing inspiration. The act of thinking may be defined as a search for the truth; when we engage in profound thought or study in regard to any matter it gives the Spirit a chance to do its office work for us in guiding our thought and study. In this way Oliver Cowdery was taught that he might receive knowledge by revelation.

"There is a spirit in man; and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding." (Job 32: 8.) This spirit is the Spirit of truth, and truth is knowledge of things as they are, and as they were, and as they are to come. (Doctrine and Covenants 90: 4.) In this light we may understand the following lines from Browning:

Friends,

Truth is within ourselves; it takes no rise
From outward things, whate'er you may believe,
There is an inmost center in us all
Where truth abides in fullness. . . .

And to know

Rather consists in opening out a way
Whence the imprisoned splendor may escape
Than in effecting entry for a light
Supposed to be without. Watch narrowly
The demonstration of a truth, its birth,
And you trace back the effluence to its spirit
And source within us.

STUDY AND THOUGHT. NECESSARY

Let it not be imagined because truth is within us that study or thought is unnecessary. The mind of man is like the soil of the earth. The ground of a man's field may have in it all the elements necessary to produce a crop of corn or wheat, yet he must plant his ground with the seed of corn or wheat if he would succeed in getting either of these kinds of grain out of it. The living power which is in the seed which he plants serves to draw out of the soil those elements which produce grain after its own kind.

So it is with the word of the truth. Although within man there is the spirit of intelligence, the light of truth, it is necessary to plant the seeds of truth in the mind in order to draw out and develop the elements of truth already there. By reading and study and meditation we plant and water and nourish thoughts and ideas in our minds, so that one idea sown in the mind may produce a great many more, if it is properly nurtured and cultivated. For this reason Jesus frequently compares the preaching of the word to the sowing of seed.

TRUE EDUCATION

True education, therefore, consists in drawing out what there is in a man, rather than in cramming something into him. The object of reading and study is to awaken our mental powers and to set them to work so that they may become capable of forming correct ideas concerning the truth, and thus producing thoughts worthy of utterance. Our minds are intended to be something better than intellectual corn cribs from which can be shoveled out only that which was previously shoveled in. Rather they are designed to be like the soil of a fertile field that from each single seed thought will produce thirty, sixty, or a hundred fold. This is the reason we are enjoined in the word, "Seek ye out of the best books words of wisdom; seek learning even by study, and also by faith." (Doctrine and Covenants 85: 36.)

Inspirational writing should be cultivated as well as inspirational preaching. Teaching by the pen as well as that by the voice should be done under the influence of the Spirit, in remembrance of the advice, "The Spirit shall be given unto you by the prayer of faith, and if ye receive not the Spirit ye shall not teach." (Doctrine and Covenants 42: 5.) The importance of observing this instruction may be seen by paraphrasing a portion of Doctrine and Covenants 68: 1 as follows: And this is the ensample unto them, that they shall write as they are moved upon by the Holy Ghost; and whatsoever they shall write when moved upon by the Holy Ghost shall be scripture; shall be the will of the Lord; shall be the mind of the Lord; shall be the word of the Lord; shall be the voice of the Lord, and the power of God unto salvation.

QUALIFICATIONS

The last clause of the above quotation brings us round again to the thought with which we started, that church work is to be performed for the salvation of men, to redeem them from ignorance, error, and from spiritual darkness. Those young people who wish to get ready for successful literary duty should remember that "All victory and glory is brought to pass unto you through your diligence, faithfulness, and prayers of faith." (Doctrine and Covenants 100: 7.)

In closing I can not do better than to present the recommendation of Doctrine and Covenants 4: 1, for the benefit of the young man who wishes to prepare himself for literary service in the church:

He that thrusteth in his sickle with his might, the same layeth up in store that he perish not, but bringeth salvation to his soul; and faith, hope, charity, and love, with an eye single to the glory of God, qualified him for the work.

DUNCAN CAMPBELL.

An Eastern legend said that the gate of heaven was so narrow that one man, walking alone, could not pass through; two men, walking side by side, one of whom had helped the other, found easy entrance; and when ten men came, who had all been serving one another in love, they found the gate so wide that they saw no post on either side.—Ozro R. ### HOW CAN WE REDEEM ZION?

Latter Day Saints have looked and prayed for the redemption of Zion,—the Zionie condition as it obtained in Enoch's time, the people realizing a condition of purity of heart. The revelations of both former and latter days foreshadow a Zion for the latter days, and here upon Joseph's land the Lord has designated the place to be redeemed, by his Saints, to prepare them to meet the Savior at his coming.

