As Sister Inez wrote: "Thus the entire missionary destiny of a whole church was changed by equinoxial storms, head winds, and the decree of the rough master of a Yankee Whaler." In the light of subsequent events, we would say that the plans were changed to conform to a will that is not thwarted by head winds, equinoxial storms, or the whims of sea captains.

ON THE FIRST DAY of May, 1844, a landing was made at the Island of Tubuai. Supplies for the ship were secured, and Addison Pratt remained to establish the work among the natives. On May 15 the "Timeoleon" anchored in the bay at Tahiti. Here was begun the work in what was to be the capital and center of our mission in the South Sea Islands. Among the white converts made was one John Hawkins, of whom Sister Inez wrote:

John Hawkins was baptized late in September or early in October. In his ordination, he was promised that he would live to a good old age, and do a good work among the natives. He always remembered this promise, and although a day came when there was a price on his head "for taking up arms against the French," he had no fear of death; and after he came into the custody of the French and the hour approached for his execution, he, still thinking of his ordination promise, was sure he would have a long life. He was pardoned on the very day he was to die, and lived to fulfill the prophecy spoken over his head.

The missionary work was well established in Tahiti and neighboring islands. Of the four missionaries who had sailed from New Bedford in 1843, one, Hanks, died and was buried at sea; a second, Rogers, returned to America, joined the exodus West, died and was buried by the way; his is said to have been the first funeral of the kind at Mt. Pisgah by the Mormons on their trek to Utah.

A third one of the four missionaries, Grouard, remained in the mission, faithfully teaching the doctrines and practices of the church until 1850. He returned to America but found teachings and conditions in Utah so different from the things he had known and believed that he drifted away entirely. To our Elder D. S. Mills, he said: "At last I was going home. Home, did I say? Good heavens, I had no home. I was alone in the world. Shipwrecked, worse than I was shipwrecked once upon an uninhabited island."

Now for the fourth member, Addison Pratt. When these four missionaries (having been duly appointed, set apart for their mission, and instructed under the presidency of the Martyr, Joseph Smith, so shortly before his death) established the mission in the Islands, they found the native chieftains living in polygamy. All such converts were required to abandon this practice. Each was remarried to the first wife and the other wives were put away.

Addison Pratt returned to America, journeyed to Utah, and in 1850, with three other missionaries from Salt Lake, came back to Tahiti and began to teach polygamy. This about-face was astounding to the natives, and was one factor in causing the French government to banish the missionaries from that field in 1852.

It remained for the elders of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints to come to the Islands with the true gospel and "the old order of things." As at the first, their visit to Tahiti seemed to be the result of a misadventure—but we feel that it was not by accident.

FORTY YEARS after the four missionaries of the church sailed from New Bedford, Massachusetts, for the islands of the Pacific, two missionaries of the Reorganization sailed from San Francisco, Australia bound. Their sailing date was November 6, 1873. Unlike their predecessors they were only a little over one month at sea before making a landing—but not in Australia as they had anticipated.

The two missionaries were Glaud Rodger and Charles Wesley Wandell. (Today a grandson of Glaud Rodger, Rodney Engel, presides over the Southern California District). The day these two missionaries crossed the equator, Australia bound, their ship sprung a leak so threatening that the captain decided to patch it up as best he could and head for Tahiti, a thousand miles away.

Tahiti was reached on the thirteenth day of December. Again chance or fate or Providence had diverted a ship from its course to land our missionaries on Tahiti. Form your own conclusions—I think it was an over-ruling Providence.

Some days after landing, the two missionaries, quite unaware of the existence of a branch of native Saints on the island, went for a walk out of town and met two native Saints. The two men on learning that these strangers were missionaries became much excited. The missionaries could not understand a word of the native language or comprehend the excited gesticulations of the two men they had met. An interpreter was obtained, and they learned about the settlement of Saints at Tiona—Tahitian for Zion—their city of refuge.

ALL THROUGH THE YEARS these Saints had held together and kept the faith. They had suffered grievous persecution, imprisonment, and severe floggings. For a time all meetings had been prohibited, even family worship, prayer, and reading the Scriptures. Yet this band at Tiona had held together, watching each ship that landed at Papeete, hoping for tidings from the church. Their vigil was rewarded, and our two missionaries were greeted as messengers from heaven. However, the ship was billed to sail away the next day. The missionaries had recourse to prayer, and the sailing was postponed until Christmas Day—six days of grace. The next day after the first meeting with the native Saints the missionaries took their way to Tiona. The story of the meeting that followed is taken from Story of the Church:

The little settlement of Saints at Tiona was all excitement. Meeting was announced at three o'clock, and the glad Saints greeted each other with "Te Atua speaks again" (God reveals himself once more), while they prepared chicken, breadfruit, and coconuts for their guests.

The history of the church since the missionaries had been ordered from the islands was the theme of the afternoon's discourse, and particularly the coming of Young Joseph, all of which the Tahitian Saints accepted without question. In the evening the Saints gathered in the room of the missionary pair and sang the familiar old hymns of Zion, "The Spirit of God Like a Fire Is Burning," and others, all in Tahitian. The whole day following was spent in church services.

Thus came again the missionaries of the Restoration to Tahiti—and not so much by accident as it might seem. Presently Rodger and Wandell went on their way to Australia to plan our work there—but that is a long story of itself. Other missionaries, many of them over the years, have gone to Tahiti. We have numerous branches of the church there and in surrounding islands. If the plans of President Israel A. Smith carry through, how the Saints there will rejoice to receive him as the grandson of the prophet who was president of the church when this mission was first planned and launched.

On Pain - By Josephine Skelton

IF SCIENCE advances much further, pain will become an outmoded commodity both physically and mentally. For some reason, we moderns have decided that pain in all of its forms is an undesirable thing. I cannot believe this is true.

Someone has said, "... pain is nearly always birth." The Catholic fathers of the Middle Ages realized this in a perverted way and inflicted pain on themselves in order to develop their souls. That sort of pain is not the kind I am thinking about. Pain which is inflicted on oneself or on another could not be considered good. But there are many other kinds of pain that open the hearts and minds of men as complacent comfort can never do.

It must have taken more than mere sympathy to make Jane Addams so conscious of the needs of her fellow men that she founded Hull House in Chicago. Sympathy never accomplished anything, but the pain aroused in the human heart for another person's suffering has produced all of the great reforms of history. The pain of powerful indignation touched Charles Dickens and made him write Barnaby Rudge, a story of the horrible conditions existing in Newgate Prison. And prison reform followed. The pain of compassion resulted in the Red Cross organization. The pain of sorrow and love brought Christ to earth as the ambassador of God.

There is a story told of an artist who was so badly crippled with arthritis that every movement was torture for him. One day a student asked him, "Master, why do you go on painting when it is so painful for you?" And the master replied, "My son, the pain passes but the beauty remains."

Do not always shrink from pain. The right kind of pain can enlarge your soul and startle you into action that will produce great good for the world.

"... for pain is nearly always birth."

Let Us Witness - By Clair E. Weldon

MANY OF US returned from General Conference with a quickened sense of our membership in the church of Jesus Christ and a deeper awareness of the covenant we have made. The spirit attending the Conference encouraged a re-examination of the purpose of the church and of our personal responsibilities as followers of the Christ.

The Purpose of the Church

It is a characteristic human error to confuse the means with the end. We have often thought that the main purpose of the church was to establish a Zion community of people living together in peace, love, and understanding. Many of us have studied economic, social, and psychological ideas, hoping to find the keys to overcome the sins of war, hatred, prejudice, greed, selfishness, unconcern, and misunderstanding. Yet it seems that the solving of one critical problem is followed by the appearance of other and greater problems. In 1950, with two centuries of tremendous social and scientific progress behind us, we are faced by the most critical, complex situations and most menacing forces which have ever threatened the welfare of mankind. We must meet the needs of the hour. There are indications that we may not accomplish this simply by securing the aid of men with doctor's degrees in sociology and economics, or by establishing within the church a Department of Planning and Research. These may well prove useful. But our so-called "social and economic goals," the ideals of Zion personal and community life, are not the end of our endeavors. They are part of the means. They are very important processes, but they remain incidental to the major purpose of the church. This purpose was brought home with deep impact by the Spirit of God attendant with the activities of the General Conference. The main purpose of the church is not primarily concerned with our own social and economic betterment, but with the mission and message of Jesus Christ.

The Coming of Christ

We judge the coming of Jesus Christ to the earth to be the most important event which has occurred on our globe. We have the record of his coming to the peoples of Palestine and Central America. We have indications that he visited other groups of people. Jesus Christ came representing the love of God. "For God so loved the world, that he gave his Only Begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John 3: 16. By satisfying the demands of justice through his death and assuring men of the fleeting nature of that death by his resurrection, he became the Savior and Redeemer of mankind.

Our Heavenly Father is the Creator of an orderly universe. He did not choose to assure man of salvation by a supreme dictate or fiat. He rejected Lucifer's proposal to do so. Nor could God say to us that we might approach him by any of a number of different paths and find salvation and eternal life. He sent his Son to be the one and only way, to be the Shepherd to guide the sheep to life and safety. It is in the nature of things that Jesus should establish and preach his gospel, to point the way for mankind. He said, "I am the way, the truth, and the life. No man cometh unto the Father, but by me."—John 14: 6. Faith and belief in his name, earnest and sincere repentance, and baptism of water and of the Spirit became the first and fundamental steps. The church with its officers and doctrines and ordinances was established as the actual vehicle of the gospel. It was to continue to function after Christ's ascension. He promised to send the Holy Comforter, and commanded his followers to cry repentance unto all nations, kindreds, tongues, and peoples. Thus Christ's coming, his preaching of the gospel, and his establishment of his church fulfilled the will of the Father by creating an organized, orderly, and demanding means by which men might come into the presence of the Father. He said, "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly."—John 10: 10. We interpret this to mean not merely an improvement of our living during our temporal lifetimes. It points to the fuller life in the presence of God. Jesus said, "This is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."—John 17: 3. The mission of Christ was to make it possible for mankind to come to the Father. Thus his purpose was to assure our salvation and eternal life. He established the church which bears his name to witness for him after he should return to the Father. When it ceased to do so, the gospel was "taken from the earth," to be restored again in God's own due time.

Who Are We?

We are members of that restored church, the church of Jesus Christ. We are called after his name: Christians. We enter into the covenant of baptism in his name: ". . . in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." We commemorate this covenant in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper by praying to God:

. . . that they may eat and drink in remembrance of the body and blood of thy Son, and witness unto thee, O God, the eternal Father, that they are willing to take upon them the name of thy Son, and always remember him and keep his commandments which he has given them, that they may always have his Spirit to be with them. Amen.

Our Responsibility

We are members of the body of Christ. We have made a covenant which is recognized not only by our fellow men and the courts of the land, but which is recorded in the "Lamb's Book of Life" in the eternal courts of heaven itself. The measure of our sin is twofold: (1) We have failed to sufficiently incorporate the gospel of Jesus within our personal lives. (2) We have failed to be effective witnesses to those about us. The second instance is the most condemning, because it is the measure of our selfishness, our unconcern, and our inertia. The responsibility of the church of Jesus Christ is "awe-ful." The collective responsibility of the church is also the deeply individual responsibility of each one of us. The purpose of Jesus Christ was to win souls. It is his church's responsibility to witness for him. We must win souls to him and thus to salvation and eternal life. It is our responsibility to witness for him. We must win disciples to him who will in turn win disciples.

Such is the main goal and purpose of the church. Such ought to be the brightly burning light within the life of each one of us. In the process of witnessing for Christ and winning souls to him, we shall improve our social and economic relationships. We shall build right relationships. We shall establish Zion community living. We shall be abundantly blessed with happiness, love, peace, security, and mutual understanding. We shall do all of this only if we are witnessing for him and winning souls to him. All this and blessings unnumbered await those who will do his will. These are the things that shall follow after those who believe. We deceive ourselves by seeking to build Zion living without fulfilling our major responsibility, which fulfillment makes Zion living possible.

We must witness for Christ and win souls to him. When we do so, these things shall follow. Until we do so, we are weighed in the balance and found wanting.

What Shall We Do?

One of the statements of deepest spiritual significance to come from the Conference was this: "There are many good people in the world who know him but know not his name, who would be members of the church of Jesus Christ were it not that our witnessing has been ineffective!" We must see and understand the things which have made our witnessing ineffective.

(1) We are yet "babes in Christ." Many of us have stopped by the side of the narrow way which leads to God, close to the door through which we entered. We deceive ourselves by believing that because we are near the way of life that we are moving forward in that way. For want of many things (teaching and witnessing homes, personal courage and perseverance, concerned and prayerful fellow men, adequate branch organization, ministering priesthood) we have stopped far short of the mark of our high calling in Jesus Christ. We remain spiritual infants and as such are greatly limited in our capacity for effective witnessing.

(2) We have not done first things first. The existence of time seems to be one of our chief burdens and curses, because it limits us to twenty-four hours a day for the 100 or less years that we shall live in our present form. But time is really indifferent: it allows for both positive and negative accomplishment. Our earthly lives are but a momentary consideration in the vast stretches of eternity, yet it is our responsibility to make use of that moment "to prepare to meet God." Our time is scanty and elusive, but that does not absolve our responsibility of witnessing for him. Our sin is that we have not done first things first. We have allowed second- and third-rate things to occupy and monopolize our time and attention. We say we must earn a living. We must go to school and prepare ourselves for our vocation. We must feed and clothe and cleanse ourselves. We must take intricate care of the many things and gadgets which we say make life much more worth while for us. We must entertain ourselves, and have enjoyment, relaxation, and body-building recreation. After all of these needs have been met, we say we may find time to be concerned about our spiritual welfare and to witness for Christ.

If a man employed us to harvest for him a great field of ripened grain, would not he feel at least disturbed to find us far from that field, reclining in ease and tending very carefully to our own selfish needs? And so also must not Christ Jesus weep tears of compassion for us in our engrossment in things of secondary importance while he waits without witnessing followers for the time when he may endow those followers more fully with his Spirit and thus bring about their salvation and eternal life?

We must and do recognize that the things which have been mentioned as engaging our time are important. It does seem that they must be done. Yet are we justified in giving "lack of time" as a reason for not witnessing? If we do first things first—if we witness—there are promises that these other things shall be added to us:

Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your bodies, what ye shall put on. Behold the fowls of the air, for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your Heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they? How much more will he not feed you? Wherefore, take no thought for these things, but keep my commandments wherewith I have commanded you . . . Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which today is, and tomorrow is cast into the oven, how much more will he not provide for you, if ye are not of little faith.—Matthew 6: 28-34.

We must take time to witness. Many small or unimportant things may be trimmed from our budget of time. We may become more efficient in other activities and thus reduce their time requirements. Most of all we may make use of the considerable amount of time we almost literally throw away each day. We may combine earnest meditation or friendly and concerned fellowship with many of our automatic tasks. We must learn to eat and sleep wisely and adequately, so that the faculties of body and mind will be of utmost service in making the best use of our time. Let us heed the counsel of "Admonition": ". . . time is ripe, my work must hasten; whoso will may bide the hour."

(3) We have not sought earnestly enough. The forces and situations which stand to block the purposes of God (and also our witnessing) are complex, formidable, and deeply imbedded in "things as they now are." Our physical and mental weaknesses, the fear of reproof or failure, a persistent inertia, and an abiding distrust of the unknown and untried combine to make us inconstant and vacillating in the presence of what might be done. We need to develop ability and perseverance as a child learns to walk—slowly, but nonetheless walking. Thus our capacity for earnest endeavor will grow. A more fundamental lack is our failure to submit to and seek the assistance of our Heavenly Father. It is prerequisite to understand that this help comes to us only when we are assisting him in his work. Without the help and witnessing of the Spirit of God, our witnessing is ineffective! We have not been sufficiently earnest in following the paths which lead to the ministry of God's Spirit in our lives. We have been commanded to pray. We must pray, and we must pray always. We must learn to be righteous, for "the prayer of the righteous availeth much." We need to develop the powers of concentration and inspiration which are inherent in true and earnest fasting. We ought to take increased advantage of the interplay of effort and the mutual strengthening which takes place as we stand shoulder-to-shoulder with, and minister to, each other. We must become strong, valiant, persevering witnesses.

(4) We have said: Not now, Lord—later!" There seems to be an ever-present human tendency toward procrastination and lack of industry. To those of us who are young and immature, the tendency to put off doing what we ought to do until we are more capable of doing it has a strong appeal. Many of us are content to wait upon the Lord, fearing our own lack of preparation and lack of capacity to do. Certainly we must be wise and not run beyond our strength. But in running, in playing the piano, in building a house, and in witnessing for Christ, we prepare and learn to do only by doing. We must witness, and we must begin to witness now!

(5) We have not desired the welfare of others. Our modern civilization is characteristically a house divided against itself. Racial, economic, national, political, and religious differences divide and cross-divide us. Even within relatively homogenous groupings, it is apparent that the individual person tends to take care of his own selfish concerns at the expense of all others in that group. We of the church of Jesus Christ are partakers of the same tendency, and to this extent we are not a "peculiar people." It is extremely difficult for us to consider or imagine the situation of our fellow men, and to desire their welfare above our own. We must develop the deep love for our brethren that Lehi manifested when he spoke to his sons: "I have none other object, save it be the everlasting welfare of your souls."—II Nephi 1: 128. We need to take greater advantage of the experiences in the church

Make Me Believe - Part V

By Ruby Tinkham

MIKE HAD A PROBLEM. It was the toughest problem he had ever had. In fact, it was so tough that it made all his other problems seem as infinitesimal as a B-B shot beside a cannon ball.

The aroma of roast beef and apple pie told him that supper was about ready. He knew exactly what would happen. They would all wait until he sat down at the table, and then Mary and the boys would turn and look at him eagerly, expectantly, with that questioning look on their faces that asked plainly, "Well, Dad, have you decided yet?"

That was it. If only he could decide; if only he could make up his mind; if only he knew what was best. He slumped deeper into the soft chair and tossed the paper aside. No use pretending, Mary knew he was worried; the boys knew he was worried, and they left him alone like this purposely so he could think things out. But it wasn't any use. He was no nearer a decision now than he had been two weeks ago when Mr. Harrison walked into his office and said casually, "Well, it's all yours, Mike, that promotion you've been wanting, that doubled salary, that policy you've been preaching about, and all those new ideas you've been wanting to work out—they're here, right in your lap. The company is bringing Dodds home on account of his health, and you're elected to take his place. Of course, you're a little young, but there's no doubt about it, Mike, you're the right man. How soon can you be ready to leave for Arabia?"

Just like that, right out of a clear sky, everything he'd dreamed of, a chance in a million, the big opportunity every man keeps locked up in his heart, and he didn't know what to do about it. Arabia, of all places—the end of the world! The dropping off place in civilization. Dare he ask Mary and the boys to share a thing like that? Just because they loved him enough to go anywhere with him didn't mean he had a right to take advantage of that love to further his own selfish ambition.

He sighed and rubbed his forehead despondently. Mary spoke softly from the doorway. "Mike, you're making yourself sick. Why not flip a coin and let it go at that?"

Mike stood up and rammed his clenched fists into his pockets. He started to pace the floor. "I can't do that, it means too much. I've got to have the right answer." He wheeled suddenly and stopped in front of her. "Look, why don't you decide?"

She smiled tenderly. "No, darling, this is your big chance, and the decision must be your own."

"But I need help. This thing is too big for me."

"I know, why don't you go over and talk to Dr. Brown after supper?" And then, hesitantly, "Why not ask God?"

Mike stared at the toe of his shoe, and for a minute he resembled a small boy, lonely and forlorn. He shook his head sadly, and a note of pleading crept into his voice. "You know I can't ask God for help after practically ignoring him all my life. What right have I got to go to him now? It would be treating him like a mythical Santa Claus whom you shelve every year until Christmas comes around again."

Mary sighed. "Aren't you being childish? Prayer isn't begging God for something he isn't willing to give. You can't persuade him to do anything he doesn't already intend doing. You can only determine what his will is for you, and then move out and forward accordingly. God doesn't point his finger at you and say, 'Mike Ferrel, don't you dare go to Arabia! That's a horrible place to take two growing boys—no schools, no churches, no nothing. You stay right here in America where you belong.' Is that what you would call an answer to your prayer? Would you be satisfied with an answer like that? Or would you look back a few years from now and say to yourself, 'I never had a chance. I never made any decision at all. God simply told me what I had to do, and I did it. I'm not sure I like that kind of a God. He's too bossy.'"

MIKE GRINNED in spite of himself. Mary knew him so well. If only he had some of her faith.

"But all the prayers I've ever heard are people asking for something. They treat God as if he was a genie who rubbed a magic lamp and presto, there's your heart's desire!"

"Mike, that isn't true! The really great prayers you've never even heard—except for a few. Moses prayed to enter the Land of Promise and was refused in order to teach Israel the significant lesson of obedience. Hannah prayed long for a son, but she too was refused until she was willing to consecrate him to God. Paul prayed for removal of a great handicap, and all he received was additional grace to surmount it. Christ prayed long and hard, and his was a refusal, too, like the rest. All of these prayers were answered and none of the people who said them received their heart's desire."

"Yes, but they did get an answer. They weren't left hanging high and dry with the hot sun beating down and no help in sight."

"You'll get an answer, too. The point is, will you accept it—that is, if it doesn't happen to agree with your own point of view?"

She laid her hand on his arm and searched his face lovingly. "Darling, I dare you to ask God for help. I challenge you to put your problem willingly into his hands for a whole week, and then let it be. Don't hash it over. Don't keep yourself in mental conflict with it. Just give it up to him, and then let it go."

She squeezed his arm, and her voice trembled with emotion. "Believe me, dearest, I know God answers prayers."

Mike looked down at the top of her head affectionately. Mary would go. She loved him enough, and she'd never complain. But she loved her home, too, and her church and her friends. The boys—they were good sports—they'd take it all in their stride. But did he have the right to ask it of them? It was their life, their future, just the same as his. Money, success, prestige—what were they beside hurting your own loved ones?

He heaved a slow sigh, and Mary looked up into his tired face. "Mike, go over and talk to Dr. Brown, will you? Go now, I know he can help you. You always feel better after you talk things over with him."

He picked up his hat and started slowly for the door. Mary followed him anxiously. "Mike, no matter what he says, we'll do it. We'll try, won't we?"

He paused as if undecided and then he replied firmly, "Yes, honey, we'll try."

DR. BROWN was spraying roses in the flower garden back of his house. He looked like a little brownie in his faded blue coveralls until one glanced at his radiant face and the windblown white hair. He caressed each branch as if it were something sublime, and the flowers responded to his touch. He called a cheery greeting to Mike and waved a free hand. Then picking up some clip-pers near by, he chose three magnificent roses and brought them over to his friend.

"Mike, these are my Peace roses. I want you to give these to Mary for me. They remind me of her—so full of the beauty of tranquillity." He smiled and sighed contentedly. "It's good to see you again. Shall we stay out here or go inside?"

Mike drew on the peaceful quietness of the garden and slid into a large wooden chair. "Let's stay outside, sir, it's so beautiful out here."

Dr. Brown nodded his head and smiled again. "Thank you, I hope God heard that. I've done so little for the earth since I've been here."

They sat silently, each wrapped in the quiet contemplation of nature's lavish display. Mike spoke out of the gathering twilight. "It seems almost a sacrilege to mention problems in an atmosphere like this, doesn't it?"

"If there were no problems there would be no roses like these," came the answer calmly. "Only out of the solution of many trying problems can there be produced such a stirring thing as true quality. Why not tell me about it?"

Mike accepted the invitation gratefully. What a man the doctor was! How easy he made it by simply understanding. Mike talked without interruption, and when he had finished he waited quietly.

"Have you thought about asking your Heavenly Father what he thinks about this?"

"No, sir, I don't feel that I've earned the right to ask. God for any special favors yet."

"Listen to me. Would you allow one of your sons to make an important decision like this without first consulting you?"

"No, sir, I wouldn't. I'd want to know all about it," Mike answered.

"And would you expect to tell him then just what he ought to do about it?"

"Of course not, I'd give him the best advice I could, and then I'd let him make his own decision."

"There's your answer, Mike. Prayer isn't begging God for special favors. It's talking things over with him and securing his will. Then you make your own decision, and he adds his strength to yours all the way."

Mike sat deep in thought, then said, "But I'm not sure I can discover his will even if I give myself up to prayer. How do I know that it isn't my own self telling me what I want to hear instead of God's pointing out the right way?"

"You have just laid your finger on the whole secret of success in prayer. Whenever a man can truthfully say, 'God, I don't want to hear my own voice coming back to me; I will accept nothing but your will,' he has already laid hold on divine resources."

His visitor was silent. Dr. Brown sighed audibly. "You know, Mike, with prayer the main line of communication between God and man, it would be interesting to know just how many times God had hopes of using that line and found it busy." He went on musingly. "Most people think of prayer as a one-way street with all the traffic heading towards heaven."

The minister waited patiently until Mike roused himself. "But I still don't feel that I can trust myself to make a decision of such importance on that basis."

"I know exactly what you mean, but in God's presence we do not call that quality mistrust, we call it humility. It's one of those things that looks very easy but comes very hard. What you need, Mike, is some help. Would you be willing to take some definite time every day and have Mary and me join you in prayer over this problem? Let's say eleven o'clock, wherever we may be, for one whole week."

Mike stood up, and even in the darkness his old friend could feel his hesitancy. "Yes, I'll try. I promised Mary I'd try."

Dr. Brown laid his hand on the young man's shoulder affectionately, "Mike, if the answer should come to either Mary or me, will you accept it?"

He responded to the other's warmth firmly, "Yes, sir, I'll accept it."

MIKE LOOKED UP at the clock. It was eleven, and this was the last day of his week. It wasn't any use, but he had promised. One more time wouldn't make any difference now. Who'd think there was so much to just learning how to pray? He had never felt so inadequate as he had this past week. His respect for religious people had grown by leaps and bounds. And he had had the audacity to think that religious living was easy, that it was a listless, weak thing! Maybe someday he would learn that in the spiritual, like the physical, all great power lies in the invisible. Poor Mary, she was so sure he would get his answer. How he hated to disappoint her.

The door to his office opened, and Mr. Harrison came in with a sheaf of papers in his hand. "Mike, how about looking over these briefs before you leave? I don't want anything coming up after you're gone that we can't handle. I doubt very much if we get another Mike Ferrel in this office for another twenty years."

Mike was startled. Mr. Harrison was grinning and there was pride in his tone. "Don't look so surprised. You're going. You know you are. I've known it all week."

Mike grinned and shook his head bewilderedly. "Am I? In that case maybe I should let my wife know about it." He reached for the phone, and Mr. Harrison laughed out loud. "Who are you trying to fool? I saw your wife just a few minutes ago at Lawton's and she was buying luggage, and I mean luggage—trunks and that kind of thing."

Mike was stunned. Mary buying luggage! She must be sure. She must have had an answer. He grabbed his hat and started for the door. Mr. Harrison was still grinning as he stuck out his hand and said, "Congratulations, and all the luck in the world." Mike paused uncertainly. Mr. Harrison was sure; he really meant it!

Mike was tense with excitement when he reached home. Now, if only Mary were here. And then he saw it. Right there in his own yard was a big truck, and men were unloading luggage! Mr. Harrison was right; they were going! He grabbed the screen door and yelled, "Mary, where are you?"

She came into the room and was smiling luminously. "Hello, darling. You're home early, aren't you?"

Mike grabbed her shoulder and squeezed hard. "Tell me. When did it happen? How did you know? I mean we're going, aren't we—"

Mary laughed merrily. "Stop a minute, and take a deep breath. Of course we're going. I knew it this morning. I knew it as soon as I saw that sale at Lawton's. I tried to walk past it and I couldn't, something wouldn't let me. It kept saying, 'Go back, Mary, and get the luggage, you'll need it. Go back and get it.' So I did."

Mike hugged her tight. He felt wonderful, like being a whole new person. Maybe it wasn't the right answer; maybe they were both being fooled, but it didn't matter; it seemed right, and as long as they both felt this way it would work out no matter what happened.

"Mike, please tell Dr. Brown. Tell him now."

HE FOUND THE MINISTER in the garden pulling weeds. The old man looked up from his hands and knees and said confidently, "Mike, I shall miss you when you leave, but I can't help feeling that for you this is a wonderful opportunity."

Mike stopped short and then grinned. "So, Mary told you?"

He shook his head slowly. "No, Mary did not tell me, but God did."

He looked up into Mike's face then and saw the uncertainty there. Wearily he got to his feet and brushed himself off. "It's like this. About eleven o'clock this morning I had a visitor. It was a young man with a problem, and he was in despair. He had been sent here to help me in my work, but for three weeks now he has been unable to find a place to live. Today he told me that he would have to give up and go back, that it would be impossible for him to hold out any longer.

"And then an unusual thing happened. I looked at the clock and I saw that it was time to pray for you. I asked him to join me, and he consented. After we had finished, the answer came as clear as the sound of your voice. 'Mike is going away. Tell the young man that there will be a place for him here. Mike is leaving.' So I told him. I told him you were leaving and that I was certain he could secure your house. Was I wrong?"

Mike stood rigid in powerful concentration. It couldn't be true, but somehow it was. It all fitted together too neatly. First Mr. Harrison, then Mary, and now Dr. Brown. Was this the way God worked? Did he answer prayers in just such simple ways as this? But how else could he work? Hadn't he always used the simple to confound the wise? Mike shook his head and answered the question absent-mindedly. "No, you weren't wrong. We are leaving, and he can have the house."

He turned as if to go and then stopped in new wonder. "Would you mind, sir, remembering us in your prayers often?"

The doctor's voice rang with an exultant note of happiness. "It gives me great pleasure to talk with God about my friends. And, Mike, promise me that you will continue your acquaintance with him."

Mike felt a returning surge of excitement. It was a great, big, wonderful world. He took a deep breath, and he felt washed clean, strong, ready for anything. It was like being born again with all the old behind and the challenge of all the new ahead. It was good to be alive, good to be young, good to be going somewhere. He looked down at the little man at his side and read in his face perfect understanding. And then he caught himself up sharply. "Did I say little man? Yes, but oh that I were such a little man—such a little man with such a great soul!"

THE END.

You Haven't Long to Live—By Louise Wrigley

PEOPLE HAVE BEEN HEARING that from their doctors for generations with varied feelings of regret, fear, and rarely even relief. We seem not to want to give up this earthly life which, if we listen to most anyone's troubles, seems fraught with anxiety and discomfort, inconvenience and strain.

Still, realizing that one hasn't long to live usually brings about a deeper evaluation of relative importances. It reminds one that he'd better be up and doing and not waste what precious moments are left to him.

Why is it few of us are wise enough to realize that, essentially, we are all in the same boat? Counted according to a larger scope, none of us have really enough time left to do what we should, judged in terms of our potentialities. In addition, some of us are almost hopelessly ill with indifference.

Every minute that is not used wisely is not given its full chance for development. Why did man develop clocks? Because he wanted to keep track of the hours that they might not pass without his knowing. Why did God ordain that the sun and the moon should indicate the passing of time? Perhaps because he set us here for an appointed span to accomplish certain things. Shall we disappoint him?

Perhaps we have done some worth-while things. Almost everyone does . . . but it is not enough. If the next years contain no more than the past have held, is it an adequate representation of what we really could do?

Recriminations and regrets are not the answer. They too, take precious time that might better be spent in actively working for the new pattern we are setting for ourselves. God does not mean that we should sit about, head in hands, moaning our repentance. He means that we should repent in our hearts and at the same time be physically and spiritually doing things which concretely attest to our true repentance. The Scriptures indicate that God does not condone the idle hands, the lazy heart. Our test is in what we do, not what we say or what we profess to believe.

If only we can remember that this very moment counts, and as quickly as that is gone. If we look longingly back on it, other moments slip by when they should be serving some useful purpose. We can prepare only for the hour ahead by living diligently the hour that is upon us.

A glance at your schedule . . . what does it include for God? Is it devoted to a well-rounded, peaceful life in a home dedicated to the things Christ taught? If it doesn't, your schedule needs some rearranging to make room for the spiritual riches you need and which await only your willing heart.

I am rearranging my schedule!

"Blessed Are the Pure in Heart

For They Shall See God" — By James Daugherty

THERE IS AN OLD LATIN PROVERB, "Unless the vessel is clean, whatever you pour into it turns sour." This is ever so true with the human will. Unless it is directed straight for God, whatever you put into the life of religious and moral effort has a root of bitterness and sourness, and it will spoil the whole life.

The "heart," both in the Old and New Testaments, stands for a man's inmost soul, and so the purity that Jesus required was not the ceremonial cleanliness of the Levitical law, nor the outward conduct but a complete purity of inward thought and desire. Purity in its true sense contains no admixture of other substance. Benevolence is pure when it contains no admixture of self-seeking. Justice is pure when it contains no admixture of partiality. Love is pure when it contains no admixture of lust. A man's heart is pure when it loves only the good, when all its motives are right, and when all its desires and aspirations seek the noble and true. Only those who are pure in heart can see God, and they can understand him in the direct proportion as they themselves are pure. When men have succeeded in cleansing their hearts of sin, they were permitted to see God face to face.

Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord.—Hebrews 12: 14.

Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is and every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure.—I John 3: 2, 3.

And they shall see his face and his name shall be in their foreheads.—Revelation 22: 4.

The heart is the basis of purity, for in the heart is the life of man. The first great commandment our Lord gave his disciples and the church was, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind."—Matthew 22: 37.

The heart must be cultivated and prepared to manifest the devotions and appreciation which is defined in the first great commandment. The honest in heart, says the Master, who will fully surrender themselves to the laws of God will establish his righteousness and will refuse to walk after their own gods.

THE RICH YOUNG RULER had not prepared his heart to receive the message of Christ. He, like so many of us, thought he could hold on to other gods and passions and still have the blessed life. But when the test came, he realized, to his disappointment, that both would not mix. He either had to hold onto possessions as his god, or abandon them for the love of Christ. He chose to keep his possessions and lost salvation. Should Jesus have made it easier for him? Jesus refuses to make great living in a sinful world an easy task. An easy religion cannot lift life to its best. "Let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me"—"Tarry ye"—"Go ye"—"Repent ye"—"Be baptized"—"Love those who hate you." This would be the true way of life even if Jesus had not said it. You cannot breath the air of the mountaintop without the climb. You cannot paint a masterpiece without long effort. You cannot even build muscle without exercise. You cannot defeat sin and build the everlasting virtues of a great life without long obedience to the will of God.

It is necessary for those who will see God to prepare their hearts. Those who have not done so must believe on the testimonies of others until they prepare themselves to find

God. Ezra prepared his heart to seek the law of the Lord (Ezra 7: 10). Bushnell said, "The life of man is in his heart."

"For as he thinketh in his heart, so is he."—Proverbs 23: 7.

"Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life."—Proverbs 4: 23.

"The Lord looketh on the heart."—I Samuel 16: 7.

The human heart is considered the seat of mental faculties or capacities. It is the seat of affection and passion, either singly or combined. It portrays love, joy, grief, enmity, courage, and pleasure.

People often say that it is impossible to lead a pure life. A great many are distressed by impure temptations and fail to make progress because they only endeavor to get rid of them instead of replacing them with good. They dislike uncleanness of heart and mind. It weighs upon their conscience and destroys their self-respect. Yet they have no similar horror of pride, or irreverence, or uncharity. The only way to get rid of uncleanness is to strive after holiness. Replace bad with good. Sin must be replaced with godliness if their heart is to be pure. Paul says, "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God who loved me, and gave himself for me."—Galatians 2: 20.

In the Name of Humanity—

Let us do all we can in the cause of humanity. Every man has a mission from God to help his fellow beings. Never have we approached nearer to our Heavenly Father than when we alleviate the sorrows of others. Never have we performed an act more God-like than when we bring sunshine to hearts that are dark and desolate.

QUESTION:

Is the custom of Saints using consecrated olive oil in their homes against scriptural teaching?

ANSWER:

The use of olive oil was common in Old Testament times, and it was used not only in religious ceremonies but in everyday purposes also. It was also used as a mark of esteem and respect (Psalm 23:5; Luke 7:46).

In pointing out things that the children of Israel would suffer if they failed to "observe and do all the things that the Lord had commanded," Deuteronomy 28:40 says, "Thou shalt have olive trees . . . but thou shalt not anoint thyself with oil." This command was not against anointing, but a statement of fact showing that because of their neglect this privilege would no longer be enjoyed. Whenever possible, reason would suggest that it is to our advantage to follow the procedure outlined in the Scriptures, James 5:14, "Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord." It is the prayer of faith that saves the sick. The anointing with oil whether by the elders or by the individual is but a type of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, with all of its healing and creative power, which we seek when asking for a blessing.

We know of no Scripture that forbids the use of the oil in the home in times of affliction.

QUESTION:

Is it God's will that we should eat pork? (See Isaiah 65:4; 66:3.)
Missouri E. N.

ANSWER:

The church has never made a distinction between the various kinds of meat, and we find nothing in the Word of God which discriminates against swine's flesh except the Mosaic Law as found in Leviticus 11:7. You will observe this language bases the restriction against the use of pork on the fact that it was among the animals which Israel was not to eat, and classified as unclean; not because it was unhealthful.

We do not know precisely why the Lord gave all the restrictions he did in the Mosaic Law, but he told them they should not do many things which seem peculiar to us today, and yet it served a good purpose at that time. For instance, they were not to light a fire on the Sabbath. They could not travel more than five-eighths of a mile from their home on the Sabbath. They were not to mix milk with meat in their cooking. However, this law was done away in Christ and these restrictions were never imposed in the gospel law.

Acts 15:29 records the apostle's "sentence" against placing this yoke of restriction on the saints which "neither our fathers nor we were able to bear." The decision was announced by James "that ye abstain from meats offered to idols." No other kinds of meat are proscribed. When Paul was writing to Timothy, he said, "Now the spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter time some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils . . . forbidding to marry and commanding to abstain from meats which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving."—I Timothy 4:1, 3.

The latter-day revelation (Section 86) makes no distinction between pork and other meat, and in harmony with scientific information of the present time, it holds that all "flesh also, of beasts and of fowl of the air, I the Lord hath ordained for the use of man." The only restriction is that they be used sparingly.

Witnessing in the Home -

By Pauline J. Arnson

THE HOME, which women preside over and which the church has designated to be the chief responsibility of women to build, is the most effective place where witnessing for Christ can be done. At least you will grant me that it is the most effective field for women, for in it can be lived all the principles of the gospel which we believe will produce a happier and more useful life. In it grow the children and other members of the family into a Christ-like character. In truly Zioniac homes are found women, and men too, who feel that their chief stewardship is first to develop into fine personalities themselves, and then to develop a wholesome and godly family which will be a living example of the gospel. Beyond that, their stewardship is to let this gospel shine through their lives to others.

There is no doubt that the home will be effective in the great program of evangelism that is now being stressed in our church. People look to members when they become interested in a new religion. "What has this religion produced in the lives and homes of those who belong to it?" they ask. "Are they living what they preach?"

It does not always follow that from good homes come good useful citizens and loyal church members, but it is more probable that this type of people will develop. If we—the women—want to witness for Christ most effectively, we must see to it that we strive to do all we can to make our homes truly Zioniac. If in addition to keeping an attractive, wholesome, clean home with a healthy family as our goal, as good a goal as this, we should keep the larger objective in our mind as we build our homes, so that the necessary functions of living will be glorified as they are given direction and purpose.

WITNESSING IS NECESSARY if the church as well as the world is to endure. We are at our best when witnessing. It does something for us to tell the gospel story. We have to believe it and work at it and test it. We have to have experience with God's working through the church and through us before we can tell this to others we wish to interest.

We women are called to build the best type of home. Latter Day Saints define this as a Zioniac home, which we understand to mean a Christian home of the highest order. This work is worthy of our best efforts, for the importance of good homes in the material, physical, and spiritual sense is recognized by many in all walks of life. Statesmen believe that the home is the foundation of a strong nation, for within the home is taught the principles of democracy. Also when homes are not maintained or if family life is broken down, there is strife and turmoil, delinquency and crime.

AN EDITORIAL in the Independence Examiner in 1948, after the death of the former Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes, quotes Dr. Emerson Fosdick, a prominent New York minister as saying, "Mr. Hughes cannot be understood without a knowledge of his family. His character was the product of that kind of family which, God forbid, America shall never lose. There is still a Gold Standard in home life." Then the editorial continued:

There are some exceptions, of course, but oftener than not, the man who lives an honorable, constructive, and worthwhile life whether he attains fame or lives out his days in relative obscurity, reflects a gold standard in family life. It may be the home from which he came or the one he established and cared for or it may be both. The point is that from the right kind of home outward, and not from remedial measures working inward, that lives of probity and wholesome influence and achievement are projected.

The church and school are highly instrumental in shaping young lives, but they are sadly handicapped if their teachings and counsel are not bulwarked in the home where children and young people are nurtured and spend the greater part of their time.

The conditions of the world of crime and evil, accident and death call us to be faithful in the accomplishment of our tasks if we recognize that good homes will help alleviate the sin and suffering.

IF WE WERE TO HAVE A CLASS, and each of you would be given an opportunity to tell what kind of a home you came from, it would be quite interesting. Perhaps your home was a perfect home and as you think of it from this distance, you think you might not want to change it at all. No doubt you do in your home some of the things your mother did, and perhaps the very customs and the way you have decorated your home—even your tastes—reflect the home of your parents. But no matter how much we appreciate the good qualities of that old family home, if we are honest, we will recognize that there were some faults and that we should build upon the good things, discarding the old.

Our homes should be better than those of our parents. The influence that goes out to friends as we attempt to witness should be greater. The qualities we possess and the type of children we rear should improve each generation and reach closer to the goal of perfection.

All of the good should be passed on and incorporated into our own homes. The characteristics of honesty, and work which were so much a part of the older home should be in ours. Children should be taught to respect work and to do their share. Mothers and fathers often make the mistake of not wanting their children to have some of the hardships they had. The greatest kindness is to prepare children to be useful people trained and able to do their share capably.

We cannot witness for Christ through our homes without having religious homes. Our ideas about what constitutes a religious home have changed too. Formal religion, hymn-singing, church-going, and "thou shalt nots" indicated a religious family in former years. I like some of the customs of the past—especially respect for the Sabbath. I recall how mothers laid out all the clean clothing on special chairs so that the youngsters would have no trouble getting ready for church school. Everything was ready for Sunday, and the family went to bed at an early hour on Saturday evening. The whole family had fun helping mother cook the food and do the baking on Saturday so that all could attend church.

To live religiously in the home is to "bring the love of God into the hearts of our children." What greater thing can we accomplish than this? Building Christian character is our biggest task and our greatest contribution to the program of evangelism of the church. If the women of the church are successful in this responsibility, many people will be attracted to the teachings which produce such qualities in the lives of its followers, and the world will benefit because we have been faithful in the performance of our duty.

To See His Face

Stanley Jones describes a visit he made to the city of Copenhagen. He went to see a famous statue of Christ. He looked at it and admired it. Then a young native came to his side and said reverently:

"You can't see his face till you bend the knee."

He went close to the statue and knelt down, and as he looked up that face looked down upon him with a depth of understanding and sympathy that he did not see until he had kneeled.—C. S. Bergstresser.

"ALL ARE CALLED," read John Brown, a young farmer from Kansas, as he entered the tabernacle of the reunion grounds. "I wonder if it really means all?"

"It means just what it says," Paul Smith, the district president said, as he peered out from behind a huge pile of benches. "God said it himself."

"I still don't get it. Is everybody called to be a preacher? Take me for instance. I've spent all my life on a farm, except four years when I was in college studying scientific farming. Now am I supposed to give up my farm and go preach?"

"That would leave us a pretty hungry world if every farmer went to preach, wouldn't it?"

John grinned. "Pretty chilly, too, if we lost all the coal miners and clothing makers to the ministry."

"This is hot work." Paul heaved a bench into the first row and sat down on it wiping his face. "There's more to that quotation that kind of explains it. Ever hear it?"

"I don't remember it if I have."

"It goes like this: 'All are called according to the gifts of God unto them; and to the intent that all may labor together, let him that laboreth in the ministry and him that toileth in the affairs of the men of business and of work labor together with God for the accomplishment of the work intrusted to all.'—Doctrine and Covenants 119: 8.

"That makes a better picture." John leaned against a stack of benches. "That 'all are called' business doesn't mean that everybody is called to the ministry. A person is simply called to do the job he can do best—grow better wheat or fatter cattle or build a better mouse trap."

"Just so long as you consecrate your gift to God and use it for him. If you don't do that, then you're still not obeying his call—and that goes for preachers, too."

"I never thought about people being called to other things besides the ministry."

"Sure thing. Look, it's this way. In this church we believe we are called to build the kingdom of God on earth. We aim to build a society that will live according to God's laws and show the other people of the world that the way of peace will really work. In that kind of society, when we get it, there will be work for everybody, and everybody will work in his place without discord."

"And everything will be peace—perfect peace." John shook his head a bit doubtfully. "I can't help thinking it sounds like kind of a pipe-dream Utopia."

"It would be if men tried to accomplish it alone. The difference comes when we get God's help and start to work together motivated by love for God and each other. With God's help and the right motivation, Zion can be established without any pipe dreaming."

"I'd hate to put you on the spot, Paul, but why hasn't it been done before if it's so easy?"

"I didn't say it was easy." Paul stood up and slapped John's shoulder. "I wouldn't want to put you on the spot, either, but can't you think of a good reason yourself?"

"Well—I haven't done much to help, if that's what you mean. But then, I'm only one person."

"And there's your answer. Too many of us are armchair Zion builders. We sit around and talk and dream when we should roll up our sleeves and get to work. Sure, God told us to study and pray in preparation to do his work, but he intended us to work as we studied and not wait to get the big job started. Everyone of us can be a missionary for Zion right while we're going about our daily business. Maybe you can be a living example of our message by being a better farmer; someone else may be a better barber—a better printer—a better teacher—and so on until everybody is obeying the call of God to do the best he can with the gift that is given him. And now I'd better get the rest of these benches set down. The first meeting will be starting soon."

"Hold on a minute. After that private sermon, there's no time like the present to start obeying my call. Bet I can put those benches around easier than you can. Stacking hay builds good muscles."

NOWATA, OKLAHOMA.—The thirty-second anniversary of the dedication of the church building was celebrated with a home-coming on June 25. Elder Lee Quick of Mapleton, Kansas, was a visitor. He was the first missionary of the Restoration to present the gospel in the community.

The day was started with church school. Mrs. Annabell Sellers gave the worship talk on, "We Strive Toward the High Calling." There followed a solo by Gaynell Groover. Elder Quick spoke at the 11:00 service on "Loyalty." Four babies were blessed at this service.

Basket dinner was served at the city park. The afternoon prayer meeting was in charge of the former pastor, Elder O. A. Duncan of Miami, Oklahoma. Pastor E. R. Coldren read a historical sketch of the thirty-two years of the branch. The branch was organized on October 21, 1917, by Elder Charles Fry. There were 46 members at the time. Membership has reached 108. At present there are 67. There have been 34 deaths, 32 marriages, 33 babies blessed, 96 baptized, and six men ordained: 2 elders, 2 priests, 1 teacher, and 1 deacon.

TUCSON, ARIZONA.—Elder George Njeim held a series of missionary meetings April 19 to May 3 in the Women's Club. On May 6 Elder Njeim baptized Raxie Lancaster. On May 7 Raxie Lancaster was confirmed with Elder A. H. Hartman and Elder Harry Sheffer officiating.

Elder Russel Ralston, associate minister in charge of the area, held meetings May 28 and 29 at the Women's Club.

On June 11, three children, Goldie, Helene, and Douglas Smith, were baptized by Priest Robert Heald. They were confirmed by Elders A. H. Hartman, Harry Sheffer, and I. T. Turner.

On June 25 Elder T. R. Davis and wife visited the branch. Elder Davis' theme for the morning service was "A True Disciple."—Reported by LAVETA BERGAN.

SEATTLE, WASHINGTON.—Joyce Wainwright and Shirley Johnson are home from college, and La Von Crum will return in August. This fall Kenneth Fernandes, Clark Coleman, Carol Crum, David Swenson, and Joe Hubbard will be going to college.

Mrs. Norma Wiley, Miss Ivadell Oliver, and Kenneth Fernandes have recently been baptized.

Paul Parkhurst is in the Maynard Hospital improving from a serious heart attack.—Reported by JESSIE EARL.

MERLIN, ONTARIO.—Four members have died during the past few months: Ada McLaren, Jessie Atkinson, Ben Haskell, and Gerald Atkinson. Two babies were blessed on Mother's Day, and two children were baptized at a service held at the edge of Lake Erie. The confirmation service was held at the church on the same day.

A mother-daughter banquet with an attendance of sixty was held in May with Helen Atkinson as guest speaker. The annual business meeting was held June 21 with District President E. E. Smith in charge. A special offering has been given to the Manitoba Relief fund.—Reported by ADDIE DAWSON.

GULF STATES DISTRICT.—"Exploring the Kingdom of God" was the theme of the 1950 Liahona Youth Camp which was held June 11-18 at the Brewton, Alabama, reunion grounds. J. A. Pray, Mobile pastor and camp forum class instructor, set the activities off to a good start at the first campfire service Sunday night when he presented, "The Spirit of Liahona." Brother Pray held in his hand a model of the "Liahona" and was dressed in a costume of Book of Mormon times, which added to the ancient atmosphere of the traditional service. All the cabins in camp bore the names of famous ships, and the campers took on names of famous explorers in history to carry through with the theme of the week.

R. L. Booker (Prince Henry the navigator) of Mobile was the camp director, and he was assisted by his wife, Adeline Booker. The rest of the staff included: W. J. Breshears, business manager; Sybil Thistlewaite, nurse; Myrtle Gowery, cook; Lillian Roberts, cook; Le Moyne Scott, lifeguard; Ed Barlow, camp paper; Wesley Diamond, canteen; J. A. Pray, forum class; Emily Williamson, work project; Phonie Ellen Everett, work project; and Jeanne Tankersley, camp paper.

There were many special events during the week mixed with fun, fellowship, and work that helped to make camp this year one of the best since its beginning in 1945. An early morning surprise trip to Bonnie Beach was held by the campers on Tuesday morning and on Friday there was an all-day journey to the Gulf of Mexico. Another special event of the week was a program presented by the Music and Drama Class in the old tabernacle under the direction of Adeline Booker. The annual banquet was held on Saturday night with Le Moyne Scott as the master of ceremonies and Apostle P. E. Farrow as the special guest. Following the banquet, the campers marched in couples down to the creek where the traditional candlelighting service of consecration is held. Each camper lit a candle mounted on a paper plate and one at a time placed them in the running stream. It was a beautiful sight there in the night to see the candles representing each camper and his light of Christ floating down the stream in a steady row, symbolic of the way the campers would leave camp the next day to go into the world and carry their light of the gospel to seeking men and women.

Camp Liahona came to a close for 1950 at noon, Sunday. An inspirational fellowship service Sunday morning in "the grove" was the climax to the week's experiences and prepared the campers to leave for their respective home responsibilities. Afterwards, "The Liahonian," the camp paper, was passed out to each camper as a scrapbook of the things that had happened within the group during the week together. Camp then came to an official close at 11:00, and the explorers prepared to journey homeward after a good week together in "Exploring the Kingdom of God."—Reported by ED. BARLOW.

STONINGTON, MAINE.—District President D. E. Harvey was in charge of the district conference held June 17 and 18. Saturday evening was a district get-together. A baked bean supper was served in the new dining room in the church basement. A program followed conducted by Elder Harvey. Songs were sung and a question-and-answer contest was held.

Prayer and testimony meeting was held early Sunday morning. At the 11:00 service the name of Winfield Billings was presented for consideration to the priesthood. He made a statement of acceptance, and Elder Cecil Billings spoke in his favor. The sermon was by Elder Harvey.

In the afternoon service, Winfield Billings was ordained to the office of priest by Elders Chester Gray and Cecil Billings. At the business meeting Elder Eugene Look was released of his duties as nonresident pastor because he was moving out of the state. Elder Benjamin Carter was chosen to fill the vacancy.

Geraldine Kimbal was also released as leader of the women's department. Helen Winslow was chosen to fill the vacancy.

Elders Carter and Cecil Billings were chosen to serve on the reunion committee till fall. They are to study the situation of repairing the old tabernacle or building a new one, and report at the fall conference. The Mountainville church property will also be discussed at the fall conference.—Reported by LOUISE J. EATON.

ESCATAWPA, MISSISSIPPI.—Services were held for the first time in the new church on Children's Day. Pastor A. N. Barnes preached the first sermon at 11:00, and Hildred Thomas sang a solo.

Baptismal service was held at the new font in the afternoon. Those baptized were Audrey Jean Roberts, Doris Marie Allen, Ethel Ann Williams, Richard Basarge, William Ray Mack, J. D. McQueen, Dewey and Alvin McQueen. Pastor Barnes and Elder Rudolph Williams were assisted by D. W. Sherman, Gordon Gibson, and Hildred Thomas in the service.

Following this service, the congregation marched over to the old church building and formed a circle. The priesthood stood on the platform. Prayer was offered by Elder D. W. Sherman for the service of the old church.

Elder Daniel McQueen led the singing of "Blest Be the Tie That Binds." Music for the day was directed by Madella Barnes.

The new church plans were drawn by C. K. Thomas and Hildred Thomas. The building is not completed. The old church has been donated to the Ocean Springs group, Ocean Springs, Mississippi.—Reported by MILDRED THOMAS.

VINITA, OKLAHOMA.—On May 14 services were held at the Ozark Reunion Grounds. Elders Arthur Dixon of Miami and Lea Lamons of Vinita baptized nine people: Vernie, Anieta, and Louanna Ellison, Howard, Eunice, and Jerry Clark of Claremore; Joe England of Chelsea, Nora Horn and Orville Lightfoot of Vinita. They were confirmed by Elders Frank Kyser and Dixon of Miami, and Dave Wilson of Fairland.

On May 21 Elders Lea Lamons and Arthur Dixon blessed Ruth Ann Clark and Jerry Mac Ellison.

A six-day Vacation Church School was held in the home of Bert Parkhurst beginning June 5. The achievement program was held in the forenoon of June 11 at the City Hall. As a result of the school, three girls were baptized: Dorothy and Joyce Remington of Inola, Oklahoma, and Margaret Howell of Muskogee. They were baptized June 18 at the Ozark Reunion Grounds by Elders Lamons, Clarence Rook, and Earl Howard of Miami.

The average attendance for the past church school year was thirty-five; the average for the past three months was forty-one. Some people drive from Claremore, a distance of about forty miles, and others drive twenty-six and eighteen miles to services and are regular in attendance.

Meetings are held in the B. & P. W. Club Room in the basement of the City Hall. Cottage prayer services are held on Wednesday evenings. There is need for a series of missionary sermons for none have been held since April, 1949, when the group was organized.—Reported by LELA PARKHURST.

ARNOLDS PARK, IOWA.—On June 18 a group of scattered and isolated church members from northwestern Iowa and southern Minnesota sponsored a family day at Arnold's Park. Meetings were held in the Methodist church building.

Dr. Roy Cheville of Graceland College was guest speaker. At the 11:00 service his subject was "Barriers." Mr. Schoonover from Estherville played two numbers on his cello, and D. S. McNamara sang "The Stranger of Galilee." This was the first time an R.L.D.S. minister had held services in this community. The church was filled to capacity, and there were many nonmembers in the audience. Following a basket dinner in the basement, Dr. Cheville spoke again at 2:30. Mrs. Arvid Peterson of Jackson, Mississippi, sang "I'd Rather Have Jesus." She was accompanied by Sister Ben Fish of Mallard.

The following towns were represented: Mallard, Laurens, Superior, Estherville, Cherokee, Spirit Lake, Armstrong, Iowa; Jackson and Worthington, Minnesota; Independence, Missouri; Lamoni, Iowa, and Ventura, California.

The Auditorium

Since Conference, the architects have been developing plans for the completion of the roof of the Auditorium dome, which will call for the elimination of the present skylight, which elimination is essential because of the high cost involved in completing it on the basis of the original plans. The specifications and plans are now completed and have been submitted for bids. Bids will be received providing for stainless steel, for aluminum, or for copper covering for the dome, and it is anticipated that the work will be let promptly.

In addition to the work on the roof, changes will be made in office arrangements within the building. The local offices are being moved to Bartholomew Hall, just east of the Stone Church. The Quorum of Twelve offices are being moved from the rear of the Auditorium to the space now used by the local office and the library. Other changes involve space for the Radio Department, Church Historian, Assistant to the First Presidency, Department of Religious Education, a council room, and a library; also space for storage and a stock room. Major improvements will be made in the dining room, providing for air-conditioning and lighting.

Plans are being developed for our program for raising additional funds for the Auditorium to commence this fall. It has been our hope that the covering of the dome with metal would be well under way in time for us to start with the fall planning for raising additional funds, but these days of crisis always present problems which affect construction for buildings such as ours. Nevertheless our plans will go forward for raising funds this fall.

In addition to the foregoing a number of houses of worship are in process of construction. Among some of the larger projects are the churches at Lamoni, Iowa; Cameron, Missouri; and Wichita, Kansas. In addition to these there are others under construction, some with plans either just completed or in the process of being completed.

What the future may hold for us in all of these projects remains to be seen, but one cannot help hoping that the present international crisis may be solved short of another major war. We must, however, face the fact that there is the possibility of a shortage of critical materials and labor which would arise out of such an emergency.

Report of General Church Income

We are submitting herewith a comparative statement of income for the first five months of this year as compared with the same period in 1949:

	1949	1950	Gain or Loss
January	$147,928.49	$155,693.65	$ 7,765.16
February	105,070.09	105,508.28	438.19
March	87,931.32	97,444.73	9,513.41
April	83,542.28	99,498.12	15,955.84
May	72,177.66	77,713.41	5,535.75
Total	$496,649.84	$535,858.19	$39,208.35

We feel that the work of the church is moving forward and appreciate very much the continued support of the members, as evidenced by this fine financial report.

Respectfully submitted,
THE PRESIDING BISHOPRIC
G. L. DeLapp

I Want to Teach

By Shirley Mae Mason

ONCE TO EVERY MAN and nation comes the moment to decide upon a particular undertaking. I have been quite as perplexed as any young person attempting to determine what vocation to enter. It was at Grace-land College that I began to find my way, and now I am more confident than ever that I want to teach.

If I were asked the reasons for my choice of vocation, I should say first of all that I want to teach because I am convinced that only in a positive setting forth of truth will the kingdom of God ever become a reality upon the earth. As I look at the life of Christ I am reminded of the mission he extended to his followers: "Go ye into all the world and teach the gospel of the kingdom." Certainly teaching involves far greater responsibilities than those which constitute a public school-teacher's duties. I believe firmly that if one could view the entire field, he would perceive a wonderfully divine and beautiful plan for human brotherhood encompassing the whole world.

I have been more aware of the need of teaching lately than ever before, and not simply because of teaching experiences at the college I now attend. Of course, I see the need for teaching the particular subjects for which I am qualifying myself, but far greater the need for understanding basic principles of human living, to which all other things are subservient. For instance, to know the fundamentals of English usage is good if one understands how and why they are to operate in his life. They are helps and skills in intelligent communication. Such knowledge is not "for ornament." To learn other fundamentals of a given subject is good if one sees the purpose that such knowledge has for mankind.

IT WAS WITH GREAT WISDOM that Paul, seeing some dangers in learning because of pride, admonished: "And with all thy learning, get understanding." How infinitely true and vastly needful is such an attribute, which might even be called a virtue in these days. Who does not sense the lack of understanding among nations attempting to establish peace, and who is not appalled by trends in crime, divorce, wrong living—all devoid of a sound understanding at the base? Sometimes, as I read or hear of men's fears and problems, I become utterly overwhelmed by the enormity of such an undertaking as teaching. Just where should one begin to teach? There are so many phases of this life which need to be corrected that one scarcely knows just where to direct energies and time first. But no man is to do the job alone. God expects nothing more than "a reasonable service" from any of us, but sometimes one feels like doing more than his share because there is so much need.

Sometimes, I'm sure, we all feel that our services are quite inadequate in view of the vast amount of work needed for the establishing of a kingdom-producing environment. Another look at the life of Christ makes us realize that he sees infinitely more need and was able to sense it upon earth, for he told his disciples, "Greater things than these [the deeds he himself had done] shall ye do. Therefore, go." He initiated this workable kingdom-building project—a project which will eventually culminate in a heaven-down-to-earth. But the Great Teacher, who lived and is the Way, with patience waits for men to respond to his teachings. Should we who follow him do less? As long as he does not become discouraged (and he has waited since the beginning of time) there is no need for any of us to become disheartened. Thus believing his confident words, "My work shall not be frustrated," I want to go on with him. I want to teach.

A NEGRESS who lives down the hall from me was telling me about the work she has undertaken to do. She talked very frankly about the problems involving human feelings that she will encounter in her teaching experience. She told me that, because of limited opportunity and deprivation, many Negroes have developed an intense dislike for white people. She stands in a position to see both sides of the problem—is thoroughly aware of ignorance among the Negro and the white groups—but she knows that her work will be more effective among members of her own race. Yet I'm sure she feels as though a heavy weight of unreasoned prejudice from the other side might eventually snuff out her good work on the one.

She related a terrifying experience she had one night. She was walking with her grandmother down a street in Georgia when a sudden burst of angry shouts from a mob caused them to retreat into the shadows and wait to see what was happening. A Negro was being dragged down the street by a group of masked men. His back was badly cut and bleeding profusely. They dared not venture out from their seclusion at this moment, but stood to witness a human being burned by other human beings amid a mixture of shouts from the mob and death-rending cries from the victim. My friend can remember vividly the scene, yet she uses good judgment in not condemning those acting in their ignorance. She too wants to teach.

THIS WOMAN is a challenge to me. She should be to all of us. We cannot in truth be a household of God's children and be divided in purpose—be divided against one another. That is another reason why I want to teach. I want to be a participant in building the greatest society of our nation and world, where "they shall come from the East, West, North, and South, and sit down together in the kingdom of God."

For these reasons then, I wholeheartedly respond to my calling: so that peace may come because men will learn to accept and live truth positively; so that each person feels and fulfills his responsibility—his call to teach according to his own gifts; so that ignorance is utterly defaced and replaced by love and understanding; so that men will begin to enjoy the happiness of "the abundant life"; so that prejudice (a veritable offspring of ignorance) is uprooted and men begin to manipulate intelligently the principles of Christ's gospel of love; and so that the kingdom may come.

Because I realize these things, there flows from my heart this prayer:

Lord, I want to teach. I want to learn from you just how the job is to be done. You have gone before me and shown me the way, but in my own weakness I have lost sight of it—

I have lost sight of you. Will you go before me again so that I may not lose the way to wisdom? With thy help, Good Teacher, I will learn the lesson each day brings and find the truth in all of life's experiences. Be patient with me, Lord, even as I am patient with others, and give me a larger understanding, a greater concern for the welfare of all men. With that understanding may I be able to help others to live more abundantly, and in the abundance of the overflow of truth and love, may thy kingdom come. Master, hear a stumbling follower, and keep me in my firm desire. Amen.

Sidetracked

By Marie Gosline

TOO MANY TIMES we become sidetracked in our great crusade for Christ. Someone does or says something we don't like. Someone fails to offer us praise at the right moment. Sometimes we simply become too absorbed with less important duties to tell the story of Christ to a neighbor. There are so many ways to tell that story, but long before we tell it, we must set our own homes in order.

Have you ever watched a spider weave a web? He looks neither to the right nor to the left. He listens for no word of approval, no word of praise. He makes no detours. He sets his course and lets nothing stop him. This is his job, and he does it painstakingly and well. First he weaves his web, then he is ready for his customers.

One day we were shopping at the Suq in Al Khobar on the Persian Gulf. The shops which lined the one street contained nothing of real value. The objects for sale were piled one on top of the other and were not in any order. The shopkeeper tried to sell us different American-made articles—cheap things—and apparently wondered why we wanted none of them. Finally the guide took us to a shop around the corner on a side street. Here there were beautiful rugs, lovely old brass and copper, and Oriental materials. And here everything was in order. Not only did this merchant have something to sell, but he knew how to display it.

THE PERSON who has the gospel story on the tip of his tongue must not become sidetracked. He must first weave the web. He must set his course and let nothing stop him. He must not only have something to sell, but his display counter must show it off to a good advantage.

As Christians, we must first have something to sell. But that is not the whole battle. We must know how to display it. We must set our course like the spider, and like him let no word cause us to detour. We must set our houses in order like the wise Arabian merchant before we can expect to make a sale. And right now it is important for us to make sales, for in this great shop we always have room for one more customer.

Let Us Witness

which bind us together more firmly. We need to cut out and burn the rank weeds of self-concern, misunderstanding, contention, backbiting, and the quickness to insult and anger which separates us one from another. We must become unified in spirit and purpose, and go forth with an eye single to the glory of God, with a restless passion for the welfare of the souls of all men, if we are to be effective witnesses for Christ.

For these reasons and many others, we have hesitated to do or have been prevented from doing what we ought to do.

Can We Witness Simply by Living the Gospel to OURSELVES?

Perhaps many of us have thought that all we need to do to witness for Christ is to live right and let others see how godly we are. This is not so! It is a false and deceptive rationalization of our failure to witness effectively. This is true: to witness for Christ we must move out among our friends and acquaintances and make a conscious effort to tell men and represent to them the message of Christ and his church. Certainly this is difficult, for both we and they are sometimes reticent. It is often difficult to feel that we are making headway, and we are fearful that our actions may not live up to the profession of our words.

But let us begin, nonetheless. Let us move forward in our branch or group and formulate a program of action which will be wise and consistent. Let us co-ordinate the efforts of all: children, youth, women, priesthood, general church officers, and the great group of common, sincere people who form the church. Let us assume a deep and personal responsibility for those persons to whom we ourselves can best minister. Seeking God in fasting and in prayer, let us launch out to be active witnesses.

Do We Stand Alone?

It is human and entirely legitimate to want to feel that we are not alone in our endeavors. We want to know that someone is behind us, and not very far behind us, either! We want to be assured of the final achievement of the task in which we are engaged. To a certain extent we must proceed in faith. But that faith may be beautifully bulwarked by the experiences of others with God, as recorded in Scripture and as given to us in testimony in our present day. As we move out in witnessing, there shall come to us a growing confirmation of the rightness of what we do and of the power of God which attends it. We are assured that we cannot comprehend the abundance of the things which God will pour out upon those who do his will. We move forward with Nephi's testimony: ". . . for I know that the Lord giveth no commandments unto the children of men, save he shall prepare a way for them that they may accomplish the thing which he commandeth them."—I Nephi 1: 65. If we be witnessing for him, God will be "as a shadow by day and a pillar of fire before us by night." He has counseled us that "the righteous need not fear." Surely we shall not stand alone if we are doing God's will, for with God and our fellow men, we are a vast majority.

Is It Worth While to Witness?

The extent of the concern of many people in any activity is expressed in the question: "What's in it for me?" The majority of the people of the world are engaged in seeking directly their own selfish welfare. By so doing they assure their own destruction, the opposite of what they sought. It is the paradox of the ages that the man who seeks to save his own life shall lose it, while the man who is willing to give his life for another thereby saves his own life! Concern for the welfare of others ranks perhaps as the noblest virtue to which we can attain as humans. It is truly amazing that in such sincere effort for the welfare of others we find the only guarantee of our own welfare.

The Counsel of the Father

Divine revelation in these hastening times brings us this counsel and assurance:

The works, and the designs, and the purposes of God, cannot be frustrated, neither can they come to nought, for God doth not walk in crooked paths; neither doth he vary from that which he hath said; therefore, his paths are straight and his course is one eternal round.—Doctrine and Covenants 2: 1.

. . . if ye have desires to serve God, ye are called to the work, for, behold, the field is white already to harvest, and lo, he that thrusteth in his sickle with his might, the same layeth up in store that he perish not, but bringeth salvation to his soul.—Doctrine and Covenants 4: 1.

. . . many times you have desired of me to know that which would be of the most worth unto you . . . the things which shall be of the most worth unto you, will be to declare repentance unto this people, that you may bring souls unto me, that you may rest with them in the kingdom of my Father.—Doctrine and Covenants 13: 1-3.

In humility and consecration. Let us go forth together with God to WITNESS FOR JESUS THE CHRIST.

DEATHS

Obituaries should be sent in promptly by relatives or friends. They will be printed free as soon as space permits. In fairness to all, the editors reserve the right to cut the message to two hundred words.

WEISER.—Nancy E., was born at Beebe-town, Iowa, on May 2, 1869, and died May 30, 1950, at the Mercy Hospital in Council Bluffs, Iowa, after two months of illness. She was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on December 18, 1887, and was married to Samuel D. Weiser on September 4, 1892. Two of the five children born to them preceded her in death. With the exception of a few years spent in Kansas and Utah, she lived all of her life in the vicinity of Council Bluffs.

She is survived by her husband, Samuel; a daughter, Mrs. Margaret Jensen of Axtell, Utah; two sons, Elwood C. and W. W. Weiser, both of Council Bluffs; nine grandchildren; and eight great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Cutler Chapel in Council Bluffs, Elder V. D. Ruch officiating. Burial was in Walnut Hill Cemetery, Council Bluffs.

KINNE.—Leslie Eugene, was born January 29, 1942, at Council Bluffs, Iowa, and died unexpectedly at the Jennie Edmunsden Hospital in Council Bluffs on May 26, 1950. He had been attending a prebaptismal class at the Reorganized Church with the intention of being baptized on Children's Day.

He is survived by his parents; Mr. and Mrs. Cecil A. Kinne; a brother, Robert Kinne; and a sister, Jacqueline Louise Kinne, all of Council Bluffs. Services were held at Woodring's Funeral Home in Council Bluffs, Elder V. D. Ruch officiating. Interment was in the Walnut Hill Cemetery, Council Bluffs.

LAND.—Naomi, daughter of Uriah Dodge and Priny Elizabeth Peters, was born January 17, 1872, in Chatham Township, Ontario, and died May 28, 1950, at her home in Elmstead, Ontario. She was married to John Land on Christmas Day, 1887. Her husband and seven of the twelve children born to them preceded her in death. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church for over sixty-five years and was a charter member of the Detroit, Michigan, Branch. She also helped to organize the congregation in Windsor, Ontario. From 1923 until her death she lived in Elmstead and attended church at Essex.

Surviving are four sons: Harry of Windsor, George, Donald, and Ellwood of Elmstead; and a daughter, Mrs. Olive Hall of Windsor. Funeral services were conducted at the Baptist Church in Puce, Ontario, by Elders James Pycock and Gordon Brown, assisted by the Reverend A. Crosby, pastor of the Baptist Church. Interment was in the Puce cemetery.

1950 YOUTH CAMPS

The Department of Religious Education calls special attention to the two new camps, the one at Bandera, Texas, near San Antonio, and the other at Racine, Missouri, near Joplin, and encourages the young people of these districts to attend the respective camps.

Other camps are in various stages of planning. The Department will forward to the proper persons, inquiries for information on these camps.

 CHURCH STATISTICS

The "Christian Herald" for July brings its annual report on religious membership statistics in the United States. Here are a few interesting items: Roman Catholics have about 33 per cent of church members, now total 26,718,343, showing a gain of 642,646 in the last year, or a gain of 2 per cent. Total Christian membership in the U. S. goes slowly upward, now numbering 81,862,328, or 54 per cent of the total population. In 1880 the percentage of the total population was only 19.9. Among Protestants, four leading Baptist groups number 15,324,352. Methodists in one organization follow them with 8,792,569. The Presbyterian and Protestant Episcopal churches have above two million each; and the following range under the two million mark: United Lutheran, Disciples of Christ, Lutheran (Missouri Synod), Congregational Christian, and African Methodist Episcopal.

 IF

If you want to do something, try to make home a little corner of heaven for those who love you.

If you can't do that, what good is it for you to try to build Zion?

 TEMPER

A temper is the only thing you have that stays right with you when you lose it.

The friendly taxi driver opened the cab door, and when I looked up he was smiling. "Nice rain," he said. He knew that rain was making business for him.

As we went up the street, he said, "The lady I hauled a few minutes ago was upset and just a little mad. Doesn't like rain. She's gonta be madder still when she finds out she left her lunch in my cab."

A little later: "I used to let everything get under my skin. I blew my top whenever things went wrong. For years I went from one job to another, getting mad. Then I found out it was a mistake. Now I try to take everything with a smile. I have a boy growing up to be just like me. I'm trying to teach him not to let his temper get him like it got me."

 PANGS OF AUTHORSHIP

1. You put a clean paper in the typewriter.
2. You write on it.
3. Then you erase it.
4. You write it again.
5. You tear it out and throw it away.
6. Back to No. 1.

TAKING THE COUNT

After the holiday week end, we took a count of our friends to see who had survived the slaughter on the highways. More than seven hundred people in the nation started out for a ride, a swim, or a picnic, not knowing that the end of the trip would find them in heaven, or whatever other place divine judgment might assign to them. . . . Looking at the drivers who race in crowded traffic, who pass cars near the top of a hill, who take desperate chances to save a moment of time, risking the lives of the innocent as well as their own . . . one wonders how we can take life so carelessly, even when there are many of us.

The Hymnal for Youth

(Herald Edition)

"The Hymnal for Youth" (Herald Edition) which we are now introducing includes many hymns that are already well known among us. There are also a large number of hymns that have found acceptance elsewhere which ought to become better known among the Saints. And we are glad to say that there are more than a few (written by our own people) that have never been published before, but which we believe will be welcomed and loved. . . .

"We were happy to be able to make an arrangement with The Westminster Press that permitted us to include herein many of the hymns already issued in their 'Hymnal for Youth,' and to add thereto hymns of our own choosing." Quoted from The Preface by Israel A. Smith and F. Henry Edwards.

The new Hymnal includes the following sections: "When We Worship," "Orders of Worship," "Responsive Readings," and almost 400 hymns.

These hymns and materials have been selected by Franklyn S. Weddle, Director of Music for the General Church, and his associates, Dr. Roy A. Cheville, Anne Morgan, Aleta Runkle, and Chris B. Hartshorn.

Church Attendance

A MOST SERIOUS LOSS in church effectiveness and in potential gains occurs through the nonattendance of our own members. Of those enrolled, about 60 per cent do not attend church on any given Sunday, and 35 per cent do not attend church at all. This means ineffectiveness in every field of church endeavor. We have lost thousands of potential converts through the failure of local priesthood to accept responsibility for nonattending members in the period soon after these Saints ceased attending. Many of these were good people who lost interest for specific reasons, and our ministry can be significantly improved by personalized attention at these points.

Converts who are not actively engaged in some phase of church endeavor within two or three years after their baptism, and who therefore lack a sense of dignity and importance in the group life, are in a precarious position. It is significant that a higher percentage of ordained men are active than of the membership. Members of the priesthood have definite responsibilities.

Introducing...

CHARLES R. HIELD (page 5), introduced August 29, 1949.

C. GEORGE MESLEY (page 7), introduced November 7, 1949.

JOSEPH E. MARTIN, Independence, Missouri (page 8), was born in London, Ontario, Canada, August 19, 1888, where he was baptized in 1897 and finished his grade school education. Brother Martin has been a student all his life and completed his education in night classes and home study. In 1911 he married Myrtle Irene Henderson of Winnipeg, Canada. To them were born four sons: Lawrence E., Howard L., Wray S., and J. Lloyd; and one daughter, Mrs. Laverna Wiggins. After the death of his companion, he married Opal Olive Hill on August 28, 1942.

Brother Martin is a structural and ornamental iron worker. One of his first jobs was to help build a bridge across the Thames River in 1907, very close to the spot where the light came down when Brother Cornish was baptizing some early members. He was ordained a priest in 1924 and an elder in 1926. He served as pastor of East Independence for five years, and associate pastor of Enoch Hill for several years.

LLOYD L. HADLEY, River Forest, Illinois (page 10), was born at Evansville, Wisconsin, on February 20, 1887, and was baptized in Brooklyn, Wisconsin, at the age of eight by Eli Wildermuth. He was graduated from the Beloit, Wisconsin, high school and finished two years of college work. For many years he was court reporter for the State of Wisconsin. Then he became assistant state probation officer, in which capacity he served the state for eight years. Following this he was employed by the Crane Company of Chicago for twenty-five years until his retirement. Here he rose to the position of assistant to the president and secretary of the board of directors.

In 1939 he married Lillian R. Nelson. Both of them have been active in church work; both lecture, and are interested in developing flannelgraph materials for church work.

Brother Hadley was ordained a priest in 1916 and an elder in 1939. He served the Northeastern Illinois District as president for several years.

ROSE-MARY BAKER ESSEX, Kansas City, Missouri (page 12), was born in Horton, Kansas, in 1920. She was graduated from the Horton High School in 1938 and attended business college in St. Joseph, Missouri. She has worked as retail clerk, waitress, cashier, bookkeeper, and secretary. In 1940 she married Albert A. Essex. To them were born three daughters and one son: Susan Kay, nine; Sylvia Jean, eight; Diane Marie, five; and James Arthur, one.

Her hobbies are leather tooling, Indian beadwork, tile craft, and shellwork. She is interested in writing and archaeology.

News & Notes

CHURCH DEDICATION

Apostles Reed M. Holmes and Daniel T. Williams attended the Canton, Oklahoma, church dedication held July 9. The previous church building was destroyed by a tornado in 1949. The main auditorium of the building was lifted completely off the foundation. The new building, a white stucco on tile, was built by the Saints on the old foundation. The natural wood pews were made by members of the congregation. The cost of the entire project was a little more than $2,000. The Red Cross relief fund gave $500 for the construction of the new building. The pastor who led the Saints in the endeavor is Elder Ray Diamond.

RADIO MINISTER

By summer's end, Elder Arthur Rock will have completed his studies and be able to start his work as radio minister. Sister Rock and the two children have already established their home in Independence.

THE AUDITORIUM

The contract has been let for completing the work on the dome of the Auditorium. The stone facing on the wall of the dome has been completed. It is estimated that it will take from six months to a year to put the copper roofing on the dome. After it is completed, work will be started on the front and foyer of the building. The front will be done in Bedford limestone facing.

CAMPUS SPEAKER

Seventy Russell F. Ralston spoke on "The Holy Spirit in the Restoration" on July 9 at the Sunday evening church service. Because of the rainy weather the meeting was held in the Stone Church. Sanford Downs, pastor of the Enoch Hill Church, and Roy Thurtchley, member of the stake high council, offered the prayers. Donald V. Lents, chaplain of the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital, presided, and Clayton J. Wolfe led the song service. Musical numbers were furnished by the Clematis Chorus.

MOVED

All church school classes that held meetings in Bartholomew Hall have moved to quarters in the recently acquired Kansas Street Church. Elder Evan Fry, teacher of the Y.K.T. class, reports that the move has made it possible for his class to double in size.

ADVANCEMENT

During the month of June of 1950, there were 715 persons baptized in the general church. This was second to the highest record for the month of June, the highest being 729 in June, 1929.

IMPROVING

Elder Dan Sorden, radio minister, and Elder C. I. Carpenter of the Auditorium, are both improving in health. Brother Sorden is able to drive his car and to visit his friends. Brother Carpenter has recovered sufficiently to be returned to his home.

"The Restoration Story"

To Be Used in Reunions and Branches

THE CHURCH is concerned with strengthening the movement of witnessing for Jesus Christ. The personal testimony given in face to face contact with a nonmember friend has always been the fundamental means of extending the gospel. Many, however, have felt handicapped in giving their personal testimony. They have needed a simple tool to implement their desire to tell the story. For several years turn-over illustrations have been used successfully in various quarters of the church. To some of the brethren it seemed desirable to extend their usefulness by refining the message and pictorial content and making them available at low cost for use in a loose-leaf binder.

For more than a year a committee of the Council of Twelve has devoted its prayers and energies to the production of such material for use by our priesthood and others at the grass roots of our church endeavor. "The Restoration Story" is the first tangible evidence of these labors. It is the first of a series of visualized sets to be made available for use in the local areas. "The Restoration Story" gives the historical background to the coming forth of the Restoration Movement. Its primary emphasis is upon the ministry and message of Jesus Christ. It brings, in pictorial form, the realization of the harmony between the church in early apostolic times and the church as we know it in these latter days. Its approach is affirmative. Its authors have sought to stress fundamentals.

The primary function of "The Restoration Story" and succeeding visualized materials is to help you tell the story to your friends. The words of introduction in "The Restoration Story" point the way toward the effective use of this material in personal evangelism.

We are impressed by the other uses which may be made of these materials. They can be an effective aid in priesthood visiting. A member of the priesthood has in "The Restoration Story" a tool which focuses attention on the purpose of his call and which gives him an opportunity to teach our membership the essential elements of our church. This will be particularly valuable for visits among inactive and isolated Saints. Parents will find these pictorial materials helpful in teaching their children about the church. Other adaptations of the material may be made to supplement church school instruction and to assist in leadership training of priesthood, church school workers, etc. Classes organized for new members may use "The Restoration Story" to good advantage.

This visual aid to personal evangelism is a mutual product of the Council of Twelve and carries with it the approval of the Joint Council. It is designed to help you tell the story. There are some who, like many appointees, will already have evolved their particular method of telling the story. They may or may not decide to use these visual materials as an aid. Others, inexperienced in telling their friends of the Restoration, will welcome a tool for their use. "The Restoration Story" is prepared especially for these. It is an instrument of personal evangelism. We hope you will master the story so that you may tell it in your own words without referring to the text, simply using the pictures as a focal point for your friends and as a reminder to you of the testimony you wish to bear. It is your testimony which is important, and it is the Holy Spirit and not the pictures which will win your friend to Christ.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
By W. Wallace Smith

A Cottage Missionary Meeting

COTTAGE MISSIONARY MEETINGS have been a feature of the life of our congregation for some years now. Young men with splendid records in local missionary work have gone under general church appointment, and we are developing others. Their efforts have contributed a considerable number of new members to our congregation, and our people are proud and happy to give them all the support possible.

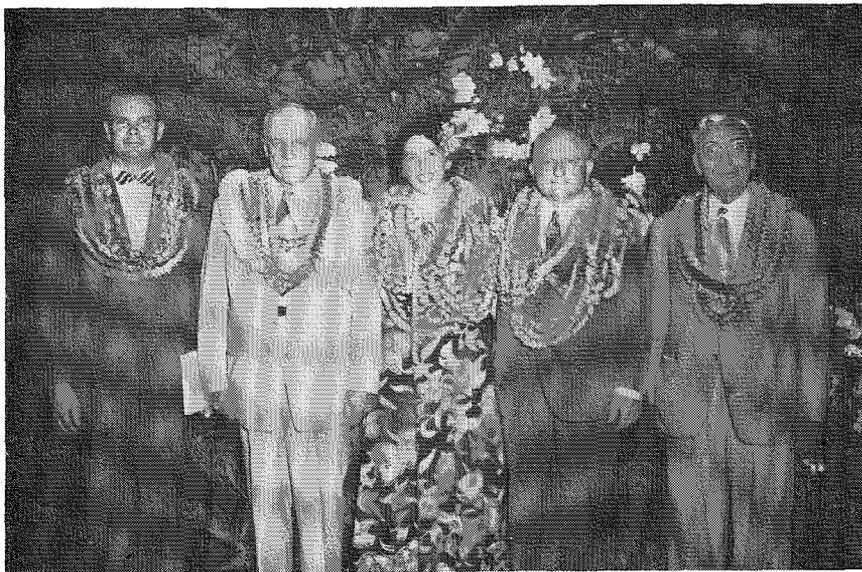

Quite recently a very good series was concluded by a young man who has had considerable success in this work. A visiting appointee, he was putting the finishing touches on the faithful work of some of our local volunteers. The meeting place was the comfortable and attractive basement recreation room of one of our member families. The lectures were based on slides used with a good projector. Our local missionary operated the machine, and the visiting missionary gave the lectures. Afterwards, there was a period for questions which was very interesting.

We were especially pleased by the number and the quality of the people who were interested in these meetings and attending them. Some have already obtained university degrees and are engaged in professional and technical work. Some are working on their degrees. Their questions were thoughtful, and showed keen interest and good understanding of the message that had been presented.

We have been baptizing many children at our church, but we are also glad that there have been quite a number of adult converts. It is good to know that we are still growing, and still spreading the gospel story.

ON JUNE 14, President Israel A. Smith left Independence on a trip planned to take in faraway places. On June 17 and 18 he presided at the conference of the churches comprising the metropolitan area of Los Angeles and assisted in the organization of the new Los Angeles Stake.

On June 19, Bishop Mark H. Siegfried of Independence flew to Los Angeles to join President Smith. The two brethren took plane for Honolulu on the evening of June 20, arriving on the morning of June 21. A cable received from them read as follows: "Received a grand Aloha on arrival in Hawaii this morning. Smith and Siegfried." The Saints had met them, and in true Hawaiian fashion had decked them with flower leis, fluffy carnation and colorful plumeria being prominent. The two brethren found themselves with armfuls of leis besides the traditional string after string placed upon their shoulders.

President Smith and his traveling companion were treated to another taste of Hawaiian hospitality at the luau, or feast, held in their honor the first Saturday after their arrival. Bishop Siegfried in commenting upon the occasion said: "We ate no lunch, so we were ready for the luau of roast pig, yams, and everything these good people could get together for a real feast."

The following day, Sunday, June 25, the Hawaiian District conference opened with an 8:30 prayer service. On that day Howard F. Miller was ordained to the office of bishop, in preparation for his future work in Kansas City Stake; Charles Lee to the office of evangelist; and Prescott Foo to the office of high priest. These ordinations were all in consonance with the action of the recent General Conference. Some ordinations as a result of local action were also cared for, and High Priest A. Orlin Crownover, who arrived recently from church headquarters, was elected the new district president.

On this same Sunday, two days before the anniversary of the death of the Martyrs, at the dedication of the site for the Gilbert J. Waller Memorial Chapel, President Smith paid tribute to the memory of his famed grandfather. He outlined his ancestor's life, declaring that Joseph Smith was a prophet, a fearless defender of the truth, and a martyr to the cause of righteousness. Mayor John E. Wilson and Mrs. Wilson attended this meeting, the mayor speaking briefly in memory of Brother G. J. Waller.

Noting an erroneous statement in regard to the lineage of Joseph Smith in the June 24 issue of the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, President Israel A. Smith was able to furnish a letter of correction, which was published in the paper of June 27. We quote his letter:

Joseph Smith, the L. D. S.,
The Reorganized L. D. S.
Editor The Star-Bulletin:

The writer is a visitor in your fine and interesting city, and is loathe to take exception to what appears in your columns; but in the interest of keeping the record straight, I deem it necessary to call your attention to a wrong statement in your issue of the 24th instant.

In your article about Samuel E. Woolley on page 21, column 5, reference is made to "Prof. Joseph E. Smith of the University of Hawaii, a lineal descendant of the church's founder," etc.

Assuming the word "founder" refers to Joseph Smith the Prophet, please be advised that the professor is not a lineal descendant of Joseph Smith, the founder of the Latter Day Saint movement.

I am a son of Joseph Smith (1832-1914) who was the eldest son of the founder, and am fully advised as to who were and who are the founder's descendants, and none of them have ever been identified with the Utah Latter Day Saints called (and calling themselves) Mormons.

From my acquaintance with Mormon officials, it is my opinion that the good professor is a son of Apostle Joseph Fielding Smith of Salt Lake City, who is the son of a man by the same name, their late President Smith (1838-1917), who was the son of Hyrum Smith (1800-1844), a brother of the founder, Joseph Smith, and who with him was killed by a mob on June 27, 1844, at Carthage, Ill.

Faith in God's Program

By CHARLES R. HIELD

"And Jesus answering, saith unto them, Have faith in God."—Mark 11: 22.

PERHAPS OUR OUTSTANDING NEED today is faith in a great world program of brotherhood and peace. Such a program is the heart of the teaching of the Christ.

Too often we have thought of faith as something to believe. It was an opinion about God—a mental exercise that brought to man rich gifts in business success, comfort in sorrow, and direction when in doubt. Religion may bring some of these values, but we lose the true meaning of faith if we think only of ourselves on the receiving end of God's program.

Real faith discusses and acts upon things to be accomplished, not merely things to believe. Faith in God is venturing; confident that the Lord's plan for society is the one which will solve the problems of the world. We are aware of this type of venturesomeness on the part of the Pilgrim Fathers and the early colonists who had faith in democracy and fought for it at Valley Forge.

Faith is an inward assurance that what has not been attained, can be attained through hard work. Faith is the power to believe and work in the face of an unaccomplished fact. Religious faith functions as does faith in our physical universe. The greatest achievements of men were once outside human experience. We have only to think of our railroads, telephones, radio, Diesel engines, to know that science is a tremendous believer; it refuses to set limits.

The saints of the first century had this life-filling faith. It was not merely a mental assent to a belief that there was a God. They accepted a despised religion; they faced contempt; they risked violence and death. Yet those early day saints were so confident that the social program of the Christ was the only one that would bring peace and harmony that their example changed the life of the world. To them it was not merely a theory to think about. It filled every endeavor of their lives and brought to them a power and a thrust of the will that has seldom been equaled.

FAITH is closer to courage than it is to intellectual assent. Faith is not blind credulity. It is the Great Discoverer, the Great Prover of Truth. When one finds truth, it is always the teachings of the Christ.

Religious faith is not unlike the faith of the successful inventor. It is a threefold faith. First, it is faith in the unchangeability of God's law concerning nature—gravity, fire, air, water, heat, etc. Having this faith, man builds with confidence refrigerators, radios, aeroplanes, and puts plumbing in his home. He is sure that these laws will function tomorrow, next year, and even hundreds of years from now. Second, it is faith in the inexhaustible power of the Universe. There is yet much to learn, much to discover. With this faith man finds how to quick-freeze his food, use electronics, develop plastics, grow colored cotton, etc. Third, it is faith that as we co-operate and bring ourselves in harmony with the laws of nature, which are the laws of God, these laws will respond and become our allies; automobiles carry us about, and television brings us the picture of world events.

The conventional observance of faith is often but a formality. The statement, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved," (Acts 11: 35) has caused many to live in a land of make-believe. The passage is true if we realize we cannot have the Christ, without his program. Salvation, is the building of a righteous society to the place where character has been developed which will insure peace, security, brotherhood, and the sacredness of personality. Nowhere is man granted such great rewards without soul-stirring effort. The fanciful dreams and hopes of Christians may in no small measure be to blame for our wars. Too many have had faith in creeds and have been lulled into indifference and repose. God is not a cosmic utility upon which we can draw for selfish gain. Faith is not reading the Bible like an ancient bill-of-fare. It is a life-activating-conviction that a planned, God-controlled universal brotherhood can be built. The tragedy of our age is that so many follow the Christ "afar off."

CHRIST SAYS that if men will learn and obey his laws they can develop a vigorous, yet peaceful, society. They will have power to carve out a world community, free from the errors which today cause so many fears.

We had faith that we could win the last war. We summoned all our strength, and with a united will acquired the courage and resolve to fight our way through to victory. Real religious faith has the same basic convictions. Men will not fight against odds unless they have a vigorous faith. He who believes acquires strength. He who doubts is weak. People with a righteous, venturesome faith in the rightness of Christ's program are happy, healthy people.

A faith like Christ had is not wishful thinking. It faces facts. It does not say the world is lovely when it is not. It says that there are means of accomplishing universal brotherhood that reason has not yet found. Such a faith brings an assurance that there is further good, beyond what we know today. Such a faith is a pathway to truth, it quickens the mind, kindles the emotions of love, courage, and perseverance. It nerves the will; summons the whole man to an adventure; and gives him the power to attack. People without this great faith in a God-controlled universe are full of fears. They are subject to moods of self-pity and anxiety. They lose confidence in themselves, in others, and in their Creator. They develop a sense of being shut up, as in a box. They feel powerless to change themselves or their society. They are easy prey for unscrupulous and selfish dictators. Life has no meaning for them. They are full of misgivings, apathy, and pessimism.

Christ is our perfect example of a man with a great faith. He was so sure that his Father's way was the right way, that it consumed his every energy. He forgot his hunger while at the well in Samaria, he fell asleep in the boat crossing the Sea of Galilee, he collapsed under the weight of the cross on the way to Golgotha. Every thought and action showed his confidence in the ultimate conquest of sin. Even death did not lessen his convictions.

IT IS TOO BAD that the divine will has to wait upon our lagging and unresponsive faith. Good intentions are not enough. People responsible for the most damnable deeds in history, and in our society today, often claim the alibi of good intentions.

He who has an inspired faith need not whip himself into activity. He has a great goal outside himself. With all his soul he wants to serve mankind. He works with an all-consuming passion, forgetful of time, in order to become an artist, a surgeon, an Edison, a Mahatma Gandhi, a Sweitzer, or a Kagawa. He does not ask double pay for overtime. A person with this great faith will endure hardships, suffering, and even persecution to assist in building this God-controlled society.

Before any great movement for liberation and human good is undertaken the questions must always be asked: "How many people can be found who will have faith enough to believe in this Cause and its triumph to venture their lives in a great attempt to bring it to pass?" To the great religious faith of the Christ, the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints calls its people and invites the world to join with them in this greatest of adventures—the building of God's will into our daily lives. Well may we all ask ourselves, "What visible evidence of faith in God's program are we showing?"

An Ancient "First-Aider"

JESUS NAMED HIM the Good Samaritan. If the episode had been real, the compliment of Jesus would have been a greater honor than being knighted by a modern monarch.

The good Samaritan was void of racial prejudice and national bigotry. When he saw the wounded, helpless man, he did not ask about his national or religious connections. Here was a human being in need of help, and he rendered first aid.

The good Samaritan was kind and the expression of his kindness was spontaneous. When he saw the half-dead man he did not have to debate the issue; he did not ask himself if he had time to administer to his need, but acted immediately. He had a means of transportation and money. After doing what he could to ease the pain of the wounded man, he took him to an inn and made fiscal arrangements so that the man could be cared for until he was restored to health.

The good Samaritan was a normal man. He did not look at the wounded one in the ditch, feel full of pity and then pass on. His concern did not stop with recognition of the beaten man's need, but led him to do something about it. So the circuit was complete. His reaction was normal, intelligent, effectual.

Were he living today he would have expressed the same principles, but his technique would have been difficult.

BUT THERE IS ANOTHER ASPECT to the philosophy of such things. Modern factory supervisors are not satisfied with first aid treatment; they have a preventive program. They get to the root of the matter. There is also a philosophy of prophylaxis in a social and religious setting as well as in an industrial setting.

In a lecture the late Dr. Anna Howard Shaw said that in her desire to serve humanity, she made preparation even to securing an M.D. degree. But as she considered her service, she said she felt she was at the bottom of the precipice ministering to the fragments of humanity that fell over and that she should be in a better position to prevent the fall. So she launched out on a career, one goal of which was to enfranchise women. But she was intelligent enough to know that legislation was limited to its power to improve human nature. A larger and deeper program is needed.

How beautiful the gospel is. It redeems the person, purifies him, and puts him on the road of life. Social conditions need to be improved. Riches belong to those who make them—those who compose the community. The surplus should be gathered into the storehouse like the corn that was gathered in Egypt under the direction of Joseph during the years of plenty. When the famine came there was corn in Egypt. The church should also gather in the surplus so that if another depression comes there will be wealth in the church.

The prophylaxis of Christ will save man physically, morally, mentally, and spiritually. It will also save him in his complicated social relations. Zion is an organization of good Samaritans, skilled not only in therapeutics but also in prophylaxis.

—JAMES E. BISHOP

I Saw a Thousand People Dying

NOT the quick death from a sudden contagion, but the long lingering death of neglect and spiritual starvation was theirs.

I didn't see them from a secure desk a thousand miles away. I saw them in their good homes, in their struggling branches, and in their life resurgent endeavors at reunions. I heard the troubled pleas of parents for their youth, and saw the pitiful eagerness with which they seized the crumbs of leadership I was able to offer. I saw them protectively clutch their children to themselves, and I went down into the oozy waters of a pond to baptize their little ones. Frail grandmothers of solid pioneer stock who had weathered a hundred crises without a tear wept when they pleaded with me for their children's children who had married Gentiles and were indifferent to the work.

The tragic newspaper stories of ten thousand in China dying the slow death of famine stirred me to a surface pity, but the slow death of a thousand, whose lives I had so touched, stabbed my compassion into action.

I saw a thousand people dying.

THEY were nearer than some of my own flesh and blood. We had a common Father and a tender-hearted Elder Brother. These were my brothers and sisters, and their deep needs were not separate from mine. Love moved towards them with eager hands to help. Action was merited, for theirs was not the complacent waiting for the end as those who do not care, or those who had lived a full life. These brothers of mine had been denied opportunities for the full life. Over the years they had given of their means that others in need of leadership might live. They had waited patiently until their church leaders could say, "Now we can help you." Little resignation was evident and what indifference was there was the fruit of the years of regrettable though necessary neglect. Now those years could be ended and new life again begin to flow into hearts and minds so long denied it. They who had struggled to baptize their own and to witness of the gospel restored could now have an infusion of men to give leadership to their endeavors.

I saw a thousand people dying.

STATISTICS which had been cold figures in a survey leaped into life to produce action. My older brothers before me had seen a thousand people dying. They had agonized over the struggles of weak branches to survive, and had moved with all the power of their calling and passion of their convictions to secure the needed transfusion of life through adequate leadership. I, with them, could now measure the growth of these thousand people in Eastern Michigan, Northern Indiana, Western Missouri, New York, Southern California, Nauvoo, and other areas. We could see them beginning to rebuild the waste places of the years of inadequacy. Young people were responding to the opportunities that inspiring leadership brought. Through the maze of figures, the red blood of their baptismal record could be traced. In ratio to the number of people and investment of man power, these places were revealing marked upward trends.

With the eyes of others of my brethren upon me, I faced the struggle between the call to serve the nebulous souls of those not yet won in regions that on paper were fruitful, and the challenge of these souls that had become a part of me. My thousand won my action because they were both fruitful and already a part of me.

The balance that was out of balance called for an equalizing adjustment. The time was at hand. The funds were available. New leaders were coming forward to be appointed. It mattered not whether my thousand were in Arkansas, Montana, Texas, Idaho, Sault Ste. Marie, or New York. They now were my responsibility, and being a part of them, I had to give to them as the Elder Brother would have given. I moved to give them leadership.

I saw a thousand people dying.

I SAW their lovely cities, once the pioneer towns of ranchers, lumbermen, and miners, but now the flourishing metropolitan areas of culture and progress. Their good universities and colleges enrolled students from every state. Great areas of their country were alive with progress. Huge dams were being built; new cities established. The agriculture of the old era was giving place to the new, and trained church people were among those leaders. Here was splendid opportunity among the second and third generation of sturdy pioneers. What had come out of Champion, Nebraska, could come out of Deer Lodge, Montana; Hagerman, Idaho; Birsey, Saskatchewan; or Carraway, Arkansas. With a leader to inspire this same potential that was already moving upward, they could have their development accelerated.

People like these could make a fresh contribution to the cause of Zion. New ideas, new energy, new ideals could be infused into the cause that needed them and of which they are a part.

Looking to the future, I moved in the present to send them help that would inspire their youth to further training, comfort those valiant ones grown old in the cause, and give to their children new possibilities. The honest in heart more readily could be won to the cause and the harvest would come where much of the patient sowing had been done.

I saw a thousand people dying.

THE Father saw the thousand dying and had ready his law, his plan for all who will to help.

"It is required of the Lord at the hand of every steward, to render an account of his stewardship."

"Every man shall be made accountable unto me—"

Those who are "governed by law are also preserved by law and perfected and sanctified by the same."

The Father's law was very clear and just. Every man was called to be a steward accountable to God. It mattered not whether over little or much.

The Son also saw the needs of the thousand and commissioned leaders saying: "Go ye . . ." The people "shall feed you and cloth you and give you money," and to the givers he said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto them . . . ye have done it unto me."

I might make the move to send them men, but only the people of God could give these men continuous sustenance for their work.

Some there be who would quibble with God about his law, but face to face with all God's blessings, a thankful man does not quibble. He does not say, "How little must I do or pay?" Gladly he asks, "How much can I help?" Thus he moves to keep the law and helps a thousand dying people.

I saw a thousand people dying.

Stirred as I had never been stirred before, I moved to bring them help. A thousand, thousand others, too, are dying. Are you willing to make possible the sending of help to them?

"Inasmuch as ye do . . . ye have done it unto me," says Christ.

"Zion the Beautiful Beckons Us On"

By J. E. MARTIN

WHAT is Zion? We find in Doctrine and Covenants 36:2 that "the Lord called his people Zion, because they were of one heart and one mind, and dwelt in righteousness." We would gather from this reading that God's people shall be called Zion when they have developed a quality of righteousness—a certain standard of perfection.

We are concerned about how these conditions were obtained. We read in Matthew 7:23, ". . . strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." I fully believe that when Jesus made this statement he was thinking of that more abundant life he came to give, and, if we are to enjoy this, which in reality is a Zion life, we will have to follow the "narrow way" to the end or until Zion becomes a reality.

During the past ten years my work has taken me to a number of large manufacturing and industrial plants. One industry that is particularly interesting to me is the production of aluminum. I have had the privilege of seeing yellow clay taken from Arkansas and processed into aluminum. This clay has to be washed, baked, and crushed. During processing it becomes what appears to be white sand. Then it goes to the reduction plant. Here it is put into a large melting pot, and in thirty-two hours it is siphoned out as pure aluminum.

The actual process of producing aluminum is simple but the steps in processing it must be followed carefully.

It is a costly process involving the production of electricity, the building of carbons, the making of various tools and equipment. It is an enormous task, but the actual processing, I repeat, is quite simple when each step is executed as it should be.

So it is with us. If we ever hope to become the children of God, we must follow the law that has been given which will cleanse, purify, mold, and shape us into the children of God.

AS we examine ourselves today, we know that we are not enjoying this more abundant life, so let us search the Scriptures and learn what is written there. Paul says, "I have shown unto you a more excellent way." We have often heard the song, "God's way is the right way; God's way is the best way," so we want to try to learn more about this way which assures us abundant life. In Doctrine and Covenants 83:3 we find these words, ". . . in the ordinances thereof"—that is the ordinances of the church of Christ—"the power of godliness is manifest; and without the ordinances thereof, and the authority of the priesthood, the power of godliness is not manifest unto men in the flesh." Without these we have no promise; and unless they function according to the divine plan, it would be impossible for anyone to "see the face of God, even the Father, and live."

In Section 104:10 we find that the Aaronic priesthood holds the keys of the ministering of angels, as well as the right to administer in the outward ordinances in the letter of the gospel. In paragraph nine of this same section we are told that the Melchisedec priesthood holds the keys of all the spiritual blessings of the church and has the privilege of receiving of the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven and enjoying the communion and presence of God the Father and Jesus Christ the Mediator of the new covenant. According to these statements, we can plainly see that God has made all the provision necessary for the growth and development of his people that they may enjoy this high quality of life and make Zion a reality. Paul also presents this thought to us in Hebrews 7:11, wherein he says that if perfection were possible by the Levitical priesthood (under which the law was received), there would be no further need for another priest to arise after the order of Melchisedec and be called after the order of Aaron.

I BELIEVE we are speaking in harmony with what Paul had in mind when we say he was conscious that the ministry of both of these priesthoods was necessary for the growth and development of the people. Let us consult the fourth chapter of Ephesians: First, let us take into consideration the fact that Paul is not writing to the world but to the Ephesian saints. He is writing to people who have already been taught the message of Jesus Christ, and is trying to bring to their attention just how the priesthood should function among them. Paul says, "He gave some, apostles; and some prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers." If we were to put these thoughts into the language of today, we would say that God placed the priesthood in the church for a specific purpose. Paul in this Scripture was trying to show the Ephesians a more excellent way.

Then he goes on to say that the purpose of this way is for the perfecting of the saints. This is what we are interested in. The work of the ministry is for the edifying of the body of Christ. I believe Paul was saying that the work of the ministry is for the perfecting of the saints and the edifying of the body of Christ, and that they (members of the church) should continue in this work until, in the unity of the faith, "all come to a knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ"—or until they enjoy this more abundant life.

He says further that the work of the ministry is to teach the people the word of the Lord, and that if any should rise up teaching false doctrines (priestcraft) or seek to deceive the people, they would not be tossed about with every wind of doctrine as we find some are today.

If we of the ministry see some of our people being led away by false doctrine, it may be that we are responsible because we have failed to teach them the true doctrine of Christ and they have not been prepared to meet these conditions. Perhaps we should examine ourselves and see if we are about our Father's business before more are led astray, even as Paul says, "by speaking the truth in love that we all may grow up unto him in all things which is the head even Christ."

MY explanation of this next verse may be a little crude, yet I have given it much consideration. First, let me present this thought: The church is called the body of Christ, and in this way the church is like a human body. Our bodies are governed by five senses: seeing, feeling, hearing, tasting, and smelling. If any one of these are injured or cease to function, the whole body suffers. Likewise the body of Christ, the church, is governed by five degrees of priesthood: the high priest, the elder, the priest, the teacher, and the deacon. If any one of these fails to minister to the membership, then the whole body of the church suffers. Doubtless this is what Paul had in mind when he said, "From whom the whole body fitly joined together [this would include the complete organization of the church—the priesthood and the ordinances] and compacted by that which every joint supplieth."—Ephesians 4:16. What are the "joints" that supply the strength of the church? The various degrees of the priesthood, each with its specific ministry. When the church receives what each of these members should give to it, it becomes a compact whole according to the effectual workings in the measure of every part.

How is this priesthood to function and make this possible? We find that when the whole body is fitly framed together it ". . . groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord, in whom ye [or we] also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit."—Ephesians 2:21, 22.

We do not want to do an injustice to this. The most important thing in the erection of a building is a sure foundation. Likewise if we are going to build a tabernacle to God in and through which his Holy Spirit shall have right of way, we must do it in harmony with his plan. Remember that I am talking about going on to perfection. Paul presents the thought that perfection can come only after repentance, baptism, and the laying on of hands (Hebrews 6:1, 2). So we are thinking of the work of the standing ministry to the membership of the church. The work of the Aaronic priesthood is to build the foundation for the kingdom of God. The work of the missionary arm of the church is to go out, select, and gather materials from which the kingdom of God shall be built. The work of the standing ministry is to take these materials and shape them (or teach and minister to them) that they may grow into a living structure, a holy temple in which the Spirit of God can dwell.

LET us analyze briefly the work of the Aaronic priesthood.

The work of the priest: (Section 17:10.) As a standing minister, the priest is to visit the members in their homes and exhort them to pray vocally and in secret and to attend to all family duties. Is not this foundation work? Is not the home the foundation of Zion? The people, the church, the body of Christ can rise no higher than the homes from which the people come. Therefore it is the priest's duty to teach people and help them set their homes in order—God's order. He should teach them the purpose, power, and beauty of prayer so that they may find favor and light and direction in meeting the responsibilities of home and family. This is not a ministry to be treated lightly nor to be forgotten after one visit. The priest is to continue teaching both parents and children that they may grow up in a knowledge and love for each other and for God.

This responsibility rests with both the priest and laity (membership). Those who want to go on to perfection should sense the need of this kind of ministry in their homes; they should invite—even urge—the priest to come into the home and give them this ministry. The priest should be so conscious of the need of the people and the responsibility resting upon him to meet this need that he should be continually seeking the Heavenly Father for light, direction, and inspiration that he may go out and share with the people in their every day experiences.

The work of the teacher: The duty of the teacher is to watch over the church always, and to strengthen the members. He is to watch that no iniquity enters in, not waiting until it is seen by all men. One of the gifts that rightly belongs to a teacher is the gift of discernment for those who are under his supervision. He should always be conscious of this responsibility. God will bless him so that he will see evil in the making and be able to bring about corrections or adjustments before they become public.

This same spirit would also help him see other conditions such as hard-heartedness, lying, and evilspeaking. He should see that members meet together often, and that they do their duty. Yet he must never criticize if they fail, nor go to their homes if they are not at church and admonish them for not attending. He is to minister to them in the spirit of love, even the Spirit of Christ, in such a way that they will desire to attend church and feel it a pleasure to do their duty.

The work of the priest and teacher is to minister to people in their homes so that they will want to establish a family altar. From their experiences in worship, they and their children will want to keep the laws of God and to associate with the Saints as they meet together to worship Him.

The deacon's responsibility is to see that there is a place in which the people may meet—a place where God will be pleased to come and meet with his people. It should be beautiful and clean as far as human hands can make it. A good deacon will see that everything on the inside of the building is conducive to communion between God and his people, and that nothing shall enter in to disturb or mar this communion.

If this foundation has been securely established, then the work of the Melchisedec priesthood enters in. When members of the Aaronic priesthood have performed their duties under the spirit and power of God, they have the promise that angels will minister to them as they hold the keys to the ministry of angels.

Members of the Melchisedec priesthood, having laid the sure foundation both in the homes and in the general assemblies, are able to give their time and attention to building the superstructure. In this way—the narrow way, God's way—the Saints shall go on to perfection or, as Paul says, shall become "compacted by that which each joint supplieth, according to the effectual working and the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto edifying of itself in love."—Ephesians 4:16.

Zion the beautiful does beckon us on. The road is straight, the way is narrow. Surely God's way is the best way, for it is the only way. As he looks down upon us today may he say once more, "Behold my people, Zion."

The Rich Young Ruler

DURING THE DAYS when Jesus Christ was on this earth, a certain young man was exceedingly perturbed over a question that weighed heavily on his mind. He wanted a solution to it, and wondered to whom should he turn for help.

Undoubtedly that young man, who was a wealthy ruler, had heard something about Jesus Christ, his teachings, and the great miracles he had been performing. Under the circumstances, the young man probably said, "This man, Jesus of Nazareth, is the logical one to whom I should go for help in solving my problem. Hasn't he helped many people to health and strength. Why shouldn't he be able to give me the answer to the question that is uppermost in my mind? I am sure there is no question that will be too difficult for him to answer. I shall go to him and ask permission to talk with him. Perchance he can give me the solution to my problem."

Jesus had come from Galilee to the coasts of Judea. There he continued his teaching—the greatest the world has ever known. Multitudes of people followed him as he went about on his mission of love and mercy. Many who were sorely afflicted were healed.

Under these conditions the young man found Jesus. In my imagination, I can believe that he came to Jesus as the first shades of evening began to settle over the earth, while the sun slowly slipped from view beyond the horizon. I can almost envisage the Great Teacher and his guest seated, facing each other. Immediately after the young man had introduced himself, the Christ, from whose countenance emanated the beauty of the Holy Spirit, discerned that the earnest young man had a serious problem he wished to have solved.

The young man speaks, "Good Master, what good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life?" Jesus replies, "Why callest thou me good? There is none good but one, that is God; but if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments."

Then the young man asks, "Which?" and Jesus says, "Thou shalt not kill. Thou shalt not commit adultery. Thou shalt not steal. Thou shalt not bear false witness. Honor thy father and thy mother. And, thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

The answer given to Jesus by the rich young ruler is, "All of these things have I kept from my youth up; what lack I yet?"

And the Christ answers, "If thou wilt be perfect, go, sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come and follow me."

It was then the young man of good morals, good reputation, and clean living found the problem which confronted him was like an exceedingly high mountain, the peaks of which soared so far into the heavens that they were obscured by the mists which enveloped them. He had great riches. How could he part with them? They were part of his very life. They meant having luxuries and the good things to which he was accustomed. His wealth was his life. If he gave up his wealth, he would probably have to live in a very humble manner. Why should he give all of that up? Why couldn't he keep the prized possession and still be the recipient of the highest type of eternal life?

So, with the words of the Master still ringing in his ears, the rich young man turned away sorrowfully, for he had great possessions.

AS THE STAR which leaves its designated position in the heavens and shoots across the sky in brilliance for a few moments and then enters oblivion, so the rich young man with such great potentialities for good who was not willing to sacrifice the thing that stood between him and the fuller life that could have been his is lost to history.

The great Master Teacher is speaking to us today in the same manner as he did to the rich young ruler nearly two thousand years ago, asking us to forsake the things that stand between God and us. As to the nature of the things we have to sacrifice, I am sure as we make an examination of ourselves, we shall be the best judge as to what we lack to travel the road to the fuller life.

If you and I are to have the fuller life we too shall have to separate from our lives many things we have greatly cherished; we must sacrifice of our finances, our time, and our talents for the advancement of the kingdom of God on earth in our day. If we are unwilling to make the sacrifice, if we turn away and do not do our part, we shall be the losers.

"He that taketh not his cross and followeth after me is not worthy of me. He that findeth his life shall lose it: and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it," so said Jesus Christ, the Son of the Living God in Matthew 10: 38, 39.

When we know of a surety that we should sacrifice certain things in our lives which retard our spiritual growth and development, we must not turn away sorrowfully, but move toward the high place to which we have been called.

QUESTION:

Must the oil be consecrated before it can be used in anointing?
Missouri L. E. A.

ANSWER:

There is no scriptural command to consecrate the oil. The practice of blessing is regarded as a logical inference from established customs and has become a traditional practice in our church.

QUESTION:

Is the "church of the devil" referred to in Doctrine and Covenants 16: 4, and in I Nephi 3: 221, an ecclesiastical organization founded by the devil, or is it made up of sinful and unrepentant people in all churches as referred to in Doctrine and Covenants 3: 16?

Missouri

W. H.

ANSWER:

The name "church of the devil," with other related appellations, seems to be used both specifically as pertaining to a particular organization, and generally as applying to various organizations and movements whose purposes and aims are contrary to the work of God.

Nephi in his panoramic vision, saw the founding of a church of which Satan was the inspirer, and his description of it leaves no doubt of the evil intent which motivated its origin (I Nephi 3: 139-144). This church was to become great and world wide, and Ezekiel, describing it under the figure of a great cedar, said that "under his shadow dwelt all great nations" (Ezekiel 31: 6). Nephi further describes this church as having "dominion over all the earth, among all nations, kindreds, tongues and people" (I Nephi 3: 255), and compares it with the church of Christ whose dominions were small. Such descriptions point to a specific organization.

But there are other references where the related names of this church are used broadly, covering more than the specific organization.

Whoso longeth not to the church of the Lamb of God, longeth to that great church, which is the mother of abominations.—I Nephi 2: 222.

Whoso longeth to my church need not fear, for such shall inherit the kingdom of heaven; but it is they who do not fear me, neither keep my commandments, but build up churches unto themselves, to get gain; yea, verily I say unto you, that it is they that I will disturb, and cause to tremble and shake to the center.—Doctrine and Covenants 3: 13.

Jesus said to the Pharisees, "He that is not with me is against me, and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad." And in latter times, expressing a similar line of thought, he said,

The whole world lieth in sin, and groaneth under darkness and under the bondage of sin; and by this you may know they are under the bondage of sin, because they come not unto me; for whoso cometh not unto me is under the bondage of sin; and whoso receiveth not my voice is not acquainted with my voice, and is not of me, and by this you may know the righteous from the wicked.—Doctrine and Covenants 83: 7.

Any person, institution, organization, or even nation which works to cross purposes with those of Christ and refuses support to the work of his church can be classified only with the opposition. They are working with the enemy rather than with Christ, and, speaking broadly, may be said to belong to the "church of the devil." In refusing support to Christ they are aiding the opposition.

QUESTION:

If a woman member of the church with a nonmember husband wants to file an inventory and pay her tithes, but he objects to her doing so, should she pay, regardless, not letting him know? On the other hand, if he does not object to her paying on her share, how is she to determine how to file her inventory? What part of their possessions will she determine is hers to pay tithes on?

Kansas

M. L.

ANSWER:

Whatever you do in your effort to comply with the financial law, do it with the full knowledge and consent of your companion. Explain to him that tithing is used chiefly to promote the cause of Christ on earth. It is for teaching the gospel and calling men to repentance, and for extending—in an orderly manner—aid to the poor and the needy.

God plans that through it, by working together, we can do what we could not do individually. There are few who deep down in their hearts do not want to help those in distress. The willingness of people to respond to the call of the Red Cross when disaster strikes a community is evidence of this.

Let your husband know you are not asking a privilege for yourself that you are not willing he should enjoy. Others who have been confronted with this problem, have said to their companions, "I would like to be a 'laborer together with God' in carrying out his work on earth, and would like to pay as tithing one half of ten per cent of our net worth, and I am also willing that you shall take a like amount and pay it into the church of your choice, or use it for any purpose you like."

For the purpose of determining how much tithing you should pay, consider your marriage as a partnership in which you both share equally. While the Bishopric encourages the filing of inventories, it would seem ill-advised for a woman to file one with the church authorities unless it is agreeable to her companion. For the purpose of computing the tithe you could make an inventory and keep it in your own personal files.

The paying of tithing and the desire and willingness to do so has spiritual significance.

The church has been directed to accede to the rendition of the bishopric with respect to the temporal law; and until such heed is paid to the word which has been given . . . the church cannot receive and enjoy the blessings which have been looked for when Zion should be fully redeemed.—Doctrine and Covenants 129: 8.

Should the way be so hedged up as to prevent your obeying the financial law at this time, patiently hold to your desire to do so. Pray that God will, by the influence of his Spirit, bring light and understanding into the heart and mind of your companion, that with you he may see the beauty couched in every phase of the law of Christ and share its joy through obedience.

Answer at Last - By MRS. A. A. ESSEX

ELIZABETH MORRISON left her friend at the corner and went slowly on toward home, kicking at little stones and bits of twigs on the uneven brick sidewalk. All thoughts of "Walk like a lady," "Ladies do not scuff the toes of their shoes," and other such growing-up rules were lost in the dream-mist about her. She was aware, without thought, of the tingling goodness of light, spring breezes rushing now and then through her hair. The day, the place, the time were all swallowed up in a sixteen-year-old's first real vision of eternity. Many times throughout life we glimpse an eternal wisdom with a freshness that makes it seem a new revelation. This was Elizabeth's first experience, and she was totally lost in it.

Home at last, she let her sweater slip from her fingers to make a brilliant splash of color on the arm of the divan, fluttered a kiss in the general direction of Father's bald spot, and floated dreamily toward the kitchen and Mother.

"Hello, dear," said Mother, "nice service?"

"Um," Elizabeth answered softly, flashing a fingertip into fresh frosting. "It was wonderful."

Elizabeth's father had looked up from his Sunday Sports Review when she entered, and a frown settled over his stern, Roman features as he watched her dreamlike progress. Then he called to her, "Bitsy."

"Yes, Dad."

His frown deepened at so gentle a reply. "Bitsy" was a name left over from babyhood that never failed to bring on a gay round of teasing bickering. "Ah—bring me a glass of water, will you please?"

"Of course, Dad," she replied.

Mr. Morrison studied her previous actions rapidly while he waited. He knew his daughter well and was not satisfied with her present passion-without-organization for anything purporting to be religious. He had given it some consideration and felt that now was a good time to do something about it.

MR. MORRISON sipped at the water and set it on the stand at his elbow; then he carefully laced his fingers together and looked at his daughter in a serious searching manner. For a moment or two there was silence, broken only by the faint clinking and occasional slight clatter from the kitchen. He remembered Elizabeth as she had looked in dainty white lawn and delicate laces as that miraculous gift, "our very own baby." Later, a toddler always in mischief. Still later, as she reached eagerly for the skill to read. And now, sometimes tomboy, sometimes lady, immersed in books, more eager to learn all she could about everything within reach—but always obedient and thoughtful. He hoped he had chosen the right procedure—one that would exercise without damaging the growing character. He mentally assured himself that past experience left no room for doubt as to how she would react.

At last, the steady scrutiny penetrated the girl's mood of bedazzlement, and she grew uneasy. "Did—you want something else, Dad?" she queried.

"Just trying to see if you looked any better after having your soul washed up for the week," he replied.

"Oh, Dad!" she cried, stung by the half-mocking note in his voice, "How can you say things like that? We had a wonderful service, and the minister spoke beautifully!"

"Indubitably, indubitably. 'The minister spoke beautifully,'" he mimicked. "I suppose he couldn't save the sinners with a lisp."

THOUGH ELIZABETH, having recognized the approach of another of their debates, stood erect in front of her father ("Learn to think on your feet, child. You may have to sometime," he had often told her.) her face was expressive of a hurt shock. "Dad," she whispered, "you sound as if you don't believe in God—don't you?"

"Do you believe in lies?" he countered.

"Of course, I don't, but God wouldn't lie," she answered, shock changing swiftly to a fierce loyalty.

"All right," said Mr. Morrison, "we'll say contradictions, if that better suits your delicate taste."

The girl's mind first accepted the change, then rejected it. "If God contradicts himself, it is about the same thing," she thought. Aloud she said, "I don't believe he contradicts himself either."

"He does," said Mr. Morrison, "if one is to believe everything every preacher says. When you have been around as long as I have, you'll know that the minister in this church says you're condemned if you go to that church, and vice versa. What do you have to say about that?"

"I say that we are all human and make mistakes. If we were perfect, we would all understand the Bible fully, and then we would all believe alike and be one big church. But we aren't perfect; so some of us read it to mean one thing and some another," with a note of modest triumph, Elizabeth repeated what she had been recently taught.

Mr. Morrison followed quickly with another question, "The disciples all understood the gospel the same, and God spoke to them. Why doesn't he speak to your good man of the clergy today?"

Just as quickly Elizabeth answered, "I know that, too. It is because the disciples were the first ones to preach the new way and had to have direct help."

Mr. Morrison looked askance, "Do you mean that all this was to be told once then passed down through the ages with no further help from its Author?"

"Yes."

"You have played the game of 'Gossip' enough that you should know how a story becomes twisted in the repeating. Yet you ask me to believe that the God we are all supposed to call Greatest of Great was so dumb as to expect his story could last, in the hands of imperfect beings, without help for thousands of years."

Elizabeth was caught without an answer. Slowly she said, "When you put it that way, Dad, I'm all mixed up."

"Of course, you are," he said, "and you might think about it a little bit. Think why it should be. Is it because this God does not really care if we understand the story he had to tell; or is it because he was too weak to last so many centuries? Or is there some other answer?"

"I still think he is as good as they say he is," there was the smallest hint of inquiry in her tone, but her father repulsed it.

"You must find that out for yourself," he said. "I have one more point to take up with you at present."

"What is it?" she asked, her confidence dampened, though not gone. She loved these sessions with her father. Trying to match wits with him induced an exhilaration in her that was like racing across green grass in the face of a fresh, young wind; so she was eager to take up the contest anew.

"Well, my dear young devotee, I want to discover something of the management of this church toward which you are bending your desires," he said. "Just how is a minister selected to preside over a particular flock?"

ELIZABETH rumbled her brow for a moment before she explained, "There are some people like—well, like Mr. Wilson from the bank and Mrs. Farber who has that big house on Opal Drive, and people like that, you know—" she lifted her eyebrows, and he nodded his understanding. "Well," she continued, "they are the board, and they write to the school or some place where ministers go and find out about how much studying the man they want has done, and how good he is. If he will take the salary they can pay, they get him to be the minister." She was watching her father anxiously as she concluded, hoping she had explained this business affair adequately.

He smiled, his stern features softening a little, at his daughter's effort to stand up to a situation she felt to be beyond her. "That's fine, honey," he said, "all very business-like, isn't it?"

"Yes, it is," she answered with pride, "The minister says that preaching is his job just like drawing is yours. He says he has to have enough money to live on if he is going to be able to preach good sermons. He says, 'a servant is worthy of his hire.'"

"Your minister is an admirable man and no doubt worth every penny he gets, but I seem to recall reading in your Bible once words that went like this: 'And I will give you pastors according to mine heart, which shall feed you with knowledge and understanding.' That makes me a little dubious about this method of hiring and firing ministers—a little 'mixed up,'" he mused, seeming to become absorbed in his own thoughts.

Elizabeth, believing the discussion to be finished, turned to leave. Just as she reached the door, her father spoke once more, "Those 'words' are in the third chapter of Jeremiah, verse fifteen, if you would like to study them," he said. After she had gone, he murmured softly, "And, if there really is Someone to pray to, I pray that you will find the right answers to those questions some day."

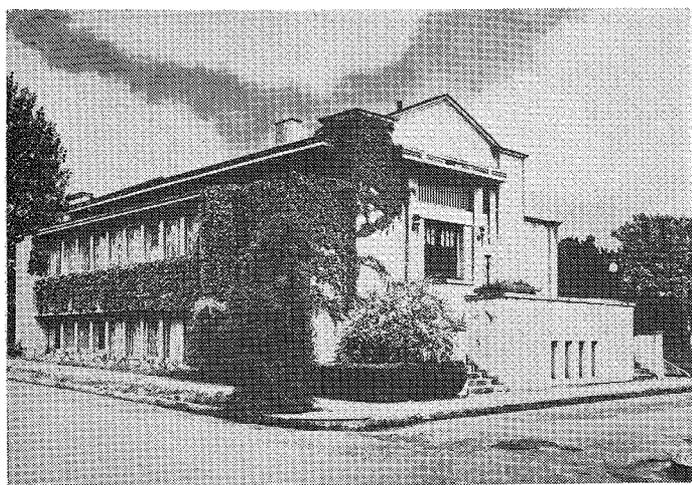

PERHAPS A MINISTER was justified in his remarks some time later to the church school teacher who regretted the loss of a pupil. Perhaps he was simply being honest and seeing people for what they are when he said, "You mustn't feel too bad, Miss Summers. Elizabeth is just one child out of millions, and she could never have understood what we try to teach in church school class. Let her move on from denomination to denomination asking her questions. 'Doesn't God care enough about us today to speak to us?' Indeed! She will get the same answer everywhere. None of us need feel responsible for what becomes of a person like that. It is all the doing of her atheistic father. Just forget the matter. 'Why can't God choose his own ministers?' Hmpf! There's no help for one like that." What he said may have been true; and in saying it he may have been as he often boasted, not allowing religion to cloud his vision.

On the other hand, he may have helped that one child more than he realized, because his failure sent her on a quest that lasted nearly fifteen years, led her through many creeds, endlessly seeking a satisfactory answer to questions, and ended finally in joyful recognition of the one church whose ministers gladly answered any question she asked. That church is the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints—the church that answers all questions and turns no child away from its knowledge.

Stimulating Friends

The friends who are most stimulating to us are those who disagree with us. It is they whose ideas we should ponder; not that we may be converted by them but that, in the light of their certainties, we may search out the basis of our own. We dignify by the name of beliefs a jumble of traditions and superstitions, and we need to go over them periodically, spurred by some skeptic, to sort out the grain from the chaff. —Cornelia James Cannon in The Atlantic Monthly.

A NEW CHURCH HOME IN PORTLAND, OREGON

THE CENTRAL PORTLAND MISSION was organized in 1944 and met in a hall at Ninth and Hawthorne. On September 3, 1944, the mission moved to Fourteenth and Hawthorne where a mortuary was purchased and converted into a meeting place. In 1946 the mission was organized into a branch by Apostle D. T. Williams and District President J. L. Verhei. Elder Verhei was elected pastor and has served in that office ever since.

The Hawthorne Street property was sold in 1947 and a good profit realized. The Saints moved back to the hall at Ninth and Hawthorne and remained there for a few months before purchasing a large house at Eighteenth and Belmont which was remodeled into a meeting place. The branch remained on Belmont for approximately two years when that building became too small, necessitating a new meeting place.

In May, 1950, a large and beautiful church at Twenty-fifth and Madison Street was purchased. This building is made of concrete and finished with stucco.

The upper auditorium will hold approximately three hundred fifty. The lower auditorium has classrooms and an auditorium which will accommodate approximately two hundred fifty; there is also a stage.

For more than a month the members have been working at painting, cleaning, redecorating, planting flowers and shrubbery, and making repairs. A modern nursery is being built in the main auditorium where young mothers can take their children and hear the sermon in a soundproof room with soundproof windows.

The first Sunday meetings were held June 25. The all-day opening services, with all the district invited, were held July 16. The order of services follows:

- 8:30 Prayer and fellowship
- 9:45 Church school
- 11:00 Preaching—Bishop M. E. Lasater
- 12:00 Basket lunch
- 2:00 Baptism service
- 3:00 Confirmation service
- 4:00 to 7:00 Open house
- 7:30 Preaching—Elder Elwin R. Vest

Isolation—Physical and Spiritual

By William Searles

I REMEMBER living on a small farm in northern Minnesota as a lad. We were some distance from an organized branch of the church and were listed on the church records as "isolated members." Our attendance at church was on a schedule of several times a year, and we looked forward to these occasions with the same pleasant anticipation as holidays and vacations. Each time we returned home feeling that our expectations had been well justified.

God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son. Christ was in the world for a purpose, physically alone—no church, no members. I wonder if the records in heaven were changed to read "isolated"? I think not. If there had been a church in Jerusalem, its records may have said "isolated" concerning the Man of Nazareth—but not the heavenly record. It may be necessary through force of circumstance that the church records show some of our members as isolated, but we do not need to be isolated from our Heavenly Father any more than was Jesus.

Physical isolation is eliminated by being in contact with other Saints. Likewise spiritual isolation is done away with by walking in the company of our Heavenly Father. We are at liberty to keep ourselves in contact with God as Christ did—through prayer. His "aleness" was overcome by the presence of his Father with him as he prayed.

CHRIST SETS BEFORE us two clear examples: first, the necessity of walking in the best spiritual company at all times by prayer; second, the necessity of sharing our spiritual company with our neighbors. Christ overcame his physical "aleness" by going to the seaside to teach a group of fishermen how to be fishers of men. We too can overcome our isolation by telling the gospel story to our neighbors. Many times we shrink from this vital task. However, if we are spiritually "sound," pray without reserve, and tell the Restoration message with conviction, the task lies well within reach of each of us. The barriers seem to dissolve away before strong faith, diligent effort, and fervent prayer.

The pitfall which traps many of us when we are cut off from church privileges is that we do not continue to tell our story to those around us. When we do not keep the task continually before us we begin to despair. Then we do not maintain regular habits of worship and prayer. This leads to spiritual isolation. As this spiritual isolation grows Satan seeks to lead us down the byways of sin and destruction.

Sometimes isolation from the church is unavoidable, but spiritual isolation is avoidable. We must not cut ourselves off from the fountain of living waters. Love as manifested by the Christ can and will transcend the boundaries of space, matter, and time.

Lydia Blakeslee Clark

“Herald” Subscriber for Seventy-five Years

SISTER LYDIA BLAKESLEE CLARK would have been the last to realize that there was anything outstanding about her life. In each busy day there was no time to spend on selfish introspection, yet the sum total of her busy days presents a picture of devoted service to church and community that is the pride of her generation and the inspiration of ours.

Sister Clark was born on October 31, 1853, in Batavia, Illinois. When she was only three years old, she moved with her family to Galien, Michigan, where her family became prominent in civic and religious affairs. Her own contribution to the community was begun as a schoolteacher in the Galien district.

On May 10, 1870, she was baptized into her father’s church and remained a loyal member until her death this year. It was natural that she should become a devoted member in the church as well as a worker, for she came from a prominent church family. Her father, George A. Blakeslee, was the presiding bishop from 1882 until his death in 1890. Her mother organized the Ladies Aid Society of the Reorganized Church. Following in her footsteps, Sister Clark acted as president of the group for forty years.

In other fields, Sister Clark was her own closest rival for service record. In addition to church school work and the Ladies’ Aid, she served for forty years as bishop’s solicitor in the Galien Branch. Although she became hard of hearing in later life, her eyesight remained good, and she was able to read up until shortly before her death. She was a regular subscriber to the Herald from April 1, 1875, covering a period of seventy-five continuous years. This record alone may never be equaled.

ON MARCH 8, 1874, she married Charles A. Clark. They were fortunate enough to live to celebrate their sixty-fifth wedding anniversary together in 1939. This was only one memorable occasion in the joint happiness of two memorable lives.

In every respect her personal life was bound up with her church activities as she tried to fulfill a verse she often quoted: “I am contending for the faith that was once delivered to the Saints.” Her pastor tells us that during her lifetime, she wore out several Bibles as she persistently studied the word of God. The last well-worn Bible she left behind her tells the story of her reading habits. It is easy to see from the dog-eared pages that the New Testament held preference over the old, and that Matthew with its heavily marked passages was her favorite. A scrapbook containing the sayings, poems, and hymns she loved bears the record of her philosophy of life. Scattered through the book are copies of such hymns as “Oh, for a Faith That Will Not Shrink,” “My God, How Wonderful Thou Art,” “Sweet Hour of Prayer,” “O Sacred Heart of Jesus,” “I Place My Trust in Thee,” and her favorite hymn, “My Faith Looks Up to Thee.” He also gives us this little insight:

Sister Clark was able to read until just shortly before her death. I used to go into her room and hand her my card, and when she would see the name of the church, she would hold it to her heart and talk to me about the wonderfulness of this church, which was her father’s church. Visiting with her was very difficult because she was so hard of hearing, but I shall always remember the nice experiences and especially the spirit which accompanied our visits when I was able to stop by and see her for a few minutes from time to time.

On February 10, 1950, Sister Clark died. It was a fitting tribute when her friend and minister, W. Blair McClain, told her friends at the funeral: “I must confess that she ministered to me more than I was able to minister to her. . . . Perhaps her life is the greatest sermon that could be uttered. We realize that she was probably not perfect, but certainly she was a good example.”

A clergyman wrote to a wealthy and influential businessman, requesting a subscription to a worthy charity and soon received a curt refusal which ended by saying, “As far as I can see, this Christian business is just one continuous give, give, give.”

After a brief interval the clergyman answered: “I wish to thank you for the best definition of the Christian life that I have yet heard.”—“New Century Leader.”

This Thing I Do - By MRS. M. A. McCONLEY

IN THE PROCESS of building a stable, efficiently-managed, Zion home, it is frequently necessary for the wife and mother to evaluate the "status quo" of her home and family.

Being a good steward in the sight of the Lord means being a good manager of all material things that come into our possession—be they much or little. It also means discharging faithfully all spiritual responsibilities in the rearing and training of our families.

To accomplish this we must think constructively and clearly, planning, organizing, and systematizing our daily life and then sticking to our plans. This is a lifetime job which often proves difficult, but it is richly repaying and satisfying emotionally, spiritually, and materially.

All these phases of life, individually and as family groups, are so closely tied together that the success or failure of one phase cannot help affecting the other phases of life.

For instance, no family can attain true spiritual heights and enjoy the rich experiences of real stewardship whose financial affairs are always in a tangle, whose debts are never paid, and whose credit is not good.

A good steward of anything must know how to do whatever it is his responsibility to do. As good stewards we must know how to care for and manage our homes. We must plan and organize and then resolve within our souls that "This thing I do" will be our motto for today, next week, and next month.

We cannot lightly dismiss our responsibility as homemaker by saying, "Oh, I just don't like to keep house and cook," or "You know, I never was a good manager; we just can't make a budget or keep records in our family."

Helps in learning how to do anything pertaining to the home are available on every hand. The home column of any daily paper, magazines on the home and family and pamphlets on all phases of homemaking from state colleges are only a few of the sources of helps for the homemaker.

Knowing how to buy supplies and equipment for the home intelligently and efficiently is very necessary for every homemaker. For instance, every woman should know values and qualities in fabrics of every kind. She should know that eighty square percale (eighty threads per inch each way) is the first quality material for children's wash dresses and women's house dresses, and it is fast color and the shrinkage is not over 1 per cent, while many cotton prints not of good quality will be faded and out of shape after only a few washings. The same thing is true of sheets, pillow cases, and towels; the poorer quality materials will last only a short time compared to the better quality ones, and the difference in price may be quite small.

A knowledge of wool material is important, too. A merchant may advertise certain blankets as being 100 per cent wool at a bargain price, and other blankets of 100 per cent virgin wool at a slightly higher price. Unless the shopper knows that virgin wool means new, unused wool yarns, while just wool may and often does mean reclaimed wool made from old garments that have been reprocessed into wool threads which are not as good as the new wool (yet both are 100 per cent wool), she would be apt to buy the cheaper one. This, of course, would not be the best buy.

Then there are numerous kinds of synthetic fabrics such as rayons, acetates, nylons, and combinations of these products. Most of these are good buys if they are used for the garments for which they were intended by the manufacturer. Assuming that we know qualities and buy accordingly, yet do not know how to properly care for the various types of fabrics, we are still not good stewards in the sight of the Lord. The waste that results from improper care of clothing and home furnishings has kept many a family from being economically sound and has disqualified its members as good stewards.

In caring for wool fabrics, one should wash blankets in lukewarm suds, rinsing them in the same temperature water, and then putting them carefully through a wringer or spinner. They should never be twisted by hand nor put through a washer. Heat and agitation on wet material causes shrinkage and matting. Most wool garments should be dry cleaned.

Cottons are easily cared for with hot water and good quality laundry soap. Poor soap will ruin any colored fabric. Bleaches should be used sparingly. They can spoil colors and weaken the strength of any fabric if they are used too often or too strong. Some synthetic fabrics launder well, and some should be dry cleaned; the manufacturer's instruction should be followed.

Good care of clothing includes more than laundering and cleaning. It includes proper repair and mending. With attention to such details the life of garments can be doubled.

Any mother can acquire at least a fair knowledge of sewing—perhaps not real tailoring or difficult work, but how to make children's clothes, and keep all clothing in proper repair. There is amazing waste in a family where every garment is thrown away at the first little rip or tear.

The Home Column

AND THEN there is the matter of furniture in the home. Furniture is one of the major expenditures and one which is not made every year. Therefore, it should be carefully selected, and the purchase should be made on the basis of quality, tastes and needs of the family, and financial resources.

Often lines and materials are merely passing fads and will be out of place and out of date in a few years. One can easily "go overboard," so to speak, on trends in anything—clothing, furniture, homes, or cars. Good stewardship means weighing carefully the pros and cons before buying anything, particularly any major purchase.

With cars, it's what is under the hood that is important, not the color of the paint on the outside. The same principle holds true with furniture. Construction and material are more important than the outer upholstery; but of course, both are important. A hardwood frame put together with screws, properly tied springs, and artistic lines are things to look for in buying furniture rather than the latest in color or style. Solid woods and various types of veneer are also worth looking into.

IT IS NEEDLESS TO SAY that before we do any buying we should carefully take stock of our present possessions—clothing and personal equipment—check on our household supplies and furnishings, and then plan the things needed for the coming season or year. We should take into account all our obligations—taxes, rent, car license, insurance, et cetera, not forgetting our obligation to the Lord. Then we should make our plans—decide what we can afford and what we will buy—and stick to the decision we make. In other words we should file our inventory and make a budget for the coming year.

Every woman should read the very fine material in Section Three of "Aaronic Priesthood in Ministry to the Family," which deals with economic problems of the home.

Do You Listen With Your Face?

DEAR LADIES" The speaker looked at her well-dressed audience of clubwomen at a downtown hotel. Ladies? Well, maybe. "Dear vacuums" might have been just appropriate. What the speaker saw was a collection of fashionable clothes and pert little hats and a perfectly astonishing display of vacant stares. For all the speaker knew, Mrs. Manyclothes was wondering if she should buy that purple dress, while Mrs. Yelpanholler was sure she had left the oven on, and Mrs. Gushanguzzle looked down her nose at the horrid red hat Mrs. Actintwenty was wearing. Yet, perhaps the women really were listening.

This scene repeats itself in classrooms, at P.T.A. meetings, and even (let it be whispered) at church. It happens wherever women assemble. What speaker can be inspired by such a vapid reception?

Listening with our ears is all very well. But listening with our faces is an added courtesy. A listening face is inspiring; interested eyes are encouraging.

In our women's meetings many fine things are offered by well-qualified, earnest people who believe what they bring to us and who are trying to serve in the very best way they can. Is there anything embarrassing about looking at the speaker? Even fine lecturers who have unlimited poise and confidence must appreciate the attention of the eyes and the tribute of an alert face.

Let us each cultivate the listening face. It will come in handy for the Sunday sermon, for the children's troubles, for the Tuesday Club, or the tired husband in our Zion home. It will prove beyond doubt that we are really as interested as we profess to be.

Through My Window

THE BLUE HAZE has lifted from the foothills, allowing them to stand out rugged and clear. Rising high above and far beyond are the snow-capped Rockies. White clouds drift lazily over the red, orange, and gold, of a Colorado sunset.

The sun moves slowly downward, and dark threatening clouds appear, partially obscuring the brilliant colors of their background and forming into queer shapes and familiar-looking places. There is one that resembles a bay with quiet, blue waters and a dark shoreline. As I watch, a white ship comes majestically into view, and a sailboat leaves the shore and goes out to meet it. Off to the right where the darkest clouds have gathered, there comes a break in the pattern that resolves itself into an arched doorway, and through that doorway a shaft of sunlight makes a golden pathway that leads upward to a faraway blue heaven.

The beauty of these pictures in the sky cannot be described by mere words, but they have brought to me the words of Paul (I Corinthians 2-9): "Eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things God hath prepared for them that love him." A deep peace fills my soul and the whole view, though fantastic, is to me symbolic of life. There are the soft pastels of babyhood; the brilliancy and gaiety of youth; the clouds and disappointment of middle age. But as life draws to a close, the dark clouds are brightened by faith and hope and, as through an open door, we see a shining pathway that leads to that paradise of God.

OTTAWA, ILLINOIS. — Missionary Elder Wayne Smith completed two weeks of services on July 6. Four were baptized that evening. Brother Smith held nine cottage meetings, preached on Sunday mornings, and gave illustrated sermons on Sunday evenings. Nine others gave their decision to be baptized upon his return on August 24 and 25.

CENTRAL MISSOURI STAKE. — There have been two barn rallies—one for Senior Zion's Leaguers, June 17 and 18, one for Junior Zion's Leaguers (age 12-14), July 1 and 2—at the farm home of Mr. and Mrs. Larry Updike, Odessa, Missouri. The theme for both rallies was "Why Will I Attend Reunion?" Approximately 100 attended the Senior League rally and 60 the Junior League rally.

Each group enjoyed recreation, supper, talent hour, worship hour, and a snack on Saturday. Sunday prayer and fellowship meeting was held before breakfast. The Junior League had a flannelgraph by Joe Martin of Independence and a sermon by the Stake Bishop, Willard C. Becker. A Communion service was held for both groups. Sunday afternoon the junior league had a baptismal service. Clair Weldon set the stage by reading a story of baptism from the Book of Mormon and explained the meaning of baptism and recommended that each one offer a prayer in behalf of Judith as she was baptized. Then Judith Updike, the oldest daughter of Larry and Patricia Updike, was baptized by her father.

Stake League Director Carlos Smith of Buckner was in charge of the rallies. Others beside those mentioned who assisted were Stake President Harry J. Simons, Hunter Ferguson, one of his counselors, and Paul Landsberg, pastor of Odessa group.

SACRAMENTO, CALIFORNIA. — The following were baptized in the 1949-1950 church year: Cecil Leonard Purcell, Janice Adele Sharpe, Beverly Colleen Sharpe, Jeannette Mary Sharpe, Ernest Henry Duncan, Robert Scott Ringwald, Clinton Robert Childs, Louis O. Root, Gladys L. Root.—Reported by K. M. WINSOR.

SEATTLE DISTRICT. — Sixty-three boys and girls enjoyed a four-day camp at Silver Lake reunion grounds, ending July 2. Early in the spring Elder Paul Wellington sent out invitations to workers to meet in Seattle to formulate plans for the first junior camp in the district. Brother Wellington advertised the camp by interesting the pastors and church school leaders and teachers who encouraged the children in their own branches, and by personal letters to children between the ages of 10½ and 13 years.

On June 29 the children began to arrive with their sleeping bags and luggage and were soon established in two large tents with wooden floors and sides which served as dormitories. A get-together party and a devotion under the stars started the camp that evening.

A flag raising ceremony started off each new day. Dona Roll led the calisthenics and then the camp marched to the lakeside where Elder Elwin Vest led the morning devotions. Sister Peggy Vest brought real life stories to this period of the day.

The children were divided into eight classes. Flannelgraph and stories from Between the Covers of the Book of Mormon were assigned to the leaders, who explained the subject material to the children. Each group colored the pictures of the characters, mounted them on flannel and cut them out. They assembled their materials and backgrounds, and each group prepared to tell the story on the flannelboard. This project required several periods at different intervals.

Handicraft classes met each day before lunch. Luella Foster taught beadwork, making rings and bracelets; Fay and Paul Wellington taught basket-weaving; Katherleen McDole taught metalcraft, making copper plaques; and Helen Gilberts taught weaving on looms, making potholders, and table mats.

There was swimming twice on Friday and once on Saturday. Jimmy Clark and John Gilberts taught swimming and diving and served as life guards.

Campfires were held on the beach after dark. Dona Roll and Peggy Vest led in singing.

After lunch was rest time: forty-five minutes of relaxation before the ball games and play time.

Saturday the camp hiked to a near-by playground for a picnic lunch. After the ball games Elder W. W. Belcher and a Boy Scout assistant gave an interesting demonstration of how to pitch a tent, how and where to build a small fire, how to extinguish a campfire, and what to do when lost in the woods.

Camp Director Paul Wellington showed an educational film, "Growing Up," Saturday evening, and presented the explanation of the film.

In honor of the holiday week end, the camp met by the swimming dock for fireworks Saturday evening after dark. Rockets, Roman candles, and whistle bombs combined with the many individual demonstrations provided an exciting display. After the supply of firecrackers was exhausted and the staff relaxed, Dona Roll and Peggy Vest led the songs of the last campfire.

Early Sunday morning the camp hiked to a small outdoor chapel. Everyone sat on the ground and Brother Vest led the devotions, and many expressed their thoughts about the experience at camp. All agreed that the fellowship of being close and sharing in good fun was the underlying value of the four days together.

One of the high lights was the service Sunday morning in the dining room. Brother Wellington was in charge, and the theme was centered on the Book of Mormon. Each group presented its part of the story on the flannelboard, and Brother Wellington co-ordinated the stories in such a way that the whole narrative was clear and understandable.

The cooking staff consisted of Hattie Belknap, Margaret Wofford, Ethel Bryant, and Lulu Premo. These women prepared healthful and appetizing meals, and their activities were very much appreciated.

Elder Paul Duvic served as assistant to the camp director and kept the camp running smoothly.

The honor campers selected each day, one boy and one girl, were: John Brockman, Carol Ann Gills, Joann Hardwick, and Wendel Dobson. These people were recognized for their contribution of making camp life more enjoyable.

Teenage staff members were Kathleen McDole, Dona Roll, Mary Louise Tyler, Jimmy Clark, and John Gilberts.

The group met at the lakeside for a parting service Sunday morning, and it was decided that hereafter the junior camp will be known as Camp Wasila. Pictures were taken of the group, and presents were given to the cooks and members of the staff. As the group made a big friendship circle, they sang a hymn. Then the bell rang for the turkey dinner, the eating of which ended the camp for 1950.

STONE CHURCH, INDEPENDENCE. — Two babies were blessed on July 9. Marilyn Kay Benedict, daughter of Warren and Venita (Black), was blessed by Elder Glaude Smith and Bishop A. Neal Deaver. Paul Jeffery Noynaert, son of Paul J. and Cleo (Cudworth) Noynaert, was blessed by Elder Glaude Smith and Elder Frank Noynaert, the paternal grandfather.

Pacific Inspection Tour

Practically all the descendants of Joseph Smith have been identified with the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of L. D. S. (headquarters at Independence, Mo.) who do not call themselves Mormons.

Respectfully submitted,

ISRAEL A. SMITH.

Going via Hawaiian Airlines, the interisland service, President Smith, accompanied by Mark H. Siegfried, Howard F. Miller, Mrs. Eriel Miller, and A. Orlin Crownover, visited the Island of Hawaii, popularly known as the Big Island.

Here on the evening of June 27, about one hundred members and friends gathered at the Y. W. C. A. activities building in the city of Hilo for a dinner in honor of President Smith. The dinner was in charge of a committee of the Hilo Saints under the chairmanship of Charles Aki, who gave the invocation. Elder M. M. de la Cruz gave the welcome address, and Elder James Kemp, pastor of the Hilo church, introduced the honor guests who were presented with gifts and leis by Mrs. Gilbert Lee. Streamers of Vanda orchids marked the middle of each of the five long tables. White Cattleya orchids were at each end. Gardenia leis decorated the entrance to the building, while hundreds of the fragrant, snowy-white blossoms were massed as a background along the base of the stage at the front of the room. An arrangement of huge ape leaves graced the stage floor.

President Israel A. Smith and Bishop Mark H. Siegfried returned to Honolulu expecting to leave July 14 upon the next part of their air journey into the Society Islands. On their return to Hawaii they found that the French government had refused to guarantee plane travel for the next two to six months. After considerable effort, and motivated by an eager desire not to disappoint the Island Saints who are making great plans for their reception, they both made other plans.

A telegram from Hawaii dated July 12 states that plane service into Tahiti is now assured for the first time since the Korean War began. They will leave on Sunday, July 16, for Suva and Papeete.

It is not known at present whether President Smith will be able to go on to Australia and New Zealand, but Herald readers will be kept informed of developments.

The world has yet to see what God can do with a man fully consecrated to Him.—Dwight L. Moody.

Dear Editor:

The Herald is always a welcome visitor. The editors and writers of articles are deserving of thanks and praise too good for mere words. Much work and travel have been necessary to get the information that gives so great pleasure to readers.

The page of questions and answers is interesting and useful.

Someone wrote, "Refuse to believe what reason rejects." Reason rejects what Eve, Enoch, and Lehi claim—that if our first parents had not transgressed, there would have been no offspring, no children.

God said his work was good when man was created. Adam and Eve were constructed to bring forth and people the earth. To claim that they had to commit sin to fulfill the purpose for which they were made is unreasonable to me, suggesting that God was unjust to punish them if they had to transgress to bring about the purpose for which the Creator made them.

Stewardship Opportunities and Responsibilities

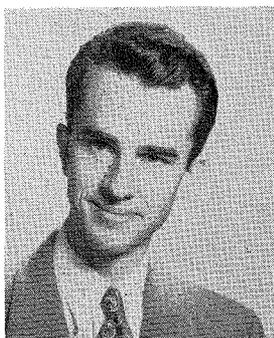

A Textbook for Priesthood Study

BY BISHOP L. WAYNE UPDIKE

This is a twelve-hour unit of study designed for the further education of the Aaronic Priesthood of our church. It covers the financial law, the missionary presentation of the financial law, how to help members file their tithing statement, family finances, funds of the church, economic Zion, and a number of charts.

Memo to High School Graduates

from R. Edwin Browne, Director of Public Relations
Graceland College, Lamoni, Iowa

WITH SUMMER past its mid-mark and high school graduates of this spring fast approaching the deadline for decisions about whether college is the next step, and if so what college, the Director of Public Relations takes typewriter in hand to convey random thoughts on college—particularly Graceland College to the wondering graduate

Graceland's Director of Public Relations happens also to be a district chairman of the American College Public Relations Association. The district for which he is responsible covers six states and all kinds of colleges: state universities, four-year schools, junior colleges—co-educational institutions and girls' schools, church-related colleges and tax-supported institutions. He has just returned to his office after a week at one of America's largest universities—Michigan—where college public relations directors from all over America were meeting for a convention. The picture for this fall, according to the word going around in the states surrounding Graceland and in most other areas represented at the convention, is that college enrollments will be down.

* * *

It appears that most colleges want to hold their enrollments about where they were last year. Many college budgets have been set up to maintain their enrollments at these levels. Most colleges will be welcoming students this fall with wide-open arms. They are looking for students. They will offer more and more scholarships to make their schools more attractive to prospective students.

So—high school graduates will find it easier to get into more schools this fall than has been the case since the war. More choices are available. Costs will be about the same, or slightly higher than last year.

* * *

Many prospective students are asking about the cost of a college education. Yet, by and large, prospective students seem to be uninformed about what to look for when they ask about cost. They ask about tuition costs, for example, when they ought to be concerned about total costs. Tuition, in most instances, is only one item of expense, and it is not always the largest item. Other public relations directors from schools of similar size attending the national conference were amazed to learn the low cost of a college education at Graceland.

* * *

Here are the figures on cost for a Graceland education. The average student can go one year for as little as $650. This includes board, room, books, tuition, and all other fees. In other words, he can eat three meals a day in the college dining room, sleep and study in a college dormitory, buy his books, pay his tuition, receive a ticket admitting him to Graceland social and sports events, obtain his weekly paper and his yearbook, attend class, and participate in all other activities open to students for an average cost of $650. The student will need "spending money" for other items, depending on needs and tastes—for laundry, extra recreation, between-meal snacks, and so on.

In comparing these costs to those of a state university, the student should keep several factors in mind. If the tuition is lower at the tax-supported institution, does it follow that the total costs are lower? Usually, it does not. Find out what board costs. Find out the average room cost. Look for course fees. Determine what the standard of living is in the town and on the campus. What about transportation costs from living quarters to campus?

* * *

Graceland can help a student financially in four important ways. The most important is the low original cost. Many a student has accepted a scholarship from another school only to find that Graceland would have been less expensive even without a scholarship. Talk to a student who has attended Graceland and then has gone to another school. If he's up on his figures, he will probably tell you that it cost less—in total—at Graceland.

* * *

Financial help number two is student employment. Over half of Graceland's students work part time to help pay their way at Graceland. By working an average of two hours per day throughout the school year, the student can earn $176 toward the cost of his education. The college furnishes this employment to students who need it. Jobs are interesting and can be an important part of the student's total education.

* * *

Loans are available to students who have need for extra financial help. A student can borrow as much as $175 toward a year of education at Graceland. This is not repaid until he has finished school. Even if he goes on to another school after graduation from Graceland, he does not need to repay the loan until he has finished work at the other school. Then, if he wishes, he can start an easy plan of installment repayment four months after he leaves school. He is not charged interest on the loan if he keeps up his payments.

Financial help number four is the installment plan for paying the cost of a Graceland education. The student can pay as little as $175 on enrollment day and take care of the balance of the educational cost in six equal monthly installments beginning November 15. There are other plans which have been set up to fit the financial needs of the individual student. Graceland wants to make it possible for every Latter Day Saint young person to attend his church college without undue financial burden.

* * *

The matter of transfer of Graceland credits to other schools is occasionally questioned by the wondering student. Here are the facts. Most four-year schools give the Graceland graduate the same academic standing upon transfer that they give to the student who has spent the first two years in that four-year school. A student who enrolls as a freshman in the School of Fine Arts at a large university may find to his dismay that his credits from that school will not give him junior standing if he transfers to the School of Engineering and Architecture in the same university at the end of the second year. This unhappy situation is not the result of the fact that one school in a university does not recognize the credit standing of another school in the same university. The problem is that the student did not plan his course so that he had the foundation required in the field to which he desired transfer.

* * *

A Graceland student who plans his course properly need not lose credit in transferring to another school upon graduation. If he loses credit through transfer, it is the fault of poor planning rather than an evidence of Graceland's credit standing. Graceland is fully accredited, and her students are welcomed in the finest educational institutions of the land. Most Graceland students transfer to other schools without loss of credit.

* * *

Graceland is the oldest and largest junior college in Iowa and is recognized as one of the finest junior colleges in America.

* * *

The counseling program at Graceland College has been thoughtfully organized to help the wondering student plan his college career wisely. More often than not the student who enrolls in college with a definite plan in mind changes his course of study before he finishes college. The counsel of experienced advisors will make it possible for him to build a foundation during the first and second years of his college life which will be adequate as prerequisite work in many fields of specialization.

* * *

One of Graceland's outstanding offerings to the young people of the church is in the quality of Graceland's teaching personnel. The prospective college student should study well the quality of teacher he will have during the first two formative years of his college experience. Graceland's teachers are qualified—by academic background, experience in teaching, and devotion to the church—to give service "beyond the call of duty" in instructing and inspiring the young people of the church.

Learning is not confined to the classroom. In choosing a college, the prospective student should study the tone of campus life. Not every campus tone is the same. Even among large universities there are widely divergent differences. The kind of person the student will become is as much the result of his association outside the classroom as in the classroom.

* * *

If the student is certain about the limits of his educational career—if he knows that he is going to be a journalist, for example—it is common practice for him to seek a school with an excellent reputation in the field of his interest. This is a worthwhile practice. But in most fields of study, the student does not need to be concerned about this problem until the junior year. If he wishes to enroll in a school of journalism, he will find that he is not admitted to most journalism schools until he attains junior standing. In fact, he may be surprised to learn that he is not permitted to enroll in even one journalism course during his freshman and sophomore years.

* * *

So—what he really needs to be concerned about as a freshman is finding a school which will offer him a good foundation for his total life—a school which will offer him the prerequisites for transfer, a school which will teach him "how to live" while he is learning how to "make a living."

* * *

Graceland—like other good junior colleges—offers excellent courses of study for the person who is interested in only two years of college. These "terminal" courses prepare the student to take his place in society immediately upon graduation from Graceland.

New Horizons

* * *

Many a student who has been out of high school several years and has learned in the school of experience that he needs a college education has found his niche after a Graceland education. Older students, including married students, find Graceland a happy solution to their educational problems.

* * *

Members of the Graceland faculty and staff will be representing the college at many of the reunions and youth camps of the church this summer. High school graduates, and others, are invited to contact them to discuss educational plans. For further information, for application papers, for a copy of the new Graceland catalog just off the press, prospective students should write the Director of Public Relations, Graceland College, Lamoni, Iowa.

* * *

Graceland will be accepting applications for admission during the entire summer.

 BLUE PRINTS

In a shady spot on the south side of the square, Bishop J. F. Keir and Elder W. E. Wakeman were having a friendly chat.

"We're talking about Zion," said Brother Wakeman.

"Got in all fixed up?"

"No, but we have some blueprints!"

 DIAMONDS

The long Fourth of July week end was a happy one for the dainty little lady who has been helping us with editorial work. She returned from her holiday with a brilliant diamond shining in a new ring on her third finger, left hand. But the diamond itself could not be brighter than the smile of happiness and hope she wore. Diamonds are so often associated with the great moments of our lives. . . . It all reminds us that we cannot find happiness alone. We must always go seeking it for someone else, someone specially precious, someone we love. . . . If you would find the jewel of happiness, hunt it and give it to others, and they will give one to you. There is no other way.

 HAPPINESS

One of our active Zion's Leaguers had a serious ear operation this summer and has just been up and around for a short time. I met her on the street the other day and asked her how she was feeling. Her reply was, "I'm as happy as a lark! I heard the kitchen clock ticking yesterday, and I feel as if I have the world in my lap."
—J. R.

 FROM MEXICO

A card from author Norma Anne Kirkendall, who is on her sixth trip to Mexico. "Each time I do new things and meet new folks," she writes. "Adventure this time came when I drove through a terrible storm in the mountains." She has made a wonderful hobby of learning about the Mexican people, their culture, art, and customs.

 MEDALS

Uncle Joe doesn't think he is perfect, but he has a pocketful of invisible medals to pin on himself when he does something good. He has a "Good Deeds" medal he wears when he gives a lady his seat on the bus. There is a small medal he wears when he picks a rusty nail out of the street to save somebody's tire. Another one, "Honest Man," for returning extra change to the cashier when she makes a mistake that would cost her something later. He has a "Nice Guy" decoration for the times when a child—with "a child's unerring instinct in the reading of character"—toddles over to him to make friends. Besides these, he is always ready to make new ones to fit any special occasion, at a moment's notice. Never think that Uncle Joe's good deeds go unobserved. He keeps track of them all the time.

 DEATH

Many a funeral began with what looked like a harmless bit of fun. But there is no fun in a funeral.

The Hymnal for Youth

(Herald Edition)

"The Hymnal for Youth" (Herald Edition) which we are now introducing includes many hymns that are already well known among us. There are also a large number of hymns that have found acceptance elsewhere which ought to become better known among the Saints. And we are glad to say that there are more than a few (written by our own people) that have never been published before, but which we believe will be welcomed and loved. . . .

"We were happy to be able to make an arrangement with The Westminster Press that permitted us to include herein many of the hymns already issued in their 'Hymnal for Youth,' and to add thereto hymns of our own choosing." Quoted from The Preface by Israel A. Smith and F. Henry Edwards.

The new Hymnal includes the following sections: "When We Worship," "Orders of Worship," "Responsive Readings," and almost 400 hymns.

The Blessing of Children

The congregation generally becomes alert and attentive when the pastor announces that there is a child to be blessed at the service. All normal people love children. There is nothing more inspiring than the sight of young parents bringing their child to the altar of the church to have it blessed. Church people rejoice with them.

The two elders who are to participate in the blessing come to the altar and stand waiting to receive the child. Out of the congregation come the parents. They place the child in the arms of the elders, and then stand at one side so that the congregation may see the ceremony. Facing the congregation and holding the child, the elders stand together as one of them offers the prayer of blessing.

At the conclusion of the prayer, the alert pastor will hand to the parents a copy of the fine little booklet, Of Such Is the Kingdom. This booklet contains the certificate of blessing (which the pastor and elders should have filled out), a message to the parents, a number of poems and Scripture readings, with helps in teaching the child to pray, and information leading to his baptism when the time comes. The booklet gives the family a permanent record of the event, and should be saved for the child and given to him when he comes of age. The booklet may be obtained from the Herald Publishing House.

Afterward, the officiating elder should also fill out the appropriate form for the purpose and give it to the branch secretary or pastor (according to local practice) to send to headquarters. In unorganized places, the elder himself should send this report to the Department of Statistics, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

In this way, both the family and the church will have a permanent record of the blessing.

Introducing...

CLEO HANTHORNE MOON (page 9) was introduced June 20, 1949.

MAY RICHARD HAMM, Independence, Missouri (page 11), was born in Laclede County, Missouri. She later moved to Independence where she was baptized at the Stone Church in 1914. After finishing her high school work, she attended Teachers' College at Springfield, Missouri, and taught rural schools for six years before starting her nurses' training. She was graduated from the Sanitarium School of Nursing with the class of 1918 and did graduate work at Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore, Maryland.

She has two sons: George R. Cook and Stanley Cook. In 1949 she married Charles Hamm.

GEORJEAN ROBINSON HARMAN, Cedar Rapids, Iowa (page 15), was born in St. Joseph, Missouri. She was baptized in Des Moines, Iowa, in 1926, and was graduated from the Roosevelt High School in Des Moines in 1936, after which she attended one year at the State University of Iowa. She was first employed as secretary to the service manager at Dun and Bradstreet in Des Moines; then as toll operator for the telephone company; and later as secretary to the vice-president of an advertising company in Iowa City.

In 1942 she married Marvin G. Harman. They have three children: Linda Kay, 5; Gregory Alan, 3; and Randall Craig, 17 months.

Sister Harman is a member of the P. T. A. and the women's department. Her special interests are reading, writing, and cooking. She says, "I am especially interested in preparing myself to teach and write for the church."

News & Notes

NEW BUILDING

President F. Henry Edwards was in Grand Rapids, Michigan, on July 11 and 12. The trip was made in regard to the new church building.

CAMPUS SERVICE

On July 16 Seventy George A. Njeim spoke at the campus services on the subject, "The Scriptures of the Restoration." This was the first of a series of four sermons by Brother Njeim. The service was in charge of Bishop A. Neal Deaver.

INVITATION TO UNDERSTANDING

Elder Evan Fry, radio pastor, was guest speaker in Odessa, Missouri, on July 16, when all denominations of the city held a community service in the Methodist Church. A crowd of about 2,400 people filled the building.

Previous to the meeting, about fifty members of the priesthood and members of other denominations visited the homes of the community and left invitations to attend the meeting.

GIRLS' CAMPS

Almost three hundred girls attended the Oriole and Blue Bird camps held at Gardner Lake near Excelsior Springs. Two sessions of one week each were held for Oriole girls 11 through 16 years of age, and three overnight sessions for the Blue Bird girls.

Miss Edna Easter of Girls' Headquarters Committee was director for all the camps. Mrs. Rachel Oeser was associate director for the first Oriole camp, and Mrs. Helen Elledge was associate director for the second Oriole camp and for the Blue Bird camps. Carl Mesle, general director of Young People's work, was the business manager and associate director for all camps. He was assisted by Lloyd Hurshman.

The theme for the Oriole camps was "God Is Interested." The theme for the Blue Bird camps was "Zion Builders."

Two Oriole circles from Des Moines, Iowa, were guests for the first sessions of Oriole camp, and one circle from Wichita, Kansas, was guest for the second session.

SANITARIUM AND HOSPITAL

On June 30 the Board of Trustees met in a special session called to review final plans as drawn up by the hospital architect for finishing of the seventh and fifth floor areas of the present building. There were three building projects presented to the board, all of which were given approval for detailed drawings and construction estimates. The seventh floor will be the children's department, part of which will be an isolation ward. Among the improvements to be constructed on the fifth floor will be a new blood bank room, electrocardiograph room, cast room, chaplain's office, and living quarters for four internes. A new building is being built between the old and new hospital buildings adjacent to the heating plant to house repair and maintenance activities that have been handled on the seventh floor.

GIFT OF FLAG

Alex Klein received from his father Moses Klein of Petah-Tikvah the gift of a large flag of Israel. The flag bears Israel's colors of blue and white and has a large blue star of the House of David in the center. Brother Klein was born in Vienna and was brought to this country in 1921 by the late President Frederick M. Smith.

Seek Earnestly the Best Gifts

"Seek ye earnestly the best gifts, always remembering for what they are given; for verily I say unto you, They are given for the benefit of those who love me and keep all my commandments."

—Doctrine and Covenants 46:4.

THE BEST GIFTS. Who knows what the best gifts are, even for himself? What we desire and what is good for us may be very different. The wise parent may not agree with his child who demands a toy, a confection, or an experience. In such a case the decision of the parent must prevail over the wish of the child.

So, too, God may not agree with us as to what is best for us. We earnestly desire many things. We change our requests from day to day. We are not the best judges of what we can manage effectively. In such circumstances, God's will must prevail over ours.

If we recognize this, we say in the end, "Thy will be done."

Some people pray for temporal gifts: they seek money or property or some other things that are considered "wealth" by the world. It is not unworthy to seek such gifts, because in the management of church affairs and in the building of the kingdom of God they are needed. Seeking them is righteous when men and women recognize that they are stewards over such possessions, and must make an accounting of the use of them.

These are good gifts, but they do not have an eternal value. We lose them when we die. Even if one seeks temporal gifts, he should also seek the spiritual graces.

Some people have great need of physical gifts. Afflicted with ill-health, suffering in many ways, they pray for help, relief, and strength. The ordinance of administration to the sick is often requested by people who need and seek the physical gifts.

It is better for them if they also realize that they have spiritual needs and hungers too, and learn to pray for spiritual strength to accompany the physical blessings.

Many people in the church have suffered under severe physical handicaps and have prayed for relief. Some have experienced a steady improvement of health through the years. Some have been quickly healed. Some have been given strength to bear their afflictions. And some, in the divine wisdom, have been taken home. We cannot know what is best in all these cases. It is something we must leave with God.

There are some gifts—the natural gifts—that God has placed within us. Some of these are: a capacity for teaching, for organization, for music, and sometimes for preaching. In seeking our gifts, it is wise to look for what is closest to us or within us. These are our own resources. They offer our richest possibilities of service.

When we have found some such gifts, we have an opportunity to develop them in study, training, and use. "We learn to do by doing," is an old educational axiom. That could be elaborated. We learn to do something better by doing it often. "Practice makes perfect," is another aphorism.

Let those who would teach study education. Those who would organize would do well to study business administration. Musicians will improve their talents in a conservatory. Potential preachers should educate themselves in literature, in the social sciences, and in the church books.

The spiritual gifts are different from the natural gifts. God sends them to us upon particular occasions, and for special purposes. We do not have them all the time. They are not received according to our discretion but according to God's wisdom and purposes.

We may leave our minds open to the coming of inspiration that we may be receptive to it when it comes. But we must have care that we do not put the pressure of undue urgency upon the spiritual gifts, because there is a danger that we will deceive ourselves, or be deceived, and exercise false gifts. This is particularly true of the "sign seekers." To be a sign seeker, as Jesus indicated, is to be in danger.

Some modern religious cults have attempted to found their entire ministry upon the charismatic features of religion, with sensational and harmful results, because they are unbalanced and neglect many of the most important features of Christian life and experience.

Saint Paul devoted the twelfth chapter of First Corinthians to a discussion of spiritual gifts, and concluded it with an admonition that we should "covet earnestly the best gifts." Then, with a short connecting link, he introduced the notable thirteenth chapter on charity and some of the social implications of the gospel.

Those social implications are also strongly expressed in the revelation

Across the Desk

Recently the Saints of Ontario congratulated Bishop John C. Dent and his wife on the completion of Brother Dent's thirty years of service as the Bishop of the Chatham and London Districts. The following letter was addressed to the Saints concerned by President W. Wallace Smith:

TO THE SAINTS ASSEMBLED:

It is not too often that we have an opportunity to express our appreciation of the long and faithful service rendered by our membership, and even when the opportunity presents itself, we are sometimes derelict of our duty in so doing. We think it is particularly fitting that the membership in Ontario has taken this opportunity to assemble in honor of one of our members who has given long and faithful service in his particular field.

When notice of this coming meeting was given to us on our recent visit to Toronto and an invitation to be in attendance, it was with a great deal of disappointment that we had to decline on the grounds of pressing business back at headquarters.

I think the Saints of Ontario are to be congratulated on having received the fine ministry of Bishop Dent, and now since he will no longer be actively in charge, having given way to the appointment of Bishop Baldwin, we feel that his service will in no way be lessened except by the relief of some of the detailed tasks that he has formerly performed.

Our sincere good wishes go to you, Brother Dent, for continued long life and happiness in the work of our Master.

Very sincerely yours,
THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
By W. WALLACE SMITH.

We have now received the following acknowledgment from Brother and Sister Dent:

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
President W. Wallace Smith,
Independence, Missouri.
DEAR BRETHREN:

This will acknowledge, with our most sincere appreciation, your letter to London and Chatham Saints and ourselves and the very kindly thoughts expressed.

Priesthood members and their wives of the two districts met and gave us a beautiful banquet on Monday night. Everything, including your letter, seemed to be said and done to make us happy.

With all the charitable and fine things you and others have said, we feel that whatever our contribution for more than fifty years may have been, it is not more than our Heavenly Father would have expected of us, and we are happy to have had a part in his work.

Your quorum has our continued faith, confidence, and prayers.

Sincerely,

JOHN C. AND MARY [DENT].
(July 8, 1950)

Two letters received from members of the Council of Twelve in the same mail express a spirit of optimism which we are quite sure the brethren will be happy to have shared with readers of the Herald. Elder Percy E. Farrow, in charge of the Southern Mission, writes:

I have been quite happy to find prospects and evidences of growth almost everywhere. This appears to me to be one of the most promising fields in the church. The people are in earnest, loyal to the church, optimistic, and extremely gracious in their acceptance of our ministry. I am especially pleased with the new buildings erected, those being erected, and the plans of those who expect to alter present church edifices or build new ones.

Elder Roscoe E. Davey, apostle in charge of the Australasian Field, says:

We are happy to report that the work here continues on the upward trend. The annual district conference for the Northern New South Wales District was held on May 13 and 14. It proved to be an uplifting conference with a large attendance and a fine spirit of fellowship throughout. The same officers were elected.

The Southern New South Wales District conference was held on the last week end, June 10 and 11. This also was a very fine conference, setting an all-time record for attendance in spite of some of the worst weather this part of Australia has seen in many years.

The United Nations

The following news note from the Saturday Review of Literature of May 11, 1950, tells of an important endeavor to marshal support for the United Nations:

Nearly one thousand institutions in Baltimore—churches, schools, and libraries—now fly the flag of the United Nations every day. This was announced by S. Raymond Dunn, president of the United Nations Citizenship League, which has been fostering an eight-point program to develop habits of world patriotism. Some Baltimore schools have a United Nations flag displayed in every classroom.

This recalls to mind the recent unanimous decision (on April 24, 1950) of the Court of Appeals of California setting aside a state law which made it impossible for aliens ineligible for citizenship to own land in California. The Court of Appeals declared such an act to be in conflict with the Charter of the United Nations, and that since the Charter has the status of a treaty any act in conflict with it is unconstitutional. The decision of the Court of Appeals will be taken before the Supreme Court of California and possibly before the United States Supreme Court. But, in the meantime, the world outlook here displayed is most heartening.

Notice to Contributors

Some have written in asking if contributions to Daily Bread and the Herald are wanted. Good material for these periodicals is always welcome. To help inexperienced writers prepare manuscripts, the editors have drawn up two lists of aids: "Hints for Daily Bread Writers" and "Helps for Writers of Herald Articles." These will be mailed to anyone requesting them.

The Logic of Prayer

By ELBERT A. SMITH

IS PRAYER LOGICAL? The atheist will answer, "No." From his standpoint prayer is illogical because he does not believe there is a God to answer prayer. Believing that there is a God to answer prayer, a Christian finds prayer perfectly logical. The weight of the argument from the beginning is with the believer.

In the Book of Nature, God Challenges Us to Seek Him Out

Putting aside for the moment the written word in the Scriptures, we have in the great book of nature around us prima-facie evidences of the existence of an intelligent, directing, creative power which has always been and is still at work in the universe. Yielding to a natural impulse, from time immemorial, men have sought to find and know and communicate with that intelligent first great Cause. Sir Oliver Lodge, a scientist great enough to preside over the British Association for the Advancement of Science, one time wrote:

Miracles lie all around us; only they are not miraculous. Special Providences envelop us; only they are not special. Prayer is a means of communication as natural as is speech.—Science and Immortality, page 73.

"Where There Is 'Design With Purpose'—a Mind at Work"

Reverting to the statement that there is prima-facie evidence in nature of the existence of an intelligent Creator who designed things with a purpose, I am reminded that some time ago there appeared in the Herald one of the best articles on that thesis that I have ever read. It was entitled, "The Case for God," by Edgar Henry Montross (Herald for January 10, 1948). His primary postulate is summed up in these words: "Remember our rule. Where there is design with purpose, a mind has been at work."

In his presidential address to the British Association, 1913, Lodge made the assertion that life introduces something "purposeful amid the laws of physics."—Continuity, page 79.

For many years it has pleased me to look for the evidence of God at work in nature. I have observed many such evidences to strengthen my faith and make logical the endeavor to approach God through prayer.

Even before the invention of the telescope, David, looking into the starry heavens, said, "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork." He saw God in the heavens. The Book of Covenants says that he who has seen the least of the stars rolling upon its wings in the midst of the power and majesty of God has seen God.

Beecher Versus Ingersoll

A generation ago the greatest infidel was Ingersoll, and the most popular Protestant preacher was Henry Ward Beecher. In spite of their divergent views, these two were friends. There is a story to the effect that Ingersoll called upon Beecher one day in his study and found that Beecher had installed a miniature model of our planetary system so arranged that the motion of the earth and the planets in relation to each other and the sun might be observed. Ingersoll was deeply interested and finally said, "Mr. Beecher, who made this model?"

Beecher looked up with a twinkle in his eye and said, "No one made it! It just happened!" Ingersoll was caught in his own trap. He could look at the starry hosts of heaven moving in majesty and precision and think that perhaps they just happened, but he could not look at that little man-made imitation of the planetary system and think it just happened.

We Live in God's Workshop

We do not need to go as far as the distant stars to see the handiwork of God. T. W. Williams at one time said, "I have seen God three times—once on the mountain, once in the desert, and once by the seashore." We do not need to go even that far from home. We do not need to make a pilgrimage to some holy place to see God at work. We live in his workshop.

We say that we have "seen God," when in reality we mean that we have seen the visible evidence that he is at work—a living, creative, directing personality. But God is a Spirit, and our eyes—being material—see only physical and material things. Nevertheless we do see absolutely undeniable evidences in the handiwork of the invisible Designer and Creator: "Things which are not seen being understood by the things which are made, through his eternal power."—Romans 1:20, Inspired Version.

With this understanding I, too, may say that I have seen God on the mountain, in the desert, and by the seashore, and may use illustrations coming from each of these places.

Desert Blossoms

Barren though our deserts in the western part of the United States may seem, they blossom in early spring with a myriad lovely flowers of many brilliant colors. The thorny cactus rivals all others. I have at home a walking stick made from a tall growing "cholla" variety known as the "cane cactus." The skeleton part of the plant is of fiber, light, hard, and strong. It is hollow, with many diamond-shaped openings on all sides. Stripped of its covering and interior pulp, this skeleton arrangement is seen to employ the principle that strength is found in a hollow column—strength with economy of material. Builders often utilize this principle.

This cactus with the hard frugality of the desert knew how to build itself a strong skeleton structure to stand erect and bear its lovely flowers to make the desert bloom to rival the rose. Artists who paint the desert use care and thought in mixing colors—so did the artist who designed the cactus plant. True, he armed it with thorns to defend itself—not pleasant to us, but designed clearly to preserve the life of the plant. I was reminded of that fact when I cut the stalk for my cane and carelessly permitted it to fall across the back of my left hand. Here was well-planned strength, beauty and fragrance, and the power of self-defense, even in the austere desert. Wherever there is life, there is design; wherever there is design, there is a designer.

Three Witnesses From the Sea

I have on my desk a moonstone which my son Lynn picked up on the beach near Hermosa, California. A moonstone is a very hard, semi-precious stone. This stone is about two inches long and an inch wide. I took it to a lapidarist and had it polished on the underside, making a beautiful jewel; but the interesting feature is on the upper side of the stone. Three small barnacles had clustered together and built their little houses on the top of that precious stone. These were not the barnacles of ill repute that fasten to the hulls of ships. These were little "acorn shell" barnacles that fasten to rocks and timbers along shore. They are a lowly form of life, yet these three came to me out of the ocean with a testimony.

They clearly showed design, and design with a purpose. Their little houses each followed a definite pattern, the form of a tunicated cone—an old geometrical pattern, older than our science of geometry. In each of them were five separate planes forming a circle, tapering towards the top. Their very structure was designed to get the greatest possible strength out of a minimum amount of material. They were fastened to the stone by a powerful cement made after such a formula as a skilled chemist might perfect. The outer shell had a color design in pink and cream color, as definite as the design on your wallpaper.

These little creatures did not know how to develop a formula for cement nor to design a little cone-shaped house to resist the beating of the waves nor how to decorate their walls. Yet here was design with purpose—the purpose being to develop shelter for a living creature; and those little houses had resisted the beating of the waves that washed that bit of moonstone ashore among the rocks and pebbles.

As I held this moonstone in my hand, I thought, "Here are three witnesses, testifying to me that there is a designer in nature who works with a purpose in mind. I had seen the evidence of God at the seashore."

A Pine Cone From the Mountaintop Testifies

Here is an evidence from the mountain. In my study I have a very large pine cone. I secured it perhaps forty years ago, and it came from a pine tree on the San Bernardino range of mountains.

This cone is a little more than a foot in length from stem to tip. It measures twenty inches around at its largest point. It has lost most of the seeds it once bore, having dried out for nearly forty years, but still it weighs three pounds. Such a cone, fully developed, falling from a pine tree and landing upon a man's head would give him something to think about—if he continued to think. It gives something for anyone to think about.

There is evidence of design in this pine cone, built to a geometrical pattern. There was design to the tree that bore it. The stem that supported it had to be designed to a strength to bear the weight of the cone, and the limb to bear the weight of several cones, with increasing strength to the trunk of the tree. The trunk of the tree all the way down was designed to adequately support a mass of weight; while underneath the ground was a spread of roots covering an area at least as wide as the foliage of the tree itself, powerfully anchored in the soil and the rocks to hold aloft that tree in the midst of storm and tempest. From root to branch there was design.

This cone carried about two hundred seeds. Really, they were little edible pine nuts—piñon (penyon) nuts. Each nut had within it the blueprint, the living blueprint, of another pine tree. This cone, and others like it, were sealed over and covered with a resinous varnish which made the cone impervious to moisture. The cones thus protected against the weather could not yield up their seeds for a long time. In fact, I am told that they might hang on the tree or lie on the ground for a period of five or six years. But, if there came a forest fire, devastating the pine woods, the heat would cause the cones to expand and the seeds would be released and fly out in various directions, prepared to start a new forest. When the government plans a project of reforesting the mountains, it takes thought, planning, intelligence, purpose, and will.

The pine cone came to me from the mountaintop speaking of a God who designed a tree in all its parts and designed with a purpose in mind. "Only God can make a tree."

Trees That Plan Ahead

We do not need to go far from home to see evidences of God at work wherever there are trees. Reverting to an experience of my boyhood days that I have related so often it may be familiar to you, there was in the grove on the farm where I lived a big, soft maple tree. Most boys are familiar with the seeds of the soft maple tree.

It was my pleasure in the spring when those seeds were maturing to climb up into this big tree and pluck the seeds and throw them out in the air and watch them whirl away or just sit there and watch them loose themselves and fly away.

A good-sized maple seed is about two and a quarter inches long. The body of the seed is about three fourths of an inch long, and at one end of it there is a blade, something like the blade of an airplane propeller. It is very thin to afford lightness, but it is carefully designed and interlaced with fibers to give it strength. Falling from the tree and caught by a gust of wind, the seed gyrates rapidly and whirls away to a distance and finally drops upon the sod, prepared to bore in and take root.

Even as a boy I saw there was design; the maple seed did not make itself. Someone thought it out, and it was designed with a purpose—the purpose being to get seeds to a distance from the parent tree, in open spaces where they could grow and produce other trees. Talk about miracles! A man could carry some of these seeds home in his pocket and plant them, and in a few years he could point to a row of majestic trees and say, I carried all those trees home in my vest pocket. In each seed there was a living blueprint of another tree.

This designer whose handwork I saw in the tree was the very God that my mother had taught me about and that my father had preached. The desire to become acquainted with him was as natural as the desire to eat when hungry. Here was prima-facie evidence of a God whom I might well seek out through every available avenue, including study and faith, and the open avenue of faith includes prayer.

In the springtime one of the beautiful trees of Southern Missouri and the Ozarks is the dogwood tree when it bursts into blossom. One autumn when I was visiting with my son Ronald at Pittsburg, Kansas, I was looking at some of the dogwood trees he had transplanted. I found that, although it was still early autumn, the buds for the next year were already quite well developed. In other words, the dogwood tree in the autumn of 1947 was looking forward to the spring of 1948 and preparing to burst into blossom. Each blossom would be of a distinctive design—four petals instead of the usual five found on most flowering trees and shrubs. Not only that, each one of those buds had in it already the format of seeds which would be developed. The pattern was there in 1947. The seed would be developed in 1948. It would sprout and take root in 1949. I cannot think of a dogwood tree planning that far ahead, but here was evidence of design, and design looking ahead with a purpose. I could not see the designer. I could see his work, and Paul said, "Things not seen being understood by the things that are made."

The Designer and Creator

Concerning this designer and creator, we are told in the Book of Covenants:

He comprehendeth all things, and all things are before him, and all things are round about him; and he is above all things, and in all things, and is through all things, and is round about all things: and all things are by him, and of him; even God, for ever and ever.— Doctrine and Covenants 85: 10, 11.

The miracle of the seeds of the tree impressed me when I was a boy. I began to see even then that when we attempt to account for the existence of things, especially living things, we have our choice of two alternatives: either they came by design in creation or they came by accident. No one has ever suggested any other possibility. Years later, I was pleased to read after Michael Pupin, one-time president of the American Association for the advancement of science, who said,

We are faced by two alternatives, either the law and order of the universe is the result of haphazard handling or it is the result of a definite intelligence . . . personally, I believe in the divine intelligence . . . when you see a seed growing after a definite plan into a tree . . . can you believe it is the result of haphazard happening? Such a belief is beyond my understanding.

We have then, I say, prima-facie evidence in nature of the existence of an intelligent creative power with whom we may logically seek to establish communication through the avenue of prayer. All down the ages men have sought him in that way.

The Light Which "Quickeneth Understanding"

One more illustration: There is in front of my house in Independence a large elm tree. There are few trees more graceful and beautiful than the American elm. Some years ago an automobile parked up the street broke loose, coasted down the hill, struck the trunk of this tree, and tore away a strip of bark over a foot wide at the base and reaching up the tree perhaps five feet. I felt that this beautiful tree was doomed. But I noticed that almost immediately the tree began to heal itself.

When a house is damaged and we order various materials delivered and begin to replace the bricks or the shingles and the paint, it takes thought. This tree began to assemble materials and build them into place, year by year, until at the end of five years the wound was completely healed over and the destroyed portions had been rebuilt.

Here was design and intelligence working to a purpose. Certainly the tree itself had not that intelligence. How do we account for the processes through which it worked? Perhaps we have at least the beginning of the revelation of the secret of life in the book of Doctrine and Covenants:

... he is in the sun, and the light of the sun, and the power thereof by which it is made. As also he is in the moon, and is the light of the moon, and the power thereof by which it was made. As also the light of the stars, and the power thereof by which they were made. And the earth also, and the power thereof, even the earth upon which you stand. And the light which now shineth, which giveth you light, is through him who enlighteneth your eyes, which is the same light that quickeneth your understanding; which light proceedeth forth from the presence of God, to fill the immensity of space. The light which is in all things; which giveth life to all things; which is the law by which all things are governed; even the power of God who sitteth upon his throne, who is in the bosom of eternity, who is in the midst of all things.—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 2, 3.

This light which lightens our eyes, which quickens our understanding, comes from God and gives life to all things and is the law by which they are governed.

Scientists have made marvelous discoveries recently concerning light. One of them wrote, "Getting down to the ultimate particles which seem . . . to constitute life . . . scientists find them all acting suspiciously like some of the processes of human thought."—Walter W. Russell, president of the Society of Arts and Scientists, in the Associated Press Dispatch, December 30, 1932.

In the illustration I drew, God was at work in the elm tree through the instrumentality of light directing the intelligent processes of healing the wound of the tree, just as he had designed and created it in the first place.

Witnesses Within Our Own Bodies

We do not even need go beyond our own selves to see within ourselves the evidences of design, and design with a purpose in the marvelous human body. Consider the articulated bony structure which enables us to stand and walk; the complicated system of muscles and blood vessels; the human heart—an automatic, dynamic pump, beating regularly about seventy-three times a minute, hour after hour, day after day, year after year, sometimes for a hundred years; the marvelous nervous system by which we feel through the sensory nerves, and the motor nerves by which we direct all the motions of the body; the structure of the eye which enables us to see, though we cannot understand how we see; the brain enthroned under the dome of the cranium, thinking and directing, deciding and choosing, endowed with the ability to think and to feel and to will.

Even in the simplest of those processes there are evidences of design with purpose, and the designer and builder is God. If the creature is thus endowed with reason and the power to think and speak, may he not logically pray to the God who made him?

Logic That a Child May Understand

I was talking to a class of children at one of our reunions and using some large pictures for illustration. I was speaking on this very subject. One picture showed a boy busy painting a barn door. On the door were hinges heavy enough to support the door. I called the attention of the children to those hinges and said, "Do you think someone made those hinges, or did they just happen to be there?" The answer was very prompt. Someone made the hinges; someone thought them out. I said, "How about the hinges in the elbows of the boy who is doing the painting? Who designed them?" With one voice they answered, "God." The proposition is so simple that a little child can understand it. There is nothing more logical in science or philosophy or logic itself.

The Impulse to Seek the Creator in Prayer Is Logical

It is, then a fact that we have prima-facie evidence in the book of nature of the existence of God, and there is in us an impulse to seek him out. One inspired writer said, "He that would come unto him must believe that he is." On a very elementary plane we have evidences in nature that he is, and we have in our hearts the impulse to believe, and so Alma made that the basis of the beginning of our search for God. He said, "If you can no more than desire to believe, let that desire work in you." So great a psychologist as James one time wrote a textbook entitled, The Will to Believe. He held that it is logical to seek to believe and to will to believe.

The will to believe is affirmative and constructive, and it opens up avenues into all sorts of research and progress. The will to disbelieve is negative, and it shuts up the avenues through which we might seek to know the truth, closing our minds and our hearts.

Atheism is negative and destructive. All progress in science and in invention has been made by those who willed to believe. "Seek and you shall find" is a truth—as true in logic as it is in the Bible. The incandescent light, the aeroplane, radio, radar, the great discoveries in chemistry and medicine and surgery, all of these have been made by men who believed in something not yet seen. With the will to believe, they pressed forward and found the thing for which they sought. In such manner astronomers have found stars and planets which had never before been seen but which they believed they would find.

Seeking Higher Planes of Revelation

Starting with the prima-facie evidences of the existence of God that we see in nature, we may move forward to the further revelation of Deity that we have in the Scriptures as given through the prophets and apostles who sought him in prayer. We see him at work in nature but we do not obtain satisfactory revelation of his will concerning us. That will is unfolded to us in his revealed word which enjoins upon us the duty and gives us the privilege to approach God in prayer, addressing him as "our Father who art in heav-

Brave From Excess of Grief

By CLEO HANTHORNE MOON

CALLIE B. STEBBINS

NIOBE WAS THE DAUGHTER of a certain Tantalus, King of Phrygia, as every student knows. She was happily married to Jupiter's son Amphion, and they had seven stalwart sons and seven blooming daughters—enough to make any wife and mother proud! Niobe, unfortunately, was vociferous in her pride, and the goddess Diana, according to the Greek myth, aimed a fatal arrow at each of Niobe's seven sons. Amphion, overwhelmed, destroyed himself.

"Bereaved as I am," Niobe yet boasted, "I am still rich." The indignant Diana sounded her bow again, and struck terror into all hearts except Niobe's alone. "She was brave from excess of grief," says Gayley, the narrator. "Then Niobe en." It reveals to us something about his purposes in us and in the universe—all that we need to know by which to plan our lives.

The universe was not accidental, and it is not without purpose; and through the written word we may come to pray more intelligently, more logically approach and understand this God whose handiwork we see all about us. We come to know that prayer has justified itself as a logical expression on the part of man of his desire to work with and for his Creator.

sat desolate among her sons, daughters, husband—all dead—and seemed torpid with grief. The breeze moved not her hair, no color was on her cheek, her eyes glared fixed and immovable, there was no sign of life about her. She was changed to stone, within and without. Yet tears continued to flow; and borne on a whirlwind to her native mountain, she still remains, a mass of rock from which a trickling stream flows, the tribute of her never-ending grief."

I know a lady who, like Niobe, lost all she had. True, there were only three lovely daughters, and a devoted husband, but the loss was complete. Nor was it swift, like Niobe's loss, but over a period of thirty years, with joy and hope between, and grief and scars mingled. Her name is Callie B. Stebbins, and she lives, in her ninety-second year, in Lamoni, Iowa. The tribute to her never-ending grief is her never-faltering, invigorating faith, a monument to the one true God.

I draw a contrast from, rather than a comparison to, the Niobe story. Mrs. Stebbins was not ungrateful, nor boastful, though she was mindful of the love of her husband, and the beauty of her children, and the child saintliness of little Helen. As the poet Landor put the words into Niobe's mouth,

May not a mother in her pride repeat
What every mortal said.

Still, Mrs. Stebbins did not at any time, from 1879, when she married Elder Henry A. Stebbins in Burlington, Iowa, until his death in Lamoni in 1920, give selfish thought to her own family alone. She gave herself wholeheartedly to teaching the Jesus story to children, as circumstances permitted her, from the time she became a church member as Clara B. Sellon when she was seventeen, until as Callie B. Stebbins, her health broke when she was sixty. And in the thirty years since then she has sought avidly for ways to do church work from her bed, from her chair, and when she could be about with frail steps.

GRIEF WEARS MANY GARBS. It hides behind the veils of stony woe, as did Niobe. It escapes under the shroud of oblivion as did Amphion. Or it buckles on the whole armor of God, taking above all the shield of faith, praying always with supplication in the Spirit, as Callie B. Stebbins did.

Alfred Lord Tennyson, baffled by grief when his friend Arthur Hallam died, sought gropingly for seventeen years before he came to a renewed, understanding faith in God. Thereafter, he became a spiritual counselor to his generation. Callie B. Stebbins, with a stancher undergirding of belief, did not grope but with each new grief turned with greater reliance toward the Lord.

"Baby Ruth was the first to go," she told me, when I probed into her intimate story. "My faith did not fail me, but I was so stricken with the loss of my baby that Sister Dancer said I never looked the same after." Ruth died at one year, when Helen was nine. "The little baby, six months old, was born and died after Helen was gone. Our Helen was such a dear little Latter Day Saint, and I lived in her development. Every year a child stays in the home makes it that much harder to give it up. At the last Helen said, 'Mama, I am all you have, and I hate to leave you, but I think I have to die.

You have told me that love is the greatest thing in the world, and now I know it is.' She also said that the Lord seemed so near she felt as if she could put out her hand and touch him. She asked that I stay near her so she wouldn't be afraid to die. As she turned, I went from one side of the bed to the other, smiling at her and giving her all the comfort I could.

"And then the Lord comforted me. After the funeral I was much alone, but I was upheld so I could sing, 'O grave, where is thy victory. O death where is thy sting?' This lasted for a week or more, and then I was left more to myself, and the hurt lasted for many months. I felt as if my heart was in a vice, with actual pressure so I could hardly take a deep breath. Finally, by getting out and helping others, I became relaxed. Then as I found time on my hands, more than was needed for my homework, I asked the Lord what I could do to help in his work. Soon the woman's organization in the church, the Daughters of Zion, was started, and I was elected secretary. From that time on I was busy, preparing the readings for the meetings, partly original, partly selected. Other work followed. . . . When Brother Stebbins went, he had suffered so much I could not wish him back. I knew I must go on alone, but under the Lord's promise to the widow or orphan."

PRODUCT OF A YOUNGER GENERATION, more and more scientific in its approach to circumstances and designs of life, I kept an undercurrent of thought whenever I talked with Callie B. Stebbins, and whenever I read her notes. I kept asking, "What are the components of this woman's patience—her devotion, her determined wholesomeness of thought? What are the ingredients of a state of mind in which faith is a reflex to all the poundings and gashes of life? Whence came such a sense of security?"

As with a psychologist's point of view, I looked to her early life. She was the daughter of William Rivers Sellon, a court reporter and a member of the Episcopal church until converted to the Latter Day Saint church by his wife, whom he was attempting to claim from her error of belief. Callie was a middle child between two girls. She had a brother who died young. At seventeen she started teaching a class of intermediate boys in Sunday school.

Symptomatic of the trend of her mind from childhood is the motto she took to herself when she was young. She paraphrased the words of Saint John, "I have set to my seal that God is true." She made that, she said, the anchor of her life. Before she was twenty, she told the Lord on her knees of her desire to serve him, and then, as later and more specifically in her great grief, she set her ear to listen for his voice of direction.

In all the incidents of her life that Sister Stebbins related, these two principles persist: belief in God and the desire to serve. They were not passive statements, for words are thin and capture no security. They were positive substance, recurring guides that built of her life a fortress against all the woes that came. The more I talked with Callie B. Stebbins, the more I probed into her life, and the more relentlessly I sought to know the make-up of the character of this woman so poised, so serene, so young in her ninety-second year, the more I learned of the make-up of faith itself. One becomes convinced not only that grief and pain and deprivation and disillusionments have failed to move Mrs. Stebbins from her anchorage in faith, but that nothing in this world can ever move her. Faith has conquered all fear. Here is the security of unshaken and unalterable certainties.

Her infancy shaped her to a philosophy which she enunciated for herself in her youth, "I have set to my seal that God is true." She dedicated herself in harmony with her belief and relied as she still relies on the direction of the Lord in answer to her prayers. That is the core around which Callie B. Stebbins integrated her character. It was a strong core, so mature that she could never outgrow it or transcend it, and it made possible the building of a serene life. That is oneness of mind. That is peace of mind and soul, so illusive in our day—so lost, so coveted.

FORTUNATE THE VILLAGE that has a Callie B. Stebbins. She is the still voice of the world mother—"the woman of valor who possesses the emotional equipment with which to inspire her family and whose historic patience is needed in the crisis of our time." She is a psychiatrist without fee. She is faith for the visual-minded. Disappointments, ill-health, cares, nor great grief could turn her to Niobe's weeping stone. Rather, she must have met grief as Sir Aubrey de Vere advised:

Grief should be
Like joy, majestic, equable, sedate, Confirming, cleansing, raising, making free;
Strong to consume small troubles; to commend Great thoughts, grave thoughts, thoughts lasting to the end.

All things, including grief, Sister Stebbins transmuted in the crucible of her own harmonious spirit to indestructible faith and persistent will to serve to the end of her life. Her service has not been spectacular, but it has been constructive and continuous. By it she has glorified the art of living. She has lived a design in the grace of the Christian way of life. May her life be longer still, for knowing her is sharing in her rich service.

DISCERNMENT

Dear God, give us strength to accept with serenity the things that cannot be changed. Give us courage to change the things that can and should be changed. And give us wisdom to distinguish one from the other.—Attributed to Admiral Hart.

Our Negro Problem — BY MAY RICHARD HAMM

God made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on the face of the earth.—Acts 17: 26.

WHY SHOULD we have a Negro problem in our church? We welcome into our membership the people of other races and nationalities, yet some of us can't stand a Negro even if he is seven-eighths white. Why?

Let's take stock of ourselves. Why do some white people so dislike Negroes? Could it be cause the white race has abused and mistreated the Negroes for so long? Slavery is more degrading to the master than to the slave. The sins of the fathers are to be visited on the children to the third and fourth generations.—Deuteronomy 5: 9. The fathers have eaten sour grapes and the children's teeth are on edge.—Ezekiel 18: 12. Could it be that as children of our slave-driving fathers our teeth are on edge?

Did you ever mistreat someone and then find that, even though he held no grudge against you, it was difficult for you to like him? Let's take ourselves to task. Maybe we are at fault. Anyway the Lord expected us to teach the gospel to the Negroes when he said to teach all nations. The Negro has the same promise as we have if he obeys the gospel law—the promise that he will become a joint heir with Jesus Christ. Let us forget about the sins of Cain and Ham. Christ died to save them and their descendants just as he died to save us from our father's sins and our own sins. If the gospel hasn't done much for the Negroes, it could be because we haven't told them about it! They haven't applied it in their lives because we haven't applied it in our own lives. Negroes are usually deeply religious. Perhaps the reason for many of their strange ideas and practices is the result of their not having been taught any better. In less than one generation from slavery, it has been demonstrated that they can learn music, science, art—anything they have a chance to learn.

THE LORD said we should be careful about ordaining Negroes to the priesthood. Why? Because he knew white men. If we ordained Negroes and then left them to their own devices, their religious practices would soon probably revert to a primitive type of voodooism. We can't expect the Negro to develop spiritual discernment by hearing a few sermons. (Discernment is a spiritual gift, but it comes only through long experience, instruction, and study.) God has never said that Negroes were unfit to hold the priesthood—only that their education in the priesthood should be carefully supervised. The same sort of education that will make an elder out of a white boy can make an elder out of a Negro boy. And we must admit that white men of the priesthood who are sent to work among the Negroes should have a double portion of the mind of Christ with special discernment to enable them to raise up persons capable of ministering to their own race.

Most of our ministry is to our own people, our family, our friends, our neighbors. Only a few great souls cross the boundary line between the races, or for that matter only a few will minister to another congregation or group besides their own little circle. Negroes should be taught to develop their own social affairs and to build up their own group activities that make a unified working unit. This is not segregation but practical administration.

There is room in our study classes only for those who desire to prepare themselves to be of service to others. Shouldn't we do everything we can to instruct the men and women who desire to prepare themselves to be of service to their own and other races?

Latter Day Saints should be above having a "Negro problem."

Stake President Robert Farnham presents a brick to Clara Allen and Vern L. Deskin

"Brick Night"

AN UNUSUAL AND UNIQUE idea was carried out in Lamoni Branch recently. The idea originated with the Branch Building Committee as a campaign to raise funds by selling bricks for the new church. The plan was put into effect on Memorial Day, May 30, which was the first anniversary of clearing the church park of trees and bushes in order that construction could begin.

Preparation for this event began with a union prayer service for the congregation on May 3, with the theme, "We Build the Wall." The response was very heartening.

The next phase began about the middle of May when 100 people were asked to volunteer to carry a brick, equipped with a rope handle, everywhere they went. It soon was a familiar sight in Lamoni to see people carrying bricks to advertise "Brick Night" and telling their friends and neighbors about it.

The bricks sold for 5 cents each. The sum of $4,650.11 was taken in at the sale, which pays for 92,842 bricks. This leaves 21,158 more bricks to be sold, and contributions are still coming in. A board representing the wall of the church has been placed in the bank at Lamoni with paper bricks pinned to it. Each paper brick represents 1,000 actual bricks or $50.00. When the board is filled, enough money will have been raised to buy all the brick for

The brick being used is called hydraulic press brick and is buff in color. It is formed from clay found 300 feet underneath the earth's surface and mined liked coal.

The Way Back -

The Story of One Woman's Fight to Overcome Alcoholism

Before I became an alcoholic, I had studied to be a concert pianist. I had high ideals and dreamed of comforting a suffering humanity with my music.

Many unfortunate circumstances led to my playing in night clubs and barrooms to earn a living. I commercialized and prostituted my God-given talent, and the only consolation I have now is that I thought it was all for a good purpose.

It seems inevitable to me that I became an alcoholic. I wanted to prove to myself and the world that God can bring good from evil; for each time, on the brink of disaster, God pulled me back from utter destruction. After many sordid experiences came sobriety, which I have maintained for over two years, and I can testify to all who are helpless and seeking relief, that God does have the power to save. "Man's helplessness is God's opportunity."

After twenty years of drinking, I found a "way of life" in Alcoholics Anonymous. There are no initiation fees, no dues, no rules. What I write is my own interpretation of the AA program and how I have applied it. It does not necessarily express the views of other members.

While AA is not a religious organization, I attribute my success to this time to the fact that I have delved deeply into the spiritual phase of the program. One must come to believe in a power greater than himself, which power to most of us is God.

I was more fortunate than some to come to AA. While I have always believed in God, many believe merely in the group as having greater power than themselves. Group therapy is very helpful to the new member, but I firmly believe anyone who stays in AA long enough will come to believe in God, depending of course on the progress of his spiritual growth.

There are thousands of us, sober and sane and restored to our families—many even to their churches and God—through the efforts of AA. It is not a curative measure, but able only to arrest the disease of alcoholism. Its program would be of great use as a practical education in churches and schools as a preventative measure. To me, it is preparatory work, which conditions the minds of people to accept God.

Alcoholics are found in most churches because they are not taught these principles in a way that will reach their understanding. How tragic and ironic to find that these principles are the same ones taught by Jesus Christ.

The first step—to admit one is powerless over alcohol—is the most difficult for many. I took that step over a year before I even heard of AA. I was praying to God for deliverance and drinking every night and day. The more I prayed, the more I drank; the more I drank, the more I prayed. But God had waited on me a long time, so it was my turn to wait on him.

I was baptized into the Reorganized Church when I was nine and had experienced two miracle healings, so I knew God could free me from alcohol and redeem my soul. Since the third day I came into AA, I have not desired a drink, nor have I had one, which is amazing to most AA members.

I had reached the "black-out" stage—a kind of amnesia and the beginning of a "wet" brain and incurable insanity. I worked in a place of business, meeting the public, even making change, yet I never remembered even being there. I've seen empty bottles around me and wondered who drank all that alcohol. When people told me I had, I couldn't believe it.

I was ready and anxious for God to remove all my defects of character. I believed with all my heart and soul that he could and would save me.

I turned my life, my will over to his care and sought, through prayer and meditation, to improve my conscious contact with him, praying only for guidance and knowledge of his will and the power to carry it out. I lacked the power to manage my own life. Since I had failed so utterly, it was a relief to get my wrecked life out of my own hands, to be rid of it, and turn it all over to God. It's surprising how much better he does all the things I could never do.

I admitted to God, myself, and to another human being the exact nature of my wrongs in an effort to be free from guilt; and I tell others in an effort to help find relief.

I made a list of all persons I had wronged and became willing to make direct amends wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.

The hardest task of all was to start at the beginning of my life and try to take a complete moral and fearless inventory. I began to weed out, one by one, every negative trait of my character and reconstruct a new being, instilling positive thinking and action.

I had to have honesty, an open mind, and humility. I had honesty towards others, but I had deluded myself.

Humility was just a word to me. I knew practically nothing of its meaning. But I was bankrupt—financially, spiritually, almost mentally. So I listened to someone else for the first time in my life. Why not? I had everything to gain. Away went false pride. I, who had had such beautiful ideals, have ended in a state of degradation. But, thank God, I no longer look down toward another who has fallen. I no longer reach down to help, only out. I have no attitude of self-righteousness.

Love, manufactured by my own power of will is, at its best, selfish and dominating. I now try to think of myself as a channel through which God's love may flow toward another. I must keep that channel unblocked by my own will. In my zeal and concern, I must not vaunt my love to force and drive or change another. Rather, I must "let go and let God" change and mold him to the divine will. After I have prayed, loved, and understood, God will do for another whatever I can't do.

I no longer tyrannize, for my will, emboldened by alcohol, became the strength of the Devil. Such pseudo-power often comes to the insane, or the angry and temporarily insane, or those whose minds are paralyzed by alcohol.

Instead of living today—just twenty-four hours at a time, I lived tomorrow, next week, next year—even planning old-age security. I hadn't understood how futile the plans of men are or that the only security comes of God. I have learned this by putting first things first. I have learned not to hurry, worry, or procrastinate, thereby avoiding waste, nervous tension, and impatience. I have learned that today can be good, and that enough todays lived well make a better future. I need not even worry about eternity; for it has always been and is even now.

Perhaps the trait most difficult to admit is hatred, which was and is always rooted in resentment, self-pity, intolerance, and envy. Here there is more irony and doubtful humor. The people I hated were not even aware of it, and I hurt no one but myself.

I began ridding myself of this disease of hatred by asking God to bless the one I hated most. At first I choked on the words. Weeks later the prayer came easier. Much later, to my surprise, I found I meant all I said. I tried it again and again on other hatreds and it worked. God can and will remove our shortcomings wherein we are too weak, if we are only willing to accept his will.

Besides being a program of faith, AA is one of repentance in action. I must make an inventory daily in striving to overcome. I have come a long way and have yet far to go. It is a rugged way, and I have not conquered all, but I'm gaining new heights because I have cast my burden on the Lord and accepted his yoke.

Yes, I've been discouraged. I have had to learn to strive for better health without depending on alcohol for relief of pain. I no longer seek escape from reality but face my problems and try to solve them. An alcoholic is always an escapist.

I came to the city alone to fight this battle with the help of AA. I was unable to enter an alcoholic hospital where the way could have been made easier. For weeks I could not find my way around the corner—just two blocks to Main Street—without asking direction every few steps. In reading I could barely grasp a page at a time.

I suffered tortures of mental and physical anguish. I had been in AA two weeks when in my hotel room on the fourth floor, I suddenly became afraid to stay in the room or leave it. Though I had no wish to take my life, my eyes were irresistibly drawn toward the window. I think I would have gone mad had there not been a telephone in the room. The few minutes I waited for someone from AA to answer was forever. I was in hysterics—just a small sample of what I endured for weeks. My brain was swollen, my face and body bloated, my skin discolored, my eyes small specks. I would frantically and incessantly try to remove the spots, but they were within. Only God could make them white again.

It is discouraging to have to overcome habits of a lifetime, to confess to a world that does not always understand, to start among strangers to cultivate new friends, to find a place back in society and the church. But there are those who believe in administering to the poor and needy in spirit who hunger and thirst for righteousness. I thank God for their prayers and for my mother who prayed faithfully through the years. I am grateful for the AA members who met me at the bus station and the others who helped me. I rejoice in the mercy and love and grace of our Heavenly Father.

After a few months sobriety I came to the realization that I am blessed with a husband who is a prize among men. With God taking first place in our lives, we are finding peace at last. On our upward way, we ask for your prayers for a safe journey.

I am indeed sorry, but I must ask to be

How to Avoid the Drink Trap

Develop some form of self-expression.

Cultivate some means of winning the approval of others; unselfish service is perhaps the best way.

Face up to unpleasant realities, don't run away from them.

If you have the "blues," just remember that everybody has them at times. You can't feel on top every day.

Remember that while it is bad to fool other people, it is even worse to fool yourself.

Remember that you can refuse the first drink, but you may not be able to refuse the second.

You don't have to drink because others drink; nobody will resent it if you say, "No."

If you are in a group where drinks are being passed around, ask for orange juice or a cup of coffee or a glass of buttermilk, according to where you are and what the social situation is.

Remember that you owe yourself plenty of fresh air, a moderate amount of exercise, and a variety of well-cooked food.

Be content if you can; if you can't, join Scarlett in saying, "I'll think about that, tomorrow."

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. Address questions to Herald Editors rather than panel members. We shall try to take all questions in the order they are received. Be patient, there may be several ahead of yours. Only signed questions sent by contributors will appear here.—EDITOR.

QUESTION:

Do those who die without law have an opportunity for celestial glory, or is the terrestrial glory the highest they can obtain?

California

K. E.

ANSWER:

And again, we saw the terrestrial world . . . Behold these are they who died without law; and also they who are the spirits of men kept in prison, whom the Son visited, and preached the gospel unto them, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, who received not the testimony of Jesus in the flesh, but afterwards received it.—Doctrine and Covenants 76: 6.

The complete sixth verse is apparently referring to four different groups instead of one class, composing the terrestrial world. First, those who died without law. Second, spirits who were in prison whom Christ visited and to whom the gospel was preached resulting in their being assigned to the terrestrial world. Third, honorable men of the earth who were deceived by the craftiness of men. Fourth, those who are not valiant in the testimony of Jesus.

There are no Scriptural statements which definitely say that the inhabitants of the terrestrial world are eligible for promotion to celestial salvation; but it is definitely stated in the seventh verse, regarding the inhabitants of the celestial world, "They shall be servants of the Most High, but where God and Christ dwell, they cannot come, worlds without end."

C. ED. MILLER.

QUESTION:

Is there any difference in meaning between "those who die without law," and those who die without a knowledge of the gospel?

California

K. E.

ANSWER:

No. The gospel is the only law by which men can be saved with celestial salvation.

C. ED. MILLER.

QUESTION:

Can those who die without a knowledge of the gospel inherit celestial glory?

California

K. E.

ANSWER:

The fact that Christ preached the gospel to those in prison is evidence that men have the right to be judged "according to men in the flesh." If men can be saved without obeying the gospel, why preach it? To fully cover the subject, the pre-existence of man must be considered, and that would require several pages of the Herald.

C. ED. MILLER.

QUESTION:

Do children who die before eight years old, or the years of accountability, have an opportunity for celestial glory?

California

K. E.

ANSWER:

Christ's atonement saves little children in the kingdom of God. In Matthew 19: 14, 15, Jesus says, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not for of such is the kingdom of heaven, and he laid his hands on them." Mark says, "And he took them up in his arms, and put his hands upon them, and blessed them." When Christ came to these continents after his resurrection, he established his church among the people. There were disputations among his followers, some claiming little children should be baptized. This was Christ's instruction to his church, "Little children are whole, for they are not capable of committing sin; wherefore the curse of Adam is taken from them in me, that it hath no power over them."—Book of Mormon, page 769: 9.

C. ED. MILLER.

QUESTION:

Once the soul has passed from this life, can the prayers of the living affect or change his destiny, or does each individual determine his own destiny?

Minnesota

E. F.

ANSWER:

Never at any time has the Lord commanded or advised his followers to pray for the dead or to offer gifts or perform any works, or for the church to conduct special services in their behalf. Nothing that man on earth may do can change the character or status of one departed from this life. His record is made and in the hands of the great Judge of all. Every man determines his own destiny and will be judged according to his own works done in this life, and not for any works others may do for him, or for works done in the spirit world. A man's works here determine his assignment made at death to one of the four divisions for humanity to inherit described in Doctrine and Covenants 76: celestial, terrestrial, telestial, or perdition.

CHARLES FRY.

we have quoted above. The gifts are not bestowed to satisfy anybody's pride, curiosity, or vanity. A gift is not intended exclusively for the one who receives it. We see, between the lines and overshadowing them, a great word looming significantly, "Others."

We see, too, that the gifts are for practical consequences in the lives of people. They are not simply to be enjoyed. They are to be used in service.

Among the spiritual gifts, it is good to observe the order in which Paul listed them: 1. wisdom; 2. knowledge; 3. faith; 4. healing; 5. miracles; 6. prophecy; 7. discernment; 8. tongues; 9. interpretation. There are many people who passionately desire number 6, when what they so very obviously and urgently need is number 1.

And in I Corinthians 13, Paul declares that none of the gifts are of any merit unless we have charity (or love, as modern translations put it). And that statement is emphatically confirmed in Doctrine and Covenants 11: 4.

Finally, in the use of all spiritual gifts, Paul admonishes, "Let everything be done in a proper and orderly way." L. J. L.

God Was My Partner - By GEORJEAN HARMON

WHAT ABOUT THE POISON IVY? And if it's damp the mosquitoes will certainly be bad. Do you suppose the baby's feeding schedule will work out all right?"

These were my husband's queries when we first talked of taking our three children, ages five and three years, and seventeen months, to the district reunion. My own unspoken question was "Will my nonmember husband, after concentrated exposure to doctrine he doesn't embrace, find compensation to justify my asking him to spend his one vacation week of the year at reunion?"

It seemed that God and I must go into partnership to find a satisfactory answer to each of these questions.

Fortunately, a favorable preview of the reunion grounds and my husband's love for out-of-door living removed barrier number one. A second barrier was to be erected or eliminated by his employer. We put in a request for a vacation coinciding with reunion week, and the testing of my faith and patience began. Weeks went by, and still we didn't know whether his vacation would come at the right time or not.

In the meantime, I made tentative plans to take ages three and five to reunion by train and leave age seventeen months with friends at home if my husband couldn't go with us in the car. Then came an unforeseen obstacle—pregnancy nausea! Would it be worth while to attempt to go when under favorable home conditions I was so uncomfortable? Yet how could I let five-year-old and three-year-old be disappointed? Already they had confided enthusiastically to our friends and neighbors, "We're going to reunion. We're going to sleep in a tent?" Each day I answered the query, "Mommy, how many more days after tomorrow?"

And still we waited for the important information as to my husband's vacation time. Although uncertain in so many ways about reunion plans, my husband started to repair our 1935 Chevrolet. It was not roadworthy, and soon it was apparent that the task could not be completed in the days remaining. Now we had to lean on God for time, transportation, and greater incentive to offset my physical discomfort.

FIVE DAYS before reunion my husband had to remind his employer that he had requested the following week for vacation time. Pleasantly and simply the answer came, "Yes, you may have the week off."

God's voice speaking? I think so.

Perhaps we should all plan to go by train—but could we manage the expense? By now we had a twelve-year-old summer visitor who also wanted to attend reunion. Three adults' and one child's fare seemed quite a sum for us in addition to reunion expenses. And wouldn't it be a task to send all our equipment by train?

Four days before reunion was to open, we were invited to ride with friends who had car space for us and ample trailer space for our equipment. God is a good partner. He assumes the greater share of responsibility.

Surely with barriers being removed one by one, my own condition wouldn't remain the obstacle to disappoint five other persons besides myself. After consultation with the doctor, I decided we were going to reunion.

THEN CAME MORE preparation—a change of clothing for each day for six persons: fifty-four changes of clothing! (We came home with at least one-third of it unused.) There were diapers for the baby, blankets and sheets for six beds, towels and wash cloths, first-aid equipment, soap, and toothbrushes. Six grocery cartons crowded the living room—a box for belongings of each of us—two large containers of bedding, a small tub for washing baby clothes, and a few cans of baby food for emergency feeding.

Rain, a steady downpour, started the morning we were to leave. Discouraged?—Not us, although we did begin to wonder how we'd manage if many such rains came during the week of camping. But packed we were, and packed we would stay until we moved into our tent ninety miles away.

FOR NINE DAYS we lived at the foot of a timbered hill. What a joy it was to be relieved of all food preparation except carrying a well-filled tray from the serving counter to the table. The discomfort I had felt at home was greatly minimized during our stay at reunion, and I am sure this is one good reason why. The nights were sharply chill, but delightful—after we'd borrowed several more blankets. Only a few hours one night did the mosquitoes bother us. There was no rain, and the days were warm and sunny. There was only one day when temperatures soared above the comfort level.

But better than these pleasures was the joy of renewing and forming fine friendships and the opportunity for recreation and attendance in classes and services directed toward our spiritual, intellectual, and physical growth.

Ages three and five acquired increased vocabularies derived from scriptural lessons; the lessons were re-emphasized by interesting handcraft. Their musical repertoire grew to include "The Old, Old Path," "Onward to Zion," "The Beautiful City of God," and other hymns. It is a joy to hear them sing.

Age twelve introduced us to a glimpse of early adolescent fun, activity, and fellowship of which we were unaware.

Age seventeen months just played in the sunshine and consumed almost double his usual volume of food. He did give the nursery director and his daddy a few bad hours by choosing reunion week to erupt two lower molars.

Provocative classes under able leadership, and splendid sermons each evening helped adults to understand their privilege and imperative responsibility after covenanting with God to be a part of the Restoration Movement. We were able to reaffirm our belief, realize our responsibility, and recognize the Spirit of God as it moves in us when we are in a receptive condition.

BEST OF ALL, perhaps, was the warm glow of fellowship generated during the prayer services. The inspirational prayers and the interchange of testimonies elevated us to a higher plane of understanding. Although we heard no utterances from the ministry prefaced by "Thus saith the Spirit," there was no disappointment in the hearts of those who felt "The Spirit of God Like a Fire Is Burning," for we knew that only this spirit could create such warmth and unity.

We're home now, and not one of us is afflicted with poison ivy. We are anticipating many pleasant moments of reflection on our reunion experiences. As we were unloading the trailer this afternoon, one of our neighbors called, "Have a nice vacation?" and my nonmember husband quickly replied, "Wonderful—just wonderful!"

With God as my partner, I should have known it would be.

This Thing I Do - By MRS. M. A. McCONLEY

Part 2

IN THE PROCESS of evaluating and checking up on ourselves and our families, we soon find that another qualification for being a good steward is that of thrift. The careful use of all things in the home—clothing, bedding, furniture, and equipment—is not stinginess or penuriousness; it is just good management.

Prevention of waste is a must for everyone who desires to be a steward for God. One of the glaring national sins of America is that of waste. A visitor from abroad was heard to say, "I am astounded at the waste of food I see in America. When I think of the millions of hungry people in Europe, I could sit down and weep." It is not that people are deliberately wasteful but rather, because of the abundance of everything, they have developed careless habits.

Another reason is that thriftiness has come to be considered "old fashioned" by some people. Jesus did not consider it so, when, after performing the miracle of feeding the five thousand people, he said to his disciples, "Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost." It is so easy in everyday life to forget "the fragments." Because of this attitude of carelessness, and because many people have unsound ideas of economics, waste has become a community and national sin in America.

For instance, in certain western lumber-producing states, large lumber companies would not take the time to cut trees less than two feet in diameter, and by dragging in the big trees with steel cables and steam engines they completely destroyed all smaller trees and vegetation. When they had finished taking out the big trees, there was utter desolation in the entire area where they had worked. Finally, after many years, laws were passed preventing this method of logging, and a program of conservation was established. Public opinion went against such flagrant waste.

GOOD STEWARDS in the sight of God will lend their influence in public opinion against waste in anything, and they will support conservation and care of all of God's gifts to humanity in the form of natural resources such as coal, oil, gas, water, and rich food-producing soil. And when food has been produced, it will not be destroyed to keep prices high. Good stewards will protest public waste and extravagance wherever it is found, whether in the immediate community or in the nation.

One may say, "My stewardship concerns my own private affairs and nothing else." But that is not true. The larger aspects of stewardship include responsibility to the community. We are our brother's keeper. Jesus might have said the fragments left by those five thousand strangers were no concern of his, but he didn't. Instead he said, "Gather up the fragments . . . that nothing be lost." He set the example of public conservation. But in considering thrift and conservation in the larger affairs of community and state, we must not forget the need for personal and family thrift in the home.

IT IS SO EASY to be wasteful in the process of everyday living without realizing it. There is an old saying that "A woman can throw more out the back door with a teaspoon, than a man can put in the front door with a scoop shovel." This is a quaint way of saying that waste in little things can undermine an otherwise adequate income. For instance, an average loaf of bread will cut into sixteen slices; if the crust on each end is thrown away, it means that 12½ per cent of the loaf is wasted. If small pieces of bread are added together to make the equivalent of a whole slice, there will be another 6¼ per cent waste, or 18¾ per cent waste in one loaf.

If the equivalent of two tablespoonfuls of butter from a pound is wasted in little bits here and there, it means that 12½ per cent of the pound is wasted. No firm could stay in business if its books showed a continual waste of 12 to 18 per cent of its stock.

Just as a slow leak in a tube, although almost imperceptible and often very hard to find, slowly but surely deflates the tire, so it is with small wastes in the home; they slowly but surely "deflate" the family income.

There are many kinds of "slow leaks" in the home. Throwing away leftover foods—a cupful of this and a half cupful of that—instead of using them for another meal is a common one. Household magazines and cookbooks are full of interesting recipes for using left overs.

Leaving lights on in rooms when they are not being used; using larger bulbs than are necessary (for example, using a hundred watt bulb in a hallway where a forty watt would do); heating an electric iron just to iron a few handkerchiefs; failing to turn the heat down on electric stoves as soon as food that is cooking has reached the boiling point; leaving fans and electric heaters running when they are not needed—these are all "slow leaks" of waste and will run up the electricity bill.

And then there are those leaky faucets—plus the careless and wasteful use of water—that can run up the water bill so fast. If hot water is wasted, the cost of heating it will run up the electric or gas bill as well. During the last few years many communities and large areas in different countries have been warned by authorities that water is being used excessively and wastefully to such an extent that the natural reserves are getting dangerously low.

Another careless and unwise habit that will deflate the family income is that of buying too much and too often on credit. There is a proper time and place for credit buying, but it is for the major investments, such as a home or furniture. Small luxuries or gadgets or fads that may strike one's fancy should never be bought on the time payment plan. Some families have a number of monthly payments to make on different credit accounts, with carrying charges on each one. This is always unwise and usually indicates poor management and lack of thrift.

Another "slow leak" is the unfortunate and unthrifty habit that some people have of buying things they do not need and often can't use at all just because they are cheap or offered at a big reduction. Nothing is a bargain, regardless of the price paid for it, unless it serves a real need. A certain lady bought seven hats at one time, because, at the close of the season, they were offered for sale at 25 per cent off the original price. These seven, added to the six she already had were probably all out of style the next year, so it was a clear case of throwing her money away, but she insisted she "just couldn't pass up a bargain." Needless to say, this was neither a bargain nor good management.

IN BEING GOOD STEWARDS it is necessary for parents not only to be wise in buying and conserving for the family, but to teach their family to be good stewards as well. This is often easier said than done in an age when "keeping up with the Joneses" is so prevalent.

It is well to start out giving children small allowances when they are around five or six (which should be given to them in pennies; it is easier for a child to understand five pennies and what they will buy than a nickel or a dime.) Of course, as they grow older their allowance should be increased, there should be a definite understanding as to what the allowance should cover, and there should be a record kept. This is the time for teaching the first principles of stewardship and responsibility. This should include responsibility for their choices, responsibility to their family, and responsibility to God for the material possessions in their hands. As they get on into their early teens, their allowances should cover at least a part of their clothing and school expenses. They will spend unwisely sometimes because of inexperience and the impulsiveness of youth. At such times parents should be patient but firm. Lessons learned by the experiences of success and failure are the lessons that build character.

As we evaluate the responsibilities of parenthood for teaching and training our families to follow in the ways of Christ, we should stress the importance of stewardship. Again we should resolve within our souls, "This thing I do." Thus by carefully training the youth of the church and by meticulously observing the law ourselves—we shall slowly but surely make the establishment of Zion a reality.

Find a cool, shady spot these hot summer days and browse through your July magazines for both entertainment and education. You'll find a variety of subject matter to catch your interest.

"Leave Well Enough Alone," Parents' Magazine, is a whimsical little piece for pure enjoyment—no rules to follow, no "supper" psychology!

"We Have Four Daughters," Parents' Magazine, is a human interest account of the family of film star Robert Young, and it contains some very good ideas.

"Who Saw It First?" Woman's Day, is a new game to be played on automobile trips, with fun for all, big and little. Additional copies of the game may be ordered.

"He Makes Me So Mad!" Woman's Day, discusses learning the art of not quarreling. Married happiness may depend on it.

For a peek into some of the governmental problems, and to arouse your sense of political responsibility, read "Washington's Midsummer Madness," American Magazine.

"Miracle in the Valley," American Magazine, will bring a glow to your heart, as you read the proof that there are a great many big-hearted people who will take time out for kindness.

"Remember Our Friend Walter," Reader's Digest, is a chronicle of Americanization that will show you the better side of our nation.

"Can We Still Save America?" Reader's Digest, is a timely article, as it is an appraisal by former United States Ambassador to the Soviet Union, William C. Bullitt, of the present world crisis.

"Christ's Home," McCall's Magazine, is the incredible, but nevertheless true, story of an amazing home for "hopeless" children.

Are you feeling the heat? Take off a few minutes, and carefully note this article, "Heat Stroke and Heat Exhaustion," Good Housekeeping.

"Why I Believe in God," Woman's Home Companion, is a challenging discussion of his faith by an outstanding doctor and author, A. J. Cronin.

If you have a small baby, you will find the monthly series called "Baby's First Year," Ladies' Home Journal, most interesting. It is a photographic record of a baby's development, and this month is "Baby's Fifth Month."

PASADENA, CALIFORNIA.—On Sunday evening, June 25, the congregation observed the anniversary of its fifth birthday as a branch. The branch was organized June 24, 1945, while the late Elder Lewis B. Shippy was pastor. The present pastor is Elder Warren K. McElwain.

A ham dinner was prepared and served by the women of the branch to seventy-five members and friends, many of them remaining for the "Family Night" entertainment in which eight families participated.

On March 26 Lawrence Emerson was baptized by Elder Warren K. McElwain at Central Church, Los Angeles, and confirmed the following Sunday during the 11:00 service in Pasadena; Elders Laurel V. McElwain and Harry K. Waylett officiated. On October 26 Evan Inslce was ordained an elder under the hands of Patriarch Frederick A. Smith. On January 1 Richard Ulery was ordained deacon by Elders Paul Moore and Warren K. McElwain.

The women's department, the La Da Sa's, working under the leadership of Mrs. Ottilla Bridenbecker, have made the building fund one of their main objectives. A dinner is given each month (usually on the third Sunday) immediately following the 11:00 service.

Pasadena was well represented at the district conference held June 17 and 18 at Central Church, Los Angeles, at which time the Los Angeles Metropolitan District became the Los Angeles Stake.—Reported by MRS. EDNAH M. STRONG.

FORT SCOTT, KANSAS.—On January 22 Elder Marion Goodfellow of Nevada, Missouri, was guest speaker.

On January 29 a district meeting was held at Rich Hill for the priesthood and their wives. Most of the priesthood with their companions attended and heard Bishop H. W. Cackler's talk, "What Priesthood Means." The same evening Bishop Leslie Kohlman was guest speaker. Ralph Murdock of Butler, Missouri, church school district supervisor, was the morning speaker.

Mr. and Mrs. John Graham, Fort Scott, celebrated their golden wedding anniversary on January 3, 1950.

The Graceland College A Cappella choir visited Fort Scott, March 15. A dinner prepared by the women of the branch was served in the basement dining room of the courthouse. Henry Anderson was in charge. The forty-two choir members with Brother and Sister Anderson were given sleeping quarters and their breakfasts in the homes of the Saints.

A number of local women attended the women's district meeting at Butler, Missouri, May 11, where Apostle Donald Chesworth and Pauline Arnson were the guest speakers.

On May 14 Apostle Chesworth met in the afternoon with the local priesthood. That evening he was guest speaker to the entire branch.—Reported by SUSIE LENEVE.

OREGON DISTRICT.—Approximately 250 attended the first annual picnic for the Fourth of July celebration held at the newly-purchased campgrounds on Lewis River. Tables were set up out-of-doors.

The meals, pop, and ice cream concessions were in charge of the district leaders' wives:

Sisters Chapman, Whiting, Verhei, and Carpenter. Elder Miles Whiting managed the buying. Elder F. E. Chapman, the ground custodian, had charge of ground facilities. A flag-raising ceremony was held after the new flag pole had been erected by the young people under the supervision of Chester Gregory. The ball games, races, and other recreations were directed by Elder Harold Carpenter. Missionary Arthur F. Gibbs gave the Fourth of July speech.—Reported by J. L. VERHEI.

OGDEN, UTAH.—The Oriole girls under the leadership of Madonna Herbert held a Mother's Day tea at the church. They gave a program, served refreshments, and presented every mother with a corsage.

SANTA ROSA, CALIFORNIA.—Missionary George Njeim held one week of cottage meetings and one week of preaching services at the church from June 4 to 17. A good interest was manifested by the attendance each evening. A young man whose wife is a member was baptized by High Priest Robert L. Bishop.

When Evangelist William Patterson held meetings in February, he was the guest speaker of the morning devotional period of the Ministerial Association over the local radio station.—Reported by H. E. WALKER.

GERING, NEBRASKA.—In just a little over a year's time, J. Charles May has held three series of meetings and has baptized nine persons. He has just completed a series of meetings. On June 25 he baptized two adults. One was a man past eighty-four years of age. The other convert completes a family group.

There is no resident member of the priesthood, but a priesthood member administers the Communion. Any member of the priesthood who is visiting in the neighborhood is urged to meet with the group. Meetings are held in the home of Mr. and Mrs. F. C. Foster, 1100 L. Street in Gering.

Church school attendance is between twenty-five and thirty each Sunday. We have Book of Mormon study on Tuesday evenings.—Reported by MRS. VIOLA E. BARKDOLL.

WELLSBURG, WEST VIRGINIA.—Dedication for the new church organ was held July 2. The Live Wire Class of young adults, whose president is Ethel Melcher, purchased the Hammond electric organ.

Services opened with church school in charge of Donald Treiber. The 11:00 dedication service was in charge of the pastor, John Treiber. Elder Treiber mentioned some of the steps taken by the Live Wire Class and expressed his gratitude for their work. The choir directed by Lenora Nixon sang "O Come, Let Us Sing." Sister Melcher presented the organ to the pastor, and he presented it to Bishop's Agent Otto Melcher who accepted it on behalf of the general church. District President S. M. Zonker preached the dedication sermon. Evangelist R. E. Rodgers offered a prayer of dedication.

At noon a basket lunch was served by the women's group.

Mrs. Robert Earley presented an organ recital beginning at 1:45. There were also vocal selections by Dolores Vincent, John Treiber, Leona Hanes, Lenora Nixon, and Patricia Treiber.

Evangelist R. E. Rodgers was the speaker at the three o'clock service. He reviewed the various projects and experiences of the branch during the past twenty years.—Reported by LEONA HANES.

RIDGEFIELD, WASHINGTON.—Missionary Arthur F. Gibbs conducted a series of services and cottage meetings. At the close of the series on June 24, five people were baptized. Confirmations were held the following Sunday.—Reported by RUTH PHILLIPS.

OSBORNE, KANSAS.—Elder H. F. Chapin of Concordia, Kansas, blessed the following four small boys at the Roy Wilson home in Osborne on June 18: Dennis Roy, infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Corbett; Ronald Ray, son of Mr. and Mrs. Raymond Junior Thornburg; Bruce Marvin and Dennis Mark, sons of Mr. and Mrs. Marvin Boyle. Elder Chapin also preached a sermon in the Wilson home and visited in the homes of several members and interested nonmembers.—Reported by MRS. ROY WILSON.

BAYOU LA BATRE, ALABAMA.—High Priest Joseph Breshears, president of the Gulf States District, and High Priest Franklin Steiner held a series of missionary services here from June 21 through 30. As a result at a baptismal service on July 2, Mr. and Mrs. Gussie Staman became members of the church.

On July 4 the Saints served a barbecue gumbo plate for the noon and evening meal. This effort brought more than five hundred dollars into the building fund.—Reported by MRS. HARVEY NELSON.

LANSING, MICHIGAN.—On May 29 Apostle George Mesley spoke at the church on his Alaskan tour, using colored slides. Following this service Bishop and Sister T. A. Beck entertained a group in their home.

The G. Everett Berndts are now located in Midland where Brother Berndt is pastor as well as district president.

Sunday morning flower arrangements for services is in charge of Brother and Sister George A. Trescott. Some of our people have grown and offered some very beautiful floral offerings for these services.

On June 4 Brother Alfred Fletcher, formerly of Buffalo, New York, provided the evening service with the tape recording of the service on Organization of the International Stake which was held in Detroit recently. This was greatly appreciated by those unable to attend.

Several carloads of women from Lansing attended the joint institute held at Coldwater, May 23, with Sister Pauline Arnson speaker.

The women's department met at the church, June 22, to elect officers for the coming year. Preceding this a musical program was given under the direction of June Sherman. Mabel B. Foster is the women's nominee for next year's leader. June Freeman is secretary and June Sherman, music leader.

Gordon Wilder, who has been attending Graceland the past year as a freshman, returned to Lansing for the summer.

The Vacation Church School was held at Rose Lake Mission during the third week of June with Alva Dexter, daily pastor, in charge. The following women were leaders: June Sherman, Myrtle Sayers, kindergarten; Blanche Dexter, Jennie Carleton, primary; Daisy Andrews, Eva Dexter, juniors; Helen Gorton, Marjorie Nemeth, young people. Sister Leslie Flowers was in charge of handwork and recreation. Myrtle Sayers, June Sherman, and Marjorie Nemeth were in charge of music. On Saturday evening, June 24, fifty-two certificates were given out with about 50 per cent of the young people being nonmembers. Will Dexter, Rose Lake Mission pastor, gave a few remarks at this service.

Since January of this year the following were added to the church by baptism: Olive and Doris Lenon, D. L. Stanke, Richard Sanderson, Laura May and Joyce Ann Arnsberger (twins), Ingrid Tirrotta, Mary Hathaway, Wava Louella Babcock, and Ronald Freeman.

Lansing Rally Day, June 25, began with an early morning prayer service with Bishop T. A. Beck in charge. District Missionary James Phillips occupied at 11:00. The choir sang "Remember Now Thy Creator," under the direction of Sister Mabel B. Foster. At noon a basket lunch was enjoyed at Moores Park on Grand River. At 3:00 Bishop Beck spoke at the river's edge on the theme of the day, "The Church Speaks in Times of Crisis." At 6:00 a baptismal service followed by the confirmation service was held at the church. Brother Phillips closed the day with a few remarks following the confirmation service.

The interior of the church building presents a pleasing appearance with its newly painted walls of pale green and ceiling of white.—Reported by MABEL B. FOSTER.

SPERRY, OKLAHOMA.—Vacation Church School was held here for the first time this summer. On Preparation Day there was an enrollment of 64. At the close of the school there was an enrollment of 120.

Mrs. T. P. Greenwood was supervisor. Other members of the faculty were Mrs. Cecil Lollar, Mrs. Delilah Dobson, Mrs. W. P. Rumsey, Miss Lou Williams, Mrs. Marie Williamson, and Miss Sarah Jane Doeris.

Visual aid pictures were shown two evenings for the children. Every pupil did handcraft work for the display at the end of the school period. A sack lunch was held on the church lawn one day during the school. On the last day a picnic was held at Greenwood Park near Skiatook.

RICHLAND, WASHINGTON.—During the months of April and May, two district institutes were held. A "priesthood and women's" institute under the direction of Apostle Gleazer, Appointee Vern Webb, District President Carl Hammel, and Pastor Lloyd Whiting, was held in April. In May under the direction of High Priest Orlin Crownover, Elder Hammel, and Pastor Whiting, a "workers" institute was held.

Eight baptisms have been recorded this year, three adults and five children. Work on the church building is progressing. The font was used for the baptisms on Children's Day. It is expected the church building will be completed by fall.—Reported by IRENE BOWERMAN.

BROCKTON, MASSACHUSETTS.—Members of the branch have made a new lawn around the church and landscaped it with shrubbery and evergreens. The church has been painted on the outside. A new church flag and national flag have been placed in the main auditorium. The pulpit chairs have been upholstered in purple, and a new purple drape with gold fringe was hung across the chancel rail. A purple runner with gold fringe was made for the top of the piano. A new Bible, Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants have been obtained for the pulpit. A new Communion set has also been obtained.

There are about 60 members in the branch. The average Sunday attendance is 16. Leonard Chesworth is the elder of the group.—Reported by EDMUND STEARNS.

MAPLETON, KANSAS.—Home-coming was recently held. The church was started in 1910. Several babies were blessed. Three people were baptized.—Reported by LEE QUICK.

GRAYLING, MICHIGAN.—As the result of consistent missionary testimony in this mission, seven persons were baptized on Children's Day. A number of other nonmember friends are making investigation of the work, and another baptismal service is anticipated for early fall. Elder Roy Newberry, pastor, is holding cottage meetings each week in one or more homes of nonmember friends. Ministers assisting Elder Newberry in the work have been Allen Schreur and Elmer Parkes of Gaylord; Robert Ball, Roscommon; George Lott, West Branch, and District President Harry L. Doty.—Reported by HARRY L. DOTY.

TRAVERSE CITY, MICHIGAN.—In a beautiful setting on the shores of Boardman Lake, the congregation met June 9 for the baptismal service of five young people. Doty Price and Harry L. Doty were the officiating ministers. Those baptized were Alvin Dudley, Delores Dudley, Darlene Kay Doty, Carolyn Lewis, and Leroy Lewis.—Reported by HARRY L. DOTY.

HERALD HOUSE

Mickey, Virginia, and Merrill Phillips in front of their Walton, Indiana, home

The Hard Road to Security

How Tragedy Paved the Way for One Family to Move to Independence

By NAOMI RUSSELL

EVER SINCE THEIR STORY, "Was It Cancer?" appeared in the May issue of Ladies' Home Journal, Merrill and Virginia Phillips have been getting sympathetic letters from Journal readers. The first one came from the Canal Zone and contained twenty dollars "to help finish the house." Others contained cash contributions which altogether amounted to about fifty dollars, but most of them were from other people who had experienced similar difficulties.

For those who didn't read the story, here is a brief resumé:

Merrill and Virginia, both in their twenties, were just putting the finishing touches on their five-room home near Walton, Indiana, when tragedy struck. Merrill, an electrician-plumber, was seriously injured when a 250-gallon oil tank which he was helping to install fell on him, breaking both his collar bones. This was a triple misfortune. It meant no work for the ten weeks he would have to be in a neck-to-waist cast; no regular income; and no progress on the house—since the Phillips' home was one of those "we did it ourselves" projects.

But even physical discomfort, insecure finances, and the disappointment of not being able to carry out carefully made plans were minor items compared to the unexpected news Merrill's doctor brought him soon after the cast was removed. A part of one collar bone protruded through the skin and necessitated a minor operation. While preparing for this operation, the doctor asked Merrill's permission to remove a growth from his head while he was under the anesthetic; Merrill agreed it would be a good idea since he had often wondered about the large, dark mole at the back of his scalp. Tests showed it to be cancerous. Another operation was necessary to make sure all of the growth was removed, and then—both Virginia and Mickey, five-year-old son of the Phillips', developed symptoms of cancer too.

Since Merrill is an ex-Navy man, his medical care was financed by the government, but Virginia and Mickey weren't eligible for GI assistance. Friends and the American Cancer Society came to the rescue and arranged for their operations. Virginia went to surgery as soon as Merrill was able to be with her. She had given her consent for radical surgery if necessary, but since her tumor proved benign, the operation was only a minor one. Two days later both parents waited anxiously while Mickey was in the operating room. His was a more intricate operation demanding bone surgery, but again the happy word came, "noncancerous."

WITHIN FIVE WEEKS the Phillipses were back in their not-quite-finished home near Walton. They could breathe a little easier, knowing they were on the road to normal health again, but the financial problem loomed ever larger. When Merrill, still in bandages, reported to his employer for work, he found he had no job. The company had been forced to cut expenses and that meant reduction of personnel. He decided to free lance until something steady turned up, but after a couple months of taking jobs as they came, he found the budget still wouldn't balance, and the house continued to remain unfinished. It was then that Virginia persuaded him to try his luck in Independence where her parents and sister live. Having been an "isolated member" for six years, she was eager to live in a place that offered church opportunities.

In April Merrill drove to Kansas City and began looking for work. Not having a union card made him ineligible for many of the jobs he could otherwise have taken, so he applied for permission to join. However, union membership is purposely limited, and no new applications were being accepted. So the search continued. After three weeks he found what seemed to be worth moving 500 miles to. A plastic tile dealer offered him $2.00 an hour to install tile, provided he could report to work in exactly one week. Hurrying back to Indiana, Merrill helped Virginia pack up what things they needed for the move, stored the furniture, and rented the home they had built. At the appointed time, he returned to his employer and said he was ready for work.

About the Draft

—AND A COLLEGE EDUCATION

But the man only smiled and said, "Sorry, I couldn't wait for you. I had to have someone last week, so I hired another fellow. If you want me to, I'll keep you on my list . . ." But Merrill couldn't wait.

Although they were staying with Virginia's parents, both Merrill and Virginia wanted a place of their own. But finding an apartment proved almost as difficult as finding a job. After weeks of looking, they finally were able to rent a three-room upstairs apartment. Although Merrill did part-time work, a steady job did not come until the Kansas City Star featured a story about the Phillipses. This brought an offer of a night-maintenance job. While the wages were less than he had been used to making, Merrill decided to take it. Virginia didn't at all like the idea of his working nights, but she agreed it was better than the catch-as-catch-can work which had so upset their budget in Indiana. All the while Merrill kept hounding the union for a permit, and after a month the good news came. Complications arose however when he tried to give a week's notice to his employer of his intention to quit. The man just wouldn't see him. He liked Merrill's work and wasn't about to let him quit. So for a week Merrill worked two shifts trying to keep both the union and his night boss happy, but such an arrangement couldn't go on forever. He finally told the secretary of his evasive employer that he couldn't afford not to take the job with the better pay, so now—with his wife's full approval—he leaves for work each morning at seven and returns at five, which means long evenings at home with his family.

LOOKING BACK at the past nine months, Virginia wonders how three people could have had so much happen to them in so short a time. "In a way," she reflects, "it was for the best. If Merrill hadn't been hurt, we may not have known about his cancer until too late. And if he hadn't lost his job, we may never have come to Independence. I've wanted to live here ever since I first visited Independence with my sister ten years ago. After being isolated and then living where we can take our choice of sixteen congregations, we hardly know which to choose.

"Our experiences have truly been a test of faith, yet we have been strengthened many times and realize that we have been richly blessed. If it is God's will we hope working conditions will make it possible for us to establish a permanent home here."

Merrill shares her feelings and is already beginning to think about building another house. When they sell their home in Walton, the Phillipses plan to start looking for a lot in Independence—a lot big enough for a six-room house.

"You see," Virginia explains with a smile, "we three are going to be four in September."

HIGH SCHOOL GRADUATES within the draft age are wondering what they should do about the draft. Should they enlist? Should they get a job and wait to be drafted? Or should they enroll in a college? The following is quoted from an article which appeared in the Des Moines Register of July 11, 1950:

According to the present outlook, youngsters just turning nineteen years of age are not likely to be called within the next year [Major General Lewis B.] Hershey [Selective Service Director] said. They will be able to begin the fall school term with almost certain assurance that they can finish out the school year. Under present regulations, any man called up for the draft after the school year has started will be permitted to finish out the year.

Hershey said further that twenty-five-year-olds will be called first, and that in the event of a large-scale call, such as three hundred thousand men, the bulk of the draftees probably would come from the twenty-three- and twenty-two-year-old groups. The first call from the Armed Services issued by the Department of National Defense on July 10 asked for only twenty thousand men.

The present draft law provides that a college student enrolled whose draft number is called will be deferred until he has completed one year of college training. In some fields of study, the deferment is for a longer period.

From these facts and opinions, the high school graduate under twenty-two years of age may assume that he will not be drafted soon, if at all. Therefore the draft need not affect his decision about enrolling in college this fall.

There is a long chance that the older high school graduate may be drafted, but he can reasonably expect to finish one year or more of college before being inducted.

BUT SUPPOSE the young man of draft age feels a patriotic call to serve? Should he enlist? This is a question which can be answered only in the heart of the individual. But there are certain facts which ought to be included in the consideration which leads to the answer.

Most college-trained men who have been in the service agree that college training is beneficial. A college education stabilizes earlier foundations, awakens the mind, advances skills, inspires new goals. A college-trained man usually has better opportunity for advancement in the service because he comes better prepared to serve.

The government has recognized the importance of higher education in winning wars. One evidence of this is the fact that the college student is permitted to finish out the college year even though his number is called. Many military leaders have agreed with educators and historians that the last war was won as much in the college classroom and laboratory as on the battlefield. Our nations, in time of war or peace, need the products of the human mind traditionally cultivated in the college setting—products of research in mathematics and science, of disciplined living in the rigors of a good college environment. Personal stability, spiritual foundations, a ready mind—these are products of a college education which are of priceless worth to nations in war and in peace.

There is probably no more critical time in a man's growth than the years from sixteen to twenty-one. During this period, most young men are beginning to think for themselves. They are emancipating themselves from the controls of home. They are turning to other sources for information on which to base decisions. Decisions made during these critical years may determine life patterns more decisively and conclusively than decisions made at any other period in a lifetime. Experiences in which these decisions are made ought to be calculated to nurture the development of the soundest of life patterns.

A good college environment, like no other environment yet devised by man, is peculiarly adapted to meet the needs of this period in a young man's life. He is exposed not only to the ideas of the professors who shall inspire him, and to the influences of the students with whom he shall live—but he is subjected (often unwillingly) to the wisdom of the ages: "things both in heaven, and in earth, and under the earth; things which have been; things which are; things which must shortly come to pass."

THE SURVIVAL OF CIVILIZATION may well depend on the right use of the accumulated storehouse of knowledge and wisdom for which the college—its library, its classrooms, and its laboratories—is the world's depository and steward. A Christian college, as no other environment, is calculated to develop young men who will learn the right use of the ideas and materials which God has placed on the earth for the good of mankind.

The call to the young man of the church is clear, and it is urgent. It is a call to become one of the sons of God. It is a call to bring other men into fellowship with the children of God. It is a call to bring to pass "in our time" the realization of the hopes and dreams of prophets, sages, and common men for "peace on earth" through the kingdom of God. A young man whose philosophy of life has matured in the inspired and inspiring environment of the church college knows more than he could have been expected to know before about the meaning of life and what, if necessary, he must fight to preserve, or grow to establish.

Clearly, the young man of purpose may be answering the call to service with as great patriotism if he enrolls in college this fall with noble goals in view, as if he enlisted—or waited to be drafted—in the armed services.

WEDDING

Farmer-Lenox

Elaine Lenox, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Miles H. Lenox of LaCrosse, Wisconsin, and W. Gene Farmer of Denver, Colorado, were married July 21 at the Reorganized Englewood Church in Independence, Missouri. Elder Glaude A. Smith performed the double-ring ceremony. They are making their home in Independence.

DEATHS

HOISINGTON.—Hattie Helen, daughter of George and Rosa Bunnell, was born March 12, 1894, near Corning, Iowa, and died May 7, 1950, at a hospital in Portland, Oregon. Following graduation from the Harlan, Iowa, high school in 1913, she taught in Shelby County, and in 1914-15 attended Graceland College. As a child she was baptized into the Reorganized Church by Evangelist Ammon White. On July 16, 1917, she was married to Leonard G. Hoisington in a double military wedding; the other couple was her sister, Ada, and her husband's brother, Earl. While Mr. Hoisington was overseas during World War I, she studied voice and piano at Cotty College in Nevada, Missouri. In the spring of 1920, her husband accepted missionary appointment, and from 1923-28 they lived in Switzerland and Germany while doing church work. Two years after their return to the States, they made their home on the West Coast where they were living at the time of her death.

Besides her husband, Leonard, she leaves two daughters: Alice Elaine Nelson of Roseburg, Oregon, and Helen Anita Billings of Chariton, Iowa; her mother, Rosa Bunnell of Salem, Oregon; two brothers: Boyd E. and Paul S. Bunnell of Portland, Oregon; two sisters: Mrs. Rosamond B. Smith, Kansas City, Kansas, and Ada B. Hoisington, Kansas City, Missouri; and five grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted by Elders Elwin Vest and Walter Barker at the Colonial Mortuary in Portland. Interment was in Lincoln Memorial Park, Portland.

HAAS.—John George, son of Henry and Elizabeth Louise Schneider Haas, was born October 21, 1876, at Harrison Hill, Ohio, and died May 28, 1950, at the Linwood Nursing

The Church and Home Together

By F. M. McDowell and

Herald House INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

Home in Kansas City, Missouri. In 1896, he moved to a farm near Piper City, Illinois, and on February 11, 1903, was married to Anna G. Funke. Seven children were born to them. He was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on November 1, 1908, and on March 11, 1923, was ordained to the office of priest. At various times during his farming years he lived in Illinois, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, and Missouri. In 1930 he won the Missouri state corn-husking contest, and two years later raised 320 acres of popcorn which rated him the title of "popcorn king." In 1939 while living in Nebraska he had a tractor accident which necessitated the amputation of his right leg; while recovering from this he wrote the story of his life, "Ohio Johnnie." In 1944 he returned to Missouri where he resided until his death.

He is survived by his wife, Anna, of the home; two sons: Richard C. of Lee's Summit, Missouri, and Victor J. of Crawford, Nebraska; four daughters, Mrs. Louise Loveland of Grain Valley, Missouri; Mrs. Ella Mengel of Kidder, Missouri; Mrs. Ruth Smith of Oak Grove, Missouri; and Mrs. Faith Miller of Stet, Missouri; three brothers; James of Wabash, Indiana; George of Chicago, Illinois; and William of Los Angeles, California; and thirteen grandchildren. One daughter, Grace, preceded him in death. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Oak Grove, Elders John T. Smith, John Quick, and Gerald Thomas officiating. Burial was in the Lee's Summit Cemetery.

SHEPARD.—Eunice Mix, was born July 5, 1859, in Wisconsin, and died June 9, 1950, at Hay Springs, Nebraska. On March 29, 1876, she was married to Columbus M. Shepard; five children were born to them. Mr. Shepard died in 1919, and a daughter, Mrs. Amos Scott, died in 1941. Mrs. Shepard joined the Reorganized Church at the age of seventeen and continued a faithful member the remainder of her life. On April 11, 1949, she suffered a paralytic stroke which left her an invalid until death.

Surviving are three sons: Frank of Johnston, Nebraska; Harry of Emmett, Idaho; and John of Sparks, Nebraska; a daughter, Mrs. Harve Williams of Nowlin, South Dakota; ten grandchildren; fifteen great-grandchildren and one great-great-grandchild. Services were conducted at the Watts Funeral Home in Valentine, Nebraska, the Reverend Paul E. Boyls officiating. Interment was in Wood Lake Cemetery.

PURCELL.—Adaline Malinda, daughter of John Wesley and Malinda Hirst, was born July 23, 1884, at Duniap, Iowa, and died May 25, 1950, at Montebello, California. At the age of seven she moved with her parents to Missouri Valley, Iowa, and on October 18, 1893, was baptized into the Reorganized Church. On July 23, 1905, she married Ben C. Purcell, who preceded her in death in September, 1936.

She is survived by a son, Harold Purcell of Los Angeles, California; a daughter, Mrs. W. S. Giles of Maywood, California; a sister, Mrs. Lettie Bernhardt of Sandwich, Illinois; two grandchildren and four great-grandchildren. Prayer was offered by Elder Virgil Lum at the Moritz Funeral Home in Montebello, after which the body was shipped to Missouri Valley, where services were conducted by Elders John Jensen and Floyd Hirst at the Reorganized Church there. Burial was in Rose Hill Cemetery.

WALLER.—Harry, was born February 2, 1889, at Mill Spring, Missouri, and died June 23, 1950, at Mill Spring. On October 7, 1916, he was married to Ora Steward; seven children were born to them. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since July 1, 1932.

He is survived by his wife, Ora; two daughters: Mrs. Mary Poole of St. Louis, Missouri, and Mrs. Clara Mann of Mill Spring; three sons: Paul of St. Louis, John of Mill Spring, and Charles of California. Funeral services were conducted at the Christian Church in Mill Spring, Elders W. A. Kuntz and J. A. Phillips officiating. Burial was in the Mill Creek cemetery.

ATKINSON.—Gerald Dent, son of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Atkinson of Merlin, Ontario, died June 6, 1950, in St. Joseph's Hospital at the age of forty-two. He is survived by a son, Joseph; his parents; and two sisters: Mrs. Max Houston of Windsor and Mrs. Max Marshall of Merlin. Funeral services were held at Needham Chapel, Evangelist R. T. Brown officiating. Interment was in the Merlin cemetery.

CRUM.—Mary Elizabeth Van Fleet, was born September 4, 1863, at Oswego, Illinois, and died June 20, 1950, at Glendale, California, after many months of illness. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church as a child and remained faithful to her covenant throughout life. In May, 1882, she was married to George Crum; four children were born to them. In 1883 she and her husband moved to California, where they made their permanent home.

She is survived by her husband; three sons: Arthur and James of Los Angeles, California, and Frank of Ontario, California; three sisters: Mrs. Sarah Mills of Englewood, California; Mrs. Cora Garner of Sunland, California; and Mrs. Roberta Shoemaker of Ontario; and seven grandchildren. A daughter preceded her in death. Funeral services were held at the Pierce Brothers' Chapel in Los Angeles, Evangelist Louis J. Ostertag officiating. Interment was in Rosedale Cemetery, Los Angeles.

DUTCHER.—Mary Margaret, daughter of Robert and Nancy Burr, was born near Bothwell, Ontario, on September 2, 1871, and died at Flint, Michigan, on May 29, 1950. She was baptized as a child into the Reorganized Church, and in 1906 was married to Pearl Dutcher. Their home in Bay Port, Michigan, was a stopping place for missionaries for many years. Mr. Dutcher preceded her in death on September 6, 1942.

Surviving are two daughters: Ellen Jenkins and Rosetta Lanigan of Flint; three stepdaughters: Kate McNamara and Laura McNamara of Flint and Elizabeth Hunter of Fargo, North Dakota; four stepsons: Harvey, Melvin, Elvin, and John Dutcher of Bay Port; two sisters: Martha Burr of Cameron, Missouri, and Nellie Irwin of Youbou, Vancouver Island, British Columbia; two brothers: George and Robert Burr of Montana; twenty-four grandchildren and twenty-one great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Newell Street Church in Flint, Elders Melvin Russell and Arthur Slater officiating. Interment was in the Gracelawn Cemetery, Flint.

JOHNSON.—Lenor, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Platt Mott, was born at New Boston, Illinois, on June 13, 1858, and died at Independence, Kansas, on June 7, 1950. As a small girl she moved with her parents to Logan, Iowa. On March 9, 1873, she was married to William C. Cadwell. They and their five children moved to Kansas in 1893, where Mr. Cadwell died on April 14, 1918. On June 1, 1920, she was married to John H. Johnson, who preceded her in death on September 28, 1935. Since 1942 she had made her home with her son Guy Cadwell in Independence. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since 1874.

Surviving are two sons: Guy of Independence and P. M. Cadwell of Bushnell, Illinois; two daughters: Mrs. Ruth Bradford of Des Moines, Iowa, and Mrs. Camilla Johnson of Napa, California; twenty grandchildren; thirty-eight great-grandchildren; and eleven great-great-grandchildren. Services were held at the Rodrick Funeral Chapel, Elders C. L. Anderson and Eldon Kaste, Jr., officiating. Burial was at Malvern, Iowa, where services were conducted by a grandson, Elder Myron Caldwell.

NICHOLS.—Harriett Sophia, died May 17, 1950, at Somerville Hospital, Somerville, Massachusetts, at the age of eighty-six. She was a faithful member of the Reorganized Church and on May 3—just two weeks before her death—attended church to bear her testimony. She was a talented woman, especially in the fields of painting, needlework, and writing.

Her only immediate survivor is her husband, Elder Arthur H. Nichols. Funeral services were conducted by Elder A. W. Sheehy. Interment was in Forest Hills Cemetery, Boston.

* SHROPSHIRE LAD

All your intellectual friends are reading A. E. Housman's "Shropshire Lad"—now that it is available at long last in a good reprint by Halcyon House. And they will be quoting it to you until you feel like an oasis of ignorance in a desert of sophistication. There is only one thing to do: go get a copy soon. If you have a mind for verse at all, you'll read it straight through and then begin again.

This Victorian poet served up sweet stuff with a strong dash of bitters. There is brine in his ambrosia, rock salt in his ice cream. In 1887 when Queen Victoria was celebrating her Jubilee, he found Shropshire people rejoicing

"Because 'tis fifty years to-night
That God has saved the Queen."

At the same time he thought of dead Shropshire men who fell in strange lands—

"Lads, we'll remember friends of ours
Who shared the work with God."

The love and beauty of nature touches his heart, the hand of history rests lightly on grassy downs and wooded hills, but death is never far away.

When he moves to London, he lectures himself,

"Hand, you have held true fellow's hands
Be clean then; rot before you do
A thing they'd not believe of you.
You and I must keep from shame
In London streets the Shropshire name."

Once in London, he gazes out the window, seeing visionary trees above the smoking chimney pots, and dreams of "the land of lost content."

But there in London he misses the kindness of nature at home, and finds something far different:

"Yonder, lightening other loads,
The seasons range the country roads,
But here in London, streets I ken
No such helpmates, only men;
And these are not in plight to bear,
If they would, another's care.
They have enough as 'tis: I see
In many an eye that measures me
The mortal sickness of a mind
Too unhappy to be kind.
Undone with misery, all they can
Is to hate their fellow man;
And till they drop they needs must still Look at you and wish you ill."