A condition of equality, in both temporal and spiritual things, is named in Doctrine and Covenants 70: 3. A cooperative work is outlined, wherein the Lord will work with his people, blessing them in all their doings, if they will show their love for God and man, by doing his commandments with a willing heart and mind.

This law is not a new one, it was made known to ancient Israel, revealed to the ancient Americans, and renewed to us in the latter days. Deuteronomy 28 is a very clear statement of conditions upon which the Lord will show mercy, and blessings will follow obedience to his law; and on failure to keep that law the heavens were to be brass over their heads, the lands, the crops, the herds, and all they possessed were to be cursed.

Here is a picture of cooperation on the part of man with God to sanctify the land over which God had placed man as a steward. The same fact is revealed in Luke 16, where we read that he who is not faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to him the true riches of heaven? And again, make friends to yourselves of the unrighteous mammon, that when you fail they will receive you into everlasting habitations.

How else could we so make friends to ourselves of the mammon of unrighteousness, so we could be received into everlasting habitations, than by obeying this financial law, honoring God with our substance, as directed in Proverbs 3: that our barns should be filled with plenty, and our presses should burst with new wine; and thereby we fulfill the conditions on our part to build the storehouse of the Lord, we having claim thereon in this life, and an everlasting habitation on the earth in its redeemed state. The land will be blessed for our sake,—the herds, and the crops were to be blessed; the same as is promised in Malachi 3, showing that it is unnecessary for God's people to suffer drought, pestilence, and so forth, if they will learn obedience.

Read Doctrine and Covenants 102: 2, referring to the withholding of our moneys, and saying we will not go up into Zion, but will keep our moneys. The Lord here says that his Saints must learn obedience if it must needs be by the things which they suffer. We see that as early as 1834 Zion could have been redeemed, but they would not honor God with their substance; some even now are doing the same thing. Why not now as a people, heed the call of the Lord in our time and come forward with willing obedience as he has asked us to do? The day of trouble is here and in Doctrine and Covenants 45: 13 we learn the time is coming when he that will not take up his sword against his neighbor must needs flee to Zion for safety. What shall we do if we have no Zion?

Read Genesis 14: 21, 28: 22, Revelation 27: 30. Here we have a definite statement of the Lord's portion to be given into the treasury. And in Doctrine and Covenants 106 we have the surplus for the building of Zion, and so forth.

If Israel of old could sanctify their land, why can not we do the same to-day at the command of the same God? This is just as clearly a command as baptism for the remission of sins.

The Jews are now, as a people, paying their tithes and offerings, redeeming their land; they control the ready-made clothing of the world, and quite largely control the currency of the world.

There is the same necessity for a Zion as there was in Enoch's day, in Israel's history, and Book of Mormon history in America; and even more, as we approach the coming of the Lord and the evil day comes on when the world is in commotion. Nearly every civilized nation is now at war, nation against nation and kingdom against kingdom.

The developments of later years also indicate that a conflict between capital and labor is inevitable, therefore the necessity of a Zion as a place of refuge is made the more apparent.

The door of opportunity is now wide open for us to enter in and occupy, honor God with our substance, and redeem Zion.

OUR ARMY OF UNEMPLOYED

The only "army" in America of numerical consequence at this moment is the so-called army of the out-of-works. A year ago much discussion arose concerning the enlistment and maintenance of this army, and, according to an article contributed by Mr. William Parr Capes to the North American Review for December, this discussion had certain fruitful results. It has at least laid bare a situation that has existed in this country for a long time, but until recently had not been recognized by any except students of industrial and economic conditions and others whose occupation brought them into immediate contact with it. It is now known that every city at all times has an unemployment problem, and some of our State governments have been brought to see the need of constructive legislation.

There are those who contend that the size of the army of unemployed one year ago was only normal, and not the result of abnormal industrial and commercial conditions. If this is a fact, it simply furnishes added proof of our national negligence, and further emphasizes, as Mr. Capes points out, the necessity for constructive work. Within the last twelve months, says Mr. Capes, more consideration has been given to the needs of the men out of work by more individuals and organizations, and more has been accomplished in the way of making basic studies and providing remedial measures than within any similar period in some time.

GETTING THE FACTS

There is now a strong tendency to advocate and to demand something more than a temporary substitute for work for the idle. We are beginning to see the fallacy of trying to bring about permanent improvement by relying upon palliative measures such as bread lines and soup kitchens. Public officials having to do with this problem are more interested than ever before in obtaining the facts of the situation. The Department of Charities of New York City, supported by private social-service agencies, made a comprehensive inquiry during the first three months of the year 1914 into the physical, mental and social history of one thousand, four hundred and eighty-three homeless men who applied for aid at the Municipal Lodging House. This study yielded valuable data which may be used to guide the officials of New York in formulating a constructive plan to maintain its helpless dependents.