His thoughts return to Shropshire with an irrepressible nostalgia:

"Far in a western brookland
That bred me long ago
The poplars stand and tremble
By pools I used to know."

And let that be enough for you, my friends, until you get the book for yourselves.

* GOD'S KINGDOM

The prayer meeting theme was, "Build the Kingdom." It was presented with great enthusiasm, but there were few suggestions for practical steps.

Feeling frustrated, someone asked Herman, who was wiping inky fingerprints off the office door frame, "Herman, how are we going to build the kingdom?"

Without missing a stroke, he replied, "I don't know. But when they get it built, I'm going to help keep it clean!"

But we think that when it is built, he will be right in there helping with the best of them.

The Restoration Story

"The Restoration Story" is the first in a series of loose-leaf presentations of the message of our church. It has been prepared by the missionary committee of the Council of Twelve as a visual aid to personal evangelism. It contains 138 pages. On one page there is a picture—on the opposite page is an explanation or a scripture telling the story of the picture.

"The Restoration Story" is punched to fit any three ring notebook (sheets are 8 1/2 x 11 inches). It can be used in personal evangelism, priesthood visiting, as an aid to parents teaching their children about our church, can be adapted to be used as supplemental material for church school instruction, and to assist in leadership training.

Binder

A special three-ring presentation binder is available, which will stand up at two different heights. It is maroon, and the name of the church is stamped in gold on the cover.

The Dignity and Beauty of Marriage

A YOUNG WOMAN can be one of the most beautiful things in all of God's creations. A young man, clean, healthy, and strong, is one of the most admirable. Only one thing is finer than either of them alone: that is the two of them together, and in love—in love that will lead to marriage. Their happiness is contagious. It touches the heart as nothing else can.

The ideal place for the young couple to be married is in church, with the ceremony performed as a sacrament by a minister of Christ, with the family and friends as witnesses. It should be, if possible, the church that they will attend when they return from their honeymoon. Next to the church, a pretty home wedding is best.

Everything possible should be done to establish and preserve the dignity and beauty of the sacrament of marriage. This is the greatest of all beautiful memories that the bride can keep to the latest years of her life. It is the symbol of her alliance and her home, of the new family of which she becomes a part.

The bride has two visible and tangible things as lovely symbols of this sacred memory. One is her wedding ring. The other is the wedding certificate. This should be a distinctive sign of her faith. Herald House has a Wedding Certificate especially designed for our people. It carries the seal of the church. It identifies the minister as one who performs this sacrament under the authority of the Restored Gospel of the latter days. It is not too big and bulky to be kept conveniently. It has simplicity and dignity in harmony with the reverence of the occasion. Every young church couple should have one as a part of their wedding plans.

Introducing...

APOSTLE PERCY E. FARROW (page 5) was introduced June 26, 1950.

WILSON SAMUEL RITCHIE, San Bernardino, California (page 11), was born in Owasso, Oklahoma, on February 11, 1915. He was baptized in Hearne, Texas, in 1931, and was graduated from the Breckenridge, Texas, high school in 1932. Since then he has taken several courses in California colleges, including Santa Barbara State College, Pasadena Junior College, Fresno State College, and San Bernardino Valley College. In 1939 and '40, he took a vocational course with the Pacific Barber College in Pasadena and operates his own shop at the present time.

In 1941 he married Edna Nieffenegger. They have two boys: George Henry, 8, and Samuel Wilson, 6.

At various times he has worked as salesman, sports writer, general reporter, and typist. He was ordained a priest in 1937 and has occupied various positions in the church, including junior church pastor, children's supervisor, teacher in the church school, publicity director, Zion's League supervisor, and church school director.

He says his favorite occupation is conducting cottage meetings.

VIVIAN CHARLES R. SORENSON, East Brisbane, Queensland, Australia (page 13), was born in Brisbane, February 13, 1916, and baptized there in 1930. The next year he was graduated from the Brisbane high school, after which he spent four years taking an engineering course at Brisbane Technical College, graduating with honors. In 1942 he married Gwendoline Peisker. They have two girls: Beth, 6, and Marvia, 3.

Brother Sorenson worked as a machinist until his appointment to the mission field in Tahiti. (See Herald of January 16, 1950.) His hobbies are photography, color slides, and electricity.

News & Notes

ON THE WAY

Word has been received from President Israel A. Smith that he was in the Fiji Islands, and that he expected to be on his way soon to Papeete of the Tahitian Islands.

VISITS REUNIONS

President W. Wallace Smith and his wife spent the week end of July 9 at the New York and Philadelphia reunion held at Deer Park, Pennsylvania, and the week end of July 16 at the Southern New England reunion held at Onset. At the Deer Park reunion Brother Smith worked in association with Apostle Maurice L. Draper, Bishop Henry L. Livingston, High Priest Jack Conway, and Elder Almer W. Sheehy. At the Onset reunion he worked in association with Brothers Draper, Livingston, Sheehy, and Elder William T. Guthrie.

CANADIAN REUNION

Apostle C. George Mesley was the guest speaker at the Port Elgin, Ontario, reunion held July 15-23. He worked in association with District Presidents J. F. Sheehy of Toronto and G. Farrow of Owen Sound. Patriarchs at the reunion were B. H. Hewitt, Benson Belrose, and W. I. Fligg.

REUNION IN ZION

The sixth annual reunion for Center Stake of Zion was held at Gardner Lake, Excelsior Springs, Missouri, during July 15-23. President F. Henry Edwards spoke at the 11:00 service on July 16. With the exception of the last evening, Apostle D. T. Williams was the evening speaker. Elder C. V. Graham, stake president, spoke at the 11:00 service on July 23.

A staff of thirty women workers and a junior pastor were in charge of the 150 children who attended the reunion. Daily meetings were held for the children from 8:30 to noon. Every evening during the church service, a story-telling hour was held. On the last evening of the reunion, the children presented the entire program. Elder Richard Price was the junior pastor. Mrs. Velma Jones was the supervisor.

About 700 people were on the reunion grounds during the last two days of the reunion. About 475 people camped on the grounds during the reunion. Many of these people came from a great distance in order to attend the reunion in Zion.

BARTHOLOMEW HALL

Work is progressing rapidly on the renovation of Bartholomew Hall into use for the offices of Center Stake officials. It is expected that work will be completed in about one month. Offices now in The Auditorium will then be moved to Bartholomew Hall.

HERALD HOUSE

Three representatives of the publishing house are away from their desks in charge of displays and sales of publications at reunions. Herman Johnson and his family are attending Northern and Southern California reunions. Marvin McDole and his family are at Silver Lake, Washington. Mrs. Clyde Hastings is at Bandera, Texas.

WHY DO YOU

Believe in God?

The Woman's Home Companion for July carries an article by the now famous physician-novelist, Dr. A. J. Cronin, author of The Citadel, The Green Years, and other works. It is entitled, "I Believe in God." Permission has been granted to quote a bit:

As a qualified doctor, I went out into the world—to a mining community in the valleys of South Wales. Here, in the practice of my profession, I began to see life at first hand. . . . For the first time I penetrated into the realm of the spirit. As I assisted at the miracle of birth, sat with the dying in the still hours of the night, heard the faint inexorable beating of the dark wings of death, . . . I realized that the compass of existence held more than my textbooks had revealed. . . . This . . . is the first step toward finding God.

One is driven to conclude that in primordial creation, in the motivation of the universe and the operation of the natural laws there is, has been, and always will be a Supreme Intelligence.

Dr. Cronin's first understanding of God came from the lives and testimonies of those devout Welsh people. Afterward, his mind was won, and he put it into scientific language. But it was his heart that learned first.

* * * * *

"Why I Believe in God." There should be some wonderful testimonies among our people on that subject, and it would be a real experience to read them, if one could get them. We have people in all occupations and professions, with many different kinds of experience. And each experience will produce a different kind of testimony. Some of them have seen life and death in the balance many times, in the course of civilian and military duty. They have peered over the misty horizons of time where, occasionally, they have looked into the borderlands of eternity.

You doctors, nurses, teachers, businessmen, bankers, stenographers, grocers, clerks, laborers, artists, and writers—you know that God places no limit on the kinds of people to whom he reveals himself; you have seen his footprints in strange places, and there have been times when you could feel the touch of his hand upon your shoulder. You have seen a celestial light in the eyes of mothers, little children, and many hopeful, striving people.

* * * * *

Belief in God rests upon foundations made of experience. We begin to believe with what we are taught as children. Of course, when we begin to grow up, and know practically everything there is to be known, we doubt it. But then later, we begin to doubt the doubt too. And as the meaning of experience begins to dawn upon our minds, we find more things that confirm our faith than confirm the doubt.

If one looks at any of the works of creation attentively, one is convinced that it is utterly unimportant that "Kilroy was here," for, of tremendously greater importance, "God was here." And sometimes, in the faces of our fellow men we see an added note, ". . . quite recently."

The Spirit of God is sometimes felt in a sick room where, in answer to prayer, a good woman is healed of her affliction. And it is often equally felt in another room, where in answer to equally earnest prayer, and for reasons best known to the Father himself, another one is mercifully taken to her eternal home.

We meet many people who believe in God, a few who do not, and a great number who know nothing about him at all, or pretend to know nothing. They used to put blinders on horses to keep them from seeing too much. That was because the horse didn't know what to do about the facts of life. In a way, it was funny—a laugh on the horse. But no one ever saw a horse put blinders on himself, as people sometimes do. Some are frightened by the idea that there is a God, resentful of the thought that there could (incredible as it may seem!) be an Intelligence superior to their own. Human vanity being what it is, people will try to maintain their ascendancy at any cost, even to the annihilation of God!

We need to learn to accept things as they are—that is, the unchangeable things. A person who believes in God is humble enough to admit that there are things in life he cannot understand, that nobody has ever explained satisfactorily, that seem likely to remain mysteries to human beings for a long, long time to come. For example, in all the discussion of the atom, nobody has ever shown very satisfactorily where the atom got its power in the first place. We only know that it is there.

We accept the sun. We accept the fresh sweet air blowing over the fields. We accept the moon and the stars. All this as a matter of course. One doesn't hold a debate with the hen before eating one's egg for breakfast. There is wisdom in accepting many things, even if we can't explain them. A man could starve to death if he had to wait before eating until he could give an explanation of the simplest item of food on the table.

Now it seems appropriate to say something about accepting God. He has been here a long time—long before we came; he is here now; and he will be here long after we are all gone. He has something to say to us, and he is waiting for us to understand. He has some work for us to do, and we can begin on it any time we are ready. Believing in him is a first step.

Church School Attendance Campaign

IMMEDIATELY FOLLOWING this paragraph is a statement prepared by Apostle Reed M. Holmes, who is Director of Religious Education for the Church. This statement has been under consideration for many months, and is presented at this time in the hope that pastors, church school directors, and others who are concerned will give it their careful consideration in making plans for the church school year beginning October 1, 1950. We feel this is a most important and forward-looking move. We commend Brother Holmes' statement to the attention of the church, and we sincerely trust that the endeavor to extend the area and improve the quality of our church school ministry will be richly blessed throughout the entire church.

F. HENRY EDWARDS.

Let's Build Up Our Church School

By Reed M. Holmes

OUR FIRST MISSION FIELD is our neighborhood. More specifically it is in the home—yours, mine, theirs. Potentially the most fruitful source of evangelistic gains is personal evangelism. In actual practice it is personal evangelism expressed in the church school which is our most effective missionary agent. An enthusiastic and well-qualified church school with its doors open will help to add daily "such as should be saved." We must multiply the witnessing power of the church school.

It is possible for the church school to reach into the homes of nonmember families in the neighborhood of the church or of church members to draw children in for religious instruction and inspiration. These children recruited by the church school may in turn bring their families to the church. A little child has many times led parents into the fellowship of the church of Jesus Christ. Let's cause it to happen again and again.

The church school is also to train members to go forth "telling the story." We are not alone to win others to Christ but to teach those who have been won that we may lead them into the full meaning of Christian discipleship. If we fail to teach our converts to witness, our evangelism is a mockery. We must, therefore, improve our methods of bringing pupils into the church school and through the church school into permanent relationship with the Master Teacher and Evangelist.

We are growing increasingly aware of our commission to witness for Jesus Christ. Throughout the church our membership is more alert to the needs of others and to the dynamic call of our message. We are doing a better job of spreading the gospel story. Evidence of this is in the increased number of baptisms.

We must remember, however, that our fundamental purpose is not merely to enlarge the church but to extend the influence of Christ. Only with this primary understanding have we any right to describe our goals and achievements in terms of numbers and percentages. The early Christian church proclaimed that 3,000 had been added to the church on the day of Pentecost. This was not braggadocio in respect to gigantic growth. It was rejoicing that 3,000 more souls had become followers of Jesus Christ. The difference in meaning is not subtle. It is the difference between salesmanship and salvation.

Let the church school receive its commission to share in the evangelistic work of the church. Let us engage in a church school attendance campaign that may help to win many, to the way of Christ in the Restoration.

Our Purpose:

To increase the evangelistic power of the church school.

To help teachers become soul-winners.

To bring every pupil to a lively faith in Jesus Christ.

To intensify loyalty to the church expressed through witnessing for Christ.

To enlarge the church school by reaching out to win others to Christ.

It is our purpose to increase the evangelistic power of the church school by helping teachers to become soul-winners.

Every worker in the church school is encouraged to develop his devotional life. Only by the power of the Holy Spirit shall we be able to bring others into a rich relationship with Jesus Christ. We must, therefore, most humbly and reverently develop our prayer life in order that our teaching may be blessed by the Holy Spirit. There is no substitute for the equipment of the Spirit of God. All methods and aids are shallow and meaningless without his Spirit.

Let every worker re-evaluate the meaning of the Restoration Movement to him. Let each one take inventory of his knowledge and understanding of the gospel. We teach out of the abundance of our own faith and experience.

We should feel the urgency of leading others to Christ. There is no greater necessity than this, that all shall be won to the person and purposes of Christ. We must feel this in our hearts until we are on fire with the passion for winning souls. There is no room for indifference in church school teaching. The teacher is in a crucial and strategic location. His success lends hope for all else we endeavor to do.

We must study, alone and together, that our teaching may have the stamp of authority. Let it never be said again, as it has been said

Unity in Evangelism

BY PERCY E. FARROW

Building for Unity

THE SPIRITUAL LIFE of the church grows out of our awareness of and our prosecution of its evangelistic mission. The church of Christ always has been and always will be a missionary church. The objective of the church has been divinely established in the commission to preach the gospel in all the world; to teach all nations and peoples. Successful evangelism necessitates a church program in which unity predominates—such unity as is builded upon an abiding faith in Jesus Christ.

The topic is presumptive. It assumes that we must build into our efforts the degree of harmony that will more fully enhance the proclamation of the gospel in winning men and women to Christ and his way of life. It is to be remembered that the triumph of the church on the day of Pentecost is invisioned only in the statement, "They were all of one accord." This oneness of accord centered in their testimony that Jesus had arisen from the dead. Fervent witnessing by testimony that Jesus is Christ and has arisen and ascended into heaven will always be accompanied by the Spirit which builds peace and harmony.

The ministry of the Holy Spirit by successive revelations to the church in past years has admonished us to achieve and exemplify unity and harmony in our efforts to push forward the work of the church. More recently, as this admonition has been heeded, the same Spirit has commended those who have heeded its instruction and have sought to manifest peace and harmony in their deliberations and contributions to the cause. Specific examples of this commendation are contained in Doctrine and Covenants 141: 7 and 142: 3, the last two revelations given to the church.

We have not always been as united as we should have been, else there would have been no urgency for such admonition as has been given. No one can dispute the necessity of that which has been received. If we had achieved complete harmony already in our efforts to build God's kingdom, Zion would have been redeemed with that achievement. As it is we need to re-evaluate our past experiences in order to be able to push forward more vigorously in the work of evangelizing and kingdom-building. Failure to do this will result in the repetition of some of the difficulties that have hindered our progress.

Discord and Its Effects

Discord is the opposite of harmony and is unseemly. It grows out of selfishness and distorted concepts. Mark wrote that the disciples of Jesus disputed as to who was greatest among them (Mark 9: 30, 31). Matthew informs us that this "reasoning," as he puts it, was over who should be greatest in the kingdom of heaven. Luke wrote of the same incident. That three out of the four Gospel narrators should mention this incident shows that it must have been of considerable significance to them. It left a lasting impression. At the time of this occurrence the disciples were likely thinking of the mission of Christ in terms of the establishment of, or redemption of Israel as a nation, in which they would occupy prominent official positions with Christ, the Redeemer of Israel, as their king.

This nationalistic concept of the mission of Christ was still in the minds of the apostles even after the resurrection of Jesus, for when he appeared to them they asked him, "Wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?"—Acts 1:6. This was distinctly a worldly point of view and was entirely out of harmony with the final commission that he gave to them to go into all the world and teach his message to all nations. The kingdom of God is universal rather than national. Jesus saw clearly what the disciples did not see—that there could be no permanent redemption for Israel until her peoples were redeemed spiritually from the narrowness of their own nationalistic concepts. The desire upon the part of the disciples to have Israel restored grew out of this distorted nationalistic concept in which they thought they saw the opportunity for prominence and power. History shows that men generally tend toward inordinate desires for prominence and power. They do not hesitate under the impulse of these desires to set themselves up as masters, rulers, and dictators over their fellow beings. It was a distorted concept of the kingdom which led to contention among the twelve of that day. Had this not been corrected finally it would have destroyed the spiritual vitality essential to their apostleship, and they never could have participated fully in the building of the kingdom which Christ was seeking through their ministry.

Contention destroys harmony in human relationships. Jesus used a little child as an example for teaching these apostles kingdom-of-heaven harmony. He set a child in their midst and said, "Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." The greatest of humility is demonstrated by little children. Many lessons may be learned from observing their conduct. True, they quarrel, but they soon forget their disputes and are friends again. They do not hold lengthy grudges. Harmony sometimes exists among the children of widely divided parents. Their own friendship supersedes the grievances of their parents. Harmony growing out of this kind of humility must be acquired by the adult members of the church who would assist in the building of God's kingdom on earth. The Lord forewarned the church in our day of these dangers by saying: "No one can assist in this work, except he shall be humble and full of love, having faith, hope, and charity, being temperate in all things whatsoever shall be intrusted to his care."

Discord leads to contention and anger. Anger leads to strife and division. These are Satanic devices that lead to destruction. "And if a house be divided against itself that house cannot stand." Paul challenged the church at Ephesus, "Can ye be angry and not sin? Let not the sun go down on your wrath."

Every wise man will guard and control his temper. If he becomes angry and injures another, he will seek reconciliation. An uncontrolled temper giving rise to an uncontrolled tongue can do more in a few minutes to destroy harmony in human relationships than a lifetime of efforts for peace may eradicate. What unfortunate havoc is sometimes wrought by a vicious temper coupled with an unruly tongue circulating unwarranted gossip or slander. The effect of such is destructive even though the intent may have been no more than an outburst of temper. How often the work of the church has been hindered and brought into disrepute by the sins which separate us.

This is not to say that differences of opinions are unseemly. They become unseemly only when those who hold such differences themselves become irreconcilable. Opinions may easily be reconciled by those who carry the spirit of reconciliation in their hearts. Unfortunately there have been times when branches of the church have been rendered impotent or destroyed by the disintegrating forces of backbiting, bickering, and relentless quarreling. Indeed we are still suffering because of past church-wide controversies which are well known to many of us. The fruit of such controversies slow up the work of the church, and must be completely eliminated before an ideal condition can be achieved. The Lord has repeatedly emphasized this in the more recent revelations to the church. As we have succeeded in rising above these undesirable and wasteful controversies, missionary fervor and power have grown within the church.

The Means of Harmony

1. Harmony has its beginning in our missionary endeavors. Nothing can be more pertinent to the strengthening and unifying of the forces of the church than for every member to be engaged in the work of winning souls to Christ. Such harmony is also basic to the fitting of converted lives into Z̄ionic standards and procedures. We must find and use the means by which harmony is achieved in doing the missionary work of the church. The building of Zion depends upon this. The reason Zion is not fully redeemed today is that this essential unity has not existed heretofore in our efforts. With this in mind we might profitably and carefully study the following divine analysis of conditions which retarded and nearly destroyed the early church of the Restoration.

Verily I say unto you, concerning your brethren who have been afflicted, and persecuted, and cast out from the land of their inheritances, I, the Lord have suffered the affliction to come upon them, wherewith they have been afflicted in consequence of their transgressions; . . . Behold, I say unto you, there were jar-rings, and contentions, and envyings, and strifes, and lustful and covetous desires among them. Therefore by these things they polluted their inheritances.

The degree of unity essential to the redemption of Zion has never been fully achieved since the days of Enoch. Would that in some future day it might be written of our time: "Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined." Yet we have gained much ground and no doubt are approaching the time of such glorious achievements. May the work be hastened in righteousness!

2. The divine commission to preach the gospel to all nations is primary in the foundation of all harmonious Christian endeavors. At the very heart of the elementary factors involved in this commission is the love of God for humanity. Growing out of this love is God's recognition of and concern for fundamental human needs. God has moved to supply this need through his grace manifested in the life of Jesus Christ, his Son. God shared all of this with his church by commissioning it to participate in the work of revealing that love to all nations through the preaching of the gospel.

The more we, who are entrusted with the responsibilities of preaching the gospel, turn our attention to missionary work, the greater will become our unity. If we neglect to prepare for and to carry out this commission we shall be without its unifying factors. Discord will ensue. Every time discord arises the attention and activity of those who participate therein and those who are affected thereby are diverted from things of primary importance. Things which are valueless and even harmful come into prominence. Church officers are under the necessity of devoting time to the settling of difficulties which may arise. Much of their time is taken from the essential work of pushing forward in the winning of souls through the primary work of evangelism. Accompanying such diversions is always the commensurate loss of integrating spiritual power. The only way to eliminate the forces of disintegration is to recapture the missionary fervor of witnessing to win people to Christ.

When discord developed at Kirtland in the early church, harmony was restored as a number of the twelve went on a mission to Europe. Magnificent blessings followed the evangelizing efforts of these noble men. What a pity the church could not have continued always in this spirit of sacrificial devotion to ministry. If it had the tragedies of Nauvoo and Carthage might never have occurred. Who knows what blessed changes might have been written in the history of Europe had the church been faithful to her commission and without disruption continued to preach the gospel to the nations of that distant continent. As it is we, today, have the memories of two world wars fresh in our minds and are threatened with a third.

In the perilous time of our own controversy on church government, the Lord gave us this timely counsel:

The hastening time is here and greater unity than ever before is necessary if the forces of opposition are to be met; and such unity will prevail if those holding the priesthood will remember their commission to preach the gospel, and each officer will seek to discharge his own duty and magnify his calling.

What applies to the church in general will apply to branches and districts. Often the solution to difficulties in our branches and districts has been reached by directing the attention and activities of the priesthood and membership toward evangelism. Pastors and district presidents may with profit give adequate consideration and study to this effectual means of eliminating friction and contention.

3. In order to achieve harmony we must keep Jesus Christ at the focal point of our witnessing ministry. The spirit of testimony must be kept alive within the church. Jesus must be kept both at the center and at the growing edge of our great commission to mankind. This was done by the apostles and seventy of the New Testament Church in carrying out the instructions of their Master. Peter on the day of Pentecost boldly testified of Christ whom he had denied only a few weeks earlier, and continued faithfully in that testimony to the end of his days. Paul wrote to the Corinthian church, "For I determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ and him crucified." To the Philippians he wrote, "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus." Christ had but one intent of mind and that was to manifest the love and power of God needed to redeem mankind.

4. This love of Christ in us will unite us as nothing else can. The peace of the world will depend solely upon a man's reception of the love of Christ in his own mind and heart. Yet, this love will die unless it finds expression in winning others to him. When we are fully absorbed in carrying the love of Christ into other lives because they too need him, there will be no room for discord among us. We cannot carry this love in our hearts without loving each other and all mankind. Love is the seed of harmony. When it is planted in human hearts and allowed to grow, it bursts forth with a divine beauty revealing truth and power to win others to God. Those attracted and moved by this power will become the material out of which God will build his kingdom on earth. The same beauty and power will adorn the courts of paradise and make heaven the abode of the redeemed. "These are they which came out of great tribulation and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

5. A further factor in acquiring harmony is that we must observe and teach the commandments of Christ. Jesus gave special emphasis to the keeping of his commandments. He associated observance of the commandments he had given with the last commission to the twelve. "Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and, lo I am with you always, unto the end of the world." The keeping of his commandments is the final demonstration of our love for Christ. "He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me." These doctrinal concepts of our message must remain always the same and will need constant re-emphasis.

6. Observance of the divine plan in church organization is a prerequisite to the building of harmony into our missionary program. In writing to the congregation at Corinth, after having described the functioning of this plan, Paul reasoned, "God hath tempered the body together, having given more abundant honor to that part which lacked, that there should be no schism in the body, but that the members should have the same care one for another." To the church at Ephesus, he wrote, "And he gave some apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; . . . till we all come in the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." —Ephesians 4: 11, 12. It should be inspiring to us to know that God designed the church to minister in such manner that if we work in accord with his plan there will be unity among us. The church needs the strength of this unity to fulfill its divinely appointed mission to the world. The gifts of ministerial functioning enhance our spiritual life and witnessing testimony when we observe and have respect for the offices and officers which God has set in the church.

Heretofore it has been and still is the work of the church to give sustaining spiritual leadership to a world which is constantly losing its way in its own Babylonian confusion. This can be accomplished only as souls are brought in contact with the divine light of the gospel through the missionary work of God's people. Men of God who have had this understanding, who have caught the vision of the needs of humanity through the various ages, have proved themselves willing to give all that they have in the ministry which seeks to lead men from darkness into light.

Isaiah prophesied of Christ: "Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end." The only way peace can come to humanity is through the power of Christ revealed in the righteousness of the Saints. As long as the church absorbs the influence of the gospel of peace in her way of life, she will possess the power to give great spiritual guidance to those who are seeking a better way than the world has to offer. The perfecting of the organization, together with the observance of the divine commandments, adds strength to this ministerial leadership.

7. In order to give this leadership we must keep the channel of divine revelation open. We must hold fast to what we have already received. This, above all else, will permit the free operation of the Holy Spirit to guide us into all truth. By this means the power of the gospel of redemption is kept alive in the church. Salvation is gained through the processes of revelation as God moves to redeem men and women, and they in turn are enlightened and inspired to move toward God. Therefore, while we contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints, let us do so in the unity of the faith which produces in our evangelistic movement kingdom-of-God peace and harmony.

The world languishes for such a manifestation of peace. "For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestations of the sons of God. . . . For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now." The challenge of the kingdom of God to us is to reveal the way to peace and harmony among all men. We ourselves must be fully united if we are to accept the challenge.

The Present Outlook

I believe the time has come for us to enter an era of more unified church expansion. It is clearly apparent that we are not only on the move, but swinging into a position that will enable us to use our full strength affirmatively in the battle for righteousness. Through the unification of our forces and the effective use of the full strength of our resources, power will be revealed to meet the challenge as well as the impact of a discordant and distraught world. With the sound financial policy of the church continued, we now look forward to leadership which will enable the Bishopric to receive surplus as the forerunner of the storehouse in our Zion organization. As this surplus is used for the development of Zion, the purchase of lands, and the erection of essential buildings; and as the Auditorium may be more fully completed, great blessings should attend these efforts to expand the work of the kingdom of God.

New emphasis in a very tangible way is being given to the missionary work of the church by those whose responsibility it is to give direction and leadership in this field. The Book of Mormon is being translated into Spanish, and an apostle and a missionary have been appointed to the Book of Mormon and Spanish speaking peoples of America. Improved helps are being made ready to enlist more of the local forces in missionary work. Careful attention and planning have resulted in the organization of two new stakes. Very splendid efforts already are achieving results in the field of priesthood education.

With these examples of what can be achieved by unified efforts we move forward. While we justly take pride in these achievements, the work yet to be done humbles us and makes us conscious of our constant dependence on God. Let us pray that the floodgates of impending devastation may remain closed long enough for us to get the job done and that the doors of opportunity may be opened further as we prepare to make greater advances. While the day lasts, let us avail ourselves of the opportunity to teach men the truth by which they shall be redeemed.

many times, that those who teach know too little about what they teach. We dare to influence the souls of our pupils. Let us be prepared to influence them for good. Church school attendance is no problem where good teaching is the rule.

Let each teacher be supported by the church school director and the other workers of the branch. Help each one to understand that his is a holy stewardship.

It is our purpose to bring every pupil to a lively faith in Jesus Christ.

We can do this only if we are adequately prepared. We must, therefore, master our lessons in advance, knowing well the purpose of each lesson and each combination of lessons. More than this we must know our children, their needs and desires. Most of all we must know Christ if we are to bring the children, young people, and adults into experience with him. Careless preparation, tardiness, absenteeism, and neglect in other ways are inexcusable. This is a day of preparation and advance.

We should make learning an exciting adventure. How can we ever coax bored pupils to follow Jesus Christ? There is no greater adventure than to walk in his steps. This being true, dull classroom routine is a far cry from real Christian teaching. Our approach to the gospel story must have zest and enthusiasm. The characters of the Three Standard Books and of church history must come alive in the hearts of our children and adults.

To bring the touch of reality to our teaching let us use frequently and with discretion all the available teaching aids. We need to rediscover the blackboard. There are many objects which may be employed to lend reality to teaching. Slides and film strips can bring the touch of real experience into the learning situation. It will take a little bit of time and some ingenuity, but we can afford to spend time and to use our ingenuity in encouraging Christian growth.

We shall endeavor to intensify loyalty to the church expressed through witnessing for Christ.

Loyalty to Christ and his church is more apt to be absorbed from parents and teachers who are enthusiastically loyal themselves than to be gained through argument. May we suggest that church school workers show their allegiance to the Master by a consistently affirmative approach to the church? It is love expressed in loyalty that promotes loyalty in others.

Every church school worker should provide opportunities for pupils to express their loyalty to Christ and his church by active participation in classwork and other group activities.

Most of all, this loyalty should be expressed in witnessing to others. People are not really loyal to Christ if they hug the blessings of the gospel to themselves. Each class ought to realize it is to be a witnessing agent. The teacher and individual class member are evangelists. Classes should be made to grow, and new classes need to be organized, continually expanding as new members are won.

It is our purpose to enlarge the church school by reaching out to win others to Christ.

Each church school should keep an active prospect list. This list should be constantly growing with the names of prospective pupils. These names may be obtained from friends and relatives, former church school pupils, public school contacts, neighborhood surveys, and new arrivals in the community. The responsibility for this list should be widely shared with the church school director, the church school secretary, and the class teacher primarily responsible. The responsibility ought to be shared with individual pupils on a sponsoring basis.

Each church school should act on the prospect list by means of:

1. House calls
2. Letters
3. "Bring Your Friend" programs
4. Personal interviews
5. Automobile helpers

This is a project for the entire church school with each class assuming responsibility and determining the methods to be followed.

A neighborhood survey may be employed to discover prospective pupils. The returns of the survey must not be a dust collector but must be considered as the first step toward winning those who are discovered. Those participating in neighborhood surveys need to be thoroughly prepared and to approach the occasion with prayer. They are to be ambassadors for Christ, therefore courtesy and kindness are imperative. Those discovered to be prospective pupils may be assigned to individual class members for follow-up visits. The teacher of the class or age grouping may follow up the contact, or class members may pair up to extend personal invitations.

A Vital Church School Program

The church school program must become more vital. Our worship services need to be more worshipful, challenging, and meaningful. Worship in the church school is not a substitute for the sermon. It is to be what its name implies—worship. In every way possible, in worship and other activities, wide participation should be encouraged. Over a period of time many may participate through reading the Word of God, individually or in choral reading. This should always be well done and ought, therefore, to be rehearsed. In this way more and more of our people shall come to treasure gems out of the Word of God. Any musical numbers made a part of the worship ought to be considered as an offering brought to Christ and not something to show off the talents of a performer. Prayers, whenever offered, must be from the heart. Many of our children and youth as well as adults may be encouraged to give two to four minute talks. Speaking about the gospel is an experience to be shared by many. These talks may develop the theme selected for the day or, as has been done to advantage, talks may be anticipated on such as the following plan each month:

First Sunday—What is happening in the church this month?

Second Sunday—A talk on some principle of the gospel.

Third Sunday—A talk on one of our missions abroad.

Fourth Sunday—A talk on some phase of stewardship.

Fifth Sunday—To be selected.

More of us need to be able to bear our testimony in words. The church school is a good place of training. Furthermore, we need to guarantee as wide participation as possible in important activities.

Adequate Church School Equipment

If our endeavor is to succeed we need to make the church school equipment adequate and attractive. Here the pupil is to learn of God. He should be encouraged to observe that there is beauty in God's house and that the equipment is adequate to the need. How strange that God, who provides so liberally for us, is so often inadequately represented in his own house. Our equipment may be humble and inexpensive, but it should be the best we can provide.

Decisions Through the Church School

Church school workers are in a fortunate position to observe when one is ready for a decision. They may have personal talks with pupils, wisely encouraging them to follow in the way of the Master. Church school workers ought to recommend to the church school director and branch president that Mr. John Doe and young Susie Brown are ready for baptism. The church school ought to provide prebaptismal classes whenever possible. There is no reason why these should not be in session the year round in many, many branches.

Reaching the Family

It is possible many times to reach through the pupils to the family. A call may be made at the home by the church school teacher. The church school teacher might recommend to the branch president that the time is right for a call by him or some other member of the priesthood. There may be special occasions at church for parents and the children. There may be achievement programs, or better still, there may be worship together in which the children and parents participate. The value of the old-fashioned Sunday school picnic and church suppers ought not to be overlooked.

Expanding the Program

Our church school program can be expanded and is successfully expanded in many places through the vacation church school. In Phoenix, Arizona; in Des Moines, Iowa; in the Center Place, and in a great number of other places, our church school leaders and pastors are discovering that the vacation church school draws in nonmember children by the scores. Equally important is this fact that the few hours the church school has with the children during the year can be doubled in a short time through the vacation church school.

Why not try a neighborhood story hour in which truly great stories without direct religious application are told at regular times week after week? Many mothers, and many others who have no children, are gifted in the art of telling stories. What a wonderful way to minister to the children of the neighborhood and bring them nearer to Christ. These children may later be drawn singly or in groups to the church school.

Home study is possible in thousands of homes throughout the church. Of course, we mean that such study ought to supplement the church school hour among those privileged to attend church schools, but more than this we mean study in the homes of those who are isolated from church privileges. A list of materials is available from the Department of Religious Education for enlivening the home study program.

Mission Church Schools

Let's have some outposts of the Restoration Movement. Wherever one or more families in our non-resident membership can get together, a small church school may be started. The materials available for home study plus study materials for youth and adults may be obtained from the Herald House. All that is really required to get started is some initiative and devotion. Our concern is for people—and most of them are out there beyond the walls of the church but within our reach. We must take the Restoration to them.

Closer Contact Between Branch Officers and Church School Workers

Too many times the branch seems to have two very diverse operations. This ought not to be, for every function in the branch is one more means of witnessing for Christ. These various functions need to be blended if the branch is to bear fruit. May we suggest closer contact between branch officers and church school workers.

Enlisting New Teachers

The church relies on its school to pass on the heritage of the Restoration and to nurture the seeds of redemption. We do need to add new zest and new life to the church school. This can be done by enlisting qualified or willing-to-qualify teachers. We have been crippled because many of our best qualified church members have not taken the church school seriously. We are all called to fit in wherever we can make our best contribution. We need to challenge and enlist more teachers—enlist them for shorter terms if necessary, but enlist them. Then we should give opportunity for staff meetings, for training, and for recognition of work well done.

New Adult Classes

We tend to think of the church school in terms of children. We ought to think of it in terms of meeting the needs of all ages and of every member of the branch. There are adults in the church school. Not all of them know all the answers. There is much for all of us to learn. Furthermore, adult classes may be used in evangelistic work. Existing adult classes should be made to grow, never remaining satisfied to have just familiar faces in attendance. We ought, also, to have new adult classes organized. To these new classes we may invite our adult friends. Our lesson material then may well be Bible centered. "The Life and Ministry of Jesus" will be available this fall. There are millions of adults in the domestic field unchurched and untouched by the Restoration message. They constitute a vital part of our major mission field.

Let each one bring one to the church school, and let those brought to the church discover that ours is a friendly church where strangers are welcome and where the first experience is so happy and helpful that they desire to return. Let them see in the alert and adequately prepared staff the promise of real help in gaining Christian experience. Let them find courtesy and a willingness to understand differences by class members as well as by teachers. It is not for us to chastise but to encourage. Let's keep track of all contacts, adding prayer to our efforts that we may truly minister the Word.

Each one bring one to church school!

Family Worship and the Child

BY WILSON RITCHIE

THOSE WHO GUIDE CHILDREN shape the destiny of the world. Our world is what it is because of the way we behave; and we behave as we do because of our attitude, which attitudes depend on our philosophy of life. The basis of this philosophy is gained in childhood.

People often profess adherence to a certain religion, then show by their actions that they didn't believe in it at all. Their philosophy is something altogether different from their profession. Sometimes religion shapes our philosophy but often it does not. The child is not born with a philosophy, but develops one as he grows.

There is an increasing appreciation of the place of the home in the development of a child's philosophy. Here is laid the foundation for life—or death. Perhaps the home learning which takes place in a child's formative years is more significant than all the other learning of his life. Certainly the pattern of behavior is developed there, and it is this which shapes the child's destiny.

The importance of early life is borne out by everything that grows. There is a plastic beginning, then a season of development along the general lines dictated by the beginning, then a period of hardening.

ONE'S OUTLOOK ON LIFE is shaped almost entirely by home, church, and school. However church and school have an element of unreality, while home is real. That which the child sees done at home becomes a part of him.

Legions of delinquent parents today are impressed by the beautiful theory of Christianity. They say to their children, "I'm going this way but don't you follow me; you go that way. It's the best way." Actually the child does not believe that parent and refuses the advice. He follows the example.

People are influenced most by those they love best. If a child's parents love him, he will love them in return. He will identify himself with them and their interests.

Parents are called not so much to delineate forms of behavior for the child, but to lead him to a satisfactory philosophy of life. This is most successfully done by helping him to develop a growing appreciation for his Heavenly Father. An introduction to the Creator is an introduction to eternal values, and a proper evaluation of the many segments of life results in the ideal philosophy.

It is impossible for the child to reason these things out. He must have a guide. Early in life he becomes a keen observer of his guide and seeks to emulate him. If eternal values are important to the parent, the child will also consider them to be important. The home in which such an appreciation exists is the home with a kingdom of God atmosphere. This is the ideal environment for people, young or old. It is permeated with the Holy Spirit, which can abide only where it is welcome.

REGULAR WORSHIP at church alone is not sufficient for the needs of the home. Individual worship at home does not suffice. The home which has the proper elements for spiritual growth has these two and family worship also.

Worshipping at church once a week with his parents is of such value to the child that nothing can compensate for the lack of it. Likewise there is no substitute for family worship in the home throughout the week.

When mother and father actually bow to God in the home, it is particularly meaningful to the child. When all members of the family worship together through the week, religion becomes a real day-to-day part of life. Private prayer and meditation also are essential to adults, but such devotions may be meaningless to a child.

The family altar is the dynamo of the home. It places proper emphasis upon the divine will and relates God to everyday living. The friction of human relations vanishes when the family approaches God together. Peace and harmony are the natural results. The child's growing understanding of the attributes of God can come only as he sees evidences of these good qualities in the lives of others. And they are most impressive when perceived in his Creator. He is guided to a sense of right relationships. The meaning and purpose of life are unfolded to him.

Conditioned by the working of the Holy Spirit, the child will increasingly identify himself with the purposes of God. The idea of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man becomes something more than pretty words. As the child visualizes all people looking to God as their Father, it is easier for him to understand that the world is one large family. Attention given in the home to right human relationships enables him to discover that this is the basis of happiness. He will find himself naturally drawn toward the dedication of his life and talents to promoting love among men. He cannot do otherwise and be at peace. The idea of stewardship is the only way of life that will seem sound to him.

Of course there are children who will reject these things, despite the best their parents seem able to do. However, the person who has felt the surge of the Holy Spirit has known contact with God, and this experience will prove powerfully effective. The agency of each individual entitles him to deny this power its rightful place within himself, but the denial is different for one whose formative years were spent with a heart uplifted to the source of light and love.

People sometimes learn obedience through suffering. The person who has learned to rely upon prayer is more able to profit from his trials than one who has no belief in a higher being.

TWO OF OUR GREATEST NEEDS are a sense of freedom and a sense of security. That is true both of individuals and society. Only as God becomes our refuge, our strength, and our bulwark can we find the security of spirit which is the basis of full, wholesome living.

It is the parents' responsibility to guide their children to such a relationship with their Creator. He who knows how to pray should never be afraid. Prayer is a means of calling upon God for guidance or help. True, when we ask him to interpose in our behalf, we are admitting our own weakness, our lack of self-sufficiency, but such humility builds character. Many of the anxieties of our age stem from our refusal to admit this very fact.

Children are teachable. They learn from others most of the philosophy which will set their course upon the sea of life. It is possible to develop within them an intense hunger for spiritual food. The best philosophy is that of the Creator. Those who dwell in a home in which the divine spirit is present have the best opportunity to harmonize their outlook with that of the Creator. The mind of Christ will dwell in those who give themselves in devotion to him.

Thoughtful people stand in awe before the handwork of the Creator. They admire the skill of the One who designed and made the atom and the sun. They reverence him as Lord of heaven and earth, and are overwhelmed as they begin to comprehend the love he has for his creatures.

Yet this all powerful God is intensely concerned over our welfare, and his greatest desire is that we may share immortality and eternal life with him. He invites us to share his work with him and the glory which is his.

THE KINGDOM OF GOD can come about only as people learn to think properly. There can be no success without right-thinking. And at the point where thinking begins, God has placed a parent. He himself fashioned the body and breathed into it the breath of life. But the shaping of the character is in the hands of parents.

Parenthood is a tremendous responsibility and a glorious opportunity. God has given parents the power of creation, and for a time the infant's parent is the only God he knows. It is then that they must set the example which will help the child build a healthy philosophy for the remainder of his life.

Immortality in a Seed

(NOTE: The preservation of the power of germination in seed appears as a symbol of immortality to many people. In the P. S. Column last year, an item asked for further information on the subject. Gerald Gabriel of Stewartsville, Missouri, kindly responded. The following is his letter.—EDITOR.)

THE SMALL GRAIN seed found in the Egyptian tomb, the ancestor of our modern wheat, did germinate. Seeds held in storage under very favorable conditions—dry air, uniform temperature, and perhaps with the exclusion or partial exclusion of oxygen, may retain their vitality through a long period of years. Ewart reports (Proceedings of the Royal Society of Victoria, Volume 21, Part I, page 210, 1908 and 1909) "the germination of a sample of white sweet clover 44 years old as 52 per cent and another sample of the same species 77 years old as 18.2 per cent."

Becquerel ("A Study of the Germination Power of Seeds," Botanical Gazette, Volume 58, page 102, 1914), tested over 500 species of seeds ranging from 25 to 135 years old. Seed of a legume germinated after 85 years of storage.

Seeds of the lotus over 200 years old are reported as germinating 100 per cent by Ohga ("On the Longevity of Seed of Nelumbo Nucifera," Botanical Magazine, Tokyo, Volume 37, pages 431-444, 1923). These seeds have lain in a layer of peat in a drained lake bed for several centuries and are still giving 100 per cent germination with greater vigor of seedlings than is shown by one-year-old seed. These seeds have about 9 per cent moisture and were buried about 3 feet below the surface.

Goss ("The Vitality of Buried Seeds," Journal of Agricultural Research, Volume 29, Number 7, pages 349-362, October 1, 1924) buried the seed of 107 species of plants in 1902. A portion of these seeds were dug up in 1903, '05, '08, '12, '18, and '23. Of these 107 species, 71 grew in 1903, 61 in 1905, 68 in 1908, 69 in 1912, 50 in 1918, after 16 years, and 51 in 1923 after 20 years.

Not a very good thing to think about when you plow under a crop of weed seed in the garden, is it?

Fifty Momentous Years

YOU AND I and millions now living have seen greater and more revolutionary material changes than the people of any half century since the beginning of man's sojourn here on earth.

Admittedly there have been earlier periods of great wars, of intense artistic and literary development when the minds of men seemed to blossom and reach out into the unknown, and of great social changes, but in these last fifty years we have had it all—wars of unprecedented carnage and intensity, revolutions, social upheavals, astonishing scientific discoveries, the rise and fall of empires and social systems. Such commonplace things as aviation, electricity, radio, the automobile, refrigerator, skyscraper, movies, diesel engines and jet propulsion have all been perfected during the past fifty years.

It is well, though, to bear in mind the fact that most of the fundamental laws underlying the development and operation of these inventions were discovered during the nineteenth century, when the light of heaven began to dawn in both the physical and spiritual realms of man's experience. Just as Joseph Smith became a spiritual adventurer, proclaiming to an incredulous world that "God speaks," so giants of science like Edison, Faraday, and Marconi were busy delving into the laws of pulsating matter and learning the operation of those laws and their application to man's needs. Hand in hand then the prophet, the engineer, the sociologist, and the scientist worked to produce the most brilliant, fruitful, rich, fascinating, bewildering—and the most dangerous—fifty years in the history of mankind.

The distinguishing characteristic of our age has not been individual discovery but team research directed toward the development and application of known principles. The great governmental and private laboratories have replaced the lone genius. International exchange of information regarding scientific discoveries has been made possible by improved communications so that scientists of all countries can and do work together on the most promising discoveries. Surely this international teamwork of science challenges us to teamwork on our social program of Zion and stewardships. Today people demand practical demonstrations before accepting theories.

LET US GO BACK fifty years in reminiscence. Britain was the foremost world power. Queen Victoria, then reigning, wrote sadly (and we believe prophetically) as the clocks struck midnight, on December 31, 1899: "I begin a new year and a new century, full of anxiety and fear of what may be before us."

It was the gaslit time of settled habits when people knew their places—when young ladies helped mothers arrange flowers and thoroughly believed a woman's place was in the home. Virtues and beliefs were fixed. Peace seemed to be permanent, and development was expected to be gradual.

The next decade was light and frivolous in comparison. The opera was in vogue and few thought of war. Horse-drawn cabs still predominated, although a few "cranks" were tinkering with motor cars. A young American engineer named Henry Ford was trying a great experiment in applying assembly line production to motor cars. Cheap transportation for the masses was his ideal. "They can have any color they like, so long as it is black" he told his colleagues. The famous Model-T Ford—the "Tin Lizzie" of affectionate memory—came on the market during this decade. This revolutionized transport and gave birth to the great petroleum industries, chains of garages and hotels, and network of roads.

BY VIVIAN SORENSON

Pioneers in other fields were shaping our 1950 world. In Chicago the aggressive, self-confident architect, Louis Sullivan, was proving that structural steel permitted a completely new style of architecture. He showed us how to build the skyscraper. The Wright Brothers were receiving criticism for attempting to fly—"God would have given men wings had he wished them to fly"—but pioneerlike they continued ignoring the critics, and today we have the modern airplane annihilating space and creating international problems.

In 1907 D. W. Griffith made the first film story, "Ben Hur," which featured the close-up and other camera tricks for the first time.

By 1910 we could just discern the shape of our modern world. The future looked bright, prosperous, and happy. Wages were improving and education was becoming increasingly available to most people. War was unthinkable.

In 1913 and 1914 people were asking, "What will the Kaiser do?" Twenty-five years later they were to ask, "What will Hitler do?" The Kaiser answered the question, and in August, 1914, German hordes began the First World War. Four years of agony shook the world to its foundation, and 8,000,000 men were killed in the shambles of its slaughter. Britain had been bled physically and economically and had lost her leadership of the world. A new, virile young giant, America, appeared over the top of the smashed remains of the old order. Misery, cynicism, want, and revolution were rife. Repentance was not considered. National hatreds remained smoldering, awaiting the fanning of fanatics that they might leap into flame again. Certain events were occurring behind the scenes which were to shake the world with an even greater convulsion than before Adolf Shicklgruber, known to infamy as Hitler, was seeking power. Benito Mussolini organized the Fascist Party in Milan in 1919, while Stalin in Moscow was getting control of the Bolshevik Party waiting.

THE BOOM YEARS of the 20's were beginning, and reconstruction programs were getting into stride. Again lightheartedness and gaiety wooed the hearts of men from God. The jazz age was ushered in. Money was plentiful; the automobile—cheap and fashionable—was drawing people away from churches, bent on Sunday pleasure and entertainment. The talkies, radio, and air transport made great strides. The world was again frivolous and happy; then suddenly, almost overnight, tragedy intervened. The depression fell, and in 1930 Hitler won the German elections. This was the end of an era.

Gaiety turned to bitterness as class distinction and inequality became magnified by the depression. Even the church had to retrench its missionaries. Despondency and despair overwhelmed mankind. Suicides became prevalent, men who lost their fortunes sought the "cowards' way out." In 1933 a new giant appeared on the world stage. In his cultured Harvard voice that the world was soon to know so well, the new President of the United States, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, told his countrymen, "We have nothing to fear but fear itself." The world needed him and was to look to him for leadership until his tragic death.

During these years from the end of World War I, an unstable peace had been kept by the League of Nations, but in 1939 Winston Churchill gave a warning voice regarding Germany's intentions. The League was still discussing disarmament and appeasement when the great shadow of a catastrophe again took shape, and World War II began in direct violation of all treaties formulated by the League.

The history from 1939 until now is still fresh in our memory and needs no recounting, but let us take a brief glance at the aftermath—the extremely troubled peace of today.

THE WAR permitted Russia to march westward into Europe and eastward into Asia. It dragged Britain down to the level of a great debtor nation and consumed her resources. It left the United States and Russia extremely powerful, destroyed old states, created new ones, and altered the balance of power throughout the world. It has repeated the history of Joseph in Egypt feeding his brethren, in the fact that Joseph's land—America—has fed the hungering nations of Europe and cared for both Jew and Gentile in the greatest rehabilitation program the world has ever known. It destroyed the British Commonwealth of Nations, stirred great waves of human migration, and inspired a new spirit of nationalism in Asia and the Middle East. It produced the atomic bomb, the blasts of which have resounded around the world and presented one of our greatest problems in determining how it shall be used in the future, for good or for evil.

One aftermath perhaps not generally recognized is the fact that there has been a stimulation in the quest for religion, a sort of clutching at straws perhaps, but nevertheless a perceptible movement toward God by many people. This argues well for the progress of tomorrow.

OUR RETROSPECTION has shown us that vast panorama of events and changes which have been crammed into the last half century. It has verified the prophetic statement of President F. M. Smith when in 1925 he said, "The hastening time is upon us." It should direct our earnest attention to the possibilities of the next fifty years which promise to be even more momentous than the last fifty. If the same tempo of change and development is maintained—and we have every reason to believe that it will be—would it be unreasonable to believe that the culmination of all things spoken of by the holy prophets of old may be ushered in during the next half century? Did not the revelation of the last General Conference move in harmony with the tempo of the age, when the Lord said, "The hopes of my people and the goals of my church, while not yet fully realized are closer to realization than many recognize"?

Let us ponder a moment upon the stupendous forces of evil unleashed and displayed in a decade by Hitler and his associates, the changing of the routine of the whole world emanating from the frenzied minds of a few fanatics. If you admit a God and agree that his power is superior to that of the devil, can you not reconcile your mind to the fact of what can be accomplished by a body of people such as our church, motivated by his Spirit for good?

The Lord calls us in no uncertain voice to labor unreservedly to bring about the spiritual redemption of Zion. The time is opportune; the need is urgent. Surely the record of the last fifty years demonstrates one supreme tragedy—man's inability to govern himself while remaining divorced from God. The wonderful discoveries of science and the material progress of our age have far outstripped our spiritual advancement with disastrous results to humanity. As a church we have largely failed to stem the tide, but this must and will not occur during the half century ahead if we heed the invitations of our God to work for the emancipation of mankind from spiritual bondage. "It is yet day when all can work. The night will come when for many of my people opportunity to assist will have passed." What a splendid opportunity lies before us to assist in the greatest altruistic work ever committed to man—to have a part in the great final drama of the ages, to contribute to the final triumphant march of righteousness and everlasting peace.

Question Time

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. Address questions to Herald Editors rather than panel members. We shall try to take all questions in the order they are received. Be patient, there may be several ahead of yours. Only signed questions sent by contributors will appear here.—EDITOR.

QUESTION:

What is the teaching of the church concerning purgatory?
Minnesota

E. F.

ANSWER:

The position of the church on this and other questions of doctrine and practice is found in the accepted Scriptures of the church—the Inspired Version of the Bible, the Book of Mormon, and the Doctrine and Covenants. We have never indorsed the current doctrine of purgatory as held with some variations by both the Roman and Eastern Catholic Churches, which hold it to be a temporary condition or place of suffering to which communicants of these churches are supposed to go at death, for reform and purification in preparation for ultimate admission to heaven to which place they go when their cleansing is complete. It is held that the period of suffering may be shortened and cleansing advanced through the prayers, gifts, sacrificial works, and the offering of the Mass in their behalf by friends on earth. The doctrine is repudiated by practically all the Protestant Churches.

The doctrine as it stands today has little ground of support in our Scriptures. There is a hell where the wicked go—those who have willfully refused the gospel of salvation when it has been offered them under the Spirit of God, who have willfully chosen to abide in sin and have become “sons of perdition.” These are “reserved in chains of darkness until the judgment of the great day” (Genesis 7: 1, 64; Doctrine and Covenants 38: 1) and are in the same relation to God as the fallen angels for whom there is no hope; they must suffer the second death (Jude 6; Doctrine and Covenants 76: 4). Another class of the wicked find a different hell which is reformatory; here the gospel is preached, offering hope and deliverance in due time. These suffer for their sins until they repent and find cleansing through obedience, though they will not be redeemed in the resurrection until after the thousand years. The Lord says, “They shall be heirs of salvation,” though they must occupy in an inferior glory. They are referred to as “the telestial world” (I Peter 4: 10; I Corinthians 15: 40, 41; Doctrine and Covenants 76: 7; 85: 5, 6, 29). This place of reform is for the wicked who have not sufficiently known the gospel on earth to have repented and become the children of God. It is not for the obedient believers, and so differs altogether from the idea of purgatory.

There are two references in Scripture which approach more closely to purgatory. Matthew 5: 27, 28 (Authorized Version 25, 26), indicating that unreconciled grievances upon the part of Christ’s disciples may be cause for being “cast into prison,” from which release comes only after “thou hast paid the uttermost farthing,” or, in other words, got rid of the sin. This is spoken specifically to the disciples and applies to the children of God who permit some incidental sin to remain unrepented and unremoved. The other reference is still more specific, being directed to the apostles, who having quarreled, were unwilling to forgive each other. In his rebuke Christ gave them the parable of the two debtors, one of whom, owing a great sum which he was unable to pay, asked mercy and was forgiven the debt; but finding a fellow servant who owed him a pittance, he refused forgiveness and cast him into prison. His master hearing of it canceled his forgiveness and cast him into prison until the debt should be paid. Jesus applied it to his apostles in these words:

So likewise shall my heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses.—Matthew 19: 34.

So the child of God carrying any sin knowingly through life and into the next world, must first be cleansed by suffering in the “prison” provided of God, before he can enjoy the glories of the kingdom. Even an apostle cannot take sin into the kingdom of God.

Our Scriptures teach that this life is the time of probation and of preparation for the kingdom of God. It is the time for sanctification.

If we do not improve our time while in this life, then cometh the night of darkness, wherein there can be no labor performed.—Alma 16: 230.

The man who has made no effort to repent when he knew he should, will not find opportunity to do so on the other side, but the faithful and diligent man who has repented though perhaps failing in some point of the law through weakness, may find the “prison” a convenient means of overcoming, thereby completing his preparation.

The worthy children of God are received at death into “paradise,” a place of peace and rest, with freedom from all pain and sorrow where they await the time of their resurrection.

QUESTION:

Is there any place of correction comparable to purgatory described in our church doctrine?

Minnesota

E. F.

ANSWER:

Only as we have noted in the preceding answer, and that is designed for rare and incidental cases—not for all the children of God as purgatory is supposed to do.

CHARLES FRY.

QUESTION:

Why does the Inspired Version of the Bible differ from the Book of Mormon on the wording of the Lord’s Prayer? The King James, English Revised, and the Book of Mormon agree.
Missouri

M. E. W.

ANSWER:

So far as I know, there is now no one living who can answer this inquiry with authority, as those involved in producing the work are not here to answer. However, the explanation which seems more reasonable to me than others suggested would be that an error must have crept into the text in some way. There are several ways in which this might have happened. The scribe who wrote the manuscript of the Book of Mormon was quite familiar with the King James Bible. At that time great reverence was felt for the exact wording of the Scriptures, and it could easily happen that one would record the language of a familiar text as he knew it to exist. One who has copied or recorded language knows how easy it is to write down an error in this way, because of what is indelibly written in the mind. The printer also claimed that he made some slight changes, but how many were corrected later, I do not know.

TOWER, MICHIGAN.—On July 9 fourteen candidates were baptized by Elders Max Kramer, pastor, and Ernest Willey. At the evening confirmation service the new members were welcomed into the church by District President Harry L. Doty. The winning of this group is the result of the testimony and work of many good people who have lived and ministered to them through the years. Elder Kramer has been the pastor for many years, and the work is going forward under his leadership and the leadership of Sister Beth Johnson, church school director. Of the new members, all are from 11 through 22 years, with the exception of three young mothers.—Reported by HARRY L. DOTY.

MICHIGAN.—Michivoix Youth Camp met on the Park of the Pines reunion grounds at Boyne City, Michigan, from June 25 through July 2. Fifty-five campers from Michigan and Indiana thoroughly enjoyed the week, using as a theme, "One Fold, One Shepherd." John Wiley, camp director, was assisted by Harry L. Doty, assistant director, boys' counselor, and music director; Marge Hulmes, camp nurse and camp-log adviser; Gladys Belrose, handicraft instructor, song leader, and girls' counselor; Ella Wiley, swimming instructor, campfire director, and girls' counselor; Ann Whiteford, recreational director, drama instructor, and girls' counselor; Betty Scott, crafts instructor, girls' counselor, and drama instructor; Ted Engle, instructor in canoeing, nature study, pioneering, flag raising, and boys' counselor; David Kaleikai, worship leader, K. P. director, and swimming instructor; Kenneth Simpson and Arnold Vanden Bosch, understudies and boys' counselors; Allen Schreur, business manager; Joseph Engmark, assistant business manager.—Reported by HARRY L. DOTY.

NORTHEASTERN ILLINOIS DISTRICT.—Aurora Branch: Three were baptized on July 4. Sandra Smith and Mike Flores were baptized by Arnold Settles; Dale Boxberger by Charles Homuth. Elders Settles, Homuth, and Clement Malcor officiated at the confirmation services. Special music was given by Gloria Settles, and a male quartet: Clarence White, Roy, Eljay, and Arnold Settles.

Deselm Branch: Vacation Church School was held at the home of Mrs. Pearl Pement, June 19-23. Twenty-two children attended, twelve of whom had perfect attendance. Workers were Pastor Earl Rogers, Elder Elmer Kahler, Beatrice Rogers, Isabel Kahler, Vida Rogers, Bernice Rogers, Rosaleene Smith, and Zada Pement. The achievement program was held on June 25 at the church.

Plano Branch: Many people traveling through Plano stop to visit the historic Stone Church. In recent months visitors have registered from Canada, Missouri, Iowa, Arizona, and Illinois.

Sandwich Branch: Elder Marion Blakely, former pastor of the branch, and his family were visitors on June 12. Elder Blakely showed slides he had taken in Arizona, their present home.—The Bulletin.

LAND O' LAKES REUNION, WISCONSIN.—Over 190 registered in the dormitories, and approximately another 50 in nearby cabins, cottages, and local residences. On the closing Sunday over 500 were in attendance.

The general church theme for reunions in 1950, "We Witness for Christ in the Restoration," was used as a theme for the reunion. Apostle Paul M. Hanson was in charge. He was assisted by Seventy Merle Guthrie and Elder W. T. Guthrie, appointee from Eastern States. Sister Nellie Mottashed of Belding, Michigan, was in charge of the women's department.

On July 8 three people were baptized.—Reported by J. A. CARL HEAVILAND.

MEDFORD, OREGON, ROGUE VALLEY MISSION.—Elder Ted Schuld conducted a baptismal service at Little Applegate River on the morning of July 9. Pastor Jim Davidson baptized Helen Petric of Sunny Valley and Jerry Murphy of Grants Pass. Brother Murphy was on leave from the Naval Base at San Diego. Earl and Mary Petric sang "Just as I Am." Prayers were offered by Harry Spinteg and John Weir. Confirmation services followed the baptisms. Attendance was fifty-one. This compared favorably with the attendance of nine when the branch was organized in 1949. After the services a picnic and swim were held at McKee State Park.

Ted and Wilma Schuld and their daughter Elizabeth have recently moved to Medford from Klamath Falls, Oregon.

Elders George Howell and Jimmy Burdick, and Priest Bob Buckingham were guest speakers in the spring.

Church services are being held temporarily at the Air Reserve Building at Medford Municipal Airport. Jim Davidson is the pastor.—Reported by MRS. JOHN WEIR.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA.—A dedication recital was held on July 16 for a new Hammond organ. This organ was made into a memorial—in memory of many of the Saints who once fellowshipped in the Minneapolis Branch. The dedication message was given by Elder C. Leslie Lynch, pastor. Elsie Bennett, church organist, accompanied Edith Olson and Darwin Rounds who sang a duet, and Thelma Turpen who played a violin solo. Elders Vernon Lundeen and Gordon Bennett offered prayers.

LITTLE SIOUX, IOWA.—On July 9 the following children were blessed by Elders L. D. Weldon of Moorhead, Iowa, and Charles Skinner of Missouri Valley, Iowa: Sandra Sue Ruffcorn, daughter of Simon Zeal Ruffcorn (mother deceased); John Vernon and Linda Charlene Bellville, children of Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Bellville; Charles Leroy Nelson, son of Mr. and Mrs. Harold O. Nelson; Richard Alan and James Roger Burton, sons of Muriel Johnson Burton, all of Mondamin, Iowa; and Anita Mae Bellville, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Gerald Bellville, of Quonset Point, Rhode Island.

WICHITA, KANSAS.—On the morning of April 23, the following were baptized by Elder Myron F. LaPointe and confirmed that evening: Esther Elizabeth Cassino, Robert Joseph Cassino, Frank Allen Cassino, Harvey Richard Clark, and Sam Larkin.

Linda Sue Rowlett, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Rowlett, was blessed on May 14 by Elders Orville Rowlett and C. R. Richards.

Roxanna Rowlett, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Orville Rowlett, and Mrs. Walter Rowlett were baptized by Elder Rowlett on Sunday morning, June 25, and confirmed the same evening.

During the last few months the women's department has sponsored a waffle supper, a rummage sale, a bazaar, and have been making and selling doughnuts to help send the children to reunion.

The Wichita Branch was host to a district priesthood institute on May 27 and 28. Apostle D. T. Williams and Seventy James Daugherty were present.

The Wichita choir presented a concert of religious and secular numbers on June 16. Under the leadership of Mrs. David Cavin, several scenes were depicted with various songs. The children's choir also sang a few numbers.—Reported by MARIAN MANUEL.

"Grateful for 'Daily Bread'"

I want to express my gratitude for Daily Bread. Often, before it was published, I wished the church would provide daily devotional material. To me it is spiritual manna. It gives me courage and renewed faith to meet the tasks of life. After I have read it, I give my Daily Bread to friends; I have also provided yearly subscriptions for some. They in turn share it with their friends.

May this "bringer of good things" continue to be published through the years.

The Value of Prayer

Three weeks before the Southern California Reunion last year, several of us women in Long Beach Branch decided to meet at the church every morning at 8:00 o'clock to pray for its success. Since the theme was "Each One Win One," we made a list of names of the people we would like to see accept the gospel. After we quit meeting at the church to pray, we observed a period of prayer each morning at nine in our homes. After ten months four of the people for whom we had been praying were baptized, and four young men were called to the priesthood. Others are taking an interest in the work.

Before Conference this year, when we were asked to fast and pray, the whole branch complied. On Palm Sunday we were blessed by an outpouring of the Spirit; and again on Easter at the sunrise service we experienced the presence of a divine power. We also have had prophecies at our midweek prayer services.

I have been a member of the church since 1936. I often compare my life to that of the engineer who had to run his train before the days of adequate lighting. At night he was always afraid of running into something, because the dim lights on the locomotive did not illuminate the track far enough ahead. Usually the objects he thought he saw were shadows. So it was with me when I came into this church—out of darkness into the light. No longer do I fear the shadows of doubt, for each time I pray more light comes to me.

Condolence

In writing a letter of condolence to bereaved friends, I was reminded that one should never attempt to argue such persons out of their grief, but express deep, heartfelt sympathy—a feeling of oneness with them. I think I never fully appreciated that advice so completely as in the days since Brother Rushton's death.

We know about the hope of the resurrection. As I read that last sermon of Brother Rushton's, it seemed to me he was trying to prepare us for his departure. Though I am aware that time heals all wounds, and I am able to think of him as being with us in spirit, yet I—with others—feel a deep hurt since he was taken away. We, the little people, learned to love him, and the emptiness in our hearts is not easily erased.

Note of Thanks

I wish to thank all who prayed for me when I was ill. I know it is through the prayers of God's people that I am regaining my health. For four weeks I couldn't get around the house, and it means much to me to be able to now. However, I still need the prayers of the Saints that I may be completely healed. I do thank the Lord for answering the prayers that have been offered for me in the past.

Choosing a Church

Recently I read of one person's search for a church—one that would satisfy her need. It made me wonder what we as a church could do to make our religion easier to find. It is appalling how many people have never heard of the Reorganized Church or, if they have, have no concept of what it stands for or how it differs from other churches. I also thought of how many things taught in the name of religion are far from it. Yet people go on living by these teachings. Many do not know how much God wants to do for his children. Few realize that he has a plan—a law—to which all things must conform; that we must do as he wills, not as we will; or that he can change us, but we cannot change him or his law.

Why can't people be educated to approach religion in the same way they do any business, trade, or profession? If we are going to build a structure, the first things we think of is a plan or blueprint, then a solid footing, a foundation, and on up, every step being according to the plans. We go to the best trade schools and colleges to learn how to make a living, yet we are unlearned about the most important things—how to live in this world and prepare for the next.

True religion must reach the reasoning powers, the common sense, as well as the heart and emotions—but it must be brought to the attention of those who are searching and those who are drifting. We display our religion in our daily lives, in our business dealings, in our social activities. But this is not enough—too few people are reached. As a church we must let the world know why and how our religion fills every need. We have to sell our product.

The only church service of ours I can get here in Alabama is the Messiah broadcast. Each Sunday I hear other churches broadcasting from coast to coast and wonder why our church, with so much to offer, doesn't do more radio work.

People everywhere are searching for a religion that has as its head a God who is the same today as yesterday—one to whom they can talk about everyday things, one who is not too far away or too majestic to care about his children, one who is just as interested in the needs of people on the earth today as he is in their immortal souls. This is the kind of religion people want, and it is the kind we have.

So many could be reached if they could only hear. I could scarcely believe my ears a few weeks ago when a friend—a mother of three children—said with tears in her eyes, "I don't know how to pray. I was never taught." I knew she had attended services as a girl at several different churches.

Are we, who have so much, doing all we can to spread the gospel as individuals and as a church?

The Spoken Word - Part I

Our American Heritage

BY FLOY L. BENNETT

THERE ARE SO MANY ELEMENTS which combine to make our speech what it is that it is difficult to analyze it for purposes of understanding and appreciation. Speech is a combination of sounds arranged in a prescribed manner, flavored with voice quality and spiced with personality—all of which is largely governed by the environment in which we learn to speak. We are all familiar, I imagine, with the story of the young American couple who adopted a French baby. The dotting foster parents enrolled in a French language class so they would be able to understand the baby when he was old enough to talk. These parents failed to recognize that in the development of language, environment is more significant than heredity. It is so true that we are the product of our environment that educators recognize the near impossibility of changing speech habits in adult life. Children learn first the language they hear at home from their parents and older brothers and sisters. All too soon parents are shocked, sometimes amused, by the startling increase in vocabulary after their children begin associating with playmates on the sidewalk and at school. Having learned, as adults, the hard way to keep our speech reasonably free from grammatical errors, we are avid in our eagerness to develop good speech habits in our children by setting the right example—by bringing them up in an environment of good speech. And although we certainly do not want to develop snobishness, sometimes we feel impelled to move out of certain neighborhoods and certain school districts because we fear that under existing circumstances our children are exposed too much to the undesirable elements in speech.

AS AMERICANS we have every reason to be proud of our language; we have less cause to be proud of the way it is often spoken. Because America has for generations been the melting pot of the world, our language has been much affected by that melting process of various races and cultures. English, as brought over to America in 1620, was not even then a pure language. It was a combination of the early Teutonic and Romance languages. Languages in all countries change with the years, but few have had the impetus for change that the American language has. It seems very unfair and literally untrue to speak of other languages as being more beautiful than the American English. Although statements to this effect are occasionally made, such opinions are not common among those who have made a careful study of language (speech).

It seems quite logical to assume that a language which has the strong, virile, vigorous, and rugged characteristics of the Teutonic combined with the sweet, lyrical, even limpid tones of the Romance languages would have a distinct advantage for colorful, meaningful, and exact expression over either the Teutonic or Romance languages alone. If speech might be compared to an orchestra, are we not much richer with the full orchestra than with either the violin or brass sections alone? With our vast vocabulary of synonyms, we can describe the beauty of a sunset, the devastating effects of a hurricane, the ugliness of slum areas in our large cities, or the gigantic structure of Boulder Dam with equal facility. Our language is full of onomatopoeic words whose sounds help to convey the meaning.

DIFFERENT FROM THE VOCABULARY available to Americans and quite aside from it is the language we use in which the elements of training, education, culture, locality, and personality play important roles. In our own great America we have several distinct dialects, and although the differences are not great enough to hamper our understanding each other, they are different. We have no wish to standardize pronunciations and rob sections of the country of their individuality in speech. The vast majority of the inhabitants of these United States, however, use a dialect spoken of as General American. It is the common language of the radio announcers, news commentators, and dramatic artists on radio, stage, and screen.

OUR LANGUAGE is often criticized because of its harshness, when it is not the language itself which creates that impression but the way in which it is spoken. Voice quality is affected by many circumstances. The climate of temperate zones is a causative factor in developing an unpleasant, harsh quality. The absence of or the wrong kind of education or unsatisfactory cultural environment also affect speech. The passion for speed and the nervous tension which seems to possess most Americans promote strident, harsh, tense voices. If we must apologize for our native language, let us put the responsibility where it belongs—not in the language itself but in the way it is too often spoken.

Although climatic conditions, cultural and educational levels, and physical limitations or defects may affect to some degree the quality of the speaking voice, perhaps a greater influence is exerted by personality, habits of associates, and amount of stress and strain in daily living. Voice usually points up very quickly the dominant or retiring personality. We take on the habits of our associates. Parents are the first examples; children invariably echo the parents both in vocabulary and manner of speaking. The teen-ager is obsessed with a fear of being different from the gang. He often purposely takes an undesirable habit which happens to be the present fad. Irritations, fatigue, or illness affect voices profoundly. Constantly blaring radios, phonographs, and juke boxes make it necessary for us to yell to be heard. What chance does the quiet, sweet voice have with such competition?

FROM THE VARIOUS ELEMENTS we have briefly considered, it seems fair to conclude that our basic language is not only adequate for our needs but that, as Americans, we are richly endowed with a language by which we can express ourselves with exactness, beauty, and vigor. Most of us can improve our speech and voice appeal by study, planned exercises, improved attitudes, and eternal vigilance.

In America we are blessed with a beautiful language. Ours is the task to discover that beauty and make it ours.

Human Nature

Thurman Arnold, trust-busting assistant attorney general, has a way of calming angry callers who bellow and pound his desk. He listens to blistering words for a few minutes, and then suggests mildly: "I really don't seem to be able to follow what you are saying. Just give me a minute, won't you, to call my secretary so she can take it all down." The trick works every time.—Your Life.

A Prescription for Loneliness

BY MAUDE D. ANDERSON

Have you ever been so lonesome that a lump rose in your throat, even though there were people all about you? How you longed for the sight of just one friendly face with a smile of recognition. In these days when people are moving from one community to another, there are so many who are new that each imagines the other is an old-timer, and waits for him to make the first advances toward getting acquainted.

Ladies in one small town decided to do something about this situation. Each had met one or two they were sure were new in the community. These in turn knew others. Each was asked to make as many contacts as she could among the newcomers to the community and ask everyone not only to write her name and address on a card provided, but to tell something of her interests as well. If her hobby were needlework, that was written, but if her idea of a good time happened to be playing croquet or going bicycling, then she made a note of that. Likewise other interests, whether it be music or collecting antiques, painting or working in ceramics were listed, and each specified which hobby gave her the greatest pleasure.

After the cards were collected, the ladies were divided into various groups. It was found that there were from six to ten in each division. Each woman took her turn in entertaining the others in her group at her home for an afternoon. No one was obligated and as only the simplest refreshments were served, the expenses were small. It gave strangers an opportunity to meet people with whom they had something in common, and if they so desired to cultivate new friendships.

Many times people live in a community for years without meeting others who have the same interests. Perhaps they go to church and gradually make acquaintances but still long for congenial companionship.

Often in moving to a new community, young people get in with the wrong kind of company because they are lonely. Perhaps they go to church a few times and if no one shows any inclination to do more than shake hands and say "How-de-do," they become discouraged. Then as the loneliness grows, they find some whose standards are not as high as their own but who are ready to laugh and talk. Soon they are going to some night club instead of to church because that is where they are accepted as "one of the crowd."

A Newcomers Club can be a real asset to any community.

Jenny Lind's Bible

At the very height of Jenny Lind's power and popularity she retired to her unpretentious home in Sweden to live the rest of her life in quiet peace. The world could not understand it. A newspaper man journeyed across the sea to interview the great singer. He found her sitting quietly by the sea, with her Bible on her knee. He said to her, "Madame Goldsmith, the whole world is asking why you have left it, with your career before you. You have but to ask and the world is yours." She looked at him for a moment with a smile and then replied, pointing to the sunset, "You do not understand. The world was very kind, but it was making me forget that and this," as she laid her hand on her Bible. "What could I do?"

We or Me?

BY JOHN THOMAN

IN THE MONTHS since the 1950 Conference adjourned, the best evidence we have had that Zion is in process of redemption is the growing tendency among the Saints to practice group-effect.

Most of the members believe in both their individual and group stewardships, but we have had a tendency to discuss heretofore the stewardship of our money rather than that of our talents or other intangibles.

Among all Saints, especially those in the Center Place, there has been a lively interest in things cultural and educational. This is a precious heritage and is reflected in the Three Standard Books.

But how are our methods and techniques as a people reflecting the inspired truths of our distinctive philosophy? I believe we need not look too far to find examples in our daily actions which speak clearly of growth.

Recently I attended (somewhat against my will) a piano recital at the Walnut Park Church in Independence. To me it was distinctly a Latter Day Saint experience. The first thing I noticed when I stepped into this beautiful chapel was the number of people already assembled. The teacher with her youthful group of pupils clustered around her before the meeting began reminded me of a group of football players around the coach before the game.

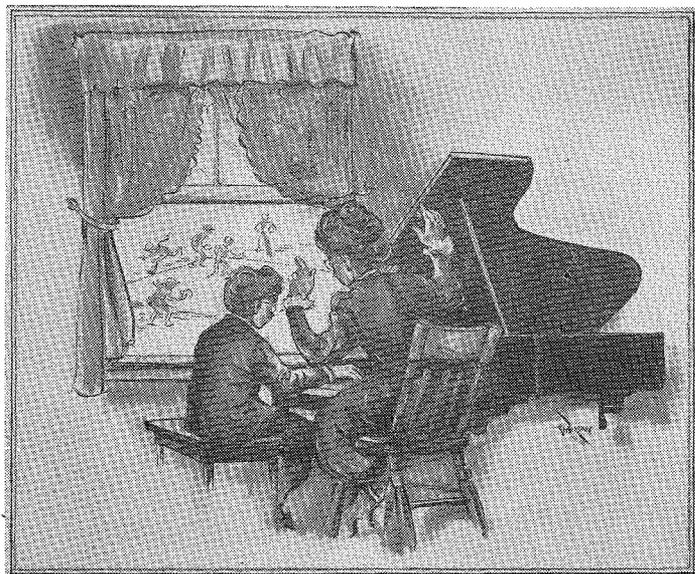

Next I noticed the neat array of six pianos at the front of the church instead of the usual lonesome grand. Apparently this was to be no program of successive prima donnas doing their stuff all alone.

The meeting was opened with a brief talk by a member of the local priesthood. He spoke of our need for the cultural experience of music. Then he stressed the fact that, from the branch president down, all were solidly in support of the efforts of these teachers of piano.

Then, after a prayer, the first number was announced, the piece and composer were named but not the performers. The thing that happened then was inspiring to me. Instead of one child or young person coming nervously forward to perform in the frigid isolation of his own raw ego, six well-poised young people walked on to the platform and stood quietly beside the six pianos. At a given signal they all sat down, and at another signal they began to play in perfect unison. They played well. The selections were excellent, and before long I was enjoying the recital very much.

The next number—a selection from Bach—was a duet (with six pianos) which meant there were twelve young people seated at the instruments when the signal was given to play.

And so it went through the entire evening, as group after group made sweet music together.

WHY, I WONDERED, pensively as the program drew to a close, hadn't they thought of this when I was a kid. By contrast there came vividly to my mind a scene from my youth. I was sitting self-conscious and alone at a piano, stumbling through one of my pieces, hating every note of it and especially the rap across the knuckles when I hit a wrong note. In those days, from where I struggled with my doubtful musical talent I could see, outside the open window, the ball diamond and the large vacant lot next door. I could hear the crack of a hickory bat as it connected with the ball and the sound was, to my young mind, infinitely more beautiful than any I could draw from the piano at which I sat. But the worst feeling of all was, as I remembered it, the feeling of isolation and apartness I felt as I practiced my lesson while my contemporaries pooled their talents on the ball diamond.

What has been accomplished is in the nature of a miracle. Individual members of the team have been brought into the parlor and seated at the piano—together. That is progress!

As with all the newer developments, both in the church and out, we could spend countless hours in speculation as to how our life would have been blessed had we been allowed the advantages of the youth of today. Under the circumstances that prevailed when I was a boy, my parents finally relinquished hope of my mastering the piano, but if I could have had the benefits of enlightened group teaching, then, perhaps, there would have been a different end to my story.

MOST OF THE SAINTS who came to Conference were impressed with the group efforts of our fine choirs as they joined to give us The Messiah; of our growing community orchestra—the Independence Symphony; of our dramatic club—the White Masque Players.

Recently an excellent art exhibit was organized and promoted here in Independence. Several Latter Day Saint members were associated with other civic leaders Personalities - Plus!

By VERDA E. BRYANT

WE HEAR MUCH about personalities. Webster defines personality as the quality of being a person and not a thing; that which constitutes distinction of persons; distinctive personal characters; individuality.

Personality is that which makes each of us different from every other human being. Phrases such as "men are all alike," and "that's a woman for you," tend to group humans into two categories—male and female—as one would separate wheat from corn in the bin; yet people differ from inanimate objects in that each person has his own individual personality which is like no other.

Personality is what causes us to love some, to dislike others; to be drawn into satisfactory association with some, and to stand apart from others. Our own personalities tend to attract certain people and to repel others. Daily we find those with whom association is a pleasure and others who tax us to the utmost—those with whom our personalities mesh and those with whom they clash.

In social life it is easy to eliminate personality clashes—we merely include only those in our circle of friends with whom we feel comfortable.

In business we cannot afford to be choosy. We come in contact with all sorts of people. Sometimes we are forced to work amid the most violent of clashing personalities. In such cases, we have to make the best of it if we want to keep our jobs. We overlook indignities; we ward off verbal blows; we alter our attitudes; we change opinions; we forgive and forget; we "take it on the chin"—and all for the sake of a pay check—the almighty dollar.

in promoting this exhibit, and many of our artists participated.

Do you remember in the basement of the Auditorium a fine large oil painting of the boy Christ among the professors? It was in the Herald Booth during Conference, but the rest of the time it forms part of the worship set-up of the junior department of Stone Church. It exists as a result of group effort, having been painted by the more advanced students of a class that met for eighteen months in Bartholomew Hall across the street to the east of the Stone Church.

These things evidence a wonderful group spirit that is beginning to develop among the Saints. We rejoice in it as another evidence of the coming kingdom. Someday, we will rise up and see the vision of the united kingdom and put aside our own personal type of "kingdom of heaven" on earth. Then, in the words of Brother Elbert, "What a free and happy people we will be!"

WHAT DO WE DO in our church life where the kingdom of God is at stake? Do we forgive the blunders of another? Do we make allowance for differences of opinion, background, understanding? Are we willing to graciously "give in" and alter our own personalities to be able to work together for the sake of Zion?

All of us know people like the choir director who, because of a personality trait, resigned and the choir suffered noticeably because one less qualified and less experienced tried to carry on. There is the church school teacher who can't get along with the superintendent, so she gives up her class. There is the priest who can't work with the elder, so one less priesthood member functions.

In building the kingdom of God there is no room for personality clashes. God is no respecter of persons. He loves the timid, the confident, the faint-hearted, the courageous, the conservative, the progressive, the weak, and the strong. He loves us all and needs us all. He needs people who can work together regardless of individualities, differences of opinion, or stations in life.

If we find ourselves troubled by personality difficulties in our work for the Master, then it is up to us to iron them out, to be big enough to allow the other the same rights we want for ourselves—to be individuals. If one will take the initiative to dissolve such difficulties, the others cannot help but co-operate. There is no difficulty too great to be overcome if we truly have the desire in our hearts to build the kingdom.

SEVERAL YEARS AGO I gave up a job because of a personality clash, and by so doing I closed an avenue of service to myself. Oh, the reason I gave was legitimate enough, though I knew at the time it was only secondary and could have been overcome. I reasoned that another not confronted with the personality difficulty could do a better job, so I resigned, and from that day to this I have regretted my decision. It was my work to do, and I should have believed the words of Paul, "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able." I should have known that God would have strengthened me and helped me, and that I could have done the work without personal difficulties.

God did not make us all in one mold. He wants us to have our individual personalities, but personalities plus a love for our fellowmen, a love for his work that transcends all other loves, and a determination to allow nothing to stand in the way of our service for him that the kingdom might be more speedily built in preparation for Christ's return to earth.

A son, Philip Duane, was born on June 17 to Mr. and Mrs. Myron Hedrick of Kansas City, Missouri. Mr. Hedrick, a member of the 1948 graduating class of Graceland, is now a first sergeant in the Kansas City Unit of the Missouri National Guard.

A son, James Thomas, was born on June 5 to Mr. and Mrs. Thomas W. Swafford of Irving, Texas. Mrs. Swafford, the former Kaye Youngs, attended Graceland from 1941 to 1943.

A daughter, Lois Marie, was born on February 8 to Mr. and Mrs. Frederick A. Campbell of Lamoni, Iowa. She was blessed on June 25 by Elders David W. Gamet and Robert S. Farnham. Mrs. Campbell is the former Donna Gayle Lewis.

A son, Edward Charles, was born on May 4 to Mr. and Mrs. George Miller of North Charleroi, Pennsylvania. He was blessed on June 11 by Elder Clarence Winship. Mrs. Miller is the former Margaret Bizilya.

Twin sons, Terry Wright and Patrick Guy, were born on May 7 to Mr. and Mrs. William Baker of Chicago, Illinois. Mrs. Baker, the former Mari Lyn Huff, is a graduate of Graceland College, class of '44.

DEATHS

Obituaries should be sent in promptly by relatives or friends. They will be printed free as soon as space permits. In fairness to all, the editors reserve the right to cut the message to two hundred words.

RAUH.—Frederick William, son of Hartman and Fredericka Graves Rauh, was born October 23, 1877, near Forestville, Michigan, and died June 6, 1950, at his home in Independence, Missouri. He received his education in the public and Lutheran schools and the Detroit Business University. As a boy he was confirmed a member of the Lutheran Church and later served as organist for his home congregation. He also played the piano and accordion and taught both organ and violin. On July 9, 1905, he was baptized into the Reorganized Church and in 1911 was ordained to the office of priest. While in Michigan he served as branch president of the McGregor congregation and in Independence as priest of groups nine and eleven. He also sang in the Messiah Choir for years. On December 18, 1901, he was married to Mary Willoughby; two sons were born to them. After moving to Independence he became co-owner of an auto top and body shop. He retired ten years ago. He leaves his wife, Mary, of the home; two sons: Ellis W. and Ernest F. Rauh; and three grandchildren, all of Independence. Funeral services were held at the Roland Speaks Chapel, Elders C. V. Graham and James Gault officiating. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

MILLION.—John Logan, son of the late Mr. and Mrs. Robert Million, was born in Carbon, Illinois, July 14, 1884, and died in Belleville, Illinois, May 25, 1950. He was married to Ellen Keith Boren on October 23, 1916. He joined the Reorganized Church in 1914 and was ordained to the office of teacher on September 15, 1929.

He is survived by his wife; a son, Keith L. of Belleville; a brother; two sisters; and two grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Belleville, Pastor John Edward Nicholson officiating. Interment was in Walnut Hill Cemetery, Belleville.

PITT.—William Percival, oldest son of Frederick George and Catherine Abbot Pitt, was born October 7, 1870, in Marion, Iowa. His early boyhood years were spent in Plano, Illinois, from which town he moved in 1883 to Independence, Missouri, with his parents, a sister and two brothers. He made his home in Independence until 1914 when he moved to Kansas City. His formal education was limited, but a thirst for knowledge and his inquisitive nature kept him interested in scientific study and mechanical development until his last illness. He was successful in establishing and expanding a loose-leaf book manufacturing business based on inventions of his own prolific mind.

The Herald of October 9, 1907, carries an address by William Pitt to the student body at Graceland College on September 24. His theme was "Elements of Success." One paragraph carries this bit of philosophy: "Success is always comparative. We never see an instance of absolute success; but we determine the degree of a man's success by its relationship to the achievements of other men."

About a year later he contributed an original article on "The Mind of Man." His philosophy on the nature of mind is well stated in this paragraph: "The mind is the divine part of man. We approach the study of the mind with the same reverence with which we would investigate the nature of Deity, for if the Creator is conscious and can institute causes that produce certain effects he must have a mind, and whatever we can learn of the nature of the mind we learn that much of the nature of God."

He passed away in Elizabeth, New Jersey, May 30, 1950, at the age of seventy-nine. Funeral services were held at the Stine and McClure Funeral Chapel, Kansas City, Missouri. President Israel A. Smith officiated, assisted by Elder Glaude A. Smith. Interment was in Mt. Washington Cemetery.

GRAINGER.—Nettie Roberts, was born in Detroit, Michigan, in September, 1871, and died in Windsor, Ontario, on May 21, 1950, after a long, painful illness. At the age of seventeen she moved to Waterford, Ontario, where she was married to Frank Grainger who preceded her in death in 1946. She spent the last years of her life with her daughter, Lillian, in Windsor. A member of the Reorganized Church for sixty years, she took an active part in church work as long as she was able.

She leaves her daughter, Mrs. Clifford M. Seldon of Windsor; a brother, Arthur Roberts of Brantford, Ontario; two grandchildren and three great-grandchildren. A funeral service was first held in Windsor, Elders James Pycock and William Garnier officiating.

He is survived by his wife Bertha; two stepsons, David and Leslie Damouth; a foster daughter, Mrs. Clara Faiola of Flint; a sister, Blanche Nolin of Lapeer, Michigan; and a brother, James O. Nolin of Mount Morris, Michigan. The funeral service was held at the Newall Street Church in Flint, Elder Arthur H. DuRose officiating. Burial was in Davidson Cemetery, the committal service being conducted by the Fellowship Lodge and Elder DuRose.

JOHNSON.—Oscar H., son of Henry and Ellen Johnson, was born February 24, 1874, in Seneca, Illinois, and died June 12, 1950, after several months of illness. He had spent his entire life on the same farm. On December 16, 1896, he was married to Bertha Hoyer, who survives him. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since childhood and attended Mission Branch near Seneca.

Besides his wife he leaves a son, Heman; two daughters, Mamie and Mrs. Grace McDermott, all of Seneca; and five grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the church, Elders David E. Dowker and Wayne Smith officiating. Burial was in the Section Cemetery.

NOLIN.—Frank Earl, was born in Lapeer County, Michigan, on April 16, 1899, and died suddenly on June 20, 1950, at Flint, Michigan, where he had lived for the past forty years. Following the death of his first wife Eva in February, 1948, he was married to Bertha Damouth on May 25, 1950. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since December 4, 1919, and was also a member of Fellowship Lodge No. 490 F. and A. M.

He is survived by his wife Bertha; two stepsons, David and Leslie Damouth; a foster daughter, Mrs. Clara Faiola of Flint; a sister, Blanche Nolin of Lapeer, Michigan; and a brother, James O. Nolin of Mount Morris, Michigan. The funeral service was held at the Newall Street Church in Flint, Elder Arthur H. DuRose officiating. Burial was in Davidson Cemetery, the committal service being conducted by the Fellowship Lodge and Elder DuRose.

JOHNSON.—Oscar H., son of Henry and Ellen Johnson, was born February 24, 1874, in Seneca, Illinois, and died June 12, 1950, after several months of illness. He had spent his entire life on the same farm. On December 16, 1896, he was married to Bertha Hoyer, who survives him. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since childhood and attended Mission Branch near Seneca.

Besides his wife he leaves a son, Heman; two daughters, Mamie and Mrs. Grace McDermott, all of Seneca; and five grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the church, Elders David E. Dowker and Wayne Smith officiating. Burial was in the Section Cemetery.

 ART FAIR

For several days there has been an Art Fair in one of the big parking areas at the Plaza in Kansas City. By fortunate accident we happened along that way. Hundreds of artists, pictures galore, and thousands of window-shopping visitors. "They like to come and look because it's free!" said one disgusted artist, whose queer productions were attracting scant attention. But artists who were doing quality work had no complaint, for they were selling well and receiving praise.

Independence had reason to be proud of its representatives. Our own Paul N. Craig and John Thoman were exhibiting a number of beautiful things, and we heard that Paul has been selling heavily. John was having fun doing quick portrait sketches on the lot. A good neighbor, Kitt Sapp, had some offerings of the finest merit.

Artists are such interesting people. There's never a dull moment around them. There are always some of them who are good students, competent scholars, and philosophers. These people are the ones who create art that endures. There are also some who dabble in it, but never quite make the grade. There are a few who affect "Greenwich Village" airs, reek of "culchah" and sophistication, have fun for a while, and vanish. The real artists stick to their work year after year.

Independence had a notable art fair last April at Memorial Hall. Blevins Davis, Fred Pitt, the Community Music Association, and many individuals gave it the power it needed. Another one is planned for this fall. Visitors ought to come with some money to spend, because many of these beautiful paintings will bring lasting joy to those who buy them and hang them on the walls of their homes.

 LANGUAGE

Just why do they call it "The King's English" when it is reported that the Queen does most of the talking?

Marvin's small son was talking months ago, but the adult family and friends stubbornly refused to understand him. He tried out several unknown languages on them and was disappointed in the results. He had the "gift of tongues" but no interpretation. Not that he was inarticulate, for he could say so much with his expressive eyes, his eloquent looks, and dramatic gestures. But he found our comprehension too slow and uncertain. So he has made a great concession, and is taking up English, since adults seem to use it so well with each other. But he still thinks it would be a better idea for all of them to learn one of his languages.

 TIME TO LOVE

I had no time to hate, because
The grave would hinder me,
And life was not so ample I
Could finish enmity.

Nor had I time to love; but since
Some industry must be,
The little toil of love, I thought,
Was large enough for me.

—Emily Dickinson, "Poems."

The Restoration Story

"The Restoration Story" is the first in a series of loose-leaf presentations of the message of our church. It has been prepared by the missionary committee of the Council of Twelve as a visual aid to personal evangelism. It contains 138 pages. On one page there is a picture—on the opposite page is an explanation or a scripture telling the story of the picture.

"The Restoration Story" is punched to fit any three ring notebook (sheets are 8½ x 11 inches). It can be used in personal evangelism, priesthood visiting, as an aid to parents teaching their children about our church, can be adapted to be used as supplemental material for church school instruction, and to assist in leadership training.

Binder

A special three-ring presentation binder is available, which will stand up at two different heights. It is maroon, and the name of the church is stamped in gold on the cover.

An Educated Heart

THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE once published an article bearing the title, "Wanted! An Educated Heart." As many young people are giving up summer jobs and going back to school, our church is saying something like this to them: Education is not of the head only. There are altogether too many people in the world whose brains are keen but whose hearts are undeveloped. The problems of life demand keen minds, but most of all, we want educated hearts. We want people who know the meaning of sympathy and brotherly love. The more education you get, the more you need the church to help you keep the balance between the head and the heart. I am through with my formal schooling for the present, but I am going to try to keep that in mind for the coming year: "Wanted! An Educated Heart."

Preaching

There is no adequate substitute for inspired preaching, but this must be reinforced by the other ministries of the church. Throughout our history the impassioned declaration of the great truths of the gospel has always been a heaven-approved means of winning men. Unfortunately, our emphasis on preaching has sometimes over-shadowed rightful emphasis on teaching; we have lost many thousands who might have been won by inspired teachers. We are now in danger of reversing this emphasis. There is urgent churchwide need for sound and able preaching.

Introducing...

PHILLIP SALONIMER, Detroit, Michigan (page 11), was born in Zechlin, Poland, October 10, 1884. At the age of fifteen he went to Scotland where he learned the English language. About eight years later he emigrated to Canada but soon after moved to Detroit, Michigan, where he has since lived. He was baptized in Detroit on February 28, 1909. In 1919 he married Maude L. Parrish. To them were born three girls and two boys: Sarah, Joseph, Esther, David, and Rebecca.

Brother Salonimer was a tailor in his youth and does much of the sewing in the home now as a hobby. He has been employed by the Detroit Street Railway for many years as a motorman.

He was ordained a deacon in 1911 and an elder in 1918, and is deeply interested in studying the Scriptures.

NELLIE BLANCHE (BUELL) CURRIE, Council Bluffs, Iowa (page 17), was born in Looking Glass, Oregon, and baptized at Lee, Oregon. She attended Graceland College in 1905-1906 and was married to Grace A. Currie in 1906. Her hobbies are crocheting, teaching, and writing. She has been active in the church school and Zion's League, and as women's leader of the Southwestern Iowa District; she was county president of the W. C. T. U. and chairman of the Council Bluffs unit; also secretary of the United Council of Church Women.

Sister Currie says, "We have six children—four girls and two boys—all married, all in the church, and most of them active in church work; one boy is in the priesthood. They all sing. I have many wonderful memories of how we all used to gather around the piano and sing together."

News & Notes

AT TEXAS REUNION

President F. Henry Edwards attended the Bandera, Texas, reunion from July 22 to 26. He spoke every evening he was there, taught classes in the forenoon, and was in charge of a prayer meeting.

He plans to attend the Silver Lake reunion of the Northwest. He will work in association with Apostle E. J. Gleazer.

CAMPUS SERVICE

President W. Wallace Smith was in charge of the July 30 Campus Service. Seventy George A. Njeim spoke on the subject, "Establish the Everlasting Covenant." Elder Evan Fry was in charge of the song service.

NEW MEMBERS

During the month of June, 659 people were baptized into the church. This is an increase over the number baptized during the same month of last year. It is also the highest June baptismal record since 1920.

MUSIC CLASSES

Franklyn S. Weddle, Director of the Department of Music, taught classes in music and worship at the Central Missouri Reunion at Odessa on the afternoons of July 24 and 27.

WINS HONOR

Elaine Farrow, daughter of High Priest and Mrs. Gordon Farrow of Warton, Ontario, won a $75.00 Student Exchange Scholarship. Elaine is a high school graduate of this season. This scholarship entitles her to a month's visit with a French-speaking family in Quebec City.

MORE ACTIVITIES

The Zion's Leagues of Independence have been instrumental in having lights installed on the recreation grounds of the Campus. About 200 people attended the dedication service.

Kenneth Paschall, city-wide Zion's League recreational chairman, and Kenneth Butterworth threw on the switch that lighted the fields. A twilight girls' softball game between the Second Church and the Walnut Park Church preceded the dedication ceremony.

Carl Mesle, supervisor of young people's activities of the church, gave a short sketch of the background of the Campus. A poem of dedication was read by Marian Davis, chairman of the original Zion's League survey committee. A trio from Walnut Park, composed of Carol Hodges, Velma Davies, and Edrie Lu Smith, sang "Now the Day is Over." John Thomas, chairman of the Inter-Church League, tossed in the first ball to officially usher in the softball season.

Bernard Butterworth was in charge of the program, and Bud Henson was the master of ceremonies.

SCOUT JAMBOREE SPEAKERS

On August 1 the Independence Rotary Club had as guest speakers four Independence boys who attended the Boy Scout Jamboree held recently at Valley Forge, Pennsylvania. The boys were David Freeman, Charles Sperry, Jr., Robert Massie, and Dick Andersen.

David Freeman spoke about the way the tour was sponsored; Charles Sperry, Jr., told about the camp set-up. Bob Massie told about the speeches of President Harry S. Truman and General Dwight D. Eisenhower. Dick Andersen explained the general headquarters organization.

All boys are members of the church.

Reflections

*The Wine of Life keeps oozing drop by drop,
The Leaves of Life keep falling one by one.*

—Rubaiyat VIII

It was a cold day when I first saw the man. He was waiting by the bus stop, and I was driving by. A keen wind was cutting down from the north. There are pleasanter things than waiting for a bus in winter. I didn't know him, but I stopped to offer him a ride. He had an Old World reserve, and there was the accent of another people on his tongue, but we developed a little friendship. I often saw him after that in his business.

One day recently there was a note in the paper that he was ill, and I wanted to send him a "get well" card. But I put it off. Inquiring at his office later, I learned that he had been alone in the world, and had died. Some remembrance might have brought him comfort in those last lonely, painful days. There was an act of kindness I could have done, but I shall never again have the opportunity.

Whatever good thing your heart tells you to do, do it today.

Tomorrow may be too late—forever!

A recent issue of Life magazine had an excellent illustrated section on Korea, with current and historical notes. Korea has been a battleground for other people's wars: Japan, China, Russia, and now the U.S.A. Korea, the Belgium of the Far East, was for a long time called "The Hermit Kingdom," wanting only to be left alone, to live in her own way. It was not a very good way, for life was primitive and hard, and there was much trouble and bloodshed, as in most Oriental lands.

One full-page picture was impressive, a candid shot of a couple in a long line of marching refugees. The man, with keen eyes and an intelligent face, was looking at the photographer critically. The woman, with a large bundle on her head, had turned her eyes to look at the man, with patience, love, and trust in her gaze. In spite of rough clothing, she was beautiful. Human fortitude in meeting tragedy and suffering is wonderful.

Where will those refugees be sleeping tonight? What will be their food, and where will they find shelter? Sometime, those who make wars will have a dreadful accounting to make to God for the suffering they have inflicted on the innocent ones of the world.

We visited a friend recently. For more than a year she has been suffering from the effects of a stroke. Before that time she was employed, kept her own home, and was a very active and talented worker in the church. She helped many people. She told the gospel story to her friends. She drove herself too hard, and her body could not stand the strain.

Now she lies in bed, looking through the window all day long. She once had so little time, now she has plenty. Outside is a pretty lawn, shade trees, and the streets where life goes by. She wonders when she will be well again, able to walk with her husband in the sunshine, play the piano, go to church, and see her friends.

Use carefully the life and strength God has given you, for you can never know how little of it may remain. When health goes, it may be gone for sometime.

In the stationery store a few days ago a fine young man, a son of friends, was getting a rubber stamp with his military identification serial number on it. He was planning to mark his clothing with it. Apparently he was going out for training with the reserves.

"This time," he said, "we don't know whether we will get to come back or not." He might have to go into active duty.

A teacher friend said, "War always takes the best. If they could only pick up a lot of the idle trash that hangs around our streets looking for mischief, it would help. But no, they don't want the worthless ones. They always want the best."

God wants the best, too. But he uses the best for life, and not for death. Let us give our best to God, that he may give his best to us.

A first visit to our new West College Street church in Independence was a pleasant and happy experience. For several years Pastor Odess Athey and his associates have been building a good congregation, some of them formerly members of Stone Church congregation living on the north side of town. Now they have a beautiful church home, pleasingly modern in appearance, and yet looking distinctively like a church. The interior is light and beautiful, with good windows and ventilation. New pews have just been installed. There are classrooms for the little folk, and many special features that are excellent in providing for comfort and convenience.

As one sees this church, like those at Englewood and on South Chrysler, one appreciates the wisdom and good taste of those who are directing the building program of the church here in Independence. They are doing a splendid work.

E d i t o r i a l

We are sure that readers of the Herald will be interested in the following communication, which advises, in addition to what has been quoted, that both President Smith and Brother Siegfried are in good health and enjoying the contacts they are making with the Saints in other parts of our world.

W. WALLACE SMITH

This is the first word we have been able to get to you since arriving in Paapeete on Thursday, July 20, at noon.

The Saints were gathered at Taronā Church awaiting our appearance. All priesthood members were in white clothes; the women also were dressed in white with white hats. The men of the priesthood were assembled in a body behind the desk. Horahitu led us in, and the people arose to greet us. Brother Mervin was in charge and, after appropriate words of greeting, the orchestra played the French, American, Chinese, and British national anthems. Horahitu spoke eloquently in greeting us, mentioning our having arrived "out of the heavens." After a brief response we enjoyed more music by the orchestra (which is splendid). After dismissal the entire congregation, the largest ever to assemble at Taronā, marched past us and shook our hands. We greeted each other with laorna, which sounds like "your honor," which was easy, for me at least.

Since then there have been various activities. I spoke to the priesthood this morning. The men were again dressed in white Palm Beach suits and were very wholesome looking.

There are many things of interest which I will write up for the Herald at a later date—such things as having met descendants of Addison Pratt and some of the posterity of John Hawkins.

On Wednesday, July 26, we go to Mervin's farm, where the conference begins. This will end on August 2, after which we will return to Taronā.

It appears we may get a freighter out of Makatea to Sydney, Australia, sometime around the first week in August.

At present we have "the run" of a new residence belonging to the daughter and son-in-law of Tihona Mervin, which is located not far from the compound. We are having time to recuperate from our travels.

Our people are still coming. One group was on a ship which went on a reef, but there were no lives lost; for this we are grateful. Saints are coming distances of from one hundred to seven hundred miles in small motor and other crafts. They come singing the songs of Zion, and such harmony I have never before heard. It is marvelous to observe the devotion and consecration of this people.

(Signed) ISRAEL A. SMITH

The following letter was addressed to me by Elder Frank McDonald when he completed six years as the appointee-pastor of an important branch at St. Louis, Missouri. After I read it, it seemed to me that the readers of the Herald would be happy to share the letter, and I am now passing it on with the consent of Brother McDonald:

PRESIDENT F. HENRY EDWARDS,
Independence, Missouri.

Six years ago last Sunday, June 4, you were in St. Louis for the purpose of installing me as pastor of this branch. So I am in rather reminiscent mood.

These six years have been years of achievement for this good people and the branch. I have found them, with few exceptions, willing to follow leadership and be about the work of the kingdom.

During these years, 114 have been added to the church: sixty-five children, six young people, and the balance adults. Of this number of adults, there were thirteen husbands and eight wives baptized to complete twenty-one family circles. We had three baptismal services in which the husband and wife were baptized at the same time.

Four men have been called to the office of elder, four to the office of priest, and one to the office of deacon. Two of our priests were ordained to the office of elder, and now are occupying as pastors in the district: Brother Ed. Goetz, Maryland Heights, and Edwin Kent, Brentwood. Two men have gone from the branch into the general ministry of the church, and an evangelical minister and patriarch has been ordained.

At the June Communion service, 1944, there were 204 present; 244 attended the preceding Easter service; and only two other times during that year did the attendance go over the 200 mark. The average for the morning worship service that year was 161. This year we have gone below the 300 mark only five times, and thus far the average for the year is 329. Summer vacations will probably cut us down some under that.

During these years the building has been put in shape and new equipment added which makes our church plant one of the best.

The matter of finances has also kept pace, both with respect to general contributions as well as the local budget.

No Sunday evening services were being held at the time we came to St. Louis, but we have instituted an informal service which has proved to be very beneficial to the Saints. The average for this service will run around eighty adults, and thirty-two Leaguers.

The department of women has been reorganized from a few who met each Thursday to quilt, to an effective group whose influence is felt in every part of our branch activity.

The friendly visitor, with her co-workers, looks after sixteen shut-ins. They receive visits, presents on special days, and the Bulletin each week to keep them in touch with the work of the Lord.

A fine cradle roll organization has been built up to look after the babies. This makes them a part of the church right from the very beginning.

A nursery has been set up and furnished. The good women who give themselves to this work care for about eighteen to twenty-eight babies each Sunday, and they are making one of the finest contributions to our services. As a result our decorum is of a very high level.

The members of the priesthood are active; as a result the Saints are being ministered to and shepherded and are moving into higher spiritual achievements.

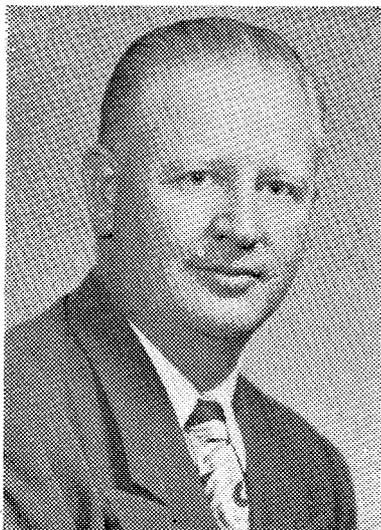

The midweek devotionals on Wednesday evenings are perhaps the high spot of all our endeavors. These are becoming spiritual feasts toward which our people look, and for which they make special preparation.

We have not had a janitor for over a year now. The deacons, with most efficient helpers, are keeping the building in better condition than it has ever been kept before.

From the light already received, other men will be called into the priesthood in the near future. This will enable us to organize the work in the fall on a more efficient basis.

We stand humbled before God for the many blessings he has bestowed upon his people in this place, and for his blessings to us. These have been the best years of our ministry up to this point. While they have been years of achievement, they have been years of suffering, but no soul comes to spiritual rebirth without suffering, and there is no progress without suffering. We shall ever be grateful that God has permitted us to suffer for his Saints, but the work would not have gone forward in this branch as it has without the help, the prayers, and the fellowship we have enjoyed with the

Mid-Century Evangelizing

By D. O. CHESWORTH

A DECADE AGO I preached a sermon following the General Conference. My opening statement was this: "During the next two years we shall keep before us the work of evangelization and take advantage of every opportunity to present the message of Latter Day Saintism to relatives, acquaintances, and friends, inviting them to become members of Christ's church." We set a goal for baptisms in 1940, achieved it, and did the same for 1941 and 1942.

So often it appears to be a difficult task to keep before our congregations the "thrill" of missionary participation for an extended period. This is true not only in our task but in every endeavor to keep a project alive over an extended period, and there must be different methods of approach and various types of stimulus. Not many years ago a commemoration, lasting for a year, was suggested in honor of the venerable George Washington. Those responsible for the success of this project frankly admitted that it was too long a time to maintain interest.

We are happy to report that our emphasis on evangelization has been growing rapidly, but this achievement has been due in part to the freshness of approach, varying stimulations, additional materials available for missionaries and prospects, and a growing vibrant testimony of what participation in the church of Jesus Christ means to those converted. Ten years ago we were told that the number of tracts sold by our printing house since the last report only averaged one per member. This retarded condition has been corrected so that today our members are well-equipped with tracts and missionary packets, and they possess a keener knowledge of the content. Today enlisted workers for the kingdom have a supply of copies of the Book of Mormon for missionary use which are readily revealed by the attractive color, as well as other effective books such as The Call at Evening.

Our men are equipped with projectors for visual aid instruction and sets of slides to assist in telling the story. This trend will be continued as the local ministry is enlisted for similar participation. Our representatives are to be commended on their attitude of joy and conviction. They are blessed with a greater knowledge of that which they should share with others in our present "uprooted society."

All successful representatives carry a spirit of enthusiasm which begets activity. Today more of our members are visiting our historic properties, going back to our origins, and—we trust—being reborn with the spirit of enthusiasm and the message of the nineteenth century which came with such spiritual force and significance.

EVERY MEMBER of the church can be a missionary in the best sense of the word. Every member should be caught up in the real missionary spirit, and will be, if our religion means to us what it should." These two sentences were recorded in the Priesthood Journal by the late President F. M. Smith.

Some of us approach the task of winning souls like the newly hired shoe salesman who went on his first assignment some distance from headquarters and made his approach only to have the store manager inform him that there had been two hundred other salesmen there before him. Discouraged, not certain of his product, and unaware that this proprietor absolutely needed what he had to offer, the new salesman wired his employer, "Coming home. There has been two hundred salesmen here before me."

Soon he received a reply which expressed a definite truth, whether in selling shoes or the gospel of salvation; "Keep on going. There are five hundred more salesmen following you." Well aware that many have been before us and now assured that members of other churches are following, let us tell the story of truth to others that they may be blessed as we already have been blessed.

As disciples we are charged,

O ye that embark in the service of God, see that ye serve him with all your heart, might, mind and strength, that ye may stand blameless before God at the last day; therefore, if ye have desires to serve God, ye are called to the work, for, behold, the field is white already to harvest.—Doctrine and Covenants 4: 1.

We embark in his service with "unreserved devotion"—with all that we have. We share our genuine love for people, using tolerance and tact in making our story clear. We offer an affirmative approach in sharing what we believe, realizing that others will quickly insert what we do not believe. We are careful of our appearance, remembering that cleanliness and neatness are more important than overemphasis on clothes.

I like the word "embark" for several reasons. It indicates action; it implies a definite course. It is the antithesis of procrastination. We embark with our message and our personal testimony among strangers to the Restoration. Sensing the conspicuous absence of people from the services of the church, we visit them in their homes. We guide the conversation into different channels according to the need. We often think that embark means to "go aboard a ship" but in addition it means to "engage, invest, enlist, or make to enter on any affair." Some folk embark in the service of God with only partial commitment. Unless one has his heart, might, mind, and strength, in his task, there is a strong possibility that he will not succeed, or at best be only mediocre.

THIS IS AN UNUSUAL age in which we find ourselves charged with the assignment of witnessing for Christ. There have been eras in which the gospel message was brought by the itinerant preacher, who also brought news from cities and countries abroad. Today he has lost much of his attraction, having been replaced largely by radio, television, newspapers and periodicals. The minister of today does not post his announcement of a preaching series and expect that announcement alone to bring an audience. He does not associate himself with a Sankey and expect the multitude to attend, for some of the best music today is available by the turning of a dial. Our task is to evangelize and dispel all human fears, but we shall be required to resort to newer and more efficient methods. Finding ourselves now in the mid-century, charged with the perpetuation of telling the gospel story, we need to make such research as may be essential.

We are faced with questions. What agencies are available for assistance in missionary work? What studies shall we make of our church plants? Shall we continue with present buildings, or should we move in order to best serve our people? What is our purpose in the community? Shall we maintain both rural and urban branches? These and a multitude other questions need our study at this point.

What agencies are available for assistance in missionary work?

We must not overlook free newspaper publicity and perhaps an occasional commercial ad. Editors are often willing to present briefs of delivered sermons. Free radio advertising may be secured with occasional personal appearances at the microphone for the missionary. Sometimes he is invited to give a one-minute noontime prayer over the radio. In city missionary work we find many regional newspapers are available for our publicity. Personal appearances at civic clubs, women's groups, and other similar bodies give the missionary an opportunity to appeal to the audience in the presentation of a lecture on some national, international, or regional attraction, thus building up a potential audience for his lecture of a religious nature. A good way for members to interest prospects is by inviting them to church dinners.

What studies shall we make of our church plant?

Some rural churches should be moved to town or sold and other church homes be purchased. (Of course, rural branches would be ruined if moved to urban areas.) Since most of our friends judge us by the exterior appearance of our church, we should see that the building is neat, attractive, and conducive to worship. Many people see our church buildings when services are not being held. Although the doors are kept closed during the week, we should always make the building available to visitors who may be prospective members. With the advancement of church school participation, our plants should be more serviceable. The day of "preaching only" has passed, and there is a definite need for classrooms. Our churches can usually be made more effective with pews, carpeting, window fans for summer, electric organ, new hymnals, and beautiful tract displays. Every church should have a representative sign so that all who pass will know it is The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

Shall we continue with present buildings or should we move in order to best serve our people?

Each progressive branch should study the location problem to determine whether or not the moving situation is injuring attendance and activity. Much uprooting has been brought about due first to employment and second to the Gathering. Before any major changes are made, a branch should consider the opportunity of winning new families in that vicinity through the assistance of general and local ministry.

What is our purpose in the community?

Let us not forget that our task is to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ and win souls to the cause of the kingdom. The keynote of this latter day dispensation is that the gospel of repentance is here. In this mid-century we should be telling people our purpose of remolding communities and witnessing, building, and comforting. Using our franchise as citizens, we should stand for the right and represent our stewardship as Saints. In our industry we should maintain this same standard. People who associate with us should be able to recognize us as disciples who believe in the ideal way of Christ prevailing on earth.

Shall we maintain both rural and urban branches?

To the person actively engaged in church promotion, the answer is obvious. The rural church is not an institution of the past. In it, as in the urban church, activity is determined by the leadership available. In a condition of indecision as to where to build, a branch might give considerable weight to the possibility of building in communities where heavy population makes prospects available since transportation is available to most everyone these days. We have done remarkably well in our transition from predominantly rural churches to many city and large-town churches, as designated in a thorough study made by President F. H. Edwards a few years ago.

IN OUR MID-CENTURY EVANGELIZATION, let us "bear down in pure testimony" as suggested by Alma (Alma 2:27). We can do this by constant use of the Three Standard Books in our preaching and teaching as evidence for the conversion of others. In some areas people are not yet converted to the common usage of the Inspired Version of the Holy Scriptures in our services. In the law given to the church in February, 1831, (Doctrine and Covenants 42:5) members of the priesthood are instructed to teach the principles of the gospel in the Bible and Book of Mormon and observe the covenants and church articles. All this they should observe to do "until the fullness of my Scriptures are given." The widow of the martyr preserved the Inspired Version manuscript for thirty years, then gave it to the committee of the Reorganized Church. When friends come to our church they expect to hear what we have to offer. They expect us to read our version of the Bible, without apology. They expect to hear us sing our hymns with the thrill of witnessing, and to hear a sermon about the gospel of Christ. Our sermons should bear testimony of what the church has done for us. We should be able to tell people that we sought light and it came from the Lord. We should be deeply aware that this church represents the truth. Our testimonies may be given with strength of Gibraltar in our witnessing, or in the spirit of humility, with tears flowing down our cheeks. We have repeatedly said that the Lord speaks to the church constantly. Now is the time for us to tell what the Lord has said in this century to us and to the world.

Rich instruction came to the church in that twentieth-century revelation concerning the patriarch and evangelical minister. Divine instruction was given concerning the establishing of stakes with the designation of Independence and Lamoni. Today we have seven stakes in the church. Instruction was given that tracts should be printed in Scandinavian, German, Chinese, Japanese, and Portuguese particularly, and others in general. Ministers were assigned to lands abroad, namely England, Australia, Society Islands, and the islands of the sea to effect better organization.

Then general information was given—admonition to acknowledge and respect those set in the church to lead, and also a word of caution concerning spiritual manifestations. Time after time the Lord has reminded us of the urgency of evangelization, under the direction of the Council of Twelve, in this half century. Listen to this instruction:

1. "There is great necessity for confidence in the men of the church chosen for positions of great responsibility, and all should consecrate of their talents, abilities, and substance for the prosecution of the great work intrusted to us."
2. Everywhere the demand for greater activity exists.
3. The Twelve should discharge responsibilities of the burden of missionary work upon them. The work in this line must be hastened.
4. The missionary work should be prosecuted with great vigor.
5. All are admonished to qualify themselves in spirit by ministry and by witnessing for Christ. The hastening time is upon us.
6. The elders should meet often in preparation for the greater endowment of spiritual power which has been promised and which awaits the time when they can receive it.
7. "The hopes of my people and the goals of my church are closer to realization than many recognize."

MID-DAY IN THE CENTURY our report is encouraging. Never have we been so strong and well-equipped as we are today. There is definite assurance that during the latter half of this century, with more expert direction, informed representatives using the many aids for achievement, and the promises of the greater endowment, shall register greater achievement. With every interested person following every prospect in the spirit of winning for Christ, we should exceed the total of five thousand souls for Jesus in 1950.

Our call is to evangelize.

In My Father's House

By Mabel Williams Crayne

AS A CHILD I had a strong faith in a God who was living and just, but after I grew older I realized that the various churches I attended did not represent God and Christ as I believed them to be. When I was about fourteen years of age, I was put on six-months probation; I studied the catechism of a well-known church as a preliminary to baptism. But the more I studied the less I believed the teachings. I had nothing else to turn to and was still "unsaved" when I came to Lamoni to attend school.

As I entered the Brick Church I looked over the building and the congregation with a great deal of curiosity. President Joseph Smith was the speaker, and his voice easily reached to the back of the room where I was sitting. His text was taken from I Corinthians 15. I heard him say, "The glories in heaven differ as one star differs from another." I sat tense, listening closely for fear I would miss a word. This was so different from the "one heaven—one hell" theory where the good "unsaved" man must dwell with the degenerates and criminals forever and ever.

I left the church eager to discuss this new religion. One night at the Mite Society building, I was spoken to by the Spirit. I knew it was from God. Happy tears drenched my face. I had found the Heavenly Father of my childhood and was baptized the following April by Brother Joseph Smith. A letter from him at that time is still one of my most prized possessions.

The Church on the Move

By ROY A. CHEVILLE

IN MID-JULY I received a letter from Trevor Norton of Birmingham, England. He and Frank Fry were preparing the program for the reunion of the Midland and Southern District to be held at Enfield just out of London. It was to be a three-day gathering with the general theme, "The Church on the Move." He was asking for a message to be read at the opening service when the reunion theme was launched. Out of his letter came these comments: "We want some of your zestful enthusiasm for the Restoration message—I'm trying to make progress in the work of the young people over here, but this cannot be achieved independently of the older ones—The comparative smallness, the conservatism, and the lack of new blood tend toward inertia—I would like you to send some message that would convey your own outlook."

The Enfield church is located in one of the suburb towns of greater London. In it are the main room or sanctuary, a smaller assembly room for educational and social functions, a vestry or ministers' room, a dining room usable for classes, a kitchen, and toilet facilities. Those attending the reunion will be housed in the homes of members and neighbors. From the gardens will come flowers to grace the platform. It will take good planning to provide food with the "austerities" of rationing. Frank Schofield brings to the branch a far-sighted, dynamic, and spiritually stimulating ministry.

This congregation will be augmented by Saints from over the district. They will come from the Birmingham, Nuneaton, and Gloucester groups. They will come, too, from places such as Cornwall where only two or three can meet. In the spirit of the gathering, they will sing from "Redeemer of Israel" these lines of promise: "As children of Zion, good tidings for us, the tokens already appear." And how those British Saints love to sing! This year John and Anne Coggan of Nuneaton will bring testimonies growing out of their visit to the General Conference of 1950. Doris Oakman and her friend, Mrs. Irene Rannie, have returned to Britain this summer and will carry the greetings of America. Sometimes visitors come over from the Dutch mission.

AT LAST YEAR'S MISSION DAY I was asked to talk to the youth group. I had been led to believe, perhaps it was from my own misjudgments, that not many would be there. We met in a side room immediately after lunch. Trevor Norton presided—feelingly and effectively. I left the class with hope. Sixty or more young people with their leaders had drawn out of me the best I had. We spoke of youth's essential place in the church's total program and of its significant role in the British mission. These young people had come from here and there, needing so much the association with other members. They were hungry to hear of the larger fellowship of our church. That morning I had met with the children and left convinced that the church school was perhaps the most promising area of expansion. That afternoon I heard the stalwarts such as John Worth and Thomas Trapp bear their testimonies. A pentecostal service closed the day. Blair Jensen and I went home quietly: we had been in sacred places.

This is the letter of testimony sent to the Enfield reunion. May it go in spirit as well as in word.

July 14, 1950

Greetings to the Midland and Southern District Reunion, Enfield, England:

A year ago I joined you on British Mission Day at Nuneaton. I left this gathering aware of the endowing uplift we had experienced and of the wonderful fraternity we had shared. Out of the day came these two convictions: (1) Both the needs and the possibilities of the British Mission had been underestimated, and (2) the advance of the church in Britain would come through the forward-looking souls who would dare to pioneer. During these twelve months this outlook has not dimmed. Today I turn with heartfelt interest to my brothers and sisters in Britain.

My life is lived among the young people of our church. They build on the events of 1820 and 1830. They revere the founding fathers of yesterday. But the youth we need to enlist in the church's endeavors are not satisfied with turning to the past. They are concerned with the living now. They look to the dynamic future. They want a church that is on the move. Nor can it be merely a church that is in motion. It must be moving in consequential activities. In these times young people of worth insist that the movements of the church contribute to the spiritual welfare of the total world.

When I meet the honest inquiries of hundreds of young Latter Day Saints today, I do not have to apologize for the church of Jesus Christ. It is not merely marking time. It is not waiting for events to happen. It is not complaining against the times. It is not relying on God to turn a miracle. It is not bemoaning its small supply of man power and money resources. It is not turning back to the good old days. No, the church of 1950 is on the march.

This does not mean that 100 per cent of the membership are fired with fervent zeal and high expectancy. I have never known of a movement with all those enrolled stirred to the quick. I am speaking of that nucleus at the heart of the church who cultivate its prophetic spirit and carry the torch at the van. These people are on the move. Others lag behind and often lose out. I am going to draw my inspiration from what the church is accomplishing, not from its weaknesses.

I look about me and see signs of promise. These are not unidentifiable hopes. They are recognizable happenings in my church at work. This is what I see.

1. A sense of a world-field is growing in the church. The word "foreign" is dropping out of accepted usage. The attitude that Latter Day Saintism is an American movement is out of date. More Latter Day Saints are aware of and concerned in what is taking place in the church abroad than ever before. On my own desk are letters from Germany, Britain, Canada, and Tahiti. My circle of brothers reaches round the world. Especially is the growth of this world spirit taking place among our youth.

2. Members of the priesthood are studying for increased competency in their ministry. The director of priesthood education finds ministers are not wanting to quibble over disputed points. They want to study to add to their effectiveness. This fall the high priests are gathering in Kirtland Temple—the first convocation of this nature for a century.

3. The institutions of the church are operating in professional quality. The publishing house, the church hospital, the church college, and the new church social service center hold reputation in their fields of specialization. What is more, they are not isolated but one working department of the church.

4. The financial policy of the church meets the test of rigid examinations. We paid off every penny the church owed. We set up resources for less favorable times. We have been operating within our means. Yet the church has not become money-conscious. The funds of the church function as means to carry on her mission.

5. The gathering of the Saints is proceeding on more intelligent patterns. Members are moving into the Center Place and the adjoining regions on motives higher than fear. The stakes are being strengthened.

6. The building program is advancing more than ever in the history of the church. Congregations are building houses of worship that will service branches at work. The building program stretches from Independence out to the Hawaiian Islands.

7. A company of youth is rallying to the colors of the church. Consecration is not a past-tense story. Young people are willing to contribute in means and in energy to the work of the church. These are not misfits who could not do anything else. They are youth who want to develop their potentialities so they will have something significant to contribute.

8. The spirit of prophetic ministry is expressed among us. Today a letter came to my desk saying that a youth in unspoken quandary about military service received in a reunion prayer meeting a prophetic message of guidance. Yesterday a letter came from a young woman telling of her being healed from an attack of paralysis. The previous day a youth testified of the spiritual uplift at a camp. These are events of today, not of a decade ago.

I can say with Rupert Brooke, "God be praised that my life is matched with these times!" The great spiritual advances of the centuries have come in times of transition and crisis. We are living in such days. We have no time for lamentation. We have only time to work among the builders who make the kingdom of God come true.

I wish I could walk into the Enfield church as you assemble for your reunion. My heart is with the Saints of Britain, for I have been with you in holy experiences. In spirit you do not seem far away—just across the ocean. I see you as another company in the total army of the church of Jesus Christ. We are under one banner. The watchword of your reunion is prophetic: "The Church Is on the Move!"

Fraternally yours,
ROY A. CHEVILLE.

Resthaven Sunshine Shower - By Josephine Skelton

THIS SPRING the patients at Resthaven had a pleasant surprise. One morning the mailman walked up the long curving path and, instead of dropping one or two letters in the box as usual, began to stack bundles of letters on the doorstep. "What's going on here?" he asked.

Many of the women didn't know themselves until they began to open the mail and found that they were the object of a Don McNeil Breakfast Club Sunshine Shower. "We still don't know for sure who's responsible for giving Mr. McNeil our names," says Miss Helen Weeks, superintendent of the home. "But one of our women here has a daughter living in California, and we suspect she had a hand in it."

Whoever is responsible will be glad to know of the happiness and interest the Sunshine Shower brought to Resthaven. Over a period of two weeks, the guests shared the fun of opening 278 letters and eleven pieces of printed matter. Mail poured in from all forty-eight states and a few letters came down from Canada. Postal cards, picture postcards, get-well cards, birthday cards, and letters kept the women waiting eagerly to see what would come in next.

A woman in Alabama who had been motherless since she was sixteen wanted to "adopt" a mother. "I couldn't do much," she wrote, "but I could remember you with letters and cards often."

A seventy-year-old woman sent a birthday card "to brighten somebody's day."

A nineteen-year-old girl from Massachusetts sent two cartoons from the newspaper "to give someone a chuckle."

A woman from Pennsylvania decided to write because she liked the address. "Resthaven sounds restful, Winner Road sounds triumphant, and Independence—that means the home of the free."

Another elderly woman, a shut-in for twenty-five years wrote because she wanted "to cheer somebody else up."

A letter came from a young baby written by his mother, "because I haven't quite learned how to write yet." A picture of a laughing little boy was enclosed.

One card came with the scrawling printed signature of a little girl who has rheumatic fever for the second time. A note from the mother on the back of the card explained, "Donna asked me to send this card to you. The mailman and the radio are her greatest time-passers. She wanted to join the Sunshine Shower to keep you from getting lonely."

A GREAT NUMBER of the cards came from church members who were thrilled to hear Resthaven named over the air. Messages of comfort and faith were written in every case on these cards. Some sent newsy letters describing their homes, families, and church affairs. A few cards were anonymous, signed simply, "A Breakfast Clubber," or "A friend who wishes you well." Now and then a religious tract or pamphlet would drop out of a card from someone who believed in accomplishing two good deeds with one three-cent stamp. And most of the papers which came in were church periodicals, all the way from The Watchtower, and The Upper Room to a National Catholic magazine.

When the mail arrived it was sorted out in stacks of twenty-five or thirty cards and letters, a slip of paper was attached, and the bundle was started circulating among the guests. As each woman read the stack, she signed her name and passed it on. Some of the patients, bedfast or with failing sight, listened quietly while others read the messages to them. They looked at the colorful cards, smiled at the cartoons, and blessed the people "who were so good as to remember us."

Touching, comic, and comforting, the Sunshine Shower of letters has brightened the life of Resthaven in a way that is second only to personal visits.

By Elbert A. Smith

WHAT DID JESUS MEAN—"TAKE NO THOUGHT FOR THE MORROW"?

Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? . . . Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself.

THE WORDS JUST QUOTED are from the Sermon on the Mount as recorded in the sixth chapter of Matthew, Inspired Version. The admonitions given applied to material things—things to eat, drink, wear, et cetera. I have heard several explanations or interpretations concerning the meaning of these words. Only one explanation satisfies me, and that one is in full accord with certain statements found in the Book of Mormon.

Taken literally and at its face value, by all peoples and acted upon, this program of taking "no thought for the morrow" apparently would play havoc with agriculture; it would distrust building and other industries—the professions and government. It is one of the statements of Christ that, taken out of its proper setting and misunderstood, might make him appear to be an impractical visionary—which he was not.

Farmers must of necessity lay by seed for the seeding of their fields. Lehi was forehanded and brought with him seeds for planting in the new world to which he and his children came. As did also the prudent Puritans. Builders must have architects draw plans looking to future construction. They must arrange for the purchase and delivery of building materials, not just for today, but as they shall be needed. They must plan for an adequate supply of labor. Jesus himself said that a man was very foolish who would start to build without a reckoning of the cost.

The words quoted appear in the Sermon on the Mount. This sermon was preached almost immediately following the calling and ordination of twelve apostles. Jesus had begun the task of building his church. It has been very well considered as an ordination sermon. The "multitude" listened in, and much of the discourse was for their guidance then and for ours now. Specific things seem to have been addressed directly to his ordained men to apply to them then and to ordained men now who are giving all their time to a spiritual ministry. At the point under consideration, Jesus was not talking to agriculturists, to shepherds, to merchants, to builders, to professional men, to governments. He was talking to ordained men who were to give all their time to a spiritual ministry; whose material needs were to be supplied by their Heavenly Father as he should will.

Now to the Book of Mormon

Am I wrong in this conclusion? Turning to the Book of Mormon, I find that it seems to be verified in a striking manner, as recorded in the sixth chapter of the Book of Nephi. Jesus, when he visited the Nephites, chose from among them twelve men to function somewhat as did the twelve apostles chosen in Palestine. He gave them authority to baptize and to preach; he also gave to them a spiritual ministry. Thereafter he preached a discourse very much like the Sermon on the Mount. The situation was similar and called for similar instruction. In the midst of this discourse, we find him speaking generally to the people. Then he turned his attention directly to the twelve:

And now it came pass that when Jesus had spoken these words, he looked upon the twelve whom he had chosen, and said unto them, Remember the words which I have spoken. For behold, ye are they whom I have chosen to minister unto this people. Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment? Behold the fowls of the air, for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they? . . . Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat: or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? . . . Take therefore no thought for the morrow, for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

The Book of Mormon says specifically that when Christ uttered the words under consideration he was speaking to his ordained ministers, those who were to give all their time to a spiritual ministry. Then the record continues, "And now it came to pass that when Jesus had spoken these words, he turned again to the multitude and did open his mouth again unto them saying, Verily, verily, I say unto you, judge not that ye be not judged." In this record, similar to that of the record concerning the Sermon on the Mount, it is clearly stated that Christ was talking to his apostles, who were to give all their time to a spiritual ministry, when he said, "Take no thought for the morrow." Following this admonition he turned to the multitude and continued his discourse.

It is true that we actually live but one day at a time. We are chiefly concerned with today. Today is the better, however, if we did some necessary planning yesterday. It is true that we are taught not to worry or be troubled in mind. Thinking and worrying are two different things.

It is consistent with the teachings of Christ as they shine out from the pages of the Three Books in many places that the men and women who labor and toil, who plant and reap, who build and manufacture, who buy and sell and practice the professions are to plan wisely and carefully and with prayer for the general activities of the morrow and the day after tomorrow. For their material needs, men called and ordained to give all their time to a spiritual ministry are to trust God (and his church) that they shall be adequately supplied.

The Ministry of Ordinances

By PHILIP SALONIMER

ORDINANCES ARE instituted by God for the benefit of man. Man cannot add to them nor take from them. They are complete in themselves as to what they are intended to represent, and they must be observed in the spirit as well as in the letter. If they are so observed, they become a factor for the good of the observer and the church as a whole. We shall limit our discussion to baptism and the Communion.

To observe an ordinance by the letter of the law only, ignoring the spiritual side of it, brings no benefit to anyone; rather, it might be harmful. The spiritual significance of an ordinance is primary. This spiritual significance must be known and understood before the ordinance can be correctly carried out.

Let us take baptism as an example. You could comply with the letter of the law by baptizing a man whether he has repented or not, whether he has humbled himself or not, or whether he has become reconciled with God or not. But what good would it do to that man? No good at all. On the other hand, if it is observed according to the spirit as well as the letter of the law, it should be of great benefit to the individual and to the church as a whole. What is the spiritual meaning of baptism? First of all, a man must repent, and he cannot repent unless he believes that repentance is necessary for his own good. He cannot believe and repent without the workings of the Spirit of God in his heart. Therefore, he must receive a portion of the Spirit of God even before baptism so that he will be led unto repentance. Then, after complying with the ordinance, he should receive a greater measure of the Spirit of God that will indicate to his intelligence that he has received forgiveness of his sins and is now a child of God. That is, primarily, the purpose of the giving of the Spirit of God to those who are baptized.

There have been times in church history when the people lost the Spirit of God because they lost the knowledge and understanding of the ordinances and had only the form left. For example, the children of Israel knew that baptism was an ordinance given to them by the Lord. This is indicated by the fact that John the Baptist was never opposed by the Jews when he included baptism with repentance. Even today baptism is performed among the Jews to all those non-Israelites who are willing to unite with them. But they do not administer baptism to their own children. The children born to them are considered members of their church without baptism. This shows that, though they believe baptism is an ordinance of God, they fail to recognize its meaning and purpose. This also happens to all those who are willing to change the ordinances. The fact that they want to change the ordinances shows that they have lost the significance and spiritual value of them. The children of Israel were reproved by the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah for doing this very thing. See Isaiah 24: 5; Jeremiah 31: 31-34.

We have on record an admonition to the church in the Book of Mormon, warning the church not to baptize people who are unworthy and not to administer the sacrament of the Lord's Supper to those who are unworthy. "See that ye are not baptized unworthily; see that ye partake not of the sacrament of Christ unworthily."—Page 713. To baptize a person who is not converted is dangerous to the one thus baptized and to the church that does the baptizing. If he is not converted, you may make him "two-fold more a child of hell" than he was before, because he thinks he is a child of God when he is not, and he thinks he sees when he is blind. He is no better than the Pharisees of old who thought themselves to be religious but were actually blind because they were unconverted to the right principles and because of their lack of humility. Pride drives men from God instead of bringing them to him. It is also dangerous to the church. These same men may try to convert the church instead of becoming converted themselves and may try to change the ordinances and their meaning. Thus they would make the church to be a church of the world instead of the church of God.

What the church needs is men of faith and understanding. Joseph Smith had a fine conception of faith, repentance, and baptism, when he wrote in Doctrine and Covenants 17: 7:

All those who humble themselves before God and desire to be baptized, and come forth with broken hearts and contrite spirits, and witness before the church that they have truly repented of all their sins, and are willing to take upon them the name of Jesus Christ, having a determination to serve him to the end, and truly manifest by their works that they have received of the Spirit of Christ unto the remission of their sins, shall be received by baptism into his church.

Every ordinance has a significance of its own and cannot be replaced by another. Therefore, what the ordinance of baptism does to the man and to the church, the ordinance of the Communion cannot do because it has a different significance. All ordinances are related one to the other, but we cannot substitute one for the other.

A man rightly baptized into the church should be a man who is on the road to repentance and who has received the Spirit of God for the remission of his sins. According to the Scriptures, those should be baptized into the church who manifest humility and contrition of heart. But the man who does not show these things should not be baptized until he does. If he is in a right spiritual condition, then baptism has a special bearing upon his life and becomes a vital force in it. Otherwise, he is yielding obedience to an ordinance of the letter of the law only. If he is initiated into the kingdom rightly, he becomes a power for good for his own salvation and the salvation of the church, for both are benefited. But if that initial step is not taken, he may become a child of hell instead and dangerous to the church.

Those who take the right step in baptism should manifest an entirely different condition than those of the world. They should show that they are born of God and that the Spirit of God works with them for their own salvation and for that of the church. After they have received a remission of their sins, the next thing for them to see to is that they retain a remission of sins from day to day, according to the statement of King Benjamin in the Book of Mormon, Mosiah 2: 22. If they should again become entangled in the sins of the world, and by that I do not mean sin unto death but ordinary sin which anyone is liable to commit, they may ask God for forgiveness and receive it. The Spirit of God also is given to them again, and they are in a condition to partake of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. But repentance and forgiveness of sins must precede the partaking of this sacrament; otherwise, they partake unworthily and are obeying only the letter of the law without having the spirit. If the church administers the Communion to such, then it stands guilty because it has not taught them what they should do before partaking of the Communion.

The sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the Scriptures, primarily means fellowship, but members of the church could not have fellowship rightly among themselves without first having fellowship with God. And they cannot have fellowship with God if they have sinned until they seek forgiveness and become reconciled with God and God gives them of his Spirit. If they partake of the Communion without receiving a remission of sins, then they partake of it unworthily, not discerning the Lord's body, for his body was given a ransom for the sins of the world. And if the individual will not seek to repent and receive the remission of his sins and become reconciled with God, that sacrifice does not atone for his sins. The sacrifice of Christ atones for sins only when a man has repented and received the Spirit of God for the remission of his sins.

On the other hand, if every member of the church gets himself right with God, confesses his sins before the Lord, and receives the spirit of forgiveness, then these members, when they come together in sacramental fellowship, will have the Spirit of God poured upon them without measure for their own comfort and the exaltation of the church.

Herein we see there is a difference between the ordinances of baptism and the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. One could not take the place of the other, and one is NOT MEANT to take the place of the other.

So, therefore, let us be careful that we do not baptize people into the church unworthily and that we do not partake of the Communion nor administer it to others unworthily because we are not doing any good to ourselves, and we bring harm to the church.

The ministration of the Holy Spirit to the Saints has various purposes and meanings. I would like to mention a few. Forgiveness of sins is one, fellowship of Saints is another. This fellowship should make you feel that you are one with God and Christ and the church, for that is what fellowship really means—that there is no barrier between God and man and between man and man as far as the members of the church are concerned. It is the Spirit which makes one feel that others are interested in his soul's salvation. Of course, reconciliation with God must precede the fellowship with Saints. Therefore, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper plays a great part in the development of the individual as well as the development of the church, and that is the right relationship one to the other and to God.

The church has been commanded to offer certain prayers before administering the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. These prayers are found in the Book of Mormon (Moroni 4 and 5) and in Doctrine and Covenants 17: 22, 23. We can see a special significance in this in that some may try to bring in a different meaning of the purpose of the Communion. Those prayers mention remembrance of the sacrifice made for us. That means a memorial, which teaches us that we should remember always. And there is nothing in the prayers to indicate that this sacrament means anything else. If it is thus observed, the Spirit of God will be poured out upon the people in great measure as a blessing to them.

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. Address questions to Herald Editors rather than panel members. We shall try to take all questions in the order they are received. Be patient, there may be several ahead of yours. Only signed questions sent by contributors will appear here.—EDITOR.

QUESTION:

When a baby dies does he come forth in the resurrection as a baby or as a full-grown person?

Washington

P. S.

ANSWER:

An ancient author wrote, "The secret things belong unto the Lord our God; but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children forever;" and this is one of the things which has not been revealed. We have heard opinions expressed on both sides, but we know of no statement of Scripture which would justify a definite answer either way.

QUESTION:

Are Latter Day Saint ministers inspired to prophesy when they preach?

Colorado

E. C. D.

ANSWER:

No, our ministers do not prophesy when they preach. They are inspired at times to bring to the people a message that will be uplifting and strengthening. In fact, Christ promised to send his Spirit upon his ministers when they preach and teach the people. The people are lifted up spiritually when God sees fit to bless the priesthood with light and intelligence. Therefore, it is not necessary that ministers prophesy except at those times when they are especially led and directed in these channels by the Spirit of God.

QUESTION:

Please interpret Daniel 11:44, 45 and 12:1. I have heard that this pertains to the Russians taking the Dardanelles.

Michigan

B. M. B.

ANSWER:

The verses are but part of a lengthy prophecy beginning with verse 21, dealing in considerable detail with a wicked ruler who shall rise up about the time of the end, and by flattery and deceit become strong in dominion. The prophecy speaks of the time of the end, and chapter 12:1 says Michael shall stand up when there shall be a time of trouble such as never was. That ruler as described has not yet arisen; the time of the end has not come; and Michael has not yet appeared; so that it is impossible to fit the events of the prophecy with the events of our time. We see no relation in any part to Russia taking the Dardanelles.

Prior to the First World War, Kaiser Wilhelm built a palace on Mount Scopus just east of Jerusalem, allegedly anticipating the day when he would occupy it as ruler of the Near East. Many would-be prophets interpreted that as the fulfillment of verse 45, "And he shall plant the tabernacle of his palace between the seas in the glorious holy mountain." Many other similar interpretations have failed, and yet men keep trying their hand at interpretation. Some prophecies are relatively plain, and others like this one are complex, mysterious, and impossible of interpretation except by revelation, or until fulfilled. The conditions described in this prophecy are not yet in sight.

QUESTION:

If partaking of bread and wine gives life, as some think, what provision is made for the isolated and others who have not the privilege of partaking? Are they without spiritual life?

West Virginia

C. J. J.

ANSWER:

That spiritual life follows the partaking of the bread and wine at the Lord's table is not specifically stated in any text that we recall, yet it is safely deduced from numerous texts. The belief probably rests upon the statement of Jesus, that "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life."—John 6:53. This may have been an allusion to the sacrament of the bread and wine symbols of his flesh and blood—though a study of the chapter reveals much more than the partaking of bread and wine alone. The flow of divine life through partaking of the emblems is strongly implied in the following:

He that eateth this bread, eateth of my body to his soul, and he that drinketh of this wine, drinketh of my blood to his soul, and his soul shall never hunger nor thirst, but shall be filled. Now when the multitude had all eaten and drunk, behold they were filled with the Spirit.—III Nephi 9:44, 45.

But the mere physical act of eating and drinking the emblems, and especially if they be partaken with careless indifference as to their spiritual significance, is hardly productive of life. The virtue is not so much in the material elements as in the spiritual attitude and the works of obedience in which the Lord has conditioned this rite. Among the requirements are these: having received Christ, believing his truth, obeying his ordinances, keeping the commandments or, in case of a lapse, prompt repentance, reconciliation with all men, remembering Christ. Warning is given against one's partaking unworthily, in the case of offense or estrangement. The Lord says, "Let him not partake until he makes reconciliation." The warning is also given that partaking unworthily brings condemnation, not life.

Isolated members may not have the privilege of taking the emblems for long periods, but they can by observing all the obligations attaching to them, and as their circumstances will allow, retain favor with God and receive life and blessing at his hand. We knew of a sister, advanced in years, who showed a remarkable degree of spiritual life, although isolated and without the privilege of attending a single service of the church since her baptism in early childhood. In another instance, with one of the brethren, I visited and administered the Communion to a couple who had not attended a church service for about twenty years, yet they had remained devoted children of God and held to the faith.

On the other hand, members who through indifference or willfulness absent themselves from available meetings and refuse to partake of the emblems, do not and cannot receive life and blessing from their membership. In so doing they violate the wise counsel of God who said, "It is expedient that the church meet together often to partake of bread and wine in remembrance of the Lord Jesus."

Isolated members should be remembered by the presiding officers of the church, and provision should be made as practicable for their partaking. Many officers do this.

Faith for Our Time - By MRS. O. A. CURRIE

EVERY YEAR the World Council of Church Women set aside a day for world prayer, and many groups observe it. This year we are praying for world peace. In unity there is strength if we pray from the depth of our souls. When we pray, our prayers must include at least three persons: God, ourselves, and others. We cannot save ourselves alone. We must help others to come to God, to be able to help build his kingdom; we must pray that his will may be done here as in heaven, since hate, greed, selfishness, jealousy, or prejudices have no place in building his kingdom.

Our fear of destruction is not caused by the existence of the atomic bomb, but by hate and greed which will bring about destruction. The world is split asunder with hatred and fears arising out of the differences and lack of understanding race, nationality, and religion, and because each nation wants more and more of the things of this world. We need a great love and an awakening removing hate and selfishness and replacing it with love, and we need to recognize that God made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on the earth.

As we become humble and full of love for the people and Christ's church, we will pray real prayers. We will be able to contact God and keep in tune with him. Then the power of prayer will be at work in our lives and the lives of others. This power will bring faith for our times and in the hearts of all with whom we come in contact.

CHRIST PRAYED many times for others, and in so doing he brought great power into his own life to give out to others. He was baptized in the River Jordan to fulfill all righteousness, but not without prayer. "Jesus . . . being baptized, and praying, the heaven was opened . . . and a voice came from heaven, which said, Thou art my beloved Son; in thee I am well pleased."—Luke 3: 21, 22, A.V. God was pleased with Christ, and he is also pleased with us as we obey his laws.

After baptism Christ went into the wilderness to be alone with God, to fast, to pray, to gain strength and power that he might be able to go among the people, bringing God close to them.

God gave his Son for us that we might have everlasting life. Jesus, the carpenter and builder of homes, was friendly and happy as he worked with and helped people. He lived and blessed the people. He will do the same today if we will let him come into our lives.

Mark (1:35) tells us, "And in the morning, rising up a great while before day, he went out . . . into a solitary place, and there he prayed." Psalm 5: 3, "In the morning will I direct my prayers unto thee."

Jesus was and is always helping others. If we live like him, we, too, can teach and help others bringing them to Christ, giving them faith as our cup of living water runs over them. Neighbors will see our good works and glorify God.

WE MUST HOLD FAST to that which is good. We should pray for each other as expressed in the song we so often sing at our prayer meetings: "Let us pray for one another for the day is fading fast, and the night is growing darker . . . for each other let us pray. Pray in faith and pray unceasing . . . for our prayers are much availing, if we walk upright and just." If we are humble and have trust, love, and faith, then our prayers will be answered.

Christ said, "Come unto me, and learn of me, and find rest . . . your burdens will be light." The power of prayer, as Christ prayed over the loaves and fishes increased them till there was enough food for all. The power of prayer and faith can do the same today. My grandmother, at one time, had only enough to feed her children for one meal. As she was putting the food on the table, she looked out the window and saw four men coming to her home. They were ministers of our church. Of course she was worried and needed help. She seated the men at the table, put the food on, and invited them to eat. They asked God's blessing on the food, and Grandmother prayed too as she worked in the kitchen. When the ministers finished, there was enough food left for all the children and herself. This was not just imagination. God increased it as he did in Bible times. And why not—he has not changed? Are we able to do the things that make us worthy to be with him? Prayer, work, sacrifice, and faith are necessary.

We are told that unless we become humble and full of love, even as a child, we cannot live in his kingdom. Christ said after blessing children, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." Then at the closing of his day's work he departed to the mountains to be alone to pray. We should always close our day's work with prayer and thanks. Christ was in the garden praying while his disciples were sleeping. Are we also sleeping?

Faith for our time must be built upon a resurrected Christ and an unchangeable God. To know Christ is a great experience. Job said, "I know that my redeemer lives, and I will see him on earth in the latter days." We too must have a living faith to give to others if we will bring the message of love into the hearts of people.

We can all work and witness for him. Our nation has a responsibility to give wisdom and understanding to other nations. This is our day; our opportunity is now. What is our decision?

CHRISTIANITY BRINGS out fine ideals in all people, but prayer, love, and work are necessary before Christ can be brought into the hearts of people. God is concerned with all. Let us tackle our jobs here, now, with a living faith. Fasting and prayer are essential to the souls of men.

There are thousands in the United States who have never heard of Christ as their Savior. How can they have faith without knowing him or his good works? All of us must learn to know him and his power to help us. I must light my candle from his great fire to bring light to others. My cup of faith must be filled to overflowing in order to run over to others. Let us pray that Jesus will guide us and help us to bring new light and peace to others. These principles and actions incorporated into our lives and practiced daily will assure to us and to others faith for our times.

We should meet together often for prayer and pray from the depth of our souls—pray for peace, unity, and love and that the kingdom of God may be established on earth.

We should live so that we can always be in touch with God and reveal his spirit to others by the example we show. Our influence for good should be felt by all in our neighborhood. We must build a sure foundation for our faith by study of the Scriptures and obey the instruction given in the Bible to love our neighbors as ourselves.

May God help us from this day to do more to help in the building of his kingdom. He will guide us if we heed him.

The Spoken Word - Part II

In the Home

BY FLOY L. BENNETT

NO MEDIUM for interpreting a family's home life is more reliable than that family's speech habits. While just standing by and observing, one who is trained to listen can get a pretty accurate picture of the family's cultural attainments, education, degree of tolerance and patience, family affection and understanding, and the attitudes and personality development of each member. Company manners will not cover up; habits of everyday living are too strong.

The mother is undoubtedly the most significant factor and deciding element in the speech habits the children acquire. Fortunate indeed are the children whose mother is aware of her position in this respect and who works daily to build and maintain a high level of vocal expression which will do much toward building the right speech habits in her children as well as allowing healthy attitudes to develop. The style or grammatical construction of the mother's speech is its least important element. Her kindness, gentleness, innate qualities of greatness, fairness, and patience will show in the pitch and quality of her voice and the selection and tempo of her words.

ONE POET has said that God has made nothing at all so beautiful as words. Words are beautiful, or perhaps we might more accurately say words can be beautiful. Like all lovely things, words which may be so beautiful are capable of the greatest desecration. Many students of words and scholars of varied interests have attempted at different times to list the most beautiful words in the English language and have included such words as home, lullaby, melody, dawn, chimes, mist, and hush. By careful examination of these words, however, we discover that we are influenced by their meaning, their connotation to us, as much or perhaps more than by the euphony of their sounds. Climes is more euphonious than chimes, but we think of chimes as being more beautiful because of the meaning of the word. Mush has a more pleasant sound than bush; yet none of us can disassociate these words from their meanings. "All through the night there's a little brown bird singing, Singing in the bush of the darkness and the dew" brings to our consciousness a more aesthetic feeling than "They had mush and milk for supper." There are numerous such examples. We have learned that even harsh and ugly words, when judged by sound only, often become beautiful to us because of some pleasant meaning that has become attached to the word through experience. We like certain names because we have admired individuals who have those names. We dislike other names because of unpleasant associations. Or perhaps the affection someone else has for some individual colors our emotional response to that individual's name. I well remember how impressed I was at one time by the voice and manner of a certain woman when she pronounced her husband's name. I had never thought of Richard as being a particularly good name from any point of view, but when this woman said, "Richard," I knew she loved her husband, and her cultured, sweet voice helped convey that truth. I have liked the name ever since.

cially true of the radio. No modern machine has been more happily and widely accepted by all age groups than the radio. It has enlarged our world far beyond the wildest dreams our great-grandparents could have had. From it we increase our knowledge, add to our entertainment, and find food for satisfaction and development of the aesthetic senses. The radio, however, is much abused. Often it is difficult, if not impossible, to find a program worth our time. One of its greatest abuses, though, comes through our own handling of the instrument. We have so dulled our senses that too often we let the radio run all day. We learn not to listen when we do not want to. Few of us refrain from speech all day in spite of the radio's blaring, so we learn to talk above it. We pitch our voices higher and we increase the volume. We have to be heard. This loud, strained speech becomes a family habit. It has almost become a national habit. Some families who have learned to exercise more discrimination than others will select their programs for a particular purpose—for news, for fun, or for artistic appreciation. To these programs they give their attention. When the program is completed, the radio is turned off and normal conversation proceeds. The radio that "goes" all the time is often too loud. Those wanting to listen increase the volume so it can be heard above the conversation. The conversationalists yell to be heard above the radio, and there they go. No wonder such practices are reflected in the family speech habits. The voice, a fragile instrument at best, is not able to compete without injury to itself. Harshness, tenseness, loudness, high pitch—all definite speech defects—become habituated through misuse of the vocal apparatus.

THERE ARE MANY THINGS, of course, which enter into building the individual speech habits of various members of the family. Occasionally we find children who do not "speak out" so they can be heard because they have been so completely dominated by stronger personalities in the family. Common courtesy gives everyone the opportunity for oral expression when his turn comes. Shouting each other down and talking above the voice which should have everyone's attention at the moment, in addition to being most discourteous, directly affects the voice quality and speech habits of persons involved. Whatever approach we make to the problem of voice and speech, we always seem to arrive at the same conclusion: our speech reflects our home and family life; our personalities and attitudes show through so that our friends may judge quite accurately the working of the Christian virtues in our lives.

SASKATCHEWAN.—The North and South Saskatchewan Districts reunion was held at North Park School, Saskatoon, July 9-16. The theme was, "We Witness for Christ in the Restoration."

Elder E. Y. Hunker, president of seventies, Sister Hunker and family; Elder John Darling, Associate Director of Religious Education, Sister Darling and Johnny; Elder Z. Z. Renfroe, missionary in charge, and Sister Renfroe, all of Independence, were present. The elders preached, conducted classes, assisted with prayer services, and ministered to the needs of the people in many other ways.

Sister Erma Ward, church school director, had charge of the vacation school. Sister Renfroe and Hodgins assisted with the classes. Handcraft classes were taught by Sisters Virginia Fisher and Patsy Gore. The 9-14-year-olds made a booklet with the pictures of the twelve apostles, showing where stationed, and an outline of their work. Sister Diggle conducted the music appreciation class. Each morning the children had their own prayer meeting in charge of Priest Ambrose Skinner.

Sister Diggle, district chorister, assisted by Sister Darling, prepared many numbers. The district choir, led by Sister Darling, gave selections at evening services. The Saskatoon choir under Sister Millie Waddells' leadership sang two numbers at each Sunday service. Others who contributed were Sister Whattam of Regina, Pearl Dinnell of Arborfield, Sister Joy Fisher of Birsay, Brother and Sister Hunker and Geneva, and Sister Renfroe. Brother Paul Schmidt gave a violin solo, and Peter Strellois, former member of Toronto Symphony, gave a saxophone solo.

Sisters Darling, Steeves, and Geneva Hunker were reunion pianists. Sister Beryl Chase of Moosedale gave several readings.

Recreation each afternoon was in charge of Rheta Gore. It included a tour of the city; a tour of the university (which included a demonstration of pottery being made from Saskatchewan clay), and a visit to the airport museum, swimming, and softball games.

Evensong in charge of Sister Elaine Olson consisted of campfire songs led by Geneva Hunker, accompanied by Brother Hunker on his guitar, and by stunts, experience stories, etc.

Zion's League, under the direction of Brother Bill Hall, was in charge of a snack canteen, which was open every afternoon and evening.

Priest Howard Whaley Fisher was ordained to the office of elder by Elders E. Y. Hunker and E. L. Bowerman.

Sisters Victoria Whattam and Mary Arlene Rascher were baptized by Elder John Darling, and confirmed by Elders E. L. Bowerman and W. J. Cornish. Keith Gendron was baptized by his uncle, Elder Arthur Gendron, and confirmed by Elders J. W. Mountaney and Gendron. Janice Aldeen Rascher was blessed by Elders Gendron and Mountaney.

Dedication services were held the last Sunday afternoon. The vacation school recited some of their lessons and sang "A Child of Galilee," which had been taught during music appreciation period. Several young people told what conference had meant to them and how it was going to affect their lives. One had resolved to file her inventory and pay her tithing; another resolved to be a more active Zion's League member. One young mother resolved to make her home more Zionistic and to be a better helpmate to her priesthood husband. Elder Howard Fisher, newly elected district president, gave a short talk rededicating his life to the work.

On the afternoon of July 15, the North Saskatchewan business meeting was held. Elder Renfroe was in charge. The call of Priest Howard Whaley Fisher of Birsay to the office of elder was presented and accepted unanimously.

The need for a permanent reunion ground was felt more keenly than ever and a motion to the effect "that we empower the reunion committee to investigate as to a location, with power to act and that the district contribute $300 and the reunion contribute $200 with power to solicit other funds." An amendment read, "that we request the South Saskatchewan District to take similar action."

Officers for the coming year are: Howard Fisher, district president; E. L. Bowerman and A. Gendron, councilors; Florence Gendron, secretary; Grace Beckman, treasurer; Erma Ward, religious education; Dora Carter, women's leader; Elaine Olson, Zion's League leader; Lottie Diggle, director of music and church historian; W. J. Cornish, nonresident pastor; Amy Powell, publicity director and corresponding secretary; Blake McLean, E. W. Baker, and Noble Harper, auditors; and Ernie Baker, bishop's agent.—Reported by AMY POWELL.

LINCOLN, NEBRASKA.—The first week in February, the Zion's Circle (women's department) served lunch to the Lancaster County Courthouse employees.

March 15, Fred and Julia Reichenbach celebrated their fiftieth wedding anniversary.

April 21, the older adult class met with Al and Ruth Pfanmiller. James Hoth showed pictures of his travel in Europe. May 5, the older adult class met with Ezra and Mary Oehring. A special speaker from Iran told them concerning his country.

June 2 was enrollment day for vacation church school. The school was held for two weeks. Mrs. Harry Niehaus was the director.

June 11 was Children's Day. Jeannie Davis and Sharon Toland were baptized. The children had charge of the church school worship.

June 15, Arthur Robidoux died while on a vacation trip to Colorado. Funeral services were held June 19, burial in Lincoln.

July 21, the church school picnic was held at Van Dorn Park. Nine children have had perfect attendance during the last quarter. Three children have had perfect attendance thus far this year. Three children have missed twice and one child has missed once.—Reported by EUNICE FULTON.

NAUVOO, ILLINOIS.—The twenty-second year of camping for the youth of the midwest has just been completed at Nauvoo. Here amid the beautiful historic setting provided by Saints of an earlier day, ninety-four young people and staff enjoyed another fine experience in a full week spent together. High point of the camp experience was the visit by Apostle Charles Hield, who became a camper with us for two days and nights. Quite a collection of articles left at the camp may be returned by writing to Lyle W. Woodstock, 405 Ct. 4 Springbrook, Moline, Illinois.—Reported by LYLE W. WOODSTOCK.

STONE CHURCH, INDEPENDENCE.—William Burwell, son of Mr. and Mrs. William Elias Anderson, was blessed July 30 by Elder H. W. Burwell (paternal grandfather) and Elder M. A. McConley.

The Church and Home Together

By F. M. McDowell and Harold W. Cackler

This is the third in the Aaronic priesthood study series, and covers the following topics: the church meets the spiritual needs of the home, provides a program of education, organized for service, and the home's response to each of these.

STUDENTS ON THE CAMPUS OF GRACELAND COLLEGE

“I am glad I went

RECENTLY the Director of Public Relations wrote letters to certain alumni of Graceland College asking each one whether or not he could prepare an honest statement under the general heading, “I Am Glad I Went to Graceland College.” An attempt was made to obtain an interesting sampling of the alumni body. Persons of various ages, of both sexes, and in various fields of work were asked to make statements. All of the persons contacted responded in the affirmative, and these testimonies are the result.

Represented here are students now attending other colleges, a church official, a businessman, a teacher, homemakers, and a farmer. Reasons given for attending Graceland and enumerations of values received at the church college by persons who have had an opportunity to evaluate the Graceland offerings from differing perspectives should be helpful to the young church member who faces a decision about college attendance.

R. EDWIN BROWNE.

The listing of WALLACE B. SMITH'S activities opposite his picture in the 1948 "Acacia" reads like a page from "Who's Who in American Colleges." His Graceland activities included being editor of the yearbook, president of the Graceland Players, and a member of Lambda Delta Sigma honor society. He is a member of the priesthood.

Since graduation from Graceland, Wally has been a student for one year at a college in Portland, Oregon, and for the second year at the University of Kansas where he is now enrolled. Recently he was accepted for admission in the K. U. School of Medicine. Last year he served as feature editor of the "Jayhawker," K. U. yearbook-magazine. He is the son of W. Wallace Smith of the First Presidency of the church.

WHY I WENT TO GRACELAND

THE QUESTION of why I went to Graceland has occurred to me before. The first time, I was seated on a milk can with my suitcase on my lap, bumping over the high iron of the Togo-Mt. Ayr Fast Freight and Mail Express Line into Lamoni. I had been to Lamoni before, and I had been out to the College. But that was a long time ago. I remember my sister and I had gone up the stairs onto a stage, holding little banners, hers with a "Class of '46" on it and mine with a "Class of '48," waving them, slightly off beat, to the tune of "Graceland Forever." My father and mother were both alumni, and Home-comings at our house ranked second only to Christmas and the Fourth of July in excitement and importance.

But then we moved out west, and Graceland and Home-comings moved into a different perspective. I had made a lot of new friends while in high school, and it seemed as if all of them were "going down to State" or "down to the University," and I began to wonder about the merits of traveling clear back halfway across the country to attend Graceland. None of my friends had ever heard of the school, and after the first few blank stares hit me when I told them where I was going, I had just about decided on "State" myself.

Then I happened to be down in the basement one day for the alleged purpose of cleaning it up. I had managed to read clear through several stacks of old funny papers and was just getting down to some serious procrastination when I found an old Acacia. All at once the memories of those Home-comings came back to me, and I thought of how much fun they were and how everyone who had gone to Graceland seemed to be so proud of the fact. It was almost as if they knew something about living that everyone else had missed or failed to see, and they found that something at Graceland. I thought of this and I thought of my dad's faded blue and gold sweater that he now wore only on picnics or to mow the yard. I knew I wanted to be part of this group that knew what the "something" was that gave them the edge in this complicated business of living. I won't say that this all hit me in a flash or that I jumped up and shouted "Hallelujah," stuffed a pair of socks into my Gladstone, and ran for the first train East. I just added up the score and found that the only answer possible had to be Graceland.

I thought of this as I rocked back and forth against a feed sack in the baggage car of the Togo Terror, and for a moment I doubted the measured wisdom of my decision. But just then the train pulled up to the little brick depot behind the grain elevator, and I heard another sound through the hiss of the steam. A group of students were on the platform singing to Graceland!"

"Graceland Forever," and I knew I hadn't made a mistake. This was the kind of higher education I wanted. Graceland is high in scholastic rank, high in purpose and ideal, and highest in the opportunity for the formation of a philosophy of life which reflects the principles and attributes of the church which sponsors it.

WALLACE B. SMITH,

MRS. DEANE EDWARDS, a 1940 graduate, is President of the Graceland Alumni Association. The wife of a surgeon in Lawton, Oklahoma, Mrs. Edwards is also the mother of three daughters. Her statement was prepared while she was in the hospital following the arrival of daughter number three.

As Deane Butler she attended Kansas State Teachers College at Pittsburg her freshman year before seeing the green light which led her to Graceland for the sophomore year. She continued her college education at the University of Kansas where she also taught a church school class. She continues to work for the church in Lawton as well as directing the alumni affairs of a growing body of Gracelanders now 4,000 strong.

"... A FELLOWSHIP OF LASTING FRIENDS"

I HAVE had many people ask me why I attended Graceland College in Iowa when I lived only twelve miles from a State College of good repute. "It is true," I say, "that I could have been home, and that it would have been a little less expensive; but, I have been compensated many times over for the added effort." Then they ask, "How?" I am glad to answer because after ten years I am still as enthusiastic about Graceland as I was when I attended Youth Conference there in 1938.

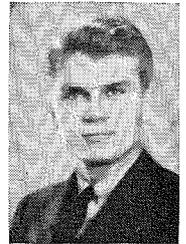

I had spent my freshman year at Kansas State Teachers' College and enjoyed it a great deal. After a week at Graceland, however, I knew I had been missing an experience of fellowship that would last not only in memory but through the years of my church experience. I just couldn't afford to miss it!

I found at Graceland that same fellowship in classes, in church services, and abroad on the campus. I still get a thrill out of meeting those classmates all over the country. I have renewed that fellowship on the West Coast, in the Central States, and in the South. Where else could I have made such lasting friendships!

Basically, too, I learned in the classroom that behind all truth and law in any field there is a deep-seated integrating force which makes the whole universe have purpose. Graceland teachers made my intellectual world "hang together" at a time when I could not have done it alone.

Yes, I am more than just glad I went to Graceland College!

ROBERT BRACKENBURY has been a teacher at the University of Michigan since 1948. He is married to the former Opal White whom he met at Graceland when they were students. They have two daughters, Jennifer and Pamela.

At Graceland, from which he graduated in 1937, he was an outstanding athlete and student. He received the B.A. and M.A. degrees from the University of Chicago as the result of work taken from 1937 to 1939, taught in Iowa secondary schools from 1939 to 1942, was in the Navy as an officer from 1942 to 1945, and received his Ph.D. degree from Chicago in 1948.

He reports that he took some important time out from listening to a baseball game on the radio in order to prepare the attached statement. In addition to his interest in sports he is active in church work in Ann Arbor.

EDUCATION THROUGH SERVICE

ONE OFTEN FAILS to recognize the true value of an experience at the time he undergoes it. So it was with my education at Graceland. While I was on The Hill, I seldom thought about what was happening to me. I simply enjoyed life and trusted I was learning something of worth.

During the thirteen years which have slipped by since then, I have many times had occasion to evaluate my Graceland experience. Having become acquainted with the program of various other educational institutions, I have come to appreciate more the high quality of Graceland's.

I have also come to realize there is something unique about Graceland. Perhaps it is the recognition that education is more than acquiring knowledge and absorbing information. In order to receive, one must give, and Graceland provides unusual opportunities for service.

Then, for quite a different reason, I've been thankful I went to Graceland. During the war and since, Opal and I have been in many communities in various parts of the country. We've never been in any, however, for any length of time without running into some "Graceland friends." This has meant a great deal to us.

Indeed, the reasons why I'm glad I went to Graceland are numerous, and it would be easy to comment upon them at great length. Perhaps, however, it is sufficient to state that Opal and I both value our days at Graceland so much that we've already begun talking Graceland to our three-year-old daughter. Jennifer is going to be disappointed to learn that she can't attend Graceland immediately upon completion of nursery school, as she now expects to do, but we know she will not be disappointed in Graceland when she does attend.

FRANCIS HENRY EDWARDS, JR., is a member of the First Presidency of the church. In September, 1921, he entered Graceland and in October of the following year was ordained an apostle.

He is the author of numerous books including "Fundamentals," "A Commentary of the Doctrine and Covenants," "God Our Help," "Life and Ministry of Jesus," and "Missionary Sermon Studies."

Born in Birmingham, England, and educated in the public schools there before coming to Graceland, he was working in an accountant's office when he entered active church work as a missionary in 1920. He is married to Alice Smith, daughter of the late President Frederick Madison Smith. They have three children.

"... ONE OF MY BEST YEARS"

WITH THE YEARS that have passed since I was a student at Graceland, I have felt myself more and more fortunate that I had a chance to attend our church college.

Many of our branches are quite small. This is particularly true in the distant missions. Under these circumstances young people are inclined to underrate the strength of our church endeavor. I think that one of the first things Graceland did for me was to show me the church in action on a high level and in a way which commanded my admiration. Even as far back as 1921-22, I was proud of our church college. And today, when I know much more about what is involved in operating a college, I am more proud of Graceland than ever before.

When I was a Graceland student, I was impressed and re-impressed by the high quality of the faculty-student relationships. I was hardly started in my year's work when I became seriously ill and had to be hospitalized for several weeks. A long way from home, and with very few old friends within reach, I was amazed at the natural way in which President Briggs, Dr. McDowell, Professor Irwin, Brother Gunsolley, and others made the transition from acquaintance and teacher to friend and teacher and then to friend and minister. During my sickness, and when I was struggling to catch up with the work which had gone forward while I was ill, men who were under no obligation to me ministered to me without condescension, but as though they actually enjoyed such service.

In the nature of things an alien who has his first contact with the American community at a small junior college has many problems he does not anticipate and which those around him do not suspect or understand. This was my experience. One or two of my immediate associates had come to Graceland from distant lands and had approximately the same problems I faced. These understood in part and I shall never cease to be grateful for the fact that John Blackmore and William Patterson of Australia, Prescott Foo of Hawaii, Harold Dewsnup and the Holmes brothers of England, shared my student difficulties as I shared theirs. But I am even more happy that we students from distant places felt and were so greatly helped by the comradeship of those among whom we had come to live. Whenever I meet a Graceland alumnus of my year, I feel especially close to him and eager to do something to show that I have caught the Graceland spirit, which is the spirit of Zionite fellowship.

I came a long way to attend Graceland in order to make some academic preparation for my life's work. I would have been very disappointed, both then and in the succeeding years, if I had not felt that the teaching at Graceland justified itself on its own account. I wanted more than mere instruction, but I did want competent instruction. I found both the high level of teaching and the other values I have mentioned.

As one of the general officers of the church, it is important for me to share the experience of other church members as fully as I can. Actually, I am just one of the men of the ministry, under appointment, with a job to do. It is a little difficult for me to be constantly aware that the information and the insight I have picked up on the way might be of use to young people who are just starting out. I am sometimes very much humbled to find how grateful young people are for help which I can give by being available for conversation and fellowship. And one of the great incentives to make myself as free for such a contribution as I can is my memory of the high value I placed on my contacts with President Frederick M. Smith and Brother Elbert, Apostle Rushton, and others.

Looking back, I think that my year at Graceland was one of my best years: not merely because of what happened during that year, but also because of the friendships and the expectations and the obligations which stem from that year of rich experience.

BOB ANDERSON is a farmer. He was graduated from Seneca High School, Seneca, Illinois, in 1943, worked with his father on their 240-acre grain and dairy farm during the war years, and enrolled at Graceland in 1947. Here he became editor of the "Tower," weekly student newspaper; a member of the student council; and a member of Graceland Players, among other activities. He was graduated from Graceland in 1949 and since has continued to work on the farm. He holds the office of elder and serves in the Mission Branch, a rural group of about 150, one of the oldest in the Reorganization.

In June of this year Bob married Dorothy Eastwood, whom he met at Graceland, "for which," says Bob, with characteristic chivalry, "I shall be eternally grateful."

ADVANTAGES OF THE SMALL SCHOOL

SOMETIME AGO, as a Graceland alumnus, I received through the mail a questionnaire from the college, asking among other things, "why I went to Graceland." The answers I made were as much the result of my happy experience there as they were of my predetermined set of reasons, even though my ideas were well thought out before I left for Lamon.

Basic in my choice of Graceland was the fact that I am a Reorganized Latter Day Saint—I inject this only as a starting point for my treasured memories—and as such sought the association of young men and women of similar standing while doing my college work in a school of high standing where my credits would transfer.

If I were to judge the fulfillment of my hopes on this one point alone, I should never regret my two years spent on the "Hill," for I number among the finest friends I have men and women who were classmates in a common experience. I doubt that the goals ahead of us were the same in any case, but the common ground upon which we stood linked us to a purpose greater than ourselves. Not that we were all Saints, for we were not, but such trivial differences lost importance in view of the greater worth of human personality. In most any state in the Union I can now greet old friends and acquaintances with the familiar Graceland "Hi" and realize the immensity and yet the closeness of our common brotherhood.

Before I left, several people who were graduates of large universities commented on the fact that I was wise in the choice of a small school to begin my college education, and it didn't take long before I realized that they were not merely making polite conversation. The tendency today is to make men cogs in a great machine that grinds out its methodical course, and the trend carries into colleges. One enters the doors as a freshman and four years later emerges with a degree, providing he hasn't been lost in the shuffle or decided in the meantime that after all ditch-digging pays pretty well these days. No matter how ideal the conditions, the transition to college is seldom easy, and even the best absorb their share of trying experiences.

For this reason alone Graceland was to me worth while. There instructors met the student as a person rather than as a chair which was to be filled with an anonymous face during the lecture period, and they gave their best that he might develop into a man or woman more capable of meeting the world's problems. If this doesn't sound important, ask someone who has been lost in a lecture hall with three or four hundred others for a semester, one who has not been within a hundred feet of the instructor, to compare the value of that course with one in which he could know the instructor and the others by name.

This is not to say I was never ruffled, for no one can really go to college and absorb new ideas without running into some that counteract old habits or theories of years' standing. I remember hours spent with friends who cared, working out problems in economics, literature, religion, or life purpose because I doubted or because they did and wouldn't accept any trite dogma for an answer.

In the things that mean the most to us we are apt to be vague, because they are hardest to define. I know that I'm glad I went to Graceland, but the specific reasons keep cropping up every day because my whole life has been changed and better directed from experiences and training there. I know students who have been to Lamoni who might have been unhappy because of their choice, but I have yet to encounter one who has really been to Graceland that would trade his two years there for a comparable two years in any other place. One has to live with a thing to really appreciate it; that's why I went to Graceland.

PAUL ELLIOTT was born in Independence in 1902, and attended Graceland from 1920 to 1922. Right out of Graceland he obtained a job as stenographer for the works manager of the Kansas City Bolt and Nut Company, a small concern near Independence. As this company grew, so did Paul Elliott. Today the bolt and nut enterprise has expanded into the Sheffield Steel Corporation, one of the largest in the Midwest, with plants in Missouri, Texas, and Oklahoma. And Paul Elliott is secretary to the president of the company.

Paul is a member of the Kansas City Chamber of Commerce, is executive vice-president of the Blue Valley Manufacturers and Business Men's Club, is superintendent of the senior high division of the Stone Church Sunday school, and teaches a church school class of high school sophomore boys. He is a counselor to the president of the third council of elders in Independence and a member of the Alumni Council of Graceland College. He is devoted to his wife and two daughters. He hopes to see his daughters attend Graceland some day.

A MORAL FOUNDATION FOR BUSINESS

AS AN OFFICER in a large steel company, I have reason to be grateful over and over again for what Graceland did for me.

Graceland gave me the vocational skills I needed. These skills were necessary in order for me to do the job. I am glad I could obtain them at Graceland.

But the thing Graceland gave me which has been of greatest value to me vocationally, and in many other ways, was a moral foundation for living. Of all the factors that have helped me obtain whatever success has been mine, these moral foundations have been the most helpful.

I suppose there are many good colleges which could have given me the vocational skills I had to have in my career. But I have discovered that these skills are only a small part of the total picture. There are plenty of fellows who have the skills. The thing which makes the difference is the kind of person one is—the kind of person who is using those skills.

I know of no school anywhere that can help a young man develop the character he needs for success in business as Graceland can. I don't know what would have happened to me if I hadn't gone to Graceland. I am grateful for what did happen to me there. I am glad I went to Graceland.

MRS. ALAN STEWART is the wife of the editor of a daily newspaper in Manhattan, Kansas. She is the mother of a one-and-a-half year old son, Douglas.

She graduated as Elinor Browne from Graceland during the war in 1945 when one out of every seven students enrolled was a man. She was a member of the staff of the student newspaper, a member of the girls' choir which replaced the A Cappella during the war, and an officer in her social club. As a student at the University of Kansas from which she was graduated in 1947 (with a B.S. in Journalism), among other accomplishments she served as society editor and as a feature writer for the "University Daily Kansan."

"HIGHER LEARNING . . . SOUNDER LIVING"

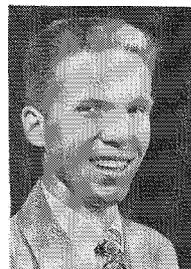

DESPITE the fact that I attended Graceland during the war years, when the campus was not its usual gay self, I am glad I spent my first two years of college there. When I went on to the University of Kansas my credits were readily accepted. That is an important item to consider. I also found that my courses at Graceland had covered the subjects as thoroughly as comparable courses at K. U. And, the personal interest the Graceland instructors took in my welfare was lacking in the larger university.

I now have a loyalty for two schools. But my loyalty for Graceland is more deeply rooted. In my opinion, the intangible aspects are as important as the tangible. I am fitted for a career, if need me, due to my two years at the university. But I feel I am a better wife and mother because of my two years at Graceland. For at Graceland one is not only given a foundation for higher learning, but also a foundation for sounder living and life itself.

The fellowship I enjoyed as a Gracelander with my fellow students was never experienced at the university. Of course we all had mutual interests in our teams and cheered them on to victory, but that is where those interests ended.

I would enthusiastically recommend Graceland as a fine beginning for a higher education and a fine beginning for a higher type of living.

I AM glad I went to Graceland.

FRED ARMSTRONG is twenty-one years of age, a priesthood member, a Zion's League supervisor, and a junior high class teacher in the Goddard Road church of the Detroit International Stake.

This summer he is working in one of Detroit's automobile factories earning money for his schooling. During the past school year he attended Wayne University, finishing his premedical requirements, and this fall enters Wayne College of Medicine.

At Graceland he was a freshman class officer, a student council member, a Baker Hall dorm counselor, and a member of Lambda Delta Sigma honor society. He was graduated in 1949.

"... BEST INVESTMENT EVER MADE"

I AM GLAD I went to Graceland College, for, as a result of my two years of experiences there, I feel that my life is progressively being enriched. The living memories of the touching Communion services, the new life concepts learned in the biology lab, and the whole-wide circle of friends continue to aid my personal development and give me a greater sense of purposeful living. Since attending Graceland I feel my social qualities have improved and that my religious activities have been enhanced. As for academic considerations, I have found that Graceland's accreditation is very high, for solely on my Graceland credits and on the recommendations of Graceland instructors I have received my acceptance into an extremely exclusive professional school. All in all, I can honestly assert that the time and money I spent on my Graceland education comprise the best investment I have ever made, not primarily in the eventual material returns but in a richness of life.

spent most of his life in Monona County, Iowa.

He is survived by his father, G. W. Lukehart; a twin sister, Mrs. Maude Patterson of Soldier, Iowa; and another sister, Mrs. Doris Bradley of Sioux City, Iowa. Funeral services were held at the reorganized Church in Moorhead, Iowa, Elder Walter Weldon presiding. Burial was in the Moorhead cemetery.

DECK.—Francis E., was born February 28, 1873, at Havelock, Ontario, and died July 23, 1950 at the home of a son, Maxwell A. Deck, in Kansas City, Kansas, where he had made his home the past seven months. He was formerly a resident of Plentywood, Montana. He was married in 1903 to Nellie Tutty, who survives him, and was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church in 1913.

Besides his wife he leaves three sons: Maxwell; Lloyd W. of Minneapolis, Minnesota; and Melvin L. of Seward, Alaska; five daughters: Mrs. Christine Dooley of Billings, Montana; Mrs. Margaret S. Schiebold of Fargo, North Dakota; Mrs. Wilhemine Mills of Portland, Oregon; Mrs. Frances O'Neill of Gilman, Colorado; and Mrs. Leone King of Spencer, Iowa; three brothers: Albert, Thomas, and William Deck of Peterborough, Ontario; and eighteen grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Echtenacht Chapel, and interment was in Chapel Hill Cemetery.

GOLD.—Ollieva Z., daughter of Thomas N. and Amanda Smith, was born January 6, 1881, at Tunnel Hill, Illinois, and died July 19, 1950, at the Independence Sanitarium. She was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church on February 28, 1896, and on November 26, 1905, was married to Samuel B. Gold; five children were born to them. A daughter, Leota, died at the age of five. Soon after their marriage the Golds made their home in Independence, Missouri, where Mr. Gold died on July 11, 1946. A devoted wife and mother, Sister Gold was also active in her church group and served as secretary for a number of years. She was a member of the Laurel Club for about twenty-two years and belonged to the Home Beautiful Club.

Surviving are three sons: Bruce of Plattsmouth, Nebraska; Orville of Kansas City, Missouri; and Milton of Independence, Missouri; a daughter, Mrs. Hubert Latimer of Independence; four sisters: Mrs. Oscar Westwood, Mrs. Earl Etzenhouser, and Mrs. Alvessia Cochran of Independence, and Mrs. Flora Broughton of Holdenville, Oklahoma; three brothers: Parley P. of Skiatook, Oklahoma; Alvin of Maimi, Oklahoma; and R. B. Smith of Kansas City, Missouri; and eight grandchildren. Funeral services were held at Stone Church, Elders Glaude A. Smith and Henry Schaefer officiating. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

SCARCLIFF.—William B., son of Henry and Elizabeth Scarcliff, was born August 23, 1866, at Janesville, Wisconsin, and died June 11, 1950, at his home in Atchison, Kansas, following several years of ill health. He was reared in Holden, Missouri, and on November 11, 1891, was married to Ruby Herbst there. Mrs. Scarcliff and a son, Henry, died in 1937. He was a member of the Reorganized Church.

Surviving are three daughters: Miss Maude Scarcliff of the home; Mrs. Lawrence Robertson of Atchison; and Mrs. Louis Gerard of Lancaster, Kansas; two sons: Delbert of the home and William of Russell, Iowa; a brother, C. F. Scarcliff of Holden; eight grandchildren and four great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Stanton Chapel in Atchison, Elder Gilbert Hedrick officiating.

NICHOLSON.—Francis P., was born in Sandwich South Township, Ontario, in 1874, and died May 14, 1950, in Windsor, Ontario. He was a respected citizen and a valued member of the Reorganized Church for many years. Until ill health caused his retirement, he was a prosperous farmer.

He is survived by his wife, Erma; a son, Carl; two daughters: Mrs. Robert Carnahan and Mrs. Harry Volland, all of Anderson Township; a brother, George of Saskatchewan; thirteen grandchildren and thirteen great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church, Elders James Pycok, W. Blair McClain, and Irving Jones officiating. Interment was in Rose Hill Cemetery, Amherstburg.

BLOCK.—Ivy Mae, daughter of Watson and Nora Belleville, was born in Soldier, Iowa, on July 5, 1907, and died in the Vale Hospital, Topeka, Kansas on May 17, 1950, of a heart ailment. She had been in poor health since suffering a stroke four years ago. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since September 6, 1921, and had made her home in Topeka since 1937.

She is survived by her parents; four sisters: Mrs. Elsie Sewall of Woodbine, Iowa; Mrs. Hazel Sorenson of Pine Ridge, South Dakota; Mrs. Lila Harmonay of San Diego, California, and Mrs. Cleoma Rowen, Island of Guam; four brothers: Oscar, Charles, and William of Mondamin, Iowa; and Gerald of Quonset Point, Rhode Island; and her grandmother, Mrs. Simon Ruffcorn of Mondamin, Iowa. Funeral services were held in the Methodist Church in Mondamin, Elder Francis Harper officiating. Interment was in the Little Sioux Cemetery.

FULLBERG.—Frank Christian, was born at Winona, Minnesota, on October 12, 1880, and died unexpectedly on June 23, 1950, while working in the front yard of his home in Council Bluffs, Iowa, where he had lived the past fifty years. He was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church in Council Bluffs on January 16, 1921, and was later called to the office of elder. On April 20, 1909, he was married to Bertha Jacobsen; three children were born to them. For a number of years he was engaged in the real estate business, and for ten years owned and managed a grocery store. He retired about three years ago.

He is survived by his wife, Bertha, and a daughter, Murial Hopkins, both of Council Bluffs; two sons: Eldon of Santa Barbara, California, and Franklin of Council Bluffs; a sister, Hannah Wachenheim of Savanna, Illinois; and five grandchildren. Services were held at the Woodring Funeral Home in Council Bluffs, Elder V. D. Ruch officiating. Interment was in the Walnut Hill Cemetery in Council Bluffs.

BARMORE.—Bertha Beryl, daughter of Joel and Mary Brown, was born October 20, 1884, at Delphos, Kansas, and died June 27, 1950, at her home in Independence, Missouri, after a short illness. She was married to James D. Barmore in 1903; ten children were born to them. On March 20, 1921, she was baptized into the Reorganized Church at Rolla, Kansas. Two years later she and her husband and their young family moved to Independence, Missouri. Mr. Barmore and three sons preceded her in death.

Surviving are five daughters: Mrs. Louise M. Huddle, Mrs. Hazel Bradshaw, Mrs. Esther Hunsburger, and Miss Bonnie Barmore of Independence, and Mrs. Beryl Vaughan of Sedalia, Missouri; two sons: Ralph of Wichita, Kansas, and Joel of Independence; a sister, Mrs. Mignon Blunk, and a stepister, Mrs. Ethel Clark, both of Waukomis, Oklahoma; seven grandchildren and seven great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held at Second Church in Independence, Missouri, Elders Charles Edmunds and Guy Mintun officiating. Burial was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

OLSEN.—Peter, was born July 7, 1865, in Utah, and died July 16, 1950, at his home in Council Bluffs, Iowa. With his parents he moved to Pottawattamie County, Iowa, at the age of four and remained there the rest of his life. He was married in April, 1890. His wife and two daughters preceded him in death. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since July 18, 1892, and was also prominent in county farm organizations.

Surviving are four sons: Harry, James, Albert, and Howard, all of Council Bluffs; two daughters: Mrs. Ernest Hough and Mrs. Basil Guill, of Underwood, Iowa; an adopted daughter, Mrs. W. R. Graves of Arnolds Park, Iowa; twenty grandchildren and eleven great-grandchildren. The funeral was conducted at Woodring Mortuary in Council Bluffs by Elder V. D. Ruch. Interment was in the Grange Cemetery near Council Bluffs.

 THE OTHER FELLOW'S SHOES

The lady struggled out of the crowded street car, grumbling that she had been forced to stand on one foot all the way down town. She and her fellow-sufferers were somewhat startled on hearing a "mere male" voice retort, "Yes, madam, and that one was mine!" (If the oaf had given her the seat, neither of them would have a reason to complain.)

How human it is to forget the other fellow. How seldom we consider his feelings.

We say, "I wouldn't want to be in his shoes," or, "I'll bet his feet hurt." But how often do we try to help the unfortunate or perhaps sinful one? Isn't it true that we even enjoy seeing them squirm sometimes? We hear, "Serves him right. I don't feel a bit sorry for him," etc., as we witness someone's reaping what he has sown.

Did Christ teach this? Let us try to remember the other fellow, judging not too harshly when we think that the "shoe" is nipping him. What if it were on the other foot? Ours, then, might be the greater discomfiture.

A wise Indian once prayed, "Great Spirit, help me never to judge another man until I have walked two weeks in his moccasins."

Edith Grace Beggs.

 PUSH

In this push-button age, we might be sure of success, if we could only know which button to push, and when. Many of our failures come from not knowing.

 FAMILY ALTAR

It was Papa who gave us the idea for this P.S. Papa was late for Work last Tuesday. It was Mama's fault. They had Family Altar at breakfast time. Mama was in a Mood. Mama prayed for the Sick Neighbors; the Postum got cold. Mama prayed for the Heathen Nations; the Egg became leathery. Mama prayed for the Missionaries and the local Church; the Toast was vulcanized. Mama looked over God's shoulder and prayed, with Disapproval in her Voice, for Junior and Billielou, who have misbehaved lately. By the time Mama finished praying, it was too late for Breakfast, and it wasn't fit to eat anyway. Papa kissed Everybody good-by, grabbed his Hat, and ran for the Bus. He just missed it.

Papa has ideas on the subject. "We ought to have short prayers in the morning, just for personal help to get through the day. We ought to be like Jacob, who saved his spiritual wrestling for the evening, when there was plenty of time." Papa is getting Mama a stop watch.

 VIBRATIONS

Uncle Joe has learned something new about bus jiggles on a tramp steamer (looks like a tramp, and the radiator steams) of the Rough & Seldom Transit Company. In addition to the regular up-and-down bounce, and the special back-and-forth jerks, this bus has added a sideways throb that will loosen the lining of the toughest lunch box in eight blocks. And if your breakfast egg wasn't scrambled before the ride, it certainly is afterward.

The Hymnal for Youth

(Herald Edition)

"The Hymnal for Youth" (Herald Edition) which we are now introducing includes many hymns that are already well known among us. There are also a large number of hymns that have found acceptance elsewhere which ought to become better known among the Saints. And we are glad to say that there are more than a few (written by our own people) that have never been published before, but which we believe will be welcomed and loved. . . .

"We were happy to be able to make an arrangement with The Westminster Press that permitted us to include herein many of the hymns already issued in their 'Hymnal for Youth,' and to add thereto hymns of our own choosing." Quoted from The Preface by Israel A. Smith and F. Henry Edwards.

The new Hymnal includes the following sections: "When We Worship," "Orders of Worship," "Responsive Readings," and almost 400 hymns.

Hope For Our Children

WE HAVE GREAT HOPE for our children. We plan for their future. We establish a savings account to pay for their education when the time comes. We want to give them an opportunity for happy, useful citizenship in their country, and responsible membership in the church. We make many sacrifices for them, with no thought of ever being repaid, except in seeing them well and happy, righteous, kind, and successful in life. Our future is in our children.

The church has a complete program of religious and spiritual instruction and nurture for our children, to supplement what we should give them at home. Unless we give them religious life at home, what the church does for them on Sunday may be in vain. Church and home must work together for the benefit of the child. Everything depends upon the parents. Good fathers and mothers will send their children, or take them, to church school. They will teach them to love and respect the church and its people.

One thing that parents used to do seems to be turning into a lost art. That is, reading to their children. Children love to have their parents read to them. To the child, the very sound of the mother's voice is beautiful. The father's voice is strong and reassuring. Children like to be read to, even after they have learned to read themselves. "Read it to me," they plead. We should grant their request.

Hope is for the children—Zion's Hope. The church publishes this magazine for the little folk. They cannot subscribe for it for themselves. They may get it at the church school. If negligent officers fail to subscribe for it, children can do nothing. Parents should see that the paper comes, in one way or another.

See that the child brings the paper home. Then make a happy experience of reading it to him. Children's most precious memories are those of happiness in listening to mother or father reading to them.

Hope is for the children.

News & Notes

SORROW

On August 12 a car accident caused the death of a young church appointee, Harley Nagel, age 28. He was riding with Brother and Sister Leon Allen when the car skidded on the wet, rain-drenched pavement and went out of control.

At the last General Conference, Brother Nagel was appointed to the missionary field, with Columbus, Ohio, as the objective. At the time of the accident, he was on his way to the Kirtland, Ohio, reunion where he was to teach a class.

Brother Nagel is survived by his wife Mrs. Sadi Moon Nagel, the former editor of "Stepping Stones," and by his parents, Mr. and Mrs. John W. Nagel and sister Christina, of Independence. His only brother Curtis was killed in action in the English Channel in World War II. Funeral services for Brother Nagel were held August 15 in the Stone Church.

Brother Leon Allen is hospitalized with an injured back. Mrs. Leon Allen (nee Eunice Jeanette Wemmer) is at the home of Brother Allen's mother and is suffering shock and minor cuts and bruises. The Allens were married just one week ago.

APOSTLE OAKMAN

The Saints in Omaha, Nebraska, were visited by Apostle Arthur A. Oakman the first week in August. Tentative plans were made for a series of cottage meetings and preaching services to be held in Omaha during the latter part of September.

CAMPUS SERVICE

Seventy George A. Njeim chose the subject "The Restoration Proclaims the Fullness of the Gospel" for his August 6 sermon at the Campus. Following the regular campus service, Brother Njeim spoke to the city-wide Zion's League groups, telling the story of his conversion to the church.

MUSIC

Franklyn S. Weddle, director of the Department of Music, was guest speaker at the Louisville Music Institute held July 29 and 30 in Louisville, Kentucky. His topic for the Saturday evening banquet was "Witnessing for Christ Through the Ministry of Music." Classes were held in choir music, multiple organ arrangements, and priesthood use of music. Brother Weddle also spoke at the 11:00 service on Sunday.

AUDITORIUM

Work has been started on the front of The Auditorium. It was found necessary to water-proof the plaster above the three doors of the entrance of the building with an extra coat of stucco. The concrete covering over the very top of the dome has been removed and preparations are being made for roofing over the area.

TO HIGH POSITION

Dr. John C. Blumenschein, church elder and prominent physician in Independence, was appointed physician for the Jackson County Emergency Hospital by the County Court at its meeting on August 7. Dr. Blumenschein began his new work immediately with the appointment. This work will be in addition to his general practice.

Are We Good Enough?

The word of the Lord came unto Jonah, saying, Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city, and cry against it; for their wickedness is come up before me Jonah began to enter into the city, and said, Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown. So the people of Nineveh believed God and proclaimed a fast, the king saying, Who can tell if God will turn away from his fierce anger? And God saw their works, that they turned from their evil way.

—The Book of Jonah

The shaping of current events recalls the story of the great city of Nineveh at the time that the Prophet Jonah was commanded to go to it and prophesy its destruction. It is amazing that the whole city, from the greatest to the least, repented. It is not surprising that, under these circumstances, God spared the city.

Critics, of course, attack the historicity of the tale. A critic will attack anything. However, they do not attack the moral truth of the story. It is a historical fact that civilizations have perished for their sins. And some have been preserved by righteousness. Decay from within has destroyed more nations than attack from without.

In the story of Nineveh there is something for America to learn.

While the war in Korea is still on a small scale, it is a part of a larger threat and a world-wide battle line, in which the United States is threatened with destruction. And while we are threatened by destruction from abroad, we must also be aware that we are in danger from spiritual and moral decadence at home.

A powerful foe has decreed our destruction. His way of life is against our way. There is no possibility now of tolerance. He will not rest so long as the two powers exist in the world. He will not compromise. He will not cease the attack, until one or the other perishes. He has made this choice. We can only choose to fight, or yield and die. There seems to be nothing else. It has been so ever since Karl Marx formed the terrible doctrine of class warfare. If there is any other alternative, it does not appear now.

History has another lesson to teach us. The Phoenicians, expanding from ancient Tyre, built Carthage on the African coast, opposite Italy. Carthage became a great commercial city-state, a strong rival of Rome. Their clashes pointed up in the three great Punic Wars, from 264 B.C. to 146, ending in the destruction of Carthage. Carthage was defeated, not because of the failures of her armies and navies abroad, but because of her weakness at home. Carthage never made friends of the native people she subdued in Africa. The historian mentions "the danger she constantly encountered from factions and dissensions within the city itself." That reminds us of the political warfare in our country. Worse, Carthaginians practiced the abominable religion of their Phoenician ancestors, the worship of Moloch or Vaal, to whom they offered human sacrifices, with cruel and lascivious rites. The evils of Carthage caused her destruction.

In a time of trouble and danger like the present, we are reminded of the words of President Lincoln in his Gettysburg Address:

A nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated Now we are engaged in a great war, testing whether that nation or any nation so conceived and so dedicated can long endure.

How long can a nation like ours endure in this kind of world? Military strength is not enough. We also need moral and spiritual strength.

We cannot change the world easily to make it safe for us. The enemy will see to that. But we can change ourselves. We can become better. We can repent of our sins and turn to righteousness. If we can become better, we will be stronger.

Perhaps we have done too much talking about the "American Way." Let's not flatter ourselves. This is only "Freedom's Way," and we didn't invent it. Let's be decently humble. Let's get over our pride, our provincialism, our smug complacency. This war cannot be won by us, nor by any other lone nation. As in the last two wars, it will involve everybody.

We should be careful not to get the idea that God has appointed us to be the official policemen of the world. There are some other peoples who have had that idea, and look at the ash cans that are filled with their broken batons, crushed helmets, and rusty badges. Yes, and the graves filled with their dead, slain before their time.

There is a God above history who puts this question to the people of every civilization, "Are you good enough to survive?" The great moving forces of the ages have frequently removed peoples and civilizations that were not good enough for survival.

As we face the great struggle of the world today, we meet the question, "Is Western Civilization worthy to survive?" We must not think that the answer is a foregone conclusion. We may think, "Yes." But we must also consider the possibility that God might think, "No."

We have one recourse. It is the solution that Nineveh took. We can repent and become better. It may be that the great world-wide struggle will be determined, not by whether we are strong enough, but by whether we are good enough!

We can change. It is not yet too late. Will we do it? L. J. L.

Midyear Financial Report

WE ARE submitting herewith a statement of income for the first six months of the year compared with the same period for 1949.

	1949	1950	Gain or Loss
January	$147,928.49	$155,693.65	$ 7,765.16
February	105,070.09	105,508.28	438.19
March	87,931.32	97,444.73	9,513.41
April	83,542.28	99,498.12	15,955.84
May	72,177.66	77,713.41	5,535.75
June	63,925.78	75,376.25	11,450.47

It will be noted that there has been an increase each month over the corresponding month last year, with substantial gains occurring in April and June. This excellent report is made possible through the continuing support of our membership throughout the world. In view of the expanding church program, the goal for General Church income was increased by 10 per cent over the 1949 income. The increase for the six months period is slightly over 9 per cent.

We are pleased to report an encouraging increase in the number of tithing statement filers during the same period. A total of 11,577 tithing statements was received during the first six months of 1950, as compared with 10,184 for the corresponding period of 1949, and 8,434 for 1948.

Respectfully submitted,
THE PRESIDING BISHOPRIC,
By W. N. Johnson

This will give official notice of the appointment of Elder John E. Booth as president of Toronto District, subject to later action of the district conference.

C. G. Mesley,
Apostle in Charge.
THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
By W. Wallace Smith.

Notice of Appointment of Bishop's Agent, Central Illinois District

Notice is hereby given of the appointment of Elder Kenneth A. Newton, R. R. 1, Box 314, Decatur, Illinois, as Bishop's agent of the Central Illinois District succeeding Elder

E. E. Thomas, whose resignation has been received. Solicitors are hereby notified to send their reports for the month of August and each succeeding month thereafter to Brother Newton at the above address.

Brother Thomas has served as agent for a period of approximately twenty years. His work has been characterized by unfailing courtesy, co-operation, and devotion to the best interests of the church. We feel sure his ministry has been helpful to many church members over the past years, and we take this opportunity of expressing our appreciation to him for the good services rendered this office.

We have also appreciated the support given by the Saints to Brother Thomas during the period of his service and commend Brother Newton to the Saints for their favorable consideration and support.

THE PRESIDING BISHOPRIC,
By W. N. Johnson.

Notice to Missionaries

Growing out of suggestions voiced by members of the New Appointees' Institute which recently met in Independence, a two-page article has been prepared to assist missionaries in getting publicity of their services in local newspapers. We will be glad to furnish a copy of this to any of our missionaries who request it. —Editor.

Across the Desk

Bishop Kohlman recently returned from a reunion assignment in the South. He told us of some of his joys in sharing God's goodness with the Saints in such a convincing way that we asked him to write it for this column. We hope each reader will catch the full spirit and significance of it.

My family and I have recently returned from a trip south, which was occasioned by our assignment to the Gulf States Reunion held July 8-16 at Brewton, Alabama. Herewith we desire to bear testimony of a most enriching reunion experience.

It was normal to hear that this was the best reunion ever held at Brewton. This is as it ought to be. However, this reunion was different from any we had experienced personally in the manifestation of the power of the Holy Spirit to cleanse and transform the lives of people.

Never before have we witnessed the grace and power of the Holy Spirit in such measure and strength as to seemingly shake our very beings and burn deep within our bosoms.

We witnessed a people edified by the gifts of wisdom, knowledge, and prophecy. We witnessed a people, motivated by this spirit, whose very countenances and personalities revealed a spirit of peace and oneness. We envisioned and witnessed, by the power of the Holy Spirit, racial barriers transcended and God's word affirmed anew that He "hath made of one blood all nations of men."

Those of us who were permitted to share in this reunion experience, under the revelatory power which was ours together, know that to walk out of harmony with that which was revealed and now known by us is to walk in the spirit of apostasy.

We are grateful for our trip south and this most uplifting experience, and herewith not only bear testimony but express our thanks and praise to God.

The Voice of God

Sermon given at Stone Church on April 6, 1950
during General Conference.

By APOSTLE E. J. GLEAZER

WE CELEBRATE today one of the most outstanding events that ever transpired upon this earth—the organization of the church of Jesus Christ. That event happened one hundred twenty years ago. I am wondering if too many of us are so satisfied with our present numerical strength, with the vast throngs that crowd these Conferences, and the other accomplishments of our church in recent years, that we are losing concern for the purposes of the same God who spoke to his servant Joseph Smith and others, giving to them commandments which resulted in the organization of his church in these last days. The trouble with the general Christian world is that it is too content to dwell upon the events that transpired 1,900 or more years ago. Let us be sure that we are not content with what happened one hundred years ago. I trust we shall not be guilty of attempting to satisfy our souls with that which has been.

There are many distinctive things in the latter-day work. Chief among them is the fact that God not only revealed himself to Joseph Smith and others, but gave the people to understand that he would continue to make himself manifest in order that his kingdom might become a reality, and his righteousness might become manifest in the affairs of men.

The words of one of our gospel hymns comes to mind: "A voice commissioned from on high." I would like to talk with you regarding a voice from heaven. Of course, I am thinking not only of the voice of God, but also of the voice of Moroni, the voice of John the Baptist, and the voice of other heavenly messengers who had part together with God in bringing this church into being. I invite your attention to the first section of Doctrine and Covenants, paragraphs one and three.

Hearken, O ye people of my church, saith the voice of him who dwells on high, and whose eyes are upon all men; yea, verily I say, Hearken ye people from afar, and ye that are upon the islands of the sea, listen together; for verily the voice of the Lord is unto all men, and there is none to escape, and there is no eye that shall not see, neither ear that shall not hear, neither heart that shall not be penetrated; and the rebellious shall be pierced with much sorrow, for their iniquities shall be spoken upon the housetops, and their secret acts shall be revealed; and the voice of warning shall be unto all people, by the mouths of my disciples, whom I have chosen in these last days, and they shall go forth and none shall stay them, for I the Lord have commanded them.

Wherefore the voice of the Lord is unto the ends of the earth, that all that will hear may hear; prepare ye, prepare ye for that which is to come, for the Lord is nigh; and the anger of the Lord is kindled, and his sword is bathed in heaven, and it shall fall upon the inhabitants of the earth; and the arm of the Lord shall be revealed; and the day cometh that they who will not hear the voice of the Lord, neither the voice of his servants, neither give heed to the words of the prophets and apostles, shall be cut off from among the people; for they have strayed from mine ordinances, and have broken mine everlasting covenant; they seek not the Lord to establish his righteousness, but every man walketh in his own way, and after the image of his own god, whose image is in the likeness of the world, and whose substance is that of an idol, which waxeth old and shall perish in Babylon, even Babylon the great, which shall fall.

Need I say any more, or read any more to bear testimony to you that these words are of God? It is the voice of God to the membership of this church. If we do nothing more than analyze these two paragraphs, I think you would be convinced that as a church we haven't paid sufficient attention to the voice of God. Enough years have passed to vindicate the divinity of these words, and we are living witnesses today of what was delivered by God to the young prophet.

This is the hour of fulfillment. All I have read regarding the sins of men manifest today that the earth is suffering a great curse because of the disobedience of its inhabitants. And I would like to say to you by way of encouragement, that inasmuch as we are witnesses to the fulfillment of the word of God regarding the consequences of sin, we also can be witnesses to the truthfulness of the work of God regarding a reign of righteousness and the establishment of his kingdom. God predicted not only the overthrow of the wicked but also the survival of the righteous.

All the promises of God are conditional. They are conditioned upon our obedience. We must have more of the voice of God and become more obedient to it. I don't mean to suggest that this requires more revelations. I am going beyond that. You and I must hearken to the voice of God. We must have an experience with him. God is no respecter of persons. We must not be strangers to his voice. More of our people must hear his voice and comply with it if Zion is to become a reality.

WE CANNOT BRING TO PASS the establishment of the righteousness of God by passing Conference resolutions. If that were so, we would have succeeded many years ago. The righteous behavior of men comes as a result of the power of God within them, not from legislation or resolutions.

God throughout all dispensations of time has made himself available to man. This same impartial unchangeable being "is not far away from any of us," as the Apostle Paul declared when he addressed the people of Athens, but it is meant to say that we must seek after him. The voice of the Lord is to the ends of the earth that all who will may hear.

We may limit the influence of God's power upon us. If his voice is not heard, the fault is ours, not his, for all Scripture, all history, bear witness that God is ever ready to manifest himself to men when they are in an attitude to receive. He was not speaking idle words when he said, "Every man walketh in his own way and after the image of his own God." That was certainly descriptive of the people of one hundred twenty years ago, and it is equally descriptive of people today. How many in this community are concerned first in seeking the righteousness of God?

God said, "They seek not the Lord to establish his righteousness." How many people are attempting to seek to establish the righteousness of God today? It wouldn't be diplomatic for me to ask, "How many Latter Day Saints are concerned in seeking God's way?" But since I'm not diplomatic, I'm going to say that too few of us are concerned with God's way, except when we are in a good prayer meeting and moved by the right Spirit.

Our difficulty is that we do not permit this Spirit to dwell with us long enough to bring to pass the manifestations of righteousness through us. That "every man walketh in his own way and after the image of his own God" is too true. I place myself in the company of men and women who have said, over and over again, "Zion could have been redeemed long before this, if we had been obedient to the commandments of Almighty God." It is possible that only in a time of crises we seek the Lord.

I WAS IN CALIFORNIA by appointment in 1933 and happened to be present during an earthquake. It was reported that more people said their prayers the night of that earthquake and the next day than before or since.

Some of us never knew when we were going to have another major shock, and a great many people kept on praying. The only difficulty was that the Lord didn't keep on shaking the earth long enough to develop within the people the habit of prayer.

One year after that tragic occurrence, when so many people lost their lives, they celebrated by having a dance and all that goes with a dance. That was their way of celebrating the earthquake. Small wonder that God looked upon this world and wept.

There is another story in the Good Book which I wish to bring to your attention. The king of Babylon was in a predicament. He had a dream. The dream was of sufficient importance that it troubled him, but in addition to that he forgot it. He remembered only his fear. He called the magicians, astrologers, and sorcerers to interpret his dream, and they couldn't do it. King Nebuchadnezzar was enraged and ordered all of them to be killed. Among the captives from Jerusalem was Daniel, a man of God. He appealed to the king, described the dream, and interpreted it.

But the thing that concerns us is what Daniel said to the king: "But there is a God in heaven that reveal-eth secrets, and maketh known to King Nebuchadnezzar what shall be in the latter days."

Can you imagine what kind of man Daniel was to speak like that? "But there is a God in heaven!" Do you talk to your friends and neighbors in that language today? All you hear is pessimism, war, trouble, and fear.

I USED TO TELL the Saints that someday they would get rid of Hitler. Some of them didn't believe me. "But," I said, "after you get rid of Hitler, you're still going to have trouble." Now we have another dictator or somebody impersonating him—we don't know.

Many of us can come forth in this hour of pessimism and say, "But there is a God in heaven who reveals secrets and has made known what is coming to pass in the latter days." Can you say that to your friends? Are you tottering too? Are you shaking? Are you crumbling?

I received a new interpretation of an old text the other day in prayer meeting, and I want to bring it in here now: "Be not overcome with evil, but overcome evil with good." Do you know, my friends, it's possible for good people to be overcome by evil? You can permit the evil of your age to depress and discourage you so that you can become absolutely useless in the cause of Christ.

"Be not overcome with evil, but overcome evil with good." That's the call to this church today. Why are we so dependent upon what is done in Washington? (I speak respectfully when I ask that.) Why are we so dependent on what happens in London and in other capitals of the world? I think old-time Latter Day Saints used to hear words to the effect that it was the intent of Almighty God that sometime this people should become independent of every nation under heaven. In those days people were so old-fashioned they believed things like that; now we hear people say, "How can we be independent?"

Are we going to be overcome by evil? Or are we going to overcome evil with good? I have maintained for a number of years that if we would dare to manifest Christ in community living, thousands of worth-while men and women who are not of our faith would seek to discover our way of life. We also have a Red Sea to cross before we can make a stand. One of these days, if I'm not mistaken, either the conditions which prevail in the world about us will force us to cross our Red Sea, or we will hear the voice of God saying to us in the hour of our calamity, "Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto this people that they go forward."

That same promise given to the disciples of Christ that no power can stay them applies to any person who has the courage to carry out the will of his Lord and Master. We are talking about our great missionary program. Well, it's better than it has been. We have increased it a bit. Now if we really believed in the voice of God, if we dared to hearken, we would be baptizing thousands of worth-while men and women who are seeking that voice. But they must see the manifestation of that voice in the life we can produce as Saints.

This calls for more individual goodness. It also calls for an example of collective righteousness that will manifest God in government and in business—not the church in business—but God in business and God in our social activities. The voice of God requires this church to produce his way of life.

Speaking from this pulpit recently, I used the text, "If any among you lack wisdom, let him ask of God." Talk about small beginnings—could you find a smaller beginning than the fourteen-year-old lad, Joseph Smith? He may have lacked academic training, but he learned rapidly. You have no need to apologize for the followers or the family of Joseph Smith. But regardless of how good or how intelligent a fourteen-year-old lad is, he is not considered great in the eyes of the world. Joseph was not yet in his fifteenth year when he was moved to seek God. God heard his prayer and revealed the Father and the Son to him. Joseph heard the voice of God saying, "This is my beloved Son, hear him." And through that young man, God established his church. If it had not been for the apostasy to Utah on the part of so many of the original members of that church, God alone knows what kind of organization we would have had today.

You talk about humble beginnings. If the voice of God, speaking to a young man and a few humble associates, could accomplish in fourteen years what is recorded regarding the history of this church, think what could happen to us today if a hundred forty thousand Latter Day Saints could hear that voice and be obedient to it.

I HAVE HEARD IT SAID many times by many people, "We just can't do it today. We haven't the means." Let's go back in our history. Suppose you had been one of the six present in the Whitmer home when the church was organized. Just think of that little company of Saints. They were all young men. Can you imagine some of those young men saying, "We haven't the means. We haven't any money"? I know that's the problem of a great many people. You hear it from the time you hear anything at all until the time you die. No matter how much money we get, we always think we ought to have more.

I think that in many instances money prevents our doing what God wants us to do. For years and years I have been committed to the text, "Zion shall be built by sacrifice." I have reached the conclusion that we will never build Zion in the hour of our prosperity. We'll build it in the hour of our need, and that is the reason for the sacrifice. We will have to take from our need to bring to pass the kingdom.

I am speaking only for myself. Out of our need we shall take what is necessary. It is not a question of wealth; it is not even a question of numbers. It is a question of righteousness. Years ago I used to say that if we had only five thousand people who were willing to discipline themselves in harmony with the voice of God, we could manifest a righteous community. These five thousand would have to be brought into one community where the population would be sufficiently strong to manifest righteousness in government, in business, and in domestic life.

That is why I still believe in a gathering. That is why we must have a gathering, and that is why this gathering must be selected. I am of the opinion—and I am going to be of that opinion until I am convinced otherwise—that we have more than five thousand people in this church who would be willing to be selected and to move under direction into a community where they might be used as instruments in the hands of God in making manifest his revelation of righteousness.

What a missionary force that would be. Think how the word of such a community would be carried to the ends of the earth, and how the fulfillment of another prophecy, and the nations of the earth would acknowledge that the kingdom of Zion is in very deed the kingdom of God and his Christ.

We complicate this ideal of Zion so that it becomes impossible to attain. And we are content to say, "It can't be done." Joseph Smith and those associated with him could have said that. Need I remind you how men directed by the Spirit left Kirtland, Ohio, without sufficient funds, to go to England, and succeeded splendidly on that mission.

Suppose they had said, "It can't be done. We don't have the means."

THE VOICE OF GOD comes to us now whether we recognize it or not. This is an hour of crisis. The only solution is to have the voice of God, to hear it and to comply with

WE LOOK AT BEAUTY

By Marcella Schenck

MY HOSTESS showed me snowy peaks noted for their grandeur and mountain streams laughing down the valleys. Our car ascended beckoning curves up and over a pass that "welcomed strangers"; then down again until we stood beside long stretches of reflecting lakes. Deep within them lay buried the twin majesty of the peaks above. We found aspen ghosts stalking at mid-day, unashamed, in forests dusky as the twilight. And I would not forget the rainbow, standing tiptoe in the valley meadow, peering through circling, highland mists into ethereal mysteries.

"Come again," said she. "You must. You so appreciate my world."

"And you," I said, "come visit me. I have no wealth of scenery to share with you, but if you linger long enough, you shall know people steadfast as your Tetons or gay as laughing streams. Those who give a welcome. Those who reflect a majesty too rich for one to question its source. People unafraid and unashamed to meet life as it is. People with feet planted firmly on the earth, who yet vision a future worth striving for. My world is a little Iowa town beside a highway, and I love its people."

"You couldn't mean to say," she said, "that all the people of your town are like that!"

"There were some dead pines on your mountain slope, fallen and shattered by storms long past," I reminded her. "Weeds grew beside the flowers we plucked on that last upward climb. We came across a panther's tracks on the trail back there and hurried here to a safer zone."

"But those are such minor things besides all this," she protested with widening gesture. "I choose to see only the beauty of my world."

I smiled. In my little Iowa town I choose to look for beauty, too. The living soul can be the most beautiful of all God's creation.

it. This church is distinctive from all other churches on the face of God's earth. Its members know that God can and does speak. He waits upon humanity. It's a solemn mockery to ask for counsel from above and then ignore that counsel. Yet many times in our prayer services we have heard the voice of God, then asked afterwards, "What did the Lord say?" It was a marvelous meeting . . . someone spoke in prophecy . . . and yet we ask, "What did the Lord say?"

You know how parents feel when they speak to their children, and sometimes the children don't answer. I've heard mothers say, "Did you hear me?" I recognize that this is an hour of crisis for the world? It is an hour of crisis for the church, too, and there's no other solution on this earth.

Everywhere there is a cry of desperation in the land. Even leading educators—and I've had the privilege of hearing one or two recently—are telling us that when knowledge is universal, and almost anyone can avail himself of a college education, unless there comes some spiritual power or some spiritual evaluation, the world is damned. What do you think Joseph Smith would say if he were alive today? Would he say, "I told you so"? It think that if Joseph Smith the Seer were here he would have the courage to sound the same cry for repentance that he issued then. But crying alone isn't enough; we must make that cry effective by manifesting it in our own way of life. Not until we take our religion seriously and know that we must bring forth the cause of Zion are we going to interest other people in it. The voice of God is available to us today. Are we going to hear it? Are we going to heed it? Or are we just going to follow the pattern of sectarianism and simply build churches in various cities?

You probably remember these words of "Admonition" given to us by Joseph Luff under the inspiration of God: "I have spoken, few have heeded. What remains for me to do? Warnings old wait vindication; man must learn that God is true." I'm not so sure that I had been baptized when I first read those words in a Saints' Herald. If so, I had joined just a few weeks before; but I bore my humble testimony. As I read those words the power of God rested on me, and I knew they were true, and yet we Latter Day Saints didn't even put it in the hymnbook.* Now I'm not a musician. I don't know what is a hymn and what isn't a hymn, but this song contains the voice of God, and I think we ought to harken to the admonition which is given right there. I've only quoted part of a stanza for you. Before you leave this Conference read the rest of it. God is saying to us now, "Warnings old wait vindication; man must learn that God is true."

I'm not concerned about a few Latter Day Saints saving their bodies and their souls, but I am concerned that the purpose of the one eternal God which brought this church forth one hundred twenty years ago shall be fulfilled. God has instructed us that after making converts and ministering to them we shall bring them together in communities through the instruments within his church with its helps and its organization. And there in surrounding conducive to right living, we will set up an ensign of righteousness that will attract the downtrodden from all over the world. We owe it to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people to bring forth the righteousness of God. The voice of God is to the ends of the earth. All that will hear may hear. You and I are committed to make that word manifest in the life that we are required to live. That God may bless us in this mission is my prayer.

Values Are Relative

By ROLAND C. LAMBKIN

THE SLIPPERY SLIDE RULE

Woe unto you rich men that will not give your substance to the poor.
—Doctrine and Covenants 56: 5.

WHEN I WAS A BAREFOOT boy, I rode one day with the local feed merchant, Mr. Jacobs, in his new car. He had just traded in his Model T. The new car was a big Dodge with shiny leather upholstery. By my boyhood standards that country feed dealer was a marvelously rich man. He made a fabulous income—almost two hundred a month the best months. He lived in wealth a poor boy like me could never hope to attain—a two-story brick house in a village of one hundred people.

Probably the feed dealer in this little village would hardly have considered himself rich. Just such a diversity of opinions operates when we collectively consider our part in supplying the sinews of Zion through consecration of our surplus. The words "rich" and "poor" are comparative terms. There wasn't a rich man on Robinson Crusoe's Island. There wasn't a poor man either! If you disagree with me, it is because you are comparing Crusoe's estate with yours and saying, "He was richer than I," or "He was poorer than I am." If none of us were rich, then none of us would be poor, for each classification is entirely dependent on the other to give it meaning.

In small towns all over the United States live rich men. They live well, and often dominate the life of their community. They are respected, have a household servant, play the stock market, and own the important businesses in town; yet they are represented in Washington as small businessmen. They are. They employ one to a dozen people; they count their reserves in thousands; they are unknown outside their own communities or business associations. To many a big businessman, they are "that small account out there in Busyville."

FROM THE VIEWPOINT of the man in the neat little cottage close to the tracks in Busyville, Mr. Big is rich. From the viewpoint of the steel company executive who had such a headache routing two or three small beams to Busyville, Mr. Big is "that poor fellow who thinks he can make a go of it out there."

Such a wide diversity of definition of who is rich does not stop there. The little fellow who owns his cottage and has a fairly secure future is rich by the standards of the dispirited migrant farm hand in California.

Brother X. owns a fine car in keeping, of course, with his standing in town as a businessman. It provides speedy and comfortable transportation. This is his car, but the children need a car, too, so he buys another for them to use. Sister M. is a widow with a houseful of children and has a fundamental need for transportation. They can all crowd into their old Model T. The obvious inequality is not at all obvious to Brother X., although all three cars are parked side by side on Sundays.

Rich and poor are comparative terms just as big and little, fast and slow are. A little greyhound is fast in his class, but he can hardly compete with an airplane. Rich and poor, as terms, have only the meaning you or your environment gives them. Riches, poverty, surplus—these are not standard terms but personal attitudes. Understanding this is vastly significant to Zionic endeavor.

WHO THEN, in the Lord's opinion, are "the rich who should be made low"? (Doctrine and Covenants 101: 2.) Perhaps we can search out an attitude from the Scriptures—a meaning given to "rich" by the Lord.

And again thou shalt not be proud in thy heart; let all thy garments be plain, and their beauty the beauty of the work of thine own hands.—Doctrine and Covenants 42: 12.

And now in this two hundred and first year there began to be among them those who were lifted up in pride, such as the wearing of costly apparel and all manner of fine pearls and of fine things of the world.—Book of Mormon, page 684, verse 27.

The hand of providence hath smiled upon you most pleasingly, that you have obtained many riches:

And because some of you have obtained more abundantly than that of your brethren ye are lifted up in the pride of your hearts, and wear stiff necks, and high heads, because of the costliness of your apparel, and persecute your brethren, because ye suppose that ye are better than they.

And now, my brethren, do ye suppose that God justifieth you in this thing? Behold, I say unto you, Nay.—Ibid., page 170, verses 15-17.

Think of your brethren like unto yourselves, and be familiar with all, and free with your substance, that they may be rich like unto you.

But before ye seek for riches, seek ye the kingdom of God.

And after ye have obtained a hope in Christ, ye shall obtain riches if ye seek them; and ye will seek them for the intent to do good; to clothe the naked, to feed the hungry, to liberate the captive, and administer relief to the sick and the afflicted.—Book of Mormon, pages 170, 171, verses 22-24.

They that trust in their wealth and boast themselves in the multitude of their riches; none of them can by any means redeem his brother.—Psalm 49: 6, 7.

And if thou obtainest more than that which would be for thy support, thou shalt give it unto my storehouse.—Doctrine and Covenants 42: 14.

Our God shall come and shall not keep silence; a fire shall devour before him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about him.

He shall call to the heavens from above and to the earth that he may judge his people.

Gather my saints together unto me, those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice.—Psalm 50: 3-5.

The Danger of Dancing - By MRS. ROY VREELAND

WOULD it be wrong to attend a few private dances? That was a question I once asked myself. After World War I, I had married and moved with my husband to the west coast where he was employed in a small sawmill.

There was no Reorganized Latter Day Saint Church in the community to which we moved, and dancing seemed to be the principal amusement. My husband's employer and wife took an active part in the life of the community and invited us to join in the Union services held each Sunday in the schoolhouse, also to attend the weekly dances held in private homes.

My husband was not a member of the church at that time but had been reared to believe as I had been that there was harm in dancing. However he left the decision to me.

FOR several weeks I prayed over the matter but received no light. Then my mother became ill, and I returned home to spend a few weeks with her. During my stay the holiday season arrived, and my older sister, Charlotte Condit, came home to spend her Christmas vacation.

Charlotte had been told in her patriarchal blessing that she was a chosen vessel of the Lord. When she was still young, she consecrated her life to the service of the Master and felt she should spend her life in work with young people, especially those of the church. She prepared herself for this work and became a member of the Graceland College faculty in 1927. There she spent the last ten years of her life and found happiness in working with our young people. Her aim was ever to assist them to reach higher spiritual standards.

Before our marriages, my younger sister and I had always talked over our personal problems with Charlotte and found her counsel wise. I decided also to discuss this subject with her. On the first day, I had an opportunity to tell her of my feeling in regard to dancing and expected her to advise me in the matter. However she offered me no advice but said she would pray earnestly that I be divinely guided, and admonished me to continue praying too. The subject was not mentioned again until near the end of her vacation.

The weather on the day before she was to leave was mild and pleasant, with no snow on the ground. Charlotte suggested that we take a walk, as we had done since childhood, to a secluded place near a creek not far from our home.

To this place my sisters and I had gone in the years past, when we were about to be separated, and had prayed together. This always brought us a feeling of peace and serenity. That day we two knelt at the old familiar spot. In her petition Charlotte prayed that I might be given divine guidance in the problem that confronted me and that I would receive a definite knowledge of the Lord's will in regard to the question of dancing. She also asked that my husband might be led to see the truthfulness of the gospel.

CHARLOTTE and I occupied the same sleeping room. Early the next morning I awakened from a strange dream which left me puzzled and moved. The experience was so vivid in my mind that as long as I live it will be as clearly remembered as on that morning years ago when it was given. I related it to my sister.

I seemed to be alone, leaving the church. It was a summer evening. I walked along a grassy path through a pleasant meadow. There were hills ahead through which gleamed bright city lights. This seemed to be my destination.

After a time the path led me into a small valley, where beautiful, white lilies grew on either side and as far ahead as I could see. At first I only admired the flowers as I walked along, but the desire to gather a bouquet grew in my mind. This I did while hurrying along.

Now my arms were full of the lilies, and I enjoyed their beauty and wonderful fragrance. However when I stooped to pick another which seemed especially perfect I saw, curled beneath the bush, a hideous black snake! Then my eyes seemed to be opened, for underneath every bush, there lay a reptile. They were aroused now, coiled and ready to strike.

Terrified, I dropped the flowers and decided instantly to turn back, but now the reptiles had crawled from the bushes onto the path and seemed to be everywhere, so it looked as if escape were impossible. It still seemed to me that there was less danger in retracing my steps, so I ran, trying to avoid the snakes. I was injured several times by their poisonous fangs before escaping from the little valley. Now I realized I must have help soon or die.

It was then that I noticed for the first time a small, white house, located inconspicuously on a hill a little way from the path. In my former eagerness to reach the bright lights of the city I had failed to see it. Now the intense darkness all around me seemed to accentuate the radiant glow that seemed to emanate from the house on the hill, and in comparison the lights of the city were dim and unattractive.

I hurried up the path and knocked on the door. To my surprise it was opened by Brother Adolphus Hendrickson, beloved pastor of my home branch who had recently died. He was dressed in white, and I was impressed by the immaculate cleanliness of the room in which he stood. His presence seemed to radiate a heavenly peace and joy. Without my requesting his help, he brought bandages and ointment with which he dressed my wounds. He assured me that I had received help in time and would suffer no ill effects from the injuries received in the valley. He also told me that he lived in that place for the purpose of giving assistance to those who blindly walked on the path, gathered the lilies, and were injured by the snakes.

After thanking him I retraced my steps toward the church I had left earlier. All desire for the lilies and the city of the alluring lights was gone. I felt only a great thankfulness for my escape.

When I had related my dream, Charlotte said, "That is the answer to our prayers for direction on the problem of dancing! There is harm in that form of amusement."

At the prayer meeting which she attended on the following Wednesday, in the branch where she was teaching, Charlotte related the dream. Immediately the elder in charge arose and said he felt impressed to say that the dream had been divinely given. With these two witnesses added to my own conviction, I was sure at last that the church's teaching in regard to the dancing question was in harmony with the Lord's will.

Several years later I learned that it had been made known to Brother Adolphus Hendrickson that his work on the other side would be to minister to the spirits in prison. This was an added testimony to me.

QUESTION:

What is the gift of tongues, its purpose, and the methods of exercise? Does I Corinthians, chapter 14, give any basis for the necessity of the interpretation coming through a spokesman other than the one who spoke in tongues?

Michigan

O. O.

ANSWER:

The gift of tongues is a manifestation of the Holy Spirit which results in the utterance of intelligible language unknown to the speaker and conveys a message to the hearer.

The purpose of the gift can be learned from the accounts given of this divine manifestation in Mark 16:15-17, and from Luke's narrative in Acts 2:4-11. The promise of this gift was given to men whose duty it was to carry the gospel "to all the world," and from this statement we can justifiably say that its purpose was, and still is, missionary in nature. Luke strengthens us in this belief when he writes, "Every man heard them [the disciples] speak in his own language . . . the wonderful works of God." Those that heard were assembled in Jerusalem from different parts of the Roman Empire and spoke many languages. In their native tongues, they heard these Galileans speak. The feature that amazed the hearers was that the speakers had no previous knowledge of the language they were using.

This view is clearly supported by latter-day revelation. The time is promised to the church "when the arm of the Lord shall be revealed in power in convincing the nations . . . that every man shall hear the fullness of the gospel in his own tongue, and through his own language, through those who are ordained unto this power, by the administration of the Comforter, shed forth upon them, for the revelation of Jesus Christ."—Doctrine and Covenants 87:3, 4.

Another reason for this gift advanced by Paul is for the edifying of the church (I Corinthians 14:13).

The belief of many in the gift of tongues is predicated solely on the account given by Saint Paul to the Corinthian saints in his first epistle, which usually leads to a misconception of this gift. Paul is a believer in the gift of tongues and wrote his epistle for the purpose of correcting the beliefs and conduct of the Corinthians, not only toward the gift of tongues but toward many other abhorrent practices and beliefs that were common among them. There were divisions (1:12, 13) and fornications "such as is not named among the Gentiles" (5:1). They went to law before unbelieving judges (6:1-9); they ate meats that were offered to idols (8:1-9); they practiced heresies such as they did towards the Lord's Supper (11:17-30), they even went so far as to deny the resurrection of the dead (15:12). The whole tone of the epistle was one of reproach and not the stating of an accepted belief. This also is true of the gift of tongues, and the note of reproach is clearly seen in the fourteen chapter.

The Corinthians evidently practiced the artificial stimulation of their emotions which resulted in the utterance of something unintelligible. The Greeks used to do that, and the dancing dervish still does it among the Mohammedan sect. (See H. V. Morton's book, In the Steps of Saint Paul, pages 181-197.) It is this that Paul tried to correct, and it is why he insists on an interpretation. There was no interpretation needed on the day of Pentecost. The language was intelligible.

QUESTION:

If the gospel was taken away with Moses and not brought back until Christ came, how did the prophets become holy or converted?

Kansas

J. P. C.

ANSWER:

It was the higher or Melchisedec priesthood which was taken away with Moses, but the Aaronic priesthood was left. This administered a part of the gospel, referred to as "the preparatory gospel," which included the primary principles of faith, repentance, and baptism by water. There remained in Israel high priests of the Aaronic order, some of whom, no doubt, officiated as prophets. However not all the prophets were priests or held the priesthood, but whenever the Lord had need he called out and empowered men for his special work. Probably Elijah and Elisha were prophets of this type, and among the Nephites were Abinadi and Samuel the Lamanite. In latter days Joseph Smith functioned as a prophet for some time before receiving the priesthood. Many were converted and became holy men between Moses and Christ.

CHARLES FRY.

QUESTION:

What is the meaning of the parable of the prodigal son? Was the elder son right in being indignant at the reception given for the returning brother?

Missouri

Mrs. K. K. W.

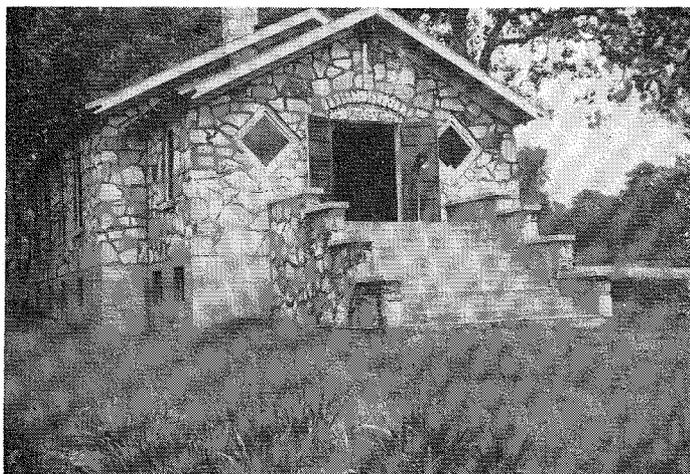

ANSWER:

The parable established two main points, viz., the doctrine of repentance, and the divine blessing of forgiveness. The brother's attitude is incidental.

The younger brother, taking his inheritance from his father went away for a life of profligate pleasure, and having exhausted his resources came to desperate want and degradation. Pondering over his condition and remembering his former estate he resolved to change his manner of life and return to his father. He would not ask for a further inheritance, but to become a servant whereby he might rebuild by his own endeavor his wasted fortunes. His decision required deep humiliation, which showed real repentance. The father received him with open arms, rejoicing at his return, and gave him the opportunity he desired.

What many overlook in the parable is the involved teaching of divine justice. The father's action was not the impulse of maudlin sentimentalism or the expression of ill-considered affection; it was consistent, practical, and just. The son was given, according to his reasonable request, a new opportunity for beginning again the building of a commendable life. How like God! It is a mistake to suppose that divine forgiveness restores what has been thrown away in sin, or makes up what has been unattained through years of indifference and sloth. Like the father of the prodigal, the Lord opens wide the door of opportunity by forgiving the truly penitent soul and helping him to make the best of life here and hereafter.

Thayer, Missouri Branch

THE THAYER, MISSOURI, BRANCH was organized in July, 1904. The Saints first met at the Cain Hill School near Thayer with Elder J. F. Cunningham as branch president, who served for ten years in this capacity. Brother Cunningham was also under General Church appointment for a number of years. Now, at the age of eighty-six, he is making his home at Alton, Missouri.

When the meeting place was changed to Thayer, services were first held at the home of Brother and Sister G. A. Davis. Brother Davis was voted to be pastor and continued to minister in this position for thirty-two years until his death on April 6, 1942. During this time the present building was erected, the first meeting being held in it on April 6, 1931.

Those serving as pastor since 1942 have been J. W. Adams, A. M. Baker, Elton McGuire, and Fred Riebold, the present pastor. Among those who have been instrumental in promulgating the work since the organization of the branch are Joseph Ward, J. C. Spurlock, Bert Bootman, W. E. Hayden, Charles May, and John F. Garver. In recent years Seventies William Guthrie and James Menzies, together with District President J. A. Phillips, have assisted greatly with the work. This year Seventy Donald L. Kyser and Missionary G. Wayne Smith have been in Thayer holding cottage meetings. These have resulted in several baptisms and additional prospects.

This congregation hit its peak membership of 132 in 1934. Due to deaths, migration during the war years, and other causes the total number of members now is thirty-three.

A Good Soldier of the Line

BY WILLIAM SEARLES

THE YEAR WAS 1945; the place, somewhere in England. A brigadier general was speaking to a group of junior officers:

Gentlemen, this army must have courageous men, without them our cause of freedom is lost. Still, I would have those in my command bear several things in mind. First on any list is that dead heroes do not win wars, only those who live and are able to take the field again. Therefore, I would like to advise any man who thinks he'd like to be a hero to temper his valor with judgment so that heroism in today's skirmish does not cost tomorrow's battles. However, every battle has its heroes who lay down their lives, and it is well to remember that our America and all it means was purchased with blood. It is with this in mind that we consider it worth while to risk our lives, for this risk is the only way we know to save the things that make them worth while. Our war dead have made their niche, but the living can still carve their niche of hero, traitor, or good soldier of the line. This army badly needs good soldiers of the line.

Every just cause needs its good soldiers of the line—the cause of our Lord, Jesus Christ, above all. Think of Christ and how he died on the cross. God in heaven did not wish it to be so, but man's state of sin demanded such. God gave his only begotten Son out of love that men might be redeemed, for by this avenue and no other could men walk through the door of death to live again, immortal and everlasting. Satan did not will that Christ die on the cross. He knew that this would become a focal point for men's minds. It would cause them to stop and consider the costs and benefits of the things Christ had taught. He would much rather have had Christ die quietly in some obscure place.

THE WORDS "hero" and "traitor" as used by the general seemed harsh, but here are the hero and traitor. The traitor, Satan, is in a living death and the hero, Jesus Christ, died but arose to live forevermore. What of the general's soldier of the line who must live after the traitor is found out and the hero is departed? In the cause of Christ that position devolves upon you and me. Day by day we are betraying his cause by our sinfulness. Our fleshly weaknesses cause us to deny the worth-whileness of a gospel purchased with a broken body and spilt blood. We are then reminded as we sit at the spiritual board to partake of bread and wine that only as we are good soldiers of the line can we ever hope to be worthy of the blessings and rewards promised the faithful. So daily every man struggles within himself, with Satan on one hand and Christ on the other, forging a life of no testimony or one valiant in the testimony of Jesus Christ.

God so loved the world and so despised death that his Son had to die to show mankind a way of life. Doubtless Satan so loved death that he wished Christ to live on past the appointed hour of his crucifixion that men might not know there is a way. Those who have gone before have found their peace and are laid to rest. Christ has left his work in our hands. We are his hands, his eyes, his testimony. Day by day we must examine critically our task, our attitudes, our talents, and our fitness in God's work. In respect to this particular age God rests his all in us. This task becomes long, hard, and wearying if we lose sight of the goal. We must keep before us both the means of doing the task and the desired results lest we lose our way. This struggle purifies and produces the qualities that make a man worthy.

Yes, God is marshaling his army for the rescue of his truth. And the general was right, "This army badly needs good soldiers of the line."

Good Books

By Edith Grace Beggs

IN DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS 87: 5 we are told to "become acquainted with all good books," and in 85: 36 to "teach one another words of wisdom, yea, seek ye out of the best books words of wisdom."

In these days of many attractions, or perhaps I should say distractions, reading often takes a back seat. It is so easy to obtain books that we have forgotten to treasure them as our ancestors did.

Books were so few and precious in olden days that Bibles were chained, so they could be examined without being removed or damaged. The Bible, still considered to be the greatest book in the world, obtained its name from the Greek word "biblos" or "the book." Thus, we can easily comprehend how the people looked upon it as their one great religious and literary possession; and as time went on the value of the book increased. The truths of the Bible today stand out in bold defiance of all criticism hurled against it.

The Book of Mormon and the Doctrine and Covenants join with it to form a chain of eternal truth which cannot be broken.

Why do we read what we read?

Some of us choose the lighter "stuff" because "it is easy to take" and gives a passing pleasure similar to eating candy, or in other words tickles the thought palate. Others crave romance and devour the love stories.

Some keep awake with crime stories while others woo slumber with the type of literature that acts as a sedative to the nerves. Still others read because they desire to gain knowledge—or get the other fellow's viewpoint. Some say they read to pass time; this is comparable to reading signs in a railway station or street car.

One might accidentally or perhaps providentially stumble upon something worth while this way, but usually we must seek to find and knock to have it opened to us. Our minds are ever reaching out for information or amusement. What we choose to read is our business. It is our privilege to choose, but it is our responsibility to choose wisely. In our reading as in our eating, we should cultivate a desire for wholesome nourishment. Food for thought should be rich in wholesome goodness, rather than of exciting savor.

WHAT CONSTITUTES A GOOD BOOK?

Whether it be fiction or nonfiction, whether it has a plain or classy jacket, and regardless of the title or by whom it is written, that book is good which leaves its message indelibly stamped on the mind of the reader, stimulating him to better thinking and higher living.

A laugh, a tear, whatever it brings, the book is an open door into another world, the magic carpet upon which we are transported to realms beyond our sphere. The poor glimpse the world of the rich, the rich have portrayed for them the life of the less fortunate, the sick forget their pain, tired folks are rested, and children are lulled to sleep or visit the wonderful lands of make believe.

Through the eyes of the author we see, we feel, and sometimes almost hear, so great is the power of well-chosen words when read with eagerness and understanding.

Word-mastication, or the breaking up of phrasing so that we can properly understand what we read, may be done by means of a dictionary. In reading as in eating, it isn't the number of books we read but the digesting of them that counts. If we desire to be better individuals, or if we already have found out how to become better individuals through reading it, then what we read is good.

Anonymous Articles

As a rule, editors pay no attention to letters, questions, and articles which are not signed. The publication of such material carries a responsibility, and it is only fair to the publishers to know the writer's name and address.

We have had a few questions sent in for "Question Time" with only initials. This is still regarded as being anonymous. Perhaps the writers felt that inasmuch as we published only initials when the question was put in the column, we did not need their names. If you have sent a question with only your initials, please be advised that we need both the name and address; otherwise your question will not be given consideration.

Letters

Letter of Testimony

I have been a member of the Reorganized Church since November 18, 1945. Although I haven't been able to attend services much since my baptism, I have read the church books and have paid my tithing. I have quit drinking tea and coffee, and I try to keep God's commandments as best I can. I have received many blessings and believe the Lord is being more than good to me.

When my husband went to work in Flint, I moved out to the main highway so that I would not be alone. I had to walk to the farm each day, however, to feed the stock. One night I had a phone call telling me that my husband was in the hospital, so I immediately went to the farm to catch up on the work so that I wouldn't have to worry about it while I was away. As I worked I prayed for God to give me strength to do all that had to be done and help me to make the bus trip safely, for I was not well myself. I was afraid I couldn't lift the hay off the stack as it was frozen, and I needed to give the stock enough to last a week. However, when I reached the stack I found the hay already piled up—enough for the cattle to eat during my absence. I knew then that God had answered my prayer. I made the trip to Flint without even becoming tired, and there found my husband much better. Three days later he was able to be taken home. Other spiritual experiences have confirmed my belief in the truth as taught by this church, and although I am isolated, I know that God is with me.

A Subscriber for Fifty Years

I have taken the Herald for over fifty years—ever since I united with the church. I think it should be regarded in the same category as "all good books" which we are told in Doctrine and Covenants to read. To me it is an essential for keeping on the road to Zion.

If I live until July 19, I will be eighty-eight years old.

Organization of Allentown, Pennsylvania, Mission

Allentown Mission was officially organized last September 21. At that time our district president and pastor, Jack Conway of the Philadelphia Branch, met with members of our group for that specific purpose. For a few months prior to this meeting, several families had been meeting weekly for worship.

It so happened that the means of livelihood brought four of us families from entirely different parts of the country together in this area within a few months of each other. Philadelphia was the nearest branch, sixty-five miles away—a distance too great for the families to attend church regularly, and so it became apparent that we should start meeting together occasionally for sudy. These first scattered meetings led to more regular get-togethers, until we knew that we wanted to try to get a place where we could worship weekly. After all, there were two elders in our small group who had the authority to go ahead and hold church meetings.

The next problem was to find a place in which to meet. Since some members did not have transportation by car, we felt it necessary to try to rent a room in one of the social clubs of Allentown which was centrally located and available to all by means of bus or trolley car. We did this a few Sundays, but the rent was very high, and conditions were not too satisfactory. After following up several other leads as to possible places where we could meet, we were down to the last one and afraid that the people of the church were not going to rent to us. We made it a special subject of group prayer, with the result that we were able to rent the church, and we are still holding meetings in it. It serves our needs adequately for the present, and is located at the corner of Oak and Poplar Streets in Allentown. We hold meetings each Sunday morning at ten o'clock and invite any church members passing through this section of the country to stop and worship with us. The church in which we meet was formerly the Seventh Day Adventist church but is now owned and used by the First Spiritualist Church of Allentown.

At present, there are six families who attend regularly and two other families who, because of distance, can attend only occasionally. We have organized a women's department and a Zion's League, and hold prayer service during the week. We have a building fund started and feel that in time there will be a church of our own in Allentown. Because of our location, many of the missionaries of the church have stopped over here and held meetings, and we can expect them to continue to stop here when they are in this area.

Allentown is a progressive city of over 100,000 in population and has many industries, good schools, and other institutions of higher learning. It is a clean, beautiful city with many parks and is referred to as the "Queen City" of the Lehigh Valley. It has many churches, and the people are "church-minded" which should be a factor to consider in promoting the work here.

I suggest that if there are members who are contemplating a move, they consider Allentown as a good location, both as to the means of livelihood and in helping in church work.

This past year we have felt that God has blessed us many times and in many ways. We have evidenced the miraculous healings of some of our church members who have been seriously ill, and God has sent his Spirit to comfort and encourage us when we have met disappointments. He is always willing to bless us when we seek to walk in his ways.

How I Found the Church

As a girl I lived in Michigan. I had one brother, Robert. In 1925, shortly after I was married, my brother went to Florida to work. Six weeks later he wrote that he had married a girl who lived next door to his boarding house. Two years later he wrote he was moving back to Michigan with his wife and baby and asked the privilege of making his home with me until he could get located and find employment. He added in his letter that he had something he thought would interest me. Womanlike, I was curious, and I did not feel that the crate of oranges which followed the letter was the "something" meant. I also wondered what kind of a wife Bob had. The family arrived, and I liked Lucy at once. I was still wondering about the "something of interest," when he approached me one day with a book. "Myrtle," he said, "I have here a book which I would like you to read. It has in it that which I believe to be the true gospel of the Lord."

I wasn't interested much in religion, but I took the book, which was entitled, The Call at Evening, and said, "I'll read your book, Bob, but let me tell you something, I'll not join any church until I know I am joining the right one."

He replied, "If, after you read this book, you don't believe it, I wouldn't want you to join the church. You would be a detriment to it."

Putting the matter in that light made me more determined than ever not to believe the book. I read very critically. I looked up all the passages of Scripture and found they were word for word like my own Bible. Some passages were new to me. One such was that Christ would live with his people a thousand years on this earth. "I know that isn't in the Bible," I said. To my surprise it was.

I came to a statement about three glories and the visions of heaven and hell. "No one can tell me that is in the Bible," I declared. It was there. Then I said, "What is this book doing to my Bible? It never read this way before. I am going to read ahead and then back, they are just picking out certain verses to make people believe." But no matter how I read, I found everything fitted together as pointed out in the book.

I continued to read and found myself growing dissatisfied with my former ideas and beliefs. As I read I prayed, and my prayers were answered in a remarkable way. I was amazed at the enlightenment that came to me. My prejudices began to melt away, and often I found myself in tears as I read about the wonderful plan God had for his people. There was no doubt in my mind about the divinity of this church, but circumstances prevented my being baptized at that time.

Seeking a better climate for the health of his little boy, my brother moved to Ohio. Two years later I went to visit him and there met an elder of the church. I talked with this elder and told him I was ready for baptism.

"Do you want to be baptized tonight or wait until Sunday?" he asked.

"I want to be baptized tonight," I answered. I was afraid something would happen if I waited.

So that night my brother led me into the waters of baptism at the Grand Canal near St. Marys, Ohio. When asked if I would like a special song to be sung, I suggested "Nearer, My God, to Thee." I had never felt the meaning of those words as I did at the moment I came from the water. It seemed as if I could reach out my hand and take the hand of the Savior. I was confirmed that very evening without even changing my clothing or drying my hair. A few days after this I heard my first sermon. It seemed the beginning of a new life to me. That "something of interest" my brother brought me has been the consuming interest of my life.

From a Personal Letter

I am writing to thank you for the nice Scripture reading and message I read recently in the Daily Bread. I was doing work too hard for me, but I had to do it as I live alone. I had begun to feel as if I were out of sight of God, and my life was like the fog you told about.

Then I came into the house to get something to eat to brace me. I just picked up the little magazine, and my eyes fell on "Be Not Dismayed." I stopped and read the article. As I did tears of joy came into my eyes. I felt God had sent a message to encourage me. I felt the "fog" in my life lift. When the day was done, I gave thanks to our Heavenly Father for his help through the rough "journey."

Daily Bread has meant so much to me. I often wish I could get others to see how much good that little book would do them if they would only taste of it for themselves.

Letter From Hawaii

I wish to express my appreciation for the rich blessings received through the visit of our prophet. It was indeed a privilege to be able to hear him speak. He has given us renewed hope and strengthened our determination to remain steadfast in the faith. The same is true of Bishop Siegfried. We bid them God-speed on their trip to Tahiti.

While he was with us, President Smith made this memorable statement: "How great is the faith of those who were drawn to the gospel by the Spirit of God; but how much greater is the faith of those who believe because of the teaching and preaching of missionaries and the testimonies of those who have passed on. How much greater is their faith because they have heard and seen and adhered to the truth, then followed after."

We, the Saints of Hawaii, also appreciate the ministry of our new pastor, Brother A. Orlin Crownover, and the help of his wife. We pray that Brother and Sister Howard Miller may be blessed in their work in the States.

It is for us to do all in our power to build up God's work in this part of the vineyard—the Isles of the Sea.

Faith Brings Healing

On June 17 our two-year-old daughter had her fingers mashed in the hinge of a car door. When we finally freed her hand, the fingers looked as if they were beyond repair. We took her to the doctor, and while he was bandaging her hand I prayed continually that her fingers would heal. God surely heard my prayers and those of our friends, because she seemed to suffer little pain, and her fingers have healed remarkably well. Her new nails are nearly grown in already.

We have no elder here, but a few scattered members meet once a month at a home in Brookings, Oregon. Elder Joseph Elkins of Eureka (eighty-six miles away) assists in these meetings. Pray that we may be more diligent in spreading the gospel in this place.

Miracle Subscription

When my Herald subscription expired, I did not have money enough to resubscribe. As I missed getting the paper more and more, I pondered on how I could possibly afford to get it. Then one evening I went for a walk in the park, and on my way home I found a five dollar bill in my path. My heart lightened, and I went the rest of the way humming, "O thou God who hearest prayer, every hour and everywhere."

I have belonged to the church fifty-five years. Through the teaching of my parents, I received a wonderful knowledge of God. He has comforted me in my darkest hours, and in prophecy he has promised to take the hand of all who need his help. That he may continue to bless his people and care for them is my prayer.

The Spoken Word - Part III

Speech Defects - Rehabilitation

By FLOY I. BENNETT

AS stated previously, children learn to talk by imitation. Their speech will be good or bad, pleasant or unpleasant, according to the pattern they have had to follow.

Muscular control of the body is a developmental thing. The large muscles of arms and legs are first to be used. Gradually the infant acquires a certain skill and control of the large muscles; soon he begins to experiment with the smaller muscles—turning of the head, opening and closing fingers, following objects with the eyes. The muscles which are in the throat, tongue, and lips become interesting for experimentation, and very early the child begins to make cooing and gurgling sounds. Perhaps at first by accident and later by experimentation and association he learns the difference between da-da and ma-ma. Finally, by observation and imitation, he learns to speak as his parents do.

Children do literally speak as the parents do, and parents store up trouble for the public schoolteachers and embarrassment and long hours of hard drill for their own children when they indulge in such "baby talk" as, "Her is a sweet girl; yes her is," or "Him's a fine baby; him's just like his daddy." As soon as the child is old enough to formulate a sentence, he will say, "Her won't give me my blocks; her is a naughty girl." When such errors in grammar are practiced by parents, it is no wonder that the confusion between the objective and nominative cases of pronouns is a life-long problem for so many people.

Some sounds are more difficult to make than others. While most sounds may be perfectly formed and used at an early age, others must wait for further maturation in the muscular and motor control of the child's speech organs. Usually children will have the most difficulty with the "r" and "l" sounds. The "th" sound is difficult for some. For the more difficult sounds, they either substitute those which are easier or eliminate the difficult sound altogether. "W" is often substituted for

"r" and "l" (dress for dress, wove for love). Dress may become "dess" when elimination of the troublesome sound is made. The small child often substitutes "f" for "th" ("wif" for with). Parents should not be alarmed if the child is still having some difficulty with a few of his words even at kindergarten age; maturation will usually correct these mispronunciations. They should not call too much attention to the errors children make; emphasis may sometimes fix an error and make it more difficult to overcome. However, parents should never indulge in "baby talk" to the small child. Even though little Mary may say, "Wet me wear my wed dress," the wise mother will always pronounce the words correctly in her conversation with the child. She will say, "Yes, you may wear your red dress." It is thought by certain authorities that some of our adults who are convinced that they cannot make an "l" or "r" sound have reached that state of mind because in their infancy and early childhood they were led to believe it was cute to mispronounce words. Of course, there are physical and organic reasons for some of these difficulties. The possibility of such a situation must be positively eliminated before assuming that rehabilitation can take place.

WHEN there are definite speech defects that maturation does not eliminate, it is wise to begin a program for speech improvement as early as possible. First, physical examinations should be made by competent doctors who have special training in the field of oral surgery and who understand the science of speech. If the defect is caused by any malformation of any of the speech organs there should be no effort made to correct the speech defect until the physical cause has been improved or removed altogether. A program for speech improvement should be directed by some one who has had special scientific training in the field of speech correction. It is not my purpose at this time to discuss in detail the problems of speech defects of either an organic or an inorganic nature. For those who are aware that they fall short of the goal for good speech, there are many available sources for help. All good public libraries have books written by skilled speech correctionists and speech pathologists. Many State Departments of Education and the University and College Speech Departments have rehabilitation clinics for the individual whose life is handicapped by defective speech. (Beware of privately administered clinics. They may be fine, but quacks in this field are abundant.)

A speech defect has been defined by speech pathologists as any deviation from normal in the speech pattern which acts as a stop light—a "difference" which attracts attention to itself and causes the listener to shift his mind from the thing that is being said to the way it is said. Any habit or affectation which does this is a speech defect.

Such defects as unusual harshness, high or extremely low pitch, too much or not enough volume, lack of proper projection, tenseness, nasality, lisping, sharp "s," and mispronunciations are common. As Americans we are particularly lazy in our tongue and lip movements which cause poor enunciation and often makes our speech unintelligible. "Are ya gonna go?" for "Are you going to go?" "Gimme" for "Give me" are illustrative of sloppy and lazy speech habits. The suffix, "ing," offers a problem for many people, but one which has usually been developed from laziness of the tongue and soft palate. Such a careless habit is relatively easy to eliminate by simple drills and exercises. Overpreciseness is a serious handicap, too, and attracts unfavorable and unsympathetic attention. Monotony in speech is a tiresome defect not impossible of correction. There is a monotony in pitch and a monotony in tune pattern. Correct phrasing and attention to sentence-sense will help to improve the tiresome tune pattern.

IT is with considerable hesitation that I mention stuttering at all. Thousands of dollars have been spent in research with the hope that the cause and cure of stuttering might be found. Hundreds of books have been written on the subject, but no one can explain unequivocally the cause or prescribe a "sure cure" for stuttering. It is important that young children who stutter never have it called to their attention so that they become self-conscious about it. This serves only to complicate their problem of self-expression. Many children go through stages in their growth when they stutter quite badly. If teachers and parents are wise and understanding, if they ignore by absence of both vocal comment and facial expression that they are aware of the difference, if they see that the child has plenty of rest, freedom from tension, pleasant home and school surroundings, wholesome food, outdoor exercise, and lots of use of the big muscles, the incipient stutterer will usually outgrow his problem without ever becoming aware he has one. Those who do not will, of course, eventually become aware of their handicap. By our attitudes toward them and their difficulty, we must help them to adjust to this handicap just as someone else may be forced to adjust to poor hearing, a short leg, imperfect sight, or other problems. Certainly, there are ways by which these people who stutter can be helped. The same clinics that can often eliminate other speech defects can sometimes alleviate the complex problems of the stutterer, but no clinician or speech pathologist has the moral right to promise a cure to such individuals. People differ, and whether or not the underlying cause of stuttering is the same with all persons so affected (a disputed question), the precipitating causes are certainly different, and a "sure-cure" has not been found. If the stutterer can be relieved of embarrassment and the resultant tensions, if he can be made to feel that when he can keep it from worrying him, he will not worry or annoy others, he will accept this problem as a no more serious handicap than any of dozens of other defects which he has escaped but which he can see in his friends and acquaintances.

In spite of all our methods and devices for speech improvement, we still have to reckon with personality and qualities of character. It is simple courtesy to make ourselves easily understood by others. It is kindness to speak in pleasant and gentle tones. It is generosity to give of our best at all times, even to the cultivation of the best speech habits our physical structure will permit us to develop.

The Prayer Circle - By MRS. DONALD V. LENTS

HAVE you ever felt regret and guilt at your inability to participate actively in the functions of the women's department of the church? If you are a mother of small children or are incapacitated in some way and cannot attend the scheduled meetings and activities, you no doubt have had this experience. The women's department cannot function at its best without all possible support of its younger members as well as those older in years, but neither does it require that mothers of babies impose on their children by dragging them unwisely to the church every time a meeting is held. Whenever possible, all members should give their support by attendance and participation—but there is a way you, too, can support your local group and General Council of Women even during the years you cannot leave your home and small children.

As Latter Day Saints we have been taught the value and necessity of living lives of continual prayer. Realizing the strength of united effort, the General Council of Women has, for a number of years, urged that the hour of 9:00 a.m. be set aside as Prayer Circle time. This is a time for all the women of the church everywhere to pause for a few moments and offer up to their Heavenly Father a very special sort of prayer for home and church. There is a great spiritual uplift in such an experience—each day when we join prayer thoughts around the world with our sisters of the church, we feel anew the great sense of purpose and mission in Zionizing our homes.

Has your small child ever said to you when things have gone wrong and your day's supply of patience seems to have been drained away, "Mommy, did we forget to ask Jesus to help us be good today?" The sudden realization that the morning's activities have been so pressing that 9:00 a.m. has slipped by unnoticed makes you stop and take your small child—who is greater in spiritual insight at times than adults—to your place of family worship to seek out God's forgiveness for your neglect and to ask his help for the remaining hours of that day.

THE Prayer Circle helps us realize that even as we feel the need of prayers from our sister homemakers, so there are others who need to be remembered by us. I am especially fond of this little poem which so aptly expresses our need for unselfishness in our prayers.

BUT WHEN YE PRAY

By Frances Crosby Hamlet

(Taken from 1,000 Quotable Poems, compiled by Thomas Curtis Clark, Willett, Clark & Co., Chicago and New York.)

But when ye pray, say our—not mine or thine;
Our debts, our debtors, and our daily bread!
Before the thronged cathedral's gracious shrine,
Or in thy closet's solitude instead,
Whoe'er thou art, where'er thou liftest prayer,
However humble or how great thou be,
Say our, thy brother man including there,
And more and more it may be thou shalt see Upon life's loom how thread to thread is bound;

None for himself, but man and fellow man,
Or near or far, meet on one common ground,
Sons of one Father since the world began.
So shall God's kingdom come in right and power.

When all can pray, not mine, or thine, but our.

A SUGGESTION was given recently which I have found of great value. Perhaps you will also find it worth while. One sister discovered that many times her 9:00 a.m. moment of meditation slipped by unnoticed because she had no definite reminder of her appointment at that hour each morning. She made herself a clock face of poster paper, putting on it only the numerals for the hours of the day. The hands of her clock were set for 9:00 a.m., and across the face of it were printed these two words—"GOD'S MINUTE." If your day's duties are such that 9:00 a.m. is an inconvenient hour for you, please do not consider that you cannot join the sisterhood of the Prayer Circle. Just "set your clock" for the time that works best under your particular circumstances—the hour of the day is not the important thing—the regular, devoted moment of prayer and communion with God is the Prayer Circle.

This has been a simple but highly effective reminder of Prayer Circle time for me—and more than that, it has helped me so many times to realize that out of the bounty of God's great goodness to me, he asks only that I repay him by seeking him out in communion each day so that he shall be able to lead and guide me into paths of ever greater happiness.

Won't you join with us in the Prayer Circle and thus be a participating member of the women's department? We feel most certain that your personal life, your home, and your church will become stronger because of these united prayers.

NORTHWEST YOUTH CAMP.—On the afternoon of July 2, a chartered Greyhound bus loaded with forty young people arrived at Cornet Bay Camp, Deception Pass, Washington. Others had arrived by car, and "Kintah" of 1950 opened officially with the evening registration of both campers and staff, including a physical check by Eleanor Sprague, R.N., of Chico, California.

The theme of the camp, "One Fold and One Shepherd," emphasizing the study of the Book of Mormon and our responsibility to the Indians, permeated all activities from morning worship to evening council fire. Under the very capable direction of "Big Chief" Ray Sowers, both staff and campers learned to live, work, play, and pray together.

A flag-raising ceremony started off each day. Mary Coleman led the calisthenics, and then the entire camp marched to a worship spot where Elder Elwin Vest led the morning devotions.

Handcraft classes were popular, with Eileen Hastings and Wana McDole teaching ceramics; Dorothy Heverling, birch bark; Loren McDole and Elwin Vest, photography; Paul Wellington, basketry; and Clarence Johnson and Vic Hastings, outdoor cookery. Special activities included boat trips, under the direction of Vic Hastings; costuming, supervised by Mary Coleman; and "Kintah Whispers," the camp newspaper, with Peggy Vest as staff adviser.

Swimming in Cranberry Lake was enjoyed with Shirley Johnson acting as lifeguard. Many other sports and field events were planned for recreation by Mary and Clark Coleman.

Campfires were led by Betty Stewart and Clarence Johnson and were held around the big outdoor fireplace. The daily news sheet and group skits were used as well as songs and Indian legends.

The cooking staff consisted of Vivian Wheeler, Lolita Roll, Eileen Dobson, and Maragret Johnson. These women worked hard to prepare nutritious and appetizing meals, and the results were appreciated. They were assisted by L. R. White, who baked the salmon for Saturday evening and by Chuck Sylvester, who made the one thousand doughnuts consumed by the camp.