One of the first important steps in the solution of the unemployment problem should be a thorough and comprehensive study of the character and capability of the homeless men and women who apply for relief. We shall then have some basis upon which to establish the number of homeless applicants who are incapable because of old age or other handicaps; the number of those who have legal residence in other localities and friends and relatives able to assist them with homes or work; the number of tramps, vagrants, inebriates, and beggars; and the number of those who are aliens and should be returned to the Commissioner of Immigration as public dependents in accordance with the law.

FARM COLONIES

The State of New York has authorized the establishment of a State farm colony for tramps and vagrants, but at the present time this project is practically at a standstill. With an institution of this kind for those who either are unfitted to work or refuse to do honest labor, and who, after care and training, would be capable of honest self-support, every community would be able quickly to rid itself of this class of helpless beings and parasites. Switzerland has shown what can be expected from this line of procedure. Another class of the unemployable would be provided for by the establishment of a State custodial asylum for feeble-minded delinquents. The municipality of New York has already committed itself to the policy of care for inebriates. The establishment of a farm colony for this class of defectives has been authorized and a site has been selected. There is also need of proper facilities for the detention of homeless wanderers ill of tuberculosis, and convalescent homes for the care of poor persons. To this list should be added adequate almshouse accommodations.

The operation of these institutions would certainly greatly reduce the number of those who are continually applying for public aid in our cities and towns. Besides reducing the number of the unemployed, the problem of finding work for the employable would be made less complicated. A greater number of employers would be eager to cooperate for the reason that they would have confidence in the fitness of those in whose behalf relief agencies and city administrations are laboring. This confidence is now lacking because of the knowledge that many seeking work and in whose behalf work is being sought are not worthy of hire.—American Review of Reviews, December, 1914.

SEISMIC ACTIVITY NEAR CHARLESTON

Few people realize that earthquakes still frequently occur in the epicentral region of the historic Charleston, earthquake of August 31, 1886, yet such is the case.

In the Bulletin of the Seismological Society of America, Mr. Stephen Taber states that during the past fifteen years these shocks have occurred at the average of one in every two months. Eight were recorded in 1912, and that of June 12, 1912, was more severe than any felt in the district since 1886-1887. There has, however, been a gradual though irregular decrease in the frequency of shocks since 1886.

The author believes most of these earthquakes to be due to adjustments taking place along a fault in the crystalline rocks underlying the Coastal Plain formations. Any factor increasing the relative pressure on the northwest side of the assumed fault, or decreasing it on the southeast side, tends to bring about a readjustment of the strata, with accompanying earthquake shocks, the most important of these factors being rainfall, height of the water-table, and barometric pressure. The shocks are most common in September and least common in April.—Scientific American, December 5, 1914.

COLOR-BLINDNESS

During recent years the subject of color-blindness has received much attention, especially in relation to men working on railways and on ships. Engine drivers and ships' officers are now subject to examinations as regards their sight, both in respect to its strength and also to the power of discriminating between different colored lights. Many tests have been devised by means of wools and colored counters, by which the sight of such people can be tested. It has now been found that color-blindness is always inherited, and that a man whose ancestry is free from it never exhibits it.

Curiously, as was explained by Professor William Bateson, in his presidential address, delivered before the British Association at Sydney, on August 21, color-blindness is always inherited through the mother, and never through the father. There appears to be no instance in which a color-blind father has transmitted his defect to his children except in connection with a mother who was a transmitter. It does not follow, however, that the mother herself need be color-blind, but she must have inherited the power of transmitting this defect from the ancestor. Some, probably all, the daughters of a color-blind father inherit the power of transmitting the defect, although they themselves may not be color-blind, and, as a rule, they transmit it to about one half of their offspring of both sexes. The sons who inherit color-blindness are, of course, color-blind, but they do not themselves transmit it; it is the inheriting daughters who become the transmitters to the next generation.

These facts ought to be of considerable assistance in the future to those who are responsible for investigating the eyesight of engine drivers and officers of ships, provided that they are able to carry their investigations back through at least a couple of generations in the family. If it can be shown that two generations are free from color-blindness, there is at least very good reason for supposing that the third generation will also be free.—Engineering.