The young people were divided into four groups for their Book of Mormon projects. The group under Elwin Vest, studying archaeological proofs, presented a fifteen-minute slide lecture showing these proofs on four evenings, and on one evening they presented a panel discussion on the present-day Indian. Mary Coleman directed a group in the preparation of a game using characters and places from the Book of Mormon, and on Friday evening the entire camp enjoyed playing "Lerno." Two of the groups presented their projects on Sunday morning. The class led by Paul Wellington made a brilliantly colored map of the world using flour, salt, water, and paints, and showing the migration routes of Book of Mormon peoples. Several from the class gave brief talks telling the story of these travels. The puppet group, supervised by Wana McDole, presented in an outstanding manner the story of the sons of Mosiah carrying the gospel to the Lamanites. The "Little Men" were very realistic under the capable manipulation of their creators. The story they portrayed imprinted a lasting impression of Ammon's efforts in the court of King Lamoni.

which was presented on Saturday evening. The scenes and music portrayed the carrying of the Book of Mormon to the Indians and challenged all to recognize their responsibility in the work.

One of the high lights of the camp was the fellowship service held around the fireplace in the recreation hall following the drama on Saturday evening. The many expressions of the campers witnessed to the success of "Kintah—1950."

The closing gathering was held in the grove where the "Kintah Whispers" were distributed and honor campers, chosen by camp vote, were announced. These outstanding campers for 1950 were: Jimmy Clark, Don Countryman, Carol Crum, Kenneth Fernandes, Dona Roll, David Swenson, Mary Lou Tyler, and Fred Williams.

From the grove the campers marched to the flag pole and sang "God Be With You" as the flag was lowered to close the camp. "Kintah" is again a memory.—Reported by MRS. ELWIN R. VEST.

WIARTON, ONTARIO.—Zion's Leaguer Jim Brady was baptized by John Bradley at the Port Elgin reunion.

The women's department catered at the wedding reception of Edith Rydall and Vernon Robinson.

VANCLEAVE, MISSISSIPPI.—Vacation Church School ended on July 7. Achievement program was held in the church on July 9. Children marched in carrying lighted candles and placed them at the front of the church. Twenty-six pupils received perfect attendance awards. The enrollment for the school was thirty-eight; the average attendance was thirty-three.

Family night was held June 29. All families of the community regardless of denomination were invited. The women's department served a chicken gumbo supper. The program that followed the supper was in charge of Mrs. H. E. Jennings. There were several comic skits, group singing, and later a worship program. The H. A. Goff family was recognized as the most outstanding family because of their devotion to the branch and the community.

Several young people attended the Gulf States District reunion. Mrs. Roy Phillips gave a report on the spiritual part of the reunion.

The men of the branch, under the supervision of H. E. Jennings, are busy every evening making blocks to be used in the new church building. At the same time the men are meeting, the women sew, crochet, and make things to be sold to buy supplies for the men's work.

On July 23, Donald McMillan was ordained to the office of priest and Clyde Parrish to the office of teacher. George Goff of Ocean Springs was ordained to the office of priest. Pastor A. G. Miller was assisted by Elders A. N. Barnes of Escatawpa, Mississippi, and Franklin Stiner of Mobile, Alabama, in the ordinations.—Reported by MRS. RUBLE MOE.

ROGUE VALLEY MISSION, MEDFORD, OREGON.—Our first religious education institute was held on July 22 and 23. The institute was opened Saturday evening with a short talk by Brother Verhei which set the theme, "Work Where You Are." Several skits and songs were presented under the direction of Leona Carpenter. Beverly Becker led in group singing. After the program, all went to the home of Brother and Sister Ted Schuld for refreshments.

Brother F. E. Chapman was in charge of the Sunday morning prayer service. At 10:00 Elder Harold Carpenter spoke to the adult class on church school working methods and effects. Sisters Effie Verhei and Wilma Schuld worked in the children's department so the teachers could attend Brother Carpenter's class.

Elder Miles Whiting spoke at the 11:00 service on the theme, "God's Blueprint for Living." Brother and Sister Earl Petrie sang their own composition, "Use Your Talents." There were approximately ninety-five people present. The Klamath Falls group was represented by twelve members. A basket lunch followed the services.

Stewardship Opportunities and Responsibilities

A Textbook for Priesthood Study

BY BISHOP L. WAYNE UPDIKE

This is a twelve-hour unit of study designed for the further education of the Aaronic Priesthood of our church. It covers the financial law, the missionary presentation of the financial law, how to help members file their tithing statement, family finances, funds of the church, economic Zion, and a number of charts.

Herald House INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

Elder Jack Verhei was in charge of the afternoon business meeting. Officers elected were: Elder Ted Schuld, pastor; Priest Jim Davidson, assistant pastor; Gladys Spinteg, secretary; Harry Spinteg, treasurer and church school director; Maud Correy, auditor and historian; Florence Davidson, women's leader; Earl Petrie, young people's leader; Elizabeth Schuld, Zion's League reporter; Helen Davidson, Zion's League representative; Irene Murphy, librarian and book steward; and Florence Weir, publicity.

The Sunday evening service was held in the garden of Brother and Sister John Weir. Brother Carpenter led a round-table discussion. Many questions were answered concerning the church departments. Sister Royce Chapman was a help to the women's department.

The building in which meetings are now held was made available through the courtesy of the Air Force's Reserve Group. The Air Reserve Building is at the Medford Municipal Airport.

Visiting Saints should contact Pastor Ted Schuld at 415 Beatty Street, Medford, phone 2-6492.—Reported by MRS. JOHN E. WEIR.

OWEN SOUND, ONTARIO.—District priesthood institute was held in the Grand Valley church on June 18 with an attendance of fifty-four ordained officers. Following a short devotional service, Seventy Louis Zonker taught a class on "Discipleship" and Bishop J. E. Baldwin discussed "Stewardship." Dinner was served by the Grand Valley women's department in the church basement. A round-table discussion followed by a priesthood fellowship service was held in the afternoon. Elder Alex Cadwell of Guelph was in charge.

Priesthood members came from Grand Valley, Owen Sound, Warton, Port Elgin, Ravena, Redickville, Stoke's Bay, Proton, Elora, and Guelph.—Reported by R. J. FARTHING.

SEATTLE SECOND CHURCH, SEATTLE, WASHINGTON.—Apostle E. J. Gleazer has returned to the district. Twenty-five of the branch attended the ordination of District President Granville Swenson to the office of High Priest. Apostle Gleazer officiated. Guest speakers have been Bishop Monte E. Lasater, High Priests Granville Swenson, and Alma Johnson, Elders Paul Wellington, and Carl Crum.

Attendance at prayer service has increased. Fifteen members have been added by transfer and eight by baptism. Those baptized were Dawn Cochran, Otis and Mabel Munson, Patricia Skoor, Barbara Izley, Linda Winegar, Karen Olsen, and Norma McGinnis. Otis Munson was baptized by Elder Paul Wellington and the others, by Pastor Charles H. Powers. All were confirmed by the pastor and Elder Al Twillgear.

Vacation Church School was held for five days, supervised by Sister Ruth Selzer, director of religious education. Sister Selzer had held teacher training classes for some time beforehand. Teachers were Ruth Olsen, Marie Skoor, Gertrude Hathaway, assisted by Mary Nickels, Myrtle Smith, Ella Chapman, Mary Louise Briggs, Thelma Powers, and Violet Carlson. Forty-one children attended with only two absent. The closing day was Achievement Day. Dinner was served by the women's department to parents and friends. Sister Blanche Berger presented her senior piano students, featuring a duo double piano number. The evening before, another class of younger pupils performed. Sister Donna Stearns was guest artist.

Three of the branch recently were graduated from Graceland: Patricia Mair, Gloria Fuge, and Robert Scott. Gloria was baptized a few days before graduation by Dr. Floyd McDowell.

Two classes in religious education led by District Director Wana McDole were conducted with an average attendance of twenty. "Leadership" and "How to Win One" were the subjects. Nine received certificates in the first class.

The women's department, led by Sister Ella Chapman, raised money to pay for materials for the missionaries' cabin at our Silver Lake reunion. The men provided the labor. A talent festival with Sister Thelma Powers in charge was held, netting $150 for the cabin fund. Many of the children gave performances. A kitchen band, quiz, gypsy chorus with Pearl Stearns as soloist, and the choir were features of the program. In the lower auditorium there were booths where baked goods, candy, plants, "white elephants," and refreshments were sold.

Marie Skoor is leader of the young married group. The choir, which is led by Sister Rose Clisby, is resting for the summer. Sisters Donna Selzer Thomson and Daisy Christiansen served as pianists.

The Boy Scout troop sponsored by the branch competed against twenty other troops and won third place. The troop was reorganized only four months previously. Don Brown is Scoutmaster and Oscar Sorlie is Assistant Scoutmaster.

The following officers were elected for next year: Elder Charles H. Powers, pastor; Teacher George N. Skoor, junior pastor; Sister Ruth Selzer, director of religious education; Sister Rose Clisby, director of music; Elder Alvin Twillgear, superintendent of junior church school; Deacon Clifford Briggs, treasurer; Sister Augusta Sparks Nelson, secretary; Mary Mair, adult supervisor; Priest Kenneth Nelson, Zion's League leader; Sister Marie Skoor, president young married group; Sister Daisy Christiansen, publicity agent and historian; and Hiram Clisby, book steward and librarian.—Reported by DAISY CHRISTIANSEN.

LOCK FOUR BRANCH, NORTH CHARLE-ROI, PENNSYLVANIA.—Betty Lee and Judith Ann, daughters of Mr. and Mrs. M. Sava-deck, were blessed on June 11 by Elder Clarence Winship.—Reported by DORIS DOOLEY.

THAYER, MISSOURI.—On July 12 four people were baptized by Brother G. Wayne Smith. These baptisms followed a two-week series of services by Brother Donald Kyser and Brother Smith. Brother Smith used slides in the church service and in the private homes they visited. Apostle Donald O. Chesworth preached on July 7.

Five from the branch attended the district conference, July 8 and 9, at Kennett, Missouri. Brother G. A. Fink was ordained to the office of teacher at the conference. Brother Ezra M. Neff, who could not attend the conference, was ordained July 12 to the office of deacon. Those baptized were Mr. and Mrs. Willard Jacobs, and Mr. and Mrs. Erwin Sergeant.

Sister G. A. Davis has returned home after a serious illness.

Brothers J. A. Phillips and P. P. Reed have been guest speakers recently.—Reported by MRS. E. M. NEFF.

SIoux FALLS, SOUTH DAKOTA.—On July 30 the Saints of Parker and Sioux Falls met together in a room of the Y. M. C. A. for the Sunday morning worship hour and the preaching service. Elder John Maas used a large chart to illustrate his sermon. Elder C. R. Buller dismissed the service with prayer. Mrs. Cora Emerson invited the whole group to her home for noon lunch.

Four people—three high school students and one adult—were baptized in the Vermillion River north of Parker. Elder Maas officiated. The confirmation service took place in the home of Elder Buller. Those baptized were Jane Hansen, Marietta Hansen, Raymond Murray, and Charles Emerson.—Reported by C. R. BULLER AND CORA EMERSON.

Making Faith Work

By ALEAH KOURY

SEEK AFTER THINGS which are worth while in life," was one admonition given in Book of Mormon times which can enhance the lives of people in all generations. When this was said, the speaker no doubt had a complex object in mind: to tell the people what good things were, where they came from, and how they could partake of them. The plan expounded in those days must bring the same results to us today, for it was designated by God and is therefore eternal.

The numerous good things of life need not be mentioned, for they are constantly evident to us; neither do the many evil things need to be pointed out, for we recognize them by their results. Disease, for instance, brings unhappiness, misery, pain—sometimes death, while the physician's skill brings relief and generally restored health. A harsh word will stir enmity between two individuals where a kind word could knit an everlasting friendship. We recognize all worth-while or evil things by their results.

Every good and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning.—I James 1: 17.

Realizing that all good things come from God, we eventually see that God is making himself manifest to us in many ways. Therefore every good thing he gives us tends to draw us to utilize it because of its good results; consequently we develop a faith in him and in the goodness he is offering. In the same way if we find that the advice of a friend always brings good results, we develop a faith in that individual as long as the same results continue. Conversely, if the results are harmful, we will go elsewhere for counsel. It was in the development of this same faith that God said men might become his sons; and through the mouths of his prophets he has assured us that as Christ lives, whatsoever good thing we ask of the Father in his name, in faith believing, that thing we shall receive.

WITH THIS SEEMINGLY SIMPLE yet necessary medium God shows himself to us. We don't see him in figure-form as we do human beings, but we can come to know him through the inexhaustible goodness he showers on us continually. We must exercise faith in him or we can never know him, simply because we don't give him the opportunity to enliven or enlarge our spiritual concepts of him. God is constantly trying to enter the hearts of men and women to offer them a way of life through his Son Jesus Christ. If, however, we exercise faith in God to the extent that we are assured of his goodness to us, a course of action is opened. Life is no longer a complexity of empty, worthless broadways; it is stepped up and reveals a definite direction by which we can reach a purposeful goal. It's obvious then, that with God there is a plan and a worth-while goal in life. A purpose is evident also to agitate action. With faith we know God, we have life in the truest sense of the word.

With faith we may reach God. With faith we acknowledge that the miracles of Christ are feasible and still possible today, and that angels continue to minister to men, being subject to the will of God; showing themselves to men and women of strong faith to call them to repentance and to prepare the way that the Holy Ghost may have place in their hearts.

It is by faith that miracles are wrought, and it is by faith that angels appear. When we recall the story of the woman who touched the hem of Christ's garment and was made well, we realize it was her faith in him that wrought the miracle, for he turned and, after asking who touched him and hearing her confession, he said very humbly, "Go thy way; thy faith hath made thee whole." Christ didn't say, "I have made you well." He told her that by the faith she exercised, she had been cured. The same thing occurred when he healed the two blind men, for he asked, "Believe ye that I am able to do this?" And when they said yes, he touched their eyes and said, "According to your faith be it unto you."

Faith in God is constructive, for it gives him a chance to build in our lives and to show us how to build for ourselves. It gives him a chance to open our eyes and causes us to want to become the kind of people he desires us to be, thereby discarding the worthless things from our lives. It is truly an element of life, necessary for our own salvation, for it causes us to seek "the worth-while things in life."

Payment in Kind - By NORA MOSER

I SPENT LAST SATURDAY MORNING making payment in kind for a debt I had incurred several months ago. Last fall I bought a car, obtained a learner's driving permit as required by my state, and learned to drive. To get the driving license, I had to present myself and car at the office of the Division of Motor Vehicles to take a road test. The state law prescribes that a person holding a learner's permit may drive only when accompanied by a licensed driver. So somebody had to go with me to take the test. My family had other business the day I was ready to take the test, and finally it was my friend Betty who went with me and bolstered up my confidence with her calmness and encouragement.

Betty already has a license. I can't pay her in kind by doing the same service for her that she did for me. I can treat her to a dinner or a movie, or perhaps return some more useful favor, but none of these is as satisfactory as repayment in kind, if it were possible. There is one way to do it, however—pay it to a different person. It may take months or years for the opportunity to come, but what does that matter? It took me eight months to find someone to pay this favor to. Martha, who works in my office, wanted to take her test last Saturday. Her husband works Saturdays. She asked me to go with her, which I was glad to do. Now I can cross that debt off my list.

WITH MY CAR I am paying a lot of other debts that date back to the depression years when my family was without an automobile of any kind. We lived on a farm several miles from any bus line or railroad. Many times our neighbors with cars gave us rides to and from town or made special trips for a nominal sum. I don't live in that locality now; I can't pay back any of those people who picked me up as I walked the three miles home from school. What I can do is give rides to people here and now who need them.

The case of the apartment took five years. In 1945 I was moving to Chicago to attend college. I needed an apartment near the campus. I sent deposit money to some friends already in school there, and they found a convenient apartment for me—which was quite an achievement in 1945. It isn't impossible that I might some day be able to do the same good turn for those friends, but I didn't wait for that. This spring I helped another family find a place to live in Washington.

ONCE I KNEW AN OLD MAN whose standard reply to my thanks for his kindnesses was, "Pass it on." There in three words is what I have been saying in four paragraphs.

The "Each One Win One" campaign is a good illustration of this principle. Presumably we who have found the Restoration are glad of it and are grateful to the person most responsible for our discovery. We would like to do something in return, but it is impossible to turn around and show the way to the one who has just led us. What we can do is to pass on our knowledge of the gospel to people who have not yet heard of it. This is the stuff chain reactions are made of. The sooner I warn my neighbor, the sooner he may be converted and pass it on to another, and so on until the world is won.

THERE IS AN OBVERSE to this coin. If I subscribe to the theory of paying debts in kind, and if necessary to someone different from the person who did the favor for me, then I cannot expect specific, reciprocal returns for all the services I perform for others. The friend I win to the church owes me nothing. He does have an obligation to pass on the knowledge to another person, perhaps someone he does not now know, or someone yet unborn. I may never know when and how he settles his debt, but that is his business; I have already settled mine.

It is the same with parents and children. Parents spend the best years of their lives bringing up their children. Can the children properly repay this by devoting all their energies to caring for the parents in their declining years? That would soon put an end to the race—which is not the way of life. The aging parents must be cared for, but the primary responsibility is to the future, not to the past. The children must go forward and bring up the next generation.

Civilization is a pool of good deeds passed on to us that we have to pass on to the next fellow. The world doesn't owe us a living—we owe the world for our lives. And we mustn't forget that debts bear interest. Keeping in mind all the good we have so freely received, let us do unto others as has already been done unto us, and then some.

Waste

Elizabeth Chalmondeley

Every year I live I am more convinced that the waste of life lies in the love we have not given, the powers we have not used, the selfish prudence that will risk nothing, and which, shirking pain, misses happiness as well. No one ever yet was poorer in the long run for having once in a lifetime "let out all the length of all the reins."

New Horizons

Southern Missouri District Gathering

A gathering for members of the Southern Missouri District, will be held in Kennett, Missouri, September 1 through 4. Activities include worship, preaching, class instruction, and recreation. Apostle D. O. Chesworth will be in charge, and the theme will be "We Witness for Christ in the Restoration." All former members of the district, as well as the Saints in Arkansas and neighboring districts are invited. Further information may be obtained from Elder J. A. Phillips, Route 3, Box 188, Kennett, Missouri. Accommodations will be available for all who wish to attend. The meeting place is five miles east and three miles south of Kennett.

ENGAGEMENTS

Yerrington-Ragsdale

Dr. and Mrs. Allan Kenneth Ragsdale of San Antonio, Texas, announce the engagement of their daughter, Ann Guyton Ragsdale, to Foster Charles Yerrington, son of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Foster Yerrington of Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. Miss Ragsdale has a bachelor of science degree in occupational therapy, and Mr. Yerrington is receiving his master's degree in psychology this summer. The wedding will take place in the fall.

WEDDINGS

Yocum-Counts

Elinor Counts, daughter of Mrs. Bertha Counts of Kimmswick, Missouri, and James Yocum, son of Mr. and Mrs. Clifford Yocum, also of Kimmswick, were married August 4 at the church in St. Louis, Missouri. Pastor Frank McDonald performed the double-ring ceremony.

Brady-Robinson

Erma Yvonne Robinson, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sam Robinson of Warton, Ontario, and James Edward Brady, son of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Brady of Toronto, Ontario, were married August 4 at the Reorganized Church in Warton. Elder Garnet Farrow performed the ceremony. They will make their home in Warton.

Boswell-Woods

Arnetta Woods, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Heber Woods of Hillsboro, Ohio, and James Boswell, son of Mr. and Mrs. Roy Boswell of Lamoni, Iowa, were married July 30 in the Reorganized Church at Sinking Spring, Ohio. Priest Charles Garman, uncle of the bride, performed the double-ring ceremony. They are making their home in Lamoni.

Nordeen-Beitz

Juanita Myrle Beitz, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Elmer W. Beitz of Muscatine, Iowa, and William H. Nordeen, son of Mr. Henning Nordeen, also of Muscatine, were married June 18 at the First Christian Church in Muscatine, Elder Lyle Woodstock and the Reverend Noble Bolinger officiating. The bride is a graduate of Graceland, class of '46, and the groom is a graduate of Drake University. They are making their home in Muscatine.

BIRTHS

A son, William Burwell, was born on July 4 to Mr. and Mrs. William E. Anderson of Independence, Missouri. Mrs. Anderson, the former Lois Jean Burwell, and Mr. Anderson are both graduates of Graceland College. Mr. Anderson is also a graduate of Indiana University.

DEATHS

Obituaries should be sent in promptly by relatives or friends. They will be printed free as soon as space permits. In fairness to all, the editors reserve the right to cut the message to two hundred words.

BULLARD.—Alma E., was born July 7, 1883, and died June 9, 1950, at his home in Nevada, Missouri. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on June 1, 1894, and at one time was superintendent of buildings and grounds at Graceland College. He moved to Nevada in 1936, where he followed the carpenter trade. He was active in church work as church school director and young people's leader. He also was a Boy Scout leader and helped in many civic organizations.

 RHAPSODY AT DAWN

God's world looks all fresh and new, something like when he finished it at Creation. The air is clear and clean. The sun, still below the horizon, is cheerily knocking at the doors of night, and dawn hastily sweeps the shadows away to the west, tidying up the sky for a new day. The grass has on its jewels, the beads of dew, and the trees are all looking pleasant like ladies putting their dreams away.

Down in the lawns the insects who have been out reveling all night are trying like drunken lords to find their way home, staggering through jungles of grass before the sun catches them. The worms have been up for a breath of fresh air and robins are busy chopping them up into sausage lengths for breakfast.

The cats, who have been out hunting, feuding, and romancing all night, are taking a last look at the birds before going home to sleep and look innocent all day.

Now men awake, and the day's quota of trouble begins. There are cars to be smashed, tempers to be lost, papers to be torn and scattered into the wind, and dust to be thrown into the eyes of the pretty world.

 REWARDS

If and when Uncle Joe gets to heaven, he hopes to be rewarded, not for what he has written, but for the miles and miles of stuff he has erased.

 RADIO

Those nice little talks they give on Morning Devotions sound so simple and easy. Anybody ought to be able to do one. You think so until you try it yourself. It takes six and one-half minutes to read one; it takes six and one-half hours to write one; and you may still think it isn't worth anything.

Yours Sincerely, P. S., has been having a turn at the radio talks. It makes him appreciate Evan Fry, Bethel Davis Knoche, Don Pyper, Steve Black, Dan Sorden, Russell Resch, Oliver Houston, and a lot of others who, for years and years, while you and I have been enjoying our toast and orange juice, have been out in the cold of the morning to woo good will from an unresponsive mike. You don't know what it is until you do it.

At the Central Missouri Stake Reunion they had an unusual feature. Over a public address system, they broadcast Morning Devotions, which made an ear-opener for the campers. This reunion meets on the grounds of pretty Lake Venita at Odessa. Thus, without being in attendance, P. S. was on the list of speakers, and addressed the camp every morning. Those nice people survived the experience, as they do many other things.

One Saturday morning P. S. had the odd experience of sitting at home and hearing himself talk on the radio. It was by transcription. He doesn't like the sound of his own voice. It disturbs him. Sounds like someone who needs a good shaking to wake him up. Anybody like to trade voices?

Time is the tyrant on a radio. Quantity is so much more important than quality. Not too little, not too much, but just enough, is the inflexible rule. If they could only install a set of semaphore signals as they have on the railroads, so that the speaker could speed up or slow down, it would help.

Harley W. J. Nagel

Killed August 12

EXACTLY ONE YEAR from the date of his graduation from William Jewell College, Harley Nagel was killed en route to Kirtland Reunion where he was to conduct a class for young people. He had been under General Church appointment since June 1 of this year, and was assigned to serve as city pastor of Columbus, Ohio, at the recent General Conference. After receiving his B. A. Degree last August, he attended the University of Kansas and William Jewell, where he was working toward his Masters Degree at the time of his appointment. He was ordained a deacon in Independence at the age of nineteen. His ordination to the office of priest took place at Cheyenne, Wyoming, on March 10, 1943, while he was in the Armed Service. On August 18, 1948, he was ordained an elder at Slover Park, his home congregation in Independence. His service to the church took many different forms; before his General Church appointment he served at various times as junior pastor, Zion's League supervisor, group elder, solicitor, assistant church school supervisor, and pastoral assistant. Perhaps his greatest ministry was his interest in people, and age or race or social standing presented no barrier to him. He was as concerned about the soul of the colored lad at the end of the street as he was about the people he met at college. He was as willing to drive to a shabby house in the country and encourage a poor family to come back to church as he was to stand in the pulpit and preach. Even during the four years he spent in military service, he found occasion to minister to those who looked for a better way of life. It was this deep concern for people that endeared him to members and nonmembers alike wherever he went.

On August 26, 1949, he married Sadi Anka Moon, former editor of Stepping Stones, whose record of service in the church was closely comparable to his own. Six days after his death, she gave birth to a daughter who has been named Doris Elizabeth. They are making their home with Harley's parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Nagel, 809 North Spring, Independence.

Funeral services were held at the Stone Church in Independence on Tuesday afternoon, August 15, Apostle Reed M. Holmes and Elder Glaude A. Smith officiating. Burial was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

News & Notes

PARTICIPATES

Apostle D. T. Williams preached five evening sermons at the Woodbine reunion, two Sunday sermons at the Lamoni, Iowa, reunion, and one sermon on the first Sunday of Stewartville, Missouri, reunion.

ATTENDS REUNIONS

Dr. Floyd M. McDowell, Supervisor of Priesthood Education spent the week end of August 12-13 at the Central Missouri reunion at Lake Venita. He gave the Sunday morning sermon and taught priesthood and young people's classes.

At the Brush Creek reunion held at Xenia, Illinois, August 5 to 13, he preached several sermons and taught a priesthood class. Brother McDowell also reports that most of his summer has been spent in preparing material for priesthood education and that several new publications may be expected soon.

LOCAL PRIESTHOOD

Starting immediately, every Tuesday evening will be devoted to priesthood visiting in Zion. Families are to remain home in expectation of priesthood visitors. It is planned to make priesthood visits on Tuesday a permanent feature just as the prayer meeting is a permanent feature on Wednesday evenings.

CAMPUS SERVICE

Elder James C. Daugherty, member of the Council of Presidents of Seventy, spoke August 13 at the Campus on the subject, "The Ministering Church of the Restoration." Bishop H. W. Cackler was in charge of the service, and Wallace Fike led the music.

About 2,500 people attended the service.

MUSIC

Franklyn S. Weddle, Director of Department of Music, attended the Far West reunion at Stewartville, Missouri, on August 14. He taught three classes: one music, one general, and one priesthood.

YOUNG PEOPLE

The newly-improved ball courts at the Campus are being put into active use. Zion's League groups of Independence have eighteen softball teams and twenty-two volleyball teams that use the courts. In addition to this there are various city teams and teams from other denominations that use the courts.

REUNIONS

Elder J. C. Daugherty reports that eight people were baptized at the Arkansas and Louisiana District reunion held in Hot Springs, Arkansas. Branches of the districts sent quantities of food to the reunion to help cover expenses.

Brother Daugherty also reports that the Kansas reunion held at Camp Fellowship near Wichita, Kansas, was larger than it has ever been. Besides preaching three sermons, he taught the men's class and a general class.

CHURCH WOMEN

When the Independence Council of Church Women held a reorganizational meeting August 7 at the Evangelical and Reformed Church in Independence, an R.L.D.S. woman was elected to complete the year's term of presidency vacated by another R.L.D.S. woman. Mrs. M. A. McConley is the new president. Mrs. Stephen Black, who was the president, is with her husband in the missionary field.

Another R.L.D.S. woman, Mrs. James Gault, is the chairman of the worship committee of the organization.

"Follow Me"

In simple trust like theirs, who heard

Beside the Syrian sea
The gracious calling of the Lord,
Let us, like them, without a word,
Rise up and follow Thee.

—Whittier

FALL IN!" Those two words will have a familiar ring for all who know anything of military life. A thousand experiences in many kinds of situations will be recalled by their memories. Some will be pleasant, some will not.

"Fall in." That is the theme for the month of September. It is a phrase that can be used in the church as well as in the military branch of the government. It is time to be ready, to line up and take our positions in the organization. We must stand in our places so that the leaders will know we are there, ready for work.

September is the real beginning of the new year of work. Promotions have been made. People have returned with their families from vacations. They have put away the bathing suits, the sport clothing, and the summer slacks. Fall clothing, fall tasks at home and church, are the order of the day.

* * * * *

Look around in your church, and you will see many things to be done. In the yard, bushes may need trimming, for they are always ambitiously trying to fill the world with their kind. Paint is wanted, too, in some spots.

Inside, things will be showing wear—the carpet on the steps to the rostrum. Damaged Hymnals should be taken away and repaired or replaced by new ones. There will be a broken rack or so on the backs of the pews. In the children's rooms, a rickety chair may break; take it out now before some child is hurt.

Check the quarterlies to see that supplies will be on hand in time. Face the question now, honestly:

does the inside of the church need redecorating? Is it shabby? What would a visiting friend think? Get busy!

* * * * *

Jesus kept his eyes open for good men.

He saw Peter and Andrew fishing in the Sea of Galilee. He was walking along the shore. He called to them. Probably they knew him, and had heard him talking to multitudes of people.

"Follow me," he said, "and I will make you fishers of men." There was something inviting and challenging in his call. Of what importance were fish when there were souls of men to be saved? "And they straightway left their nets, and followed him."

Jesus was as good as his word. He did make them fishers of men.

He saw Matthew taking the customs receipts, and said, "Follow me." And Matthew arose and followed him.

In the same manner he called the rest of the twelve apostles, and began the formation of the body of his church.

If all the many other wonderful things Jesus said could be forgotten, the compelling look of love in his eyes, the tone of invitation and authority in his voice would make those two words reach the hearts of men and women in all ages.

Can you read the story of his life today, after two thousand years of human history filled with trouble and sorrow, and not feel the compelling power of those two words, "Follow me"?

Your heart is touched. You put aside the little tasks with which you had been filling in the time. You had been waiting for something, you knew not what.

This is it—this is the call you had been waiting for—now is the time—Jesus is calling!

"Follow me!"

* * * * *

Where will He take you? You don't care, just so he is there. You will go anywhere he tells you—if you have heard his call—you will do anything he asks. You answer:

I'll go where you want me to go,
dear Lord,

I'll do what you want me to do.

It may be into missionary work. It may be into foreign lands. It may be out to preach the gospel in domestic missions. It may be the work of a pastor. It may be down into the basement of your own home church to teach little children. It may be to do a kind of work you have never done before. It may be a work you had never cared to do, until he asked you. No matter. Now you will love it, because you know it is for him.

* * * * *

A new sense of belonging and of dedication takes possession of you. You are no longer an isolated individual, picking along at your own ephemeral, unimportant little project. You are part of an organization—an everlasting organization. You have engaged in an eternal work. It will not be done in your lifetime. It will not perish when you die. Others will carry it on, and on, and on. You are marching with the hosts in the army of the Lord. You are one of the builders of the kingdom of God.

You have heard the call, and it is still ringing in your ears; the sound of his blessed voice lingers like a memory of beauty; the sight of his face still fills your vision. You can remember how his lips looked when they were moving and forming the words of his invitation and command,

"Follow me! Follow me!"

E d i t o r i a l

IN LOOKING forward to the coming meeting of the members of the High Priests Quorum in Kirtland, I was particularly interested in the following passage from a letter recently received from Brother Frank McDonald of St. Louis, Missouri:

The Lord has been good to these people. He has hearkened to their petitions in behalf of our sick ones; he has blessed her servants in their shepherding ministry; his arms of love have been about his people, and in their worship services they have come into the presence of their Father. Their singing has been like that of the heavenly hosts around the throne of God.

Since the last General Conference my ministry has been blessed by more of the Spirit of God than ever before. For this I am very grateful and humble, determined to be the kind of a pastor the people deserve. I am looking forward with a great deal of anticipation to the experiences of Kirtland this October. I am doing everything within my power to bring my life so completely in harmony with the purposes of the Almighty that nothing therein will hinder the great body of high priests from coming into the presence of God at that time.

We trust that this spirit will permeate the thinking of all of those who are anticipating fellowship at this coming meeting.

WE ARE glad to pass along this communication from Apostle Holmes:

Dear Brother Edwards:

The following is a paragraph taken from a letter written to me by Orrin R. Wilcox, Box 363, Fairview, Montana. I believe you will find it interesting, and I am wondering if mention might be made of this venture of the Wilcox family. Perhaps others will be stimulated to do the equivalent in their territories.

My wife and I start on a trip today which will take us through the western part of our district. We will travel over 1,000 miles in the next two weeks, visiting in the homes of isolated Saints and meeting next Sunday with the group at Nashua where the Saints from Opheim, Hinsdale, Glasgow, Saco, and Ft. Peck gather for church school each Sunday. This is the only organized group we will find in all this vast territory of the West. We will use your list of materials for teaching children in the home and in mission church schools.

This list mentioned by Brother Wilcox is one we have sent to district church school directors and all appointees in the field. We hope that we may stimulate and direct study in this way and trust that some mission church schools will be the result of this endeavor.

I READ MANY of the articles appearing in The Saturday Review of Literature with enjoyment and profit. In an article by Louis J. Halle, Jr., on "Raw Materials of Persuasion" appearing in the issue of March 11, 1950, were a few paragraphs which will be particularly interesting to those of us who are alert to our responsibility for spreading the good news of the kingdom. Here it is, quoted by permission of the Review:

The Wind and the Sun, in the old story, had a contest of strength. To demonstrate his prowess, the Wind undertook to strip the overcoat from the back of a man who was walking across a field. At the Wind's first blasts, however, the man pulled the coat more tightly about him; as they rose in strength, he turned up his collar, and, finally, when the Wind shrieked and howled about him, he buttoned it up to his chin. The Wind retired at last and the Sun took his turn. He beamed benignantly on the man, wrapping him in his warmth until the man quite voluntarily unbuttoned his coat, then spread it open, and finally took it off altogether.

If you truly mean to persuade a man, you must have his good will. Your approach must be disarming so that he does not assume an attitude of defense. You must not seem to be opposing your conviction to his, your ego to his, challenging him to a contest in which his pride is at stake. On the contrary, you must be friendly and show respect for the quality of his mind, avoiding any implication of superiority on your part. To show off your own wit is merely to discredit your wisdom. By your own intellectual generosity, however, you can make him ashamed not to respond in kind. When I have been arguing heatedly on a subject of which I have little knowledge (the kind of subject on which we argue most heatedly), I have sometimes found myself humiliated by a sudden concession from my opponent that I know more about the matter than he does.

My immediate reaction is to confess how little I do know and to concede, in turn, that he may be right after all.

This deference is courtesy and, like all courtesy, it bears in the minds of many the brand of hypocrisy. It need not and should not, however, be essentially hypocritical. It is to your own credit to renounce pride of opinion, to forebear from the attempt to humiliate others, and to assume that they are, like you, intellectually responsible persons. This assumption makes truth, rather than victory, the object of the argument.

Most of us tend to take our cue from those we meet, responding with friendship where friendship is offered, with hostility to hostility, giving respect for respect, scorn for scorn, generosity for generosity, intransigency for intransigency. Men who are better than I bring out the best in me, and I have on occasion been shocked by my low behavior in dealing with the low. If you are badly treated perhaps it is your own fault. Your rule should be, then, to give the best possible cue yourself. "Use every man after his desert," says Hamlet, "and who should scape whipping? Use them after your own honor and dignity. The less they deserve, the more merit is in your bounty."

In any case, the man who knows how to make concessions is relatively unassailable. When you do find yourself plunged into argument, concede every point you can so that your defense is based only on your strongest positions. If a sally takes you beyond them, do not hesitate to retreat. Many zealous debators are led to abandon their main and defensible points in order to defend some minor, incidental, and indefensible position—simply because they think they must counter every move, and if their opponent says black is black they will countercharge with black is white and die in the issue though their argument did not require it. Never put yourself in the position of defending the indefensible.

Notice to Missionaries

Growing out of suggestions voiced by members of the New Appointees' Institute which recently met in Independence, a two-page article has been prepared to assist missionaries in getting publicity of their services in local newspapers. We will be glad to furnish a copy of this to any of our missionaries who request it. —Editor.

Experiences of a Missionary

By L. G. HOLLOWAY

This is the first of a series of many articles by Elder Holloway. We believe that "Herald" readers will find them both interesting and inspiring. During his forty-one years in the mission fields of the church, Brother Holloway has influenced many people. He tells of many experiences and mentions many names. Above all, his life story shows that he loves God and His church, and sincerely desires to share this love with people.—Editor.

JOINING THE CHURCH

MY FATHER AND MOTHER were Christian people even before coming into the Reorganized Church. They set an example of purity and goodness before me. This made a marked impression on my life and prepared me so that when I came to young manhood I too desired to accept the gospel.

About this time I had two dreams that caused me to seriously consider coming into the church. In these dreams I saw the coming of the Master; he was surrounded with all the holy angels, and I knew this meant I must be prepared if I were to be with him upon the redeemed earth. After pondering the matter over well, I decided to set a time when I would be baptized. The day was set, and I promised the Lord if he would spare my life I would unite with the church.

When that day came, I regret to say, I broke my pledge to the Lord; and as a result I found myself in misery. After suffering the pangs of conscience, I again made a pledge that if my life were spared until a day I set of my own free will, I would submit myself for baptism. The days passed slowly and again I found myself facing the same ordeal I had previously experienced. When the day arrived I went to my father's barn and put a bridle on one of the horses. Within me a fight was going on. Two powers were exerting themselves. One of these powers sought to prevent me from keeping my pledge, while the other encouraged me to do the thing I knew was right. I went to the home of Elder Charles H. Jones who had baptized my father. After some effort I succeeded in telling him the purpose of my coming. We went to a small stream near his home and on March 17, 1893, I was baptized.

As soon as I had complied with this law of Christ, peace and happiness came over me as a cherished fountain. On my way home I received another spiritual experience. I heard music and rejoicing from a great angelic choir which defied description. I knew that heavenly messengers rejoiced over one sinner who had accepted the gospel, and they were rejoicing because of my coming into the church. This same testimony was repeated to me some years later as I was traveling along this same road not far from where the Lone Rock Church now stands. This testimony will remain with me as long as memory lasts, and some day I hope to hear it in the mansions of the blest.

On reaching home I was only too glad to inform my father and mother of what I had done, and they, too, were happy because of my uniting with the church. A few days later I was confirmed. As hands were placed upon my head, I felt the Spirit as plainly as if water had been poured upon me. All doubt was removed, and I was able to say, "I know this to be the work of God."

SAVED FROM DEATH

A few months after my coming into the church, I was called to Western Iowa to work on my uncle's farm. While there I met with a very serious accident in which I was crushed beneath a heavily-loaded wagon. I was taken to the house and laid upon a bed. My uncle called for a doctor and also sent a telegram to my father and mother, informing them I had been seriously hurt and for father to come at once. When the doctor arrived he examined me and told my uncle there was no hope for my recovery. As I lay there suffering greatly, it seemed the end was not far distant. Life was sweet, and I had a keen desire to live. The day passed, and as the shades of night gathered around me, I wondered if I would live until my father arrived, or until the coming of another day.

While I was suffering all that my flesh could endure, an experience came to me, bringing great courage and hope. As the people gathered at my bedside expecting me to die at any moment, I heard a voice—not the voice of any man—but the voice of the Spirit say to me: "You shall not die, but you shall live to declare the words of the Lord."

Never in all my life had such assurance been given to me as these words brought. Ten thousand people could have stood at my bedside and insisted I could not live, but faith was given to me; I knew the Lord would heal me and that some day I would preach the gospel.

I had not taken any medicine, as the doctor said it was only a matter of a few short hours until I would be gone. After hearing this voice, every pain left my body and the hemorrhage ceased. The people said I was dying, but I knew better. When my father arrived the next morning, I was able to get up and dress and take some nourishment. I truly know it was by the power of God that I was healed.

CALLED AND ORDAINED

Many years later those same words came to give me strength in an hour when I needed spiritual help. Like many young men I found myself engaged in many things that were contrary to Christian living. I needed the help of the Master to overcome these things that were offensive in his sight. I felt my weakness, yet the promise given that I would declare the "words of the Lord" gave me courage to try. One by one I overcame these temptations until I was permitted to be ordained to the office of priest.

I am happy to say that light was given to me regarding the call which came to me through the president of our branch. One day we were walking along the road, and he asked me if I felt I had a work to do. I did not care to give him a direct answer even though I knew the Lord wanted me in the ministry of the church. Soon he gave expression to that which was divine light to him and said I should be ordained. I then told him what I knew about the call. Later on I found that several men in administrative positions had also received divine light. My name was presented to the branch and later to the stake conference for approval. I was ordained a priest under the hands of Heman C. Smith and Columbus Scott on February 8, 1903. Four years later I was ordained an elder by Heman C. Smith and Frederick A. Smith. This time my call came through Gomer T. Griffiths and was approved by the Stake High Council presided over by John Smith, President of the Lamoni Stake. My third ordination, to the office of Seventy, took place in Independence, Missouri, under the hands of Apostles Frederick A. Smith and John W. Wight, on April 16, 1908, the ordination being approved by the General Conference of that year.

Soon after my ordination to the office of priest, I entered into the work of that office with zeal and earnestness. I was eager to prove my ministry and sought upon every occasion to make myself worthy. Many times I would work hard all week either on the farm or at other labor and would then walk twenty miles to speak in some of the branches in the stake. I was blessed in my work, and I felt my ministry was acceptable not only to the Saints, but to the Master. I had few opportunities for education in my youth and I needed to apply myself to reading and study for the work before me.

BEGINNING MISSIONARY WORK

Two years after my first ordination, I was impressed that I should enter the mission field. I talked the matter over with some of my friends, including Presiding Patriarch Alexander H. Smith, and all gave me words of encouragement. One day as I was sitting in the home of a friend, I was impressed to write the Quorum of Twelve offering them my services as a missionary for the church.

I attended the Conference of that year, and when the appointments were read, my name appeared in the list of appointees. I shall never forget how it affected me as they sang, "I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord." My appointment read "Seattle and British Columbia District," nearly two thousand miles from home. I had never been away from home except for short periods of time and then never far away. Could I succeed in staying away for many long and weary months? Having confidence to believe the Lord would help me, I was willing to make the trip. Little did I realize the many hours of loneliness and temptations that would confront me. Had I known all that would come in the experiences incident to missionary life, I fear I might have decided not to go.

However, I placed my trust in the Master, believing he would sustain me in the hour of my need and would never permit me to be tempted above that which I was able to bear. During the forty-one years I was under missionary appointment, I can truly say the Lord was kind, never forsaking me in the hour when I needed help.

FIRST MISSIONARY EXPERIENCES

I PREACHED my first two sermons in the mission field in Seattle on the following Sunday. My first series of services was held in Tacoma where I found a hearty welcome in the home of Brother and Sister Van Eaton. I shall always remember the kindness of these good people who did all they could to help me, and arranged for me to hold services in different places. Sister Van Eaton was like a mother to me, and it was largely through her efforts that I found a place in which to hold services.

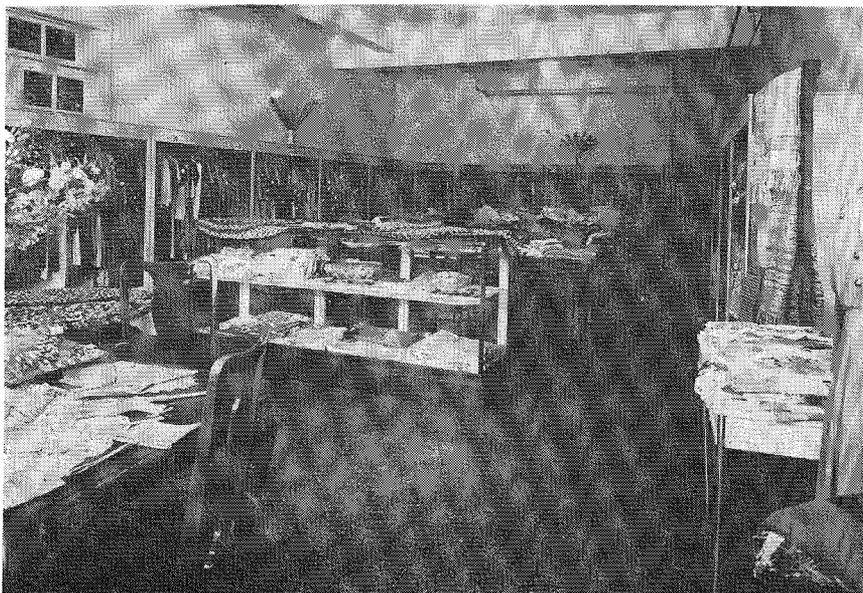

MT. RAINIER'S GLACIERS

While holding meetings near Ashford, Washington, I was permitted to make a trip up Mt. Rainier to Paradise Valley. In company with several men, I climbed nearly ten thousand feet up the side of the mountain to what was known as the Camp of the Clouds. Here we found ourselves in a vast snow field, and took a ride down the side of the mountain. I found an old chair with the legs removed and used this for a sled. As I coasted down the side of the valley, my speed increased until it seemed to me that I was traveling at the rate of an express train. As I got down to lower grounds the snow became soft. My chair all at once stopped, but I did not. I rolled for nearly one hundred yards and when I finally succeeded in stopping, I found myself wet to the skin. It was the first time in my life that I had taken a sleigh ride on the twenty-first of June. That night I camped with Brother Richie on the side of the mountain. We built a fire, but I nearly froze while he slept. My clothing was still wet and this added

Social Service Is Big Business

By JOSEPHINE SKELTON

View of the Ladies' Ready-to-Wear salesroom. The glass case contains quilt tops for ambitious customers who want the fun of doing the quilting themselves.

THE Social Service Center has come a long way from its humble beginnings in the basement of Bartholomew Hall. There is nothing to suggest a charity institution in the huge plate glass windows of the two sales rooms. Anyone walking along the street would look at the gay rugs on the display tables and think that here was an attractive new store in Independence.

And the Social Service Center is an attractive new store. But, unlike an ordinary store out to make a profit, this one is dedicated to the profit of its customers. The belligerent poor who bluster in demanding something for nothing leave humbled after contact with a new kind of charity—a charity which has been transformed into help which bolsters self-respect. The timid poor who hesitate wistfully in the doorway are drawn in by kindly saleswomen to find that here is a place where re-conditioned merchandise is priced within their reach.

On a busy Tuesday afternoon when the workrooms are as crowded with activity as the salesrooms, Mrs. Russei Rowland, the major domo of the volunteer workers, and Norman Hield, manager of the project, are everywhere and nowhere. It took this reporter half an hour to track down Mrs. Rowland from one department to another, and then she was found at last burrowing through a room full of boxes as she directed a storage operation.

"Space," she exclaimed as she patted the shoulder of a teen-age boy who was struggling with a box labeled Women's dresses, winter, "I've been stumped for more space ever since we started up ten years ago. I thought we had the problem solved when we moved into the Swope Mansion—we had just five workers rattling around in it—but then that got too small for us. And when we got this place, I thought we'd have lots of space from now on, but already, before we're even settled, I can see where we'll have to expand again in short order."

Fortunately the building is strong enough so that the second floor may be built out to cover the whole area of the first floor. Cornered on a flying trip through his office, Norman Hield led the way out on the flat, sunny roof. "The first floor under this is all workrooms and storage space. It's a good feeling to know that we can have twice as much room when we need it." Going over to the edge of the roof, he pointed down at a small cement foundation close to the main building. "That will be the auxiliary boiler to supply steam for the laundry and dry cleaning department. And that," he waved a proud hand at the 120 by 66 foot parking lot, "will be our receiving department when the time comes to get a shed built over it."

DOWN in the basement the long wonder-working process from rags to raiment begins. Until the shed is built for the receiving department, one end of the basement is turned over to receiving and sorting the truckloads of material that pour in from the Independence area. The truck backs into the receiving department on an average of three times a day. Manned by a driver and helper, it carries everything from upright pianos to kiddie cars and from old shoes to bags of clothing. All of this pours in through the week and piles up across one end of the basement, often overflowing into the space which will soon be needed for new departments. Each Tuesday, several women wade through the hodgepodge and work on the staggering job of sorting all the material into bins, shelves, boxes ready for routing to the different departments.

Shoes by the barrelful go to the volunteer cobbler who combines good uppers with good soles and cleans and polishes until the finished product meets his craftsman's standard. All sorts of furniture from pianos to electric fans are repaired and sent up to the household furnishings salesroom. Paper is salvaged for sale. Books are rebound and mended. Hats go to be cleaned and blocked. And every piece of clothing that comes in begins a complicated round to disguise it from the former owners. No one is to be humiliated by wearing something that can be identified as a castoff.

Clothing too far gone to be mended for instant use goes immediately to the ripping department where buttons are removed and an electric ripping machine rips the seams. The strong pieces of cloth thus salvaged are laundered or cleaned and sent up to the dressmaking department to be cut into garments of a smaller pattern. The scraps are forwarded to the comforter department and cut into blocks of three sizes. If the cloth happens to be wool, the tiny pieces left over are carefully saved and sent to the rug department to be used in making homespun oriental rugs. "The only things we lose," says Mrs. Rowland proudly, "are the ravelings and the dust."

Pieces of cotton cloth get much the same treatment. They are cut up into three-sized blocks and used either in making quilts or comforter tops. These quilts are works of art and run up as high as $25.00 when they are handmade. More moderately priced ones are machine quilted, and quite often quilt tops are sold alone to women who want the "fun of doing the quilting themselves." Stouter cotton materials are put into comforter tops which can be washed instead of cleaned as the woolen comforters must be. "I wish people would get over the idea that we can use only whole garments." Mrs. Rowland picked up a pile of comforter blocks and flipped through them. "Do you know what these are? These are strong pieces of material salvaged from torn jeans that have been washed and worn until they are this faded color and soft texture. They make wonderfully durable comforters. Pretty, too."

ALL around the outside wall of the basement are workrooms separated by waist-high partitions. The center space is built into storage rooms with two rooms assigned to each department, one for the "raw" materials and one for the finished products.

Some of the departments are not operating yet. "We're working in the raw," says Mr. Hield. "For instance, some day we will have a paper bailer and shredding machine so that we will be able to make a better profit from the wastepaper that comes in here. And we want to get some equipment for refinishing furniture and repairing electrical appliances and toys. We could even use a piano-tuning department, if some piano tuner would just volunteer his services." The new laundry and dry-cleaning unit nearly fills one side of the basement, and Mr. Hield praised the machines as enthusiastically as a press agent.

Other departments are going full blast. The tearing room is next door to the ripping department. A bright-eyed little woman looked up at us as we paused outside the partition and smiled, "You'll have to excuse us. We always look on a rip and a tear in here." White sheets beyond repair are saved, dyed all colors and sent to this tearing room to be torn up into long strips and wound on balls. These are then sent to the rug department to be used in making borders or in special orders for rugs of a certain color. Right now there are 2,000 pounds of balls waiting on the shelves ready for the looms.

Six looms are set up in the basement. This department has the honor of having the youngest volunteer worker. A little ten-year-old girl comes in as often as possible to help with the tedious job of threading the shuttles that fly back and forth on the automatic looms.

One of the most interesting units is the button department where the woman in charge has earned herself the unique title of "the woman who cans buttons." The counter in front of her crowded shelves is always cluttered with mounds of multicolored buttons as she collects and ties sets together and sorts them into boxes. No matter what the dressmaking or mending departments ask for, Mrs. Monroe can lay her hands on just the right thing. All the buttons are filed in boxes under descriptive labels: black coat buttons, belt buckles, small colored buttons, oddities. "And when I told a newspaper reporter that I had a quart of white pearl buttons and two gallons of white shirt buttons, she started that business of calling me the woman who cans buttons." Hooks and eyes and snaps are kept in pint jars, and there is even a Quaker Oats box filled to the top.

THE second floor, which is at present built over the salesrooms, provides space for the offices of Mrs. Rowland, who says she hasn't had time to use hers yet, and Mr. Hield. His office is connected with a smaller room which in time will become the office for the "receptionist, bookkeeper, secretary and treasurer—a jack-of-all-offices."

The needlecraft and artwork departments are the only two upstairs. Supplies are kept in shelves that line the walls and are hidden by dainty curtains that give the rooms an air of cheerful hominess.

THE first floor follows the same pattern as the basement with the work space lining the walls by the windows and the before-and-after storage rooms assigned to each department occupying the middle. Four quilting frames were in action when we passed by, and one woman looked up to wave at us, "We just sold the quilt we're working on," she said. "A lady was touring the Center and bought it right out from under our needles." Across from them, comforter tops are stitched together and stacked on high shelves. Down the line the dressmakers busily remodel clothes. Their room is fitted up as professionally as the retired seamstresses could wish with racks of patterns, a huge cupboard of supplies, a pinking machine, four big power machines, six electric machines, and a dress form—with a beautiful figure.

Separated only by a low partition, the apron and millinery department act as each other's severest critics. An elderly grandmother trying on a saucy teen-ager's hat met the friendly hoots of the apron makers from beyond the wall with a laughing, "All right, all right. It's not for me!" One of the regular workers here has been in the millinery business for forty years and another thirty-five years. Together they run the department with the help of eight or ten others who are learning the trade because they like it. "I'd really rather be in another unit," the one who has been forty years a milliner confided. "I'm not learning anything here. I've got my eye on the hook rug department just as soon as they can get along without me on the hats."

The millinery unit is a fascinating place with the old, lusterless, smashed hats being given new life and beauty. Trim is removed, hats are reblocked into exciting shapes, felts are cleaned, and straws are painted with white shellac to make them look like new. When the finished product is at last placed in the window of the showroom, the women of the millinery department defy former owners to pick out their last year's hat. "Sometimes we get a felt that just can't be made over," the woman's hands twisted and pulled a crown into a new contour, "and then we send it up to the art department. They make the prettiest slippers out of them you ever saw!"

Already fall dresses and hats are keeping the women busy. Spring and summer clothing is kept in lockers, one locker for each department so that saleswomen can get supplies quickly. The "before" storerooms are slowly filling with the raw material for fall and winter clothes, and the "after" storerooms are building up stock for the change of season that will catch up with them so soon.

LIKE any other big department store, the Social Service Center has an elevator connecting its three floors. Only here there is an unusual reason in addition to the need of being able to transport merchandise from one floor to another. "Most of our workers are elderly women, some with physical handicaps. They simply couldn't climb stairs." And on the first floor there is a ladies lounge, complete with several davenport and a radio, so that workers and customers have a place to rest. Unlike an ordinary department store, this one has a chapel fitted with a raised platform for the speaker and a reconditioned piano. Every Tuesday morning at 9:00 o'clock when the women meet for their regular work day, they begin with a devotional period.

Most of the space occupied by the chapel does triple duty. When tables are moved in, it becomes a dining room where the workers are served their noon meal. "We want to fit up our own kitchen right behind the chapel so that we will be able to prepare and serve complete hot meals to anyone who happens to be in the store when noon rolls around." At all other times, the tables are piled high with merchandise while the pricing committee does its work. The millinery and rug departments price their own goods, but every other article must pass through the chapel on its way to the salesrooms. At present sixteen women are handling the volume of work that passes through this department, but with the store staying open for a six-day week, the staff must be enlarged to twenty in order to keep the salesrooms full.

Although the regular workday is Tuesday, the store is open all week with a volunteer staff consisting of a supervisor, three saleswomen, and a cashier. The two large salesrooms are separated by the large hall where the cashier's desk has been set up. Both rooms are decorated in pale green with professional-looking racks for clothing built into the walls. One room is given over entirely to ladies-ready-to-wear with long tables of lingerie down the center of the room and a glass case to display quilt tops and costume jewelry. One corner has a built-in cupboard with glass doors to show the hats, and the table of hats by the window is as tastefully arranged as in an exclusive salon. There is nothing but the incredibly low prices to indicate that this is not an ordinary store. Here a woman may buy a dress for 50c, a hat for 75c and feel as well-dressed as any of her neighbors.

A door on one side of this salesroom leads to the men's department. Still rather small and incomplete, the organizers see a big future for it. Men need clothes, too, and the racks of shirts, odd coats, and trousers are a good beginning to supply the male half of the low-income group of Independence with attractive clothing.

The second large salesroom is given over to the baby department which fills one wall, and the children and junior departments. Little coats sell for 12c, dresses go for 30c, and a boy's first long trousers can be had for 45c. Close to the door, aprons are displayed on a table, and along another wall glass cases show off the art work and handmade quilts. Both rooms have full length plate-glass windows with the rugs displayed—braided, hooked, woven, crocheted, and Oriental.

Extending back from the second showroom is the household furnishings department where a young couple starting out can completely furnish their first home at prices they can afford. And opening off that is a narrow room with shoes on stands along one wall and books in cases along the other.

BACK upstairs in his office, Mr. Hield became enthusiastic about the Center. "It's amazing the amount of work that passes through our hands," he said. "We have thirty departments and a crew of 150 volunteer workers. There are about a dozen on our regular staff and only five of those are paid workers—that includes Mr. Brooks, our maintenance man, who lives in an apartment right here in the building."

But still more workers are needed. The most urgent need is for men who can repair furniture and electrical equipment ready for sale. "Our salesrooms are just getting started, but already we average $500 worth of sales a week. You can see we'll need workers to help us keep up with the increasing demand." With the low prices at the Center, it takes a tremendous number of articles to make up even $500 worth of sales.

Already plans are being made to expand the service. Regular routes for the truck pickups are being established around the city to replace the hit-and-miss system now used. Large paper bags are on order to replace the expensive canvas bags, and these will be placed in every home in the area. "Surplus" goods is what the Center is after. "And we like to think that anything, no matter what its condition, is surplus if no one is using it. A too-short dress or an outgrown suit of clothes is surplus to the owner, but we could certainly use it here. And we hope our church members will come to see it in that way soon." Even a sled down in the basement after the children are grown up is surplus in the eyes of Mr. Hield, and he covets it for the work in the Center.

"It's the same with time," Mrs. Rowland put in. "Most of our workers are elderly women who have time on their hands and they donate it to this cause. Our most crying need right now is to find more people who are willing to give their talents and surplus time to helping others." There is no age limit on the workers in this unique organization. The oldest is Mrs. Moore who, at 92, spends her Tuesdays raveling sweaters so that the yarn can be used in hooked rugs, and the youngest volunteers are the Oriole girls and teen-age boys who run errands to save elderly legs.

A Tribute to Gomer T. Griffiths

By J. CHARLES MAY

IT will take a year to get the new building completely fixed up to satisfy the plans Mr. Hield and Mrs. Rowland have for it. Already they have spent $20,000 from the Center treasury, and more money will be needed to finish the job. "Where does our money come from in a nonprofit store?" Mr. Hield smiled. "Well, it doesn't come from our customers, that's certain. We get some money from donations, but most of it comes from the luxury trade we have built up in fancy quilts, comforters, rugs, and art work. Everything else is sold at cost, unless a family honestly can't even pay our rates. Then it goes through the bishop's office, and when we get the proper requisition, we give the family everything it needs outright."

Another big hole in the Center's resources is made by the overseas orders which come in on an average of about five a day. These come in from the Bishopric and each shipment is filled with the best materials on hand. "It wouldn't be worth-while to send cheaper stuff and pay heavy postage on it." During the war the orders were in bulk and the Center donated over 40,000 pounds of clothing and 1,300 pairs of shoes to European aid. Now the requests are in behalf of individual families and ask for specific types and sizes of clothes. At first these orders were paid for by the Bishopric out of the oblation fund, but at present the Center is bearing the entire cost.

"We have been open for business here in the new building only a few weeks, but we'll be expanding from now on. We expand just as fast as people find out about us, and as we find out about the people who need our help. Perhaps you could explain what we're doing in this way. We believe that as long as people are cold and hungry, they aren't able to pay attention to their standard of living or take an interest in community affairs or care about religion. We want to see that their physical needs are taken care of so that they will feel like looking around and taking an interest in life and culture. The end goal, of course, is to help make life more abundant for them, both materially and spiritually.

Mr. Hield looked out his office window at the flat roof which some day will be built up into busy workrooms as the Social Service Center expands its work. "Social service is big business," he said thoughtfully. "Yes, you might say social service is good business."

DURING my first appointment to the Society Islands Mission (1909-1915) Apostle Gomer T. Griffiths and Elder C. Ed. Miller came to Tahiti and spent several weeks with us in the year 1912. A very wonderful work was done by these servants of God during their short visit, and the native Saints greatly mourn the passing of Brother Griffiths, known among them as "Gomera." They will never forget his kind, loving disposition and his powerful ministry among them. It was during his island visit that he ordained me to the office of seventy.

A group of the native Saints known as the pupu autabu'avaa, or priesthood company, had been cut off from the church at a mission conference several years before. This group numbered about seventy-two at the time of Brother Griffiths' visit. We had several visits with them during which Brother Griffiths showed much patience and kindness; through his labor of love and an admonition given by him to them through the Spirit of God, they decided to reunite with the church. Brother Griffiths led thirty-two of them, including three of their leaders, back into the church through baptism in the sea near the mission headquarters at Taronā. It was a great day for the island mission. There was much rejoicing, and the Spirit of God was there in power. As the natives feasted and sang, we were reminded of the feast for the prodigal son. Our returned brothers and sisters were received with out-stretched arms.

The forty remaining members of the group soon united with us. Brother Griffiths wrote an epistle for me to carry throughout the islands to the rest of the pupu people. Accompanied by a native elder, Tapu a Moana, I visited several islands, baptizing the remaining forty and many others. Among the pupu people were some of the very best members of the island mission, and we are happy to say that after their return into the fold they became very active and remained true to the church. The work done by our brother in his visit to Tahiti proved a boon to the whole mission, for during that year, including those rebaptized, 225 were added to the membership of the island mission.

ANOTHER wonderful experience which came to us during the visit of Apostle Griffiths and Brother Miller was our trip to the island of Takume during the pearl-diving season. We spent two weeks with the native Saints there who had gathered from various parts of the mission. An epidemic of dysentery was sweeping the island, and many of the natives were dying, but none of those administered to were taken by death. Our friends of the other churches noted this, and several of them also came for administration; not one of the seventy-five administered to died. Just the night before we left the island, we were called to the home of a native sister who was critically ill. When we reached the home, we found some of her relatives and friends weeping as though they were mourning her death. She had lost both weight and strength until it seemed that there was but a spark of life left. After administration she soon fell asleep. Early the next morning we left for Tahiti without knowing of her condition, but several months later at a mission conference in one of the upper islands, a native sister approached me and asked, "Do you remember me?" Upon answering that I did not, she replied, "I am the one that was administered to the night before you and 'Gomera' and 'Eduati' [Miller] left Takume for Tahiti." There standing before me was this sister, the very picture of health, testifying to the goodness of God. I rejoiced in knowing that every one of the many we had administered to were healed.

Brother Griffiths has often spoken of this experience as "an outstanding manifestation of God's power in healing."

THE visit of these brethren to the islands was well-timed. Elder Charles H. Lake, president of the mission, just a few months before had passed on to his reward. This was unknown to Brother Griffiths until he landed in Tahiti. His ministry and words of encouragement were much needed at that time.

I join with the many others who have paid tribute to Brother Gomer T. Griffiths in saying, "A good man, a man of God has passed on, and surely his reward shall be great."

The Pearl of Great Price

THE Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, referred to in this presentation as the Utah Church, has four standard books: the Holy Bible (King James Version), the Book of Mormon, the Doctrine and Covenants, and the Pearl of Great Price. From the fourth one comes several of the basic points of doctrine of that church. This article deals with the historical development of the book, which is, to the members of the Utah Church, a scriptural record.

Background

On page 472 of Essentials in Church History (Utah), by Joseph Fielding Smith, we find this account:

The organization of the First Presidency and the disfellowshippment of Lyman Wight, left four vacancies in the Council of Twelve. February 11, 1849, the First Presidency and apostles met in council at the home of Elder George B. Wallace to consider the filling of these vacancies. President Young nominated Elders Charles C. Rich, Lorenzo Snow, Erastus Snow, and Franklin D. Richards for these positions, which nominations were approved by the apostles. The following day at the home of Elder Wallace, they were ordained.

On January 1, 1851, this same Franklin D. Richards succeeded Orson Pratt as President of the European Mission.¹

During his first year as president of the European Mission, Apostle Richards published a mission pamphlet, "being a choice selection from the revelations, translations, and narrations of Joseph Smith, first prophet, seer, and revelator of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints."²

The preface of this mission pamphlet best explains the purpose of its being published, and also the meaning of the title:

The following compilation has been induced by the repeated solicitations of several friends of the publisher, who are desirous to be put in possession of the very important articles contained herein. Most of the Revelations composing this work were published at early periods of the church, when the circulation of its journals was so very limited as to render them comparatively unknown at present, except to a few who have treasured up the productions of the church with great care from the beginning. A smaller portion of this work has never before appeared in print; and altogether it is presumed that true believers in the divine mission of the Prophet Joseph Smith will appreciate this little collection of precious truths as a Pearl of Great Price that will increase their ability to maintain and to defend the holy faith by becoming possessors of it.

Although not adopted, nor designed, as a pioneer of the faith among unbelievers, still it will commend itself to all careful students of the Scriptures. . . .

Thus, in 1851, in Liverpool, England, Apostle Franklin D. Richards, acting on his own volition, published the Pearl of Great Price as a mission pamphlet. Including the original edition, there have been four major revisions published: 1851, 1878, 1902, and 1921.

On July 2, 1833, Joseph Smith finished correcting the Holy Bible, having made the corrections under the inspiration of God. This corrected version is called the Inspired Version, or more correctly, Holy Scriptures.

1851 Edition

The original edition of the Pearl of Great Price, published in 1851, contains twelve parts. The first part is titled "Extracts from the Prophecy of Enoch" and is dated December, 1830. In the comparison of several other works, it is noted that there are two accounts given under this same title, one quite a bit longer than the other. However, the longer account embodies all of the shorter account. The short account is found in Church History (Reorganized), Volume I, pages 160-164; History of the Church (Utah), Volume I, pages 133-139; Times and Seasons, Volume IV, pages 336-339; and Doctrine and Covenants (Reorganized), Section 36. The longer account is found in the 1851 edition of the Pearl of Great Price, and all subsequent editions, although not under this title. This longer account is verified in the Book of Moses 6:43-47; 69³ and in Genesis 6:45-7:78, Inspired Version.⁴

The second part of the 1851 edition is titled "The Words of God, which he spake unto Moses . . ." and is dated June, 1830. This account is the same as the revelation given in the forepart of the Inspired Version, which is also section 22 of the Doctrine and Covenants (Reorganized), and Times and Seasons, Volume IV, pages 71-73.

The Book of Abraham

The third part of the 1851 edition is "a translation of some ancient records that have fallen into our hands from the catacombs of Egypt, purporting to be the writings of Abraham while he was in Egypt, called the Book of Abraham, written by his own hand, upon papyrus."⁵ This same account is found in Times and Seasons, Volume III, numbers 9 and 10, March 1 and March 15, 1842, respectively, beginning on page 704 and continuing intermittently through these two numbers. It is also recorded in the Millennial Star, Volume III, number 3, July, 1842, pages 33-36, and concluding in the August, 1842 issue; and the History of the Church (Utah), Volume IV, pages 520-534.

By RICHARD A. NIES

The "Book of Abraham" is not given as such in the Church History (Reorganized), but there are several references to it made therein.

These extracts, as we understand, are from a translation of a roll of manuscript found with some Egyptian mummies purchased of a traveler who visited Kirtland, Ohio, a few years ago for the purpose of exhibiting the mummies. The church has never to our knowledge taken any action on this work, either to indorse or condemn; so it cannot be said to be a church publication; nor can the church be held to answer for the correctness of its teachings. Joseph Smith, as the translator, is committed of course to the correctness of the translation, but not necessarily to the indorsement of its historical or doctrinal contents.—Volume II, page 569.

The fourth part is "an extract from a translation of the Bible, being the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew, commencing with the last verse of the twenty-third chapter, King James Version."⁶ The translation referred to is the Inspired Version, and this extract is Matthew 23:39; 24:56, Inspired Version.

The fifth part is "a key to the Revelation of St. John."⁷ This account is section 77, Doctrine and Covenants (Utah), being one of the twenty-five sections added to the Utah Doctrine and Covenants in 1876, but dated before the death of Joseph Smith, Jr. It may also be found in History of the Church (Utah), Volume I, pages 253-255.

The sixth part is "a revelation and prophecy by the Prophet, Seer, and Revelator, Joseph Smith . . ."⁸ This account is section 87, Doctrine and Covenants (Utah), also being one of the twenty-five sections mentioned but dated before the death of Joseph Smith, Jr. This revelation is concerning the Civil War, and can be found in the Church History (Reorganized), Volume I, pages 261-263, and in the History of the Church (Utah), Volume I, pages 301, 302.

The seventh part consists of extracts from the history of Joseph Smith, as found in Times and Seasons, Volume III, pages 726-728, 748, 749, 753, 754, 771-773, 832, 865, 866, and in Church History, (Reorganized), Volume I, pages 6-19, 29, 30, 34-37. This seventh part includes an account by Oliver Cowdery as recorded in Times and Seasons, Volume II, page 201. The first paragraph of this account may be found in Church History (Reorganized), Volume I, page 33.

The eighth part is a series of quotations from the 1835 edition of Doctrine and Covenants.

The ninth part is an extract from a revelation given in July, 1830. (The exact month of this revelation is somewhat confusing; July, August, and September are to be found.)

The tenth part is "An Account of the Rise of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints."

The eleventh part is taken from Times and Seasons, Volume III, page 709. At a later date, with one major alteration, this account was titled "Articles of Faith." As given, it may also be found in Church History (Reorganized) Volume II, pages 569, 570.

The twelfth part is the poem "Truth," by John Jaques, now furnishing the words to the beautiful "Mormon" hymn, "O Say What Is Truth?"

It is apparent that this mission pamphlet by Franklin D. Richards was officially recognized, for in 1857 President Brigham Young placed a copy of it in the Temple archives.⁹

At the time of its first publication, there were more church members in England than there were in Utah. In 1878, after the population in Utah had grown to over 140,000 people, the Pearl of Great Price was published in America for the first time.

1878 Edition

The contents of the 1878 edition are in the large the same as the 1851 edition, but there are a few changes, which we shall note. In all, there are eleven main parts to the 1878 edition.

The tenth part is the "revelation" of the eternity of the marriage covenant, including plurality of wives. This "revelation" is section 132 of the Doctrine and Covenants (Utah), and the only other place it is to be found is in the History of the Church (Utah).

On October 10, 1880, two years after the publication of this edition, the Pearl of Great Price was canonized by the Utah Church. We quote the account of this event.

President George Q. Cannon said: "I hold in my hand the book of Doctrine and Covenants and also the book The Pearl of Great Price, which books contain revelations of God. In Kirtland, the Doctrine and Covenants in its original form, as first printed, was submitted to the officers of the Church and the members of the Church to vote upon. As there have been additions made to it by the publishing of revelations which were not contained in the original edition, it has been deemed wise to submit these books with their contents to the Conference, to see whether the Conference will vote to accept the books and their contents as from God, and binding upon us as a people and as a Church.

President Joseph F. Smith said, "I move that we receive and accept the revelations contained in these books as revelations from God to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints and to all the world."

The motion was seconded and sustained by unanimous vote of the whole conference.¹⁰

In the act of canonizing the Pearl of Great Price the "Articles of Faith," as contained therein, became Scripture. In the 1878 edition, the articles were identical with the account given in the Times and Seasons. However, on October 6, 1890, the "Articles of Faith" were accepted as Scripture in and of themselves. The only account we have been able to find is on page 128 of Utah Pioneer and Apostle Marriner Wood Merrill and His Family, by Melvin C. Merrill, which account we quote:

Bishop Orson F. Whitney then read the Articles of Faith, when they were adopted by the Conference by vote.

"Don't Worry" - By Marie Goslinc

IT IS NEEDLESS to say to many, "Now, I don't worry. Everything will come out all right," for these are perilous times in which we are living. It is natural that we should feel deep concern because we are about to be thrown into another great conflict, and the same boys who saw us through the last war, and who are now buying their homes and trying to re-establish themselves, are being called back into the service. It is only normal that we should feel great anxiety not alone for ourselves, but for those who must go to the front.

However, it is a regrettable fact that our worries are multiplied because we have not learned to pray and put our trust in God. The world in which we live today is really something to worry about, but how much happier we would be if we could put our faith in him, knowing he will take care of everything, that his purposes will be fulfilled.

These are big worries. But many of us today are "little worriers"—we are chronic "little worriers." We are constantly on the alert ready to start worrying about something. We are like the story of the "Little Red Hen" in the first-year reader.

Under the direction of President Joseph F. Smith, Apostle Dr. James E. Talmage completely revised the Pearl of Great Price, motivating the third major revision in 1902. In his work of revision, Dr. Talmage used an 1878 edition, marking his recommended changes in it. His copy is now in the Brigham Young University library.

Dr. Talmage was instrumental in the printing of the fourth major edition of the Pearl of Great Price in 1921. The wording and make-up of this edition is the same as the 1902 edition, but it is considered to be a major revision because it is the first edition published in double-column pages with a general index, and it is the edition in use today.

A bit of something falls on our heads, and we are off to tell the king and set our tiny world in turmoil!

Too many of us have not learned to take one thing at a time—to go step by step. We are like the young bride who, in the early morning after she sends her husband to work, stands in the middle of the floor and says, "Six guests coming to dinner. I have to vacuum the rug, dust the piano, pick the flowers, peel the potatoes, snap the beans. Oh, what'll I do first? What'll I do!"

There is no evidence Jesus ever worried. He lived day by day as his Father would have him live. He took one step at a time. He never crossed bridges until he arrived at them. He didn't make mountains out of molehills. He knew that nothing could be accomplished by worry, but that much could be wrought through prayer. He knew that back of him was God, his Father and his Rock to lean upon.

Our Father is still the Commander of his Army, and no battle was ever won through worry. Many battles—more than we can count—have been won through prayer.

Question Time

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. Address questions to Herald Editors rather than panel members. We shall try to take all questions in the order they are received. Be patient, there may be several ahead of yours. Only signed questions sent by contributors will appear here.—EDITOR.

QUESTION:

Do the Scriptures teach progression after death?

Missouri

G. W. B.

ANSWER:

If by "progression" you mean individual development in personality, including knowledge, wisdom, capability, and power, the answer is yes.

Life is progressive activity in those qualities which mark the divine character. There is no stagnation with God, and none of his works remain still. Man was made to go on to higher things, this life in the world being but a period of beginning and a preparation for a more extended development. It is said by the Lord:

I delight to honor those who serve me in righteousness and in truth to the end; great shall be their reward, and eternal shall be their glory; and to them will I reveal all mysteries; yea, all the hidden mysteries of my kingdom from days of old; and for ages to come will I make known unto them the good pleasure of my will concerning all things pertaining to my kingdom; yea, even the wonders of eternity shall they know, and things to come will I show them, even the things of many generations; their wisdom shall be great, and their understanding reach to heaven.—Doctrine and Covenants 76: 2.

Again he has said, "The day shall come when you shall comprehend even God."

If the question is intended to apply to the passing of souls from one degree of glory to another, or from one realm to another, I must as confidently answer no. Little is written upon this point but what is written is against it. The three glories described in Scripture are three separate realms, occupied by three distinct classes of humanity, the highest being the celestial, then the terrestrial, and finally the telestial. All three of these groups attain salvation in the kingdom of God, even the lowest having a glory which at present is incomprehensible, yet each removed so far from the others that there is no intermingling except as God sends messengers from the higher to minister to those in the lower realms. Of the telestial it is written, "Where God and Christ dwell they cannot come, worlds without end." There is no progression to a higher glory for the telestial.

The impossibility of the lower being able to reach the higher is not because God has arbitrarily denied them, but because "He who is not able to abide the law of a celestial kingdom, can not abide a celestial glory; and he who is not able to abide the law of a terrestrial kingdom, can not abide a terrestrial glory." Such, the Lord says, must inherit another kingdom. This truth is couched by the Lord in the parable of the sower relative to the good seed which was planted in fertile soil and brought forth fruit, "some thirty-fold, some sixty, and some a hundred." A thirty or a sixtyfold head of wheat when it is ripe cannot be transformed into one of a hundredfold. The terrestrially redeemed cannot abide a celestial glory. Paul says of even the bodies of men, that there are "celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial, and bodies telestial," and assures us they are distinct and their glory different (I Corinthians 15: 40). The Lord also tells us that human quickening in the resurrection comes by three different degrees of glory, and that each class ultimately receives a fullness of that glory by which it was quickened (Doctrine and Covenants 85: 6). Each must abide its own glory.

It may be asked if there be individual progression after death, why is it that men in the lower glories cannot in time qualify for the higher. The answer is that God has appointed this life of mortality as the time of man's probation and preparation, and each man by his life's works determines what his status will be in the eternal world, and which realm he will be in. Some have thought that because repentance and remission are possible to some in the spirit world that thereby all the possibilities of the gospel are renewed to them there. But not so; for while salvation results from their obedience, their reward or glory is determined by their works in this life. Men are to be rewarded according to the works done in the flesh and not those in the spirit. Personal progression is within the limits of the glory

QUESTION:

Could it have been possible for three-thousand souls to have been baptized on the day of Pentecost?

Minn.

M. P.

ANSWER:

Easily. The apostles were not alone, for there were many disciples at Jerusalem at that time including "his brethren"—that is the four brothers of Jesus. The number gathering for daily prayer including some women was 120, among whom there must have been a considerable number of the ministry with authority to baptize. Only a few weeks before great crowds of the faithful celebrated Jesus' entry into Jerusalem.

CHARLES FRY.

QUESTION:

Were there deacons in Christ's church when he was on earth?

Nebraska

M. H. H.

ANSWER:

Paul speaks of the "office of a deacon" as existing in the church in his day (I Timothy 3: 10, 13), and deacons are mentioned in several other places; but whether deacons had been already installed in the lifetime of Christ is not certain.

The New Testament does not record the exact date of the founding or organization of the church. Many hold it was set up on the day of Pentecost though we see no grounds for such belief, and since Jesus speaks in Matthew 16: 19 of building his church, and in chapter eighteen regarding the law of offenses that unrepentant offenders shall be cited to the church for trial, we cannot believe otherwise than that the church had its beginnings early in Christ's ministry, or perhaps even in John's ministry. The church of that day was undoubtedly of progressive organization, that is, officers were added from time to time as the growth of the body made possible. Under Christ the apostles were chosen first; it was considerably later that the seventy were called. Again it was not until a considerable time after Pentecost that seven men, commonly called bishops or deacons, were chosen to care for temporalities.

The essential fact is that the "office" of deacon was in the New Testament church, being provided for by the divine mind which designed the organic form of his church, filling this and other offices as conditions required, and as qualified men were available.

Communities for Better Living

Reviewed by Nora Moser

Communities for Better Living: Citizen Achievement in Organization, Design, and Development, by James Dahir. New York; Harper and Brothers; 321 pages; $4.

PLANNED communities are not confined to the books of Utopian dreamers and the dead or dying efforts of idealistic religious sects. A surprising number exist right here in the United States today, some dating from as long ago as 1869. More are under construction; for example the Washington Post of July 23, 1950, carried this story: "517 Acres Sold Near Weaton, Maryland, 2,450 Homes Slated. The Gelman Construction Company will build three-bedroom brick ramblers on the land, to sell for less than $10,000. Provisions for a shopping center, schools, playgrounds, and churches are being made." Such a development will house about 10,000 people and care for most of their daily needs except a place to work.

Communities for Better Living is an excellent introduction to the subject of community planning for the layman and a valuable up-to-date survey for the specialist. Very readable in style, it tells what has been done, is being done, and can be done in designing new communities and improving existing ones for the benefit of the people who live in them. The book left me feeling good, feeling that positive Zionism is feasible now, with what we have and the people we have in Zion, in the designated stakes, and elsewhere. More than that, I know in a general way how and where to start, for "how to" is emphasized all through the book and there is a bibliography of 451 items of more specific information.

Mr. Dahir treats both urban and rural communities, with accent properly on the urban because a majority of Americans live in towns and cities. He ranges from backyard clean-up campaigns to the building of an entire new community for 50,000 people on a unified plan. He sets up a standard to be met regardless of the economic or cultural state of the residents: "People shall not be overcrowded; they shall not be disturbed by through traffic and their district shall be made as safe as possible for pedestrians and especially for children; they shall have near-by play spaces and neighborhood parks, equipped and manned to the best of the whole community's (not the neighborhood's) ability to pay; there shall be schools for small children near by, centrally located, and not overcrowded; that daily shopping needs can be satisfied with convenience in location and number of stores; that if industry is near by it shall have no nuisance character and that smoke and fumes shall be controlled religiously; that centers for the use of voluntary groups for cultural and recreational purposes shall be available and that the participants shall have a voice in their administration."

Among the communities described in the book are: Country Club District, Kansas City; Baldwin Hills Village, Los Angeles; Garden City, Sunnyside, and Levittown, Long Island; Norris, Tennessee; Greenbelt, Maryland; Mid West City, Oklahoma; Wynnewood, near Dallas, Texas; and Fresh Meadows, New York. Any of these is well worth a visit after one has learned from the book what features to look for.

LARGE new developments on raw land must, of course, be undertaken by mass production contractors, insurance companies, philanthropic foundations, or government agencies. Improvement of conditions in existing communities, however, is up to the citizens living in them. The best means, according to this author, is a citizens' council composed of representatives of all possible existing community organizations. The first thing to be done is to find out what the current problems are and set up a priority list. It is well to start with fairly small projects having a high probability of successful accomplishment. Thus the council can quickly acquire a record of achievement. Such projects might be safety measures on a highway, playground space, or improved bus service. In general full responsibility should not be left permanently on the volunteer leaders who must necessarily begin the council; some paid personnel should be obtained, office space provided, and measures taken to insure the continuity for carrying through long-range projects. A citizens' council can usually be more stable than the local government which is subject to being turned out by the opposite party at the next election. Every advantage should be taken of the several good sources of help outside the community. Some of these are universities, the Farm Bureau, county agents, and state extension services. Arkansas and Kentucky have statewide development programs. Several small communities in the same area may well co-operate in unified development and in order to pay for expert services. Such development will cost money, of course, in bond issues, increased taxes, or direct assessments, but even hardheaded businessmen have found it pays off.

The ordinary commercially-developed community is planned primarily to meet the physical needs of the population, but Mr. Dahir maintains that the social needs are not divisible from the physical. A good physical setup will promote social intercourse of the inhabitants, and people who get to know each other will work together to preserve the physical amenities. A good community is one where the people will want to keep on living and where their children will want to settle down when they are grown. This is the grain of social truth behind the rather frantic efforts of moneyed interests to preserve property values.

It has been found that although any given community may have a large number of organizations such as fraternal orders, garden clubs, Rotary, and churches, there is much duplication of membership. Some persons belong to a dozen organizations, while perhaps a third of the town belongs to none and participates in no part of the community life. These people undoubtedly have interests and abilities which they would share with others if the conditions were favorable. A community for better living of all its members will draw such people into activities which will benefit both them and their neighbors.

A HEALTHY community is not a one-class community economically; it includes all income levels, though not necessarily in the same neighborhood. A neighborhood unit, as used by Mr. Dahir, is the area served by one elementary school, or about 5,000 people. It has shopping facilities for most daily needs. A community is composed of several neighborhoods, has more elaborate shops and recreational enterprises, and up to 50,000 or so people. A community should not grow in population much beyond this mark; rather, a new community should be started. The Garden City plan promoted by Sir Ebenezer Howard in England is mentioned in this connection. Included in the community's land, in addition to internal playgrounds and parks, is a peripheral area which is to remain perpetually in small farms or park space so that the city dwellers may not be too far removed from rural life and the farm people may be near the benefits of the city. The city is limited to an optimum size by the inviolable belt of green. Disorderly "ribbon development" along highways leading from the town is prevented.

Churches are recognized by the author as one of the community organizations whose support for civic betterment is to be obtained, but he found no example worthy of mention where a church had played an important role in community building. Latter Day Saints have an open field. Schools, however, are a different matter. The elementary school of the neighborhood can become the community center. An example is cited where the teachers are employed on a year-round basis and are given commensurate extra pay for carrying on adult educational recreational activities outside of regular school hours. The school building is in use every night of the week.

Most of the communities described were dependent for employment on a near-by city, but industry can be and is being persuaded to place new plants convenient to a community where the workers can live in comfort and permanence, without traveling long distances to work daily. This also ties in with proposed decentralization for atomic defense.

If all these things can be done by secular agencies motivated by nothing more than enlightened self-interest, what a wonderful place Zion can be! Zion, whatever the details of its plan, is a community for better living, and the kind of community described here is a minimum for Zion.

Experiences of a Missionary to my discomfort. When daylight came I started down the mountain, and after walking some sixteen miles in which I blistered my feet, I succeeded in reaching camp again. While on Mt. Rainier we visited the Cowlitz and Nisqually glaciers. Even now after many years I can hear them grinding large rocks into pebbles as they scored down the side of the mountain. It was an interesting experience, and I think I realize more now than I ever did what it means to remove mountains by faith and prayer.

The Power of Stillness

One evening several years ago, I was sitting by myself wondering and worrying whether or not I should change by place of employment, which I did not like very well. Finally the sweet spirit of the Master came to me with the words: "Be still and know that I am God." In less than two weeks' time, a nice position was offered me and I have been happy with it.

Sometimes it is a very difficult thing for us to be still and let God speak. Is there any note of music in all the chorus as mighty as the emphatic pause? Is there anything more exciting and awful than the hush that comes before the bursting of the tempest or the strange stillness just before an earthquake?

Not long ago I was eating in a quaint little French restaurant. The three or four musicians who made up the small orchestra played incessantly, and how nice it was . . . when they stopped for a while. How often I have wished during a Communion or prayer service that we could have a little less talk and music and be still and let God speak to us in that still, small voice.

We cannot go through life strong and fresh on constant fast trains, with ten or fifteen minutes for lunch; we must have quiet hours also, and secret places where we may wait upon the Lord. The most important thing about this stillness is that it gives God a chance to work. When we open our minds, God's thoughts come to us.

There is another kind of stillness that tells us to cease when we are angry and would speak a cruel or unkind word. Here again we can let God take care of the situation in his own way. We need but remember the silent Savior, answering not a word to the men falsely accusing him. He, the Lamb of God, stood still while they did their worst.

Faith Brings Results

Since suffering an accident about a year ago, I have been a patient at the Allen Rest Home. I am better now and hope to be able to return to my own home soon. Although I am not active in church work now, I can still bear witness of God's power. Life was hard for me after my husband, Dallas C. Moore, was killed in a car accident. My sons were good to me and the neighbors were kind, but I kept asking, "Why?" I still have not learned why, but I have discovered God's power to help when problems seem too great for human solving.

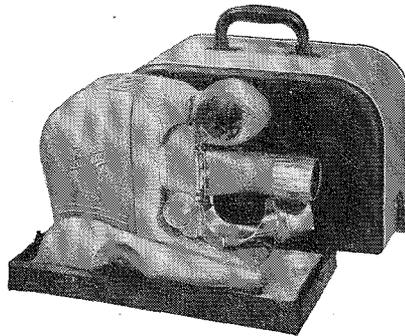

One of the patients here at the home is mentally deranged. When he is locked in his room, he sometimes screams and pounds on the door. It is terrible to listen to, but I have found that when I pray for God to help this man find peace, he soon quiets down. God has the power to help people today the same as in ages past. I am praying that he will completely heal me, but I have learned that God takes his time, so I am not impatient. Surely he "doeth all things well."

The Spoken Word - Part IV

"Out of the Abundance of the Heart"

By FLOY L. BENNETT

SEVERAL years ago when I was young enough to be considerably impressed with the audacity of a certain minister who was specifically assigned to work with young people, there was a little friendly (maybe a little less than friendly) exchange of ideas at our district reunion which I have never forgotten.

Brother Zest was enthusiastically and happily leading a discussion with a group of young people one afternoon. As too often happens, these young people were not privileged to make it an exclusively young people's meeting; several adults had found seats in the back, some of them well past the age of three-score and ten. Young people do occasionally have problems which they like to discuss with someone who is impartial and understanding. On this occasion that age-old question of Sunday baseball arose. Of course the youngsters were seeking the approval of their leader and adviser, and he was not being particularly harsh. In the midst of the discussion, elderly Sister Jenkins rose to her feet to express her opinion. She condemned, without qualification, such "devil-sponsored activities" as baseball on Sunday.

Brother Zest was annoyed. He was prepared to discourage but not to veto the Sunday baseball idea. Sister Jenkins upset his equilibrium so he rose to his full and considerable height and said, "Sister Jenkins, baseball may not be the most desirable activity for Sunday afternoon, but I consider it does much less harm than a group of old ladies can do sitting on someone's front porch gossiping." Sister Jenkins was deflated and grumblingly took her seat.

THIS incident has stayed with me, a vivid memory, all through the years. Through the years too, the truth of the minister's statement has had many verifications. Webster defines gossip as "an idle tattler; a news-monger" and again as "groundless rumor." Gossiping is not limited to any particular age-group nor to a particular sex. Gossip is like a disease that affects, especially, the individuals who have personal feelings of inferiority and insecurity. Sometimes gossip is deliberately malicious; but more often it is just idle talk, the harvest of poorly furnished or unthinking minds and starved hearts. The injury which comes to others because of his thoughtlessness seldom touches the offender. It is well for all of us to read often the biblical warning, "But I say unto you, that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment. For by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned."

Unless we are one of these rare individuals who pause to think carefully before he speaks, our speech reflects what is in our hearts more accurately than what is in our minds. Especially is this true in informal conversation among friends. If on our desks, work tables, telephone stands, luncheon and dinner tables, we could have a placard before us bearing the inscription, "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," we might find challenge to check on ourselves. What is in the heart? Do we clutch with jealous zeal such qualities as envy, hatred, bitterness, sorrow, fear, prejudice? If we do, it will show. No mask is clever enough to hide these unpleasant occupants of the heart and mind. If the heart is full of love, kindness, gratitude, understanding, tolerance, generosity, joy, and serenity, they will show just as conspicuously and the glow will be reflected in our speech just as surely.

An oft-repeated maxim is "Silence is golden," but it is the misuse of speech which has popularized it. Silence can sometimes be the greatest rebuff one can employ. Speech wisely and kindly used may heal a broken spirit or help a doubting youth tie his goal to the stars.

ONE of the greatest boons to personality development and personal, as well as general, happiness is a grateful heart. Sincere feelings of appreciation should be cultivated and spoken. Our families and friends give us so much cause to be grateful. God gives us infinitely more. If we have been taught to recognize those gifts and express our appreciation often, we are indeed blessed, "for by our words we shall be justified."

It is not at all likely that we ever hear a sermon, a solo, a rendition by the choir, or a church school class lecture that has nothing good about it. More often than not these things are mostly good; yet, we are aware of the perpetual critic; the only comment we hear from him is concerning the weak point, the false note, or the wrong thing about the performance. Is he jealous, envious, unkind, or does he just attempt to advertise his own superiority by announcing that the defects were obvious to him? He speaks out of the abundance of his heart. Do not chastise him; be sorry for him. He is poor in the qualities of character that enrich the soul.

Have we noticed the magnificence and glory of creation lately? Have we expressed our gratitude for health, friends, a good job? Have we spoken a generous word of praise and thanks to the pastor, the choir leader, the church school teacher? Have we been vocal in expressing our appreciation of Mother's culinary and housekeeping skill recently? Have we told Dad we have some understanding of his efforts to provide the physical comforts for the family, and we love him for it? Have we noticed the many things done for our happiness and comfort every-day by others? And have we been grateful enough for all these gifts? If we are truly thankful, we have actually spoken this thankfulness, for "out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth speaketh."

The spoken word, how potent it is! It can hurt; it can heal. It can excite hatred; it can engender love. It can stir up excitement; it can quiet hysteria. It can destroy a home; it can help build the kingdom of God in us. The tongue is merely a tool, subject to the mind and heart of man. Cultivate, then, the better qualities of mind and spirit because experience has taught us that "out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth speaketh."

The San Contributes to the Zion Home

A talk given at the meeting of Women's Department Leaders, held at the Stone Church on May 2, 1950, by Nelle Morgan, R.N., Director of Nurses, Independence Sanitarium and Hospital.

THE subject of building Zion homes has been a challenge to me these past several years. I have given it a great deal of thought since I came to the Sanitarium seven years ago to be the director of nurses. Many people come to my office in the course of a year, a number of them from Independence, others from various parts of the country. Frequently the conversation turns to the establishment of Zion.

The concepts of Zion are as varied as the people who express them. Most persons agree that the home must be the basis of Zion living. This leads us to the question, What is a Zion home and how does it become such?

Is freedom from want the criterion by which to judge such a status? Does having every member of the family belong to the church make it a Zion home? Does the reading of the Three Books do it? In many homes all of these things may be found, yet they are not Zion homes. One or two good characteristics do not make the home a good church home.

What is my concept of such a home? To adequately describe my thoughts would take more time and space than are allotted to me here. Just a few thoughts should suffice to form a basis for what I wish to say later in regard to student-nurse education at the San.

I believe that the Zion home is one in which the family members are unselfish—they are concerned with the good of all. This interest goes beyond the family and includes all peoples. Everybody works in such a home; there is no room for the lazy. Health in this home is a way of life, not just some far-distant ideal to be talked about. The individuals are physically and mentally clean. Education and study are a vital part of the family life. And last, but far from least, each member of the family must strive for spiritual peace and satisfaction.

Now, what are we doing at the San to help establish such homes? We are a church institution. Many of us working there are not mothers, but I believe we have just as definite a part in building Zion as you mothers have, and we are earnestly endeavoring to fulfill that obligation.

WE have a school of nursing at the San. Seventy young women there are being educated in professional nursing. The school is a good one professionally. It is accredited by the Missouri State Board of Nurse Examiners. The girls are well cared for physically; they have frequent physical examinations, including chest X rays; their diets are planned by a dietitian. The graduates of the school have no difficulty in finding positions. I frequently get letters from employers saying, "We have had your nurses with us before, and we would like another one now. They are good nurses and can be depended upon."

Nursing is good preparation for living. The young girl in a school of nursing learns the basic principles of nutrition; she knows how and what to feed the family. She learns how to care for the physical ill. She learns the principles of prevention of illness. She has experience in caring for children. She has courses in mental hygiene which help her in handling the mental health of the family. She is taught good housekeeping and is expected to put these principles into practice. In all of this preparation for living, we believe we are doing a good job at the San.

What are we doing for the girl's spiritual development? Here, I believe, is where you good people can play an important part. There is one club in town that is very definitely assisting with this part of our program. The O. K. Club is composed of former Gracelanders who belonged to either the K Club or the O.O.H. Club while at Graceland College. This club sponsors a "town mother" program for our students. Many of these girls are a long distance from home, and they get pretty homesick. When one is homesick she is more likely to do things and go places that she wouldn't otherwise. The club, with the assistance of myself and Chaplain Lents, assigns each student to a home—a home that has volunteered to serve in this capacity and in which the members of the family are interested in helping young girls. We need good church homes to offer this service. These girls need someone, who is not connected with the school, with whom they can discuss their problems, someone who is interested in them as individuals. This fall we will have thirty-six new students who will need homes in Independence. If you would like to assist with this project, call Mrs. Pauline Siegfried Fowler, president of the O.K. Club. She will be glad to hear from you.

Another way in which you can be very helpful is to make these girls feel at home in our Independence churches. You come to the hospital as patients, as visitors, and you see the girls there. Perhaps you are not formally introduced to them, but you know they are student nurses. Speak to them. Don't wait for the nurse to speak to you. Maybe she did take care of you every day for two weeks, but you look very different when you have on your dress-up clothes and your make-up from what you did lying in bed in that white gown.

YOU women of the church can be of great assistance to the San. Besides helping to develop the students already enrolled there, you can use your influence to encourage more young women to enroll in the School of Nursing. Our fall class is not yet filled; if you know some qualified young lady who is interested in nursing, or who would benefit by such preparation, talk to her about being a nurse and about enrolling at the San.

The qualifications necessary to make a girl a good nurse and for her to be happy in nursing are that she be in good health, have a love for all peoples, and like to serve them. She must like to work and study, and she must have good moral character. The other requirements are that she be at least seventeen years of age and a graduate of an accredited high school. If you know such a young lady, talk to her about nursing, send us her name, and we will gladly get in touch with her.

You will, also, be helping her to prepare for building a Zion home. You know Christ was always interested in caring for the physical man. Many of the parables have to do with feeding man and healing his physical ill. The School of Nursing helps with this part of the Zion program, by educating young women to take this responsibility. We appreciate your interest and assistance.

SWEET HOME, OREGON.—The women's department was organized under the leadership of Sister Maude Bowser, and those present studied the booklet, "Through Days of Preparation." Officers are preparing the yearbook for the next meetings. The women's group sponsored a bazaar at which needlework and homemade candy were sold. Proceeds went toward the building fund.

An institute was held in April with district leaders giving valuable instruction. Leaders present were: Elder and Mrs. Miles Whiting, Elder and Mrs. Harold C. Carpenter, and Youth Leader Chet Gregory. Dinner was served by the women's department.

The church sponsored a pie social, the proceeds of which finished paying for the site of a new church home.

Several young people attended the youth camp at Lewis River in July.

A Thursday night class is being taught by Sister Goldie O'Dell. Study taken is Book of Mormon Studies, by Thelona Stevens. Several in attendance are studying for credit.

Baptismal services were held July 16 with Elder and Mrs. Roy Kieser attending from Vancouver, Washington. Those baptized were James Phelps and daughter Violet, Barbara Ward, and David Holden.—Reported by NELLIE WALBERG.

KIMBALL, ONTARIO.—The Petrolia and Kimball Branches jointly held a Children's Day rally. The priesthood of the two branches conducted the services, assisted by James Kelly of Chatham and William Smith of Sarnia. Eight were baptized in the church font and confirmed in the following service. A basket lunch was served in the basement and a program was held in the afternoon.—Reported by W. KIMBALL.

COLEMAN, MICHIGAN.—Evangelist Edward R. Carter from Lansing conducted a baptismal service July 21. Following the baptismal service, the six candidates were confirmed under the direction of Pastor Jason Methner.—Reported by RAY MOGG.

CENTRAL BRANCH, PORTLAND, OREGON.—On July 16, the newly-purchased church at S. E. 25th and Madison Street was dedicated. Services began with a prayer service in charge of Pastor J. L. Verhei. A solo, "Bless This House," was rendered by Lloyd Shannon.

Church school followed the prayer service. Lloyd Shannon, district church school director, and Elder Harold Carpenter of Vancouver, Washington, were in charge. The adult class was taught by Elder Granville Swenson, president of the Seattle District.

M. E. Lasater, bishop of the Northwest District, was the speaker at the 11:00 o'clock hour. His subject was, "The Church, Its Progress, Its Goal." The service was in charge of Elder Reuben Porter, assisted by Evangelist Mark Yeoman, both of the Central Branch, and Elder Lester Comer, pastor of the Southeast Portland Branch. A solo was rendered by Adah Mueller.

Basket lunch was served in the lower auditorium by the women's department of the Central Branch. At 2:00 p.m., the following were baptized: Kathleen L., daughter of Brother and Sister Lyle Lawler; Dale, son of Brother and Sister Carl Dvorak; Nadine, daughter of Ralph Auld; and Elmer Hicks, of the Central Branch; Ina, daughter of Harvey Clark of the First Portland Branch; and Genevieve Ziesing and Nila Johson of the Southeast Branch. A solo was sung by Elaine Gollehan of Hood River, Oregon, and an additional song was sung by several children of the Central Branch. Services were in charge of the pastor, assisted by Elder Comer of the Southeast Branch, and Priests O. V. Coop of Estacada and Chas. M. Gollehan of Hood River, Oregon.

At 3:00 o'clock confirmation services were held for those baptized, and also for the blessing of the following children: Chester Bruce and Deloris Rosalie, children of Brother and Sister Elmer Hicks and John Wallace and Martin Edmond, children of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Larsen, all of Central Branch. Services were in charge of the pastor, assisted by Evangelist Mark Yeoman and Elders Elwin Vest, Reuben Porter, Clark Livingston, and Lester Comer. Elder Granville Swenson of the Seattle District was the speaker of the services.

Open house was held from 4:30 to 6:30 in the afternoon for those present from other branches, and those visiting from the neighborhood. Refreshments were served, and all had a chance to visit with friends.

A play entitled "The Three Nephites" was presented at 6:30 by the Zion's League under the direction of Darlene McGrew and Lois Nelson. Those taking part in the play were: Doyle Mathewson, Robert Lasbaugh, Delmer Ray, Shirley Dvorak, June Forsyth, Mark Yeoman, Wayne Lapworth, and Cecil Roley. Musical numbers for the play were sung by Adah Mueller, Mattie Young, Vergie Mathewson, Lloyd Shannon, and Ray Nelson.

Missionary Elwin Vest was the evening speaker, and his subject was "What Are We Building Today?" In charge of the service was Elder Cecil Roley, assisted by Elders Clark Livingston, pastor of Oregon City, and Charles Asher, pastor of Salem, Oregon. Lloyd Shannon sang the very beautiful song, "Under His Wings." Approximately 300 were in attendance during the day.

Annual election of officers was held July 20. The following were elected: Elder J. L. Verhei, branch president; Elders Reuben Porter and Cecil Roley, counselors; Mattie Young, historian and secretary; Wayne Lapworth, treasurer and solicitor; Mike Ray, auditor; Lloyd Shannon, church school director; Effie Verhei, womens' leader; Vergie Mathewson, youth leader; Adah Mueller, music leader; Kathleen A. Lawler, publicity agent; Lyle Lawler, librarian; and Cecil Roley, Wayne Lapworth, Mike Ray, Lloyd Shannon, and Reuben Porter, appropriation and finance board.—Reported by KATHLEEN A. LAWLER.

ROCK ISLAND, ILLINOIS.—Deborah Mickey and Sandra Diane, daughters of Mr. and Mrs. Bobby Angell, were blessed June 4 by Elders Seibert Chesnutt and Lee White, and Elders L. W. Stiegel and Harry Eckwright, respectively. Rebecca Jane, infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Wesley McKay, was blessed July 30 by Elders L. W. Stiegel and E. R. Williams. Kent Richard, infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Richard Sackfield, was blessed July 30 by Elders E. J. Lennox and E. R. Williams.

Vacation Church School was held June 12 through June 22 under the supervision of Evelyn McKee, Winifred Stiegel, and Laurel Jordan. There was a staff of twenty-three workers to care for the sixty-eight children who were enrolled.

Ordination services were held on the mornings of Sunday, July 16 and July 23. Those ordained July 16 were: Clyde McKee to the office of elder; Gerald Taylor and Harold Braun to the office of priest; and Merlyn Williams to the office of teacher. John Hinkle, Kenneth Stiegel, Daryl McKee, and Richard Bowen were ordained to the office of deacon on July 23.

The movie projector purchased by the women's department is being well used. One Sunday night a month, a religious film is shown. The response has been very good.

The young people held an ice cream social on the church lawn, Friday, July 21, to raise money for the church building fund.

Cottage meetings are being held at the Campbell Rest Home under the direction of Elders Clyde McKee and Orville Short.

A Deacon's Quorum of nine deacons has been organized under the supervision of Senior Deacon R. G. Huntley.—Reported by DOROTHY O'LEARY.

PASCAGOULA, MISSISSIPPI.—On the night of June 15, Apostle Percy Farrow was guest speaker. Members from near-by branches attended this meeting. W. J. Breshears, district president, introduced Apostle Farrow as the new apostle in charge of the Southern District.

The following were baptized on Children's Day: Sara Harris, James Shelton, and William Yocum, Neil Harris, Ernest Harris, Billy Ales, and Gloria Bang.

Three young men were ordained to the priesthood on July 23: Joseph H. Johnson as teacher, Robert L. Barlow and Clyde H. McCormick as deacons. The pastor, Elder J. L. Barlow, was assisted in the service by Elders W. F. Steiner and Brewton Breene of Mobile, and Elder A. N. Barnes of Escatawpa. Mrs. Dennison West of Independence, Missouri, rendered a special solo.—Reported by Mrs. NINA LEA MASON.

WALLA WALLA, WASHINGTON.—It was just a year ago that this mission was organized, with Carl Hammel, district president, presiding. John L. Fletcher was elected pastor. Early in this year a women's group was organized with Vida M. Fletcher as leader. All but two of the church women have been active workers, and interest was very good until meetings were discontinued through the hot weather, according to the custom in this section. The group will resume regular meetings in September.

In the spring of this year, the group accepted the suggestion of the district president that Matt Crownover be installed as supervisory pastor, with John Fletcher continuing as resident pastor. Due to the big bridge over the Snake River at Pasco being out, it was virtually impossible for friendly visitors from Richland to help out with preaching during the winter and spring. But since then the monthly visits of Brother Crownover have been enjoyed by all.

This group was very happy to have the Warren L. Farber family, formerly of Omaha, Nebraska, move to this community. He has been elected church school supervisor and Mrs. Farber is active in music and also teaches the young people's class.

Our services are held in the Y. W. C. A. building every Sunday morning. Attendance was from twelve to about twenty until the busy season began. A few Graceland College students visited with us during the canning season.

Prayer services are held about twice a month in various homes.—Reported by JOHN L. FLETCHER.

REUNION OF THE OZARKS.—Members of the Rich Hill and Spring River Districts enjoyed the largest reunion ever held in the area from July 22 to 30, with more than 500 people camping on the grounds. Many others who lived near by drove in for services each day.

The staff was headed by Apostle Donald O. Chesworth. Evangelist Ray Whiting preached several sermons and gave as many patriarchal blessings as time permitted. Evangelist Roland Scott of Omaha, Nebraska, was present the last few days and gave a number of blessings. Presiding Evangelist Elbert A. Smith was present to preach the first Sunday and assisted in the services on the last Sunday.

Elder Stephen Black, president of Spring River District, and Seventy Donald L. Kyser, president of Rich Hill District, assisted in the executive work. Elder Black taught the men's class each morning and was dean of men. Elder Kyser was in charge of the morning devotions.

Seventy Cecil Ettinger of Nauvoo, Illinois, taught the young people's class, assisted by Elder Sylvester Coleman, president of the Southeastern Illinois District, and directed the evensong activities.

The women's class was under the direction of Sister T. W. Bath and Sister Donald L. Kyser, leaders of women in the Spring River and Rich Hill Districts, respectively. The morning classes averaged about 125 women in attendance. A smaller number attended the program of afternoon activities which were varied to provide workshop and social experience for the women.

Melba Morehead, dean of women, was assisted by Eldon Kastl and Anna Dean Angel in providing instruction for the Junior League on the subject of "Gospel Pioneers." An average attendance of fifty-two was maintained in that department.

The children met in a large tent and two smaller auxiliary tents under the leadership of Marjorie Gilbert and a corps of twenty-two workers. She was assisted by Ermajeane Jackson, Nina Coldiron, Lela Brooks, and Margaret Althouse as heads of departments. The achievement of the 150 children in attendance was presented for the camp in a program and display of handwork Saturday evening. The theme for their work was "Old Testament Heroes," using lessons, workbooks, and handwork prepared by Sister Gilbert. Lucille Marsh and Lela Parkhurst were in charge of the children's activities on Sundays, when regular church school lessons were studied.

The music was supervised by Bertha Rogers, music director for the Rich Hill District, who was assisted by Clifford L. Browne and others. A reunion orchestra played for the services each evening.

The interior of the tabernacle was enhanced by the work of Curtis Pearson who prepared a large picture of "The Great Commission" for a background for the rostrum. During the week the whole front of the tabernacle around the rostrum was covered with knotty pine paneling and shellacked by the men on the grounds. The lumber was donated by Mary Leka.

Richard Carter, athletic director at Graceland College, was on the grounds the early part of the reunion as the Graceland representative.

At the services Saturday afternoon, nine children were baptized: Sharon Pat Sheppard, Mary Jane Moore, Janis McCollam, Billy and Tommy Allen, Mary June Martin, Rebecca Jo Highfield, Mary Lou Barnett, and Billy Rotter.

Children's musical leaders were Adena Browne and Erma Clayton. Olivia Jones was in charge of the children's story hour each evening.

The cafeteria was operated efficiently under the direction of Esther Wilson, Arvilla Nichols, Minnie Robberson, and Lorene Moore.

Elder Frank Shank of Chicago rendered a useful service with his wire recorder. He made a recording of all services and then played them later as requests were made to hear some of the messages again or by people who were unable to attend the services when held.

Apostle Chesworth conducted the general prayer service each morning, taught the general class at eleven o'clock, and shared in the preaching responsibilities.

Attendance reached its peak on Sundays. Over 950 were present the first Sunday. On the last Sunday an offering of $1,169 was taken to be applied on the reunion budget.

A number of the campers were visitors from Independence, Missouri, and other cities.—Reported by LOIS SHIPLEY.

The Church That Faith Built

By GERALD GABRIEL

ONE OF THE OUTSTANDING EVENTS for Zion's Leaguers at Far West Stake Reunion is the early morning prayer service conducted at the Old German Stewartsville Church, better known today as Maple Grove. Being rich in history, inspiring in tradition, and stimulating in accomplishments, it gives added revelation to the youth who gather there for such an occasion.

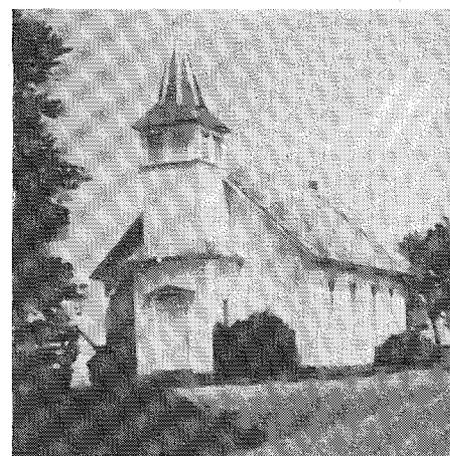

The 30 by 40 boxlike structure built in 1881 for the total sum of $985 by twelve devoted families still proudly raises its steeple to the sky. It is well kept, but for its many years of valuable service it now begins to surrender to the forces of nature. Strong winds sway it until its well-kept and painted plaster crumbles and its door becomes hard to open. In the near future it will be replaced with a modern community service unit and chapel, with classrooms, kitchen, recreation center, and auditorium.

In passing, the little church leaves a history comparable to those who rest in the half-acre plot just east of it. It all started with one family in a foreign land. Temmie T. Hinderks, Sr., left Tiechelwork, Friesland, Germany, in 1866 for America—the land where revelation had directed he should take his family of seven. Thirteen days by steamer, and a few days by train carried them to Burlington, Iowa, where they settled in the little town of Danville. It was here that the first German family started to gather other German families of the Baptist faith. In the fall of 1871, J. R. Lambert and John Lake, missionaries of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ, held services at a place procured by a newly won German Baptist, J. G. Bauer. Through the efforts of Elder Bauer, the Hinderks family first became interested in the church. One evening he presented them a tract in which he was very interested. This interest stimulated thought and prayers for further light. After a series of missionary sermons, Temmie, Jr., was baptized. Within two years seven others of that community of good German people joined the church. They became devoted to the church. Prayer meetings were held Sundays, Tuesdays, and Fridays. At one of these meetings, Elder J. G. Bauer spoke in prophecy to Temmie, Jr., pointing out that he should be called to hold many places of responsibility in the church. At this same meeting, Mary Hinderks, sister-in-law to Temmie, spoke in tongues, and the interpretation was given through Temmie.

Two years later the Lord spoke to the members in a prayer service, telling them to sell their property and move to the land of Zion. Shortly thereafter Temmie, Jr., and his older brother consulted with the Prophet Joseph Smith. With faith they had come to the prophet to talk about Zion—a word they had heard but had never read, for up to this time they had never seen a Book of Mormon or a Doctrine and Covenants. In their conversation with the Prophet, he advised them to locate in the region of Stewartsville. Upon arriving at Stewartsville, they began to look at various farms for sale. It was while they were walking over the farm that is now occupied by Evangelist Archie B. Constance, that God spoke to them, telling them this was the place for them to gather.

BY THE BEGINNING OF 1877 there were four families in this new territory. They held their prayer meetings in the homes until the spring of that year. In April, Elders T. W. Smith and James Kemp met with the Saints and organized a branch. At the organizational meeting, the Lord spoke to the little group and told them that if they lived faithful they would be greatly blessed, and many would come and join the church. This was fulfilled when others were converted by the ministry and the devoted lives of the church members.

In the spring of 1881 the small but growing group decided to build a church. After the plot of land had been donated, the money raised ($1,000), and the hauling of material completed, the building began. One of the present members, John Hovenga, rode on the first load of lumber. He takes a great deal of pride in telling about that ride and other incidents following. Upon arriving at the grounds with the first load of material, those present offered a prayer asking God's blessings upon their efforts. The church was finished in the fall with a balance of $15 in the treasury. Shortly after the dedication sermon by Alexander Smith, the need for hymnbooks became apparent. The only hymnals that could be purchased from the church publishing house were in English—these people spoke German. However, some of the church hymnbooks were purchased, and some of the members who could read English would translate a few lines, then the congregation would sing them in the German tongue. This same system was used in teaching the Three Standard Books until German editions could be purchased. The first Sunday School was organized about 1883; it too was conducted in the German language until 1904.

The spiritual gifts of the gospel were frequently enjoyed. Dreams, visions, prophecy, tongues, interpretation of tongues, and healings ministered to these faithful people. The branch was reminded that it was the "planting of His own planting." A severe drought hit this territory in the summer of 1900 and it seemed that the crops for the year would be a total loss. The Saints of Maple Grove "took their umbrellas and went to the church to pray to their God for rain" while their Gentile neighbors laughed at them for their optimism. The Saints returned to their homes using their umbrellas to keep dry from the rain which had come in answer to their prayers.

It is under such a setting that enlightenment comes to the Leaguers as they gather each Wednesday morning at Far West Stake Reunion to look jointly to their Heavenly Father and pray, "Thanks be to God for such a heritage."

Building Material Shortage

A French story describes a lady of good reputation, family and estate, presenting herself fearlessly at the gates of heaven. Saint Peter receives her politely and leads her through a street filled with lofty and beautiful mansions, any of which she thinks will satisfy her requirements; but, to her amazement, they pass them by. Next they come to more modest but still charming houses, with which she thinks she could be reasonably content; but again they pass by. Finally, they reach a small and mean thoroughfare.

"This," says Saint Peter, "is your habitation."

"This!" cries the indignant lady. "I could not possibly live in any place so shabby and inadequate."

"I am sorry, madame," replies the saint. "But we have done the best we could with the materials you furnished us."

Co-Valedictorians to Attend Graceland

The authors of these two statements were co-valedictorians of their high school class in Bald Knob, Arkansas. They are like many other young men and women throughout the church who have distinguished themselves by excellent scholarship in high school. It appears that more than ever before young people of excellent scholarship are seeking admission to Graceland College. Many of these students have rejected attractive gift scholarships offered by other colleges in order that they might take advantage of the opportunity to obtain an education at the church college.

An Important Step Toward Increased Service

IF, IN EARLIER YEARS, I had been asked why I wanted to attend Graceland College, the only answer I would have been able to give is that everybody in Bald Knob Branch seemed to think I should. As I grew older, my conviction that I must go to Graceland grew with me, but still I wouldn't have been able to give one satisfactory reason why.

It was about a year ago that I really began to get a conception of the possibilities for mental and physical development and moral and spiritual enlightenment Graceland affords. It was then that I began to meet and talk with former Gracelanders and learn of the many edifying experiences it offers to the receptive mind.

Though I am not isolated from the church, there are very few young people here, and I, like every other young Latter Day Saint, am hungry for fellowship with those of my faith. In my opinion, this in itself justifies my determination to enter Graceland this fall, for I believe that the spirit of brotherhood and comradeship is truly made manifest there.

Recently I attended our church reunion at Hot Springs, Arkansas. I shall never forget many of the things that happened there—the spirit of fellowship and good will that prevailed, the working together in harmony, the sharing of the good and bad alike, the bright smiles and cheery greetings. We were a happy people made into an even happier family by the blessings of association with other Latter Day Saints. That reunion seemed to me to be a taste of what Zion will be like, and the help and spiritual strength we received there a sample of the gifts that will continually flow into our lives in Zion.

So it must be at Graceland. If we can receive such moral and spiritual elevation in six days, doesn't it stand to reason that we will reach much greater heights after months of happy "living together" at Graceland?

That reunion greatly broadened my vision of Graceland and what it has to offer. Previously it meant the achievement of all my dreams. I'm still convinced that graduation from Graceland College is an accomplishment for anyone to be proud of, but it isn't the ultimate of my ambitions. Instead, I think of it now as just another important step to increase my capacity to render service to my church and further my preparation for the work that will mean the achievement of that final goal.

DORIS TURLEY.

A Challenge to be Met

I HAD TAKEN FOR GRANTED the fact that I would attend Graceland since I was a very small child. I remember proudly telling my friends of my intentions. I remember, too, the bitter disappointment that came when I thought my dreams of Graceland were not to be fulfilled; then the sheer joy and thankfulness I felt when I learned I would be able to go.

As I read over the aims and objectives of Graceland, I know that the student is responsible for the degree in which these aims are achieved. I resolve to co-operate with the faculty and other students to the fullest extent, to use my time to the best possible advantage, and to lend a helping hand wherever possible.

I want to worship, study, work, and play with Gracelanders, and when my year is finished I hope to say that my friendship is not restricted by the boundaries of a city, state, or even a nation.

I want to help in furthering this "great and marvelous work" of the church. What I can do, what I will do with my life in this respect is a challenge. With the help of God, I will strive to meet this challenge as he would have me meet it.

RALSTON.—Hugh P., Jr., son of Hugh P. and Ruth Ralston of La Junta, Colorado, was born December 14, 1925, at Syracuse, Kansas, and died August 3, 1950, at Amarilla, Texas. He attended grade school, high school, and business college in La Junta and enlisted in the Navy in 1943. He received his honorable discharge in 1946. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church in his youth and was ordained a priest in 1948. An employee of the Santa Fe Railroad, he was transferred to Amarilla in 1949 where he helped organize a mission and church school.

He is survived by his wife, Virginia; two sons; his parents; two brothers; and one sister. Funeral services were held at the Peacock Chapel in La Junta, Elder Heman H. Davis officiating. Interment was in Fairview Cemetery, La Junta.

MAJOR.—Anna, daughter of Seth and Mary Scott Farrow, was born in 1885 at Independence, Missouri, and died August 1, 1950, in Independence. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church at the age of eight and remained a faithful member throughout her life. In 1907 she was married to John J. Major; their home is near the Little White House in Independence, and their kindness to newsmen assigned to cover stories about the First Family has been lauded by the press.

She is survived by her husband, John, of the home; a daughter, Mrs. Anna Lee Piper of Pine Bluff, Arkansas; a sister, Mrs. John W. Luff of Independence; and two grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Henry Stahl Chapel, Elders Glaude A. Smith and Arthur E. Stoff officiating. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

1950 YOUTH CAMPS

The Department of Religious Education calls special attention to the two new camps, the one at Bandera, Texas, near San Antonio, and the other at Racine, Missouri, near Joplin, and encourages the young people of these districts to attend the respective camps.

Other camps are in various stages of planning. The Department will forward to the proper persons, inquiries for information on these camps.

 TIME TO WRITE

A busy author-housewife tells us how she finds time to write:

"Somehow, I've found a little more time for writing, and I think I have the answer. Getting up earlier is the secret—I'm trying to join the Six O'clock Club. Haven't made it yet. The closest I've come is 6:15, but it has been between that and 6:30 for the past two weeks. They tell me there are many famous members of this club. I think getting up on your feet and into your clothes with your eyes still shut is the initiation. I sympathize with the fellow who said he was the oldest man in the United States at seven o'clock in the morning. Certainly I'm the oldest woman—at 6:30!"—Leona Hands.

 REDUCTIONS

Uncle Joe has a new name for his struggle to reduce. He calls it, "The Battle of the Bulge."

 ABBREVIATIONS

For years there has been some mild and harmless fussing against the "alphabet soup" names of government agencies. But isn't it shorter and easier to say RFC than Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Now our correspondents are pushing it over into publications. They call the Saints' Herald, SH; Daily Bread, DB; the Quarterlies, Q; and so on.

But isn't there a limit somewhere? Just imagine if we said you ate your B this morning, read the P, kissed your W good-by, tried to start your C (or F), had trouble but finally got to the O and went to work on your J. Savvy?

 WAITING

The young couple were sitting outside in the car. There were stars shining in the girl's eyes, and the young man looked as if he were planning far ahead. He was looking through the years as at a shop window.

They weren't saying much, their minds and hearts were so full. Only in the body were they sitting there in the car. Imaginatively, their daydreams were far in the future, with a little home at the center, and a job or a business. Probably, off on the horizon, the guns of war thundering in the smoke of battle were threatening to break the dream. But it was a durable dream. . . . The wedding was to be soon. God bless their hopes and dreams, for they hold in their hands, with all young people, the future of the world.

 EDGES

Let us beware, in getting our gilt edge bonds, that we do not also get a guilt-edged conscience.

 A GADGET is a "buy-product" for those who don't need anything.

 "BEAUTIFUL LAND OF SOMETIME"

Under the excitement of getting things timed to the split second on the radio, strange things happen. Our good announcer left out a period. That may not sound serious, and it wasn't—but it turned out to be funny. The announcer was saying, "From the quartet we shall hear, LEAD KINDLY LIGHT, and SOMETIME, SOMEWHERE the speaker . . . will take his text from Acts 21: 14."

The Restoration Story

"The Restoration Story" is the first in a series of loose-leaf presentations of the message of our church. It has been prepared by the missionary committee of the Council of Twelve as a visual aid to personal evangelism. It contains 138 pages. On one page there is a picture—on the opposite page is an explanation or a scripture telling the story of the picture.

"The Restoration Story" is punched to fit any three ring notebook (sheets are 8½ x 11 inches). It can be used in personal evangelism, priesthood visiting, as an aid to parents teaching their children about our church, can be adapted to be used as supplemental material for church school instruction, and to assist in leadership training.

Binder

A special three-ring presentation binder is available, which will stand up at two different heights.

It is maroon, and the name of the church is stamped in gold on the cover.

Stepping Stones to Maturity

IF YOU WANT A CHOCOLATE CAKE, you must put chocolate into it. If you want beef stew, you must put beef into it. That seems so simple and obvious, doesn't it? Yet many of us are missing the implications of that principle.

If you want a child to grow up to be a good church member, you should give him church literature to read, shouldn't you? Simple as this fact is, some members do not know it. Some church school officers do not know it.

How readily some parents give their children money to buy "comic books." And what will those books make of the children? Gangsters, juvenile delinquents, and petty criminals, unless the children get some other kinds of ideas. Yet the price of just a few "comic books" will pay for a year's subscription to Stepping Stones.

We are using the phrase, "Stepping Stones to Maturity," for that is the true character of Stepping Stones, which is published by the church for our younger folk. They are going on the path toward maturity. Where is their path leading them? Will they walk on the quicksands of worldly ways of thinking, or will they have Stepping Stones that are founded upon the solid Rock?

The fallacious thinking of so many poor and irresponsible parents goes like this: "There is plenty of time. I'll let him decide for himself when he is grown. We can give him the church doctrine later—any time—tomorrow—or the day after—but not today!"

It is later than you think. Time is running out. Decisions that you hope will be made tomorrow are being made today while you sleep and delay. The formation of personality and character that you think you are deferring indefinitely is going on now. You have put your money into raising a child, but are you putting your heart into it? You are not willing that your child should grow up to be a member of another church, but by your indifference are you letting him grow up to be a heathen?

Introducing...

JOHN W. A. BAILEY, Independence, Missouri (page 5), was born at Staunton, Virginia, May 13, 1877, and was baptized in 1891 at Independence, Missouri, by Elder F. G. Pitt. In 1901 he was put in charge of a Sunday school at Pleasant View and two years later opened one in Warrensburg, Missouri. In 1896 he married Nannie Schiller. To them were born two sons and one daughter. After her death, he married Anna Ford Adams in 1918. They have two daughters.

Elder Bailey was ordained a priest in 1904, an elder in 1909, and a seventy in 1920. He has served the church in many places and positions as missionary, bishop's agent, district president, counselor to the bishop of Holden Stake, pastor, and missionary supervisor.

He worked eight years in the Utah District with Salt Lake City as the objective. Many of his articles have appeared in the Saints' Herald.

LLOYD W. NEWCOMBE, Stony Plain, Alberta (page 10), was born in Blomidon, Nova Scotia, February 9, 1884. He was baptized at Somerville in 1906 and three years later married Ada Sanford. He graduated from high school in Nova Scotia in 1900. Brother Newcombe was in the laundry business in Boston for many years and then moved to Alberta where he farmed until 1947, when he retired. He was ordained a priest in 1908.

News & Notes

PRESIDENCY

President W. Wallace Smith recently returned to the office from a trip to the East with his wife and son. On the trip President Smith contacted the Erie Beach Reunion where Apostle C. George Mesley was in charge, and the Kirtland Reunion where Apostle Maurice Draper was in charge. President Smith preached at both reunions and found good weather, fine attendance, and a spirit of unity in both places.

BISHOP DeLAPP

Bishop G. L. DeLapp attended the Northern California Reunion July 17 to 24 and the Southern California Reunion July 22 to 30. At both reunions Bishop DeLapp taught classes and preached several sermons.

FAR WEST AND BLUE WATER REUNIONS

Apostle Charles R. Hield has recently returned to Independence after attending the Blue Water Reunion from July 20 to August 6 and the Far West Reunion from August 10 to 20. At Blue Water Apostle Hield was in charge of the prayer meetings and the evening preaching services. At Far West he taught the General Class and the Young Peoples' Class. He reports that, "The outstanding feature of both reunions was the fact that lives were being changed in such a way that they would help build the kingdom. A good degree of the Spirit of God was there, particularly directed toward people's doing something about it in their educations, their homes, and businesses to win others to the cause of Christ."

ELDERS' RETREAT

On the week end of August 19 and 20, an Elders' Retreat was held at Gardner Lake with eighty-five elders attending. The theme for the retreat was "Shepherding," and the theme was carried into every service. Dr. F. M. McDowell conducted two classes, one on Saturday evening which was followed by a campfire service and the second on Sunday. The fellowship service at seven o'clock on Sunday morning was enriched by an excellent spirit which carried over into the business session where plans were discussed for this fall and the coming year. Elder C. V. Graham concluded the retreat with a message on "The Challenge of Shepherding."

This fall the elders of Independence are to organize under their pastors to bring family ministry to the branches on Tuesday nights. Family Nights are to begin immediately.

HIGH PRIEST RECOVERS HEALTH

Elder James A. Wilson of Toronto, Canada, recently underwent a serious operation. With the blessing of God, the operation was successful, and he is steadily regaining his health. Elder Wilson is a high priest and a former district president.

STONE CHURCH BAPTISMS

The Stone Church reports six baptisms. Martha Lee Virgene Martin was baptized by Elder P. G. Fairbanks. Jerry Norman Rimmer was baptized by his father, Priest Norman W. Rimmer. Leota Grace Thoman was baptized by her father, Elder John C. Thoman. George Ernest Brinkmann and Earl David Seal were baptized by Elder Glaude A. Smith. Mrs. Grace Spitzer was baptized by Elder William Worth, Jr.

Is It Hard to Be Good?

"Go in at the narrow gate. For the road that leads to destruction is broad and spacious, and there are many who go in by it. But the gate is narrow and the road is hard that leads to life, and there are few that find it."
—Matthew 7: 13, 14

It may not be amiss, occasionally, to come down out of the clouds and consider something practical that concerns people every day.

On the way home from Morning Devotions recently, a friend asked, "Is it harder to be good than it is to be bad?"

There is a question that could arouse much debate. I asked another friend what he thought about it, and he replied, "I think it must be harder to be good. There are so few people doing it." That, probably, is premised on the idea that people are lazy.

But statistics show that most of the trouble, sin, crime, and sorrow are caused by a small percentage of the people. So, though laziness may be universal, it does not afford an explanation. There must be another angle that calls for examination.

* * * * *

The Scriptures give us some help on the question, and the Goodspeed translation, quoted above, is stronger than the King James. "The road is hard that leads to life," it says. The great majorities follow the way of destruction. Only a few, a small minority, find their way to life and salvation.

Another Scripture may also help:

"The way of transgressors is hard."—Proverbs 13: 15.

Perhaps we had better draw some distinctions here. The way of a transgressor is easy up to the point of the transgression. But the moment he does wrong his troubles begin. It is easy to be bad; but it quickly becomes hard after a wrong is done, when one must pay for his sin and folly.

It may be hard, at times, to be good. But the rewards make it worth the effort.

The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. The way of the wicked is as darkness: they know not at what they stumble.—Proverbs 4: 18, 19.

Now we are getting down to something definite. If a man wants to be bad, he will find it rather easy. But the consequences will be hard, and they can end in his death if he goes far enough. He walks in darkness because he is going away from God.

On the other hand, the righteous person knows where he is going. He need not stumble in darkness. He walks in the light because he is going toward God.

That puts the issue clearly, doesn't it?

* * * * *

Evil takes people down hill.

There is a character that occasionally rides the bus from the city. He is always intoxicated. He has never been seen on this line in any other condition. In addition to the cargo he carries inside, he often has a sack of bottles with him.

He was rather nicely dressed the first time he appeared. Now he is becoming careless of his appearance, he forgets to shave, and his clothing is rumpled. Dissipation is marking his face, too and his jowls are beginning to sag. He is near the repulsive stage. He is on the way down.

The tragedy of it is, that he was a fine-looking man. He has a fair education and could hold a good job, if sober. He understands a certain amount of grace and courtesy. Evil is doing something terrible to him.

* * * * *

Perhaps we have been looking at the wrong aspect of this question. It may help to shift our sights.

It isn't so important whether being good is easy or not. The act is of short duration. But the consequences are long enduring and they are easy to take.

Taking the "easy" way into evil isn't wise, because the times of ease are very brief. The consequences of evil are hard, and they, too, are of long duration.

There it is. We have seen what Jesus had to say on the subject. We have seen what Solomon, the wise man of the ancient world, had to say about it. We have seen what life itself has to say on the subject. And they all agree.

* * * * *

The few sinners and criminals cause the rest of the people great trouble and expense. What can be done with them? There is a stubborn social prejudice against killing them. The laws discourage it, too. Also, there is the possibility that evil is like the Hydra that Hercules slew: when he cut off one of its heads, two grew up in place of it.

No, we just reject that. It wouldn't work. It didn't work for the Red Queen in Alice in Wonderland. When anybody displeased her, she shouted, "Off with his head! Off with his head!" But the people of Wonderland were used to her, and they paid no attention at all.

We must do it the hard way. We must preach the gospel and lead people to repentance. It will take longer, but it is the only way that will work.

Notice of Appointment of Bishop's Agent, Owen Sound District

Notice is hereby given of the appointment of Elder Alex Cadwell, 219 King Street, Guelph, Ontario, as Bishop's Agent of the Owen Sound District. Solicitors are hereby notified to send their reports for the month of August and each succeeding month thereafter to Brother Cadwell at the above address.

We are happy to have Brother Cadwell assume the responsibilities of this office in which he served with devotion and ability some years ago. He will assume the regular responsibilities of a bishop's agent serving under the supervision of Bishop Joseph E. Baldwin, who is appointed to serve as a general church representative in this district.

We take this opportunity of commending Brother Cadwell to the Saints for their favorable consideration and support.

Women's Department Works for Church School Attendance Campaign

BY PAULINE J. ARNISON

THERE ARE SOME THINGS in the program of the church that departments can do alone, in fact they are each fitted to do some things best and without the assistance of other groups. Not so with the campaign to add members to the church school. This is a church-family affair. Everybody must support and work to insure its success.

The church school is organized for everyone, but most especially for the young. Children make up the church of today as well as tomorrow's church, and the church schools in our branches are well-equipped to aid church families to teach their children the fundamental beliefs of the gospel.

We recognize that the home is the best place for most effective daily teaching, and there seems to be an increase in the number of parents who are striving to help their children evaluate life in terms of loyalty to high ideals and in service to others, rather than in making the word "success" synonymous with the word "money." Even the most capable parent, however, needs the additional help which a consecrated church school teacher can give. Few of us ever forget our first Sunday school teacher or the little class which composed our friends or many of the fine lessons we learned.

Church school literature prepared by devoted writers for all age groups is especially fine, and although quarterlies can be purchased for home study and to provide material to help parents teach, the best and most lasting results can be obtained from class participation.

Members of the women's departments in the branches are interested in children. They are mothers, teachers, and friends and can give valuable assistance to this campaign in many ways. Most departments are divided into neighborhood groups, and it is a simple thing to contact people in these areas. If the elder or pastor in charge wishes, the women can assist him in making the attendance campaign a success in these specific ways:

1. By making a survey of children in their neighborhood who do not attend church school.
2. By calling on people who have no church affiliation and inviting them to attend.
3. By collecting children on Sunday who would not get to church without this help.
4. By sharing the family car and picking up those who live at a distance or those who would not make the effort to go alone.
5. By joining a church school class.
6. By talking about the campaign, thus assisting the leaders.

Notice to Missionaries

Growing out of suggestions voiced by members of the New Appointees' Institute which recently met in Independence, a two-page article has been prepared to assist missionaries in getting publicity of their services in local newspapers. We will be glad to furnish a copy of this to any of our missionaries who request it. —Editor.

Probation After Death

By J. W. A. BAILEY

THERE ARE A FEW MEMBERS of the church who are being disturbed over the interpretation that some people are placing on certain Book of Mormon references which deal with the future state of the dead. While it is true there are a number of things that are not as clearly stated in the Book of Mormon as are stated in the Bible, yet we should keep in mind that we have an abridgment of the many records that were had by the ancient Americans. Their prophets have repeatedly stated that not a hundredth part of their records are recorded in the abridged record they left for us. (See pages 204: 4-17; 671: 1; 697: 25; 699: 36; 701: 8; 759: 108; 760: 1.)

When Jesus appeared to the Nephites, he called their attention to an important item dealing with the resurrection of many of the saints at the time he arose. Jesus said to the Nephites:

Write the things which you have seen and heard, save it be those which are forbidden; write the words of this people, which shall be even as hath been written of that which hath been; for behold, out of the books which have been written, and which shall be written, shall this people be judged. And behold, all things are written by the Father; therefore out of the books which shall be written shall the world be judged.—Page 674: 1-3 (670: 29).

The foregoing statement of Jesus includes far more than the small abridgment we now have. Jesus spoke of the books that have been written and of the books that shall be written.

Jesus' statement of the books which have been written evidently includes the Old Testament Scriptures up to about 600 B. C., and also the "Records of the Jaredites and Nephites" up to the time he was speaking to them. His statement of the books that shall be written would evidently include "The Record of the Lamb of God"—"The New Testament Scriptures" and the "Latter Day Revelations," which deal with the coming forth of the Book of Mormon and the translation thereof. But if we set these Latter Day Revelations aside, as some are trying to, then we discredit Joseph Smith, and in so doing we discredit the authenticity of the Book of Mormon. See the following references: Book of Mormon 35: 157-184; 37: 190-192; 156: 45-47; 157: 59-61; 157: 65-72; 205: 17; Doctrine and Covenants 22: 24; and Revelation 20: 11-14.

At the Great Judgment Day

Nearly all of the Book of Mormon references on future punishment of the wicked refer to the second resurrection, at which time the "great judgment day" takes place. And those that are found then in rebellion against God are the ones who shall be cast into the lake of fire, which is the second death.

That great day of judgment will not take place until every soul has heard the gospel preached, whether it be in earth, in Paradise, or in the prison house. See pages 108: 47; 218: 125-128; 205: 17; 450: 66; 427: 197, and Revelation 20:11-14.

For one to deny probation after death is to deny the mercies of God to men. In order to do so, one must deny all that Christ, the prophets, and the apostles have said in the Bible on the subject.

The mercies of God would not punish all sinners with the same degree of punishment. (See Luke 12: 47, 48.)

Most of the references in the Book of Mormon which refer to future punishment of the wicked deal with those who have willfully rebelled against God after having heard the gospel. Here is what Mosiah said on the subject:

Yea, even all those that have perished in their sins ever since the world began, that have willfully rebelled against God, that have known the commandments of God, and would not keep them; these are they that have no part in the first resurrection.—Page 253: 62 (445: 8).

This statement is in harmony with what the Apostle Paul said on the subject:

For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted of the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance; seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame.—Hebrews 6: 4-6.

Again, Paul said: "For if we sin willfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins." Sore indeed is the punishment of him "who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace."—Hebrews 10: 26-29.

These statements of Mosiah and the Apostle Paul refer to people who have committed the unpardonable sin against the Holy Ghost, a sin which only a comparatively few have committed or will commit.

Many sinners have gone to the prison house, but they have never committed the unpardonable sin.

Alma, speaking on the subject, said: "Behold, if ye deny the Holy Ghost when it once has had place in you, and ye know that ye deny it; behold, this is a sin which is unpardonable.”—Page 445: 8.

Jesus made the following statement concerning the unpardonable sin:

Wherefore I say unto you, All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men: but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men. And whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come.—Matthew 12: 31, 32. See also Mark 3: 28, 29; Luke 12: 10; I John 5: 16, 17.

If no sin whatever is to be forgiven men after this life, why did Jesus say, “Neither in the world to come”?

For further information on the subject, see The Atonement of Christ and the Final Destiny of Man, page 86. This is a tract by Elder Isaac M. Smith, who specialized on this subject.

Our Part in the Resurrection

Paul, who claimed he was called of God to preach (Acts 9: 3, 4; Galatians 1: 11-16), said that the resurrection of the dead will differ in glory as the stars of the heavens differ in glory. Read I Corinthians 15: 40-42.

Here is what Dr. George Oliver said concerning this important subject:

If an inspired apostle speaks of a third heaven; of the righteous differing from each other in glory, as one star differs from another; and the Savior himself should acknowledge that heaven contains many mansions; then we may fairly conclude that there are different degrees of reward proportioned to the measure of man's faith and obedience.—Historical Landmarks, Volume II, page 18.

The following statement made by Mosiah, if taken unqualifiedly, would have God favoring all those who died in ignorance, not hearing the gospel:

And these are those who have part in the first resurrection; and these are they that have died before Christ came, in their ignorance, not having salvation declared unto them. And thus the Lord bringeth about the restoration of these; and they have part in the first resurrection, or have eternal life, being redeemed by the Lord.—Page 253: 58, 59.

Certainly, Mosiah did not mean that for one to die without hearing the gospel—to die in ignorance—is a passport to celestial glory. If so, then we should not try to preach the gospel to the heathen nations. It would be far better for no one to hear the gospel if men can be saved without hearing it.

But all who have died or will die in ignorance, not hearing the gospel, and even some who have heard the gospel, will hear it preached to their understanding, either in Paradise or in the prison house. Then, if they will obey, they will come forth, either in the terrestrial or the celestial glory. See Luke 23: 40-43; I Peter 3: 18-20; 4: 6; Isaiah 42: 7, 8; 61: 1; Book of Mormon 770: 26, 27; Doctrine and Covenants 45: 10; 76: 6, 7; 85: 6; I Corinthians 15: 40-42; II Corinthians 12: 2, and John 14: 2.

The Book of Mormon quotes Jesus as saying, “If I be lifted up, I will draw all men unto me.”—Page 673: 26-28. (Also see John 12: 32.)

The word “all” means more than a few; it means just what it says—all, everyone.

Jesus expressed the same thought in his parable of the lost sheep. He tells of the ninety and nine being safe in the fold, but that the Good Shepherd goes on until he has rescued or saved the one hundredth sheep (Matthew 18: 11-14; Luke 15: 3-7).

For Correction

The love of Jesus, as expressed in the parable of the lost sheep is quite different from the doctrine of eternal damnation. Years ago, more so than now, many preachers preached “eternal damnation.” In doing so, they gave expression to their feelings about those who differed from them.

Not long ago I heard a radio minister preaching “eternal damnation.” He said, “If you will repent now, God will forgive; but if you die before repenting, God will never forgive . . .” As I understand the revelations of God, his punishment is for correction, not revenge. God said he has “no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked should turn from his way and live” (Ezekiel 33: 11).

If Satan will have control over all mankind and cause men to miss the “narrow way” while in this life, then he will have won the great battle between himself and God. But I do not believe he will, for Christ will not fail in the ultimate test. He will have conquered death, hell, and the grave, even destroying the one that had the power of death. (See Psalms 2: 8; 22: 27, 28; 69: 33; Isaiah 24: 22; 42: 6-8; 49: 9; 55: 10, 11; 59: 1; 61: 1; Philippians 2: 10, 11; Matthew 12: 29; I Peter 3: 18-20; 4: 6; I Corinthians 15: 24-26, 55; Hebrews 2: 14; Revelation 1: 18; 20: 11-14.)

When Christ has fulfilled his great mission, he will have destroyed all the forces of evil, including the Devil himself (I Corinthians 15:26). The time will come when all the ends of the world will worship the Lord of Hosts (Psalm 2: 8; 22: 27, 28). It is written that at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, both in heaven, in earth, and under the earth; and every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father (See Isaiah 45: 22, 23; Philippians 2: 10, 11; Revelation 5: 13, and Doctrine and Covenants 85: 6).

As the work of God is the work of creation and redemption, man cannot glorify God while being in hell. Therefore, he must be redeemed before this Scripture is fulfilled.

Even the sons of perdition are included with those who would bow the knee to God. This they did so after they were enlightened—before they became the sons of perdition, (Continued on page 22.)

Experiences of a Missionary - Part II

Admonished to Study

IN one of the first series of meetings I held, I retired one day to the woods for study and prayer. I sought the Lord earnestly and wished to be blessed with wisdom. I did not do this with any selfish motive, but only that I might lead mankind to Christ. As I prayed light came to me, and this was what I was told. "Study and the Lord will help you, but do not ask the Lord to do something for you that you can do for yourself." I have found the Lord ever true to his promises, and when I have put forth the proper effort by study and prayer, he has blessed me.

An Endowment of the Spirit

While preaching near Seattle in a schoolhouse not far from Renton I had a very sublime experience. I was greeted each night with a good-sized audience. The first night a man came to me and invited me to his home. He informed me that he and his wife had a baby just nine days old in their home, and he wished me to baptize it. I told him I would be too happy to visit them, but as to baptizing the baby I could not grant his request. He then informed me he did not care to have me visit his home.

Each evening the attendance was good. One man kept coming to me and asked if I was going to speak on baptism. I informed him I expected to. Others came and asked the same question, and I gave them the same answer. I was then informed that if I did the entire audience would walk out and not come back again. I pondered the situation over well. I did not care to drive my audience from me. Several nights passed by, and they were determined to carry out their threat. To fail to preach on the subject to me was cowardly, and I knew it was needed.

One night as I went to the schoolhouse, I decided to stop on my way and seek the Lord and abide by whatever was given me. Accordingly I went out by the roadside and bowed down in prayer. I pleaded for light and told the Lord if he would bless me with the spirit that Mormon had when writing to his son Moroni, I would preach on baptism regardless of the consequences. As I arose from my knees, there came a feeling that I need have no fear even though the audience had threatened to leave me. I went on to the schoolhouse, and as I arose to speak, the Spirit of the Master came to me in a marked degree. I was endowed with such a pouring out of the spirit as I had never before received in my life. Instead of the listeners leaving as they had determined to do, they were drawn toward me and listened with marked attention. A power accompanied my preaching that took possession of those attending and held them spellbound. Not one person left the room.

After the service closed, the men who told me they would leave, came to me and with tears streaming down their cheeks apologized for the way in which they had talked. To me it was one of the most outstanding experiences that has ever come in all my preaching, and I am sure it was a foretaste of the endowment that will someday come to the church.

Threatened by the Adversary

After going to the home of one of the Saints that night, I had a further experience that permitted me to understand to a much greater degree the power of the Adversary than I had ever understood before. After turning out the light and going to bed, I felt my spiritual eyes open, and I saw a person enter the room. He wore a cloak over his head and face. As he approached me, my spirit left my body. This individual walked up to my bed as if to destroy me. He put his hand within a few inches of my face, but there seemed to be an invisible power between my body and his so that he could not touch me. Being unsuccessful the first time, he tried the second time; and again this same power prevented his harming me. Again with a desperate effort he made the third attempt to destroy my body. This time the cloak he was wearing fell from his head and shoulders, and I could plainly see his face. He then passed out of the room. My spirit re-entered my body, and I found myself wide awake.

I was made to know this was Satan, and he would destroy not only the body of man but man himself. No one by his own strength can withstand the Adversary; only by the power of God can men survive.

During the remainder of that night, I lay in deep meditation. Never do I want to find myself subject to the power of the Adversary again. The influence left in the room that night remained for several hours. Weak man cannot survive without the help which comes of the Lord.

By L. G. HOLLOWAY

A Case of Bad Treatment

Most of the people were friendly during the series of services held near Renton. Many of them invited me into their homes. One night a woman who had been attending the services insisted on my going home with her. After reaching the house, she brought her Bible out and laid it on the table. Then she asked me to take a seat on the opposite side of the table from her. She began to ask questions which I tried to answer. Soon she flew into a rage and called me hard names and accused me of telling falsehoods. Her husband sat in the room but said nothing. It appeared to me that she wanted to start a quarrel with me so that he would drive me from the home. I was indeed happy when near midnight she showed me a room and I retired.

The next evening when I went to church, several came to me and asked if I went to this home and if I remained over night. I replied that I did. Then they asked me how I got along. Not wishing to tell what really took place I answered, "All right." Some of my friends then informed me that this same woman had invited several ministers of other churches into her home and then treated them so badly they left, and they wondered if I would be able to stay. She threatened to send for her minister to give me a theological thrashing, but for some reason he never came.

First Baptism

While laboring in this part of my field, I walked many long and weary miles, hoping to find someone who might be converted to the gospel. I succeeded in converting a Mrs. McIntosh and had the privilege of baptizing her. She was the "first fruits" of my efforts in the mission field.

Many times I would find myself laboring under discouraging conditions. It was during one of these times that a brother spoke to me by the gift of tongues and interpretation, giving me words of encouragement. Among other things he said was that many souls would be brought into the church through my efforts. I went from that service happy believing there were better days before me. Those words have been fulfilled, and I have been made happy in knowing that in my weak way I have been able to bring some to a knowledge of the truth.

Abuse in Eastern Washington

Apostle Gomer T. Griffiths was in charge of the field in which I labored. He arranged for me to do some missionary work in the eastern part of Washington known as Spokane District. Here I met some very discouraging conditions. I went to the town of Harrington and tried to hold services in private homes, but no one was interested. In company with Brother Fred Turnbull I went to a town some eight miles from Harrington and there obtained the promise of a church in which to hold services. All arrangements being completed, we left an appointment for the following Sunday. When the time came for the service to be held, we gladly walked this distance again.

On our arrival at the church, we found a crowd but we were informed we would not be permitted to speak. They had sent for another minister, and he was present to see we did not use the church. I tried to get the people to listen to what we had to say. Finally this minister said to me, "You talk smooth, and want to appear nice, but if the facts were known you have five or six wives in Utah." I gave him to understand I was a single man and did not have one wife, much less five or six as he had stated. After listening to their abuse for a time, we decided to return to Harrington, walking in all thirty-two miles on the two trips. After such treatment, I became discouraged and wondered what to do. After thinking the matter over, I decided to return to Seattle with the hope I could find some place where I might go and tell the gospel story. I prayed earnestly, asking the Lord to open the way for me.

Divine Direction

I sought the Lord for divine guidance not once, but many times but no direction was given. One day I was sitting at a table writing some letters. Again I felt an urge to seek the Lord, hoping he would listen to my pleading and would grant the favor I had asked. While thus engaged in prayer, a voice spoke to me and said, "You go to Humptulips, Washington."

I remembered the case of Philip and the man from Ethiopia who was very much concerned in the things pertaining to the gospel. The Spirit said to Philip, "Go near and join thyself to this chariot." If the Lord would do this for Philip so that the eunuch might find the way of life, I could see no reason why he would not give me direction where I might go in order that mankind might be taught the plan of salvation. There was something sublime in the direction given by the Spirit, and I was ready to make a test of that which I had received.

The little hamlet of Humptulips was down in the wilds of the Grey Harbor country. The nearest railroad went only as far as Hoquiam, and from there I would need to take a stage coach some twenty-five miles. I went by boat from Seattle to Tacoma and from there to Hoquiam by rail. On reaching the latter place, I found the stage coach went only on two days of the week, so it was necessary for me to remain in Hoquiam overnight. I found by taking invoice that I had one dollar and fifty cents. The stage coach fare was one dollar. To get a bed in a hotel would cost the same, and that would take more money than I had.

As I stood on the railroad station platform, I noticed a man who attracted my attention. I felt impressed to ask him if he knew of any Latter Day Saints living in the town. He immediately replied that he did. Calling his daughter who was a worker in the Salvation Army he asked her if she knew where Alma Upton lived. She pointed out the home of this man. Going to the home I inquired if Mr. Upton was a member of the Reorganized Church and he replied he was. I told him who I was, and he invited me in to remain for the night.

The next morning I took the stage coach to Humptulips, and on my arrival there I made inquiry as to whether there were any Latter Day Saints in the town. I was told that Brother Earnest Fishel lived there, and soon I was made welcome in his home. In company with Brother Fishel, I called upon the school board and asked for the use of the schoolhouse which was readily granted. I preached for several evenings to attentive audiences. I was the first minister ever to preach in the town.

One night a woman arose and asked me if I would be offended if an offering was taken for my benefit. I had at the time five cents in my pocket, and naturally I appreciated the kindness of this woman. When the offering was given to me, it amounted to three dollars and sixty-nine cents. I was indeed grateful for this and believed it came because of the good will of the people and for the further reason the Lord wished to favor me.

Baptisms at Humptulips

It was not long after this that I baptized the woman who asked my consent to take the offering. Her son and daughter also were baptized.

The husband was a member of another church, but very friendly toward us. One night he invited me to stay in his home, and I accepted the invitation. On reaching there, he wanted to know on what terms he would be accepted into our church. I informed him it would be necessary for him to submit himself for baptism, as this is the rule of the church. To this he refused. We talked the matter over until midnight. I used all the logic I could think of to convince him that this was a reasonable requirement and in harmony with the law of Christ, but I could not prove to him that he needed to be baptized again for he had complied with that ordinance once and that he thought was enough. I suggested we had better retire for the rest of the night, and to this he consented.

On arising the next morning, nothing was said about the discussion on the previous evening. The day passed by, and still we did not mention it. That night after church services were over, he again invited me to accompany him home. On our reaching his home he resumed the question about his rebaptism. I gave him the same answer as on the previous evening. We discussed the matter until about two o'clock in the morning. The next day was passed in silence so far as the question of rebaptism was concerned. Again my friend invited me into his home, and again he raised the question previously discussed. I had exhausted all the arguments I knew, but none seemed to convince him that he was wrong in his attitude. Midnight came, two o'clock came, and finally four o'clock came. My friend arose and walked the floor. This was his closing argument: "I'll die and spend my time in Hades before I will ever consent to being rebaptized." My patience had been exhausted; tired both in body and mind I arose and said to him, "If that is the way you feel about it, you can die and go to Hades as far as I am concerned, I am through discussing the subject with you."

The next evening he invited me to his home, but I refused. Each evening he would extend the invitation, but each time I refused to go. I was determined not to have any further conversation with him as no good was resulting from our talks. He finally gave up and did not invite me to his home again. A few days after, I was walking to the schoolhouse and without giving any thought to this man I heard a voice asking me this question, "Where are you going?" I replied, "To the schoolhouse." "Why go to the schoolhouse?" and I said, "Because the teacher is interested, and I thought I might do her some good." Then this same voice said, "Don't go to the schoolhouse; go to Mr. Partridge's." This was the man who had refused to submit himself for baptism.

It was necessary for me to change my course of travel which I did. Arriving at his home I found him and a neighbor discussing religion. The neighbor soon excused himself, saying it was necessary for him to go home if he got his chores done in time to attend church that night. Mr. Partridge and I turned to go to his house, which was a short distance away. As we neared the house, a question was given to me to ask him. I turned and said, "Mr. Partridge, you have refused to submit yourself for baptism." He replied, "Yes, that is true." "Would you be satisfied to come into our church without baptism?" He stopped and for a few minutes stood in deep meditation without saying a word. He lifted his eyes as he looked me squarely in the face and gave me his answer, "No, Brother Holloway, I would not."

That ended our discussion, and three days later I saw him go down into the waters of baptism. He continued faithful to that covenant, and died a true Latter Day Saint. The Lord knew the man was honest and he further knew the state of his mind. He also knew that under this peculiar condition and at this specific time the man would be willing to comply with what he previously refused to do.

An Agnostic Questioner

Some years afterward, while laboring in Helena, Montana, I had an agnostic attend my services. At the close of the service, he came to me and raised certain questions concerning our religious beliefs. We were holding services in a tent and a large crowd was present. This man was asking questions he thought would embarrass me or, failing to do that, I would have to confess I could not answer them.

One of his statements was this, "You never have seen God. You never have heard from God. You know nothing about God." The crowd was anxious to hear my answer. He kept pressing the question as to what I knew about God. I asked him if he would believe what I might tell him as to what I knew about God, and he pledged his word and honor that he would believe my statement. After he made this pledge to me, it was necessary for me to tell him what I knew regarding our Heavenly Father. I then gave him my experience in which I had heard the voice of God giving me divine direction. He listened, but his attitude indicated he did not believe my story.

I asked him if he believed what I had related to him, and he frankly stated he did not. The people present, however, were not only interested in my relating the experience, but apparently believed it. Even though he had given me his word and honor that he would believe, I felt sure he would not. I told him further that some day he would stand in the presence of the Great Judge just as I would, and that we would answer to him for what we had pledged ourselves to believe. This man never troubled me again.

A Vision and a Healing

In company with Brother D. C. White, I was laboring in the Lone Rock Branch, staying in the home of Elder Chas. H. Jones. His grandson became seriously ill, and the family physician was called in. After carefully examining the lad, the doctor informed the parents, Brother and Sister Alma Jones, that it was possible the child would never recover. The parents had called for administration several times, but no relief had come. In fact, the child had grown worse. It was decided that administration should be tried once again in hopes the Lord would come to the rescue of the child. I was asked to offer a prayer before the administration, which I did. As I was praying I saw the Father and Son, the latter pleading with his Father for the life of this child. I could not understand his words as they were beyond my comprehension. However, I did know that Christ was concerned regarding the life of the boy. I saw the Father's face moved with compassion as he listened to the pleadings of his Son. Following the prayer, Brethren White and Jones administered to the child, and he was instantly healed. In a short time he asked to be permitted to go about the house and showed no effects of being ill.

This experience caused me to know that the Master pleads in behalf of his children and also to know that our Heavenly Father will listen to the pleadings of his Son. The love of the Master is so great for his children that under no condition will he desert those who stand in need of his help. On many different occasions I have witnessed the healing power of the gospel in the lives of men and women. I could relate hundreds of experiences in which, under my own ministry, I have witnessed the healing of those who were at the very brink of eternity; their lives being spared for a wise purpose and because of their faith in God.

A Healing Demanded

Many years ago I knew a mother who had a very sick child. She called for the family doctor and also for the elders of the church. It seemed the child would die. In her desperation this mother made a statement, "Either heal my child, or I shall never serve you again." In some measure I can realize her feeling that, because of her deep love for her child, she might in some degree be justified in making this statement. The child lived, but for many years he suffered more than tongue can tell. The mother suffered also. When about eighteen years of age, he died. I feel sure this mother was relieved when she knew his suffering was over.

Comparing the attitude of this mother with that of Job, we can see the real difference between the kind of faith acceptable to the Lord, and one which demands that He do as we wish, or we will never serve him. Job lost all his earthly belongings and was greatly afflicted. His wife came to him when he was in this condition and said, "Why don't you curse God and die?" But Job replied, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust him." There was real faith. To be subservient to the will of God is to manifest greater faith than it is to make certain demands of the all-wise Creator.

The Lord does not always heal men's suffering, but the healing power of the gospel has accompanied the church in all ages, and whenever it is wisdom that men should be healed, the Lord is ready to grant that request. I have witnessed hundreds who have been healed by the power of God not only through my own ministry but through the ministry of others of the church. The blind have been made to see, the deaf to hear, and the lame to walk through this ordinance of the gospel as found in the laying on of hands of those in divine authority.

THIS IS AN AGE of discovery and progress, which has caused numerous changes in our thinking, some of which have seemingly destroyed, or at least weakened, what we at one time considered basic and fundamental.

Innumerable ages have passed since life began its tumultuous existence on earth. Science reveals a steady upward climb toward the unfoldment of some great and sure purpose as yet not fully revealed, perhaps not even conceived. "It doth yet appear what we shall be."

In the distant ages of prehistoric man, when awakening consciousness of mysterious forces about him touched his mind, the struggle to survive over fellow creatures, over physical disaster and change, over pain, hunger, and inevitable final death, led to the placating of strange powers not understood, but blamed or credited, as the case might be, with being responsible for it all. These mysterious forces became a world apart, something to be deified, worshiped, revered, served, or propitiated according to the manner or nature of their manifestation.

The struggle to comprehend the unknown has gone on for millenniums while all the elements needed to supply the answers were around him in nature and in himself. When the Supreme Intelligence breathed into man the breath of life, man became one with God as well as nature. In nature around him, in his environment, were the requirements of his being, for all creation is one. "The light which now shineth which giveth you light . . . is the same light which quickeneth your understandings; which light proceedeth forth from the presence of God, to fill the immensity of space. The light which is in all things, which giveth life to all things."—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 3. "All things unto me are spiritual."—Doctrine and Covenants 28: 9.

As God's laws in nature govern alike and are the same things infinitely small and in the immensity of space, so laws are equally one in earth or heaven. Indeed why do we talk of another world? Emerson said years ago, "Other world? There is no other world. God is one and omnipresent; now or never is the whole fact."

We have so built up the belief in a spiritual and material world that it is hard to realize the essential unity and oneness of what appears as two. Science tells us that what we call matter is but collections or different alignments of energy. We see the tangible forms into which the energy becomes shaped and which changes, decays, or dissolves and so apparently passes from sight, and call it the natural or temporal. "The things which are not seen are eternal and are understood by the things that are made." "The word was made flesh and dwelt among us."

So we can vision and grasp with our physical senses some of the unseen realities. Actually, of course, the created world we see is eternal in character, being but different formations and manifestations of the intelligence or light which is not created, neither indeed can be.

The great error throughout the centuries has been the division which the religious world has conceived as existing between what was called spiritual and material. The present world was called evil, carnal, and the enemy of the spiritual; and the sole purpose of religion and the church was to save man for a future and eternal life in a home beyond the skies. This concentration on some future salvation left the improvement of the present world as outside the field of church activity.

Individual salvation was the supreme purpose of the church. The improvement of society and its laws was too materialistic for the church to consider. Any good work that ordinary men should attempt to do was but "filthy rags" and unrighteousness. Indeed one church taught that only by mortifying the flesh through suffering and penance and suppression of the natural desires could the inner man be fitted for his future existence. Does the church become materialistic or secular when it works for the regeneration of society as well as the individual? There is reason to become concerned because of the inadequacy of religion as a vital factor in world affairs. The churches of today offer no sure hope, no authoritative message, even in their chosen field, and people are steadily becoming more and more indifferent to any life beyond the present. Men want something in the here and now, rather than a vague and uncertain future; the promises of heaven and its joys have lost their appeal in this practical and scientific age.

Man today is a product of his past and present environment and society. Science believes that improvement of the race by eugenics and heredity is possible only within limits, but improvement by environment is a straight-ahead proposition.

If men are better today, as they are, it is probably due to better social and economic conditions in which they live, which have supplied the basic needs for survival, security, and happiness with the necessity of acquiring one's neighbor's goods, either by competition or illegal means.

Einstein said years ago, "The only progress I can see is progress in organization." Science proves that environment can change the individual; temperature, climate, and food can change the body, nature, and disposition; man is changed by his surroundings, by the tone of society, by the company he keeps, by his occupations or his reading. Environment is really a part of us. We live not only in it but of it.

THE GREAT CHALLENGE before the church is in the field of social and economic regeneration, to produce a better world in which the infinite possibilities inherent within mankind may develop and unfold.

Christ did not speak much of another world; instead his whole example and life clearly demonstrated his concern for the physical suffering around him. He went about doing good; he healed the lame, the sick, the blind, and fed the hungry. He said, "I am among you as he that serveth."—Luke 22: 27. "The son of man came not to be ministered unto but to minister."—Matthew 20: 28. So to his disciples he said, "The disciple is not above his master nor the servant above his Lord."—Matthew 10: 21. "As the Father hath sent me even so send I you."—John 20: 21. He trained his disciples to follow in his steps in the path of service and told them they could do even greater works than he had done, because he had to leave them to "go to the Father." These chosen few were the beginning of the kingdom of God upon earth; they were the nucleus, the good seed, he planted to be sown throughout the world. "The field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom."—Matthew 13: 37.

CHRIST HAD GREAT PLANS for his kingdom of good will among men. This was the basic theme of his teachings from the first public utterance, "Repent for the kingdom is at hand," to the final instruction to his disciples, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel of the kingdom to all people." It was to be made the subject of their daily prayer, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth." It was to be like the leaven which could raise the whole lump; like the mustard seed which could grow into a great bush. "His dominion shall be from sea to sea and from the river even to the ends of the earth."—Zechariah 9: 10.

To misunderstand the kingdom of God would be to misunderstand the message of Christ. Personal regeneration was not for the purpose of personal salvation; it was a preparation, a training, a fitting for service in the kingdom of God. Salvation for the individual was a purely incidental effect, not the end of religion.

The evangelical ministers who encourage their hearers in a selfish seeking for a future salvation from a burning hell forget the essential teaching of Christ that contradicts such a principle, "He that seeketh to save his life shall lose it, but he that loseth his life for my sake and the Gospel's shall find it."

Any future salvation must be incidental or a side product to a life spent in service to our fellow man. Christ made this clear (Matthew 25) in his picture of the judgment, when the sheep inherited the kingdom not because of any profession or even knowledge of Christ, but solely because of their services to the needy. Further he made it clear that no rich man can enter the kingdom of heaven, because in a world of many needy one must share with his brother, otherwise "How dwelleth the love of God in that man?"

Christ envisioned more than just individual righteousness and service. He came to co-ordinate, to collect and organize such a people into the kingdom of God on earth, a world society, an agency for co-ordinating the social ideals or laws of heaven and building them into the laws of society and the nations until "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ."—Revelation 11: 15.

To lose sight of this is to lose the essential core in the message. The laws of the kingdom were socialistic. Not only was the individual to share ("He that hath two coats let him give to him that hath none, and he that hath meat let him do likewise." "Go and sell all that thou hast and give to the poor.") but the community was also to do the same: "And all that believed were together and had all things common and sold their possessions and goods and parted them to all men as every man had need . . . and laid them down at the apostles' feet, and distribution was made unto every man according as he had need."—Acts, chapters 2, 4.

Arnold Toynbee said, "The present American ideology lays great stress on the value of freedom, but seems less keenly alive to the need for social justice." There can be no freedom or security to the man without a job and with an empty pocket-book.

The supreme need in the world today is for a new vision and practice of the laws of the kingdom of God. The ideals and principles of service and sharing need to be incorporated into the laws of society and nations. Then as we attain this hope, each new generation will stand on higher and higher ground, and a better environment will be able to expand, and the great purpose of God will ultimately reach the triumphant climax. The kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ.

A wise man, more than two thousand years ago, when he was asked what would most tend to lessen injustice in the world, said, "That every bystander should feel as indignant at a wrong as if he himself were the sufferer."

QUESTION:

Some in the priesthood say the Reorganized Latter Day Saints do not teach sanctification, but it is spoken of in the Three Books. Would you explain our belief on this?

Nebraska

M. H. H.

ANSWER:

Yes, our Scriptures do contain teachings on the doctrine of sanctification and hold that it is necessary to salvation in the kingdom of God. However there are teachings of certain sects we cannot in-dorse, especially those which make sanctification an instantaneous act of the Holy Spirit.

Sanctification is the progressive change which takes place in the souls of men under the gospel of Jesus Christ by the co-operative work of both man and Christ and through the ministry of the Holy Spirit. It is the essential work of Christ and his gospel, for he came to take away the sins of the world and to cleanse the world from all unrighteousness. Faith and belief of truth, repentance, baptismal covenant, and keeping of the law in every part are steps in the process making for sanctification, all of which belong to man. They are man's part in the work of redemption. But Christ assumes a part, also, doing that which is beyond the power of man to accomplish. Man may stop sinning, but Christ's forgiveness is necessary to remove from him the guilt his sins have left. Man may change to good works, but this does not cleanse him from the stain and defilement caused by sin, only as Christ imparts to him the Holy Spirit of cleansing. Paul says we are "sanctified by the Holy Ghost" (Romans 15: 16). Inherited evil, sometimes called "original sin," is not removed in this life, though by the spirit's grace we may be enabled to keep it in subjection, and by the physical death it is laid away in the grave; but in the resurrection this evil is left out to trouble us no more. These things and others are the work of Christ contributing to our sanctification.

Sanctification is often spoken of as applying to persons during this life. Such use of the word is relative rather than absolute, for sanctification moves on by stages until it becomes perfect and complete. Man's part cannot be completed in a day. Knowledge, faith, belief, repentance, righteousness are matters of growth, and all contribute daily to spiritual progress and sanctification. Neither can the cleansing power of the Holy Spirit move faster than the man's development allows. Hence sanctification cannot be other than a progressive work. A few quotations will help:

For this is the will of God, even your sanctification.—I Thessalonians 4: 3.

For God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth.—II Thessalonians 2: 13.

Every man that hath this hope in him [of attaining Christ's likeness] purifieth himself, even as he is pure.—I John 3: 3.

All men, everywhere, must repent, or they can in no wise inherit the kingdom of God. For no unclean thing can dwell there, or dwell in his presence.—Genesis 6: 59, 60.

Nothing entereth into his rest, save it be those who have washed their garments in my blood, because of their faith, and the repentance of all their sins, and their faithfulness unto the end. Now this is the commandment, Repent all ye ends of the earth, and come unto me and be baptized in my name, that ye may be sanctified by the reception of the Holy Ghost, that ye may stand spotless before me at the last day.—III Nephi 12: 32, 33.

Come unto Christ and be perfected in him, and deny yourselves all ungodliness, . . . then is his grace sufficient for you, that by his grace ye may be perfected in Christ. . . . If ye by the grace of God are perfected in Christ, . . . then are ye sanctified in Christ by the grace of God . . . that ye become holy.—Moroni 10: 29, 30.

The complete sanctification of men is the design of Christ through his gospel, that they may dwell with him where evil and sin cannot be, and where they may have perfect joy in his kingdom.

CHARLES FRY.

QUESTION:

When a person dies, does he go immediately to heaven?

Missouri

Mrs. K. K. W.

ANSWER:

Immediately at death the spirits of men return to God according to the Scriptures. Ecclesiastes 12: 7 reads, "The spirit shall return unto God who gave it," and Jacob, speaking of the wicked who die in their sins, says, "They shall return unto God" (II Nephi 6: 72). The spirits of all men at death come directly under the Lord's direction and are appointed their place of abode while waiting the time of their resurrection. The righteous people of Enoch were taken "into mine own bosom," that is, into the Lord's presence where they remained, as are all the righteous (Doctrine and Covenants 38: 1). But he said of the wicked, "An hell I have prepared for them, if they repent not." Of those who perished in the flood, he declared, "I will shut them up; a prison have I prepared for them."—Genesis 6: 30; 7: 44.

Alma gives a complete account of this matter.

The spirits of all men, as soon as they are departed from this mortal body; yea, the spirits of all men, whether they be good or evil, are taken home to that God who gave them life, and then shall it come to pass that the spirits of those who are righteous are received into a state of happiness, which is called paradise; a state of rest; a state of peace, where they shall rest from all their troubles, and from all care and sorrow. . . . The spirits of the wicked . . . shall be cast out into outer darkness; there shall be weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth, . . . and thus they remain in this state, as well as the righteous in paradise until the time of their resurrection.

Changes come at the time of the resurrection. Those with Christ will come with him to reign on the transformed earth. Other groups will be appointed their permanent abodes.

QUESTION:

How did Paul and Silas know that the jailer's household would be willing to be baptized?

Minnesota

M. P.

ANSWER:

Evidently the dungeon for prisoners and the jailer's apartment were in one building, and when the earthquake opened the dungeon doors, the awakened jailer, supposing that the prisoners had fled, was about to kill himself. Paul intervened by saying, "Do thyself no harm for we are all here." It was then that the jailer took them into his house, "and they spake unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in the house." All members of the family heard the gospel that night and were baptized.

Financing the Rural Church

By GERALD GABRIEL

THE OPEN-COUNTRY CHURCHES in the United States have an average income of less than $1,000 per church or an annual contribution of less than $10 per member. It is estimated that 70 to 80 per cent of the income is derived from individual contributions; the remaining 20 to 30 per cent is derived from sundry activities.

For individual contributions, a canvas of the entire membership, and the envelop system are being used with success. Management of church finances is like the management of the home; the church with a well-planned financial program and budget are found to be more successful. Mr. Brunner writes in the Town and Country Church in the United States:

The annual budget, every-member-canvass, and envelope system are being increasingly developed. One third of the town and country churches use all three elements in an efficient financial system.

The per capita contributions of these churches exceeds those without an efficient financial system by from 12 to 100 per cent.

Of the sundry activities employed to raise funds for the rural church, two seem to hold great promise and are at present of much interest to rural leaders. One is that a resident pastor should live on a small farm and raise a few chickens, pigs, a cow or two, a garden, and some crop if desired. The farm should be large enough to furnish the minister and his family with sufficient produce for themselves and some to sell for extra income. In many cases the farms are owned by the church. The pastor and his family belong to the community. This gives them economic security and physical exercise, which is profitable and recreational, and enables the minister to talk the language of the farmer, to see his problems and help solve them.

Another activity that is quite popular is the "Lord's Acre Plan." The individual members of the group set aside a part of a crop, livestock, or produce; when it is sold, they give the proceeds to the church.

Other means used to raise funds are still popular in the different age groups. In the women's department the bake sales, bazaars, and quilting bees, are used to good advantage. Young people raise their funds by box and pie socials, parties, plays, etc.

THE HOME MISSIONS COUNCIL of North America recommends "intensive training in Christian stewardship . . . for accomplishing successful financing" of the church. The report in its conference of 1946 says of stewardship:

It is bound up with the whole life and worship of the church and bears fruit in the following ways:

1. It brings home the teaching of Scripture that each one is a trustee in the sight of God for the use of one's talents, time and possessions.
2. It implies commitment to God, sacrifices to God, and service for the kingdom of God—all of which are fundamental in the building of Christian character.
3. It brings greatly increased spiritual power and financial support to the church; and helps to insure that the life and work of the church shall go forward with growing strength in future years.
4. It deepens the sense of union with Christ who was ever about his Father's business; and creates a firm bond of fellowship within the congregation and with others who are collaborators with God.

5. As training in Christian stewardship is given relief and rehabilitation, it brings about a genuine spirit of sympathy for people in distress.

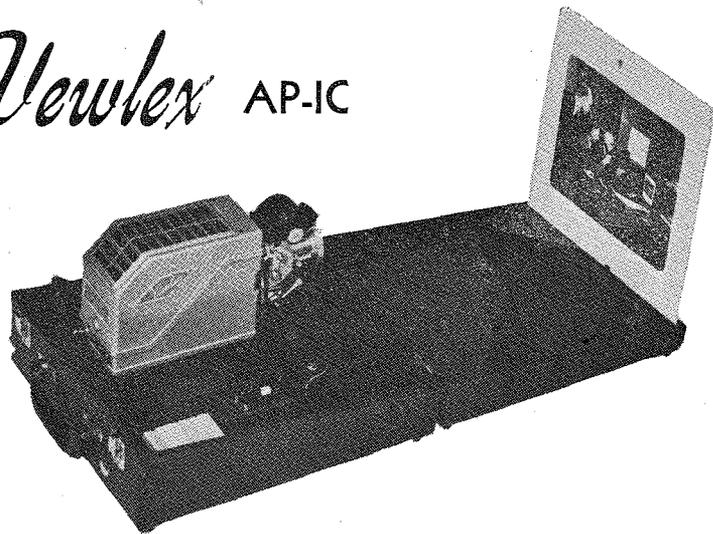

6. Intensive training in Christian stewardship helps one to feel a true kinship with all peoples of the world who worship God as their Father; and a sense of Christian responsibility for all mankind.

7. It definitely utilizes abilities for earning contribution, increases skills in Christian living, and brings about a growing sense of duty for the work of the church. Thus is given sound assurance for the development of capable leadership for the future life and advance of the church.

THE RURAL CHURCH has most always been on the deficit or even side of the ledger. However, the church is not a business; it is a service, therefore, it should not be expected to show profit.

The collection plate has become symbolical of the beggar's method of gathering funds. The church of the people's choice should certainly be able to rise above the method used by the unfortunates seen on city streets. This can be done by use of the envelope, which may be given at the church office or to the bishop's agent.

Viewlex AP-IC

The Model AP-IC is the most revolutionary development in this field in the last 15 years. There has been a long-felt need for projection equipment that is light, compact, and completely self contained. This projector meets all of these requirements and more. The AP-IC measures just 5" x 13" x 14" and weighs less than 12 pounds. It will take any type of 2 x 2 slide as well as single frame filmstrips. They may be projected on the built in "Tuck-away" screen, or with the lid removed, on any conventional screen. A 5" accessory lens is available which converts this machine to the equivalent of the Model AP-2C. A Translucent plastic screen the same size as the "Tuck-away" screen is also available. Its use allows the audience to be grouped around the far side of the screen while the operator sits beside the projector and faces the group. This is the ideal arrangement for cottage meetings and personal contact work. Price complete with 2" f/3.5 coated lens $77.00

The rural church that is a church of the people in other phases will have little trouble in adopting a successful financial program. The remark, "Why doesn't the church do something?" is evidence that the speaker has forgotten he is the church, or else he has been denied sufficient active participation to be able to realize that he is a part of the church. All can and should have an active part in preparing the annual budget, then be cautious about becoming overzealous and overspending the budget. When the every-member canvass is used, the budget must be made according to the findings of the canvass plus past experience. When adequate records are kept over a period of time (several years), the predictions as to how nearly the pledges will be forthcoming will be more accurate.

The income of farm families determines the contribution they make to the church. Since the owner-operator's net income is almost twice that of the tenant-operator, the church contribution of the tenant is about one third of the contribution of the owner-operator. As the standards of living increase, the demand for better church buildings, grounds, church programs, and ministry increases. The rural church in helping to increase the income and better living conditions of its members, is lifting itself by its own bootstraps.

A Personal Testimony

Many people become members of a church because their parents belong. They believe that because a certain religion was good enough for mother and father, it's good enough for them. This is dangerous thinking, unless their religion is the one Paul referred to:

But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed.—Galatians 1: 8.

I have been a member of the Reorganized Church over twenty-seven years. Before joining I belonged to another church for ten years—simply because my mother was a member of it. I can testify now that I know the Reorganized Church is the only church recognized of God.

Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me.—John 5: 40.

Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.—Matthew 7: 14.

Why I Believe in God

There are some wonderful testimonies among our people. That alone is not why I believe in God, though much strength comes to me when I hear the rich experiences of others. These, added to my own experience, give me an added testimony of God. My teaching of God in early life was very little, though my parents were church people. Their knowledge of Divinity was limited, as their preacher was paid to do their thinking for them. I did not study much. We were farmers in the poorer part of eastern Texas. The people there frowned on higher education; reading and writing were sufficient for farm people, and many did not get even that far. I was one of them, and the result was I did not get to know God.

When I was in my early thirties I lived in Wilburton, Oklahoma. I began to attend church so that I could become acquainted with some of the people there. I did not want to belong to the Latter Day Saint Church, but by attending it I thought I would be able to catch something to throw back at the members and prove them to be fakes. I would listen to them pray and testify of God and how he blessed them. I was taught that God had not spoken since the day of Christ and, not hearing from him, I believed it. My brother-in-law, Allen Wooten, was a member and invited me one Sunday to go with him to Fanshawe, just a few miles from Wilburton to hear a debate between Brother Hubert Case and I. W. Yondell, a Freewill Baptist. One thing I remember was that he chewed tobacco and spit all over Brother Case, and I wanted to whip him during the morning session. That afternoon the spirit Brother Case possessed got to me and took all the fight out of me. Then, for the first time in my life, I could really say, "Lord, forgive him, he knoweth not what he does." On the next Sunday afternoon I slipped into the prayer meeting and had to be seated near the middle of the building, as my usual place in the rear of the building was filled. During the testimony service, a brother I had never seen before arose to testify. He spoke in tongues and then began to interpret. As he spoke he turned and pointed a finger at me and said that God desired me to be an elder in the church. There was nothing to do but sit and listen; that was the beginning of my experience in this church. I found God on February 17, 1909. I was baptized by S. W. Simmons and was ordained under the hands of E. A. Erwin and J. T. Riley. In 1923 I moved to California. Since I became a member, I have had experiences I hope never to forget; many healings have come under my observation.

Some months ago I was called to Covina Hospital where one of our young men had been taken following a plane accident. As I looked at him I thought how unlike a human being he looked he was mangled so badly. The doctor whispered to me, "One chance in a million." His mother, brother, nephew, and fiancée did not know what the doctor said. After administering to him I went out in the hall. The doctor came and talked a while, then said, "I will go in and examine him and let you know." He returned in a short time and, as he passed, said the boy's condition was improved but that he would be badly scarred. This same young man came to church last Sunday. The only visible scar is a little bump on his chin.

Yes, I believe in God. He does bless his people. I am at the sundown of time, as far as time goes, but my real life has been spent in his church. The rest has been waste. This church is a challenge to you and me. What are we going to do about it?

From a New Member

My fourteen-year-old daughter and I were baptized on June 4 in Des Moines, Iowa. It was indeed a glorious experience. Some friends of ours, Elder and Mrs. Clyde McDonald, invited us to play a special musical selection at an evening service. From that time on we both felt a decided drawing power in the gospel. Surely the church has a message for all who will let God's Spirit in.

We are happy to tell others about the church and sincerely hope to have a part in winning others to it.

A Cup of Flour

When a friend asked me to borrow a cup of flour from Mildred Draper, Mrs. Levi Gamet's daughter, God must have inspired and blessed the act, for that borrowed cup of flour changed my whole life. Mildred asked me to return, as she wanted to ask about my church, the Christian Science. I was delighted; having brought seven into my church, I immediately hoped she would be my eighth. Getting my book, I returned to her apartment.

"Do you people believe the Bible and the divinity of Jesus Christ?" she asked.

"Certainly we do," I replied.

"Do you believe in present-day revelation and the ministering of angels?" She read Hebrews 13: 2; Revelation 1: 1, and 19: 10.

I replied that I had always believed what God had done he could and would do again, if we were spiritually in tune.

She went on, "How are your ministers called, and are they paid?"

"We do not have ministers, but readers. They are very highly paid."

The REORGANIZED
CHURCH of JESUS CHRIST

My friend then read from the Bible, Hebrews 5: 4 and 13: 8, proving that none could preach without authority from God. Upon my agreeing heartily that this was right, she asked if I were sure the people in my church believed the Bible.

I said we did, but she questioned me as to the form of Communion service we had. This I explained as silent prayer, called "silent communion."

"And you say you believe the Bible!" she remarked. "What form of baptism do you have?"

I had to admit that we had none, only spiritual. She then read how Jesus commanded John to baptize him by going down into the water and coming up out of the water (Matthew 3: 16). Immediately I said I believed that, for Jesus came to show us the way, but I had never thought of it since it was not mentioned in my church.

"What about ordinances and offices of the church?" my friend continued. "Do you have apostles, prophets, evangelists, seventies, priests, high priests, elders, teachers, deacons? You know the Bible says none of the ordinances should be left out or added to by man. All these Jesus placed in his church. There is but one church, one faith, one baptism (Ephesians 4: 4, 5). According to the Bible, only the church having all these offices and ordinances is the true church Jesus established. You can see why I failed to understand how your church could believe in the Bible and not observe the ordinances. What about healing the sick?" She quoted James 5: 14, 15.

"We go to practitioners for 'treatment,' which is silent prayer," I said. "They charge the same as doctors. I never really believed in that, as I could not imagine Jesus praying for the sick, then asking or accepting pay. It never seemed right—commercializing prayer. You certainly have me thinking! I believe every word you have told me and proved by the Bible."

Mildred then went into the next room, returning with a book which she said was a history of the early Americans. Looking at the cover I saw the word "Mormon" and said in disgust, "What have you to do with Mormons?" To me "Mormon" meant Brigham Young and polygamy.

She smiled and satisfied me by saying, "Nothing. The book was written by a man named Mormon."

This was about nine in the morning. As Mildred's husband was away on business, and her eighteen-year-old daughter was on a vacation, we had plenty of time to ourselves. We started reading the Book of Mormon, taking turns. I was so interested and thrilled over every word that it was four in the afternoon before either of us realized how quickly time was passing. At Mildred's insistence that we stop for food, I begged her not to stop because I was getting all the food I needed.

We took about fifteen minutes out to eat some soup and crackers, and then began reading again. The next time we looked at the clock, it was four in the morning of the following day.

Mildred said we must stop and go to bed, but I still was not ready to stop reading. I felt lifted up and grateful, humble, and happy to have found the true gospel at last. Not feeling the need of sleep, I prayed the rest of the night for guidance, asking God to show me the truth, not to let me leave my church if this were not his. But I had the testimony of God's truth as we read, every word burning within me.

Graceland's Doors Are Still Open

GRACELAND COLLEGE still has room for students of quality. New students are scheduled to arrive on the campus on September 8. Young men and women of the church who may have caught more of the vision of the church during reunions and who now desire to bend every effort toward preparing themselves for greater work may still enroll at Graceland College even at this late hour.

Such persons should write, wire, phone, or visit the Public Relations Office, Graceland College, Lamoni, Iowa, immediately. The committee on student selection stands ready to engage in extraordinary procedures to make it possible for all qualified applicants to gain admission to the college.

If there are young men in the church who have delayed their decisions owing to unrest in the face of critical world conditions, let them be reminded that they may well expect unrest to continue, and that the call to the youth of the church is to develop within themselves the redemptive powers which are the peculiar gift of those who represent Christ and his church. Now is the time to make decisions. What can be gained by delay? Enroll now at Graceland. In no other place in the world has a comparable array of consecrated talent been gathered so divinely calculated to prepare young men and women to qualify for their peculiar tasks in the shaping of the kingdom. Graceland exists to serve the youth of the church in this critical hour.

Graceland will continue to admit students until classes open on September 13. It is in the best interest of prospective students, however, that they complete their plans if possible before September 8.

Graceland expects to enroll about 550 students from forty states and several countries this fall. The college is better prepared than ever before to serve these young men and women. Graceland's courses are fully accredited and her students transfer without loss of credit to the finest institutions of higher learning in the land. Graceland welcomes inquiry from the prospective student who desires to enroll in the fall of 1950.

R. EDWIN BROWNE,
Director of Public Relations

Soon we finished the Book of Mormon. Then we read together the Doctrine and Covenants, Church History, all the Angel Message Tracts, and some Heralds.

Then, as Mildred and her husband were going on a business trip for several weeks, I was asked to stay with her daughter. I could now spend all my time reading and learning about this glorious gospel. Reading night and day, and thanking God every minute for his goodness in giving me this opportunity, I read the Call at Evening, Voice of Warning, Beatrice Witherspoon, Timbers for the Temple, Joe Pine, Square Blocks, In the Shelter of the Little Brown Cottage, A Vineyard Story, Old Jerusalem Gospel, and many others.

The following October (1935), I joined the church. I considered myself the happiest woman on earth, and I longed to bring the whole world into this church.

My advice to the Saints is to study, study! I have read the Book of Mormon and Doctrine and Covenants through sixteen times, besides studying them in church school classes. Still I feel I've hardly scratched the surface. Earnestly I ask the prayers of God's people that I may be given wisdom and understanding to tell the story intelligently to others, and that I may never bring discredit to the church I love so much.

American Visitors in England

Recently we had the pleasure of having Sisters Doris Oakman and Irene Rannie of Independence visit us. Sister Oakman had been away for twenty years; Sister Rannie was on her first visit. A reception for them was arranged by the women's department so that they could renew old friendships and make new ones; Carole Trapp, granddaughter of Bishop and Mrs. A. T. Trapp, presented bouquets of roses and carnations to them. Sister Oakman brought her films of church activities in the Center Place and recordings of sermons by Apostle Arthur Oakman and Elder Glaude Smith, pastor of Stone Church.

We send our best wishes and appreciation to the women of Independence for their concern for us.

The Word of Wisdom - Part IV

WHEN JESUS WAS HERE on earth, he spent much time "healing all manner of sickness and all manner of diseases." Luke says:

They went through the towns preaching the gospel and healing everywhere . . . and the people when they knew it, followed him, and he received them, and spake unto them of the kingdom of God, and healed them who had need of healing.

The first missionary who went to India to preach the gospel found it slow work converting the people. Not until he had won their confidence and love by bringing health to their bodies was he able to minister to them in a spiritual way. Hospitals were set up, medical missionaries were trained, nurse's training was offered women of India themselves that they might help overcome the diseases prevalent in their land. Then when the bodies of these suffering people had been healed, the missionaries were able to bring healing to their souls.

Few of us will ever go to heathen countries to preach the gospel, but right around us we find much suffering and sickness. Can it be that there are those who would be interested in the gospel if first they found relief from illness and suffering? I believe the Word of Wisdom has missionary value.

Health is an easy thing to talk about. We include it in our greetings, "How are you?" The Bible tells us specifically to visit the sick. How much encouragement the Word of Wisdom could give them with its wonderful promises of abundant health both physical and mental. "My operation" has come to be a standard joke, but with sympathetic listening and a prayer for the right things to say, one can make such conversation an opportunity for missionary work.

By FLORENCE SANFORD OURTH

AMONG THE NAUVOO WOMEN, missionary work along this line first reached out to church friends in other branches. Sister W. H. McKiernan of the Fort Madison Branch, who visits Nauvoo frequently, became interested in whole wheat bread. Not only did she go home and bake it herself, but she talked it up and gave the recipe to other women in her branch, encouraging them to bake their own bread.

Sister August Lee had several relatives in the Burlington Branch, and whenever she went to visit she would take some of her baking along. Soon many of the Saints there were using whole wheat.

We have begun also to reach out to our nonmember friends, and it is surprising how many opportunities have opened up for us to share with them. Sister Lee happened to be in the grocery store at a lull time one day and the lady clerk said, "Come behind the counter and have a cup of coffee with us." "I don't care for any coffee," she replied "but let me run over home, and I'll bring you some of my whole wheat coffee cake that I baked this morning." She found that the owner of the store was a diabetic but could eat whole wheat bread. So after that Sister Lee shared her baking with her until she moved to Burlington, Iowa.

One day the subject of bread came up in the conversation as Brother Bernard Galbraith was going over accounts with one of his clients, so the next time his wife Jean baked, he took a loaf of whole wheat bread to this client who appreciated it very much.

If someone is sick in our neighborhood, or if there has been a death in the family, a loaf of fresh bread or a pan of rolls is often taken to the home. On these occasions we pray that our bread will be good, as well as praying for those to whom we take it. I was interested in the article, "Worship in the Home," by Lillie Jennings printed in July-August Guide Lines. She says,

In a Jewish family on baking day, God's blessing was first asked on the flour as it flowed out of the barrel into the mixing bowl. Then the smoothly mixed dough was set aside for rising. It was covered with a cloth and left with God's blessing upon it again. And when the dough had puffed up, had been shaped into flat cakes and was in the oven baking, for the third time God was asked to bless it.

If one feels she needs an excuse to visit somebody, it is easy for her to say, "I was baking bread today so brought you a loaf." If visitors are in our homes at baking time, they are invited to sit down and have a sample with a glass of milk and perhaps some honey. And if they ask for the recipe, they are given some flour also to take home since the right kind of flour is sometimes hard to get. No one will ever know how much flour and bread have been given away by Nauvoo women.

SEVERAL YEARS AGO I taught a primary class in the church school. One of the lessons was of the widow who shared her meal and her oil with Elijah, and I was very much impressed with the promise to her; "Thy barrel of meal shall not waste, neither shall thy cruse of oil fail." Several years later at the Nauvoo Reunion my husband was spoken to in prophecy by Elder Arthur Oakman. Among other things he was told, "And it shall be even as it was to the widow who fed the prophet—thy oil and thy meal shall not be wasted.” It was a wonderful promise, but we felt it was not just a blessing for us.

Nauvoo being a cornerstone of Zion, I began to think of the time when the Saints would have to flee to Zion and would need to be fed. I thought of a prophecy by Sister Roy Weldon in which the Lord said, “by faith my people shall share their last crust of bread—and Zion shall be.” It could be a blessing to many if our barrel of meal would not be wasted.

When we became interested in the Word of Wisdom and began sharing our bread and our meal, Brother Oakman’s prophecy took on another meaning, for surely this meal will not be wasted if it helps to bring health to these people.

Recently I have been impressed with the possibilities of the Word of Wisdom as an opening for telling our neighbors and friends the gospel story. And I thought again that surely our meal would not be wasted, if by sharing it we brought souls to God.

Here is a recipe for steamed brown bread intended to be served with baked beans, but it makes a nice change for sandwiches filled with cheese for lunch boxes or picnics.

- 3 cups of whole wheat flour
- 1 teaspoon salt
- 1 teaspoon soda
- ½ cup of raisins or nuts
- 1¾ cups milk
- ¾ cup honey or molasses

Sift dry ingredients, add raisins and mix, then milk and honey. Put in steamer, a three pound Crisco can, or three one-pound cans, and cover. Put on low rack in cooker as for canning, fill cooker with water to within two inches of top of cans. Cook for two hours, timing when water starts boiling.

MINOT, NORTH DAKOTA.—A preaching service was held in the morning of July 30 at the Logan schoolhouse with Elder Joe Ballantyne and Elder Nelt Wager in charge.

This service was followed by a baptismal ceremony in which Caryl Louise, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Virgil Smith, Geraldine Maxine, daughter of Mrs. Ethel Strong, and Harold Martin of Logan were baptized by Elder Joe Ballantyne.

Following the baptismal service, a picnic lunch was served at the Reece Whitted farm home.

In the afternoon a confirmation service was held followed by a special branch meeting to decide if we should continue as an organized branch or become disorganized and be a group. It was decided to remain as an organized branch and Elder Nelt Wager of Bantry was elected as our pastor.

A service was held on August 6 at the Logan schoolhouse with Elders Joe Ballantyne and Nelt Wager in charge. This was followed by a Communion service, after which a regular branch business meeting was held. The following officers were elected: Elder Nelt Wager, pastor; Teacher James O'Brien, assistant pastor; Mrs. Leon Beeter, secretary; Mrs. Glenn Bunker, solicitor and treasurer; Mrs. Homer Cornell, women's leader; Mrs. Virgil Smith, reporter.—Reported by VIRGIL D. SMITH.

FORREST, ILLINOIS. — Missionary G. Wayne Smith held a series of cottage meetings from July 23 to August 6. Illustrated missionary sermons were presented at the church on Sunday evenings. At the close of the endeavor, Wayne, Sylvia, Delores, Janet and Doyle Adamson, and Mary Elizabeth Brown were baptized.

HAMILTON, ONTARIO.—Apostle C. G. Mesley, newly appointed apostle to this mission, visited Hamilton Branch on May 8. He was accompanied by Bishop G. L. DeLapp and John F. Sheehy. This being Brother Mesley's first visit, a large number of our membership were present to meet him. A colored Kodachrome, "Alaska, land of the midnight sun," was shown by Brother Mesley. Brother DeLapp also gave a short talk.

Recent speakers at our Sunday evening services have been Elder George Towers, Niagara Falls, Ontario, Elder William Archer, pastor of Woodbridge Branch, and Evangelist B. H. Hewitt, Toronto. Local speakers were Elders F. H. Gilliam, F. J. Boyd, and F. E. Oliver, and Brother L. W. Hill.

On Sunday evening, May 28, we were very pleased to welcome Brother J. Leslie Prentice's Sunday school class at our service. They were returning from a week-end trip to Palmyra, New York. The party consisted of two busloads—74 people in all. It taxed the seating capacity of our auditorium. To make this service a success, Brother L. W. Hill presented a fine challenge in his sermon lesson.

Port Elgin and Erie Beach reunions were well attended by our members. Twenty-three attended Port Elgin and eight were present at Erie Beach. At both of these gatherings, the spirit of devotion was of a high caliber, and the large numbers present were lifted up by the splendid ministry of Apostle Mesley and his associate workers.

On August 15 Hamilton Branch will lose one of its most important families. Brother and Sister D. L. Culp will move to Brantford, Ontario. Brother Culp's firm is transferring him to take charge of the Brantford office. For the past ten years, Brother Culp has been deacon in charge and branch treasurer as well as branch solicitor for the Bishopric. He will be in a position to render valuable assistance to the Brantford Mission just recently commenced under the direction of Elder C. E. Muir, London district president.

Sister Lillian McKinnon of Windsor, Ontario, is recovering from a very serious operation in the Mountain Sanitarium. The doctors are very hopeful for her complete recovery. She asks that we continue to remember her in our devotions so that she will be able to be up and around again soon. It will be necessary for her to remain in bed at Windsor after her discharge here until some time in January, according to medical advice.—Reported by F. ELDON OLIVER.

LOCK FOUR BRANCH, NORTH CHARLEROI, PENNSYLVANIA.—On July 30, Nancy Jane, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. W. Markle of West Newton, Pennsylvania, was blessed by Elder Clarence Winship, and George Marcellious, son of Mr. and Mrs. M. Mills of Maple View, Charleroi, Pennsylvania, was blessed by Elder Henry Winship.—Reported by DORIS DOOLEY.

IOLA, KANSAS.—Three were baptized on July 2 in the swimming pool at Riverside Park: Janice Carlson of Chanute was baptized by her grandfather, Priest Roy Hill; Elizabeth Bain of Chanute and Sam Matney of Iola were baptized by Elder Lee Quick of Mapleton. Following the service the group went to Chanute where the new members were confirmed by Elders A. C. Barker of Chanute and Lee Quick. A reception is being planned to welcome them in the church.—Reported by LILLIAN MATNEY.

ALBERTA DISTRICT CONFERENCE.—The Alberta District Conference convened at Sylvan Lake, Alberta, July 17 to 23. Ministers in charge were Apostle Paul M. Hanson, Seventy Z. Z. Renfroe, and District President Elgin Clark. Other general church officers present were Elders John Darling and Aleah Koury.

Officers chosen to serve the district for the following year are: District presidency, Elgin Clark, David Larmour, Angus McLeod; secretary, Ardella Clark; treasurer, Richard Osler; auditor, C. R. Bowerman; director of religious education, Magdaline Unstad; director of music, Dorothy Howard; nonresident pastor, northern district, David Bowerman; southern district, Stanley Walker; women's leader, Hazel Dallyn; publicity agent, Gladys Larmour; Zion's League leader, David Bowerman; Zion's League supervisor, Robert Jenkins; Zion's League secretary, Patricia Shaw.

Prior to the conference, Apostle Hanson visited the Edmonton Branch and officiated at the ordination of Brother William Osler to the office of evangelist on Sunday, July 16.—Reported by GLADYS LARMOUR.

NORTHWEST REUNION.—The reunion of the four Northwest Districts was held August 4 to 13 at Silver Lake, Washington. This was the largest gathering ever held in the Northwest. During the first part of the week, there were 1,400 campers; by Wednesday there were 1,700, and by the last Sunday there were 2,000.

President F. Henry Edwards taught classes each day for the youth and priesthood, assisted in presiding over all prayer services, and went on the early morning hikes to the young people's prayer services. Apostle E. J. Gleazer was in charge of the reunion and taught the adult class each morning. He presided over the prayer services and shared the evening and Sunday preaching with President Edwards.

Other teachers and leaders who helped make the reunion a success were the many workers who prepared the grounds, took care of the odd jobs during the week, and removed the tents when the reunion was over. These workers were headed by Missionaries Arthur F. Gibbs, Paul Wellington, Vern Webb, and Elwin Vest; Evangelists Frank Curtis and Adolph Lundeen; Elders Harold Carpenter, Ray Sowers, Granville Swenson, Sam Clark and C. E. Hammel; Bishop M. E. Lasater; Sisters Effie Verhei, Peggy Vest, Rose Lasater, and Eva Lundeen.

The annual Salmon Bake was held on Thursday afternoon under the leadership of L. R. White, pastor of the Bellingham Branch.

The committee in charge of the reunion consists of the four district presidents, the bishop, and the apostle in charge, Apostle E. J. Gleazer, with J. H. Verhei serving as his representative during his absence. Granville Swenson serves as secretary and assists Elder Verhei. Bishop M. E. Lasater acts as treasurer. A committee made up of Apostle Gleazer, Elder Verhei, and Bishop Laster was selected to decide on ground improvements and building projects on the grounds. The reunion budget will be brought before the four district conferences for approval.—Reported by J. H. VERHEI.

CENTRAL AND SOUTHWEST TEXAS REUNION.—The Texas reunion of the Central and Southwest Districts drew to an inspiring close Sunday, July 30, at the camp grounds at Bandera. "We Witness for Christ in the Restoration" was the theme of the nine-day meeting.

President F. Henry Edwards was present the first four days, and Apostle Percy E. Farrow was in charge.

Morning devotionals were broadcast over the P.A. system by Elder Arthur Rock. General prayer meeting and classes followed breakfast. The men's class was instructed by Elder A. H. Yale on family evangelism. Elder John G. Wight taught the young people, while Mrs. Dagmar Root lectured the women's class, using the text, "I Witness for Christ," by Blanche Mesley. Children's work was under the supervision of Mrs. Mary Hall with Elder Preston Wheeler serving as children's pastor and Mrs. Vera Barksdale teaching handcraft.

The dining hall was managed by Ed Everetts, assisted by Catherine Wilder. Approximately 500 people were served the first Sunday.

Southwest District President J. E. Wilder was in charge of grounds maintenance, while Central District President C. W. Tischer was program director. Bill Hall supervised tent-cot rentals.

Emma Jackson directed the music for the reunion. On the first Saturday evening there was a recital of instrumental and piano numbers. Daily choir rehearsals provided anthems and special selections for each evening's preaching service. A mixed choir sang "The Crucifixion," by Stainer, the final Saturday evening. Miss Aleta Runkle conducted a discussion on "Music in Our Branches" each evening at 7 o'clock.

A bazaar sponsored by the women of both districts sold many beautiful and useful items during the reunion, all proceeds to be used for payment on the camp grounds.

Five baptisms were performed in the Medina River. They were for: Jo Ann Brashears of Dallas, Karen Sue Wakeman of Uvalde, Mrs. Beulah Beaver of Houston, Grant and Philip Salzman of Dillon, Montana.

One evening was devoted to Graceland publicity; a program of slides and lecture was conducted by Coach Dick Carter. The Houston Zion's League presented the play, "The Lost Church," the last Saturday evening.—Reported by LILLIAN MORSE.

MARLIN, TEXAS.—The Marlin Branch held its Vacation Bible school from August 7 to 18 with a good attendance. The school was under the direction of Sister Zella Standifer of San Antonio, Texas, with many of the Marlin church members assisting and Brother Raymond Brown in charge.

Election was held on August 6. Elder J. R.

Allen was elected pastor with Earl Allen and Arthur Allen as counselors.

On Sunday, August 13, Elder A. J. Rock baptized four young people into the church: Mrs. Arthur Allen, Barbara Marks, Douglas Harless, and Shirley Broom. Three men were called and ordained to the Aaronic priesthood under the hands of Elders Rock and Allen.

On August 2, Apostle Percy Farrow and Seventy J. G. Wight visited with the Marlin Saints.—Reported by MRS. RAYMOND RENEAU.

CENTRAL MISSOURI STAKE REUNION.

—The Central Missouri Stake Reunion was held at Lake Venita, Odessa, Missouri, from July 22 to 30. A new feature this year was the 6:30 morning devotions over the loud speakers, coming by radio from radio station KMBC during the week. On Sunday mornings, John T. Puckett, stake missionary, was in charge of the devotional periods. The theme was, "We Witness for Christ in the Restoration."

Apostle Charles Hield delivered five powerful and enlightening sermons during the week. On Friday night Patriarch Henry Castings spoke on "Spiritual Gifts." Brother Castings attended the entire reunion and gave a number of patriarchal blessings.

The young people conducted their own prayer services on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Saturday mornings. John T. Puckett was in charge of the Senior League class and Clair Weldon the Junior League.

The children's work was directed by Wilma Green of Knob Noster, and the nursery was in charge of Ruby York of Warrensburg. The children's choir sang two songs at the Saturday evening talent hour.

The general classwork was directed by the Stake Presidency: Harry J. Simons, S. E. Mifflin, and Hunter Ferguson using as a basis of discussion the new missionary material, "The Restoration Story." The men's classwork was in charge of Bishop Willard C. Becker with speakers from the Extension Division of the University of Missouri. Each evening Brother Becker taught a class on "Stewardship." On Saturday afternoon, Dr. F. M. McDowell addressed the priesthood class. The women's class used "I Witness for Christ," by Blanche Mesley, during their morning sessions. Sister Ruth Simons was in charge with Florence Hughes, Doras Becker, Lillian Weldon, Lucretia Mifflin, and John T. Puckett as instructors. During the afternoon sessions, the Word of Wisdom was discussed by Sister D. R. Hughes, "Home Nursing," by Geneva Smith, R.N., and "Foods and Nutrition," by Hazel Sartin. On Wednesday afternoon, John Blackmore, church historian, spoke to a group of the branch historians. At the business meeting on Wednesday, two recommendations for ordination were unanimously accepted—Otho Clark to the office of high priest, and Clair Weldon to the office of elder. They were ordained that evening at a special service.

The reunion choir, under the direction of Netta Anderson, stake music director, and the orchestra, directed by Ammon Roberson of Warrensburg, proved a success. On two afternoons Franklyn Weddle, general church director of music, taught a class for the priesthood and music leaders.

Five persons were baptized on the last Sunday morning. Dr. F. M. McDowell preached at 10:45, and the closing sermon was given by the stake president, Harry J. Simons.—Reported by LOUISE LOVELAND.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

"... For the People Had a Mind to Work"

By DON LANDON

THE NETTLES wilted under a relentless beating of the July sun. A crew of four barebacked men labored slowly and independently in the heat of the day laying pipe—each man a unit in himself, concerned only with himself—each an anonymous entity. They had only one thing in common—an interest in the time clock.

Two men were putting the finishing touches on the ditch they had dug—each waiting for the other to remove a rock imbedded at the bottom. Both were determined not to touch it, since it was in the other's half of the ditch.

The other two men were tapping the main gas line to connect the newly laid service. One was in the bottom of a deep hole operating the hand-driven tap machine. The other was standing aimlessly above the hole in the shade of a tree.

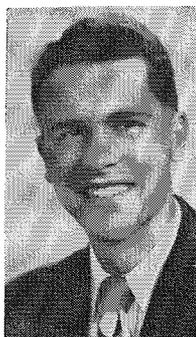

These men had worked together for two weeks and knew each other only as "Hey, you!" Each dug his part of the ditch independently of the others and was sure to measure out only his correct portion of digging. They considered their job as one that had to be done—any time!

BILL who was making the tap in the main line, looked up out of the hole he was in and barked an order to the fellow standing above him. The tap was about through, so Bill slowed his arm motion on the machine. When he felt the bit pierce the main and the gas rush into the barrel of the tap machine, he began unscrewing the machine from the large pipe and held a plug ready to check the gas. At that instant a sudden burst of pressure was loosed from the main line, blowing the machine from the hole it had made and leaving the hole in the main blowing natural gas behind twenty-nine pounds of pressure. Bill suddenly realized what had happened and tried to cover the hole with his hand, but the pressure pushed it away. The pit he was sitting in was full of gas and dust, and the gas was blowing out over the street. The slightest spark of flame within twenty-five feet around the hole would cause a disastrous explosion.

Still unable to check the blowing main, Bill hollered above the hissing of the gas for help.

AT ONCE the other men realized the danger and were suddenly transformed from three independent unco-operative laborers to a single

He was class president during his freshman year, and editor of the "Tower" during his sophomore year at Graceland. He plans to enter the University of Iowa this fall where he will major in education, journalism, and sociology. He was ordained to the office of priest in 1947.

unit bent on rescuing Bill from the gas and plugging the hole. Bill lay in the large pit vainly trying to stem the onrushing gas, while the three other men moved quickly to be of aid. One ran to the truck and got a larger plug; another grabbed a wrench; and the third jumped into the pit with Bill. Each worked as gears meshing together. Through their concerted effort, the hole was plugged and Bill—faint from the gas—was pulled to safety. Afterwards the four men stood looking into each other's faces with quelled fear. They were speechless as they realized that as a single unit they had accomplished a task that could have been done only by men working together. When a crisis faced them, their individualism changed into efficient co-operation that made each man work for the good of the other and for the unit as a whole. All four of their lives were endangered—before they realized it.

The remainder of the afternoon passed quickly, and the men completed their work. This experience initiated a feeling of unity among them and developed a sense of appreciation for honest-to-goodness work. From that day on, the crew had a mind to work. A crisis had turned the trick.

* * * * *

SOME PEOPLE employed by a large firm are occasionally heard boasting of the small amount of work they have to do to keep their jobs. Laziness seems to have replaced the virtue of industriousness.

The mental set of people toward work has long been the classic subject of discussion among the more industrious. Ambition and industry are Christlike qualities that must have their beginning in the home. Following a parent's example is characteristic of children. If a father is slovenly and believes the fall frost will kill the July weeds, he often gives a worthless heritage to his young son.

Christ, as an example for man, was the essence of industry. His "wist ye not that I must be about my father's business" at the age of twelve set the stage for a life of untiring service. As an apprentice carpenter, he worked with Joseph and then spent three years in the ministry that took nearly a lifetime of preparation. An intensive three years it was. As the disciples tried to rebuke the mothers and their children from seeing Christ because of his supposed exhaustion, he arose and said, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

The Master was a worker—a fit example for thousands of Latter Day Saints who are faced with a crisis as were the pipe-layers. Humanity faces annihilation or salvation, and the gospel that will transform men's lives is in the hands of a small minority. We, as Latter Day Saints, are living in a critical moment and have the responsibility of showing a better way of life to a world which is cheating itself of the degree of happiness and joy its Creator planned for it. We have the choice of meeting the crisis, or evading it, and thereby denouncing the truth and power of the message.

A CHRONIC FATIGUE plagues too many of us, and we are willing to ride in the chariot pulled by those who have a mind to work. Christ's work was not designed to be done by a group of people split between industry and apathy. All are called to invest their very best resources in the production of a quality product—a new social order—the kingdom of God—Zion.

Nehemiah and his followers in Jerusalem were faced with the job of rebuilding the walls of the city that were torn down by the Babylonians when they destroyed the city of the Hebrews and took captive its people. The builders were constantly harassed by attackers from the Arabians, Ammonites, Ashdodites, and the forces of Sanballat and Tobiah as they labored on the wall. They could easily have become discouraged by these attackers who tore down their walls as they attempted to build them up, deserted the job, and fled the city; but their determination and will to work held them to the task.

Nehemiah devised the plan whereby each resident would build up the wall on his property and stand guard at night against the attackers. The wall was built in small sections and joined together as the neighbors worked one with another. So each fulfilled his given task, and Nehemiah writes:

So built we the wall; and all the wall was joined together unto the half thereof; FOR THE PEOPLE HAD A MIND TO WORK.

A Southerner Speaks on the Racial Issue - By Ed Barlow

BORN AND REARED in the South, I had never been out of Alabama until the summer I went to Oregon to work in a pea cannery with about seventy-five students from Graceland. There I hoped to save enough money to fulfill a lifetime ambition and attend Graceland College. I had many experiences on the West Coast that summer and among them was one that helped me to begin to see through one of the greatest paradoxes ever concocted by man—the racial issue.

I met many people while working there; one of them was a nice looking, well-mannered Negro boy (I thought). I was friendly to him, as I have always been to members of the colored race; but back in my mind I held a concealed feeling that I was just a little better than he, and that I was entitled to more than he was. I only felt what I had seen practiced for eighteen years in the South and what most everyone else felt where I came from—with the exception of a few church members.

Time passed, and I enrolled in Graceland in September. The first week I was there I saw the same boy I had thought was a Negro in Oregon. I learned he was from the Hawaiian Islands. I got to know him very well, and we developed a good friendship. Before the school year was out, he held my respect as much as any other person on the campus. This young man is the type that God can depend on to build his kingdom.

WHAT HAPPENED between July in Oregon and September in Graceland? The boy didn't change any. I changed my attitude because I found out he was a Hawaiian. What if he had been a Negro? He would have had the same personality, same talents, same capabilities, and would have been just as important in the sight of God.

I have learned my lesson. This young man would have been the same to everyone except those who blindly held on to prejudiced ideas as I did.

We just got through fighting a war because some people across the ocean said they were a superior race. Now some of us come right back home and try to tell the Negroes that we're the superior race. It all sounds silly to me now.

It is time we started judging people as individuals rather than on the basis of who their ancestors were, how their eyes slant, or what color their skin may be. Truth is truth no matter what false notions people may get in their heads. The sooner we realize that God is interested in every individual, the sooner He will be able to use us in the building of his kingdom and the furthering of his purposes.

God's Business

There were Hindus from India, several Filipinos, a few Hawaiians, Chinese, Japanese, and South Americans gathered around a fireplace in an American home on an American campus. A Brahman and an Untouchable sat side by side. After the meeting had started, a blonde girl from Alabama came in late. A Negro boy near the door stood up, smiled, and offered her his chair, but she walked past him to the davenport and squeezed in between two of the South Americans. He could not blush, but everyone else did. A little later the discussion turned to the question of racial tolerance as it so often did in the International Club. Looking across the room at the southern girl, the Negro commented, "If I am selfish or ill-tempered or discourteous, you may call me to account; but if you find fault with the color of my skin, I must refer you to God."

New Horizons

before they sinned against light and truth (See Hebrews 6: 4-6; 10: 26-29; Doctrine and Covenants 85: 6).

There is no final judgment, only "eternal judgment," for God's judgment is eternal judgment. (See Hebrews 6:2; Doctrine and Covenants 18: 1, 2; and Psalm 139: 1-12.) For wherever God is, there is his judgment, either to bless or to punish. It is not Satan that does the punishing of the wicked; it is the Spirit of God that operates upon the conscience of man.

Reward Is Certain

Jesus said, "Whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward."—Matthew 10: 42. Unless we believe in the doctrine of "Once in grace, always in grace," and that the mere giving of a cup of cold water is a passport to heaven, then we will have to admit that many such people will have to receive their rewards after coming out of the prison house. No one could enjoy a reward while undergoing punishment. Thus the rewarding will take place after the debt is paid—after the resurrection. That is why the Apostle Paul said to Timothy, "Some men's sins go before to judgment; and some men's sins follow after."—I Timothy 5: 24.

Some people obey the gospel here in this life and by constant obedience to the laws governing the kingdom of God, they have their sins remitted before they die. But the others who did some good things, but did not hold out until the end, or did not unite with the church in this life, will have their sins follow after them to judgment.

The rewarding does not take place until after the resurrection. (See Matthew 16: 27; 25: 31-46; Revelation 20: 11-15; 22: 12.)

God said to Isaiah,

As the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and turneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater; so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth; it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it.—Isaiah 55: 10, 11.

No, Christ will not fail or be defeated by Satan. He will accomplish what he pleases to do, and that is to save mankind.

The following references might be of interest to the reader: "God sent not his son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved."—John 3: 17. Read also verse 16.

"The Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives but to save them."—Luke 9: 56.

"The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost."—Luke 19: 10.

Paul said: "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners."—I Timothy 1: 15.

If Christ could save all mankind, but will not, would he be infinite in love and mercy? If Christ would save all mankind, but cannot, would he be omnipotent, all powerful?

The Book of Mormon and the Bible tell us that Christ is infinite and omnipotent. See Book of Mormon 429: 210; 217: 116-118; 225: 21, and Revelation 19: 6. The Apostle Paul said: "Christ must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."—I Corinthians 15: 25, 26 (Matthew 28: 18; Revelation 1: 18).

Thus we see how nicely the whole plan of salvation fits together; so out of the depth of our souls we can say with the Apostle Jude, "To the only wise God our Savior, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever."—Jude 25.

DEATHS

DAHL.—Grace A., was born December 5, 1893, in Rhode Island and died August 16, 1950, at Auburn, California. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since June 20, 1908, and had lived in Roseville, California, for the past seven years.

She is survived by her husband, George; seven children: Floyd, George, and Lavina of Roseville; Mrs. Dorothy Gavrilka of Placerville, California; Mrs. Marjorie Carpenter of Pacific House, California; Mrs. Florence Montgomery of San Francisco, California; and Mrs. Ruth Foltz of Richmond, California; and two sisters: Mrs. Mabel Fisher of Canada, and Mrs. Ida Miller of Nampa, Idaho. One daughter preceded her in death. Funeral services were held at the Lambert Chapel in Roseville, Evangelist William H. Dawson officiating. Interment was in the Roseville Cemetery.

HILT.—Luella W., daughter of Nelson and Zylphia Caselman, was born January 7, 1865, in Kane County, Illinois, and died August 12, 1950, at Bethany Hospital in Kansas City, Kansas. She was married on February 25, 1885, to Newton Hilt who preceded her in death on April 4, 1937. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since October 17, 1875.

Surviving are two daughters: Mrs. Lillian E. Clark of Kansas City, Kansas, with whom she had been making her home; and Mrs. Osia Crane of Munsie, Kansas; four sons: Arthur, Alfred, Wesley, and Harry, all of Kansas City, Kansas; eighteen grandchildren and twenty-nine great-grandchildren. A daughter, Civilla, died in 1890.

CARTER.—Merna Joyce, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ray Carter of Chilliwack, British Columbia, was born December 27, 1930, and died August 8, 1950, at the Royal Columbian Hospital in New Westminster, British Columbia. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since July 20, 1941, and in 1949 was elected church school director for the Rosedale Branch. She was conscientious in her work and was loved and respected by those who knew her. At the time she became ill she was in nurses' training.

Besides her parents she leaves three sisters and a brother: Mrs. William Scott, Lethbridge, Alta. Mrs. Lloyd Taylor of Agassiz, British Columbia; Lynda and Arthur of the home. Elder Norman Morrison and Brother Clark conducted the funeral services. Interment was in the I.O.O.F. Cemetery in Chilliwack.

FRIEND.—Rena Maria Joice, was born October 21, 1878, at Mexico, New York, and died August 16, 1950, at her home in Independence, Missouri. In 1881 she moved with her family to Michigan, and it was there that she was baptized into the Reorganized Church on May 8, 1892. On May 16, 1897, she was married to Harry J. Friend. They first made their home in Stewartsville, Missouri, then moved to Far West, and in 1912 to Independence; nine children were born to them. They celebrated their golden wedding anniversary at the East Independence Church on May 16, 1947. Sister Friend found pleasure in handwork and painting and gave generously of her art to her family and friends.

She is survived by her husband, Harry; six sons: Joseph of Blue Springs, Missouri; Jesse, Michael, and David of Littleton, Colorado; Harry and Daniel of Independence; three daughters: Mrs. Jennie Butler of Blue Springs; Mrs. Elizabeth Stark and Mrs. Charlotte Wagener of Independence; a sister, Mrs. Alice Campbell, and a brother, Dr. Charles A. Joice of Independence; thirty grandchildren and eleven great-grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted by Elders Glaude A. Smith and John T. Smith. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

CRICK.—Thomas, son of James and Letitia Evans Crick, was born December 1, 1867, in Beaver, Utah, and died August 12, 1950, at Independence, Missouri. In 1896 he moved to Independence and, with his brother, William, became associated with the Independence Foundry, now known as the Independence Stove and Furnace Company. In 1929 he became president of the company, which position he held until his death. For many years he was a member of the Board of Directors of the Chrisman-Sawyer Bank. He also maintained membership in the Kansas City Athletic Club, Lodge No. 76 A.F. and A.M., and the Ararat Shrine. In 1930 he succeeded in winning the President's Flight at the Independence Country Club; this trophy was one of his prize possessions. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on April 15, 1878, was ordained a teacher on December 13, 1907, and an elder on January 5, 1920. On December 8, 1897, he married Maude Green who preceded him in death on October 23, 1945.

He is survived by three daughters: Mrs. John Feldhahn of Independence; Mrs. David Duke of Tulsa, Oklahoma; and Mrs. Wallace Hatcher of Paul's Valley, Oklahoma; a sister, Mrs. Ellen Hattay, and a brother, David Crick, both of Independence. He also leaves eight grandchildren and one great-grandchild. Funeral services were held at Stone Church, Elders L. F. P. Curry and Glaude A. Smith officiating. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

DROSCHKE.—John E., was born February 19, 1894, at Lexington, Texas, and died June 6, 1950, of a heart attack at Marlin, Texas. He had operated a farm near Eddy, Texas.

He is survived by his wife Edna; three sons: Wayne, Gene, and Cecil, all of Eddy; three daughters: Mrs. Luther Russo and Patsy of Eddy, and Mrs. H. A. Ihlenfeldt, Jr., of Waco, Texas; a brother, Charles Droschke of Reagan, Texas; five sisters: Mrs. Mollie Allen of Chilton, Texas; Mrs. Rebecca Walker, Mrs. Jessie Courtney, and Mrs. B. W. Whitlow of Marlin, Texas; and Mrs. Coatney Wallace of Ft. Worth, Texas; a half-brother, Henry Droschke, of Marlin; and one grandchild. Funeral services were held at the Reorganized Church in Marlin, Elders A. J. Rock and J. R. Allen officiating. Interment was in Powers Chapel Cemetery.

FEARS.—James Carrol, was born February 14, 1864, near Ellington, Missouri, and died July 27, 1950, near Commerce, Missouri. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since 1917.

Surviving are four sons: Austin of Poplar Bluff, Missouri; Jessie of St. Louis, Missouri; Fred of Bernie, Missouri; and Corbett of Commerce; two daughters: Mrs. James Paulus of Sikeston, Missouri, and Mrs. Sidney Meesey of Pharr, Texas; two stepdaughters: Mrs. R. H. Montgomery of Sikeston, Missouri, and Mrs. Minnie Voyles of Bourbon, Missouri; thirty grandchildren and fifteen great-grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted at the Welsh Chapel by Elder J. M. Smith. Burial was in the Sikeston Cemetery.

EPPERSON.—Archie Dee, was born August 5, 1887, at Pacific Junction, Iowa, and died August 21, 1950, at St. Catherine's Hospital in Omaha, Nebraska, after a brief illness. He was married to Bessie Radford on April 24, 1909; two children were born to them. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since September 21, 1919.

He is survived by his wife Bessie, of Council Bluffs; a daughter, Mrs. Calvin Negus of Ralston, Nebraska; four brothers: Harry of Omaha; Vern of Miami, Florida; O. L. of Manawa, Iowa; and Gerald of Kearney, Nebraska; and three grandchildren. A daughter, Elizabeth, died in 1941. Services were held at the Woodring Funeral Home in Council Bluffs. Elder V. D. Ruch and the Reverend C. P. Hughes officiating. Interment was in the Glenwood, Iowa, cemetery.

CORRECTION

In the obituary of Mary Elizabeth Crum, which appeared in the Herald for July 31, 1950, it was stated that her husband survived her. Mr. Crum preceded her in death.

 NOT AFRAID

The traffic light halted a group of pedestrians at the street intersection. A man and a woman were talking, almost inaudibly. Then a single sentence stood out plain and clear.

She was along in years, and looked as if she had done a great deal of work in her time. She was warm and tired, and she had apparently forgotten glamour long ago.

Then she spoke: "I am not afraid," she said in a firm and resolute voice, "but that God will take care of me."

One felt like sending up a prayer for her, that her faith might be answered.

What a splendid thing to be unafraid. What a source of strength to be able to trust God.

 THE OLD RED COW AND THE CHOO-CHOO TRAIN

"I think I could turn and live with the animals," Walt Whitman wrote. "They are so placid and self-contained."

It is fun to watch them. They have so few inhibitions, and one can learn so much about people from what they do. And that brings to memory a certain old red cow.

The old red cow was a determined individualist. One day she was leaning against the fence by the railroad. The fence broke, and she walked into lush green pastures. Up between the rails there was some nice green grass she especially wanted. She went and got it. The train came, and the engineer blew the whistle. But she never paid any attention to anything, except what she wanted. Then the engine hit her. There wasn't enough left of her for hamburger.

The old red cow cared more for a bite of grass than she did for her life. It is all right to pick up a nickel in the street, but not in front of a speeding car. It is all right to be interested in material things, but it isn't wise to pursue them where we may get knocked into the middle of eternity.

 DEATH

Death is a dialogue between
The spirit and the dust.
"Dissolve," says Death. The Spirit, "Sir,
I have another trust."

Death doubts it, argues from the ground,
The Spirit turns away,
Just laying off, for evidence,
An overcoat of clay.

—Emily Dickinson, "Poems."

 UNIVERSAL AILMENT

One day a neighbor of Lincoln's was called to the door by a noise of children crying. Mr. Lincoln was striding along, the hands of his two small sons held in both his own.

"Why, Mr. Lincoln, what is the matter with the boys?" asked the neighbor.

"Just what's the matter with the whole world," replied Lincoln. "I've got three walnuts, and each wants two."

OUR NEW BATTLE CRY . . .

Each One Bring One

The Family Altar

THE HEART OF THE HOME is the place where members of the family kneel to worship God. It may be around the large table where they gather to eat. It may be before the fireplace where they talk, read, and visit. It may be at the side of the bed in a little apartment. Wherever it is, the place of prayer is the sacred spot. It is the heart of the home.

In prayer we open our hearts and thoughts to God. There, in the family circle, we open our minds to each other. We share our problems, our hopes, our fears. We gain strength from each other and from God. In our prayers unsuspected depths of love are revealed. There all masks that hide and protect us from the world can be dropped. We do not need to be afraid. All poses and pretenses are pushed aside. We cannot be insincere before our Heavenly Father. The true family altar brings us prayer, and something more. We read the Word of Life. We talk things over. We hold counsel. We fortify ourselves against the world. The member who is afraid or uncertain receives help.

How shall we plan the family altar? The church has made provision for our help. There is a magazine, Daily Bread, which is issued every month. There is a page for each day, with a Scripture to read, an inspiring story, a hymn to sing, and a central thought for prayer.

The best way to profit by this magazine is not to read all of it at once. It is not meant to be read that way. It is meant to be read aloud, and to the family, unless one is alone.

In foods, we take a little every day, according to need. It is the same with spiritual foods. "Give us this day our daily bread," says the Lord's Prayer. We should bow at the family altar every day. Daily Bread gives us the program we need.

A Proved Religion

CHRISTIAN PEOPLE of today are unanimous on one thing, that religion must prove itself in the lives of those who believe. If we can show that our lives have been enriched by our faith, others will be likely to listen to us; but if we cannot show this, then Christianity is doomed as far as our generation is concerned.

I do not know whether or not the people of other years talked about this as much as we tend to. But they did the essential thing. They loved and worshiped Jesus, and changed lives followed naturally. That was specially true in the first Christian generation.

Even though practical religion is important, worship is still the life blood of all really Christian service. Without Jesus to help, we are all joining together to lift humanity by our shoe laces. With him, we are the links in a chain which encircles the universe and reaches to heaven. Maybe, later, our thoughts on this matter will develop. But the thing that matters now is that experience shows it is true. The arguments can wait, but the world cannot. For the sake of our own work in the world, let us take time out for worship.

News & Notes

PRESIDENT SMITH IN NEW ZEALAND

President Israel A. Smith and Bishop Mark Siegfried went from Samoa to New Zealand, arriving in Auckland on Saturday, August 26. They report plans to arrive in Sydney, Australia, on September 14 for a ten day stay. From there they will return to the United States by airplane.

PRESIDENT EDWARDS

President F. Henry Edwards is back in his office after attending a reunion in the north-west and a brief visit to Kirtland in connection with the forthcoming conference for High Priests.

DES MOINES REUNION

President Wallace Smith drove up to the Des Moines Reunion at Camp Mitigwa for the last Sunday, August 27. Sister Smith, who taught the women's classes throughout the week, reported a fine reunion with an exceptional prayer meeting on Saturday. Apostle Arthur Oakman was in charge of the reunion. Other appointee ministers were Evangelist John R. Grice, Seventy John N. Loren, and Elder Herbert Scott, pastor of the Des Moines Branch. President Smith preached at the 11:00 service on Sunday morning.

THE WRECK OF THE SEVENTY

A car driven by Seventy Cecil Ettinger was side-swiped by a semi-trailer truck as he was driving through Mexico, Missouri. With Brother Ettinger were his wife and their two children, Ray and Stephanie. All were thrown from the automobile, Stephanie being thrown the farthest. All suffered bruises, cuts, and shock.

STONE CHURCH BAPTISMS

Don L. Kerrick and John T. Gillum were baptized by Elder Glaude A. Smith. Durward Dell Crenshaw was baptized by Apostle Arthur A. Oakman.

INDEPENDENCE ZION'S LEAGUE ELECTION

New officers for the Stake-wide Zion's League were elected on August 27 in the basement of Stone Church. Elmer Sloan was elected president of the Stake-wide League. Other officers are: Vice-president, Barbara Peavey; secretary, Lois Pederson; and treasurer, Delmar Sloan. These officers will give leadership in the coming year to over 500 Leaguers in eighteen different Leagues in Independence. The retiring officers are: President, Kenneth Green; vice-president, Bob Sparks; secretary, Carol Hodges; and treasurer, Oliver Houston. About 200 young people attended the election.

WALNUT PARK YOUNG PEOPLE

The young people of Walnut Park have made this a big year for baseball. So far in three championship contests, they have won three championship crowns in the church league of Independence. The winning teams are the Senior team, the Girl All-Stars, and the Junior Boys.

BOY SCOUTS

One hundred Independence Boy Scouts of our church troops and thirty-one leaders enjoyed the two-day session of the Scouts and Scouters retreat held August 18 and 19 at Gardner Lake. Fellowship service drew a good response from the boys, and presented a challenge to the leaders. It is hoped that the fine experience of this two-day retreat will be the first of many.

Have You Said "Thanks" Lately?

"What thanks can we render to God again for you, for all the joy wherewith we joy for your sakes before our God?"

—I Thessalonians 3: 9

A STORY is going the rounds, and has been used in several publications. There is no reason why we can't use it too. It tells that the famous Dr. William L. Stidger remembered, one day, what a debt of gratitude he owed to a former teacher at his college in West Virginia. He forthwith sat down and wrote a letter to her—Mrs. A. B. Wendt—who had retired from her work at West Liberty State College. In due time he received a reply, of which the following is a part:

"My dear Willie I can't tell you how much your note meant to me. I am in my eighties, living alone in a small room, cooking my own meals, lonely, and like the last leaf of fall lingering behind. You will be interested to know that I taught school for fifty years, and yours is the first note of appreciation I ever received. It came on a blue, cold morning, and it cheered me as nothing has in many years."

It seems incredible that no one, in all that time, had thought to say a word of thanks to the lady.

People need appreciation. From the cradle to the grave, they wish to be loved and wanted. They like to be important to somebody. A little honest praise will boost their morale, improve their confidence, act as a balm on hurt feelings, and restore them to their highest effectiveness.

On the other hand, if you want to cut down a man's efficiency and reduce his production, you can do it most easily by criticizing him and letting him know that you don't think much of him.

There are many good people in the world who will do a lot for you, for nothing, if they only know that you appreciate it.

The surest way of cutting yourself off from your friends is to accept favors without giving thanks.

I was going to say that men are the only creatures of the earth who know the meaning of gratitude, but that would be wrong. I have seen gratitude among the higher animals—the dog and the horse especially, and even cattle—that touched the heart very deeply. And I have seen a lack of gratitude among some people that was disgusting. The best of animals are so much finer than the worst of human beings!

Let us put it this way: the higher souls are those who know the meaning of gratitude and take the trouble to express appreciation as best they can. If you never say thanks, just put yourself down as one of the lower forms of animal life!

As an editor, I would like to say that I have nothing to complain about. Perhaps the members of our church are more appreciative than other people. I do not know. But I can say that through the twenty years in which I have been trying to serve by writing editorials, people have written me many fine letters and have spoken kind words of appreciation. I offer this to counter the general impression that people are not appreciative. I can only speak from my own experience.

Of course there have been complaints too, most of them reasonable and merited. A few have been unfair, and one learns to bear them.

But these negative and adverse tributes have been in the minority. If the mind and heart are humble enough, one can learn important lessons from the critics.

So, I am not writing this editorial for editors. Rather, I am writing it for many other people who may be less fortunate than we are. I write for the pastor who carries a heavy burden of his members' troubles, as well as his own, sometime with, sometimes without reward. I write for the heads of church departments, for the teachers in the church school, for the organist and the leader of the choir, for the faithful soloist, for the person who lugs in flowers and vases to beautify the church, for the deacons who assist with the services and the maintenance of the building. I write for the humble little people who work alone and are not seen and seldom thanked.

The Presidency, the Presiding Bishopric, and other church officers get lots of mail, some of it business, some of it criticism. It may not be very long since you have complained. How long is it since you have said thanks?

People like appreciation. They even lap up a bit of sympathy when it is offered, and like it. They want to be important to somebody. They would rather do a great volunteer work for the good of humanity than be paid for any other kind of success. People are idealistic. Many of them are unselfish. You see that all the time. What they need is to know that it helps, that somebody cares.

Paul held the key to the whole matter. "In all things give thanks," he said. Gratitude is the mark of a happy, be thankful. There is no happy heart. If you want to be other way.

E d i t o r i a l

From a letter just received from A. Orlin Crownover, president of the Hawaiian District, we excerpt the following:

We feel that the reunion was quite successful. The attendance was considerably higher than last year, and most people expressed a feeling that it was highly successful. Attendance this year ranged upward to 160 on the closing day, and more than 100 camped for the entire week. While this means that only one fourth of our members in the district attended the reunion, we are encouraged because those who were in attendance are making arrangements to return next year.

We feel that the reunion was most beneficial to all those who attended. They expressed the desire to grow in service to the church and seemed to return to their home branches with increased conviction and devotion. The spiritual and intellectual levels of the reunion were good throughout. While there is still some improvement to be desired, this reunion nevertheless marked a milestone of growth for the Saints and the work in Hawaii.

We are glad to see that the same condition prevails in Hawaii as we have found in our contacts with the reunions here on the mainland.

The Paralysis of Analysis

By C. A. Davies

IT has been said that churches today are suffering from the "paralysis of analysis." We certainly live in an age when the "why" of everything is considered most important to discover. Ours is a logical age, which analyzes everything from food values to the vague qualities of the ether. No one escapes from this influence. Even when we take our place at the table, our desire to eat is somewhat modified by the necessity of our estimating whether the food before us contains the correct amount of starch or protein and fat that food analysis has brought so vividly to us. Our ancestors cared little for such analytical treatment of food. Indeed they had little if any knowledge of the content of what they consumed. While writing these words,

I can almost hear some dietitians cry out in horror at such darkened understanding which would question the value and wisdom of modern food analysis. I hasten to explain. I merely seek to illustrate a conclusion I have come to in my own attempt to analyze matters physical and spiritual. My conclusion is that analysis of both physical and spiritual food can serve a very useful purpose by assisting us to select what is best to consume, but that the nourishment comes of partaking and not from intellectual analysis or appreciation thereof. Unfortunately the attitude of many today indicates that the emphasis is on analysis.

The ignorance with which generations past may have partaken of physical food definitely needed to be dispelled, but if people were to attempt to live merely upon their knowledge and fail to eat, the paralysis of death would certainly supervene. It may seem too obvious to remark upon, but is this not a fact with regard to the spiritual feeding of the multitude today? Perhaps I should say "eating" instead of "feeding," for we eat only by our own will.

No doubt people ate many things in times past that were not good for them; this may have been the underlying cause for our present desire to know the elements of correct diet. Likewise, in the past much spiritual food was consumed that had little or no nourishing value, and as such was harmful. It is well that through analysis of the gospel message and study of the Scriptures we have learned much of the true nature of divine things. If, however, we stay in the analytical stage and fail to partake of the spiritual food, paralysis will overtake us in the form of spiritual death.

One ounce of good plain food is worth a ton of literature on dietetics, no matter how scientific the information may be.

THE Master sat by Jacob's well on one occasion. While he was there a woman who had need to draw water from the well came along. In the course of the conversation which followed, Jesus offered her a drink of the living water that would be of lasting satisfaction and value to her soul. Bringing the situation forward two thousand years, one cannot imagine the Master doing otherwise than offering to such a person the living water, urging her that she sample it for her own good. In comparison, the tendency of this age is to offer a complete thesis on the composition and psychological process in the assimilation of such spiritual element. This can no more satisfy the spiritual thirst than a learned and scientific treatise of the composition of physical water can satisfy physical thirst. Analyzing water into two parts hydrogen and one part oxygen quenches the thirst of no one.

God does not need lawyers to defend his existence. What is needed more than lawyers to defend God is a witness of his power in the human life—witnesses who will show by example that the way of God and his Son Jesus Christ is the way of happy and joyous living.

The world is in great need of this demonstration. In one sense there is much less hypocrisy in the world today. People are more ready to accept the real things. They evidence an unwillingness to listen to theories that do not have some practical demonstration. They are not so much interested in historical backgrounds as they are in the present value of religion. There is no doubt that the historical background of the message we present is of great relative importance, but again our present demonstration in the world is the vital thing. The task of proving the morality of our early leader and prophet is a comparatively easy thing if the questioner is of honest mind, and it is a small task compared with the demonstration of the true worth of our Restoration Movement to the world. I find that the proof of the character of the latter day prophet is intellectually easy, but I find that it is not the first interest of men. I find that endeavoring to live up to the principles of the Master is rather difficult in comparison with intellectual proofs, but the world is interested in the living example and will judge our work accordingly. It is very true that men today are more interested in social principles than ever before, but they give their allegiance to that which promises a rich result.

Notice to Contributors

Some have written in asking if contributions to Daily Bread and the Herald are wanted. Good material for these periodicals is always welcome. To help inexperienced writers prepare manuscripts, the editors have drawn up two lists of aids: "Hints for Daily Bread Writers" and "Helps for Writers of Herald Articles." These will be mailed to anyone requesting them.

Let's Build With the Church School

Each Bring 1

Your Missionary Job—

There is a missionary job waiting for you. It is right where you are in your own home town. There is somebody waiting for you to begin your work so that he can hear the gospel story.

Perhaps you have never preached a sermon. Maybe you have never talked the gospel to anybody. Don't worry about that now, because it is not a part of this plan. There is something you can do. It is not hard. You can go to work at it right away.

You can invite a friend to church school.

It is as simple as that, but it is very important.

All over the church today people are saying, "Each one bring one to church school."

Bring your one to church school next Sunday.

—each 1 bring 1—

The Church School—

The church school is a great missionary field. It has classes for all ages. It meets every Sunday. Somebody is always there to teach. Everyone is welcome.

There are friendly people at the church school. They are always glad to welcome new people and be kind to them.

Many different subjects relating to the gospel are taught in the classes, suitable to all needs and interests.

The church school is a good place to invite your friends to hear about the gospel and church work.

—each 1 bring 1—

Personal Preparation—

Pray for guidance as you seek to do your part in the program of evangelism. Ask God's blessings upon your effort.

Make a list of your friends and acquaintances who should be interested in the church. Make it as inclusive as possible, because the ones you think of first may not be those who will make the best prospects. The last one on the list may be the most important.

Underline the names of those who are not now attending any other church school. You can perform a good service by winning somebody who does not now attend anywhere. Also, you are less likely to meet objections and arguments on creeds.

—each 1 bring 1—

Preparation at Church—

Before you invite a friend to attend church school, be sure that you have a good class with an able teacher. Since a nonmember does not feel any tie of loyalty to the church, the class must be interesting to hold him.

Discuss your problems with your church school superintendent, your pastor, or possibly with a teacher.

Perhaps there is a need for a new class with a special teacher. It may be that some church member who is not now teaching can be engaged to take it.

Discuss what subject or quarterly would be good for the friend you wish to bring to the church school.

—each 1 bring 1—

Appeals to Use—

In soliciting your friends to attend church school, the following appeals are suggested. Others may occur to you.

1. You will make some fine new friends by coming to our church school. Many of them are interested in the same things you are.

2. We have nice social affairs besides our church school meetings.

We have good recreational programs.

3. We are expanding our class, and we would like very much to have you with us.

4. We are establishing a new class, and we think you would like it.

5. We have an excellent teacher, and the class discussions are interesting.

—each 1 bring 1—

What to Do Now—

1. From your list, select one or more persons with whom you plan to make a special effort. Pick someone who will likely be interested in the class.

2. Talk to this friend and invite him to attend church school.

3. If your friend agrees to come, call at his home and accompany him to church so that he will not arrive as a stranger.

4. Introduce your friend to members at the church door as you enter the building, to your teacher, and, if you have an opportunity, to the superintendent.

5. Go with your friend to the class and sit with him so that he will not feel alone among strangers.

—each 1 bring 1—

Follow Up—

1. After the class is over, ask your friend if he would like to remain for the church service. But don't put on pressure. People don't like to be trapped, and if they are, they are harder to catch next time.

2. See your friend later in the week and ask if he has any questions. Answer them yourself if possible. If you can't, ask for help from your pastor or some member of the priesthood.

3. Don't try to rush things too rapidly. Be content to have your friend attend the class until he learns more about the gospel and becomes interested. Be ready always to help, but do not try to push.

Experiences of a Missionary - Part III

A HEALING IN THE FAMILY

I here take the liberty of presenting a case of healing in my own family. Some years ago I was laboring in the city of Clinton, Iowa. I had left home a short time before, with the family all in good health. One morning as I was sitting in the home of a friend, a feeling of unrest came over me. Soon the postman brought me my mail, and among the letters was one from my wife. Upon opening it I was made happy as she told me all were well in the family. However, I was still uneasy, and for some reason I could not throw off the feeling. I decided to put on my hat and walk down into the main business district.

When near the post office a voice asked me, "What would you do if you received serious news from home?" A feeling like an electric shock ran over me, and I replied not in an audible voice, "Lord, spare me that ordeal." Being near the post office, even though I had received my mail only a short time before, I felt impressed to go in and inquire if there was any mail for me at the general delivery. Several letters were handed to me, among them a letter from a doctor in Lamoni in which he stated my wife was afflicted with cancer and it would be necessary to amputate her arm and for me to come home at once.

I canceled my appointment and hurriedly prepared to leave for home. My wife was the only member of her family that had come into the church. Some of the rest had opposed her joining. This was especially true of her mother. My wife had been a faithful companion and had never laid a straw in my pathway that would in any way interfere with my duties as a minister for Christ. I traveled all night to reach home. I presented the matter to the Lord in prayer. I had been sent to distant fields where I had spent many long and weary months away from my family without complaint. Now to feel that my faithful companion must suffer the loss of her arm was more than I could bear. I made a solemn pledge to the Lord that if he would heal my wife of this terrible affliction, I would not only thank him but pledge myself to spend months and years if it need be in distant lands or even the islands of the sea.

The next morning as I stood at our front door, my wife came to the door surprised to see me. The doctor had not informed her of the serious condition of her arm, so it remained for me to break the news to her. She took the matter calmly. We talked the matter over with the doctor, and he said there was nothing to be done except to amputate the arm.

Requests for prayers went to many of the Saints who knew me. Some of the brethren were asked to come and administer to her. Among them were Brethren John F. Garver and Elbert A. Smith. The latter did the confirming. He sought the Lord earnestly and asked that she might be healed, but to leave enough to remind her of God's goodness to her. I would not consent to the operation but decided to take her to the Sanitarium in Independence. Upon examination by one of the best cancer specialists of Kansas City, no trace of cancer could be found. Some years after Brother Elbert was in my home and asked my wife to see her hand. He found a small scar which was enough to remind her of God's goodness, but her arm was healed, and has given no trouble from that day until now.

The pledge I made to the Lord was kept. Never have I refused to go where sent. Both my wife and I received blessings for which we are very thankful.

MEETING MY COMPANION

When I entered the mission field, I did so as a single man. I had met a great disappointment at one time in my life during which a young woman, not a member of the church, broke an engagement within thirty days before we were to have been married. I had prepared a home and had it all furnished ready for occupancy when without any reason she wrote, saying she had found one far more dear to her than I was or ever could be. After receiving this letter I did not sleep for several nights. I made a decision never to get married. With this thought in mind I entered the field.

By L. G. HOLLOWAY

It perhaps will be of interest to my readers as to why I changed my decision. No sooner had I entered the field than I found different approaches made to get me to become interested in different young women. After passing through some of these experiences, I decided it better for a missionary to have a companion.

I shall never forget the first time I ever met my companion. Brother Joseph Smith came to Seattle, and the daily papers of the city were very generous in advertising his coming. As a result, Miss Blanche Henderson and her mother came to a service at which Joseph was to speak. The service was held in the Acme Business College. I went to the place of meeting and found the daughter and her mother there. It was a little early for the service and only five or six people were present at the time. I went to where they were sitting and spoke to them. They treated me kindly, and the young lady smiled. The memory of that smile never left me, and even to this day I can see what then left a marked impression in my mind. There was something about this young woman that seemed outstanding to me. She continued her attendance at our services and after some months was baptized into the church. After joining the church she kept company with another young man in the branch, and they later became engaged. I met her on many occasions, but even though I admired her, I thought I should not interfere in any way with her friendship for the young man to whom she was engaged. Months passed by, and my field was changed. One day I received a letter from a young woman I had baptized, and learned that the engagement between these two people had been broken off in a friendly way, and both were free to accept other company. I did not have the opportunity of going with her, but I did enjoy her company so far as writing made that association possible.

As time passed by our friendship grew until I felt I could ask her to become my life companion. She did not give me a definite answer at first but wished to know how it would affect my missionary work. She felt if it would in any way cause me to quit the field, we should not be married. Another very important matter concerned us—that we should seek divine guidance. We both prayed earnestly and received light that caused us to make our decision.

This was quite in contrast to my other engagement. I was so determined to marry the nonmember girl, that I told the Lord in my prayer that if it were not wise for me to marry her, to stop it in some way. I knew I was so blind and thought so much of her that I would marry her regardless of the consequences. I have always believed the Lord heard my prayer and answered it in the manner in which he did, for my good as well as for the good I might do in preaching the gospel. At the time it was one of the most severe blows that had ever come to me, but after meeting my companion I could see how unwise it would have been for me to have married the other girl. I believe that had I married her I would never have done any church work, and my life would have been wasted. Misery would have been my heritage, and I would never have recovered from the effects of my mistake.

In planning our marriage we decided to have the wedding take place in my father's home. Accordingly my wife made the trip from Seattle, Washington, to Andover, Missouri. I met her in St. Joseph, Missouri, and accompanied her the rest of the way. My father met us at the station and took us to his home. The next day, Sunday, March 17, 1907, we were married in the presence of some sixty-five relatives who came to surprise me, but who in turn were surprised when the minister, Brother Price McPeck, performed the ceremony that made us husband and wife. Never from that day until this have I changed my mind that it was wise for me to make her my life companion.

OUR CHILDREN

I would not have my readers believe that everything has been sunshine for either my wife or myself. She has seen many hours of loneliness and anxiety as she, to a very large extent, has met the problems that constantly arise in caring for the family during my absence. I have been fortunate, however, in some things; one of these is that I have been present when each of our children was born. Our first daughter, Esther Irene, was born in Lamoni, Iowa, on June 8, 1908, and is now the wife of Donly Pierson. They have two children, Donna Jean and James, and live in Des Moines, Iowa. Both are teachers in the schools of Des Moines and are quite successful in their vocations.

Our second daughter was born in Provo, Utah, on March 23, 1910; we named her Erlene Margery. She was always a frail little thing and suffered much. When very young she contracted whooping cough which left her with bronchial trouble. In her senior year in high school she underwent an operation for radical mastoid that for a time threatened her life. On three different occasions I stood by as surgeons operated on her for different ailments. She was a lovable girl and was an excellent student and made many friends. She passed away in Colorado Springs, Colorado, where she had gone for her health on December 17, 1931. She was the only child in our family who was not privileged to attend Graceland College.

Our third daughter Grace Evelyn was born in Lamoni, Iowa, as were all the other children except Erlene. She was born January 20, 1913. She is now the wife of Lt. Hayes M. Ashenhurst, and they are living in San Diego, California. They have three children, Dixie Lee, Ralene Ann, and Tracy Lewis. She has traveled extensively having made two trips with her family to China where she joined her husband who is serving in the Navy. She has taught school not only in America but in China as well. She is teaching in California at the present time.

Our oldest son, Raymond Leonard, was born May 31, 1921. He served in the Merchant Marine during World War II and visited many parts of the world. He married Jeannett Sherbondy; they have two children, Rowena June and James Leonard. When only a lad he suffered an internal hemorrhage and for a short time we thought he would die. At the time of birth I dedicated him in prayer to the work of the Lord, hoping some day he might take my place. When it seemed life was gone at time of the hemorrhage, I again committed him to the Master and in a short time he regained consciousness and has ever manifested an interest in the church and its work.

Our youngest daughter Vivian Erlita, is now the wife of Keith Lane and resides in East Moline, Illinois. They have two children, Ronald Keith and Vivian Gay. At one time she desired a gift that she might use in the Lord's work, and there was given to her the gift to sing which she has used many times to the edification of those who heard. She has always believed this was given to her as the result of prayer. She has used it in a sublime manner befitting to a gift of that nature. Her husband is a graduate of the Palmer School of Chiropractic and expects to engage in that profession. He served his country in the Second World War as a Marine and saw service in foreign lands.

Our youngest son, Robert Vernon, was born August 21, 1925, and at the present time lives in Yakima, Washington. He married Crystal Darnold; they have one daughter, Cathy Loudeen. He served in World War II in the Navy, and spent two years in the Pacific Southwest. He was promoted during the war and served in different capacities and eventually became an officer.

I am happy to say all our children have united with the church on their own will. I give credit to my faithful wife for this. She largely had the rearing of the children and brought them up in such a way that they desired to be baptized.

AWAY FROM HOME

One of the hard things for a missionary is to leave his family and spend many long months from home. The little children forget him, and many times when he returns home they will run to their mother and ask, "Who is that man?" Even when they grow up, it is hard for them to understand he has any place in the home. He finds himself becoming acquainted with the family only to have to leave for another long period in which the children are apt to forget again about their dad.

HOMESTEADING

Having entered the mission field as a young man, I had never been able to accumulate any of this world's goods. As a result we had to rent. The furniture with which we commenced housekeeping cost seventy-five dollars, and I had to borrow the money to pay for it. After living in rented houses for some years, we talked the matter over and decided we would try homesteading in eastern Colorado. By proving up on a homestead, we might be able to dispose of it and thus provide means with which to build a home. We knew the life of a homesteader was a hard one and this would be especially true of the wife of a missionary who must of necessity be away much of the time. I went to Colorado and filed for 160 acres of land twenty-six miles from Brush, our nearest railroad town. I had thirty-five dollars with which to build a house and make other necessary improvements. We put up a one-room building sixteen by twenty feet. At that time we had two children, Esther, two years of age, and Erlene, a babe in her mother's arms. Our nearest neighbors were two miles away. The appointing powers favored me by assigning me to the Eastern Colorado District so that I might be as near home as possible. Many times I have left my wife and children alone and taken my journey to some distant part of the district to do missionary work. Never will I forget how I took my grips and started out on foot across the prairie, while my wife stood in the door with Esther clinging to her skirt and Erlene in her arms watching me as I disappeared in the distance to be gone several weeks. There have been times when I felt like rebelling and refusing to go; then my wife would give me the encouragement I needed, and I would continue my work. For fourteen months we lived on this homestead and succeeded in getting a deed from the Government.

Sometimes when I was home for a few days, I would dig wells to make extra money to take care of our needs. One well was 110 feet deep. Sometimes while digging, I would have quantities of gravel fall in on me endangering my life. While on the homestead we lived on the very plainest of food. For weeks we would have nothing but beans and bread. One day I went to a rancher and bought some butter which was a luxury indeed. We took out of the amount I bought enough for a meal and hung the remainder in a well I had dug. The rope became untwisted and the butter dropped to the bottom of the well—a sad loss indeed.

After "proving up" on the claim, we succeeded in selling it to a friend for thirteen hundred dollars; with this money we bought lumber that is a part of our home today.

BLIZZARD AND A SACK OF COAL

One more experience I must give regarding homestead life. Usually I would lay in a goodly supply of food and coal so that my wife could endure regardless of weather conditions. It was late in the spring and we had hoped to have coal enough until warm weather. I was away from home when a fierce western blizzard came up. I knew in all probability that the coal supply would be exhausted. Under these conditions the only thing that remained for me to do was to get home. I walked for miles to get there. The blizzard was still raging. I had to pass an old deserted homestead where I knew there was a sack of coal that had been left there by a former occupant. I stopped on the way and got this sack of coal and carried it on my back for a distance of four miles. On reaching home I found wife and the children were in bed as the coal was gone, and they were trying to keep warm. The presence of husband and father was welcome, especially when he brought something to warm them. Next morning the storm subsided and the sun came out. It was a much different world in which to live.

It might be thought that taking this sack of coal was wrong, but may I state in the West where conditions are such that the lives of people are endangered, it is not considered wrong to take that which preserves life and prevents suffering; under the circumstances we felt no conscientious scruples had been violated.

The Fall of Man Essential to the Divine Purpose

AN ARTICLE in the "debatable topics" column of a July Herald opens the way for discussing a subject which has been something of a mystery. Modern revelation has done much to clear away the ambiguity which has shrouded the dogma of the fall of man and given, I think, a much clearer picture of God's purpose and design in the redemption of mankind than had prevailed hitherto. In this short article I wish to present for consideration certain conclusions I have reached; the reasons for those conclusions, I believe, will not be found incompatible with reason.

Adam's fall was undoubtedly necessary in the divine plan of redemption. The Garden of Eden as portrayed in Scripture was a picture of innocence, of creatures made in the image of God and unaware of the possibilities around them or within themselves, drifting along without consciousness of either pain or joy, good or evil, life or death—indeed without any sense of social relationship, free agency, or possible progress or attainment.

The story of the creation reveals the arising of a new creature of infinite possibilities made a little lower than the angels, in fact of the nature of God himself, for God is "Father of the spirits of all flesh." "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and it was so."—Genesis 1: 27.

It was never intended in the mind of God that a creature of such magnificent powers should remain undeveloped and dormant on the sea of time, so he provided for an opposition in all things, light and darkness, righteousness and evil, life and death, joy and pain, gain and loss, decay and growth, retrogression and progress. It was God himself who cast to the earth the fallen angel who became the Devil or Satan. (See Doctrine and Covenants 28: 10 and Revelation 12: 8.) God told Moses, "I caused that he should be cast down, and he became Satan, yea, even the Devil, the father of all lies, to deceive, and to blind men, and to lead them captive at his will, even as many as would not hearken unto my voice."—Genesis 3: 5. The power to tempt man was then delegated to Satan by God; this is shown also in the story of Job (1: 7-12). From Doctrine and Covenants 28: 10 we learn, "And it must needs be that the Devil should tempt the children of men, or they could not be agents unto themselves."

The fall itself was necessary, and, in the mind of God, a part of his plan. Satan sought to beguile Eve also, for he knew not the mind of God (Genesis 3: 7). Lehi, speaking of the transgression said, "But behold all things have been done in the wisdom of him who knoweth all things."—II Nephi 1: 114.

The fall or transgression could not be considered a sin, as before the fall Adam and Eve did not know right from wrong, "for they knew no sin." Adam could not have understood what the death penalty signified; never having known of death, he and Eve were like children playing in the garden, being easily led, giving heed to the last speaker, accepting with confidence any statement made to them, "For behold as in Adam, or by nature they fall, even so the blood of Christ atoneth for their sins."—Mosiah 1: 115. "For it must needs be that there is an opposition in all things. If not so . . . righteousness could not be brought to pass, neither holiness, nor misery, neither good nor bad."—II Nephi 1:

81, 82. Not only was Adam himself forgiven his transgression and his children and the children of all men under eight years of age, but all who had died in ignorance of the plan of redemption are released from the penalty of Adam's fall. "For behold, and also his blood atoneth for the sins of those who have fallen by the transgression of Adam, who have died, not knowing the will of God concerning them, or who have ignorantly sinned."—Mosiah 1: 107.

It is furthermore clear that Adam and Eve rejoiced because of the fall. Adam, filled with the Holy Ghost, said, "Blessed be the name of God, for, because of my transgression my eyes are opened, and in this life I shall have joy."—Genesis 4: 10. Eve rejoiced, "Was it not for our transgression, we never should have known . . . good and evil, and the joy of our redemption."—Genesis 4: 11.

The plan of redemption was prepared before the fall. Christ was the "Lamb slain from the foundation of the world."—Revelation 13:8. Adam was immediately redeemed from the fall. "Behold I have forgiven thee thy transgression in the garden of Eden. Hence came the saying abroad among the people, that the Son of God hath atoned for original guilt."—Genesis 6: 55, 56.

Adam was a righteous man. "Adam ceased not to call upon God; and Eve also his wife."—Genesis 5: 3.

Some Benefits of the Fall

The fall gave men their free agency. "And because they are redeemed from the fall, they have become free forever, knowing good from evil to act for themselves."—II Nephi 1: 117-119. Until the fall "they could not be agents unto themselves, for if they never should have bitter, they could not know the sweet."—Doctrine and Covenants 28: 10. See also Genesis 3: 28; 4: 10, 11.

The fall opened the way for the joys—new life—and children to ensure the fulfillment of the command, "Be ye fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth." It was not until after the fall that Adam and Eve reached the adolescent stage, and the knowledge of their nakedness and sex. The penalty of death required reproduction and birth. The fall was an integral part of the plan of redemption by which the divine nature within man became free to unfold and expand and develop the characteristics of God, to work out his own salvation and to have joy in accomplishment.

The Plan of Redemption Revealed

It is absolutely certain that Adam's transgression brought no condemnation to mankind whatsoever. It introduced to all people the opportunity of acting for themselves with perfect freedom and knowledge of choice; it was a part of the plan of God for the salvation of all men, and was therefore ordained to come to pass.

God, having given man his agency through the plan of redemption, revealed to Adam the fullness of that plan. "In that day the Holy Ghost fell upon Adam which beareth record of the Father, and the Son, saying, I am the Only Begotten of the Father from the beginning, henceforth and forever; that, as thou hast fallen, thou mayest be redeemed and all mankind, even as many as will."—Genesis 4:9. Adam began to make this known to his sons. "And Adam and Eve blessed the name of God; and they made all things known unto their sons and their daughters. . . . And they [the sons] believed it not. . . . And men began from that time forth to be carnal, sensual and devilish."—Genesis 4:12, 13. This makes it clear that it was not the fall of Adam which made men "carnal, sensual, and devilish," but their own rejection of the plan of redemption. "Behold, Satan hath come among the children of men and tempted them to worship him; and man has become carnal, sensual, and devilish."—Genesis 6: 50. "And God cursed . . . men . . . for they would not hearken unto his voice nor believe on his Only Begotten Son."—Genesis 5: 43.

It was God's intention that Adam should partake of the forbidden fruit. He did not compel Adam to do so, but he made it almost inevitable that he would, because he knew that ultimately the joys of redemption would be far greater than a characterless, innocent, and unprogressive existence. Under the plan of redemption, "man does not necessarily have to commit sin in order to appreciate righteousness, but sin must exist where he can witness its effects." "It must needs be that offences come." "Christ himself was tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin." However, in order to be so tempted, it was necessary for him to take upon him the nature of man and live in evil conditions. It was thus he became the Savior of mankind. "It became him [God] . . . to make the captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings."—Hebrews 2: 10. "Though he were a son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered. And being made perfect, he became the author of eternal salvation unto all that obey him."—Hebrews 5: 8, 9. The goal of perfection is more than sinlessness; this goal is now possible through the fall, agency, and the redemption of attainment for all. The great heresy promulgated by the Roman Church that man was eternally lost and totally depraved through Adam's transgression has been a serious drag on the road of man's upward climb. Man, made in the likeness of God originally, still merits the approbation of Christ as he spoke of the child—"of such is the kingdom of heaven." The plan of redemption cannot hope to change what God made good; instead the purpose is clearly stated: to place the forces of heaven on the side of righteousness and the building of character in the individual; also to build on earth a society in which the laws of heaven shall be impressed to produce the kingdom of good will, where under the divine law that nature within may blossom forth in the full fruition of life eternal.

In considering the plan of redemption, it is necessary to remember that within all mankind is something of the nature of God, for "God is the Father of the spirits of all men." After the fall God could say, "Behold the man is become as one of us to know good and evil."—Genesis 3: 28. The plan of redemption is based on that assumption, and the doctrine of Christ and the laws of the kingdom of God are arranged to develop, unfold, and build upon that foundation a complete creature in perfect likeness of God. Furthermore the kingdom of God is intended to provide a suitable environment and sure ministry of the priesthood, where the perfecting of the Saints and edifying of the body of Christ may be completed even "unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ."—Ephesians 4:13.