RAILROADS IN ECUADOR

There is but one completed railroad in Ecuador, that between Guayaquil and Quito. Until this road was extended in 1905 Quito was, by modern standards, considered to be shut out from the world. Another road, the Ambato-to-Curaray Railway, one hundred ninety miles long, is under construction which will connect the Guayaquil and Quito Railway at Ambato with the easterly provinces of the Republic. The last consignment of rails for this new road is expected about November. Two Baldwin locomotives have been received and other rolling stock has been ordered from the United States.

The preliminary survey is nearly completed for still another railroad between Puerto Bolivar and Borja, known as the trans-Amazon Railway. This road will connect the Pacific coast with the head of navigation on the Marañon River, the name by which the upper Amazon is known as it passes through the Peruvian Andes within a hundred miles of the Pacific Ocean.—Scientific American, November 14, 1914.

MUIR'S FIRST VISIT TO CALIFORNIA

When I set out on the long excursion that finally led to California, I wandered afoot and alone, from Indiana to the Gulf of Mexico, with a plant press on my back, holding a generally southward course, like birds when they are going from summer to winter. From the west coast of Florida I crossed the Gulf to Cuba, enjoyed the rich tropical flora there for a few months, intending to go thence to the north end of South America, make my way through the woods to headwaters of the Amazon, and float down that grand river to the ocean. But I was unable to find a ship bound for South America—fortunately perhaps, for I had incredibly little money for so long a trip, and had not yet fully recovered from a fever caught in the Florida swamps. Therefore I decided to visit California for a year or two to see its wonderful flora and the famous Yosemite Valley. All the world was before me and every day was a holiday, so it did not seem important to which one of the world's wilderness I first should wander.

Arriving by the Panama steamer, I stopped one day in San Francisco, and then inquired for the nearest way out of town. "But where do you want to go?" asked the man to whom I had applied for this important information. "To any place that is wild," I said. This reply startled him. He seemed to fear I might be crazy and therefore the sooner I was out of town the better, so he directed me to the Oakland ferry.

So on the first of April, 1868, I set out afoot for Yosemite. It was the bloom time of the year over the lowlands and coast ranges; the landscapes of the Santa Clara Valley were fairly drenched with sunshine, all the air was a quivering with the songs of the meadow-larks, and the hills were so covered with flowers that they seemed to be painted. Slow indeed was my progress through these glorious gardens, the first of the California flora I had seen. Cattle and cultivation were making few scars as yet, and I wandered enchanted in long wavering curves, knowing by my pocket map that Yosemite Valley lay to the east and that I should surely find it.

Looking eastward from the summit of the Pacheco Pass one shining morning, a landscape was displayed that after all my wanderings still appears as the most beautiful I have ever beheld.—From John Muir's "The Yosemite."

READING FOR MAY—PHYSICAL EXERCISES

"It is a matter of importance to both sexes to keep every portion of the body in a strong and active condition—prepared to meet what demands may be made upon it without strain or destructive or difficult exertion. . . . The most effective and essential service that exercise renders the body is the building of vitality and the increase in reserve energy that attends it, . . . for the effects of exercise are infinitely more far-reaching than the mere development of powerful and prominent muscles. . . . And it may be said that those forms of physical activity that involve the use of the trunk and that call for the especial activity of the blood-making and blood-purifying organs are the most efficient and most helpful. . . .

"One essential point to bear in mind is that no matter what one's physical condition may be—no matter how much one may lack energy, the persistent and regular performance of exercises will build up a degree of strength and vitality that will soon enable one to perform the exercises with increasing interest and enjoyment."—Bernarr Macfadden in Physical Culture.

EXERCISES TO BE TAKEN IN BED

One who is not strong or who has not developed an interest sufficient for taking other regular exercise may perhaps most easily be induced to begin with exercises that can be taken in bed. These may be taken night and morning, and, for sleeplessness, in the night. Each movement should be repeated five to ten times, commencing gently and increasing the number and force as the bodily condition admits without strain. Here as elsewhere, deep breathing should head the list and accompany all the exercises.

"1. Lying on the back, extend the body full length, stretching downward with heels and toes, drawing up on the arch of the foot. This is good to draw the blood from the head and to strengthen the arches.

"Work the ankle joint, drawing the toes as far up as possible. Alternate the two movements. In connection with the exercises that follow, these will help the circulation and prevent cold feet.

"2. Flex the knees and thrust the feet downward.

"3. Draw the feet up, and resting the body on the shoulders and the soles of the feet, lift the body slowly and hold while counting ten. Lower the body and count ten while resting. When sufficiently strong this may be varied by twisting the body and lowering it to rest first on one hip, then on the other. Rest the body and swing the knees from side to side.