What Occurred in the Garden of Eden

PROBABLY NO SUBJECT has been more under discussion than such themes as "Was the sin of Adam intended?" "Did God give a commandment and then punish man for obeying?" and "Was the conjugal relation the sin of our first parents?"

Somehow it has appealed to me that the real sin of our first parents was actually partaking of the fruit of some kind of a tree bearing fruit just as the Scriptures relates.

"To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God."—Revelation 2: 7.

"In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations."—Revelation 22: 2. We think of paradise as too ethereal for an actual tree to be there. So we try to paint a picture of some psychic condition in which there is no real tree, but any such picture does not fully answer the question. Why not believe just what it says rather than a lot of speculative philosophy on which no two people exactly agree?

We who believe in dreams and visions can well believe some of the highest authorities in the church that have been permitted to see the streets of paradise, even though their description does not seem to agree with our ideas.

In the beginning God commanded our first parents to be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth. To me this indicates that the earth had once been peopled, but for some reason this creation had been destroyed themselves much as we fear our own annihilation in this atomic age. Replenish is a compound word; "plinish" means to fill up, stock, furnish; the prefix, "re," indicates repetitions (American College Dictionary or Webster's Collegiate Dictionary, "back, especially back to an original or former state or position"). Adam and Eve were commanded to again fill the earth. I get a great deal of satisfaction in believing that this fully accounts for all the finds that believers in biological evolution advance.

In the Garden of Eden, a paradise comparable to the description given in Revelation, Eve was created as a helpmeet and companion to Adam. God planted the "tree of knowledge of good and evil" as well as the tree of life. In the day he created Adam and Eve, he gave them their agency. No doubt they were free to move about as they wished. As Eve was inspecting their new home, she was approached by the serpent. The serpent apparently walked upright. (See the curse pronounced on the serpent in Genesis 3: 20, Inspired Version.) The sin of partaking of the fruit at first involved only Eve and the serpent; it was not between Adam and Eve. Therefore, I cannot conceive that the marital relationship was the sin. There was some power in the fruit that opened their minds so that they knew good from evil. After partaking of the fruit, Eve gave some of it to Adam; this partaking made them wise. The Lord God, speaking to Christ, said, "that man had become as one of us knowing good from evil."—Genesis 3: 28. The time had not come for man to live forever, and because the tree of life was in the garden, God drove them from the garden and pronounced the sentence of death upon them. However, he had prepared a plan of redemption from spiritual death. The fact of their becoming aware of their nakedness is simply a result of their increased knowledge and does not necessarily mean that the act of transgression was connected with this awareness of their condition.

If Adam had not partaken of the fruit and Eve would have been banished from the garden while Adam remained, the net result would have been that they were separated. Therefore, Eve was correct in her statement "Were it not for our transgression, we never should have had seed."—Genesis 4: 11. Eve particularly states that the joy referred to was the joy of redemption. This makes clear Lehi's statement, "If Adam had not transgressed . . . he would have remained in the garden . . . and they would have had no children."—II Nephi 1:111-113. Eve had transgressed before Adam. The joy referred to in these quotations has no reference to physical pleasure, but is the joy of redemption.

The result of the fall was physical death, the redemption came and brought spiritual salvation. In Major Mysteries of Science, Dr. George W. Crile ascribes to man's brain a driving power that eventually brings death. By sin (disobedience to law) death entered into the world, but by redemption came life everlasting.

The future of men in the resurrection will be better for their having passed through this condition. Only of the few that commit the unpardonable sin is it said, "It is better for them never to have been born." Of the least of the glories (telestial) it is said, "And thus we saw in the heavenly vision, the glory of the telestial which surpasses all understanding."—Doctrine and Covenants 76: 7. Truly "Adam fell that men might be, and men are that they might have joy."—II Nephi 1: 115. (Or as Eve expressed it, "the joy of our redemption.") Let us not overlook the fact that while Eve was deceived, Adam partook of the fruit that he might be with Eve and fulfill the first command to multiply and replenish the earth. "Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in transgression."—I Timothy 2: 14. There is no doubt the plan of God for man was worked out as intended, but man having his agency was the factor that brought it about.

Perfection Must Come Through Suffering

THERE ARE TWO GREAT LAWS that govern the world in absolute fairness and certainty. These are the law of agency for all mankind and the law of cause and effect which is the basis of all our law. The second of these laws gives us a blueprint of how a certain cause will affect us morally, socially, economically, or spiritually.

The world was made perfect in the beginning, for all of the works of God must be perfect, as he is perfection itself. But the world was not made as a child's toy. It has the depth and wonder we would expect of a work of God. We will never, while in our mortal bodies, understand more of its greatness than we learn by our blundering methods. Only those "born of the Spirit" gain an insight of the meanings of things. That is why revelation is so important.

Adam and Eve were made fit for childbearing, but in the garden they were as innocent children, naked and unashamed. In this state, children born to them would have had no

Patriarch Harmon A. Higgins

IN MARCH, 1950, a pleasant man of seventy years preached in the Malvern Hill Church in the Kansas City Stake. His sermon marked fifty years of service in the priesthood of the church. The man, Elder Harmon A. Higgins, spoke with the same deliberateness that had held the attention of many audiences during the years of his service. The people of the congregation were well acquainted with the tall, friendly elder, for Malvern Hill is his home congregation. He is the fatherly patriarch of the Kansas City Stake. He was ordained to this position in 1940 by Apostles M. A. McConley and E. J. Gleazer. Weather has never been too bad nor other occasion too important to prevent his answering the calls for help.

Brother Higgins and his wife Edith live in an English type cottage in Kansas City, Missouri. A green lawn and bright flowers surround the home. Mrs. Higgins, who is a capable assistant to her husband in his work, has taught Book of Mormon classes in almost every group in Kansas City Stake. Brother Higgins' first wife died in 1923; their daughter, Ruth Higgins Dimmitt, lives in Los Angeles, California.

Brother Higgins was called to the priesthood in 1900 and ordained by Elder Mark H. Forscutt. During the following three years that he served as a priest, he grew spiritually under the careful guidance of Elder Forscutt. On October 3, 1903, he was ordained an elder by Elders Forscutt and J. W. Waldsmith, and on June 8, 1910, a high priest by Apostle J. W. Gillen and Elder Waldsmith. He has served as pastor of five congregations: Nebraska City, St. Louis, Des Moines, Quindaro, and Fourth—the latter two in Kansas City Stake. He served as district secretary and as president of the Southern Nebraska and St. Louis Districts. During these fifty years he has required little financial assistance from the church, always supporting himself and his family by working for Morton Gregson and Wilson and Company, Incorporated, both meat-packing concerns, serving forty-two years with these corporations. With these concerns he held such prominent positions as sales manager, provision manager, and assistant general manager. During World War II he was department manager of canned meats and foods departments of the Wilson Company. Since 1941 he has taught a class in salesmanship for the same company.

BROTHER HIGGINS was born in Louisville, Nebraska, on October 11, 1879. When a young man of nineteen, he was baptized into the church in Nebraska City. He has been a faithful, diligent worker through the years that have followed. With a smile he will tell you that much of his priesthood activities had their foundation in his training and experiences as a youth in the church.

He was graduated from high school at the age of sixteen in Bennett, Nebraska, after which he spent four years in the law office of Hayward and Pitzer in Nebraska City. Later, while serving as pastor of the Des Moines Branch he attended Drake University and received twelve hours credit. He retired from active service with Wilson and Company, Incorporated, on January 1, 1950. This retirement has given him time to pursue a hobby of many years. A small box camera expanded into a wide field of photographic art. Brother Higgins also has a great appreciation of music and has enjoyed singing in the Conference choirs.

Some of the people who sat in that Malvern Hill Church congregation a few Sundays ago remember Harmon A. Higgins as a child who had his share of mischievous adventures. Others remember him as a youth who dared to live the way of Christ. But most of the congregation know him as Elder Higgins, the fatherly patriarch.

Character Is First

Recently the alumni of an engineering school met in Los Angeles to elect a new leader; those assembled represented some eight thousand members. When the voting began for the selection of a leader, character was placed as the number one requirement; technical skill came last. An all-day session was held to determine what the outstanding ingredient of character was. Religion was selected. Then came intelligence, courage, authority, et cetera.

As we view the church and religion as the basis upon which to build character, we are made aware of the fact that God is interested in what we can become, rather than what we are or were.

Behind us is an eventful century; before us, we can but pray for strength of character to meet the problems of the future.

I Was a Stranger —And Ye Took Me In

BY JENNIE ELLIOTT

IF YOU WERE TO ASK me how long I have been a Christian, I would answer, "Why, all my life." Because I can't remember when I have not thought of Christ as my personal Savior. You see, that's the way my Granny brought me up. Since my parents were Methodists, I naturally joined that church, and since I always worked in the various departments of the church according to my years and abilities, I was happy and contented.

When I came to Kansas City to live in the Catherine Hale Home for the Blind, I put my membership into one of the large Methodist churches here. For several years everything went fine. Then the people who had been taking me to church could not take me any more. After that no one—not even the pastor—seemed interested enough to see that I got to attend services even reasonably often. It was then, out of sheer soul hunger, that I started going across the street to Central Church. The warm friendliness of the people, together with that something I cannot define, brought new hope to me. Immediately I felt a peace of mind I had not known for months.

Before I realized it, I began to be interested in the teachings of the church. I wanted to know what it was all about. I wanted to believe. And so I studied things out for myself the best I could under the circumstances. That is when I got the idea of having the The Three Books put into braille. Then Evan Fry conducted a week's series of meetings at Central Church. That settled it. After much prayer and thought, I talked things over with my best friend. Although she was of another faith, she encouraged me to join this church. I also talked to Elder J. C. Stuart who was then pastor at Central Church, and on the Saturday before Easter, 1948, I was baptized and confirmed.

These past two years have been the happiest of my whole life. I had prided myself on knowing Methodist doctrine and thought I knew what church membership meant, but I didn't. I cannot put it into words, but I have found a deeper, richer meaning in this Restored Gospel than I ever dreamt existed anywhere. And I have been able to express my innermost thoughts as never before.

Of course I want to share all the rich spiritual life of the church, but it is comforting to know that even when sickness and trouble come, the church and its people are standing by ready to help.

Another Road Back

AFTER READING "The Road Back" by Anonymously Yours in the Herald of July 31, I feel that perhaps my story might be of help to some poor, unfortunate person who also has made the mistake of traveling the wrong road.

I seem always to have been cursed with an appetite for alcohol. I very clearly remember the first whisky I ever tasted. I guess I was about four or five years old at the time, and I thought it was good. I was permitted to take enough of it to make me drunk, and I liked the sensation, so I started drinking in my teens.

At the age of eighteen I found the "best girl in the world." She had a horror of drinking, and I promised her I would never drink again. I didn't for eleven years, but after we had three fine children, I accepted a position that I thought held out a promise of security for my little family. Unfortunately it put me in a position to be among drinking people (I do not mean sots or bar flies, but people who drank "socially" at times). Having a natural appetite for the stuff, I found myself taking "social" drinks. After a while, I rather looked forward to them, and before long I found myself getting "high."

I was also a cigarette smoker but prided myself in the thought that I had very strong will power. I quit smoking about sixteen years ago but continued to drink, getting worse and worse of course.

So now, after more than twenty years of wasted life, I find it necessary to take the "road back." I realize now that instead of security for my wife and children (two others came later), I created a memory of myself as a "sot" with them.

However, I am truly on the road back. I didn't join AA as "Anonymously Yours" did; however, I believe it is a very fine organization. I am sure it has a very fine purpose—to rehabilitate people who have become addicted to drinking. Only those that have had the habit can realize the need of someone to sympathize with them and help them.

It has been more than a year ago now since I had my last "fling." I was away from home at the time. As I was trying to shave in my hotel room one morning, I kept telling myself that I wished I could quit drinking so I wouldn't be so nervous. Suddenly I squared my shoulders, pointed my finger at the man's face I was looking at in the mirror, and said, "You are a big liar; if you really wanted to quit you would." So I did. All that day on the train home, I was a most miserable person, but I kept on telling myself that I was going to do without a drink for one day; and I am thankful to say I am still doing without for one more day at a time.

I lost lots of friends, lost my authority in the priesthood, and lost many opportunities to do good things, just as all people do who waste a portion of their lives. However, I am determined to put the remainder of my life to a better use. I hope that my experience in seeking "security" may be of help to someone in some way. Surely "wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging, and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise."

QUESTIONS:

Why don't we as a church believe in revivals and altar calls? During our missionary services, why shouldn't we extend the invitation to nonmembers to join the church?

Ohio

C. M. G.

ANSWER:

The revival as referred to in the question seems to be the practice instituted and long followed by Protestant churches of holding extended meetings with the particular end in view of gathering in new members. Such meetings are generally accompanied by much religious fervor and excitement, and frequently the fear of judgment or misfortune is brought to bear to spur persons to immediate action. Mass psychology often plays an important part in helping to sweep large numbers into the church, and the powerful appeals stir the emotions more than the mind and heart. Members are pressed into service to use their personal influence with the prospects to induce them to come to the altar or mourners' bench, where an affirmative decision is most likely.

In all the Scriptures we find no instance of any of Christ's ministry comparable to that of the modern revival with its extreme persuasive appeal based so largely upon sentiment and emotion. Christ and his ministry sought primarily to preach gospel truth, not for the mere sake of getting followers, but to turn people to God and to an intelligent observance of his law. That preaching was accompanied by the Holy Spirit to enlighten both speaker and hearer, but the people were left free to make their own choice.

Jesus invited but never coaxed or begged people to become his followers. He never, before the public gaze, embarrassed a hearer by exercising strong persuasion in an effort to induce him to become his disciple, but set the example of preaching the word, clearly and dispassionately, permitting each hearer to decide as he chose. His apostles followed the same practice. Undue persuasion and other overbearing influences tend to infringe upon a man's God-given right of free will or free agency. Persuasion is justified only insofar as it holds this right inviolate.

Under the Restoration of latter days, the Lord has shown us the better way, even that used anciently. To Orson Hyde, he said

Proclaim the everlasting gospel, by the Spirit of the living God, . . . reasoning with, and expounding all Scripture unto them. . . . This is an ensample unto all those who are ordained unto this priesthood, . . . that they shall speak as they are moved upon by the Holy Ghost.—Doctrine and Covenants 68: 1.

Ministers are to "preach the word of truth by the Comforter in the Spirit of truth," so that those who hear may "receive the word of truth in the Spirit of truth." Any other way than this, he says, is not of God. (See Doctrine and Covenants 50.)

What could be more simple and appropriate than Christ's way of giving to the willing hearer a clear and calm presentation of the truth, permitting him under the quiet enlightenment of the Holy Spirit to ponder the matter until he is satisfied and ready to make his decision with an understanding mind and a willing heart? The message itself is an invitation, and the gentle influence of the Holy Spirit a persuasion, such as the Lord has intended. Decisions made and covenants entered into under these conditions are not easily forgotten.

It has been our observation that in conducting missionary meetings, the elders do generally extend a public invitation to the people, assuring them that the doors of the church are ever open to receive the truly penitent.

QUESTION:

Who is the false prophet referred to in Revelation 19: 20 and 20: 10?

Michigan

A. H.

ANSWER:

The false prophet is first referred to by John in Revelation 16: 13-21. These several passages with those in other Scriptures represent this particular person as one of great qualifications who abandons all that is good for the attainment of his ambitious ends, becoming a son of perdition. He becomes a king over the wicked people, leading them to world-wide conquest, only to fall with his united armies in the last great battle of Armageddon, in which the Lord intervenes in the behalf of his people Israel for their salvation.

This event is associated with the restoration of Israel and the setting up of the kingdom of God which is to extend to the ends of the earth, bringing in the millennial reign of Christ. As a son of perdition, he is the embodiment of all that is evil and is motivated by Satan. While the course of world events seems to be leading on to this great climax, and to be showing signs of the approaching end, this false prophet has not yet appeared, at least not to the extent of being identifiable. He is yet to arise.

Some of the many references to this matter are in Ezekiel 21: 25-27; II Thessalonians 2: 3-10; Zechariah 11: 16, 17 with John 10: 10-14; Ezekiel 28: 11-19 with Psalm 55: 12-15; and John 5: 44 with II Nephi 11: 30-34 (the false messiah).

QUESTION:

Was there an official history kept of the church from 1830 to 1844? If so, who kept it from 1844 to the Reorganization?

Nebraska

L. W. H.

ANSWER:

In Doctrine and Covenants 47: 1, 2 we find that John Whitmer was designated to write and keep a regular history of the church. In 69: 1 he was instructed by revelation to continue writing and making a history. His historical account is very meager and inadequate. Joseph Smith, Jr., wrote or dictated to a scribe a history, which manuscript was taken from Nauvoo to Utah. However, some of the first chapters were published in the Times and Seasons. The Utah editions of that history have been extensively altered by the editors. Also, articles published in the Times and Seasons constituted a written history which was quite fragmentary.

From 1844 to the Reorganization no official history was kept. The Reorganization was not completed, and therefore no one was officially designated through the church to keep the history. Since the Reorganization was completed, various historians have been appointed.

Knowing Jesus

The author has been doing some missionary work and here shares with our readers his answer to a question asked by one earnest seeker for light.—EDITOR.

"How can I know Jesus?"

The matter of learning to know the Savior is one which needs understanding. The most important thing is a contrite heart and an open mind. Prejudices carried without reason can stop our really finding him.

We have all heard things from youth that we have clung to as basic truths that on examinations reveal themselves to be false. What those things are is best left to one's own study. You will not find Christ nor know his law without both study and prayer. The Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5-7) is perhaps the greatest sermon in all history. You must read all the Gospels, but none of them past the point that especially takes your attention at any one reading.

The idea or point of doctrine that fills your mind either with conviction or wonder should be allowed to find fullness in your being. Hasty reading will stop the revelation you are ready for. God will reveal himself to you as you read and ponder. Let the light of his recorded word enter your mind and soul without restraint, and the added light of the Holy Spirit will guide your understanding. He will reveal your need of repentance and strengthen your resolution to atone. He will answer your earnest prayer with light and blessing. The answers may not always be what you expect, but if you pray with a soul laid bare in submission to his bounteous will in you, your blessing is sure. Tears will not always be denied, for when people humble themselves, the physical response is sometimes beyond control. I do not believe that this is mere emotionalism. I personally find tears flowing when I feel the strong urge of the Spirit. This does not indicate lack of strength. The power of God is great enough to create worlds and move us as it will.

It is one thing to want to give yourself to the Savior and another thing to do it. You do it when you place yourself in absolute submission to his will. Reservation, whether conscious or subconscious, interferes with our growth, but long before our submission has reached completeness, the power of his spirit becomes so apparent in our lives that we find the blessings of heaven around us in such bounty we want to sing the praises of the Lord to all. We find a new life—one that the uninitiated can only guess at.

Do not listen to doubters. They have never known the Lord and can tell you nothing. Many deride—but you hear only testimonies of faith from those who have known the joy of his presence in their lives. The mocking and the derision come from those who have never known him, and their scoffing would change to cries of forgiveness if they were to make an earnest, intelligent effort to know the truth.

Some men of all degrees of education and intelligence deceive themselves by believing they can reason around the fact of Jesus and his gospel. Yet their combined knowledge is so small that they cannot even create a plan to assure anybody of security. These people who rise to power express ignorance in a form that forces us to sacrifice our sons and daughters on unholy altars of greed and selfishness.

Your sincere prayer and belief in Christ will do much to free you from their bondage. Wars and famine and suffering are not of God, but they can provide an opportunity for him to enter our lives and bring us to the safety of his kingdom. The mystery of God and his plan in us will be unfolded as we are ready to receive. Be as alert to the things of Christ as you are to the things of the world. Talk about him and to him as much as you do your closest friend. May he bless your search.

The Importance of Prayer in My Life

I have been a member of the church since I was eight years of age. I had always taken it for granted that prayer should be offered only by the priesthood of the church for the benefit of the Saints. Being a lay member and negligent in prayer, I relied upon the prayers of the priesthood for my spiritual and temporal blessings.

Through many years God was most merciful to me. He blessed me with good health and an abundance of those temporal things which seem so necessary to make life pleasant on this earth. All these years I had been privileged to be a church member and had the association of other Saints. Then I became afflicted with a rare nerve ailment. Only through the assistance of the iron lung, an indirect gift from God to man, was I able to breathe during the crisis of my affliction.

While in a half-conscious state, I prayed in my weak and humble way that if it be the will of God my life might be saved. I feel now that he did prolong my life through the power of the laying on of hands by the elders of the church. I fully realize, too, that my blessings came as a result of the prayers offered in my behalf by the Saints throughout the church.

Although afflicted and crippled, I am still able to study church literature and books. Through sincere prayer and humility I have come to sense a fuller realization of just how important prayer is in our daily lives. We need to seek God constantly. Without that strength from the Almighty One, we would be nothing and could do nothing.

Whenever God wills that I rise up in physical strength, I trust that I may lend a helping hand. I have come to realize the great need for each of the Saints to step forward and, in his own way and according to his talents, seek to serve God.

Thirtieth Wedding Anniversary

Mr. and Mrs. John Carroll were honored on their thirtieth wedding anniversary by members of the El Dorado, Kansas, congregation. Following games and a program of special music, they were presented a number of gifts by their friends. A three-tiered cake topped with thirty candles was cut and served with ice cream and punch for refreshments.

Viewlex AP-IC

The Model AP-IC is the most revolutionary development in this field in the last 15 years. There has been a long-felt need for projection equipment that is light, compact, and completely self contained. This projector meets all of these requirements and more. The AP-IC measures just 5" x 13" x 14" and weighs less than 12 pounds. It will take any type of 2 x 2 slide as well as single frame filmstrips. They may be projected on the built in "Tuck-away" screen, or with the lid removed, on any conventional screen. A 5" accessory lens is available which converts this machine to the equivalent of the Model AP-2C. A translucent plastic screen the same size as the "Tuck-away" screen is also available. Its use allows the audience to be grouped around the far side of the screen while the operator sits beside the projector and faces the group. This is the ideal arrangement for cottage meetings and personal contact work. Price complete with 2" f/3.5 coated lens $77.00

Viewlite translucent screen (rear projection) for models AP-1 and AP-IC $6.75

5" accessory—consists of 5" f/3.5 Anastigmat, Color-Corrected, coated Luxtar projection lens, adapter tube, 5" asphere condenser lens in holder, with felt bag $19.95

 INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

The Bell Sheep - By MABEL WILLIAMS CRAYNE

LARRY DUNCAN and his wife Anna had waited eight years for their first child. She was born on Halloween, and they named her Holly for that day. She was as bright and cheery as the holly berries at Christmas time.

When she was two years old she had her first party. The guests were her mother's friends and their children, and it proved such a delightful affair that it was repeated year after year, with Holly having no part in the preparations or the invitations. Her father always took her to the store or to see a neighbor on that eventful evening and when they returned the house had been changed as if by magic into a witch's den. When she was twelve years old, she surprised her mother by asking, "Mother, why can't I invite some of the boys and girls in my room at school and help make some of the funny things?"

Her mother, not realizing that Holly had been thinking of this for some time brushed her request aside and answered, "Holly, my dear, it takes a lot more work than you think, and besides you would only mess things up. A real birthday party is always a surprise."

Holly hid her tears from her mother, but her father saw her unhappy face as she passed through the living room.

"Hey; there, Holly girl! Stop a wee bit with your daddy. What has taken the sunshine from your face and the laughter from your eyes?"

Holly came and sat on the arm of his chair. She told him of her wish to share in her party, and that it didn't seem to be as much for her as it was for her mother.

He did not speak for a few moments but put his arm about his little daughter and drew her close to him so that her head was upon his shoulder. He knew he must be very careful in his answer if he would keep her sweet and unspoiled. "Honey," he said, "your mother means well, and she thinks she is doing these things just for your happiness. Now you and I will share a little secret. We like to do things to make people happy, too, so we're going to keep right on pretending that we love the party. Your mother and her friends look forward every year to your birthday, when they can relax from their everyday living and laugh and play games, but the way some of the other youngsters act, I imagine they feel just as you do. They want a kid party with kid games and no coaching from the side lines. What say, Holly, do we upset your mother and make her feel that we don't appreciate her good intentions, or do we continue to play the game and make her happy?"

"Of course," answered Holly, with a smile, "we will let mother have her party on my birthday." It was fun, having a secret with daddy.

TWO YEARS LATER the old longing returned. Holly was fourteen, in junior high, and beginning to think for herself. A party of her own might solve a problem that had been on her mind for some time.

Under schoolroom supervision inequality was not noticeable, but outside it was very evident. She thought of Amada Rubio who came from Mexico and wore such gay colored dresses. She was a jolly girl with a contagious laugh. And there was Hyacinth Foo, the shy Chinese girl, whose mother was a native of China and who grieved for the loved ones she had left behind when she came to America. Hyacinth knew many interesting stories that her mother had told her of the Chinese children and their customs. She told them to Holly because she needed a friend. Rosa Nakashima was an American born Japanese who loved to write stories and be in the school plays. Although her father was an officer in the American Army, some of the thoughtless boys called her "Tokyo Rose." She, too, needed a friend. And across the aisle was Charlotte Bain, a dark-skinned American girl, whose musical ability was recognized by the whole school; she sang solos and played the violin with the school orchestra.

These girls were all likeable and talented but there was that indefinable something called cast that kept them from going into the white man's home as equals. Holly had heard Brother Hardacre take his text from Acts 17: 26: "And hath made of one blood all the nations." What did it mean to those who listened? How could the color of one's skin determine his place in society? These were deep thoughts for one so young, and Holly decided to talk it over with her father. They left the house together each school day as the same bus that carried her to school took her father to his office.

THE NEXT MORNING while on their way, she asked, "Daddy, why do we think we are better than the people with different colored skin? The Bible says that God made of one blood all the nations."

Her father answered her with a twinkle in his eyes, "But the last of that paragraph reads, 'and determined the bounds of their habitation.' Maybe we wouldn't have all this race contention if we had stayed where we belonged."

Holly laughed at all her father's jokes whether she understood them or not. Her mother had her parties, and Daddy had a right to his jokes and a good listener, so she laughed and answered, "But where would I be if you had stayed in Ireland and mother was still in Norway? Please don't laugh at me. I'm serious about the way grown-ups act. Don't you think that if they didn't try to influence the younger generation there would be more questions about character than race or color?"

Her father answered, "My girl, you have hit the nail right on the head. Do you remember the flock of sheep at your grandfather's farm?"

"I say I do," said Holly, "I remember that when I tried to bring them in from the hills where they were grazing that old bell sheep was determined to stop at the river, and none of the others would come without him. When he was ready to move on, all the rest followed him straight to the sheds." Her father spoke seriously, "That gives you an idea of the usual run of people. They play the game of 'follow the leader' most of their lives. If we had a good leader in this town, we might get somewhere with a lot of things."

Holly's eyes brightened with excitement as she got the idea he was trying to put over. "Oh, I see," she said, "we need a good bell sheep." The bus stopped at her destination, so she could say no more.

DURING THE NOON HOUR the pupils sometimes went across the street to a little variety store where ice cream cones were sold. While there Holly spied a little silver chain with a bell attached—the kind that is often used on a pet animal. The bell, though small, gave a clear, sweet tinkle. She paid for it with her ice cream allowance. New ideas danced around in her head, and she felt happy all over whenever she put her hand in her pocket to see if it were still there.

The Impossible Can Be Done

By Ruth Midgorden Goodwin

WHY ISN'T ZION HERE?" was an impatient and demanding question asked by many members in an earlier day. Because of their ignorance concerning its scope and the conditions necessary for its establishment, some of our people could not understand why God's city was not here.

As we learned more about the complexities and the many details, and especially as we realized the overwhelming task of changing and educating our human natures so that Zion could be, some of us felt the task hopeless and impossible. There's no denying that the job of educating people to higher planes than some of our present levels is a big one. But it isn't impossible.

Memphis, Tennessee, I am told, is living proof that any group of people can achieve something nearly impossible if they want it badly enough—even though it may be something utterly contrary to human nature. In the city limits of Memphis, it is illegal to honk an auto horn. Can you think of a traffic law harder to enforce than that one? When the person driving ahead of you or to your right or to your left in heavy city traffic pulls some foolish trick, the impulse is to sit on the horn button. But the people of Memphis don't do that—and because of it, the people of Memphis are better-than-average cautious drivers.

Think of Smart Aleck in the souped-up Ford beep-beeping at one intersection and of Mr. I. M. Portant in his Cadillac blasting away at another. No police force in the world could enforce a law against horn-honking unless a great majority of people wanted release from the irritation of petulant auto horns.

IF ALL OF US wanted badly enough the peace and assurance and the cessation of turmoil within our souls that comes from obeying eternal laws, Zion would now be established. God's laws are not impossible to obey—Christ gave us the perfect example of obedience. The real reason we don't have Zion is that too many of us are beep-beeping impatiently or smart-alecky or all-importantly at the intersections. Enough of us have not made up our own individual minds that what we want more than anything else in the world is to build God's kingdom. We are holding back those who have taken to heart the admonition, "Seek ye first to build up the kingdom of God and all these others things will be added."

Every evening, after dinner, Larry Duncan changed into a loafer jacket and read the evening paper. From force of habit he put his hand into the jacket pocket and was surprised to find something there. He drew it out carefully and when he saw the bell, he stood thinking for some time. His first thought was, "So she is trying to hang it around my neck, the little rascal." But more serious thoughts persisted. He took the Bible from the bookshelf and, seating himself in his special chair, he turned to Mark 12: 36-39. "Huh," he said, "wait until I show this to Anna. She has been working on an altar cloth for weeks and is saving out of her allowance for new silver to be used in the church kitchen. It says plainly that to love your neighbors is more than all the sacrifices."

Larry Duncan leaned back in his chair and closed his eyes. He wanted to think things through and decide whether he had the nerve to lead the "sheep" on as touchy an expedition as his daughter had laid out for him. Was he just a hireling who had no real interest in the people he contacted in his home town, or was he of God's household, and called all men brothers?

Holly came into the room and, seeing his eyes closed, tiptoed out again and reported to her mother, "Poor daddy is so tired that he has gone to sleep in his chair without even looking at the paper."

That night Larry and his wife Anna had a long talk in the privacy of their own room. He saw the way looked brighter when Anna said that she had often thought of these things but couldn't see what anyone could do about it.

HALLOWEEN CAME on Saturday, and with the morning mail Holly received a note from her Aunt Helen, asking that she come to her home for a birthday luncheon and to please come early so she could help with the decorations. This was very unusual for Aunt Helen who was a self-centered person and had paid no particular attention to her birthdays before this. It was about a half-hour's ride, and Holly took the bus right away. Her aunt had invited several of the young people who lived in that neighborhood, and they had a good time. It was dusk when her father came for her. When they arrived home the house was dark and still, but as they entered by the side door, they were met by an old witch with a broom in one hand, and a flashlight in the other. In the hallway something soft and billowy was wrapped about Holly and something pressed tightly upon her head. The lights in the living room came on as her father opened the door, revealing all sorts of fantastic looking creatures—some beautiful but most of them grotesque. As she entered they bowed low and a squeaky little mouse voice said, "We bow to the queen." Holly looked down at her costume and saw that she was dressed in a long robe. A beautiful lady stood near and she recognized the ring on her hand. She whispered, just so the lady could hear, "Mother, darling." Holly was so happy she could scarcely speak when the masks were removed and she saw her schoolmates, before her—every boy and girl in her room. After the excitement died down the fun began. Later in the evening a close friend of her mother's played a soft musical background while Hyacinth Foo told a beautiful Chinese legend. Then came Rosa Nakashima dressed in true Japanese costume—a gay kimono of white and red flowered silk and a red hibiscus in her dark hair. She gave a dramatic reading and followed that with a slow, graceful dance of the islands, which she emphasized with an Oriental painted fan. Charlotte Bain's first violin number was a composition by her father, and as Larry listened, the first strains she drew from the instrument sounded to him like the sobbing of a child in the dark. As the girl played on into stronger, wilder notes, she seemed to be telling all the joys and sorrows of her race. Then she changed to special request numbers, and her rich contralto voice lead them in singing, "Jesus, my Shepherd, call with a sweet command."

When Mrs. Duncan said that Amado Rubio was responsible for all the weird black and yellow decorations, there was a vigorous clapping of hands.

The party was over. Mrs. Duncan had gone to the kitchen to pay the help. Holly and her father stood on the porch reluctant to go in. "Holly, girl," he said, "it's been a grand night for witchcraft, hobgobling, and the 'little people.' And now, would you look at that moon, 'tis that weird tonight it changes old houses into castles and people into morons, meaning myself."

Holly kissed his cheek and asked, "Daddy, how on earth did you ever put it over? Was mother very much upset?"

"Well, I should say not," he answered. "I didn't have a thing to do with it. She planned the whole affair, even to having her own birthday on December 5 where it belongs. She has already asked your pet sheep to entertain at that time."

Holly was astonished at this added surprise. "You're not fooling me, Daddy, and you had better keep the little bell just in case."

Anna Duncan held the jewel case that Larry gave her for her birthday, and exclaimed, "A gold necklace for me!" Tenderly she lifted the pendant, an exquisite little bell. "Put it on me, Larry, darling, I'm sure it will fit."

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA REUNION.—

The annual combined reunion of the Los Angeles Stake and the Southern California District was held at the Pacific Palisades, July 22 to 30, with an attendance of approximately 331 campers augmented by large numbers of visitors for evening and week-end services.

The reunion was marked by a fine spirit of unity, climaxed by a rich degree of spiritual power. Excellent work with the children by a fine staff of teachers was particularly outstanding.

The general church was represented by appointee ministers: Apostle E. J. Gleazer, Bishop G. L. DeLapp, Evangelist William Patterson, Garland E. Tickemyer, president of Los Angeles Stake, Bishop J. Stanley Kelley, Elders Peter Whalley and Thomas R. Beil. Local ministers having special assignments at the reunion included Rodney Engel, David Carmichael, Jack Van Eaton, L. J. Ostertag, Lynn E. Smith, Glen Holmes, John Davis, and Clyde Rockwell. Other key workers were Lois Nunamaker, Hazel Gregg, Mayme Blake-man, Ada Hampton, and Ferne Roberts. The Herald Bookstore was represented by Brother and Sister Herman Johnson. Brother and Sister Malcolm Ritchie represented Graceland College.

Special offerings and a small registration fee met all costs of the reunion and added approximately $700.00 to the Reunion Fund.

NEW PHILADELPHIA, OHIO.—For several months the men of the branch have been painting and repairing the church building. New doors enhance the beauty of the church.

During the month of March, unified Wednesday prayer meetings were held with the neighboring Methodist Church. The Saints did well in attendance and participation. Five members of this branch attended General Conference. The pastor, Elder John D. Carlisle and Deacon Charles Hensel gave reports to the congregation on their activities there. Evangelist H. E. C. Muir of Melvin, Michigan, visited here shortly after conference and gave a good report.

The branch had its sixty-fifth anniversary on May 9. The late Apostle Gomer T. Griffiths organized the branch.

Five women of the branch attended the district women's institute and banquet in Akron on May 20. Sister Pauline Arnson was the speaker. A group of men attended the next day, and at the business meeting Priest Glenn Carlisle was elected district church school supervisor. The district conference in November is to be held here.

Vacation Bible school was held in co-operation with the Methodist Church. Approximately sixty children of all denominations attended. Teachers from our church were Marjorie Hobart and Leah Carlisle, assisted in games by Romaine Steinbaugh and Nancy Bigler. Our pastor offered the benediction at the concluding exercises.

The young married couples' class held a lawn festival on Saturday evening, July 3, which netted $125.00 for the building fund. The children provided the Mother's Day as well as the Children's Day programs. A church school picnic was held at Arwood Lake and was sponsored by the young married couples class, headed by Brother Edward Warner.

Our pastor, Elder John D. Carlisle, was invited by the Ministerial Association to speak three days at the morning devotions over our new radio station. These talks were much enjoyed by all who heard them and have been an inspiration to many.—Reported by GLENN CARLISLE.

SOUTH PEKIN, ILLINOIS.—On Sunday evening, August 20, sixty-five members and friends of Peoria Branch and Pekin Mission met at the home of Brother and Sister R. L. Guyre in South Pekin for a potluck supper and campfire circle. This is the second annual campfire circle, enjoyed by all ages.

—Reported by R. L. GUYRE.

MIDLAND AND SOUTHERN DISTRICT REUNION, ENFIELD, ENGLAND.—This year the gathering was primarily for the Midland and Southern District. Approximately 150 people attended, eighty of them coming from the Enfield Branch.

In addition to Apostle Blair Jensen and District President Frank Fry, other ministers in attendance were Bishop A. T. Trapp and Elder Thomas Worth of the Quorum of Seventy. The reunion theme was "The Church on the Move."

The reunion opened officially at 2 p.m. on Saturday, August 5. The opening service featured testimonies of various pioneers in the church work in England, and concluded with testimonies of those who had attended General Conference this year. These were Doris Oakman and Irene Rannie, now visiting England from Independence, and Brother and Sister John Coggan of Nuneaton. During this session, a letter was read from Brother Roy Cheville.

At the business meeting, four men were recommended and approved for ordination: Fred Shaw of Clay Cross to the office of deacon, William Muldoon of Clay Cross and Norman Norton of Leicester to the office of priest, and Harold Harvey of Birmingham to the office of teacher. It was decided to hold a district reunion next year and a reunion committee was elected: District President Frank A. Fry, Bishop Trapp, John Coggan, J. Franklin Schofield, and Trevor Norton. Elder T. E. Worth preached the evening sermon on "Convictions of the Restoration."

At the Communion and Fellowship service on Sunday morning, Elder Franklin Schofield was ordained to the office of High Priest by Apostle Blair Jensen and Elder Fry. Brother Schofield is pastor of the Enfield church. In the afternoon Apostle Jensen taught a general class on the theme "The Church Witnesses." Following this the departmental classes met. Trevor Norton taught the young people, using a letter from Dr. Cheville as the basis of the discussion; Gertrude Allen, district women's leader, taught the women's class; Thomas Worth taught the men's class. Apostle Jensen preached the evening sermon. During the early part of this service, Sister Irene Rannie read a letter from President Israel Smith, and Sister Doris Oakman read a letter from the Saints in the Center Place. On their behalf she presented to Brother Fry, for the British Mission, a church flag. A dedicatory prayer was offered by Patriarch J. W. Worth.

Two new ventures for this district were tried. Doris Oakman and Trevor Norton planned and conducted a campfire service. Sister Oakman led the community singing which was followed by a worship period and a short talk by Brother Fry. At 7:30 on Monday morning Brethren Fry and Norton conducted a Young People's Prayer and Fellowship service. After the service, a sandwich and fruit breakfast was served. Bishop Trapp taught a general class concerning the aspects of the financial program. At 4:00 p.m. Frank Judd held a class for departmental workers. Apostle Jensen preached the concluding sermon on the theme, "It is yet day"

Frank Judd and his helpers organized film lectures and other activities for the children. The Enfield Zion's League was responsible for serving lunch, tea, and supper each day. Appreciation was expressed to Brother William

The outstanding feature of the reunion was the strong and sincere spirit of fellowship manifest among the Saints.—Reported by VIOLET WORTH.

SANTA ROSA, CALIFORNIA.—On Sunday, August 6, at the Communion service two sons of Elder and Sister Hyrum Crownover were ordained to the office of deacon. Glenvil was ordained by his father assisted by High Priest Robert L. Bishop. Billy Ray was ordained by High Priest Bishop assisted by Elder Crownover.

Some weeks ago Apostle and Sister E. J. Gleazer visited the branch at the Wednesday evening service. The church was well filled with members and friends to hear Brother Gleazer. After the service, a reception was held to give everyone an opportunity to meet them. They were guests overnight with Brother and Sister Bishop.

Elder and Sister Day of Vancouver, British Columbia, and Sister Jella Cline and her granddaughter Marlene of San Jose, California, were recent visitors to the branch.—Reported by H. E. WALKER.

ARIZONA STATE REUNION.—The eighth annual Arizona Reunion was held at Camp Lawton, Mt. Lemon, Arizona, August 19 to 27. This year's reunion was planned by Arizona's State Co-ordinator Elder Marion M. Blakely and Apostle Paul M. Hanson. Other church appointees were Seventy Russell F. Ralston, assistant-minister-in-charge; Bishop and Mrs. J. Stanley Kelley, Patriarch William Patterson, and Elder James A. Everett.

General prayer services were held on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday mornings lead by Patriarch Patterson. On Monday, Wednesday, and Friday separate prayer services were held for the junior high class and the young people with Elder Everett in charge. The general class was held by Brother Ralston. Mrs. Audentia Kelley taught the women's class, and Brother Ralston taught the men's class. The young people's classes were in charge of Elder Everett. George E. Greene and James Everett were in charge of the afternoon recreation.

Sister Hazel Donn was the director of religious education. She was assisted by Catherine Mills, kindergarten teacher; Gersel Taylor, primary teacher; Lucy Slight, junior teacher; Winifred Foster and George E. Greene, junior high teachers. Brothers Patterson, James Everett, and Keith Rogers assisted in the field and nature course. On Wednesday the children went to the woods to participate in the re-enactment of the Book of Mormon story.

On Friday evening at campfire, those in charge—George E. Greene, Russell Ralston, and James Everett—sponsored a surprise watermelon feed.

On Saturday morning, Carol V. Gentry of Bisbee and Mrs. Bonnie Jean Greene of Phoenix were baptized by Elders James A. Everett and Priest I. Ronald Greene. Confirmation was held at the 11:00 service on Sunday. Carol Gentry was confirmed by Elders Ralston and Blakely, and Mrs. Greene was confirmed by Patriarch Patterson and Elder I. Raymond Greene.

On Saturday afternoon Elder Blakely presided over the annual reunion business meeting. Russell Wood was retained as secretary-treasurer, and Hazel Donn was retained as women's representative. It was also voted upon that Arizona should hold a mid-winter conference in February at Tucson.

Forty-one young people went to Inspiration Point for an early morning prayer service on Sunday. Apostle Hanson was in charge of the Communion service and confirmation service at 11:00 on Sunday morning.

There were about 125 campers on the grounds throughout the week, and the auditorium was filled to its capacity of 225 for the Communion service.—Reported by WALLACE R. GREENE.

Weary Waiting

UNSEEN TO MORTAL EYES, the Stranger walked slowly and sat with the Saints who were scattered thinly over the auditorium. His shoulders drooped dispiritedly. He was unutterably weary. The time of his glorious coming seemed so near at hand and yet today—how ingloriously had they handled the preparation for his coming!

He breathed a heavy sigh and relaxed on the wooden bench. Ah! It was good to rest. He meant only to stay a short time. The meeting was already in progress. Half the time for the service was past, and the Saints still waited.

The burdens of the day came back upon his consciousness. He had walked the weary world this day. Perhaps that was why he was so downhearted. But no . . . he had been challenged. Here was a great task—a great opportunity.

Now it was Wednesday night, and he must be with his people. But the emptiness of the building! He felt lonely, isolated, the whole world upon his heart; millions he loved more dearly than his own life needing the touch of his people, and not a soul here knew of his burden.

He was startled out of his reverie by the testimony of a humble sister. It was the cry of the ages, the challenge that always gripped his heart.

"I have sinned!" In the latter-day church, a confession . . . An inkling perhaps . . . a sign of awakening! Could he hope? He leaned forward in his seat, alert now, every power of heaven at his command. Possibly, just possibly, here was an opening.

The electric current of his interest moved through the assembly. All listened intently as the woman confessed her shortcomings. It was true. It was true. She was praying, "If I could but love the Lord my God with all my heart, all my might, mind and strength, and love my neighbor as myself. . . ."

The Stranger rose and the might of his strength filled the house. The future shone bright and sure before him.

The woman continued, "If I could but live each day, a day at a time, not depending upon my own arm of flesh—if I could but spend each day in communion with Him."

Softly the congregation sang, "Unto God who knows our every weakness." And now the Stranger stood in their midst. His glorious countenance upturned toward heaven. He wept with joy.

With the sweet strains of "Consecration" bearing his prayer heavenward, he prayed, "I thank thee, Father, for these thou hast given me out of the world."

Your League Is What You Make It

By Bernard Butterworth

INTRODUCTION

Out of the normal activities of one of the larger Zion's Leagues in Independence grew the production of the light operetta, "The Mikado." With the help of other Leagues, these young people produced a beautiful and entertaining musical.

In addition to providing a rich experience for all who took part or witnessed it, this production raised over $800, with which it was possible—also through volunteer help—to erect floodlights on the Campus softball diamond, which is owned by the church. Now each week this summer, eighteen Zion's League softball teams, as well as other teams from the local Y.M.C.A. and the city recreation leagues, find wholesome recreation in the clean moral atmosphere of the Campus.

What does such a project do to the spiritual life of the League? As many as seventy-three young people of this one League have been counted at their prayer services. While recognition must be given to the young people for their excellent work, the real key to the success of such projects rests in the skill and devotion of the League leadership, which can carry on only with the complete support and co-operation of the pastor and the entire congregation.

—CARL MESLE, General Director of Young People's Work

ONE OF THE GREAT THINGS in this is growth. This applies to events as well as to books and institutions. Here is the story of the growth of an idea, which resulted in the stimulation of a League, the challenge of other Leagues, and entertainment for a community.

Few people could comprehend the growth necessary for such a production as they sat and enjoyed the performances of Gilbert and Sullivan's light opera, "The Mikado," in the Campus Open Air Theater on the evenings of June 13 and 16. The idea was conceived by a group from Walnut Park Zion's League. The musical and dramatic talent was evident. An operetta would combine this development. The idea was at first simple—a local musical comedy to be presented for the branch. There was one problem—where could it be presented? Leaders put their heads together; plans began to formulate; the cast was chosen. Interviews with competent leaders indicated that it must be a beyond-local project. It branched to city-wide Leagues. Then a goal was initiated. The Campus needed lighting facilities for the softball diamond. The project was never considered primarily for entertainment. It was originally suggested for League development and activity. Now it had turned to service.

As rehearsals and staff meetings progressed, another and most vital element appeared—the feeling of group unity. The chorus of forty singers became enthusiastic. They immediately buckled down and memorized their numbers. What they lacked in maturity, they overcame with enthusiasm. Each rehearsal became a picnic; everyone enjoyed working. Soon parents began to show interest. Mothers began sewing and collecting costumes. Fathers began constructing scenery. Others planned lighting and administration. While the cast and chorus were working in this common experience together, there came to everyone a sense of belonging, a true spirit of fellowship. As they met for prayer that Tuesday evening, a few minutes before the first public performance, they placed their petition with God. They prayed, "We are not real musicians and actors. We are just amateurs; but we have made adequate preparation; our cause is good; enhance our effort with thy Spirit"—and they found that spirit at their service.

THE PRODUCTION was a streamlined version made to appeal to average listeners, but something of the original was missing. Busy hands began inserting lines; copying music, orchestrating scores. A twenty-piece orchestra was chosen from various parts of the city. This orchestra needed to be co-ordinated with the chorus and solos. All of the members were fine musicians and had little difficulty providing a brilliant accompaniment.

Local League artists designed and painted the elaborate scenery which centered around a large, grotesque Buddha in the Palace of the Mikado.

New Horizons

These same artists began working on designs for programs, posters, and costumes.

An outside production presents problems. The scenery, which was bulky and large, had to be protected from the weather. Here again detail of organization solved the problem. Fathers of Leaguers and other interested persons could erect the sectional scenery in about an hour. The lighting itself was a small problem in electrical engineering. The League members made the orchestra lights themselves and various critics worked out the balance and details of sound. The work "behind scenes" equaled the work on the opera.

The cast was chosen with great care. This paid off in the fine performances and commendable acting. There was a remarkable spirit of cooperation throughout. Church organizations such as the White Masque Players and the Men's Club, General Church officers, and the pastor at Walnut Park, combined with city-wide Leagues, all pledged their support and assistance.

Came the eventful week and the weather was favorable. The unusually cool summer became humid. Each night rain threatened, but did not materialize. The show was a huge success. The money for the lights was raised, but that was subordinate. Audience appeal was first, and every member of the cast, chorus, and orchestra tried hard to give his best. As each actor played his part or sang his songs, he became confident that growth comes with effort. Memories of a tightly-welded group born of common fellowship through song and drama will not soon be forgotten.

THese LEAGUERS are not through. They aspire to new and better projects. This was but a beginning. They have learned by this and similar experiences that your League is what you make it. It stands squarely on your shoulders. It is the hope of Walnut Park Leaguers that this project may offer a challenge to other Leagues to use their talents for their

A Modern Parable

A Man of Great Faith

By FRANCES M. MILLS

THERE WAS A MAN who had great faith in God. He lived in a town at the base of a high mountain. From time to time rocks and dirt would dislodge from the side of the mountain and fall upon the town. Whenever this occurred the people became frightened and many fled to the open fields for safety. But the man of great faith only laughed at their fears and told them to put their faith in God, and they would be saved. Then one night a village elder dreamed that a terrible storm broke over the high mountain, and a large stone was loosened and began to roll and gather other stones and dirt and trees and became an avalanche that swept down the face of the mountain and buried the town at its feet.

The elder told his dream to the people, and one came forward to say he too had dreamed such a dream. And some believed it to be a warning. Then the elder said, "Let us go out into the open plain and build up a city in a safe place that we may not be crushed when the mountain falls." And many arose and went with him and builded a city far out on the plain. But others said, "'Tis but an old man's fancy. We will stay and live as we have always lived."

own development, and that they will learn to grow through serving.

Yes, one of the great things in this world is growth—development from small to large, simple to great. Let this story of the growth of an idea stimulate your League, that it may challenge other Leagues.

"Give me a standing place," said Archimedes, "and I will move the world." But it was the immortal Goethe who changed the postulate into the precept—"Make good thy standing place, and move the world!" Zion's beginnings can originate in your League.

And they raised their eyes to the mountain, and it seemed very strong and sure, and the sun shone brightly, and there was no cloud in the sky.

BUT EVEN AMONG THOSE who stayed were some who remembered the elder's words and secretly laid by provisions and kept watch that they might be prepared to flee when the mountain began to tremble. But the man of great faith said, "I have faith in God that he will protect me." Many days passed by, and few there were who still kept watch. Many forgot even the dream and the city built out on the plain.

Then one dark and windy night, one who watched came running to say that fierce lightnings were flashing about the summit of the mountain and rain was falling. Then those who had prepared themselves beforehand gathered together their provisions and fled to the city built upon the plain. But the people who remained in the city only yawned and said, "We have had bad storms before," and returned to their beds and went back to sleep. And the man of great faith stood in the middle of the street and lifted up his eyes to the skies and cried, "Lord, save me! I have great faith in thee!"

And a mighty rumbling commenced within the mountain, and the rocks began to roll, and the whole side of the mountain fell upon the town and buried it so deeply that no man saw it again, and all who were within it perished. But all who dwelt in the city on the plain were unharmed.

Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour. Let them, therefore, who are among the Gentiles, flee unto Zion. . . . Let not your flight be in haste, but let all things be prepared before you; and he that goeth, let him not look back, lest sudden destruction shall come upon him.—Doctrine and Covenants 108: 4.

Perfection Must Come Through Suffering

further outlook than that of innocent children. But God is utterly fair and impartial. He would not have some born in this state, and some in the state we are born in today. Being all-knowing, he knew that sin would enter in. Being all love, he provided the cure, through the atonement, before the sin was committed. So Adam and Eve were withheld from childbearing until their children should have the same conditions as all other children have.

The tree of knowledge became the "tree of learning" to our first parents, and also to us. Man learns his power by overcoming obstacles; he learns the love of God through the sacrifice of Christ; he learns the glory of development and achievement; he learns the true meaning of faith, hope, and love. In this way he has personal knowledge that the angels lack, as they have never had this experience.

The way Adam chose is the way that produced the curse. God did not arbitrarily curse the world in anger. As man chose to "be as the gods" (Genesis 3: 10, Inspired Version), God had to show man how incapable he was of being God. So all those obstacles were thrown in the way for man to overcome. Man is still far from being "as the gods." Adam and Eve willfully severed communion with God, breaking the first commandment. God did not contradict himself by letting sin be his agent. He only wanted to teach man the truth of the awfulness of sin, which he would otherwise not have known. Thus we see how in the end all things must eventually bow the knee and confess that God is supreme. Thus we see that perfection comes through suffering, strange as it may seem. But that is the law of development in all creation, and one in which man can really share in the ruling of the kingdom of God.

FRANCES RECKLIN.

Adam's Fall Was Necessary

WE HAVE BEEN TOLD that reason rejects the claim of Eve, Enoch, and Lehi that if Adam and Eve had not transgressed, there would have been no children.

Inspired Version versus King James Version

We read in the King James that when God made man, He said his work was good, but very soon he felt bad about making man, "And it repented the Lord that he made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart."—King James. There is nothing in the King James about God Almighty's discussing the plight of man on the earth or his need for a Savior before Adam and Eve were created, but this is clearly explained in the Inspired Version. It states that all men were created spiritually before Adam and Eve were on the earth. The King James has nothing at all about Lucifer trying to get into the picture when God selected Jesus Christ to come to earth and represent God.

Garden of Eden Situation

When Adam and Eve were first created and stood naked, they had no realization of their nakedness, nor did they know good from evil. The Almighty of course started man on earth for him to make his choice as to whom he would serve, God or Satan. Naturally God knew that when he commanded Adam and Eve not to eat the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil that they would fail to comply, and that he would have the knowledge of good and evil, and would be in a position to exercise his agency.

Testimony of Adam, Eve, and Lehi

Adam and Eve said God blessed them because of their transgression. Lehi (one of the great prophets of the Book of Mormon) has an inspired explanation regarding the fall of Adam and Eve, and it agrees fully with their testimony. Lehi states, "Adam fell, that men might be; and men are, that they might have joy." But Lehi goes into detail in his explanation. He says, "And now, behold, if Adam had not transgressed, he would not have fallen; but he would have remained in the garden of Eden. And all things which were created, must have remained in the same state which they were, after they were created; and they must have remained for ever, and had no end. And they would have had no children; wherefore, they would have remained in a state of innocence, having no joy, for they knew no misery; doing no good, for they knew no sin."

The evidence is conclusive in the Inspired Version and in the Book of Mormon that the fall of man was necessary to the divine purpose!

Adam Gained by the Fall

The Lord said to Adam, "I have set thee to be at the head: a multitude of nations shall come of thee, and thou art a prince over them forever."—Doctrine and Covenants 104: 28. Adam was glorious even to his old age. Doctrine and Covenants 104: 29 reads, "And Adam stood up in the midst of the congregation, and notwithstanding he was bowed down with age, being full of the holy ghost, predicted whatsoever should befall his posterity unto the latest generation. These things were all written in the Book of Enoch, and are to be testified of in due time."

At the time of his death he was executive director of the Eastern Jackson County Y.M.C.A. and pastor of the Bennington Heights congregation in Kansas City.

He is survived by his wife, Edna, and two sons, Paul Michael and Thomas Frank of the home; his mother, Mrs. Nancy Fraccascia, of Philadelphia; and two sisters: Mrs. Anna Frost of Philadelphia and Miss Hilda Fraccascia of Vineland, New Jersey.

NEWCOMB.—Hanora Coleman, was born September 1, 1874, at St. Johns, Newfoundland, and died August 19, 1950, at Resthaven in Independence, Missouri. After their marriage she and her husband Owen L. Newcomb, moved to Nova Scotia and later to Boston, Massachusetts. On May 13, 1895, she was baptized into the Reorganized Church; a devoted worker in the church, she taught a class of boys and was active in the women's department. In 1912 she and her husband homestead in Saskatchewan. Eight years later they moved to Independence, then to Boston, and in 1925 to Independence again. Here Sister Newcomb was a member of the Laurel Club and Home Beautiful Club. She was a regular attendant at church until May, 1943, when she suffered a stroke. In September, 1945, she had another stroke, after which she was hospitalized for a month and then taken to Resthaven. Her husband died in June, 1948. The only close relative, who survives her is a sister, Mrs. Elizabeth Page of Wenatchee, Washington.

FUSSELMAN.—Lucy Ann, daughter of James A. and Lucinda Leonard Johnson, was born April 13, 1854 in Pike County, Illinois, and died August 15, 1950, in Hill Memorial Hospital, Quincy, Illinois. She spent her early years near New Canton, Illinois, and was married on March 7, 1872, to Philip Fusselman, who preceded her in death ten years ago. Her home in later life was in Quincy, although she spent eight years in Independence and resided with her sons at various times. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since September 8, 1867. She spent the last fourteen years of her life in the hospital, for three years she was totally blind.

Surviving are three sons: Charles A. of Hull, Illinois; George E. of Quincy; and Clyde E. of Nauvoo, Illinois; fifteen grandchildren, nineteen great-grandchildren, and two great-great-grandchildren. Funeral services were conducted by Elder Harold Skiles at the Stormer Chapel in Quincy. Interment was in Greenmount Cemetery, Quincy.

BRYANT.—George E., was born February 2, 1900, and died July 30, 1950, at his home in Manitowaning, Ontario. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since June 27, 1915. Funeral services were conducted by Elder M. K. Brown and C. M. Smith at the Reorganized Church in Manitowaning. Burial was in Hilly Grove Cemetery.

 SEA COINS

Lillie Jennings returned from her vacation with a couple of sand dollars in her purse. They couldn't be spent, of course, but they seemed like wealth of a kind. Actually, the sand dollar, a kind of sea-urchin, resembles an Italian "raviolo" (plural, "ravioli") made of limestone, with the creature living where the spiced meat would be. It is decorated on the top with an etching like a five-petaled flower. There are peculiar little vein markings on the bottom as if made to conform to the rootlike feeders the creature sends out for nourishment.

We give the strangest long names to the smaller things. The sand dollar has been named "Echinarachnius parma," and belongs to the order "Clypeastrina." Probably fortunate that he doesn't have to think about it.

Isn't it odd that the Indians, who used shells for money, never made use of the sand dollar? Perhaps because they didn't call it by that name.

Nature's mint keeps operating, and she turns out this kind of coinage in generous numbers. They are not often found alive on the beach, but are washed up by the tides and waves after the occupant has died, leaving his home behind. Often they are crushed by some invader that has broken into the little house to eat its owner.

Strange and fascinating beauty has been wrought by unseen hands into these small creatures of the sea. And as one contemplates it, he considers the purpose of the great creation which takes into account even so humble a citizen of the earth.

 YOUR PERSONAL PHILOSOPHY

Your personal philosophy can be like an overcoat to protect you from the storm, or it can be like a bed of spikes that you must lie down on. It simply depends on what you include in your philosophy.

Anger is a fire that burns down the house because you don't like the knob on the door.

Resentment is like a descending escalator. It can carry you in one direction only—down.

A smile is the first word in a pleasant conversation. A frown is the beginning of trouble.

Every person is surrounded by a zone of illusions, based mostly upon his feelings. If he feels happy, the world is bright and beautiful. If he feels sad or angry, the same world looks ugly and revolting. Would it be stretching things to say that hell is created by the minds of those who go there?

 THE GREATEST OF THESE IS CHARITY

The folks at Uncle Joe's house have learned to be very kind and patient with the mistakes of others. They know very well that if either of them is critical, he is sure to be involved in something worse by the next day. Aunt Molly lost a saucepan as big as a merry widow hat. Uncle Joe found it reposing coolly in the refrigerator with a sprig of parsley and a cold potato in it. Fortunately, he made no foolish remarks. Before the day was over he had successively misplaced his glasses, a pair of shoes, a clean shirt, and the spool of thread he had brought home from town. It pays to be quiet and gentle about these things.

News & Notes

All church school superintendents in the United States and Canada are expected to report the number of persons in attendance at church school on Sunday, September 24, to the Department of Religious Education, the Auditorium, Independence, Missouri.

This information is desired in connection with the church school attendance campaign which is being conducted throughout the domestic fields beginning October 1, 1950.

An early response to this request will be greatly appreciated.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
By F. Henry Edwards.

JOINT COUNCIL

The First Presidency, Council of Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric began their Joint Council meeting in the Auditorium on September 5. The session is expected to last about two weeks.

It is expected that President Israel A. Smith will return before the conclusion of the meetings. All the apostles except D. Blair Jensen of the European Mission and Roscoe E. Davey of the Australasian Mission are present.

BOOK OF MORMON IN SPANISH

Apostle Charles R. Hield reports that work is progressing nicely on the translation of the Book of Mormon into Spanish. Immediate work is being done on the Book of Mosiah. Every page of the Book of Mormon has been assigned to someone for translation.

FROM TEXAS

Apostle Percy E. Farrow reports that Jack Wight and Alfred Yale, new appointees, are making a get-acquainted tour of Texas. Both young men will be doing missionary work in Texas. Brother Yale has just completed a series at Bryan, Texas. Brother Wight has recently assisted Pastor J. L. Berry in organizing a new mission in San Antonio, Texas.

WASHINGTON VISITORS

Mrs. Jessie Ward LeBaron, author of the "Call at Evening," and her husband Dr. G. C. LeBaron were visitors in Independence from August 16 to 22. For the past several weeks, Dr. and Mrs. LeBaron have been making a cross country trip to the east coast and are now on their way home to Seattle, Washington, where they operate a school. During their tour they have presented informal lectures to hundreds of Saints on herbology, dividing the lecture time between them.

YOUTH IN ZION

A city-wide Zion's League retreat was held at Gardner Lake, Missouri, on September 2, 3, and 4 under the supervision of Carl F. Mesle, General Director of Young People's Work in the church. The theme for the retreat was "A Faith for These Times." Two hundred and sixteen attended.

Apostle Charles R. Hield presented the Sunday morning sermon and was the leader for the Sunday afternoon discussion forum. Brother Mesle was in charge of the forum.

Al Pelletier, a veteran of World War II and now a special student at Graceland, presented the Sunday evening sermon and spoke at the Monday morning fellowship service. Kenneth Green, youthful city-wide Zion's League leader of Independence, was in charge of the fellowship service. At this service Brother Pelletier spoke under the influence of the spirit. The meeting lasted for two and one-half hours and might have lasted longer had time permitted.

At the beginning of the retreat, Brother Mesle held a meeting of all present who belonged to the priesthood. These young men were given active parts in the Communion service and other services of the retreat.

John Pennington was baptized at the retreat by Brother Mesle. Two other young people have given their decision to be baptized.

Among those in attendance were people from California, Washington, Nebraska, Iowa, Canada, and Australia. Les Gardner, who will enter Graceland College this fall, was from Australia, and Kenneth Phillips, who recently moved to Independence, was from Canada.

Our Professional Magazine

EVERY PROFESSION has its own special publication. There are magazines for doctors, druggists, lawyers, schoolteachers, and nurses. Preachers and ministers have theirs, too. "The butcher, the baker, the candle-stick maker," barbers, theater-operators, stamp collectors, dog-lovers, jewelers—all have their special periodicals that keep them informed on the latest things in their fields. If they do not take these publications, they are soon left behind and will be incompetent to give first-class service.

A professional education is like radio or television—some new feature is always being added. It is never complete. Also, it is like a car, it requires repairs and maintenance.

The church has a professional magazine for its leaders and local and district church workers. It is Guide Lines to Leadership. Last year you may have known all that was necessary to be a good church school teacher or officer. This year something has been added; new ideas and more effective plans have been developed. You will find these discussed in the current issues of Guide Lines to Leadership. If you are not taking this magazine, you may be falling behind and losing your effectiveness.

The July-August issue contains articles by Apostle Reed M. Holmes, Thelona D. Stevens, Donald V. Lents, John R. Darling, Beatrice Darling, Alice Burgess, Emma McConley, and the Presiding Bishopric, and other leaders. These bring valued information that will result in better church work for those congregations in which the material is studied and used.

Guide Lines to Leadership is a serious and important professional magazine. Are you keeping up with it?

Pictured on front cover are sons of Mr. and Mrs. William Entwistle, Wigan, Lancashire, England, taken on visit to United States.

On Speaking Into the Air

"Except ye utter by the tongue words easy to be understood, how shall it be known what is spoken? for ye shall speak into the air."

—I Corinthians 14:9.

A serious consideration of this text could hardly lead one to the conclusion that Paul was anticipating radio broadcasting. Yet there is a sense in which his warning might be of profit to those who speak over the "air" as well as others. For it is quite certain that many who begin merely by "speaking into the air" end before very long by speaking into the empty air.

And wouldn't it be a wholesome thing if sponsors and performers could hear the clicks of the switches on thousands of radios in homes all over the land being turned off just as their programs come on? If it could be accomplished, it would start a great reform.

* * * * *

There is hardly anyone who has not been guilty, at some time in his life, of "speaking into the air," as Paul expressed it. There is a modern expression, somewhat on the colloquial side—"talking through the hat." It would be interesting to know how that expression originated.

You hear "speaking into the air" in many places. Sometimes it occurs among businessmen in the discussion of ideals. Sometimes it happens in prayer meeting when you hear some people making statements of dedication that you know they have utterly no intention of fulfilling. People seem to think that these promissory notes to God are not binding, that they are simply for publicity.

Sometimes politicians speak into the air. And sometimes plain ordinary citizens are guilty too.

* * * * *

There should be occasions of soul-searching for all people. And preachers should not regard themselves as exempt. Accustomed as they are, and as they must be by their profession, to search the souls and the motives of others, they must not forget themselves.

We can hold up a mirror to the body, but it is more difficult to hold up a mirror to the mind and spirit. One must be very honest, very resolute, and very fearless to do it.

* * * * *

The function of language is to communicate thoughts and ideas. If it does not do that it fails. If the speaker uses words that the audience cannot understand, he speaks in vain. He wastes their time and his own. Language should be plain and clear, if nothing else.

Of course we have all heard men who speak not to be understood but to be enjoyed. They have good voices, and they use them as a singer does, to produce beauty. So, what they give out is "chin music," literally. But there are some who doubt that the instrument is good enough for a sustained "organ solo."

* * * * *

We have some ministers in our church who speak to the mind. Their sermons are intellectual feasts. One goes to hear them gladly, because it is certain that one will come away better informed, and with a new outlook on some subject that is refreshing and stimulating to the mind. One comes empty, and goes away filled. These men speak to the educated and cultured listeners. It is a pity that many others who need this sort of thing so much get little out of it. For them, it is "speaking into the air."

On the other hand, there are other men who minister to the poor and humble, giving them the spiritual sustenance they require. And, for the intelligentsia, these men "speak into the air."

We cannot expect to be able to reach and minister to "all kinds and conditions of men." All we can do is to try.

* * * * *

There are men who speak to the heart. Their sermons are filled with sympathetic understanding and compassion. They help people to know each other better and appreciate each other more. Theirs is a ministry of peace and reconciliation. People love them. Such men never "speak into the air." They can reach and bless all kinds.

* * * * *

I once saw a preacher—and I will not identify him—turn sideways to his congregation so they could see his magnificent profile. He shut his eyes and talked to the wall. He turned loose a stream of grandiloquence that would have amazed the people if they had known what he was saying, which he did not. For he was using big words incorrectly, and was making an amazing exhibition of himself to the few who understood. Such speaking may have its place, but it is not in church. Like Shakespeare's poor actor, it was "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

* * * * *

Those who speak—and most of us do it at some time in our lives—should remember our obligation to the people. We should speak so that they can understand easily or we waste their time and our own. It is not good to "speak into the air."

E d i t o r i a l

From Eugene Theys, Stuttgart, Germany:

I am again in Germany visiting our groups in the western zones. I find the work steadily progressing, even though there are many uncertainties standing in our way.

Brother and Sister Joseph Holmes of England traveled with me my first two days on this trip. They had the pleasure of meeting our members in Offenbach and Nürnberg. I believe they are among the first English Saints to visit on the Continent.

On August 26 Brother Erick Hühhold, bishop's agent in western Germany, and I visited the Floyd Engstroms at Landshut. Here we had the pleasure of meeting many of the officers on the staff. All we met spoke highly of Brother Engstrom's work and the way in which he is ministering to our soldiers over here. I wish we had more men like him representing our church in this capacity.

At present Brother Hühhold and I are traveling together. We are now staying at the home of Brother Reinhold Czech, a prominent dentist in this city. Brother Czech is pastor here and is doing a good work despite the fact he is very busy in his profession.

The following is from a letter from President Smith written after he cabled he would be going to Australia via New Zealand:

Going clear to Auckland on this ship, a toss up as to time, as we faced a two weeks' delay for plane at Apia, Samoa; so we will complete a visit to Australasia in ten or twelve days. Having rougher seas and cooler weather since turning south from Samoa.

We feel it is very desirable that President Smith has had this opportunity to contact the Saints in the other part of the world, and from what we hear from them they have appreciated his visit.

The following report comes to us by letter from Alvin C. Wadsworth, district president of the Northwest Ohio District.

On Sunday, July 2, at Oak Harbor, we baptized eight persons. The scene of the baptism ceremony was a private beach on Lake Erie. Among those baptized were a mother and her three sons; a father, his son and daughter; and our daughter-in-law—three adults and five youths.

Right Habits Are Good

(A subscriber has asked for the reprinting of this article which she clipped from an old "Herald." We believe our readers will profit by reading it. The author was Frederick M. Smith.—Editor.)

Creatures of habit though we are, how slow we are in learning to adequately appreciate the methods of forming good ones. Bad habits seem more easily acquired than the good ones. That is because bad habits are formed by following the lines of least resistance, while the good ones are formed only by making our moves purposive and having a definite goal toward which we constantly endeavor.

What are your habits? Have you evaluated them to discover if they are good or bad?

Bad habits are eliminated only by replacing them by good ones; and know this Saints: to replace a bad habit by forming a good one is more difficult of achievement than to form the good one first.

Why speak of habits here? Because we form church habits as in all other lines of activity. What are yours? Are you regular in family devotions? In private prayer? In observance of the Sacrament? Punctual and regular in attendance at church, Sunday school, and Religio? In study for greater usefulness—study in music, church literature, literature general, your vocation? In keeping the financial law of the church? In speaking no evil of persons, but only good? These and many others are matters which have to do with our spiritual habits. Get the habit of being right, doing right, at the right time; or being good for the sake of the other fellows and for God and his church.

Be sure your habits are right, then go ahead—to perfection.

Why Attend Church?

THE OTHER DAY a radio commentator discussed some of the reasons people give for attending church, even though they are not zealous church members. Judged from the Puritanical standards of our forebears, most of the answers would have been plain sacrilege; judged from the standpoint of value to society most of them were worthy of consideration.

First, there were the young marrieds just starting out in life who wanted the social side of church association. Is that not a worthy ambition? Is it not better that they cultivate friends who seek a place of worship than those who patronize the cocktail lounge?

Second was the young father who wanted only the best for his family. He liked the cultural atmosphere the church could give his children. He hoped that as they grew to maturity and he did not have to be so concerned with business matters, he would be able to enter politics. It was his opinion that a church background would be an asset for such a career. What better background could the leaders of our country have than the refining influence of the church? Even though he might not be very religious, he would absorb some of the ideals which would better fit him for public office.

The third person to give his reason for church attendance was a young man who had decided that he was old enough to find a wife. He was not quite sure whether he was an atheist or not, but he felt that if he went to church it wouldn't hurt him, and it might help him in making his decision. He enjoyed the music of the church and participation in it as well as the dramatic program. As to finding a wife, what better place could a young man of refined tastes choose to go than to church? As to his ideas on being an atheist, church attendance should soon cure that.

After listening to these reasons advanced for church attendance, I began to wonder just what my own reason was. It seems to me that in the stress and strain of this modern day, I need the spiritual uplift that quiet hour brings. Even though unable to attend a church of my own faith where I might find the great spiritual communion which is not found elsewhere, there is much to be gained and nothing to be lost by attendance at other churches. When someone tells me that only hypocrites go to church, I say, "But think how much worse they might be if they didn't go."

MAUDE D. ANDERSON.

The Greatness of Service

By CHRIS B. HARTSHORN

A Sermon Preached May 21, 1950, at Liberty Street Church in Independence, Missouri

From a wire recording by Elmer Hart.

Scripture: Matthew 23: 1-9, Inspired Version

I HOPE THAT THIS THEME of service will really be a challenge to all of you, as there is great service to be done in the kingdom of our God if the church does that which is required of it in the near future. In my youth—and I think I have heard this same testimony even in later years—I very frequently heard people say, “I love this work. It is my meat and drink.” Now it is work, and it is fine when we can love it, because work that someone else gives us to do usually is something we dislike. Work that we ourselves find to do, which is a very part of our beings because we love it, is a joy and a satisfaction—even a blessing. It has dignity.

I wish to read two or three texts which emphasize the importance of work. In about five of the early revelations, the same statement is reiterated: “A great and a marvelous work is about to come forth among the children of men.” Then in one of the early revelations of the Reorganization, this statement was made: “I will hasten my work in its time.” Perhaps one of the better known revelations which emphasizes the principle of work by all of us is contained in Section 119: 8:

Prosecute the missionary work in this land and abroad so far and so widely as you may. All are called according to the gifts of God unto them, and to the intent that all may labor together, let him that laboreth in the ministry, and him that toileth in the affairs of the men of business and of work, labor together with God for the accomplishment of the work entrusted to all.

When you have made a covenant with Jesus Christ in baptism, by which you are made a new creature spiritually, and had all the possibilities, the innate rights and privileges of spiritual rebirth into the kingdom of God, it was not like a graduation diploma for the completion of some work; it was not the idea of something you had done that was great; rather it was like a matriculation to begin study—an initiation into a work that meant either salvation or damnation.

The late Lecompte du Nouy in his book, The Destiny of Man, has this to say: “Purely intuitive religious faith is a much more efficacious human lever than science or philosophy. Action follows conviction and not knowledge.” The world is not being lost today—that part of which is being lost—because it does not know better. Latter Day Saints are not getting in trouble or backsliding because they don’t know better—it’s because they lack convictions. Perhaps the ministry is at fault, I do not know; but it seems to me one of the functions of the ministry is to keep hammering away on the things that are important in our religious belief until conviction comes to the membership that now is the time for us to be about our Master’s business. There’s nothing else so important in this whole world. Life is not made up only of things that pay bigger dividends which are less important than the things pertaining to the kingdom of our Lord.

BROTHER CHEVILLE told this little incident in a meeting I attended a few months ago. While he and Bishop Earl Higdon were walking toward the college one evening for a faculty meeting, Brother Higdon said, “Roy, I bet you can’t sit through this meeting without saying something.” Roy thought that was a challenge so he said, “I’ll take that bet.” And he did. Walking home, Brother Higdon said, “Well, you won; did you enjoy the meeting?” And Roy answered, “No, I didn’t.” The principle here is, we must participate. We must do something about what we know, about what we have a stake in if we’re going to enjoy it. People do not backslide from the kingdom because they are overworked; it’s because they’re underworked and, consequently, underpaid.

The main theme for this month which you find on the back of your bulletin is “Serve Where You Are.” Perhaps you have heard several sermons on that already, but I’m not apologizing. It was intended by those who are trying to lead us and unify our thinking in the church that we should approach this subject from various angles and keep on emphasizing it until we have some convictions.

Now I want to admit—perhaps it’s a confession—that the idea of work is hard to glamorize. It makes some people tired even to think of work. They just haven’t found very much satisfaction in it. Like an old record we used to own, called “The Two Black Crows,” where Moran and Mack have a little skit in which one tells the other about an excursion that is going down the river on the coming Saturday night and he wants to know if his friend is going to attend. It seems that every time there had been one of these excursions he was out of money, so his friend told him he wouldn't be out of money if he would just work a little bit. He said he would work if he could find any pleasure in it but he had never been able to enjoy it. This isn't told to amuse you, but to point out that lots of church members feel the same way. They want pleasure in all that they do. I'm sure that if most Latter Day Saints would get in and work hard—not just a little bit here and a little bit there, but work at their religion faithfully and conscientiously—they would find pleasure in it.

Brother Elbert A. Smith some years ago wrote this little bit of philosophy concerning the subject. He says, "It's a curse not to have work. It's a greater curse to be unable to work. But the greatest of all curses is to be unwilling to work." This is true of people in and out of the church. Nearly always those who have not found pleasure and satisfaction in the work they do come into trouble sooner or later. It is a great curse to be unwilling to work.

A FEW YEARS AGO in a meeting at Kansas City, I heard the Reverend Charles Darsey make this observation: "In the average church 25 per cent of the members are actively enjoying their religion. The rest are onlookers or well-wishers, if they have not already degenerated into backbiters and backsliders." That 25 per cent may be reminiscent of something you have heard in our own statistics, but some sort of feeling of relief may come when you know that other churches have about the same difficulty in keeping people up to concert pitch in the work—in keeping them ever going on and doing the things that are required in the kingdom. In the recent General Conference a revelation came to the church. Note the last thing that appears in this revelation:

"The hopes of my people, the goals of my church, while not yet fully realized at times, and to many seemingly distant, are closer to realization than many recognize. It is yet day when all can work. The night will come when for many of my people, opportunity to assist will have passed."—Doctrine and Covenants 142: 7.

There is a wonderful promise in that, but there is also a warning. Some have grown discouraged; some are spreading that discouragement wherever they can. The things that come uppermost in their minds are the failures that the church and individuals in the church have made, so they talk about them. But that only confirms them in their own indecision, their own delinquency in the work of the church. On the other hand, it's not so dark but what there is hope, and the day of our realization of many of our goals seems much closer to me now than it has ever seemed in all my life.

I can remember as a boy in my teens of hearing prophecies about the coming of the Lord. Many had the assurance that he would come in their life time. So I have grown up with expectancy, but I have not been discouraged, for as I look upon the things that have happened in just the past two or three years, and particularly this last Conference, I'm filled with hope. I have confidence that if we will take seriously those things I read from Section 142 and say, "Now is the day for us to do our work," we could accomplish much. We must lend ourselves to God and his purposes, not reluctantly—not to do just as little as we can—but being willing to give the most, we are able to give consistent with our other obligations and responsibilities.

I want to read the twenty-sixth verse from the twelfth chapter of John's Gospel: "If any man serve me, let him follow me. Where I am there shall also my servants be. If any man serve me, him will my Father honor." Here is a great promise for service. And at this late day we must be willing to give service.

We must have a purpose and pursue it relentlessly.

A STORY IS TOLD of Thomas Henry Huxley, the great English scientist, who on one occasion went to Dublin to give a lecture. His train was a little late and he was bothered. He rushed from the station to a waiting cab, jumped in, and said, "Drive fast!" The cabby whipped his horse, and they started down the street at a very lively clip. After he got his breath and thought about his instructions, Huxley asked the driver, "Do you know where you're going?" "No," the man replied, "but I'm driving fast!"

We can do this in the church; we can get in and start off very fast. When we're new in the work, it seems as if it won't be any time until we can convert a great many people. It's so plain to us; it's so easy for us to see the beauty and reasonableness of the gospel that we feel we can go out and convert our co-workers in the shop, our relatives, and our friends by the score. By and by we find out that we have been going pretty fast, and we don't have much accomplished; then we get discouraged. But Jesus said, "Narrow is the way that leadeth to life eternal and few there be that entereth therein." This does not excuse us from being enthusiastic for what we have. It is the pearl of great price, but we can't expect others to appreciate it until they have seen it as we have seen it—and maybe we've had a lot of work done on us. We may have a heritage that is not possessed by these friends of ours, so we must be patient with them and never forget that while we do a little planting and a little watering, God gives the increase in his own due time and season.

A VERY GOOD MAN in the church whom you would all know if I named him, came into my office and told me of this incident. He said, "I was talking with one of our priesthood members who is a professional man. I said to him, 'You do not seem to have much time or money for the church these days. Why is that?' 'Well,' he said, 'the church just isn't going anywhere. I've got work to do. I'll do my work, and let the church do its work. When the members get ready to go someplace, I'll be ready to go along.'

There are several fallacies in this attitude. The first is that it is not "my work and theirs," but "our work." This man was a part of the church, an ordained minister in fact, but he had the idea that he was too busy to pay much attention to church work. He was so busy pursuing money that he hardly had time to do anything for God. He had forgotten; he had lost the vision; and the church was moving on in several directions doing some worth-while things he didn't know about. What do you suppose will happen to make him know that the church is moving forward and cause him to get in and do the things God has called him to do?

I like the spirit of Nehemiah, and I know you have been thrilled as you have read of it. In the sixth chapter of Nehemiah we read that Sanballat and Tobiah sent word to Nehemiah while he was working on the walls of Jerusalem. He had about finished the walls, but while he hadn't hung the gates yet, he had made them secure and these men knew they were to be excluded. They sent word to him to come down—they had a little matter they wanted to discuss with him. Nehemiah could see what was in their plans for he said, "They intended to do me mischief." So he sent back this message to them: "I am engaged in a great work, so that I cannot come down. Why should the work cease while I come down to you?" That was a good question for Nehemiah to raise. It is a good question for us too. When we leave the task of building Zion's walls to talk about extraneous things, aren't we about other matters—minor matters?

Perhaps it would be interesting, though not profitable, for me to tell you a number of things I've heard since Conference that are critical and inconsequential in comparison with the many great things accomplished there. Some make men offenders for a word. They find technical difficulties in the way. But why should the work cease while we come down and argue about minor issues?

THERE IS WORK TO DO. It's important work. Service gives dignity to life. "Serve where you are." Why? There are two good reasons. We must serve—it's in our nature. We cannot find satisfaction or dignity in life unless we are doing something worth while. Because of this we're going to serve ourselves, our family, or other people. He who serves primarily himself is usually petrified to the service of others. Selfishness has a very small reward. Personal satisfactions soon run dry. As we enlarge the circle of our interests, it's easy to find dignity to life.

Another reason is that there's only one place where we can begin our work of service, and that's right where we are. We can't serve the people in Japan today, although they need lots of service over there, nor any other place on the globe. If we're going to serve, we must serve right where we are—with the hands we have, with the talents we have—and not long for youth, or more physical strength, or more talents. The only way we can serve God and our fellow men is right where we are with what we have.

James explains something to us of this situation in which people are talking rather than doing. In the second chapter of James, verse fifteen, we are told that a man may say, "I will show thee I have faith without works; but I say, Show me thy faith without works." And the inference is that it can't be done. There's only one way to show our love for God and that is to serve God's people. There's only one way to show our faith, and that is through works. James makes this affirmation, "And I will show thee my faith by my works." The church is calling upon us today to do this very thing.

I noticed a report that came over my desk recently indicating that there has been a rather healthy increase in the tithes and offerings paid to the church the first quarter of this year as compared with last year—and last year was a good year. This is indeed fortunate, because at Conference time we did vote quite a large increase in our budget for the next two years. Unless we are willing to come forward and increase the tithing and offering we give, the church cannot accomplish what we have promised we will do. I'm thankful that we gave some to make that possible, that among those who contributed in tithes and offerings last year your name and mine are listed. That's work all of us can do. It doesn't require singing talent; it doesn't require mechanical knowledge. It just requires what we have where we are to do some of the work the church expects of us now.

Another thing the Conference brought to the fore is the work of the storehouse and surplus. Right across the street from us is located the Social Service Center, a very concrete project, and we're not to admire it from across the street only; we're not just to sing its praises in the columns of the Herald. Many people have to get into this project and work. There's work to do, and those who have said that Zion isn't to be redeemed, or that the church isn't going anywhere should accept this challenge! There's plenty of work to do wherever one looks in the church today—here in Liberty Street and in the other fifteen congregations there is need for more workers. We need to make preparation. Above all, we need to roll up our sleeves and go to work on the projects so we may have surplus, so we can make the Social Service Center serve this community and particularly the people of the church. I could point out other ways in which we are challenged to serve where we are.

RECENTLY SOMEONE SAID, "There is no limit to the good we can do if we're not too concerned about who gets the credit." That's what often holds us back in doing good. We want to be sure we get the credit for what we do, but that is not important. If we love this work, if it's our meat and drink, then that it might go forward to the glory of God is much more important than who gets the credit.

I want to call your attention to two or three more things in my text (Matthew 23: 1-9). Certain people love to sit in Moses' seat. Moses was a great man. He was raised up by God to lead the children of Israel out of bondage. He was the father of Judaism, and there were people among the Pharisees always wanting to sit in Moses' seat. Someone must be there, of course, but when too many people want to get in one place, it usually causes trouble. "But do not after their works for they say and do not . . . and all their works are done to be seen of men." They care who gets the credit. "They make broad their phylacteries." Now you may not know what phylacteries are, perhaps, unless you have had some instruction on them. We do not use them any more—at least not the kind the Pharisees used. They bound them on their frontlets and wore them on their wrists. These phylacteries carried a bit of religious advertising in writing and contained certain words of the law. They were worn in conspicuous places for people to see. Not content with something modest, the Pharisees kept making them larger and larger.

That's the kind of people who lived in Jesus day. They weren't getting along too well in the matter of the kingdom, so Jesus set up his own kingdom. He called new apostles and seventies, ordained them, and sent them forth to preach the kingdom of heaven. The Law of Moses was fulfilled in John, and since his time, "the kingdom of heaven was preached and all men pressed into it." They loved to be called "Rabbi," which means "Master." Titles are all right when they contribute to understanding, but they're like phylacteries when they're just tacked on to give glory or honor to certain individuals. "One is your master, which is Christ, and all ye are brethren." That's a beautiful thing—all are brothers. No one is in Moses' seat, or the upper rooms of the synagogue, or in the best chairs. "And whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased, and he that shall humble himself shall be exalted of him."

THERE IS GREATNESS in service, but if you would be great, you must be the servant of all, and if you don't like work—if you don't like to serve—then your greatness is limited by your own dislikes.

ELDER CHARLES GRAHAM told this experience recently in a sermon. I hesitate to repeat his story because it was his own experience, but it fits in here so well. He and other leaders were planning the young people's camps to be held at the lake. He needed a certain man to help, so he went to him and asked, "Could you possibly arrange to come and help us for two weeks?" The young man didn't see how he could because it was hard for him to get his vacation at that particular time and anyway he had made other plans. Brother Graham told him he was disappointed because he was hoping he could arrange to do the work. He tried to get someone else and failed. Then he saw this young man again and said, "If you'll come and help us just one week perhaps we could manage." The man thought perhaps he could do this.

He went down to the camp and served one week. During this time he was with others in the group meetings, and the Spirit of God worked among them. They were lifted up, and he enjoyed it as he hadn't enjoyed anything for a long time. On Friday evening when Brother Graham went to this young man and said, "I'll take you home tomorrow," he answered, "But I'm not going home tomorrow!" Brother Graham said, "I thought you were to serve only one week." And then the man told him, "I've called my wife and she said, 'If you want to stay, stay. I'd rather live on bread and water than to have you come back to your job just because we need the money'—so I'm going to stay." Now he didn't remain the extra week because he was being paid for it; it was the Spirit of God at that camp that made him want to serve. He needed more of that spirit, and he was enjoying his work. After the camp was over he went home and found that his wife was ill. She had a skin ailment which the doctor seemed unable to help. Brother Graham and others were called there to administer to her and she was healed instantly. The doctor marveled that such a thing could happen.

This brother later came to Charles Graham and said, "I had another great blessing at the camp that I want to tell you about. I have a hobby that I work at on the side, and all unexpected to me, some people sought me out to get me to do something for them in this line. I have orders worth $250 to me." Don't you see how things sometimes work out? It wasn't a matter of bread and water, it was a matter of spiritual feasting. It was a matter of God's moving upon people so that there was no loss of money; but we have to have faith.

HOW MANY OF US love this work? How many of us will say as this young man said to Brother Graham, "The next time you have anything you want done in the Lord's work, you let me know; I'm ready to do it." That's the spirit of this work. You'll be happy in it. Serve where you are. Not where somebody else is, or where you want to be a year from now, but where you are today.

I like this thought of Tennyson's: "Be strong. We are not here to play, to dream, to drift. We have hard work to do, loads to lift. Shun not the struggle; face it. 'Tis God's gift."

Experiences of a Missionary - Part IV

Lost at Night

DURING the time we were on the homestead, we needed milk for our children. When I was home I would walk about four miles to the home of a neighbor to get milk for them. Usually I would go late in the afternoon after I had finished a hard day's work. One day there was a drizzling rain, and as soon as late afternoon came it grew very dark. It was daylight when I started to the neighbors, but by the time I started home it was pitch dark. As I started across the prairie I noticed the wind seemed to be changing directions. I kept walking until I discovered I was completely lost. There were no landmarks, and I wondered if I would ramble all night. The sky being overcast I could not get my direction from the moon or stars. After walking many miles, I came to a road that I recognized and this road led me to our home where I arrived about midnight. To be lost even in a prairie country brings a terrible feeling. After that my wife always put a lamp in the window so I might have a beacon light to pilot me home.

A few weeks following this event a mail carrier became lost, and after driving for hours he came to our cabin. He called and my wife answered him. He inquired the way to a small town some twelve miles distant. She gave him directions and told him to go a mile east and then north to the town. He replied by saying he did not know north from south or east from west, so she went out to where he was and gave him directions so he could find his way. A few days after this I was riding home with him, and he told me how thankful he was that my wife was brave enough to come to his rescue and give him the information he needed. I am wondering how many good women would be willing to face such conditions as I have just described, so that their husbands might go out and preach the gospel. I hope there are many.

Education at Home

My wife was more fortunate than I in her schooling and did much to help me correct my English. Sometimes she would take down my sermon in shorthand; then when we got home she would read to me some of the things I said. I was deeply disappointed in myself, on such occasions, but I did try diligently to improve. I spent months studying, and eventually overcame many of my public speaking weaknesses.

Missionary Hardships

The hardships endured by missionaries forty years ago were many. Transportation was crude as compared with today. Money was scarce, and missionaries often found themselves in dire need of help. In many of the large cities we had a few Saints with no place to meet except in private homes. It was no uncommon thing for a missionary to obtain the consent of city officials to speak on the streets. Schoolhouses were sometimes open to the presenting of the gospel of Christ. Whenever or wherever an opportunity presented itself, the representatives of the church took advantage of it and tried to reach the honest in heart. Opposition was strong, and prejudices in many fields were most bitter.

At one time in company with Brother Frank A. Russell I was preaching on the streets of Boulder, Colorado. Good crowds greeted us each evening, and this stirred up the opposition. One day we went to the postoffice to get our mail, and a letter was handed us telling us to leave the town or we would suffer the consequences. The date was set, and if we were found in the city after that date, a dose of tar and feathers awaited us. It happened we did not get the letter until after the date for our leaving had passed. We were made happy, as no harm came to us even if we were threatened.

In some places, however, threats were carried out. I well remember preaching in the home of Brother and Sister Kerr near Haigler, Nebraska. It was in the homestead country where settlers had but little money, and houses were constructed of sod cut from the prairies. Attending these services were Mr. and Mrs. Frank Cotterell. After some investigation they accepted the gospel and were baptized. Brother Cotterell is now Presiding Judge in Lafayette County, Missouri, where he is held in high respect by all who know him.

Opposition

Not long after the Cotterells came into the church, an evangelist came to Haigler and held a series of services in one of the churches there. This man was one of the bitter opponents of the church, and in many places did all he could to hinder the progress of the work. Night after night he would abuse us and tell very detrimental stories. Sister Cotterell wrote me asking that I come down and protect our interest.

Taking the first train to Haigler I went to the church where this evangelist was speaking. I took a seat in the back part of the church expecting to say nothing but to take notes. Without even coming back to speak to me or show any consideration whatsoever, he shouted, "Holloway will offer prayer." I arose in my place and asked the Lord to bless the people of that community and to bless the presenting of the gospel of Christ. When I closed my prayer, he went to a question box and took from it a number of questions, one of which he read to the audience. The question related to the manner in which their men were called to the ministry. It gave him an excuse to open fire on our work and on me in particular. He denounced our ministers as hypocrites and challenged me to meet the issue without further delay. I arose and immediately he and his assistant minister asked me to sit down. I tried to be heard, but no opportunity was granted me. Seeing no good could come by my remaining on my feet, I sat down. For more than an hour this man resorted to some of the most abusive language I have ever heard. I sat in silence but took notes.

When the service closed that night I walked over to his assistant whom I knew personally and told him that they had acted everything but the part of gentlemen. I was ordered from the building, but I declined to go. It was a public place, and as long as I behaved myself I had a right there.

This man had made an attack on our work in Burlington, Colorado, and had conducted himself in such a manner as to arouse the enmity of the best citizens of the town. They had decided to invite him to leave and when he heard of what they were going to do, he left town without having received the invitation. He discovered I knew about this and grabbed me by the throat and began pushing me down the aisle of the church. I did not offer any resistance but upon reaching the pulpit I told him to take his hands off me or I would show him the value of law. With some degree of reluctance, he complied with my request. He kept saying, "Defend your old Aaronic and Melchisedec priesthood." I pulled some propositions from my pocket and read them to him and told him to put his signature to them and I would be only too glad to defend our church, but this he refused to do. He picked up a Bible that was laying on the pulpit and tried to rub that in my face. His assistant told him he better behave as he was making a laughingstock of himself. As I walked out of the church one man ordered me to leave town or he would egg me. I replied by informing him I would be in town the next day and for him to get his eggs. There was only one Latter Day Saint in the audience that night, and he thought they would mob me but I had no fear.

Vindication

The next morning I came into town and I saw on a bulletin board this statement: "Rough house last night. Brown was wrong. Will apologize tonight." Public sentiment had turned bitterly against him. I obtained a hall of the I.O.O.F. in which to reply to this tirade. The use of the hall was free. I placed window cards in all the business houses in town, advertising the time and place of my reply. When the night came the opposition had arranged a special program that would take the entire crowd from me and thereby prevent my being heard.

Some of my friends came to me and told me what the opposition were doing. I felt bad but seemingly there was nothing I could do. When the hour came for my reply, I almost wished the earth would swallow me up. I shall never forget how I felt as I climbed the stairs leading into the hall where I was to occupy. If I could have twenty-five people to hear me I would be satisfied, but I did not expect even that many. When I opened the door that night, a great surprise awaited me. That hall was packed full of people anxious to hear what I had to say. The special meeting of my opponent had only seventeen people. It is needless to say I paid my respects to this man and as far as I know, he has never from that day to this made another attack upon the church.

No Help at Allendale

In company with Brother John F. Garver, who at the time was associated in the Lamoni Stake Presidency, I went to Grant City, Missouri. From there we walked and carried our baggage on our backs to Allendale, eight miles distant. It was in the early springtime, and the roads were impassible for vehicles.

On our arrival in Allendale, we went to a hotel owned by one of our members, Brother Charles Farrell. He inquired as to why we were there, and we told him we expected to hold a series of services. He informed us that we were not wanted, that we were too young and inexperienced. What they wanted was someone from the First Presidency or the Twelve who could go back to the very beginning and review the gospel, "an epoch at a time," as he expressed it.

Even though we were not wanted we decided to make an effort, so that night we opened a series of services in our church. I did the preaching and Brother Garver had charge. After the service, Brother Farrell was very much elated and congratulated us on the good service. He made further inquiry as to who would do the preaching the next night, and I informed him Brother Garver would be the speaker. To this he most seriously objected saying, "Let Garver do the singing and praying but you do the preaching." The next evening Brother Garver spoke. Our friend was again present, and when the service was over he went to Brother Garver and said, "You did fine. Just the way I wanted it presented. Who is going to speak tomorrow night?" Brother Garver informed him, "Holloway will preach." When this answer was given him, he completely reversed himself. He protested and insisted Garver should do all the preaching and let Holloway do the singing and praying. However, before the week was over he seemed willing to listen to either of us.

The week passed by and the interest and attendance were fine. A traveling man passed through town and reported several cases of smallpox in Lamoni; this caused the people to become afraid and so they stayed away from our services. This meant we would have to close the meeting.

No money was given to us, and we found ourselves without sufficient funds to pay our fare from Grant City, Missouri, to Lamoni. We walked from Allendale to Lamoni, a distance of thirty miles. Brother Garver's baggage weighed twenty-six pounds, while mine was a pound less. Even with such a load to carry we started out on foot. About nine o'clock in the morning it began to rain, and by the time we got to Hatfield, Missouri, we were drenched to the skin. Between the two of us we had about twenty cents in money with which we purchased some cheese and crackers to stay our empty stomachs. After eating this we proceeded on our way. The mud was deep, and no teams were on the road. We continued to struggle along until we came to the country home of Elder Charles H. Jones, the man who had baptized me some years before. We found a hearty welcome there and remained overnight. The next morning we arose and continued our journey to Lamoni, stopping at my father's home on the way where we ate dinner. From there on home was ten miles, but we felt equal to the occasion so continued our trek.

A "God Bless You" Saint

About six miles from Lamoni we passed the home of a Latter Day Saint. He came to the door and asked us where we had been. We replied, "Allendale." "Holding meetings down there?" "Yes." "God bless you boys. That is the way to make good missionaries."

Brother Garver evidently was weary and not in the best kind of a mood as he replied, "Yes, you will say, 'God bless you boys,' but you don't help them or give them a cent of money to pay their way."

So we trudged on our weary way. About night we reached Lamoni. When within a mile of home we had to cross a stream that was about ten feet deep. There was ice along each bank, but the center of the channel was open. The stream was not so wide that I could not jump across. Brother Garver came up to the bank and tried to test the ice as to its strength. He finally made the jump. The ice broke, his feet went up in the air and he came down in the middle of the stream with his grips on top of him. He climbed out with the water dripping from his clothing.

We reached home that night feeling we had done our part in trying to reach the people even if our experiences had not always been pleasant. The next morning we walked to the business section of town. Brother Garver was so lame he could hardly walk and I was not much better.

Many times in the cold and storm of winter we have traveled to some of the remote places in the Lamoni Stake that we might be able to tell the gospel story to those who desired to hear it.

Profits - By R. C. LAMBKIN

The Slippery Slide Rule

LATE ONE EVENING young Joe Gerber, a refugee student at Rensselaer Polytec, sat contemplating the pile of books and notes before him. He was three weeks behind in his course in Aeronautical Engineering. Would he ever catch up? If only it didn't take so much time! "I've got an idea," said Joe to himself. "Now if it'll just work." He ripped the elastic from his pajamas and marked it off in proportional parts. It worked. Stretching or contracting his rubber ruler against his conventional scales, he was able to complete his work with an enormous saving of time.

Today Joe is busy turning out slide rules that stretch. The whole scientific world marvels at the immigrant boy's invention.

Yet, for a long time now the world has been living by a similar rule—one that slips and slides and stretches until any answer we have to life's problems only faintly resembles the answer in "the book." Shall we as Latter Day Saints trust this slippery slide rule to measure our performance?

For instance, we protest that absolute equality is impossible, so we interpolate. We shift from the exact ideal. We pick up our neighbor's elastic rule. We measure both our needs and our surpluses by it. Deftly we come up with an answer. We have equality. All is well in Zion. Ah, but is this answer like the one in the book? How large a percentage of deviation does God allow?

Let us briefly examine a few:

THE WORD OF GOD and THE INTERPOLATION BY MEANS OF OUR RULE

1. I will make a man of more worth than the golden wedge of Ophir.
Of course, but to stay in business we have to make a profit.
2. Love your neighbor as yourself.
Oh, definitely. Community chest, Red Cross, what not.

3. In your temporal things be equal.
Yes . . . but this is conditioned by an infinite variety of convenient things.
4. Seek ye first the kingdom.
Sure, but then we have to live.
5. If ye obtain more than is needful for your support, give to the storehouse.
Agreed, heartily agreed. But I can't keep up with the Joneses now. How am I ever going to get ahead enough to have a surplus?

THE LAW OF PROFIT FIRST is a jealous taskmaster. I worked for several years for two men, partners in a construction company, Mr. C and Mr. K. They were typical industrious businessmen, having besides this business, a number of things in which they had a participating interest. They were close personal friends, yet to me it was amazing the deals they pulled off on each other.

One of them once moved in on the other's airplane shop—in an emergency. The emergency, by the way, was a sudden fad in shuffleboards, and Mr. C decided to make some and turn a quick dollar. I was helping Mr. K's air mechanic put some finishing touches on a board when the mechanic asked Mr. C when he could expect to get some planes back in the shop.

"Oh, we'll be several months at least," Mr. C said.

Not two seconds later his partner came in and asked him the identical question, "When do you think you will be out of here?"

"Oh, in a few days," he replied.

I was confused, and when his partner was gone, I asked, "Mr. C, I thought you told that mechanic we would be here several months."

Mr. C laughed. "He isn't going to run me out of here."

All injustice, all deception, all trickery between these two partners, and much, too much of their church and community activity could be traced to the fact that it made a profit.

Banker Hoax was the most active man on the Chamber of Commerce committee to keep the overall factory in town. Of course the overall factory directors were operating on the profit principle too. If the town wouldn't give them a building they needed in their expansion program, they were going to leave. Everybody praised the money-raising campaign put on by Banker Hoax. My friends, the building partners, were on the committee too, and were they burned up! Brother Hoax had bought the property chosen as a site for the new factory for $700 and was holding out for $2,700 for it.

BROTHER J had spent his sixty-odd years building up a business. He had set aside a cash reserve of sixty thousand dollars. He owned his building and the stock in it.

Brother J's son grew up and wanted to go into business, but he needed some help. The old man looked at his possessions, his security, and at the long, hard years of accumulating them and said, "No." Then he explained, "I never went in debt to get a thing I have. If you haven't enough to start, get out and work until you do have."

Do you know what happened? The boy went down to Banker Hoax and borrowed the money he needed. It was the same money his father had so painstakingly deposited there from year to year. Of course, Banker Hoax charged rent on the money, six times what he was paying Brother J for the use of it, but then it was a good loan, wasn't it? The boy was old man J's son!

STRANGE ENOUGH, the Lord of heaven accepts the law of profit making as wise. He does so because it is true. He has said, "The laborer is worthy of his hire" and contrary-wise, "He who will not work shall not eat." Profits are the wages of an entrepreneur. He is worthy and

The Generation of Fulfillment - By William Patterson

A Department for Debatable Topics

The views expressed in this article do not commit the "Herald" or its editors but stand on their own merits. Should other views on this topic be offered for publication, they should be affirmative, free from personal references, and possess literary merit.—Editors.

THE TIMES in which we live are momentous and precarious—times to try and to challenge men's souls to the uttermost; times variously called "the hastening time," "the sifting time," "the dispensation of the fulness of time," and, as Jesus said, "when the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled, shall not pass away till all be fulfilled."—Luke 21: 32, Inspired Version.

Since God has evidenced his deep concern for his people during periods of past crises, it may be expected that he would be particularly concerned about them in this time of supreme crisis. The Scriptures are replete with prophetic statements forewarning us of adverse conditions and events that we might be fortified against and prepared to successfully meet them.

The words of Jehoshaphat to the people of Jerusalem, "Believe in the Lord your God, so shall ye be established; believe his prophets, so shall ye prosper," are as meaningful to us now as to those to whom he personally addressed them. The same thought is expressed in latter-day revelation: "And the day cometh that they who will not hear the voice of the Lord, neither the voice of his servants, neither give heed to the words of the prophets and apostles shall be cut off from among the people." Our future security will be in proportion to our observing the revelations of God as given in the Three Books of the church.

Moroni, the last writer of the ancient American Scriptures, admonished us of this generation, "Behold, look ye to the revelations of God. For the time cometh at that day when all these things must be fulfilled."—Mormon 4: 44. When people cease to believe in the revelations of God, they cease to believe in God and his purposes.

According to prophecy, at or near the time of Christ's second advent, natural and artificial chaos and destruction would assume global proportions. Jesus said: ". . . and upon the earth distress of nations with perplexity, like the sea and the waves roaring. The earth also shall be troubled, and the waters of the great deep."—Luke 21: 25, Inspired Version. Who would deny that we are experiencing these things in our own generation?

David Refers to Particular Generation

One of the outstanding prophets of the Old Testament was David. Though he was a man of recognized outstanding literary ability, to designate him only as a "Psalmist" robs his writings of prophetic meaning and value. The Apostle Peter refers to David as "the patriarch" and "prophet" (Acts 2: 29, 30). New Testament writers have quoted him more often than any other Old Testament prophet.

Psalms 102: 12-22 is a remarkable prediction of "the generation" in which the great purposes of God would materialize on the earth. Said David: "When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory." From this statement it may be inferred that the building of Zion precedes the coming of the Lord. "This shall be written for the generation to come, and the people that shall be gathered shall praise the Lord."

Contemporaneous with the gathering of the people of God is "the gathering of the nations to serve the Lord." This event is elaborated in Isaiah 2: 2-4. It seems that these prophecies are in the process of fulfillment in the return of the Jews to Palestine; the movement of Zion which should and will be accelerated; and in the establishment of the United Nations Organization, the assembling of the nations of the earth, the precursor of the "gathering of the nations to serve the Lord."

We should be able to see the great wisdom of God in admonishing the church to prepare for a greater ministry by studying, "things both in heaven, and on earth, and under the earth; things which have been; things which are; things which must shortly come to pass; things which are at home; things which are abroad; the wars and perplexities of the nations; and the judgments which are on the land; and a knowledge also of countries and kingdoms, that ye may be prepared in all things when I shall send you again, to magnify the calling whereunto I have called you, and the mission with which I have commissioned you."—Doctrine and Covenants 85: 21.

What Is a Scriptural Generation?

There are two generations mentioned in the Scriptures: the biological and the chronological. The former is "that which is generated or brought forth; progeny; offspring." This generation is determined by the act or acts of nature, according to the life span of the individual—it may be a year; it may be 969 years, the life span of Methuselah. The chronological generation is a specific period or measurement of time, and according to the Scriptures appears to be one hundred years, as the following statements indicate:

Behold, I perceive that this very people, the Nephites, according to the spirit of revelation which is in me, in four hundred years from the time that Jesus Christ shall manifest himself unto them, shall dwindle in unbelief; . . . yea, I say unto you, that from that day, even the fourth generation shall not all pass away before this great iniquity shall come.—Alma 21: 9, 12.

And four hundred years shall not pass away, before I shall cause that they shall be smitten; . . . and there shall be those of the fourth generation, who shall live, to behold your utter destruction; . . . and those of the fourth generation shall visit your destruction—Helaman 5: 11-13.

. . . until an hundred and ten years had passed away; and the first generation from Christ had passed away, and there was no contention in the land . . . And it came to pass the two hundred years had passed away, and the second generation had all passed away save it were a few.—IV Nephi 1: 21-25.

To understand prophecy correctly, one should observe whether the prophet is speaking of the life span of a person or persons (biological) or of a specific period of time (chronological).

Times of Gentiles Fulfilled

Jesus spoke of "the generation" in which "all things shall be fulfilled." It is very essential that we know of this generation. Matthew, Mark, and Luke record the words of Jesus regarding the events and conditions of the world prior to the time of His second coming, and particularly regarding "the generation of fulfillment." (Matthew 24:34; Mark 13: 30; Luke 21: 24, 32.) The Inspired Version is more informative.

We are living in this generation of fulfillment, I believe. According to Luke, Jesus said to his disciples: "Verily I say unto you, this generation, the generation when the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled, shall not pass away until all be fulfilled."—Luke 21: 32, I. V.

A revelation given through Joseph Smith on March 7, 1831, throws considerable light on this important subject:

. . . And this I have told you concerning Jerusalem; and when that day shall come, shall a remnant be scattered among all nations, but they shall be gathered again; but they shall remain until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. And in that day shall be heard of wars and rumors of wars, and the whole earth shall be in commotion, and men's hearts shall fail them for fear, and they shall say that Christ delayeth his coming until the end of the earth. And the love of men shall wax cold, and iniquity shall abound; and when the times of the Gentiles is come in, a light shall break forth among them that sit in darkness, and it shall be the fullness of my gospel; but they receive it not, for they perceive not the light, and in that generation shall the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled.—Doctrine and Covenants 45: 3, 4.

According to this revelation, around 1830—the time of the restoration of "the fullness of my gospel"—events leading to the weakening of the Gentiles and strengthening of the Jews were to have taken place. In 1829 the Greeks obtained their independence from Turkey. Reference is made to Turkey because of the role she plays in this prophecy and movement. Greece's independence is an indication of the waning power of Turkey at the exact time when Jesus said that the Gentile power would come in. In 1830 the first Jewish Emancipation Act was enacted in France, soon to be followed by a similar act in Great Britain. We are informed in prophecy that the date of the Restoration (1830) would mark the date of the Jewish emancipation, and that during the following chronological generation "the times of the Gentiles would be fulfilled;" also that the event of the liberation of Jerusalem from "the Gentiles" domination would mark the beginning of the "generation in which all things would be fulfilled."

Who Are "the Gentiles"?

If we can discover to what Gentiles Jesus was referring in the prophecy, we shall have found the key to an understanding of the whole question. It is the almost unanimous opinion of Bible students that Jesus was referring to all the Gentiles of the world. This interpretation cannot be true as there has been a definite strengthening rather than weakening of some Gentile nations—particularly the United States and Russia.

It is our understanding that Jesus was talking about Turkey only. He designated "the Gentiles" when he said, "And Jerusalem shall be trod-den down of [by] the Gentiles, until the time of the Gentiles is fulfilled." "The Gentiles" are those who trod down Jerusalem, which could apply to none other than the Turks, who literally trod down Jerusalem for many centuries until they were driven out during the First World War.

Even before Turkey received her disastrous defeat in World War One, world movements were preparing her destruction. According to a letter to Kaiser Wilhelm from Emperor Franz Joseph of Austria, "Turkey, whose community of interests with the Triple Alliance was progressing well, and who constituted an important counterpoise against Russia and the Balkan States, has been almost entirely pushed out of Europe and has seen her situation as a great power gravely compromised." Again, from the same letter: "The first condition before the realization of this plan [to end the military might of the Triple Alliance] was that Turkey should be pushed back from the territory inhabited by the Christian nations of the Balkans, in order to increase the strength of these states, and to render them free to expand to the west." Thus the unfolding events of history fulfilled the predictions of Christ and the prophets.

In 1917 the Turks were driven out of Jerusalem by the Australians under General Birdwood, and in 1920, according to the Balfour Declaration, supported by the Allied Nations, Great Britain was given a mandate over Palestine, thus fulfilling the words of Isaiah, "And kings shall be thy nursing fathers, and their queens thy nursing mothers."—Isaiah 49: 25. This continued until May, 1948, when the Jews became "a nation in a day." The war of deliverance of Palestine is portrayed in Isaiah 60: 1-11. The First World War ended Turkish domination of Does Your League Do Things?

By VERDA E. BRYANT

LAST June the Walnut Park Zion's League of Independence presented "The Mikado," Gilbert and Sullivan operetta, at the Campus to raise funds for the installation of floodlights and other improvements on the campus recreational grounds. They were supported by the other seventeen Leagues of the Center Stake of Zion, which helped with the sale of tickets; but the major problem of presentation rested upon the Walnut Park Leaguers, who spent nearly six months in preparation.

Those who attended either of the two performances were amazed and pleased with the almost professional presentation. The elaborate scenery, the colorful costumes, and the excellent performance of the cast (aided by two microphones which enabled all to hear) were a joy to those who took advantage of the opportunity to see this operetta.

Walnut Park is an example of a good League. It is a large one—so large as to be almost unwieldy if it were not for a wise division of adult sponsorship; but the size of the group has little to do with its prosperity. What is the secret of its success—of any League's success?

The program of a good League is instructive, interesting, and challenging; it brings the Leaguers closer to each other and to God. A good League can be a magnet which draws out the best qualities and talents from the young people of the church. It can be the tie that holds the youth to his God when all other forces seem intent on pulling him toward Satan. It can be a steppingstone from the half-hearted interest of early adolescence across a sea of doubt, fear, and desire to the fiery zeal and strong convictions of the young missionary.

IS your League the kind that can accomplish this? Or do you say, "Why go to League anyway, the kids never do anything?" They never do anything! Why? Is it the fault of the leaders and officers, or is it the young people themselves who are failing?

The secret of a successful League is that every member does things; thus all talents are used.

Through three years of actual practice, good Leagues throughout the church have proved that a division of responsibility among all members produces more satisfactory results than if the officers alone are responsible. The Department of Religious Education recommends that the officers, together with the sponsors and other officials, form a cabinet. Then all other members of the League are divided into four commissions: study, worship, service, and recreation. Each of these commissions is headed by a chairman who is a member of the cabinet. Each commission is responsible for one meeting a month, thus giving a fair balance between the four basic activities. This makes each League member accountable for the success of the League meetings, and where responsibility is assumed interest automatically increases.

However, the mere dividing the League into four commissions will not solve the program problem. There is still the problem of what to present at the meeting. Where can the commissions turn for ideas? If they flounder around trying to find a speaker or rush to get up a last minute service, chances are the meeting will be a dud, at least it won't present much opportunity for those present to generate interest and enthusiasm. What does the church have to offer the Zion's Leagues for program ideas?

THE Department of Religious Education is introducing its Fourth Zion's League Annual for the year 1950-1951 entitled, "Exploring Our Message." It contains ideas and materials for fifty-two services and is intended to acquaint the young people with the doctrine of our church.

The Epitome of Faith has been used as a basis, and the monthly themes are as follows:

- October—We Believe in God
- November—We Believe in the Holy Spirit
- December—We Believe in Jesus Christ
- January—We Believe in the Doctrine of Stewardships
- February—We Believe in the Word of God Contained in the Scriptures
- March—We Believe in the Principles of the Gospel
- April—We Believe in the Divine Calling of the Priesthood
- May—We Believe in the New Testament Church
- June—We Believe in Marriage as Ordained of God

July—We Believe in the Justice of God

August—We Believe in Zion

September—We Believe in Continuing Revelation.

These themes are expounded in many interesting and unusual ways with ideas and instructions for carrying them out. An installation of officers is included in the month of October, and there are suggestions for all four commissions through programs, services, drama, pantomimes, debate-forums, discussions, quizzes, get-together, projects, and constructive recreation, each linked with the theme of the month.

There is a place for every Leaguer to use his talents and qualifications. There are ideas to help your League DO THINGS! There should be an Annual available to every commission chairman and officer. These Annuals cost $2.50 each, but if your time is worth even five cents an hour, you can't afford to be without it, for it will save hours and hours of time which otherwise would be spent searching for ideas and gathering materials.

The Annual, by no means, presents your programs ready to slice and serve. A good program depends upon the individuals putting themselves into it. No cut and dried program read from the pages of a book and served on a silver platter can reach the heart as can one with its ingredients carefully chosen, skillfully blended, and artistically served. Then after it has been thoroughly chewed and digested by the whole League, it will flow through the blood stream to the very hearts of the participants. Such a program will do things for your League. Such a program will take your League off the "I'll go if I haven't anything else to do" shelf and put it in the "I wouldn't miss League for anything" class.

The Annual will help make your League "tops" if you follow it. As it is flexible it will fit any League. If your group is small, it explains how to "borrow" help. Help "borrowed" for an evening may become permanent. "Borrow" likely talent when you need it from among those who should be interested in the League but aren't, or from among your friends who belong to some other church. Make them feel needed, and you make them friends to the church. People need to be needed.

Say It When and Where It Counts

By JOSEPHINE MONTGOMERY

ONE of our young missionaries tells how several years ago he became interested in the church through having been "borrowed" for an evening. He had been reared in the church, but he suffered from an acute case of teenage disinterest.

As I recall his story, it went something like this: Some Leaguers asked him if he would help out on a certain program. They wanted a forest setting and asked if he would help bring up a few willows for the platform. Reluctantly the missionary-to-be assented, but as he worked he got the idea of creating the illusion that everyone was in the forest and they transferred "half of the willows from the river" to the basement of the church. As a result of this one service, others became enthused and challenged to do something equally unusual and well; and, as the missionary exclaimed with a gleam in his eye, "We really had a League that did things. If it hadn't been for the League, I might still be selling shoes."

No one really wants to "sell shoes" when he is capable of bigger things in the kingdom of God. Not all Leaguers are potential appointees or appointee's wives, but each one has a place to fill in the work of the church. The League can help in that development.

If you want your League to be a success, to do things as the Walnut Park League has done, then put all your Leaguers to work.

What about giving your League the "lift" it needs by following the Annual for the coming year?

SEVERAL YEARS AGO Reader's Digest carried a filler that advised readers to "say it where it counts." The idea was that if a citizen had any ideas for political or community improvements, he should make them known to men who could do something about it instead of merely grumbling to his neighbors. I thought it was a good idea then. I still do.

But there are deeper implications to that slogan. There are many things besides suggestions for civic improvement that should be said. To me the expression of the right kind of gratitude at the right time to the right people is important. So often we can never repay the happiness that our friends give to us. The only approach to payment we can make is to tell them that they have made us happy. And by telling them in the right way at the right time, we can make them happy. It's a wonderful piece of circular reasoning. A makes B happy. B makes A happy by telling A that he has made him (B) happy.

The right time to express gratitude is the immediate present while the "first fine careless rapture" that the poets talk about is upon you. The right time to express gratitude after that is the rest of your life. Nothing is so warming as to receive a letter five years after an event telling you that something you had forgotten is still appreciated. Or to get a picture post card showing a scene that you and a friend had seen together: "Remember when we were here? We had such a wonderful time that day. I'm glad we shared it."

IT TAKES SO LITTLE to make most of us happy. I don't mean an ecstatic happiness, but the warm glow of well-being that comes from some simple kindness. It may be no more than a tone of voice . . . as in the case of the busy organist who has played at hundreds of weddings, but when I asked her to play at mine she sounded as interested and pleased as though I were the first person to ask her. Or the friend who asked me if anyone had given me a handkerchief to carry at my wedding. When I shook my head she said in the right tone of voice, "Well, Little Babe, nobody had better. I'd like you to carry mine—if you will." It was partly what she said and partly the way she said it, but it suddenly made my wedding even more special than it had been before.

The best birthday gift I ever received was a haircut because of a certain thought that lay behind it.

A friend compliments me by discussing philosophy in her letters, and her ideas have been of more help than she knows.

And another friend manages to put an amazing amount of affectionate concern in short, casual letters.

The man-in-my-life has said many things to make me happy, but I doubt if he knows that the first time I knew he was the man-in-my-life was on a certain Sunday morning in church when he smiled at me and took my hand.

It takes little things to produce the greatest happiness. Why don't we tell people about it? I don't know why most of us consider it a violation of the inner sanctum of our emotions to say, "I love you! Thank you for loving me." There is nothing that gives me a greater feeling of real happiness than saying or writing loving words of appreciation. So you see, in a way it is selfish for me to say "Thank you," because I do it partly for my own benefit.

The real gift of life is not the pleasure of being loved, it is the privilege of loving. Among all the weeks of the year reserved for the glorification of various societies, there ought to be fifty-two weeks reserved for being grateful—and saying it when and where it counts.

The Task He Gave - By ELVA OAKMAN

ONCE UPON A TIME—a long, long while ago—there was a beautiful little home with a lovely garden. In the garden were larkspurs, sweet peas, forget-me-nots, roses, and hollyhocks, with a smooth, green lawn for a background. Within the home lived a mother, a father, a boy, and a girl. The boy had seen four summers and winters pass, while the girl had seen only two; but they were very happy together . . . that is, unless there was only one rake, or one pail, or one stick to play with . . . and then, of course, there was noise.

The mother was a clever woman. She could sing, play the organ, teach church school classes, preside over meetings, and even bake wonderful pies, cakes, and cookies when they were needed. She could drive a car, and sometimes . . . well, really quite often, she worked in the shop as a seamstress to make a few extra dollars. The house was paid for, but even if it hadn't been the father was a good provider and could have paid for it in time. The extra money went for better furniture, newer clothing, and toys for the children.

This was a very modern home, with a very modern mother, and the children were very modern, too. The mother did take time out to go to church, however, and to prayer meeting, and to the woman's department meetings, and to the clubs for the betterment of the group, and to all of the activities that the church put on. Yes, indeed, she was most devoted to the church.

Once in her youth the Angel of Clear Vision had visited her. As she had talked with him, her eyes had been opened to perceive some of the mysteries of the kingdom. She had heard his voice saying, "If you would walk with the Master you must put him first in all things. As you give of your best to accomplish the work that he will give you, you shall find great joy, and your closing years shall shine in the beauty of peace and assurance."

And so this mother tried always to do everything she was asked to do. Because so many were glad to let her do much of the work, she did more and more as the years went by. Because she had been told to give of her best, she attended all of the institutes, and read all of the books that were suggested as well. Then she spent hours in preparing her church school lessons for teaching in the most approved fashion.

THE LITTLE BOY AND GIRL were really no hindrance to her in her work. With the additional toys she provided, there were always enough for two, and so they played nicely together—summers in the garden, winters in the basement—well, at least they usually played nicely together, and if they didn't, they fought it out until little sister was put in her place. The children were most always clean and tidy, and always went to the doctor and the dentist at the proper time. Truly theirs was a remarkable mother. As she dressed them in the morning, she taught them their nursery rhymes; and as she put them to bed, she told them the very best fairy tales. In the evening she always hired a baby sitter to stay with them, so they wouldn't be alone. And they always said their prayers.

Now and then some of the leaders of the woman's department and even some of the ministers suggested that a woman's place should be first in the home with her children, teaching for the Master, with church work coming next in importance. When these suggestions were given, the mother did not often hear them for she was busy planning her activities for the following day. When she did listen, she rejoiced within her soul that such ability had been given her that she was able to work in the church as well as in the home. It was all just a matter of organization, she thought to herself.

Years passed, and the children grew up. Sometimes they had their fun in their own home, and sometimes in the homes of others. Now that they were old enough to choose their own course, on Sunday they often went with their friends to another church or more often did not go to any church, for there were so many other places they really needed to go. In time they went away to college and were married. When they returned home for a visit, the radio was dialed to the loudest jazz, and the air was blue with cigarette smoke. Their children ran riot every day, including the Sabbath day, and could not seem to be controlled.

AND THUS IT WAS in the quietness of old age the mother paused to review her life as she mourned over her family. Surely she had not found great joy. Her work for the Master was a thankless task, although she had given her best. The people at the church and in the civic organizations to which she belonged lauded her and called her The Faithful. But her heart was heavy with burdens, for where she now longed most to serve she could not.

The words, "Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavily laden and I will give you rest," came to her with gentle insistence. She paused in her work and knelt with tear-filled eyes to lay her burdens at the Master's feet. "Lord, have I not served thee with vigor through all my days?" she questioned sadly, "How is it that my heart is bowed in sorrow now, and my loved ones have wandered far?"

The Home Column

Again the Angel of Clear Vision was sent. He spoke gently, first in reminder: "Were you not told that 'if you would walk with the Master you must put him first in all things? As you give of your best to accomplish the work he will give you, so shall you find great joy, and your closing years shall shine in the beauty of peace and assurance.'"

"The work he will give you." The words repeated themselves again and again in her heart. She saw the wee boy and the baby girl who had come from the Master himself. She saw them playing together in the yard, laughing over the Mother Goose rhymes she had taught them, acting out Red Riding Hood and the Little Red Hen. She saw them going to school and learning again these jingles and stories. She saw them being taught other stories by the children with whom they played. Only on Sunday they had heard of the Master. They laughed about that, too, as another story of the unseen fairy world. Yes, they'd had a good time at church, but the world had called much louder, and they had no foundations. And so it was the world claimed its own.

So great was her sorrow and the darkness about her that she sank down in utter despair. "O God, forgive me," she cried aloud. "The task you gave me, I left undone. Is there no way that I can make restitution? Their sin is mine. I chose my own course, not thine, and they have paid the price."

From afar there came to her ears the words of the prophet of old, "There is a way that seemeth right unto a man; but the end thereof are the ways of death." "Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old, he will not depart from it."

"Train up a child in the way he should go!"

"Forgive me, Lord," she pleaded silently once more, "I have quoted those verses to others many times, but I did not comprehend. If only I could live my life again, how different my days would be." She was crying softly now in utter humility.

"I thought it necessary only to take the children to the church on Sunday, and to see that they said their prayers each night. The rest I expected you to do."

FOR A LONG TIME the mother sat in deep thought, and then as her understanding deepened she knelt again to pray. This time it was a promise she made the Lord, that gladly she would give up all of her material possessions and all of her time if only somehow she could help her dear ones to really know the Master and his love.

As she prayed she saw that the lost years could never be restored, but if she would work at the Master's side, under his guidance and with his love in her heart, exercising always the greatest patience and never neglecting an opportunity to teach her dear ones for him, the day would come when they would join her in his work.

And in her last days the beautiful little home became beautiful indeed, for daily as her grandchildren played within her walls she taught them those things that were of greatest worth. And daily as the young mother and the young father came to get them, they, too, heard the gospel story and came to love it as the children did. Ere her work was ended, her children and her children's children walked with the Master, and her days were filled with joy and peace and assurance.

The life of every man is a diary on which he means to write one story and writes another; and his humblest hour is when he compares the volume as it is with what he vowed to make it.—J. M. Barrie.

Bread Cast Upon the Waters

By Edith Grace Beggs

THE PARCEL was thrust into my hands. Answering my surprised look, the bestower said with a warm smile, "It is bread cast upon the waters which returneth after many days." As I opened the package, which proved to be a pair of flannelette sheets and two pairs of pillow cases, the giver explained that she had intended to buy me something for a long time in return for what I had done for her. I thanked her sincerely for her practical gift, which I knew could be put to good use.

I had not been aware of doing anything extraordinary for this person—in fact, I had forgotten all about it, yet there it was as the proverbial "bread" returned.

Bread cast upon the waters—what is it? It is spoken of also as our substance, and we are told to give freely of it.

What is our substance? It is surely ourselves, our being and our possessions.

The talent buried is not bread cast upon the waters. Money given (or I should say returned to God) begrudgingly, is not given "freely," nor is work done grumblingly.

Attending church spasmodically or the folding up of our "spiritual tent" at the close of reunion or special days with a "let George do it attitude" will never spread God's truth from pole to pole.

"Cast thy bread and toil with patience" sounds like a full-time job, doesn't it? "Thou shalt labor not in vain" is surely our guarantee of a fair deal from our Heavenly Employer.

KIRTLAND, OHIO.—The annual branch business meeting of the Kirtland Temple was held on Monday, August 21. The pastor, Elder W. E. Williams, was in charge, assisted by Apostle M. L. Draper, District President Norman Cox, and Bishop J. F. Wildermuth. The meeting was called in order to elect officers for the new church year. The officers thus chosen are: Pastor, Elder Williams; Director of Religious Education, A. L. Sanford; Women's Leader, Mrs. Howard Roberts; Adult Leader, Raymond Clough; Young People's Leader, Howard Roberts; Secretary, W. A. Smith; Treasurer and Solicitor, William Davidson; Book Steward, Pauline Jones; Auditing Committee, V. A. Majewski, B. J. Neville, and O. M. Isenberg; Finance Committee, William Davidson, J. C. Martin, W. G. Rimes, Mrs. Howard Roberts, and W. E. Williams. The minister of music, librarian, and children's leader are to be appointed by the pastor.

Apostle Draper presented a recommendation from Church Headquarters. The church officers plan to use the Temple in the future for world-wide gatherings of various groups within the church. The first of these gatherings will be a Conference for all High Priests throughout the church from October 5 to 8. Therefore, they requested the local congregation to erect a chapel for their worship and other activities. This would release the Temple for General Church functions. The group voted to adopt the recommendation. A Kirtland Chapel Fund Committee was chosen to raise funds for the project: Mrs. Howard Roberts, William Davidson, Howard Roberts, T. Evan Thomas, and W. G. Rimes were elected. A Plans Committee to draw up plans for the building in conjunction with other church officers is made up of: C. S. Fenner, E. R. Curry, Arthur Burt, John Collin, Sr., and R. B. Flack.

WEST VIRGINIA DISTRICT.—An organized plan by district officers to visit all branches and many scattered members throughout the West Virginia District, at least twice during the summer months, has resulted in many inspiring and interesting meetings that have brought about increased and united efforts toward kingdom building in the Mountaineer State.

A new mission church school has been organized at Morristown, Ohio, which is in the West Virginia District, with good interest.

One of the summer high lights of church work here was the Youth Conference held at the Harmony Branch, Indian Creek, W. Va. Our new missionary, Elder James Menzies, was in attendance and gave valuable counsel and assistance to the assembly. There, also for his farewell conference work in this district was Elder Merle Guthrie, who has so faithfully and efficiently accomplished a wonderful work in this area during the years he was under appointment here.

Young people, representing nearly every branch and mission in the district, attended and took an active part in all phases of the conference. Five were baptized, to be enrolled with the Harmony Branch at Indian Creek. District President Samuel Zonker presided at the Communion service which followed.

The annual district conference will be held September 23 and 24 at the Parkersburg, West Virginia, Branch. A splendid meeting is anticipated.—Reported by MARGARET C. PACK.

JONESPORT, MAINE.—The new baptismal font installed in the church this spring has been used several times. At the close of a two-week series of missionary services held by Seventy William Guthrie, four persons were baptized. Four others have entered the church since then. New members are Clifford Seavey, John Tibbetts, Roland Alley, Ulysses Woodward, Nola Wass, James Ryan, Judy Kimball, and Richard Kimball.

Elder Eugene Look and family have moved to Blue Springs, Missouri. They are greatly missed here, but the good wishes and prayers of the Jonesport Saints go with them.

Visiting out-of-state speakers this summer include Dr. Charles F. Grabske, Apostle Maurice Draper, and Dr. Floyd McDowell of Independence, Missouri, and Evangelist Clarence Archibald of St. Louis, Missouri.—Reported by PAULINE HARVEY.

ROGUE VALLEY MISSION, MEDFORD, OREGON.—Sunday, August 27, Elder Clark Livingston of Portland was guest speaker. The theme was "The Power of Prayer." He was assisted by Pastor Ted Schuld, and Elder Elwin Vest of Portland. There were approximately seventy-five people present. A basket lunch followed the services. Baptism services were held immediately afterwards at the Little Applegate River. Priest Jim Davidson and Elder Clark Livingston baptized Ralph and Darwin Lorge of Medford, Alice Ruddick of Medford, Nellie Lyons of Grants Pass, and Frank and Ruth Ward of Central Point. Elder Elwin Vest officiated, assisted by Elder Ted Schuld. Confirmation followed the baptisms. Brother and Sister Livingston and Brother and Sister Vest visited many friends and relatives during the week end.—Reported by MRS. JOHN E. WEIR.

CHICAGO-NORTHEASTERN ILLINOIS REUNION.—During the week of August 13 to 20 on Lake Geneva in Wisconsin, the Chicago and Northeastern Illinois Districts reunion was held. Apostle D. O. Chesworth presided. The reunion was the first to be held by the two districts in many years. On the first Sunday, 272 registered for overnight accommodations; by Friday, this had reached 307, and Saturday night it was 340.

Each day's activities were begun with a prayer service. Assisting Apostle Chesworth in leadership responsibilities were Elder Lloyd E. Cleveland, president of the Northeastern Illinois District and Elder J. C. Stuart, president of the Chicago District. Elder Stuart led the men's class each morning in a profitable discussion of methods in family evangelism.

The Zion's League class, "Witnessing for Christ Through Stewardship," was taught by Elder Sylvester R. Coleman, president of South-eastern Illinois District, and Elder G. Wayne Smith, missionary for the Chicago and North-eastern Illinois Districts. The women's class under Sister Ena Slasor of Detroit had an attendance of 70 to 100.

The chapel was filled to capacity for the general class, "The Restoration Story," taught by Apostle Chesworth each morning. Bishop Stephen Robinson of Des Moines also taught a general class each evening on "Stewardship Opportunities and Responsibilities."

In the preaching services, outstanding messages were brought by Apostle Chesworth, Bishop Robinson, Seventy Donald L. Kyser, president of the Rich Hill District, and Elders Stuart, Coleman, and Smith.

Sister Hattie K. Bell was in charge of children's activities. She and Sister Ethel Malcor taught the primary class, using the theme, "God in Nature." Among the other children's workers were Roberta Gregory, Isabel Kahler, Ruth Gouty, Marcella Brown, Alice Beggs, and Dulcie Carlson. Sister Beggs and Sister Carlson were visitors from Wichita, Kansas, and made an excellent contribution to the children's program.

Each morning, a junior church service was arranged by Sister Mildred Kunz. A number of priesthood members helped in this activity. At night, a children's story hour was held and motion pictures presented for them. On Saturday evening, an achievement program was presented, giving evidence of what had been done during the week. Among the numbers presented was a junior choir directed by Sister Dulcie Carlson.

Reunion music was supervised by Sister LaVon Lusha. Eight special numbers were sung by the choir directed by Sister Irene Thomas, and many quartet numbers and solos were presented.

The afternoon activities included a leadership training class directed by Sister Bell, an experience meeting, and on Tuesday, a women's reception planned by Sister Cleo Settles and Sister Lydia Wight.

Recreational activities included swimming, volleyball, softball, horseshoe pitching, boating, fishing, and horseback riding. A cruise around Lake Geneva was made by 250 campers on Thursday, and a like number on Saturday visited the famous Yerkes Observatory of the University of Chicago which was located just three miles from the camp.

Special activities following preaching at night included evensongs and a talent night directed by Elder Smith and a Graceland program conducted by Brother and Sister Deam Ferris.

Two youth prayer services were held. On Wednesday, one was held at sunrise on a high mound overlooking Lake Geneva. On Sunday morning, a large room was filled to capacity for the service directed by Elders Stuart and Coleman.

A baptismal service was held Saturday afternoon on the banks of the lake. Charles Lester, Tommy Freeman, and Bennie Darter were baptized. Seventy Donald Kyser was in charge of the service.

During the closing week end, Evangelists L. S. Wight and Harry Wasson gave patriarchal blessings and contributed to the spiritual ministry of the reunion.

On Saturday night, one of the most spectacular displays in years of the aurora borealis or northern lights was witnessed by reunion attenders. Standing on the shores of the lake, they were made to marvel at the handwork of God shown in this unusual illumination of the heavens.—Reported by RAYMOND E. TROYER.

Profits

honorably in taking them. It is uniformly true, too, that the businessman who can't make his business work won't eat. But the Lord put himself still more strongly in the profit camp.

He says, "It must needs be that the riches of the earth are mine to give."
—Doctrine and Covenants 38.

And plainly to the Jews, "Thus saith the Lord, thy Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel, I am the Lord thy God which teacheth thee to profit, which leadeth thee by the way that thou shouldst go."—Isaiah 48: 17.

And most plainly of all, in latter-day revelation, "It must needs be that ye save all the money ye can and that ye obtain all ye can in righteousness."—Doctrine and Covenants 48.

Why then all the chicanery in profit making? Are these examples of silly men—lying, stealing, taking advantage, hoarding—the way which you should go in profit making? What apostasy has occurred here? Is this blind use of the slippery slide rule pleasing in the sight of God? I'm afraid not.

ALL IMPORTANT to God is the attitude of the soul. Strangely enough some of the richest families of our nation have discovered this profound truth. The size of the enormous Rockefeller fortune is a closely guarded secret. Yet, the five young men of the present generation were raised with austerity. Allowances ran to a quarter a week, and to get more money the boys had to raise vegetables and shine shoes. They also had to keep a strict account of all their spending, and this account had to show 10 per cent saved and 10 per cent given away.

This story is told of Nelson after he had grown to manhood and was hard at work in his state department assignment in South America. News came to him of his father's personal gift to a large eastern university. The size of the gift staggered his imagination. He wired his dad, pledging his personal fortune to help him out of the hole he certainly must be in after having made such a prodigious contribution. Nelson had to be called in and shown that the Rockefeller family was not as poor as he had supposed all his life.

Blessed are the poor in spirit. The attitude of the soul makes men blessed or damned. To be "poor" in spirit is essential to the well-being of all men regardless of their financial status. This is the fundamental lesson in the Lord's teaching man to profit. The kingdom and its righteousness is first. Men are sons of God and, as such, are sacred.

These two principles, the primary of the kingdom of God and the sanctity of personality, must take precedence in decisions involving profit. The intrepeneur must be ready to sacrifice profit, business, livelihood, and life itself to these two firsts.

Upon these two—love the Lord, thy God, with all; and thy neighbor as thyself—hang all the law and the prophets.

The profits hang there, too, for Latter Day Saints.

The Pastor's Handbook 1950-1951

The theme for this year is "Make Disciples for Christ." The General Church has sent one copy of this handbook to each pastor. We have a small supply on hand to offer for sale to assistant pastors and those members of the priesthood to whom this manual will be helpful.

This Was America - By LILLIAN CARR

ON the morning of March 5, 1947, I rushed up to the top deck of the "Queen Elizabeth" and scanned the horizon which now revealed a new and exciting picture. There were black skyscrapers silhouetted against the blue sky, and I realized that at last we had arrived. I was actually looking at the "new world." The Statue of Liberty loomed impressively over the water, and as I stood by the rail, I could see hundreds of shining cars speeding along the white highway running parallel with the river.

Once through the customs I made my way to the barrier and stood there expectantly, hoping that someone would come to claim me. No one appeared. I walked around so that if the Squires were there they would be sure to see me, but all in vain. I began to get panicky. Being all alone in New York was not an ideal situation, and I began to wonder if I would like America after all.

I could hardly understand a word the porter said to me, but I gathered he was trying to be helpful, so I followed him down to the street where he hailed a brightly colored taxi and held out his hand for a tip. I hadn't the slightest idea what to give him and, by the look on his face, I think it must have been a nickel. A few minutes later I was speeding towards 4060 Bedford Avenue (I hoped). The Negro driver looked at me strangely when I gave the address, and he didn't seem too keen on taking me. Apparently he was due to go off duty in a few minutes and, as he informed me several times, he hadn't ever been as far as 4060 Bedford Avenue and didn't even know if it existed. I, too, was beginning to have my doubts.

Eventually we arrived, after an agonizing forty minutes, during which I kept my eyes glued apprehensively on the meter. I soon had my fingers on the doorbell, and when I saw Sister Squires on the threshold a feeling of tremendous relief swept over me. We paid the cab driver, and he, too, seemed relieved. Over a cup of tea, (made with a tea bag) Sister Squires explained what had happened. She had sent me a telegram giving me their telephone number, which should have reached me on board, and so she had been waiting for my call. We laughed about it, and when Brother Squires came home he had a good time teasing me about my ten-mile ride in a cab. They made me feel very much at home, and Brother Squires even said "ta-ta," (which he pronounced tar-tar), "pip pip," and "cherrio" everytime he left the room. We had a hilarious time altogether, and when they learned that I liked bananas they took me down to the grocery store and sat outside in the car so that they could watch the shopkeeper's face when I asked for "banar-nas" instead of bananas.

Lillian Charlotte Carr first learned of the Reorganized Church through the Orioles. Although she is the only one in her family who belongs to the church, she is quite active in Enfield Branch, especially in League work. Before leaving the States for England, she was given a surprise shower by the people of Walnut Park Congregation in Independence and some of the girls she had known at Graceland. Her mother was amazed at the "treasure chest" of lovely things she received (as well as $70 in cash), but those in America who knew Lily felt it small compensation for her friendship.

She is now employed in the Town Hall at Hackney, a suburb of London, and works for His Worship the Mayor. She takes shorthand notes at the borough council meetings and helps on old people's welfare and air-raid distress relief. Her address is 42 Farr Road, Enfield, Middlesex, England.

THE next day Anne Squires introduced me to New York. We walked through a maze of brightly lighted shops containing everything I had forgotten ever existed. I'm sure I must have made a spectacle of myself gazing open-mouthed at the displays. Anne was highly amused at my reactions, and as we walked down Fifth Avenue she insisted I eat my first hot dog, which wasn't as exciting as it looked. I secretly decided that these Americans had a very queer taste in food.

On Saturday Brother Squires came home from the bank and told us all to "step on it" because we were going to visit Sister Squires' people in the Catskill Mountains. We were soon speeding along the four-lane highway, leaving the city behind, and in no time at all were driving through snow-covered hills with little white houses nestling on their slopes. Soon we entered one of these little houses, and before long I was seated with the others at a table spread with banquet fare. I don't think I have ever been in a home quite like that one. Everything seemed to breathe welcome and the spirit of friendliness. After dinner we gathered around the piano and sang hymns, with Brother Squires trying valiantly to keep us all together—and failing completely. In this home I began to realize that Latter Day Saints are the same the world over, and it occurred to me that Zion could not be very far away.

It was after 10:00 p.m. when we left, and as we drove down from the mountains, we saw the great city of New York outlined by millions of lights twinkling and flashing in the frosty air. Later as we drove down into this vast fairyland, we saw the great bridges spanning the river outlined in colored illuminations and reflected in the shining waters. The effect was very beautiful, and it was a scene I shall never forget.

THE next day found us in the Brooklyn church, and I experienced my first American church service. I don't quite know what I expected, but it proved to be very much the same type of service as ours except that the sermon was delivered in a terrific Brooklyn accent by Brother Squires. After the service, I met Brother and Sister Perce Judd and their family from Australia. I almost hugged them when I heard them speak. It was their first Sunday in New York too, so we compared notes about trips and first impressions of America. I learned that Beryl and Percy would be joining me at Graceland in September. By a strange coincidence, almost three years later, we all sat in that same church, but this time we were looking forward to going home.

Other wonderful experiences came soon after. I arrived on the Hill, saw

New Horizons

Alice and Merle again, and found Graceland crammed full of the friendliest people I had ever met. On the heels of this, and before I had hardly settled, we were packing again—this time going south to Zion and General Conference. We drove down in a terrific thunderstorm on Good Friday which seemed in keeping with the day. At 9:00 o'clock that night I stood on the porch of Bartholomew Hall beside the Stone Church and, by a flash of lightning, got my first glimpse of the Auditorium. We had been reunited with Mollie Maloney Spargo in the meantime, and the four of us attended a reception that night where we met President Israel A., his wife, most of the apostles, and many other people. It was a big thrill to see Tom and Betty Worth again and all the English people who crossed for that Conference.

The following week was packed with many wonderful experiences: the never-to-be-forgotten Easter morning Communion service, when I really began to sense the vastness of our church, as I looked around and saw every available seat in the Auditorium filled; the evening with Brother and Sister Peter Whalley, when we gathered around on an odd assortment of chairs in the tiny kitchen of the apartment in which we stayed, talking over old times and proving to our American hostess that English people really do like their cup of tea; the women's meetings in the basement of the Stone Church where even the men flocked to hear Sister Mesley speak; and the fellowship enjoyed in the foyer of the Auditorium between services where names heard in the past became living personalities.

The business meetings proved very interesting, and the last one was especially memorable as we listened while the appointees were told their destinations and we all sang "I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord." The week passed all too quickly, but the whole experience gave a new meaning to life. Back on "The Hill" there was much to talk about.

I ATTENDED four reunions while in the States. Three of them were in Lamoni and the other at Liahona Park, Michigan.

How I got to Liahona Park will always seem a miracle to me. I had no money to spare for such luxuries and hardly dared take time off from my job of cooking for the Summer Crew. However, I wanted desperately to get to the Park of the Pines Reunion in Michigan. I wrote to Doris Conklin, the activities director at Graceland and a very dear friend of mine, mentioning the reunion. A letter soon came back saying that if I could get there, we could camp together at Liahona Park Reunion. I wrote right back telling her that by hook or by crook I'd be there, and then things seemed to work themselves out. I discovered that Sister Roy Benson was leaving for the East the same day that I should leave for Michigan—with an empty car. I was overjoyed when she consented to take me as far as Chicago. And so it was that I arrived in Alma, Michigan, one afternoon in July and was soon happily installed on the Conklin Farm about which there was the same friendly atmosphere I had found in the other homes I visited. That night we moved into Liahona Park with our tents, beds, oil stove, and provisions, all set for five days of reunion life.

The Saints there were very kind and friendly; they wanted to know about England, and I had a hard time keeping up with their questions. I spoke to the children one morning, and when I asked if they had any questions, I was literally bombarded. One little boy inquired if the children in England had BB guns, and if so how many BB's did they hold. Since I hadn't the least idea what a BB gun was I said "No" and hoped for the best, but I realized then that there was more than one little boy in that group who thought England a very poor place indeed.

At the end of the week, there was a very beautiful baptismal service on the lake shore when several young people were led into the waters. This was the first time I had witnessed a baptism in natural surroundings such as these, and the scene made a lasting impression upon me. The week came to a close all too soon; and while we were breaking camp, we recalled some of the many experiences we had had. I stayed for five days on the Conklin Farm and delved into the mysteries of rural life. I strayed off with the twins to bring the cows home, even tried to milk one of them, and explored everything from the hayloft to the chicken run. I also made friends with the yearlings, and the last time I heard from the twins they informed me that the new calf had been named after me.

LAST Christmas found me in Charleroi, Pennsylvania, a mining town on the banks of the Monongahela River. The Winship family, with whom I stayed, made that Christmas for me a very happy one indeed. I attended the church there and was surprised on Christmas morning when all the Saints came laden with gifts for their church—new hymnbooks, pulpit light, an altar table, a light for the piano, and many other things besides a large sum of money for the building fund. It was really a joyous occasion. My stay there was very pleasant, and I left with many happy memories of a Christmas spent with brothers and sisters in the East.

Last summer, through the kindness of Brother and Sister J. Bergman of Lamoni, I was able to travel west. I saw the strange beauty of the gently rolling prairie lands of Nebraska, the mountains in Wyoming, and the wonders of Yellowstone Park. Montana, with its rich valleys, small thriving cities, and glorious mountain scenery took my breath away. Washington proved to be just as lovely with its gently rolling hills cut by winding rivers and dotted with beautiful pine-fringed lakes. I left my friends in Montana and was very soon boarding the train in the vast city of Seattle on the last lap of my journey during which I had traveled about 2,000 miles by road since leaving Lamoni five days before.

I found Mollie Spargo and her husband waiting for me at the Canadian border. They steered me tactfully through the customs, and soon we were driving past fish-and-chip shops with their decided English atmosphere. The next six days were filled with sight-seeing, visiting and getting acquainted with the Saints, who all seemed very English and asked after many people in England.

Vancouver is very beautiful with the mountains on one side and the sea on the other. While I was there we had typically English weather, and when it stopped raining the day before I left, I saw the tops of the mountains for the first time. It was then that I saw the "Guardians of Vancouver" which Mollie had been raving about, and they proved to be a very unusual formation of rock silhouetted against the skyline, looking exactly like the lions in Trafalgar Square.

MY last Sunday in Independence I sat in the Walnut Park church and listened to a brother wishing me Godspeed on behalf of the branch on my trip home. He also told me to tell the Saints in England how much the ministry of the Davies had meant to their branch, and how much they were loved and respected. I looked around me at the familiar faces in the congregation—many of them Gracelanders whose friendships I cherished—and I thought how wonderful is the love of God which can bind all people together in whatever part of the globe they happen to live.

My last week end in Lamoni happened to be Home-coming, and so I managed to see and say good-by to many old Graceland friends. Two important things happened on my last Sunday: the New Student Center was dedicated, and the ground-breaking ceremony for the new Lamoni church took place.

I shall never forget the generosity and hospitality of the Saints in the United States and Canada nor the love and friendship shown to me. It was indeed a wonderful experience and a privilege to live and work with them.

Here is an excerpt from a letter I received from a friend in Lamoni while I was in New York en route to England:

You know that you take with you my best wishes, and even though letters may not cross the waters very often, you are going to be in my thoughts. Things will have changed for you, and there will be times when you will become discouraged, but keep your chin up and know we are pulling for you. Please let me know if I can be of help to you at any time. I'll be more than glad to assist you in any way possible.

This is typical of the spirit of friendship and love shown to me. These people did indeed "teach my heart what a friend can mean."

The Generation of Fulfillment

Palestine and the subjection of the Jews; therefore, 1917 became the year of the fulfillment of the Gentile power over the land of Palestine, and marked the beginning of the "generation of fulfillment." It is my opinion that 1917 to 2017 is the generation of fulfillment.

I draw your attention to a statement in latter-day revelation which confirms the generation of the Gentile fulfillment. The church was informed that the testimony of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon "shall go forth unto the condemnation of this generation, if they harden their hearts against them; for a desolating scourge shall go forth among the inhabitants of the earth . . ."—Doctrine and Covenants 5:3. And in section 45:4, the following statement: "And in that generation shall the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled; and there shall be men standing in that generation that shall not pass until they shall see a desolating sickness come over the land." The only "desolating scourge" in the form of a "desolating sickness" experienced in America and throughout the earth was the epidemic of influenza in 1918—the year after the conquest of Palestine. There could be no more confirming event than the experience of the flu.

Ours Is the Generation of Fulfillment

Accurate knowledge of prophecy is not a substitute for loyalty, obedience, and service. Let us not be content to view these as the times of prophetic fulfillment but rather as the time when we ministers and members of the church of Jesus Christ shall resolve to fulfill the purposes of God by preaching, teaching, and exemplifying the gospel to the world, establishing the Zion of God as a place of righteousness, toleration, and brotherhood, with spiritual, physical, moral, and economic security.

May the urge which impelled Commander Robert E. Peary to attain his life's ambition to reach the North Pole actuate us to reach the ambition of the righteous adventurers of all ages to attain our chief goal—the establishment of Zion. Said Peary:

The determination to reach the Pole had become so much a part of my being that, strange as it may seem, I long ago ceased to think of myself save as an instrument to the attainment of that end. To the layman this may seem strange, but an inventor can understand it, or an artist, or any one who has devoted himself for years upon years to the service of an idea.

The conditions of the world today justify our belief that these are "the hastening times." Let us, therefore, hasten to fulfill the promises and purposes of God. How can we remain self-satisfied and self-centered in such an insecure, chaotic, and dangerous period?

May the word of revelation challenge us to build up the kingdom of God.

P.S.

 A LITTLE CHILD SHALL LEAD THEM

This story was told by a young mother on herself. She sends her small son to church school regularly. On a recent Sunday he came home and said, "Mother, if you don't change your ways, you're going to hell." That pinned Mama's ears back, and she asked him to explain. "Well," he said, "you smoke and you swear, and people who smoke and swear can't go to heaven. That means the other place for you!"

That, she says, is giving her something to think about these days. Perhaps God intends to reform her through the efforts of her own child.

 NYLON

Missionaries who have a problem keeping a supply of clean shirts in their travels will be interested in the record kept on one nylon shirt. It has been hand laundered over a hundred times, and is still in good condition. While it cost $9 new, it has saved 20c on each laundering, needing no ironing. This represents a gross saving of $20, a net of $12 above its cost. You have known how a man must work for a shirt; have you ever heard of a shirt working for a man? It can be laundered in a washbowl of warm water and a small handful of soap powder; let it soak five minutes, scrub collar and cuffs with a small brush, rinse twice, roll it up in a towel to absorb excess moisture, then hang it up on a plastic hanger. It will dry in an hour and be ready to wear. You carry one or two of them instead of a dozen, and travel much lighter. Never put it in hot water. Never iron it.

 DIET

Most people, and vegetarians especially, should be interested in a new way of cooking potatoes. It has been tried out and is successful. Cook small potatoes whole, cut large ones into big sections. Peel, wash, and drain them. Cook them in a basket-type French fryer, with deep fat, moderate temperature and a rather low flame so that the outside will not be overdone when the inside is underdone. When potatoes are lightly brown on outside and show tendency to float a little as they cook (as in the case of French fries) they will be done. Lift them out of fat and let drain. On the inside they will be mealy and taste like baked potatoes. Advantage is that they are practically free of grease and cook in a short time—less than thirty minutes. This is quicker than either boiling or baking and gives a much better flavor—a boon to the working woman.

 SENSE AND MADNESS

Much madness is divinest sense
To a discerning eye;
Much sense the starkest madness.
'Tis the majority
In this, as all, prevails.
Assent, and you are sane;
Demur—you're straightway dangerous,
And handled with a chain.
—Emily Dickinson, "Poems."

 BRIGHT SAYINGS

Sunshine brought in this saying by her younger brother: "I feel so happy it's tickling the bottoms of my feet!"
Have you ever felt it just that way?

Kirtland Temple

Begun 1833 — Dedicated March 27, 1836

A monument of architectural beauty, a great historic landmark of the Restoration, a shrine of faith and inspiration, Kirtland Temple is a survivor of a glorious past and a reminder of the faith, sacrifice, and devotion of the generation of people who gave all that they had and were for the achievement of a great ideal.

The Golden Wedding

WHENEVER I see two elderly people who have spent half a century or more as real companions, I feel that they have much more to teach us about marriage as it really is than any dozen Hollywood stars you may care to choose.

You can't learn the deeper values of any of the sciences or arts if you quit at the first sign of trouble. Any marriage is one of the greatest of the arts. Even people who love each other need to learn how to blend their lives into a desirable whole, and this takes both time and patience.

If young people start out with the idea that if marriage does not work they can quit and try again, they start out with a handicap.

That is why our church is giving constantly greater emphasis to the sacredness of the marriage vows and to the importance of marriages that endure.

Introducing...

JOHN BLACKMORE, Independence, Missouri (page 7), was born in Sydney, New South Wales, Australia, July 13, 1891, and was baptized there in 1908. All of his precollege education was obtained in Australia. In 1920 he enrolled at Graceland, remaining one year to complete a course in religious education. In 1925 he received a bachelor of science degree from Kansas State Teachers College at Pittsburg. In 1933 he received a master of arts degree from Iowa University. From 1931 to 1939 he was an instructor in history at William Chrisman High School, Independence, Missouri.

While attending Graceland College, he met Nellie Mussell, daughter of a missionary. They were married June 14, 1923.

Brother Blackmore was ordained a deacon in 1908, a priest in 1914, an elder in 1919, and a high priest in 1928. He has served under church appointment in various capacities since 1918. From 1918 to 1921 he was a missionary to Northern New South Wales District, Australia. From 1928 to 1930 he was director of religious education in Independence. From 1930 to 1931 he was general religious education director of the adult division. He has occupied in pastorates which took him to Pittsburg, Kansas; Cameron, Missouri; Los Angeles, California; Omaha, Nebraska; and Joplin, Missouri. From 1948 to 1950 he was district president of the Spring River District. At present he holds the position of church historian with an office in the Auditorium.

As special interests Brother Blackmore lists "international and foreign affairs."

MAUDE (DUNCAN) ANDERSON, Auburn, California (page 23), was born in Lebeck, Missouri, and baptized in Prospect Lake at Colorado Springs, Colorado. In 1918 she was married to Frank N. Anderson at Lander, Wyoming. To them were born two boys and a girl: Claude F., who lost his life in France in 1944; Muriel, who is teaching in North Kansas City this year; and Charles, a student in high school.

Sister Anderson was graduated from high school at Twin Falls, Idaho. Her schooling also includes a sixteen months' course at the American School of Photography and a year at Placer College. Since 1934 she has managed her own photo studio, at first in her home and later in a business location. For the past two years she has been unable to work at her studio and has been taking a course from the local college to improve her writing technique.

She is a member of the Rebekah Lodge and Past Noble Grands Club, the Soroptomist Club, and the Auxiliary to the Veterans of Foreign Wars, as well as adviser to the Auburn Theta Rho Girls' Club. Her hobbies are writing, color photography, and handicrafts.

LOIS (SMITH) LARSEN, Independence, Missouri (page 17), was born in Lamoni, Iowa, and baptized at Onset, Massachusetts. In 1931 she married Edward J. Larsen of Copenhagen, Denmark. They have six children, five boys and one girl: Frederick, 18; Stephen, 17; Anina, 12; "Zeke," 9; Daniel, 7; Leif Peter, 2½.

Sister Larsen received her high school training in Hollywood High School in California and Central High School in Kansas City. She took some academic work at Graceland. She attended Graceland in 1925-26 and continued studying with Kansas University and Santa Ana Junior College.

She has been active in P.T.A. work and child study groups. Her special interests are writing and English literature.

GOING FORWARD

About three hundred attended the Independence Stake Conference that was held in the Stone Church on August 28. Those presiding over the meeting were President F. H. Edwards, Bishop H. L. Livingston, M. L. Parker, Charles Graham, Glaude Smith, Fred Davies, and Arthur Stoff.

The stake presidency, Brethren Graham, Smith, and Davies, and the stake bishopric, Brethren H. W. Cackler and Parker were sustained in office. All city-wide officers were also sustained. The appointments of the pastors of the sixteen congregations were approved. The pastors are: Lyndon Wagener, East Independence, Marion Talcott, Eden Heights; Ted Scott, Englewood; Sanford Downs, Enoch Hill; George Davis, Gudgeon Park; Fred Fry, Liberty Street, William La Grece, Mount Washington; Claire Green, Second; Fred Epperson, Slover Park; Arnold Ellsworth, South Chrysler; Warren Haskins, Spring Branch; Glaude Smith, Stone Church; Victor Talcott, Sugar Creek; Fred Davies, Walnut Park; E. J. Richards, Blue Ridge, and Ralph Freeman, West College.

Twelve men were recommended for ordination: Otto Elser for elder; Dale Moon, Elmer Armstrong, Kenneth Tousley, and William Webb for priests; Leon Simmons for teacher; Cecil Taylor, Robert Audet, Ovel Webster, Nornbert Phillips, Raymond Merle Hardy, and Michael Postpack for deacons.

The conference recommended and approved the grant of $2,500 from the stake building fund for the purchase of property for Blue Ridge Mission.

The meeting was closed by a short address by Stake President Charles Graham on the future of the stake.

ON SICK LIST

Joseph Anthony, prominent church author who lives in Lamoni, Iowa, is recovering at his home after a stroke. He is able to be up a little each day.

Brother Anthony is the author of "Lamoni's Passing Parade," "Birds of a Feather," "Paddy," and numerous stories and articles for church publications.

STAY-AT-HOME

The pastors of Zion met on September 11 at the Women's Center to make further plans for the Tuesday Stay-At-Home program. Because the plan calls for members of the priesthood to visit homes for family ministry, it is suggested that families try to remain home on Tuesday evenings. It is also suggested that no large meetings or gatherings be planned for Tuesday evenings.

SIX FROM HAWAII!

Among the thirty-five young women who are attending the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital School of Nursing there are six from the Hawaiian Islands. They are Henrietta Cachola, Ruby Ing, Mildred Ishikawa, Constance Nishimiya, Marilyn Ching, and Law Yee Tong. They were met at the Union Station in Kansas City by representatives from the School of Nursing.

These six future nurses were part of a large group of young people from the Hawaiian Islands. Many of the group were on their way to attend Graceland College.

Renewal

"Create in me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within me."—Psalm 51: 10.

RENEWAL is one of the great principles of the universe. It is everywhere manifest. The sun, burning its atomic fires, is able to renew itself so that for millions of years it has given light and heat to the planets, and will continue to do so for millions of years to come.

Everything in nature undergoes renewal. The tree drops old leaves to make room for new ones. The grass and perennial flowers die down to the ground in winter, but renew themselves to send up new leaves and stalks in the spring.

Human bodies are renewed. Hair and nails grow out, the skin sheds old cells, and the body is completely changed every seven years.

Mind and spirit need renewal, too. We must seek new knowledge, and experiences of inspiration and light. The blessings of yesterday were for the time, and this is another day, with new problems, trials, and cares which call for new strength and hope to meet them.

The soul must be renewed by daily contact with God, or it will die by degrees.

* * * * *

The beautiful things of the world are the new things, the young things. A rose is best when it is a bud, just opening. There is nothing softer and sweeter in the world than the skin of a baby. All the little creatures of the fields and woods—the calves, the colts, the birds, tiny chicks, and ducklings—have a special beauty of their own.

Life renews itself through the coming generations. We live our allotted spans and are called to another sphere, leaving the young behind us to carry on.

* * * * *

We were at a Zion's League retreat, watching the young people in their play on the beach and in the water. They dived and swam, they absorbed the sun on the sand, they paddled brightly painted canoes on the lake, like pictures against the green wooded shore. All were happy, having a good time, and behaving themselves admirably. We found renewal of mind and spirit in being there, breathing in the clean, fresh air of the retreat, and watching those splendid young people.

A young couple came up out of the water to talk a while, the lad handsome and healthy, the girl as beautiful as a picture. After a while they turned and raced back to the water for another plunge. It was a pleasure to realize that they were our own.

* * * * *

As we become older, we need renewal within our minds and spirits. We become tired and worn, or discouraged. We relax our vigilance. We sometimes fail to do our duty and miss some of the services of the church. We may even forget some of our convictions, and our resolutions or promises to serve. The world has put its hand upon us. We need renewal.

There are times when we must take charge of ourselves and make some decisions. If we let ourselves drift, we will be lost. We must bring ourselves back, make a fresh beginning, and leave the mistakes of the past behind us.

Fall is the time for such renewal. We close our vacation days. We prepare our homes for the winter. We send the children to school. Then it is time for us to get back into church work. The soul will find its renewal there.

God is the father of all newness in his creations. He continually renews his works. And if we will let him, he will make something new and better in us.

It is the work of prayer to bring us back to the foot of God's throne, to seek there the cleansing of the mind and spirit that will remove the stains of worldly sin, and there to find supplies of grace and strength to keep us going for a day, for a month, or a year.

* * * * *

There is always new and undiscovered beauty in the gospel and in the Scriptures. Each time we hear the gospel story, we find something richer and more important in it. Each time we read the Scriptures we find new meanings that we had missed before.

Of course, the truth and beauty of the Word is always there, waiting for us to grow mentally and spiritually, until we can understand it. The limitation is not in the Word, but in our capacity to comprehend.

We should all realize that there is a never-failing opportunity to renew ourselves in the study of the Scriptures.

* * * * *

October is the time of year for the renewal of our church life. We send the children back to church school if we have been away. We take up our teaching tasks again, accepting the classes that need teachers, or attending adult classes for the information and stimulation they afford, as well as for fellowship with the Saints.

Unless there is a time of renewal for the church each year, it will die of neglect. Unless there is a time of renewal for the individual, he tends to deteriorate and go downhill. We cannot remain at the peak without constant effort.

Are you renewing your own mind and spirit at this time?

Almost "Marooned"

WE HAVE HAD the experience of being almost immobilized in the great Pacific area.

After much uncertainty while in Hawaii about getting into Tahiti, we did manage to reach Papeete on July 20 by Trapas Cataline plane—the last one, as Air France is taking over. The French Consul at Honolulu warned us that we might not get in till August or later, and that, once there, we might not be able to get out by plane or ship for months.

However, our luck held as to getting in, then certainly fled: Air France became a speculation. Trapas had in fact discontinued. A military seaplane came in, took a sick man out by government request; but we were not able to get the necessary help. With no prospect of any plane service, we were forced to look to the sea. Brother Butterworth had wisely anticipated this situation and had made reservations on the Union Steamship "Waihemo," bound from Vancouver to Auckland, scheduled for Papeete on August 5. It was our only chance, it seemed, and so, when the "Waihemo" (Mauri for "high water") left on Wednesday afternoon, August 9, Brother Siegfried and I embarked as part of the six passengers for Auckland.

Pointing a course slightly north of due west, we came along steadily for five days when we put in at Apia, Western Samoa, almost thirteen hundred miles.

Here we were told a plane would soon be in, bound for Nondi Airport (Suva), and from there we could quickly reach America by Pan American Airways. But the plane had its full complement of passengers, and another hope was dashed. No plane for another two or three weeks—so, we have made of necessity a virtue, and are now, as I write, one-half day out of Samoa, sailing 27 degrees west of south on a sixteen-hundred-mile stretch to Auckland, New Zealand.

We left Apia on Friday, August 18, at 5 p. m. (yesterday), and woke up this morning to find we had crossed the international date line, and today is Sunday, August 20.

When I get to the point where I reach Samoa in my regular write-up, I will try to recall the "Waihemo" anchored a thousand yards from shore, with two hundred native stevedores taking off by "lighters" immense cargoes of lumber and other merchandise and loading up with thousands of bags of copra (dried coconut meat), cocoa beans, etc., working night and day, the constant noise and clatter of hoisting engines and winches, the loud clamor of commands and orders and directions—laughter and shouts of the Samoans in their native tongue, all making sleep near to impossible.

But I will tell a little about Western Samoa: It formerly was a German possession for a time prior to World War I, but afterward it was made a New Zealand mandated island. We were told that only English is taught in the schools, and there appear to be a number of church schools, Catholic, London Missionary, Protestant, and also Mormon. But we heard no English talked by the natives. Everywhere it was Samoan.

We saw plenty of Samoan men black with tattooing from their waists down to their knees. Most of them wore slashed skirts. Many went about with nothing but the skirt which they are very adept in handling while at work.

Apia is probably well-known if not famous around the English-speaking world as the last residence of Robert Louis Stevenson, the author, and his tomb is one of the places everyone desires to see. His spacious home, erected inland a couple of miles, now enlarged for government purposes, is the official home of the governor of the island, a New Zealander, and is easily reached; but the tomb, planned by the writer before his death, is on top of a tor or small mountain, to be reached only by climbing up a steep path more or less hazardous—especially in bad weather.

Brother Siegfried and I accepted this as a challenge; we celebrated his birthday and my wife's birthday (August 16) by negotiating on foot not only the two miles to the bottom of the climb, but all the way to the top. We returned to the wharf for the launch to the ship, foot sore and tired, but well-repaid for the effort. We took pictures in technicolor—which we sincerely hope will be good, though the day was overcast and conditions for pictures not very promising.

Now I am very anxious to know more about this man Stevenson and hope to satisfy the urge when I reach Australia. He died in 1894, his wife surviving him by twenty years. Here is the inscription which he directed to be placed on his grave—in bronze:

Under the wide and starry sky
Dig my grave and let me lie.
Glad did I live and gladly die
And I laid me down with a will.

This be the verse you grave for me:
Here he lies where he longed to be.
Now is the sailor home from the sea
And the hunter home from the hill.

The foregoing, written on Sunday, August 20, will be the foreword for my travel account, beginning June 1, 1950—a little late, but one does not always possess the necessary inspiration midst busy days, or time does not permit. It is the conjunction of both one needs. I would I were a Stevenson to do justice to what I have experienced during the last two months—and I have New Zealand and Australia vet to do.

Many eventful and momentous things have happened to me since June 1. As often before I have found it difficult because of daily activities to find time to record them while memory was best able to aid. Therefore, there may be a resultant loss of detail. If detail be lacking there may be—I hope there will be—a gain in perspective.

Since early in June I have been engaged in travel in different places, some of them far from home. As I write these lines I am in a lounge on the "Waihemo," a "freighter," we boarded on Wednesday, August 9, at Papeete as a "dernier" resort in getting back to travel lanes that will lead us home.

Bishop M. H. Siegfried, of Independence, has been with me since June 20 when we left Los Angeles by plane for Honolulu.

Shawnee Road Church

Taking up my activities in time sequence, I recall with pleasure assisting at the dedication of the new Shawnee Road Church in the Kansas City Stake area on June 4.

These services were in charge of Stake President J. D. Anderson, assisted by Bishop L. Wayne Updike.

Presiding Bishop G. L. DeLapp preached at 9:45 with his usual vigor and ability. This event was one of several dedications in which I have been associated with Bishop DeLapp; I have found him to be a safe and wise counselor, and our social contacts have always been most pleasant. Brother Burhl Hill sang at this service, accompanied by Sister Louise Dillee.

At eleven a. m. I occupied, presenting some thoughts about altars and the gospel of the Restoration.

Elder W. W. Strong gave the opening prayer, and Bishop DeLapp offered the prayer of dedication.

I was interested to learn that Brother Strong is the son of William Strong with whom I have been acquainted since boyhood days, William being the son of a Sister Mary Strong who bore excellent testimony to the work when I was a boy at Lamoni.

The old Argentine Branch, now worshiping at Shawnee Road, is to be congratulated on getting into this fine new structure, well appointed for their use. It is modernistic in style, and appeals to me as a practical solution of their needs. President Anderson and Bishop Updike are also to be congratulated on this achievement.

During the day an infant child of Elder James Graham was blessed by Elders C. V. Graham and W. W. Strong.

I also met here for the first time in many years, Andrew Fowler whom I had not seen since we were boys at Lamoni.

South Crysler

The next Sunday (June 11) Sister Smith and I worshiped at South Crysler where I occupied at 11 o'clock, Samuel G. Balzer, pastor, in charge. This, as I recall, was my first appearance in this pulpit.

I was quite touched to have my old friend, O. C. White, in attendance. "O. C.," who was one of the most active in securing a church for the South Crysler group, had been indisposed, but, as stated by his wife Atha, he wanted to hear me. I trust my effort was worthy of his sacrifice.

New Stakes

During the month of May, pursuant to General Conference authorization, the Center Stake at Independence and the International Stake at Detroit had been perfected. Early in May I presided, in association with other members of the Presidency, Apostle D. T. Williams, and others, at the initial meeting of the Center Stake. Presidents Edwards and W. Wallace Smith, with Apostle C. G. Mesley, later in May, visited Detroit for an organization meeting of the International Stake.

It was left for President Edwards and me to proceed to California on a similar mission, where, on June 17 and 18, the Los Angeles Stake was organized.

The history of the work at Independence and his experience during recent years made Elder Charles V. Graham the logical choice for president of the Center Stake. Charles is a man of compassion; he loves people and likes to serve. He is a praying man and will receive necessary help and direction. In Elders Glaude A. Smith and Fred O. Davies, church appointees, he has able and experienced counselors.

At Detroit, Elder W. Blair McClain had done much to solidify the membership of that city into a new unity, though the movement to that end had been well begun by Elder, now Apostle, D. Blair Jensen. In Elders L. O. Brockway and E. V. Osborn, Brother McClain has capable counselors.

Bishop L. Wayne Updike, a versatile minister, has proved himself as bishop of the Kansas City Stake, and we congratulate Detroit on having him during the initial stages of its stake development. He has selected Bishop C. O. Carlson as his counselor, a wise choice, as Brother Carlson has been bishop of the city area for a long time.

Bishop Harold W. Cackler came to the general offices a few years ago as an assistant to the Presiding Bishopric. Very quickly he established himself as a man of capacity. When Bishop J. Stanley Kelley was transferred to California, Brother Cackler assumed responsibility as bishop in Zion. His labors have been very satisfactory. He appointed Elder Montague L. Parker as one of his counselors; this arrangement is especially pleasing to me.

Los Angeles

President Edwards, Apostle E. J. Gleazer, and I converged on Los Angeles by different routes. We found a marvelous spirit of unity and finished our duties there with an assurance that the work will be advanced under the leadership of President Garland E. Tickemyer, who has been in general charge of the Los Angeles area. He is a man of experience, having served at Independence under the late President Frederick M. Smith, who always held Garland in his confidence. His counselors are Elders Thomas R. Beil and Glen L. Holmes.

Bishop J. Stanley Kelley, experienced as bishop in Zion for twenty years and for two years as bishop of California, will serve the new stake. He has chosen two fine counselors in Elders Arthur Ballard and Everett Niles.

In each of the stakes high counselors have been chosen from men of ability, and we have reason to be assured that the affairs of the stakes will be well administered, thus relieving general officers from considerable direct responsibility.

Hawaii

For some time I had been importuned to visit the "Islands of the Pacific." First at the General Conference of 1948 when Elder John and Sister Emere Mervin were in attendance, and later by others. Elder F. Edward Butterworth reminded us of our tentative promises. The late General Conference seemed to hold out further inducements: Elder Howard F. Miller, Honolulu, had to be ordained a bishop before assuming his work for the Kansas City Stake, and Elder Charles Lee, a Chinese member there, was to be ordained to the office of patriarch. Brother Miller and wife were about to leave the Hawaiian Mission after a number of years of service there, and Elder A. Orlin Crownover had been assigned to relieve Brother Miller. It was thought to be a good time to include, on the long proposed visit to Tahiti, a visit to Hawaii.

Accordingly plans were perfected for me to go to Honolulu right after the stake organization at Los Angeles, scheduling a plane trip toward Tahiti in the month of June.

At the suggestion of Brother Butterworth, Elder Mark H. Siegfried made plans to visit these places with me.

We rather expected a spirited welcome at Honolulu on the morning of June 21, but were quite swept off our feet, figuratively, by a reception committee of about a hundred members, including Brother and Sister Miller, Brother and Sister Crownover, and many of the priesthood and women who could meet the plane. We were almost buried beneath beautiful leis bestowed in the traditional Hawaiian manner. Introductions came too fast for memory. Pictures were taken of us with the members, and we felt we had been royally received.

Baggage was secured, and we were taken to Makiki church and the Mission House, and then for some time we were in the whirl of church services, meetings, conferences, and social events.

First I must relate that at Honolulu we were domiciled at the splendid beach home of Duke Kahanamoku, under Diamond Head, where we could see and hear the breaking surf at all times. It came about this way: Duke, world-renowned Olympic champion swimmer, holder of a houseful of trophies, was on a tour with Mrs. Kahanamoku on the "Mainland," as Hawaiians call it, and their home was in charge of Sister Helen Paoa Sterling and her husband, Leon H., a prominent county official.

At the close of each day and at other times, Brother Siegfried and I were taken to this comfortable home for rest and relaxation, for which we were very grateful not only to the Sterlings but indirectly to the Duke who is and has been county sheriff for many years; he is so popular nobody runs against him at the elections.

Sister Sterling was the daughter of a Brother Paoa, one of the pillars of the church at the turn of the century. She recalls that when the late President Joseph Smith visited Hawaii in 1906, a luau in his honor was held in her father's yard. The Sterlings were kind and insisted on our having breakfast with them each morning.

* * * * *

When I reach the point of making a record of activities in Hawaii, I have to take a deep breath and a second look at my notes, they are so many and varied. As I write, we are the second day out of Papeete on the "Waihemo." We take turns on the sun deck, amazed at the vastness of the Pacific Ocean; we are called to meals at regular hours, and wondering if we can hold out against the monotony and ennui of such travel. But fellow passengers are affable and friendly. Even the "Master" of the ship, Captain Young, relaxes and chats with us. Contrary to custom, the ship on this trip carries a woman passenger. Her husband, Mr. Thomas Marshall, an entrepreneur in moving pictures, and she were "marooned" at Papeete; by special dispensation they, like us, are going to New Zealand in an effort to find there a means of getting back to Los Angeles, their home.

When we arrived at Tahiti, the natives were closing a celebration which lasted for several days, and Mr. Marshall had been filming the ceremonies to be shown as feature reels at the "movies" in America.

* * * * *

After the welcome at the airport at Honolulu, we made an inspection of the three church properties: Makiki, Palama, and Kaliki. In the evening there was an "Aloha" service when we were made welcome—more leis, speeches, and gifts, the Hawaiian way of welcoming visitors. Songs were sung in Hawaiian, Chinese, Japanese and, of course, English. Refreshments were served, and at the end of this first day, I was very glad indeed to retire on the "king-size" bed at Kohana-Moku's for a much-needed rest.

The next day (June 22) we were among a party—five cars in all—that made a complete circuit of the Island of Oahu, stopping for a picnic lunch at Kailua Beach. We visited the grounds where the reunion of the district would soon be held on Waialae Bay.

We were in the Inouye car with Henry and Emily DeTray Inouye. The Inouyes, though not natives of Hawaii, are versed in the legend and lore of the island, and they added much to the pleasure of the trip.

Nuuanu Pali was visited, the cliff or pass where King Kamehameha's Hawaiians repelled invaders and pushed them over the cliff to their destruction.

These were busy days as Brother Miller, who was scheduled to leave for Independence in a few days, de-

Kirtland Temple -

By JOHN BLACKMORE
Church Historian

INTRODUCTION

A very significant gathering, the Conference of High Priests, will be held at Kirtland Temple, October 5 to 8, inclusive. Some of the best leadership of the church, both general and local, will be gathered at this great historic shrine of the Restoration for a time of worship, inspiration, and instruction in the advancement of the cause of Christ.

It is appropriate that the Conference should be held in the Temple where the early church experienced so rich and wonderful an outpouring of spiritual blessing when the Temple was dedicated on March 27, 1836, and during the following days. Since the Temple has been held by the Reorganization, it has been the scene of many another spiritual experience.

The First Presidency have asked our Church Historian, John Blackmore, to prepare an article about the Temple that all should read, and especially those who are to attend the Conference. We commend it to the consideration of our readers.

THE EDITORS.

THE EARLY DAYS OF THE CHURCH in Kirtland are full of events which have eternal significance. It was at the General Conference of June, 1831—which was a conference of elders—that the “fullness” of the authority of the high or Melchisedec priesthood was bestowed upon the church and upon individuals. Previously the authority of the Melchisedec priesthood seems to have been limited to that of eldership and not to the fullness of the high priesthood. David Whitmer stated in his address, “In Kirtland, Ohio, in June, 1831, at a conference of the church, the first high priests were ordained into the church.”¹

His testimony agrees with that of Lyman Wight’s account. “Here for the first time I saw the visible manifestations of the power of God, as could have been on the day of Pentecost, and here for the first time I saw the Melchisedec priesthood introduced into the church of Jesus Christ, as anciently, whereunto I was ordaind under the hands of Joseph Smith, and I then ordained sixteen others, such as he chose, unto the same priesthood.”²

Parley P. Pratt gave expression to the same thought in his autobiography. Writing of his experience at this particular conference, he said, “Several were then selected by revelation, through President Smith, and ordained to the high priesthood after the order of the Son of God; which is after the order of Melchisedec. This was the first occasion in which this priesthood had been revealed and conferred upon the elders in this dispensation, although the office of an elder is the same in a certain degree, but not in the fullness.”³

It is very appropriate that a “Conference of High Priests” should meet upon the grounds and in the locality made sacred, both in memory and in fact, by the historic and eternally significant bestowal of the “fullness” of the high priesthood in the priesthood (elders) conference of 1831.

PRIESTHOOD EDUCATION AND CULTURE

The early history of Kirtland is associated with the fundamental and basic belief of the church that the full redemption of man—socially and spiritually—cannot be achieved in ignorance. Therefore, the Lord in those early days deemed the education of the priesthood so imperative that a revelation was given to the leaders of the church to establish a “School of the Prophets” for instruction in all that was expedient.⁴

Unfortunately, contention arose in this school which nullified its spiritual and educational value. It was hard for those stalwart early pioneer men to recognize that men of the priesthood may differ in viewpoint and opinions and not make their theological and philosophical differences matters of personal feelings interfering with brotherly relationships. Evidently the School of the Prophets was merged into the “School of the Elders.” Joseph Smith states in his history of October, 1834, “It now being the last of the month, the elders beginning to come in, it was necessary to make preparation for the school of the elders, wherein they might be more perfectly instructed in the great things of God, during the coming winter.” In March, 1835, the school closed so that the elders could go forth to preach and engage in their missionary work. The closing was evidently only for a short period. In November, 1835, Joseph in his history again writes of attending school. The elders studied grammar, Hebrew, Bible, geography and undoubtedly other things.⁵

In January of 1836, the “School of Elders” moved into the Temple where the studies of the Hebrew language were continued.⁶

The education of the ministry was thereby associated with the early activities in the sacredness of the Temple. The architectural arrangements provided for classrooms and facilities for study. Interpreting this history in terms of the present, we infer that the men of the ministry are to learn and study to increase their proficiency in spreading the gospel. Any measure of ignorance upon the part of the men of the priesthood is an eternal loss to the world. Even the sacred precincts of the Temple were dedicated to the holy cause of learning. Again, it is very appropriate for the men of the high priesthood to meet in the sacred or holy atmosphere of the Temple for conference, for worship, and for study.

The precedent is set for the high priests of the church to foster the intensive education of the two priesthoods of the church. On May 4, 1833, "a conference of high priests convened to take into consideration the necessity for a building for the School of Elders in accordance with the direction in a revelation given in Kirtland, March 8. Hyrum Smith, Jared Carter, and Reynolds Cahoon were chosen as a committee to secure subscriptions and to erect such a building." A circular was sent out by the committee seeking support for the task. In due time the Temple was built and dedicated on Sunday, March 27, 1836.

THE TEMPLE AND PRIESTHOOD

In the Temple such sacred ceremonies as the "Washing of feet" and the "Sacrament of the Lord's Supper" among the brotherhood of the official family of the priesthood were observed. In the holy place, men of the ministry studied and taught each other "Words of Wisdom." They sought knowledge from the "best books," and they sought learning by "study and also by faith." It was a "house of prayer, a house of fasting, a house of faith, a house of learning, a house of order, a house of God."

In the dedicatory prayer uttered by Joseph Smith on Sunday, March 27, 1836, is this petition. ". . . that thy glory may rest upon thy people, and upon this thy house, which we now dedicate to thee, that it may be sanctified and consecrated to be holy, and that thy holy presence may be continually in this house; and that all people who shall enter upon the threshold of the Lord's house may feel thy power and be constrained to acknowledge that thou hast sanctified it, and that it is thy house, a place of thy holiness."⁷

During the winter of 1837 the Quorum of High Priests met in the west room of the attic where they transacted the business of their quorums.⁸ Men of the high priesthood in this day may wish to enter the area of that west room and in spirit commune with the past and to meditate upon the struggles of those early church pioneers in the work and calling of the high priesthood. Undoubtedly in this room many lively discussions ensued, for high priests enjoy an intellectual debate. Also, true to the experience of the order of the High Priesthood today, those early pioneers in the church would enjoy and appreciate seasons of meditation and worship when the Holy Spirit would enlighten them with wisdom and understanding.

Men of the high priesthood who attend this conference will have a rich experience reflecting about Kirtland's past history and anticipating the high priesthood's work as men of this holy order move constructively into the future amid a chaotic world of wars, fears, and uncertainties. The world today needs the inspired, intelligent, and devoted work of the men of the Melchisedec priesthood in its highest and fullest power. The church today depends for its spiritual life blood upon the men of the high priesthood to whom God has given the keys to much spiritual power and the opportunity for a great achievement in righteousness.

NEWS AND NOTES

IN SEARCH OF HOLY GRAIL

On the evening of September 7 the Zion's Leaguers of Walnut Park held another successful enterprise. In their original plans they had hoped to have an attendance of sixty, but eighty-nine attended the banquet.

The meeting was given for a double purpose: the installation of new officers, and a send off for those going to college. The ancient quest for the Holy Grail was used as the theme for the banquet. As part of the program the legend of this quest was told by Barbara Peavey. A song called the "Holy Grail," which was sung by Roy Sterns, was written by Barbara Peavey and Bernard Butterworth. The White Masque Players presented a playlet on the subject.

The lower auditorium of the church was made to represent a medieval castle. Guests entered by a drawbridge that spanned a moat. At one end of the room there was a large luminous picture of a knight on a charging steed.

Guests of honor at the banquet were Carl Mesle, John Thomas, Fred Davies, and Bud Henson.

NOTICE

The time for the radio program "Morning Devotions" has been changed from 6:30 a.m. to 7:00 a.m. The time for the other radio programs remains the same.

CLOSE OF A SERIES

The last Campus service for the year was held September 10. It is estimated that 29,000 attended the thirteen services of the series. The theme for the series was "We Witness for Christ in the Restoration."

Sermons for the first twelve meetings were presented by members of the presidency and the council of seventy.

At the last service, presided over by Stake President Charles Graham, fifteen selected men presented their personal testimonies.

RADIO

Arthur Rock, radio minister for the church, began his radio work by presenting the morning devotion on September 1 over station KMBC. Brother Rock has established his home in Independence and expects to buy a house here.

Previous to coming to Independence he attended Baylor University in Texas. He is now completing his thesis for his master's degree.

ENGLISH NEWS

A letter was received from Elder Frank A. Fry expressing the gratitude of the Saints of the British Isles Mission for the large church flag that was sent by the church in general.

Doris Oakman and Irene Rannie of Independence who are visiting England made the presentation.

Many of the Saints in England had never seen the flag of the church before.

SUMMER OF CHURCH WORK

Elder John R. Darling, Associate Director of the Department of Religious Education, has returned to his work in the Auditorium after attending a series of reunions and church meetings in western United States and Canada. Since beginning his travels last June, he says he has crossed the Continental Divide about ten times.

Sister Darling was with him on his travels and took an active part in most of the reunions.

Experiences of a Missionary - Part V

Labors in Many Fields

DURING the forty-one years I was under appointment, I worked in many districts and branches from Maine to California, from Canada to Mexico. Each of these fields had its distinctive problems as well as advantages. Many people have asked me how I liked my field and my answer was always about the same. When sent to a new field, I never made any decision as to how I was going to like it, believing I would find some things to like in every field.

One of the most difficult fields in which I have labored was Utah. Those who have worked there and in foreign fields have always preferred the latter. Two years was supposed to be the limit for anyone to labor in Utah as it had many discouraging problems. In all I have spent seven years there, five of them at one time.

At Work in Utah

I have preached hundreds of sermons on the streets, standing in a car that was furnished by the General Church. Sometimes these services would begin at eight o'clock and continue until midnight. There are very few towns in Utah that I have not been in and held services. Sometimes the entire town would come out to listen. Usually two of us traveled together. First we would preach, and following the preaching we would permit questions. The answering of these questions very often aroused antagonism. In Southern Utah we would find entire towns composed of members of the Mormon Church. From childhood these people are taught to believe that the Reorganized Church is an apostate group, and no place in which I have labored is the name so resented. But even with all this animosity, I have friends among the Mormon people. I have heard warm discussions between the members of that church in which some would defend us while others would condemn us, which has led me to believe that some day a number of them will join our organization.

There are times when we are especially discouraged and feel like giving up. As I was in charge of missionary work in Utah, it was my duty to arrange for other missionaries to preach. This was not always easy. I was sitting one evening in our headquarters in Salt Lake City after having worked hard all day without stopping to eat. I got up from my desk and decided to go down into the business district and get some food. I put on my overcoat and hat and went out into deep snow. As I walked along, discouraged and disheartened, I thought of the future of the church—of that wonderful day we have looked forward to when the endowment would be given. This brought a feeling of encouragement to me. If I could be found worthy to live in that glorious day and receive the outpouring of that Spirit, I should be happy, regardless of what disappointments might come in the meantime.

A Wonderful Promise

It was after sunset, and darkness was beginning to hover over the city. My surroundings faded from my natural vision, and seemingly I was transported to some distant place where multitudes of people were gathered. A personage appeared and asked me if I would be happy if I could baptize ten people, and I replied, "Yes, Lord." Then I was asked if I would not be happier if I could baptize twenty-five people, and again I answered, "Yes." Yet another time I was asked "Would you not be made exceedingly happy if you could baptize one hundred people?" My answer again was, "Yes, Lord, I would." That same voice further declared, "The time will come when not only tens, twenties and fifties and hundreds will come into the church, but thousands will accept the gospel."

The vision closed and I found myself rejoicing in the knowledge that there is a day coming when the armies of Israel will become very great. Under the endowment that must come to the church, the servants of Christ will bring many souls into the fold. From that day until now I have always believed there will be a glorious consummation of our work in which many thousands will be converted and brought into the church. Since that experience, when inclined to become discouraged, I have meditated on what I saw at that time, and it has revived my hope and courage. I have no doubt it will find a fulfillment at some later period in church history.

Car Trouble in the Desert

While working in the extreme southern part of Utah, I received a letter from the First Presidency asking me to go to Hagerman, Idaho, to attend a reunion there. In company with a Brother Parks, who at the time was working with me, I left for this reunion. We drove some two hundred twenty-five miles, reaching Salt Lake City that night. Early the next morning we continued our journey. Neither of us had much money but we did not care to ask for any help, hoping in some way to be taken care of. We drove all day and got out on the desert west of Ogden, Utah, when we discovered we had burned out a connecting rod in our car and were left stranded on the desert sand. Brother Park decided to remain with the car while I tried to find repairs. Good fortune favored me, for soon some tourists picked me up and took me to a small town where I hoped to find the necessary repairs. By the time I reached this town, all business houses were closed, so I had to remain over night. The only thing I could do was to rent a hotel room, even if it did take some of the much-needed money. The next morning the hotel manager called me for breakfast. While I had not had anything to eat for twenty-four hours and was hungry, I did not think I should spend the little money I had for a meal. I told the manager I was not eating, but he insisted I must come in and eat. I still further declined, but the manager insisted someone had come in and paid for my breakfast, and I must eat. No one knew who I was nor my financial condition, and I have wondered many times who was kind enough to pay for that meal. I know I enjoyed it greatly and have always felt it was the Lord who provided it for me.

By L. G. HOLLOWAY

I was compelled to return without any repairs as none were to be found in the town. I returned to where I had left the car and found my companion waiting. We decided to go back to a small town called Snowville, where we hoped to get the car fixed, but again no repairs were available.

The owner of the garage removed the motor of the car, took it to pieces, and said he had no parts with which to fix it. He was an inexperienced man and could not put the motor together again. He deserted us and left us to meet our problems without any help.

Motor Repairs

After working all day, we finally got the car together and in running condition. The next morning, we left for Hagerman, one hundred seventy five miles away. I had only thirty-seven cents, and I knew our gas tank would be empty long before we reached Hagerman. We were strangers in a strange land, but we did feel we represented the Master of men, so would trust him to open the way so we could reach our destination. After traveling a few miles wondering how we could ever reach Hagerman, I saw two men running up the mountainside. They were waving their hands at us. I stopped the car, and they asked us if we were going through a town about forty miles away. We told them we were, and they asked to ride. We explained our situation and told them if they would give us seventy-five cents each we would take them. They were only too glad to do this. Soon they learned we were going to Burley which was forty miles farther and they offered us three dollars if we would take them there. We gladly accepted their offer, and with this money we were able to get ourselves something to eat, buy gas, and pay for the repairs. That night we reached Hagerman, happy to find ourselves among friends.

A Vanishing Trail

The reunion closed and in company with Brother and Sister N. L. Booker we were to go to a schoolhouse about one hundred fifty miles away. Brother Booker thought he knew a short cut that would get us to our appointment in less time, so we decided to take this route. We left the main highway and started on a road that lead up the valley along the Snake River. At last we came to a swamp in which a man was stuck with his car. He had been there for several hours and had almost given up in despair. We all gave him a lift, and soon he was on dry land. We, too, were to pass through this same swamp and soon found ourselves mired down. I got out and was standing directly behind the car when the driver let the clutch in. The wheels began to spin, picking up mud and water and showering it on me from head to foot. Brother Booker was out on dry land, and as he looked at my plight he could not refrain from laughing. We succeeded in getting out, but we did not reach our appointment until near midnight and the people who had expected to hear us preach had gone to their homes. Whenever Brother Booker meets me he always has a good laugh over this incident.

Montana

Much of my work has been in rural communities. This was especially true in the Western States. Sometimes the hardships to be endured were great. I well remember holding a series of services in Willow Creek, Montana. The weather was sometimes thirty to forty degrees below zero, but attendance was good considering the low temperatures. Some of the Saints drove six or eight miles in order to attend services. There were very few automobiles in the country, so travel was largely by team. Some of these people insisted on my going home with them.

At first I hesitated to go out in the storm, but when it became apparent they were going to be offended if I did not respond to their invitation to stay in their home, I promised them I would go home with them.

Foolish and Thoughtless Hosts

When the night came, it was thirty below zero. My clothing was light, as I was not dressed for the rigors of that climate, but having promised them I would go, the only thing that remained for me to do was to keep that promise. The trip was made in a sled. By the time I reached their farm home six miles away, I was nearly frozen. The fire had gone out, and they decided to go to bed without rebuilding it. I had hoped I might get warm, but the family retired without replenishing the fire.

My bed was in a hallway between two houses. The only protection I had was a board wall one inch in thickness. The spaces between the boards were open and I could see the stars shining outside. Instead of getting warmer, I grew colder, and in order to protect myself I got up and put on all my clothing, but even this did not help much. I feared if I got up and went into the house it would offend the people who lived there. The long dreary hours of that night passed, and it was a relief when morning came. I was glad to get in a room where a fire would warm me up.

I had not only suffered cold, but I had nearly frozen. After this exposure I developed a raging fever which continued all day. I went to the schoolhouse that night and tried to preach, but I was too sick and had to give up. I went to bed, and for a week I wrestled between life and death, but the Lord granted his blessing, and I began to mend. It was some time before I was able to do any church work.

A Blessing at Sagle, Idaho

Many times I have heard people say they wished to be remembered in prayer. To me it was a simple request, and I wondered if those who made it fully realized its importance. For several days I had been conducting a series of meetings in Sagle, Idaho. The interest was fine, and each evening the church was filled with interested listeners. After preaching for nearly two weeks, I found myself nearly exhausted for subject matter. I pleaded with the Lord to help me. I not only prayed but studied hard to prepare myself.

When I went to our church one evening, I found it packed to the door. Even though I had tried hard to prepare myself, I seemed to have nothing to say. As the congregation sang, I wished they would continue their singing for the entire service.

As I sat there, discouraged and disheartened, a vision was given me. I saw Brother Charles H. Jones who had baptized me, praying for me. I heard him as he pleaded with the Lord to bless me for the good of mankind.

Soon the vision closed, and I was called to stand before that audience that night not in my own strength, but under a divine power and light that caused me to know of the value of the prayers of God's people. This good man never knew, so far as this life is concerned, of my experience, but I am sure I was blessed in my effort largely because of his prayer. As I stood that night I felt the enlightening influence of the Spirit of God and I also felt hands placed upon me. I was told that heavenly messengers stood behind those who represented Christ in the preaching of the gospel.

From that time until now, whenever I hear someone request prayers, I breathe a silent prayer in their behalf, as I know the value of "Let us pray for one another."

"How many times discouraged, we sink beside the way, about us all is darkness; we hardly dare to pray." It is under such conditions as these, when we take courage and seek the help that comes from above through prayer, that we are blessed. Often I have sought the Lord when no earthly hand could help me, and I have never been disappointed, but have known truly the Master has sustained me as I placed my hand in his.

Question Time

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. Address questions to Herald Editors rather than panel members. We shall try to take all questions in the order they are received. Be patient, there may be several ahead of yours. Only signed questions sent by contributors will appear here.—EDITOR.

QUESTION:

Please explain Doctrine and Covenants 63:15. Who is under condemnation, and who uses the name of the Lord in vain, not having authority? Should we be ordained or have authority as lay members before we present the gospel to our neighbors or friends?
West Virginia C. J. J.

ANSWER:

The statement reads:

Wherefore let all men beware how they take my name in their lips; for behold, verily I say, that many there be who are under this condemnation; who use the name of the Lord, and use it in vain, having not authority. Wherefore, let the church repent of their sins, and I, the Lord, will own them, otherwise they shall be cut off.

The word "vain" is used in the sense of "unproductive of useful or satisfying results; ineffectual; worthless; fruitless; unprofitable." It derives from the Latin word vanus—empty.

The Lord applies the statement to the church, and to his ministers who are sent forth to represent Christ and preach his gospel. He had commanded them to "teach the principles of my gospel which are in the Bible and the Book of Mormon, in the which is the fullness of my gospel, . . . and these shall be their teachings, as they shall be directed by the Spirit."—Doctrine and Covenants 42:5. They are to be the messengers of revealed truth and not of secular or scholastic things of human production. Their message is a limited one, "saying none other things than that which the apostles and prophets have written, and that which is taught them by the Comforter, through the prayer of faith."—Ibid., 52:3.

If or when a minister, standing as a representative of Jesus Christ, presents teachings other than those he is commissioned to teach, he is acting on his own, and not by the authority of Jesus Christ. Such teaching cannot produce the results the divine truth was given to produce, and the effort, so far as the Lord's purpose is concerned, is in vain. Again the Lord warns,

Remember that that which cometh from above is sacred, and must be spoken with care, and by constraint of the Spirit, and in this there is no condemnation; and ye receive the Spirit through prayer; wherefore, without this there remaineth condemnation.—Doctrine and Covenants 63:16.

The minister for Christ does bear a responsibility of knowing his message and of being assured that it is according to the will of God. Anything short of this will not have the confirming presence of the Holy Spirit, nor divine approval. Some elders must have failed in the early days of the church, for the Lord said, "Many there be who are under condemnation;" and the further statement, "Let the church repent of their sins," seems to attribute some measure of responsibility for this failure to the body officially.

Members not holding the priesthood may, according to divine provisions, tell the gospel story to others, for there is much they can do in spreading the knowledge of the gospel, though in doing this it is not necessary that they speak "in the name of the Lord;" nevertheless they have need of care in their judgment, and wisdom in their utterances, even as Emma Smith was counseled when she was called "to expound Scriptures and to exhort the church, according as it shall be given thee by the Spirit."—Doctrine and Covenants 24:2. The Scriptures emphasize two essentials in those who would teach, whether they be ministers or members, viz., diligent study of the word of God and earnest prayer, which qualify for this great service.

CHARLES FRY.

QUESTION:

Does Hebrews 6:4-6 refer to the sinning against the Holy Ghost? Is there more than one way to commit the sin?
Alabama E. J. L.

ANSWER:

Opinion on this passage differs. There are those who think that the apostle was writing to saints of He-braic blood, and since the Hebrews had a national enlightenment because of the prophetic word in their midst, had tasted of the heavenly gift, and were partakers of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost, Acts 2, and had heard Christ and his apostles, the conversion was based on observation and not on a soul-saturating experience, and hence they did not sin against the Holy Ghost. On the other hand there are those who regard this passage as a sin against the Holy Ghost. They argue that these apostates had received the Holy Ghost through the laying on of hands, and that the experiences listed in the passage were not based on observations of the workings of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, but rather on a soul-satisfying experience of a personal nature.

There are two passages in our Lord's teachings that shed light on this statement. The first is the parable of the seed that fell on stony ground, and the second is his reference to the workers of miracles and those that prophesy in his name, Matthew 7:21-23. If these apostates were converted to the cause of Christ because they had read of the promise of his coming in the law and the prophets, and had heard the word preached, had witnessed the pouring of the Holy Ghost on the disciples, and had no depth of soul in them, they did not sin against the Holy Ghost. They were the stony ground that tasted of the heavenly gift and the good word of God and could not drink it in. If they were of the other class mentioned in the seventh chapter of Matthew they undoubtedly sinned against the Holy Ghost and crucified the Lord anew.

It is difficult for us to determine what class of people the apostle was writing to, but the moral of this statement should be clear to the saints of subsequent generations. Apostasy is horrible, and it is extremely difficult to bring those who apostatize to repentance again. For, if one considers the light against which they have sinned, it is hard to escape the conclusion that they have blasphemed against the Holy Ghost.

Is there more than one way to commit the sin?

Sin against the Holy Ghost is one. It is the unyielding attitude to the light that gives us knowledge that Jesus is the Christ.

GEORGE A. NJEIM.

Activities in the DeKalb, Illinois, Branch

RECENTLY THE PASTOR of one of our small branches told the bishop, "You, help us rehabilitate the church here, and we will do the same to the membership." That pastor was Roy F. Healy, and he has been as good as his word. In the past few months DeKalb Branch has stepped out with long strides of progress.

The rehabilitation began last winter when members of the congregation decided to repaint the interior of their church. Believing that people who worship together should work together, they put the work of redecoration on a voluntary basis. The women came bringing lunches, and the men came bringing tools and skill. Soon nonmember friends were caught up in the spirit of fellowship and service. Night after night a Catholic woman and a Lutheran man joined Latter Day Saints to work and sing and eat in a fellowship that would be hard to beat.

This was only the first step. "People who work and worship together should pray and fast together." Uniting to help each other spiritually, the members of DeKalb Branch agreed to fast from breakfast on one day a week. But their prayers were not selfishly confined to themselves. In the letter column of the Herald, Elder Healy told about their effort and offered to include the names of any who wished to be remembered in their prayers. The response was immediate and surprising. Requests came from widely separated sections of the country, mostly from isolated Saints and even a few from nonmembers. All indicated a sincere desire for a blessing. A second letter in the Herald invited these strangers who were brothers in the church to join in the Fast Day, remembering the needs of each other.

From one day a week, the DeKalb membership voluntarily increased it to two days, and then to three: Sunday, Tuesday, and Thursday. Many of the blessings they have enjoyed since the start of these fasts are humbly accredited to the fast days by the members.

BUT PRAYER is not enough to build up a branch. Active effort must go into it. The correspondent, Sister Clara Easterbrook, began inserting notices in the church section of the DeKalb newspaper, describing the services attractively, and soon church announcements were being made over the radio station on the Saturday morning "Church Hour." DeKalb was reaching out.

In planning the services, the pastor tried to make them interesting and provocative as well as beautiful. One Sunday three young girls dressed in white took up the offering. On Children's Day four little boys proudly walked up the aisle with collection plates while their parents as proudly watched. On Women's Day, the entire service was turned over to the women of the branch. A feeling of "belonging" through participation swept over the congregation.

A period of meditative silence and prayer has been added to the regular service following the second hymn. These few moments when the congregation bows in silent prayer adds much to the reverence of the hour. "It isn't a new idea, but we are finding it highly successful in establishing an inspirational atmosphere."

Another tie to hold the branch together has been found in family night which is held each month. The committees are constantly changing so that everyone has a chance to help. The "nights" are sponsored by the young people or young adult groups, but every member is invited to come and bring friends. Even the invalids can come, for transportation is provided for everyone, and some of the oldsters have the best times. Two of the oldest members, both past seventy-five, are the keenest players in balloon volleyball games.

THE VISITING PROGRAM of the branch in DeKalb has taken a unique turn in the past few months. Since there are no priesthood members nearer than thirty miles, the women have formed a "Five and Five Club." The goal is for each participant to visit five members in their homes and five nonmembers, then turn in their names to the pastor for follow-up calls. With a discreet eye for advertising, the pastor has had cards made with the message, "Your pastor called," to leave when he finds no one at home. Already the results are apparent in two requests for baptism, a list of interested nonmembers which may lead to a missionary series this fall, and the return of many members who had become indifferent and drifted away.

A ministry of progress should not be an unusual thing in our church. Every branch is capable of just this. The attitude of humility and prayer combined with the active application of stewardship principles will build Zion. Zion people will build Zion. Zion branches will make Zion a reality.

Please Call Me Jason -

By MABEL WILLIAMS
CRAYNE

WHEN DOCTOR EDWARD INGLES returned from his round of morning calls, he found his friend, Bill Akers, waiting in his office.

"Well, good morning, Bill," he said, "What brings you here? Nothing serious, I hope."

"Now, Doc," Bill sputtered, "you know it's nothing serious. I've never been really sick a day in my life. I just get a little winded when I carry boxes of canned goods and a bit dizzy climbing ladders. I've got a cold, and I want you to give me some shots like the ones you gave Henry Sanger last winter. He said they worked like a charm."

The doctor's smile vanished as he listened to Bill, then he said firmly, "Bill Akers, take off your coat. You have been a lucky man to have such good health so far, but you have worked in that store for over twenty years with very little time off." Examination over, the doctor sat down at his desk and began to write.

Bill waited a few minutes, then said, "Come on, Doc, I've got to get back to the store and put up my afternoon orders. You can take care of your correspondence after I'm gone."

The doctor laid down his pen and looked at his friend. He was not smiling when he said, "You are not going back to that store, Bill. You are going home and get into bed. Next week we're going fishing."

It took Bill a moment to realize what the doctor had said. Then he stormed, "Why should I go home and get into bed this time of day? And who are you to tell me when to go fishing?" Then his belligerent tone changed, and a tired look came over his face as he said, "Aw, Ed, what's the use? I never could bluff you. You know I'm dead tired, and I'd like to go fishing with you. Alice and my nephew can run the store for a couple of weeks. Can you get away that long?"

"I have already taken care of that," said the doctor. "Dr. Arnold is going to take over. He's new here, but he's made a lot of friends." He picked up a small vial of white tablets and a glass of water and handed them to the worried man before him. "These are heart pills, Bill, and I have been taking them for the past two months. I want you to take one now. There is no use in fighting against nature at our age."

Bill's hands trembled and his face paled as he took the tablet; then he slumped back in his chair. "Ed, do you mean that we are both on the same spot and have to walk out on our jobs and leave them for some one else?" The doctor nodded affirmatively, but Bill's voice continued to plead for a denial. "Are you sure, . . . can't you be mistaken? Why, I won't live six months without my work, and you won't either."

"I know it's tough, Bill," said the doctor, "but we have to face it and find something less strenuous to occupy our time. As far as our present work is concerned, others will step in to fill up the gap, and business and the world will move on as usual. Your nephew has worked for you for a long time without promotion. Now you can make him manager. Dr. Arnold has a wife and two youngsters and going into my office will mean a lot to him."

"But what about Alice?" asked Bill, "I can't walk out on her."

"You have never let Alice down before," answered the doctor, "don't do it now. You can be strong in will if not in body, and you can make her proud of you. The fellow who takes life as it comes is the strong man these days, and there is always plenty of work to do without pay." He handed the paper he had been writing on to Bill, "Stop at the drugstore on your way home. After a few days rest, we'll go up to my cabin and talk things over."

THE EVENINGS were cool in the mountains, so the doctor lighted a log in the large fireplace. The two men sat in comfortable chairs before it, with no other light than the dancing red and blue flames that cast queer shadows on the walls. They talked of other days when there had been four of them—Ed and Mollie, Bill and Alice. They recalled the trip to beautiful Lake Tahoe where they fished and slept out under a canopy of stars, their nostrils filled with the fragrance of pine. Then there were the week ends at Big Bear, where they rented a cottage, and the distant voices and friendly putt-putt of the motor boats on the lake were like music to the work-weary men from the noisy city. All this was before "too much business" intervened.

"How did you happen to buy such a big place?" asked Bill. "There's room enough here for a dozen cabins and a few tents besides."

"I bought it when the boys were at home. They had great times up here for just one summer with their friends. Mollie and I came up for a few week ends, and my mother stayed on to chaperon the youngsters. Now the boys are miles away, and Mollie and mother won't be coming any more. It is too full of memories for me to sell it to a stranger."

"I WAS JUST THINKING," said Bill, "that it would be a good place for a boy's camp. Alice and I have never had children of our own, but she's mothered a lot of little shavers who came around the store. I could round up a dozen right now that need better food and a good doctor to look them over."

The doctor sat staring into the fire as though he had not heard until Bill abruptly asked, "Ed, have you been to church lately?"

"No, . . . can't say that I have. People get sick on Sunday, too, you know. Mollie used to round me up once in a while, but I don't seem to have the time or incentive since she has gone. Why do you ask?"

"Because Alice has been nagging at me to go ever since they started that 'get one' drive. Do you suppose we could let her 'get two'? It would make her happy and wouldn't do us a mite of harm. Remember when we wouldn't miss a meeting?"

"Yes," answered the doctor thoughtfully, "I remember, and I wonder if God gives us ill health and old age because we need time to remember. I'll go to church with you next Sunday, then we'll come back up here and talk about that camp for your boys."

TWO WEEKS LATER Uncle Billy Akers, as he was called at the store, was out scouting. He was walking the streets of his home town on the look out for two more recruits to make an even twenty in the "Boys of all Nations Group" before they went to camp. They had held one meeting, and he and the doctor were jubilant over its success. He stopped suddenly and his eyes brightened as he saw a boy kneeling on the sidewalk shining a pair of shoes, while the owner sat on a wooden box. He watched the boy as he worked, noting the careful way he handled the shoes and the real shine he was giving them. When the boy had finished and his satisfied customer walked away, Bill asked, "Am I next, son?"

The boy looked into the man's friendly eyes and answered with a grin, "Sure, mister, you're next."

Bill was not in the habit of paying anyone to shine his shoes, but he figured it would be worth the price just to talk to this lad whose clothes were shabby, but whose personality spoke much in his favor. He lost no time in idle conversation but went right to work on the shoes.

"What's your name?" Bill asked.

Without missing a stroke, the boy answered, "Carlos Gonzales."

"Tell me, Carlos, do you know Jesus?"

The boy looked up, his face radiant, "Sure, mister, I know Jesus. He is my brother, and he has a shoe-shine stand down at the next corner."

Bill was not expecting this answer, although he knew that the name Jesus was not uncommon among the Jews in the time of Christ and is used by the Mexican people today. He waited until Carlos had finished his shoes, then said, "I have a very dear friend whose name is Jesus, and I'd like to know your brother. Can you go with me to see him? You may miss a customer so I'll give you a little extra to make up for that."

"Thanks, mister," said Carlos, "I'll go with you. My brother helps take care of Mom and me, but he don't feel so good these days. I guess it's the heat."

They found the older boy idle at the time; his stand was made from a piano box and topped by a large beach umbrella. Bill noted the pale face, the thin body, and the brace on his leg. He held out his hand and spoke to him in a man-to-man tone, "Carlos tells me you are a good businessman and that you help take care of your family. That is a fine thing to do, young man, but every one needs a vacation once in a while. There's a group of fellows having a meeting tonight, and I'm sure you'd like to know them. They're pretty much like you and Carlos. Some of them aren't as well off as you are, but they're planning on having some good times together. And there'll be ice cream and cake for refreshments."

The boy remained silent, but Carlos spoke for him, "Mister, I'd like to go, but I guess Jesus is thinking of Mom, 'cause we don't ever leave her alone nights. Could she come too, mister? Could our Mom come to the meeting and have ice cream and cake? She can play Chinese checkers real good. She used to work in a store before she got sick."

"Of course," said Bill, "she can come and help hand out the cookies. I'm not such a bad one at Chinese checkers myself!"

Carlos had guessed right, and the face of the older boy brightened, he held out his hand and said, "You're all right, mister, and if Mom don't feel too bad, we'll come to the meeting."

The boys and their mother were waiting on the corner when Bill came by and picked them up that evening. This was the beginning of a new life for the Gonzales family. Mrs. Gonzales had a long talk with the doctor, and arrangements were made for her to go into a rest home for medical care while the boys were in camp.

THE CAMP had been in full swing for a week with a good cook and Alice to supervise. A young schoolteacher took over the boys' daytime sports and the buying of supplies. He had gone into town and Bill and the doctor sat out on the wide, sunny porch, getting a coat of tan and keeping an eye on the smaller boys who were throwing sticks in the water for Stuff, the doctor's cocker spaniel. Suddenly the laughter ceased and Carlos came running, calling, and crying at the same time. The older boys who had been playing ball on the other side of the house ran down to the lake. Carlos sobbed, "Jody Jarvis fell in the water, and Jesus pulled him out, and then Jesus died."

The two men started toward the lake but stopped when they saw the boys coming up the hill carrying Jesus. It was a queer procession and a silent one. Little Jody, none the worse for his ducking and being only three, had discarded his uncomfortable wet clothing and trudged close beside his rescuer, his little black body shining in the sun. His brother, Amos, who couldn't come to camp unless he brought Jody, lagged far behind, scared and trembling lest he be scolded and sent home with him.

The doctor waited calmly until they reached the porch, then said quietly, "Put him down here, boys, and I'll have a look at him."

The wet clothing was removed and the unconscious boy was wrapped in a warm blanket and laid on the bench in the sun. "He's just exhausted," said the doctor to Bill, who stood by anxiously waiting for the verdict. "He had so little strength, poor kid, and he gave it all."

One of the older boys spoke up in disgust, "Aw! I knew we would have trouble if we brought that baby along."

The doctor smiled as he spied "that baby" and said, "Amos, you had better get some clothes for your little brother. He's a fat little rascal, isn't he? No wonder Jesus got tired bringing him in. You fellows all scatter now and don't be noisy. Jesus needs to sleep." After they were gone the men stood looking down at the boy, and Bill said softly, "And his name is Jesus, meaning saver."

The boys learned a great deal about "Jesus the Christ" before they went home. Every morning Alice would read from the Bible, and at night they would gather around the fireplace while Uncle Billy and the doctor told them stories selected to show good conduct, bravery, and fair play. The boys were encouraged to tell of their own experiences in sports and work. One evening the doctor had a book that gave the meaning of all their names, and he explained that Jesus meant saver, and Christ, the anointed one.

"There were many in the time of Christ," he said, "who had the name of Jesus, but in reverence to him, they changed it to the Greek word, Jason. It was said that no sinner bore that name in His day."

Jesus Gonzales, who was sitting close beside Bill, whispered, "Please, Uncle Billy, will you call me Jason?"

Uncle Billy took the boy's hand in his own as he answered, "Sure, son, from now on your name can be Jason, and if your Mom and the Lord are willing you are going to have a chance to study and work for our friend Jesus the Christ." He turned and looked about him at the boys' happy faces, the sweet content of his wife, Alice, the renewed companionship of his old friend, Doctor Ingles. The answering pressure of the slim fingers held closely in his broad palm brought such a warm glow of happiness that it filled his whole being. He was no longer afraid of the future. He had found the way to abundant living.

Letters

Influence for Good

A few months ago I asked the members of my junior-high church school class if they could think of any one person who had truly been an influence for good in their lives. Several raised their hands, and when I gave one an opportunity to speak, they all chorused: "Brother Simons." Then I asked them to tell me how he had helped them. Their answer was that he always smiled at them and called them by name even when they were in a large crowd and when he was busy. Several said that when he came to administer to them, he was just as serious as he had been jolly on other occasions. They were touched by the spirit of his friendliness and concern for them, and although he had been away from Flint for a year, they had not forgot his kindness.

Brother Simons' example should be a challenge to us. We who work with young people must learn to be happy with them and also genuinely interested in their spiritual welfare. We must learn to cultivate in our lives those qualities that will be an influence for good to them. HATTIE JOPLIN.

The Responsibility of Membership

After you publicly acknowledge membership in the church, the world sets you apart and watches closely your every move. Because you have chosen the better way, your friends may expect perfection of you. Baptism does not overcome your faults for you—you must patiently sift each one out and overcome it.

Shortly after I was baptized I had some experiences that set me to thinking and trying to reason the situation out for myself. The more I read, the more I realize I have yet to learn. In the word of God there are depths of meaning seemingly impossible to grasp, yet every day things unfold and become plainer to me. I am helped, too, by reading other people's views. Some things that weren't clear to me in the past have been made understandable when I have read the opinion of others. When I study sincerely, God seems to open my mind. Complacency never aids spiritual growth. There is something inside that prompts to do more and more. Satan may try to discourage this feeling, but growth can come from that too. If I am able to recognize what is happening, I can pray harder than ever for strength. Then I can see better what I am aiming toward and set my course again.

On the Word of Wisdom

In the beginning God and his Son devised the great plan of salvation for mankind. This plan covers both physical and spiritual realms. There are wonderful promises in the Word of Wisdom for those who obey it. Many members can testify of the blessings they have received by being obedient to these rules for healthful living.

We are warned of perilous times in the last days, yet when we live by the law God gave us, he is bound to keep his word. The world cannot save us, but his plan is sure.

The Word of Wisdom should be stressed in every pulpit so that the Saints may find the way to health and strength. All we need to fear is failure to do what we have been directed to do. When we are obedient, God will provide the blessings we need each day.

A Flower for the Church

By STELLA B. OMOHUNDRO

SISTER F. M. MCDOWELL is a woman of many interests and hobbies, all of them closely tied to enriching the beauty of her home. As you admire her rugs, finger the old furniture she has refinished, the jewel boxes she has fashioned, enjoy the plants flourishing in unusual containers, and look at her framed collection of Madonna prints now housed in a lovely file cabinet of her own design, you are somewhat overwhelmed. Ask her what ranks first in her interest and she is sure to speak of her favorite project which she has followed for some years—that of establishing a church flower. She is really interested in two flowers, one of purple and one of gold, to symbolize the church colors.

It started back in 1943 when she was resting from her labors in the garden. She began thinking about what a wonderful thing it would be to have a flower designated as a church flower which could be used to beautify church grounds everywhere. The lily and the rose have always had sacred associations, so she began a search for a flower which would be adaptable to many climates and which would exemplify our colors.

It was not long before she had discovered the Hemerocallis, commonly known as the day lily. So she started experiments with it in her own garden, along with her study of its history. Everything she learned, both its habits in the garden and its interesting history, spurred her enthusiasm.

THESE PLANTS are adaptable to every climate, and are bothered by few pests. They are herbaceous perennials which do better if left undisturbed for several years. In colder climates varieties are available with blooming periods that extend to four or five months. In warmer climates, they extend even longer. Around Independence, for instance, the early varieties bloom in April while others bloom as late as September.

The yellows and golds are well established. Recent hybrids have been developed in reds and wines. Sister McDowell wishes that some horticulturist in the church would work on developing a variety symbolizing our purple.

THE DAY LILY is a very old flower, being first described in print in 1570. It was mentioned again in 1753. By 1804 it was given the name of Hemerocallis disticha and described in a catalog of plants then being grown in the Cambridge Botanical Gardens in England. Its early habits were wandering. It was a great spreader and traveled out of yards and over fences. In this respect it follows the history of our own church people. Now it stays put, even as our church groups have taken root and are developing strength in their own places. By 1823 a color plate of the Hemerocallis was published.

It is interesting that the first notable attention to this plant was just beginning to take serious hold of botanists around the time of the organization of our church.

No doubt some of the earliest varieties such as H. Fulvous, or tawny day lily, or the old corn lily were familiar to the early Saints and planted in Nauvoo, for from 1834 on it is mentioned more and more in botanical works.

Since 1890 interest in the plant and study and development of new varieties have grown until there are now thousands of hybrids ranging in color from pansy purple through the red-purples, burnt orange, orange, gold, yellow, lemon yellow, and one almost white. They vary in size from dwarf plants which grow only twelve inches tall and others as high as six feet. They are particularly effective in perennial borders, or they can be used in the foreground of shrubbery borders. They thrive in full sun, part shade, or full shade. Some are evergreen in moderate climates.

Many nurseries have carried on experiments in improving the color and size of bloom of day lilies, and in her search Sister McDowell discovered a catalog from Russell Gardens in Spring, Texas, that have achieved notable success in the new varieties. In 1949, these horticulturists had fourteen acres of Hemerocallis with more than a million plants. They publish a catalog devoted solely to day lilies and guarantee the plants to grow from Maine to California. Among other points they stress about day lilies and their suitability to wide culture is the fact that they have never spent as much as five cents for insecticides in their fields.

Sister McDowell is constantly trying new varieties in her own garden. But she feels inadequate to the task of developing our purple. She wishes help. She would like others to study and observe the plant and its behavior, to become acquainted with the truly lovely modern hybrids. She would like trained horticulturists to work on color, our color, so that enthusiasm will spread throughout the church for using it on our church grounds and in our gardens. She thinks of our two new flowers as being named the Joseph Smith and the Emma Smith. She hopes they will be realized before too many years.

Children and Character

By LOIS LARSEN

THREE CHILDREN were returning from a vacation. Behind them was a long, hot, dusty ride; ahead were food, baths, the comfort of home, and a much-missed father. So there was every incentive to get along the highway as rapidly as possible.

The road had literally been cut through the hills, and there were signs all along warning of landslides and rocks on the pavement. These were duly commented upon by the children and finally as the road passed through an unusually deep cut, the oldest child looked up at an enormous section of cliff which seemed to be one solid mass and asked the others, "If that great big rock had come down just before we got here and filled the road clear across, what would you do?" I listened with interest for their replies.

One said simply, "I would climb over it and go on."

The second one said, "I would go back to the last town and get some dynamite and come back and blow it up."

The one who had asked the question remarked, "It would be smarter to go back to the little side road we just passed and take that. I am sure it goes around this hill and comes in on the other side."

Now the thing that pleased me the most about these replies, since the children were mine, was that none of them suggested sitting down and waiting for the road maintenance crew to come and remove the imaginary block. Each solved his problem in a highly characteristic manner. One of these children will go through life climbing over its obstacles; one will use every means including force if necessary to remove them; and one will always sensibly find a way around them. But I hope they will have strength of character enough to attend to their own difficulties with a minimum of outside help.

The dictionary gives as a meaning of the word "character"—distinctive qualities or traits; moral excellence. In speaking of a person as having a good or a bad character, we usually mean that his moral traits are in the majority on the positive or negative side.

DURING THE RECENT PRIMARY CAMPAIGN, I heard an impassioned plea from a minister on a radio program for men of character to fill the public offices of our government. I heartily agree with him that such men are needed badly, and I also agree that there are all too few men and women of high principles who are willing to serve in public office. I know, too, that there never will be an increase in this type of officeholder unless we try to rear children who have high ideals and the ability to carry out their ideals to practical ends.

I once asked a man of the church, whose opinion I valued highly, what he thought was the best way to develop good character in children. He answered, "Teach them to have faith in God and in their fellow men," and then he added, "and of course they must have faith in themselves."

It is good to have "the faith that moves mountains," but it is also good to have the intelligence and ability to go ahead and move the mountain. A child should be taught that God gave him his abilities, talents, and brains, and expects him to use them. A good, well-rounded personality is the sum of many experiences and varied teachers and lessons, but the basis of a good character can be laid almost at birth.

Without faith in God there is no solid foundation on which to build; without faith in his fellow men, life isn't worth living; and without faith in himself, there is no way to build the firm character which is so needed in the church and world today.

Picked From the Periodicals

By Aarona Booker Kohlman

September brings a change in pace for everyone. School opens, home schedules are rearranged, fall sewing must be done, organizations again resume meetings—and September magazines quite naturally reflect this atmosphere in their content.

"What Our Colleges Don't Require," Reader's Digest, touches on the necessity for a knowledge of American history, which is too widely ignored.

"Science Discovers True Love," Reader's Digest, is an excellent discussion of the nature of love and of the great need for love.

Reflecting the season is "The Kind of Parents Teachers Like," Parents' Magazine. The author gives ways in which parents can contribute to their children's school success.

"Don't Be Afraid of Your Children," Parents' Magazine, is good advice for parents who are afraid of harming their children by saying no, the parents who cannot check their children at all.

"Should a Mother Work?" Parents' Magazine, gives both sides of the picture, and gives questions which all mothers should ask themselves before reaching a decision.

"The Truth About Nylon Stockings," Good Housekeeping, gives helpful advice on how to take better care of those expensive items of wearing apparel.

"Can a Nation Afford Health for all Its People?" Ladies' Home Journal, will help the reader come to a more reasonable and informed opinion about national health insurance. A British author discusses the British plan.

"This May Be Worth $1,000 to You!" American Home tells the person who is planning to buy a house of hidden features to inspect.

"How to Prepare a Room for Painting," American Home, gives some trade secrets for achieving professional results.

"How to Get the Best of/in Your Department Store," Woman's Home Companion, tells customers what to do when they are dissatisfied with merchandise or services.

The woman who likes to make her own hats should look for "Six New Fall Hats," McCall's.

"Examine Yourself and Save 20,000 Lives," McCall's, is another cancer-prevention article with suggestions for steps that can be taken.

SASKATOON, SASKATCHEWAN.—The annual business meeting was held September 8. Increased attendance at all services throughout the year was reported. Book sales reached a new high of $570.00 for the year. The sum of $980.82 was reported in the building fund.

Officers elected were: J. A. Gendron, pastor; Mrs. Ken Fisher, secretary; Mrs. J. A. Beckman, treasurer; Mrs. E. A. Ward, church school director; William Hall, solicitor and envelope steward; Mrs. C. E. Diggle, publicity agent; Mrs. Bruce Waddelt, music director; Mrs. George Steeves, pianist; Noble Harper, book steward; Ken Fisher, Zion's League leader; Patsy Gore, librarian; Mrs. H. D. Lousks, president of Daughters of Zion; Mrs. Arnold Pippin, president of LaDaSa; Mrs. E. A. Ward, friendly visitor; Mrs. Ken Fisher, leader of Skylarks; Mrs. Roy Anderson, choir leader.

The pastor and church school director were to be responsible for the second hour for the children by providing flannelgraphs, pictures, stories, and sometimes prayer services.

It was decided to have prayer service every Sunday morning excepting the first Sunday of the month.

Leslie Roy, infant son of Ray Edward and Doris Chapman was blessed August 27 by Elder Victor Anderson. Roberta Lynn, infant daughter of Robert and Eileen Freeland was blessed on September 3 by Elder Aylmer Powell.

A social evening was held in honor of Priest Peter Harder who left to become a student at Graceland. He was presented with a pen and pencil set by members of the branch and with a leather billfold by members of Zion's League, of which he was the president. Deacon William Hall is the new president.

The older members are meeting on Wednesday evening for further discussion of their church school lesson. The Daughters of Zion will resume their regular weekly meetings. The election of officers and a demonstration of flower arrangements will occupy their opening meeting. The LaDaSa group will also hold their first meeting the first week in September.

The chapel has been recently decorated.—Reported by LOTTIE CLARKE DIGGLE.

BEND, OREGON.—An institute was held September 2, 3, and 4 under the direction of District President J. L. Verhei. The theme was "Disciples for Christ."

The institute started with a buffet supper Saturday evening at the home of Brother and Sister George Dyer, followed by preaching services and classes at Norway Hall. Communion and prayer services were held Sunday morning. A basket lunch was served in Pioneer Park. Speakers for the institute were J. L. Verhei, Elwin R. Vest, and Monte Lasater.

Breakfast on Monday morning was held at Shevlin Park. Preaching services were held in the same park. Saints from Medford, Salem, Burns, and Madras attended the service.—Reported by GEORGE M. DYER.

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.—Twenty-four district Leaguers, most of them from St. Louis, spent the week end of July 29, 30 at Gardner Lake, near Excelsior Springs, Missouri, in fellowship with the League from Stone Church, Independence. A bus was chartered for the trip.

For the first time in recent years, the Reorganized Church in St. Louis was represented in athletic competition this year with other churches in the city. In mid-August a softball team composed mainly of St. Louis Leaguers finished a 14-game schedule in the North Side Division of the St. Louis Church Athletic Association. The team ended with a mark of eleven wins and three losses, to give them third place standing in the eight-team league. They won their last six games in a row.

Softball was actually a continuation of last winter's basketball activity among the same group of churches. The athletic program was organized last winter in the branch by Jimmy Myers and Herb Tourville. The congregation provided uniforms for the team. Basketball practice is soon to begin in preparation for the new season.

Throughout the summer the body of the League has been kept together by a schedule of frequent social events in place of the regular Sunday night devotional meetings during July and August. The Leaguers have met, on an average of every two weeks, in addition to the special events already mentioned. Attendance has averaged between 15 and 25 for such activities as watermelon socials, swimming and bowling parties, wiener roasts, and picnics, usually accompanied by volleyball and badminton.

On Labor Day the church school picnic was held. A private picnic ground in St. Louis County provided a full day's romp, including all types of sports, for 214 branch members.—Reported by DON HUNSTEIN.

ST. CHARLES, MISSOURI.—Election of officers was held August 26. New officers are F. F. O'Bryan, pastor; Stewart Wight, assistant pastor; Lawrence Propst, church superintendent; Mrs. Omar Bloebaum, secretary and women's leader; Mrs. Francis Trask, treasurer; Mrs. B. G. Hunter, music director; Mrs. Otto Nienhueser, children's leader; Beanie Hunter, young people's leader and Florence Hollander, publicity agent.

Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Wight and their three children from Rock River, Wyoming, and Mr. and Mrs. Harvey Litzinger and son from Ferguson, Missouri, have moved to St. Charles.

On August 27 a basket dinner was held in the lower auditorium of the church. Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Carl from Illinois were guests of honor.

On September 3 Brother and Sister O'Bryan were guests of Mr. and Mrs. Wight. In the afternoon a priesthood meeting was held at the church. Sunday being Brother O'Bryan's birthday, the Saints honored him with a surprise birthday get-together. While he was attending the priesthood meeting, the ladies made everything ready at the home of Mr. and Mrs. L. Propst and when Brother O'Bryan came in everyone sang "Happy Birthday." Homemade cake and ice cream were served.

A Bible class was held every Wednesday morning for the children this summer. The class was conducted by Florence Hollander and Jane Purghan. Clara Nienhueser, the children's leader also conducted a program practice for the children following the Bible class. The children took part in three worship programs in the church school hour on Sunday mornings. These classes were well attended by children belonging to the church and also by nonmembers. The average attendance was eighteen. At the close of the classes a party was given.

Improvements are still being made on the church building. Plans are being made to paint the exterior of the church.—Reported by FLORENCE HOLLANDER.

MILL SPRING, MISSOURI.—The second week of June Elders W. A. Kuntz of Corridon, Missouri, and J. A. Phillipps of Kennett, Missouri, held a week series of meetings in the Mill Creek schoolhouse. As a result of this meeting, one has asked for baptism. The women of the church held an ice cream social August 12.

On September 10 the new pastor and officers were elected. Elder Kuntz was again elected to serve as pastor. Melvin Knight was elected as church school director, and Mrs. C. J. Nelson as adult teacher, secretary, and treasurer, and Mrs. L. G. Borders as children's teacher.

HERALD HOUSE

Independence, Missouri

Plans are being made now for another week of services to begin the latter part of September or the first part of October.—Reported by MRS. C. J. NELSON.

PARKER, SOUTH DAKOTA.—Elizabeth and Rebecca Murray were baptized on August 27 in the Vermillion River by Elder John Maas. Confirmation was held in the home of Elder C. R. Buller.—Reported by C. R. BULLER.

TAMPA, FLORIDA.—High Priest W. J. Breshears, president of the Gulf States District, held a series of meetings here from July 30 through August 4. Visual aids were used to supplement his sermons.

The meetings were well attended even though many members were away on vacations.

On September 3, five people were baptized: Eva May Thomas, Mary Joy Weiser, Vivian Tresham, Roger Tresham, and Kenneth Freeman. Eva May Thomas, seventy-six years old, was baptized by her son, Priest R. L. Aultman. Pastor A. J. Chevalier was assisted at the confirmation service by Elders H. P. Kelley of Orlando, Florida, and Ernest Knight of St. Petersburg, Florida, formerly of Akron, Ohio.—Reported by ROY McGAHAGIN.

MADISON, WISCONSIN.—Branch business meeting was held September 5. District President Frank Mussell presided over the meeting. These officers were elected: Fred Moore, pastor; Margaret Bender, secretary; Leah Miller, women's leader; Carl Wirth, treasurer and custodian; Eva Moore, church school director; Glenn Price, adult supervisor; Mabel Curry, young people's leader; Leda Colbert, primary supervisor and publicity agent; Lois Carpenter, music director; Celia Piper, librarian; Robert H. Brigham, Glenn Price and Leah Miller, auditing committee; Floyd Griswold, Leah Miller, and Albert Fuss, building committee.

Alice Moore and Evelyn Brigham will attend Graceland this year.—Reported by LEDA COLBERT.

EVERETT, WASHINGTON.—Elder David Taylor of Chariton, Iowa, preached on August 20 and 27. Elder Taylor and his wife and Brother Andy Goode from Independence, Missouri, attended the Silver Lake Reunion and have remained to assist the Everett Saints at the Evergreen State Fair.

The results of the annual branch election held August 21 are as follows: Elder Elliott Gilberts, branch president; Carl F. Oliver, counselor; Luella Foster, church director; Fern Gage, music director; Agnes Johnson, women's leader and adult leader; Merle Foster, young people's supervisor; Nedra Inslee, children's supervisor; Ben Pilbeam, treasurer and custodian; Helen Skoor, book steward; Pete and Emma Johnson, flower committee; Harold Johnson, bishop's agent; Leona Utt, auditor; Helen Gilberts, clerk, reporter, and historian, and Winston Inslee, attendance chairman.

After the business meeting, the group enjoyed refreshments in the lower auditorium—whole wheat bread which Brother and Sister Bert Brooks of Lamoni sent for this special occasion.—Reported by HELEN GILBERTS.

EASTERN MICHIGAN DISTRICT.—The reunion of the Eastern Michigan District held at Cash reunion grounds, August 12 to 20, had an increased attendance in all services over last year. Approximately seven hundred were in attendance on the Sundays with 234 campers throughout the week.

Apostle C. G. Mesley and Sister Blanche Mesley taught classes that were well attended. R. Melvin Russell, district president of the Flint-Port Huron District, was in charge of the morning prayer services. John Blackstock, district president of Central Michigan District, preached at the evening services. Other classes were led by James C. Phillips appointee to Southern Michigan District and J. V. Pement, district president of Eastern Michigan District. Lillian Dunlap with her assistants looked after the junior church school sessions. John Rogers, district church school director, was in charge of handcraft.

The recently installed loud speaker system on the grounds made it possible for the kitchen and dining room staff to enjoy all the morning devotion services by J. V. Pement.

The reunion music and choir under the leadership of Sister Jean Decker added inspiration to the worship of the reunion. Others who assisted with solos, etc., were Jean Smith, Harold Decker, Mrs. O. J. Campbell, Mrs. W. Campbell, Mrs. Frank Sheufelt, Clayton Gimmell, Mr. and Mrs. Murray DeFrame, Mr. and Mrs. Chevalier of Tampa, Florida. Mrs. Frances Wellman was reunion pianist.

Camp activities included a women's reception, swimming party, hay ride for the young people and one for the children. There were campfires. Kodachrome moving pictures were shown by Apostle Mesley. Graceland College night was conducted by Dr. Roy Cheville and Ray Zinser.

The Friday morning worship service commenced with the ordination of O. J. Campbell to the offices of elder and district bishop's agent.

A baptismal service was held on the last Sunday afternoon in the Cash church, when four people united with the church.—Reported by ISABEL PHILLIPS.

GENOA, NEVADA.—The scattered Saints of Genoa, Carson City, Reno, Dayton, and Yarrington met at Genoa for an all-day meeting on August 27. Brothers John and W. H. Dawson from Sacramento, California, presided at the Communion service and at the preaching service. A potluck lunch was served at the A. R. Trimmer residence. All Saints living in any of the above-named places should contact Brother Trimmer at his home in Genoa.—Reported by ANNIE I. TRIMMER.

VANCOUVER, WASHINGTON.—The branch was well represented in the Silver Lake reunion, especially among the Zion's League age group from which there were eighteen young people. Following the reunion, Seventy Arthur F. Gibbs was in Vancouver for two evenings demonstrating missionary methods and using the new materials provided by the General Church and others prepared by him. A church school attendance campaign has been launched with Shirley Browning as chairman.

Six new members, recently baptized, are: Nellie Moreland, Dean Moreland, Betty Almer, Shirley Browning, Raymond Chapman, and George Vargo. Missionary Elwin Vest has done good work in his missionary endeavors here.

District President J. L. Verhei was in Vancouver, September 6, for the branch election of officers. New officers include Elder Roy D. Keiser as pastor; Ruby Fishel, church school director; and Wanda Fishel, music and drama director.

The Zion's League has been active with a high percentage of nonmembers in regular attendance. The young people presented a radio revue talent show with a cast of about twenty, in Vancouver, Camas, Longview, Sherwood, Forest Grove, and three branches in Portland. Also, they gave performances at the Barnes Veterans hospital and the Pythian Home for Aged, in Vancouver. Chuck Taylor, League Supervisor, and Bob Taylor, president, were in charge of the radio show. The girls of the League formed a softball team with Dorothy Moreland as their captain and played in the city church league. The final game was with the Presbyterian girls, with our church team winning the championship and receiving a trophy cup with the name of the church engraved upon it.—Reported by RUBY FISHEL.

The Pastor's Handbook 1950-1951

The theme for this year is "Make Disciples for Christ." The General Church has sent one copy of this handbook to each pastor. We have a small supply on hand to offer for sale to assistant pastors and those members of the priesthood to whom this manual will be helpful.

The Delicate Art of Proselyting

By NAOMI RUSSELL

Religion cannot be tucked in a basket and peddled from door to door like brushes or vegetables.

RECENTLY an attractive girl with a folder of art samples walked into the office and asked if we would be interested in seeing the type of illustrating she did. We looked at her sketches, told her we would be glad to put her name and address on our list, and said that we might call on her later. After she left, I asked the usual, "Anyone know if she belongs to the church?"—This because we prefer giving as much work as possible to our own members. One of the other Herald employees answered: "She doesn't belong, but she might have joined if her neighbor hadn't tried so hard to convert her. Both she and her mother came to our church for a while, but when the woman next door started putting the pressure on them, they got disgusted and quit coming." Missionary spirit is a fine thing when it comes mixed with equal portions of common sense and tact; uncontrolled it can lead to sad results.

Religion cannot be tucked in a basket and peddled from door to door like brushes or vegetables; yet well-meaning but unwise enthusiasts rush in where the best of salesmen fear to tread and try to sell the gospel. Armed with the Three Books and a look of determination, they spread their wares before an unwilling public expecting to win converts. Occasionally it works, but more often it creates a barrier between the potential converts and the church that is not easily torn down.

First of all a person must be tantalized into wanting to hear the gospel story. His curiosity must be built up so that he will ask questions. When he really wants to know the facts, he will listen eagerly to one who can supply the answers.

I once heard of an Italian chef who concocted a very special salad dressing. He put just enough garlic and just enough spice in it to give it an irresistible tang—but he always used it sparingly. When a guest asked him why he wasn't more generous with it, he said, "Would spoila da salad. Thees-a-way my customers eat ev'ry leaf and go 'way wanting more. I putta too much on, they get tired of eet. I like theem to leave with appetites steel begging a leettle—then they keep coming back."

Like salad dressing, religion often finds its best patrons when served in small quantities. Spread thinly over a number of conversations, it may create a growing appetite for more; indiscriminately used it may sicken.

INDUCING PANGS OF HUNGER for the Restoration Message is not easy. You may have illusions that all the world is starving for what this church has to offer, but in most cases people are quite contented with their present religious fare. Those who need it most may be entirely unavailable as far as personal contact goes, while those near at hand may feel you are meddling if you talk to them of a better brand of religion. The job of selling the Methodist family next door, or Uncle John's Episcopalian wife, or the Baptist clerk who works in the corner grocery is no simple project. It will take a lot of Tom Sawyer psychology to make them want to leave their own pleasant Sunday worshiping to help you with the exacting task of transforming a complacent society into kingdom of God material. And you can't scare intelligent people into conversion—you wouldn't want to. Cowards are a liability to any organization. You have to make the job look so challenging, so desirable that your friends who stop to watch you will gladly sacrifice their apples and jackknives for a chance at the white-wash brush. The call to crusade must make them want to bring their best and offer it willingly. This may result in fewer baptisms, but it will also result in fewer disinterested members later on. Numerical strength counts for little unless it is backed up by quality.

A "MUST" in selling the church is honesty. Because the Restoration has a number of unique features many other religions do not have, you may be tempted to overadvertise. If you find that your intended convert is particularly interested in the Latter Day Saint philosophy of Zion, tell him of its good points but point out the fact that building the kingdom is a long, painstaking process. If he is led to believe that it is a kind of Utopia which may descend at any time upon the faithful, he will be disillusioned after a few years of membership and may decide the whole thing is a hoax.

The same goes for administration. Those who hear it presented as a divine cure-all are going to expect immediate results each time the ordinance is performed. Another point that is easily played up out of proportion to other facets of the gospel is "the gifts." It is an injustice to so build up a person's anticipation of the miraculous that he expects a prophecy at every prayer service. All of these extraordinary aspects arouse interest, but like seasoning they should be used with discretion. Overplaying them cannot change the basic product any more than overpeppering can change the basic flavor of an egg.

Blessings on the self-appointed missionary who studies well his projects before he begins proselyting. He will make them his friends before he tries to make members of them. He will arouse their curiosity, then answer their questions, rather than forcing them to listen to his message. He will interest them in the church by his own high standards, and they will enter it with the idea of giving as well as getting. He will not sell them short by allowing them to believe the church is more than he actually knows it to be. He will be as conscientious in his salesmanship as if he had to report personally to God on his efforts.

Lingering Adolescence

By Maude D. Anderson

A WELL-KNOWN AUTHOR once said that the American people are adolescent—that they refuse to grow up. One thing cited was the ever-increasing divorce rate.

Perhaps we should analyze what is meant by the term "adolescent." It is that time when children are entering adult life and their characteristics are very different from either the adult's or the small child's. They are emotional, sulky, hot tempered, and selfish. They are constantly seeking the stimulus of entertainment; they want everything without thought of giving value received to other members of the family.

If we were to listen to the average divorce trial, we would find that these characteristics form the basis for the major portion of the accusations which are usually summed up as "mental cruelty." We may well view with alarm the ever-present divorce evil with all of the misery and unhappiness it causes, not only for those who are responsible but also for the innocent children who are its victims.

Still another evidence of this adolescent attitude is the constant demand that people make for the government to hand out favors without their giving anything in return. An adult can realize that for everything which is good or worth while, he must be willing to pay a price. Were our forefathers able to establish this democracy without paying for it?

THE ADOLESCENT does not attain adult thinking by having someone do his thinking for him or by having someone continually telling him what to do or how it should be done. A famous educator once said, "Let a child do as he pleases as long as he pleases to do right," then added, "It is the responsibility of the parents and teachers to see that he chooses to do right." All too many parents follow the first suggestions but will not take the trouble to follow the latter part. It requires a great deal more effort and patience to guide a child into the right way of thinking than to merely say, "Do thus and so, or else . . ." Commands may suffice to keep a child in line as long as the adult is there to see that his commands are carried out, but there comes a time in every child's life when he must choose for himself. If he has learned to stand on his own feet and choose the right course because he has that desire, there will be nothing to fear when he is out from under parental jurisdiction.

THERE WAS NEVER A TIME when the young person who wished to make a contribution to society had more opportunity than today. Our schools need more instructors whose one great purpose in life is to help the young to appreciate the best that a democracy has to offer. Children need to be encouraged to do work willingly and cheerfully, for it is only that kind of work that adds to the happiness of the individual. Men like Edison did not succeed because they were driven to their tasks.

Leaders are beginning to realize that if we are to survive in this age of the atom bomb, people must become sensitive to the needs of their fellow men. It can no longer be an individualistic world where each is thinking only of himself and his own pleasure, but a world where everyone is concerned about the welfare of his neighbor—where each has an opportunity to work and is inspired with a will to work with a knowledge that he will receive a just compensation for his efforts.

sired to show us as much as possible while he was still in Hawaii.

At noon on June 23 the elders met with us at a restaurant where we ate Chinese food with chopsticks—quite a venture at first, the risk being one might not get enough to eat, or might commit a faux pas and get food in his lap.

A surf ride in an "outrigger" was ordered for the afternoon. I pleaded necessity to write and stayed in the club house. The canoe was a large one and was in charge of Searjant Kahanamoku, a brother of the Duke. He is a handsome, stalwart, typical Hawaiian. During the trip, a wave knocked Brother Siegfried into the briny. As he could not swim, Kahanamoku speedily got hold of him. Soon all were back in the canoe. Again they braved the breaker, and this time it was a great success.

We had dinner at the Mission House, the guests of the Millers and Crownovers.

On Saturday (June 24) we drove up the shore to Kailua where we breakfasted with Sister Madden and her husband, and that evening the great luau was held in the mission yard under a canopy erected for the Waller Memorial meeting scheduled for the next day.

A pit had been dug, round volcanic stones made red hot, two pigs prepared, and early in the afternoon the cooking or roasting was under way. By evening the pigs were "done to a turn," other food in abundance provided, and more than two hundred partook of the feast; the many dishes included of course, poi (made from the taro root). I found poi very palatable. It is supposed to be eaten by gathering it on the index finger and—but I ate mine with a spoon.

After the feast a program of some length was given, with more leis for us, and speeches.

At this luau the Saints were honored by the presence of Mrs. John H. Wilson, wife of the Mayor of Honolulu, who seemed to enjoy the occasion, and who made a short address in Hawaiian. She is a most gracious lady, and there is a very interesting and romantic story about her, Mr. Wilson, and America that I wish to get ready for the Herald when time permits.

* * * * *

Three days out from Apia, Samoa, and now we are told a plane will come soon by which we may get to Suva or Nandi airport. We are still hopeful.

Last evening the radio operator brought us the following radiogram:

Everyone sad because of your departure. Thanks for coming. May the Lord bless you on your journey. Best wishes to your families and to the church. Mervin Family.

It was indeed thoughtful of Brother Mervin and his excellent family to remember us in this way.

* * * * *

Getting back again to Honolulu— at 2 p. m. on Saturday (June 24) the district conference was held in Makiiki church. I was selected to preside and appointed Elder Crownover as my assistant. The business of the district was carried through with unanimity and dispatch, and everybody seemed pleased to accept the changes proposed by the general church.

Since Elder Miller was being relieved, I placed before the conference Elder Crownover for president, and on behalf of the Presiding Bishopric I named him as bishop's agent. The conference approved unanimously.

At this conference Henry Inouye was called and approved for ordination to the office of priest.

Sunday (June 25) was an eventful day: prayer service from 8:45 to 10:15, followed by a preaching service when I occupied.

Then came the Waller Memorial meeting in the outdoor tabernacle.

Elder Miller was in charge. A varied program followed and speeches were made. Mayor John H. Wilson spoke in glowing terms about Brother Waller and his excellent reputation. Brother Siegfried and I spoke.

In the afternoon, a special ordination service was held with Elder Crownover in charge, he being the new district president. Elder Miller was ordained to the office of bishop by myself and Bishop Siegfried; Prescott A. Foo to the office of high priest; Paul Miyamoto to the office of elder; Charles Kramer to the office of priest; Kogoro Sakima to the office of deacon, and Charles A. Lee to the office of evangelist by myself and Elder Crownover. Here were four races represented: Hawaiian, Chinese, Japanese, and English.

Brother Lee is the first of his race to be ordained a patriarch. He has served as an elder for some years, has excellent standing among all the members and with those not of the church. We are assured he will give a much-needed ministry. I gave him such counsel as I believed would be helpful to him.

WEDDINGS

Henson-Crowell

Priscilla Marilyn Crowell, daughter of Mr. Donald Crowell of West Haven, Connecticut, and Floyd Eugene Henson of Flora, Illinois, were married at the tabernacle on the reunion grounds at Onset, Massachusetts, on Saturday, September 2. District President Almer W. Sheehy officiated. Both Mr. and Mrs. Henson attended Graceland last year and were active in student affairs. They will reside in Decatur, Illinois, while he is attending pharmacy college.

Montgomery-Skelton

Josephine Adele Skelton, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Skelton of London, Ontario, and Vern Dressler Montgomery, son of Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Montgomery of Fairland, Oklahoma, were married September 2 at Englewood Church in Independence, Missouri, by Evangelist Ray Whiting. They are making their home in Lawrence, Kansas, where Mr. Montgomery is attending the University of Kansas. Both are graduates of Graceland College, and Mrs. Montgomery is a graduate of the University of Kansas ('49).

Oelklaus-Treadway

Lovie Treadway, daughter of Mrs. Marie Treadway of St. Charles, Missouri, and Walter August Oelklaus, son of Mr. and Mrs. Walter George Oelklaus, also of St. Charles, were married August 27 at the Reorganized Church in St. Louis, Missouri. Pastor Frank McDonald performed the double-ring service. They are making their home in St. Charles.

Hale-Brown

Charlene Carolyn Brown, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Brown of Eunice, New Mexico, and Leslie William Hale, Jr., son of Mr. and Mrs. L. W. Hale of Council Bluffs, Iowa, were married at the Reorganized Church in Tulsa, Oklahoma, on August 5. Elder O. J. Stephens and Priest Conrad Faulks officiated at the double-ring ceremony. They are making their home in Lamoni, Iowa, where the groom is a sophomore at Graceland College. The bride is a graduate of Graceland.

BIRTHS

A son, Thomas Guy, was born on May 14 to Dr. and Mrs. Wallace G. Van Eaton of Sedalia, Missouri. He was blessed on August 13 by Elder Roe B. Vincent. Dr. Van Eaton is a graduate of Graceland and the Texas Chiropractic College.

A son, Richard Lee, was born on August 10 at the Independence Sanitarium, to Mr. and Mrs. C. G. Taylor of Richland, Washington. Mrs. Taylor, the former Betty Seaver, is a graduate of the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital School of Nursing.

Mr. and Mrs. Albert Seidel of Tucson, Arizona, announce the birth of a son, Dennis Albert, born July 18.

A son, Troy Kent, was born on July 4 to Mr. and Mrs. Kent Woods of Tucson, Arizona.

A daughter, Deborah Deane, was born on July 20 to Mr. and Mrs. James Simpson of Tucson, Arizona.

DEATHS

HEDRICK.—Emma, daughter of Josiah D. and Elizabeth Wilson Price, was born March 31, 1877, near Fanning, Kansas, and died August 3, 1950, at her home in Atchison, Kansas. On October 21, 1896, she was married to Frank G. Hedrick—the first couple to be married in the Reorganized Church in Fanning. She was baptized a member at the age of eight. A life-long worker in the church, she served fifteen years as district and local women's leader and ten years as district secretary, as well as helping her husband.

Besides her husband she leaves a son, Gilbert F. Hedrick; three sisters: Mrs. Margaret Dittmore of Atchison; Mrs. Etta Graves of San Francisco, California; and Miss Daisy Price of Troy, Kansas; three grandchildren and two great-grandchildren. Evangelist Orman Salisbury conducted the funeral service in the same church where she was married. Burial was in the Fanning cemetery.

BOOKER.—Audie Mae, was born November 26, 1905, at McKenzie, Alabama, and died August 11, 1950, at her home in Georgiana, Alabama. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church on August 6, 1922 and on October 6, 1928, was married to William H. Booker, who survives her.

Besides her husband she leaves one son, Alvin Booker of the United States Army; a daughter, Inez Booker, who is making her home with relatives in East Brewton, Alabama; her parents, Mr. and Mrs. S. J. Wiggins of McKenzie; three sisters: Mrs. Alma Lanton of Andalusia, Alabama; Mrs. Paul Booker of McKenzie; and Mrs. W. C. Martin of East Brewton; six brothers: Howard of McKenzie; Emory of Mobile, Alabama; Elton of Birmingham, Alabama; Dewitt of East Brewton; Mack and Wesley of the Army. Funeral services were conducted at the Reorganized Church in McKenzie by Elders W. H. Drake and Rogene Odom. Burial was in Pleasant Hill Cemetery.

BREWSTER.—Mary S., was born July 20, 1866, at Shenandoah, Iowa, and died August 13, 1950. She joined the Reorganized Church when she was sixteen and remained faithful throughout her life. In "Memoirs of Joseph Smith" she was referred to as "one of the pillars of the church." In 1888 she was married to Thomas Brewster; five children were born to them. Mr. Brewster preceded her in death.

Surviving are two daughters: Lucretia Schneithorst of Independence, Missouri, and Manilla Hewitt of Detroit, Michigan; and two sons: William Brewster of Independence, and Robert Brewster of Pleasant Hill, Missouri. Funeral services were held in Detroit, Elders James Pycock and Blair McClain officiating, and at Kirtland Temple, Elder Elbert Winters officiating. Burial was in the Kirtland cemetery.

CLARK.—Bessie Rosella, was born March 21, 1874, in Ottumwa, Iowa, and died August 25, 1950, at Escambia Hospital in Brewton, Alabama. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church in 1893, and on April 3, 1895, she was married to C. J. Clark, a telegraph operator in Keokuk, Iowa. They traveled extensively in the Northwest and Southeast, starting church meetings at Memphis, Tennessee, and Helena, Montana. Most of their work, however, was in the Florida and Alabama Districts. A musician, Sister Clark taught many to play, always encouraging her pupils to use their talents for the good of the church.

Patriarch A. D. McCall conducted the funeral. Burial was in the Coldwater, Florida, cemetery.

 WEATHER

At last—at long, long last—Home Town has weather fit to brag about. The long rainy spell is over, with its overcast drawn across the sky. The welkin is a cerulean blue, with small fleecy clouds, white as whipped cream, floating around like little ships on the bay. Golden sunshine filters down through the cool fall air, warming it to just the right temperature. Come home, all you wandering vacationers, leave behind you the hurricanes of Florida, the smogs of Frisco and the drizzles of Hollywood. The weather is perfect here in Missouri.

 MILK AND HONEY

You have often read how the ancient writers spoke of Palestine as a "land flowing with milk and honey." Why did they always use those two things together? There must have been a reason. Probably they made something good out of it.

Perhaps they had trouble getting children to drink their milk, just as we do now. They didn't have the popular chocolate syrup to mix with it to give it flavor, but they did have honey.

And so you can try it today. For a delicious beverage put some honey into a glass of cold milk. Mix it vigorously until they are thoroughly blended. Then sip and enjoy! The ancients really had something.

 ADVICE

Our own Fred Allen of Stone Church congregation told this story on the bus one day. It was in the rush hour, and he was riding with a wild driver. The standees were clinging desperately to pipes, handholds, and seat-corners, and everybody was being tossed about. Fred had both hands on the rail above his head—the bus made a great lurch and his feet swung free. Just as he was coming to rest again, he looked up and saw a Unity sign that said, "RELAX—LET GO!"

 TRY KINDNESS

Our shop people have a bit of fun in the rest period. Keith, who has a droll sense of humor, is sometimes a tease. Yesterday he shared a treat with a fellow worker, who said, "He's turning over a new leaf. He's going to be generous—for two weeks. If it doesn't work, it's all off!" Keith grinned. "I just thought I'd try it."

There's an idea that could become big stuff. Suppose everybody would be kind to everybody else for just two weeks? It could begin a revolution that would turn the old hell-on-earth into heaven. We could quit arguing about Zion and have it.

Think of it on a world-wide basis. The Russians could quit trying to wreck the other nations. The North Koreans could go home and mind their own business. Our boys could come back, get jobs, marry and be happy ever after. Americans could win friends and influence people by ceasing to brag about themselves, and appreciate other folks. It's a great idea. Do you think we would do it?

 A THOUGHT FOR TODAY

Give a smile and a kind word to the friend you meet today. For all you know, it may be the last time you will meet on this earth. Tomorrow may find one in eternity, and it could be you.

"My Church"

IN THE "HERALD" OF AUGUST 28, 1950, page 21, Doris Turley used an expression in her article in regard to attending Graceland College. She wrote: "I think of it now as just another important step to increase my capacity to render service to my church and further my preparation, for that will mean the achievement of that final goal." I wish all the rising generation of young people would get in the habit of saying, "my church."

One time there was an employee of the Eastman Kodak Company who had a complaint to make to Mr. Eastman in person. He stated that the head of the department where he was employed constantly used the expression "my department." To some of the employees that was offensive, particularly because he acted as if he owned the department. Mr. Eastman asked, "You say he acts as if he owns the department?" And the young fellow answered, "Yes, sir."

Mr. Eastman had a thorough study made of the department in question. The report stated it was the cleanest, the most efficiently operated, and the most profitable department in the whole Eastman organization. Mr. Eastman sent out a very terse order to every head of a department, as follows, "HEREAFTER YOU WILL RUN YOUR DEPARTMENT AS IF YOU OWNED IT."

Referring to "departments," the late President F. M. Smith said one time that a good department head believed his department was the most important in the organization.

Dear young people of the church, get in the habit of saying, "my church."

Introducing...

ADDIE SPAULDING STOWELL, Independence, Missouri (page 18), was born in Worthington, Minnesota. She was baptized near Bottineau, North Dakota, where she was also graduated from high school. Following high school she took special courses by correspondence. In 1903 she married Joseph E. Stowell. They have one daughter and five sons: Grace, Grant, Joseph, Charles, George, and Wayne. All are married. Sister Stowell has made writing both a hobby and contribution to the church. Her articles have appeared in Zion's Hope (her first being published when she was twelve years old), Stepping Stones, and Saints' Herald. She was a teacher by profession before her marriage. Later in life she learned the tailor trade, and from 1942 to 1947 she had her own shop in St. Louis.

MILDRED REED DORSEY, Leavenworth, Kansas (page 11), was born in Mercer County, Missouri, and baptized in Pleasanton, Iowa. She was graduated from the Leon, Iowa, High School in 1931. In 1934 she married Linly I. Dorsey. They have two children, Paul, 11, and Anne, 9. Sister Dorsey's special interests are home, family, and writing. She is a junior church school teacher and treasurer in the women's department.

News & Notes

NEW HONOR TO OUR PRESIDENT

President Israel A. Smith was elected the new president of the Missouri Constitutional Convention Association, September 22, at the fifth annual meeting of the state-wide delegates who framed the new state constitution. The Association is composed of men who were delegates to the convention which wrote the constitution under which Missouri is now operating.

JOINT COUNCIL

On September 19 the last session of the Joint Council was held in the Auditorium. The opening meeting was held on September 5. Some men found it necessary to leave for their fields before the session was completed. Others are leaving during the last two weeks in September.

Because President Israel A. Smith arrived home on September 11, he was able to attend most of the meetings.

All Apostles, except D. Blair Jensen and Roscoe E. Davey, were present.

PRESIDENT WALLACE SMITH

The first general church service of Graceland College was held in the Memorial Center on the morning of September 17. President Wallace Smith, who was the guest speaker for the occasion, spoke on the subject, "The Church and the College."

BROTHER SHEEHY

After three weeks of tests and observations at the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital, Elder John Sheehy has returned to his home in Independence. Brother Sheehy has been advised that he may return to his ministry but that he may not take too active a part.

AUDITORIUM NOTES

Ninety-five per cent of the copper for the dome has been delivered to the contractor in Kansas City. During the last week of September, a crew of metal workers will begin work on the dome.

Work is in process for the remodeling of the dining room and offices. The mimeograph, shipping, women's department, and historian's offices have been moved to temporary locations in the Auditorium.

Before the beginning of October, Independence Stake offices will be moved into Bartholomew Hall.

GIRL'S WORK IN ZION

Officers for the coming year have been appointed and elected for the Skylark Leaders' Band and the Oriole Monitors' Workshop.

Oriole officers are Lucille White, president; Pearl Wilcox, vice-president; Beth Wyckoff, secretary; Pauline Teague, treasurer; and Mildred Seig, publicity.

Skylark officers are Emma M. Phillips, president; Thelma Kester, vice-president; Esther Smith, secretary; and Pearl Carlile, treasurer. The Skylark organization was formerly known as the Blue Bird organization.

Both the Skylark and the Oriole organizations hold regular monthly meetings of leaders and monitors in Independence and vicinity.

COVER GIRL

The September issue of the "Missouri Nurse" magazine had on its cover a picture called "Scrubbing Up." The nurse in the picture is Ramona Lew, a graduate of Independence Sanitarium and Hospital.

He Knows What Is in the Darkness

DANIEL HAS A MESSAGE for us today. Consider, for example, the story of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego. It has always seemed to me that the real point of this story is not in the miraculous deliverance of these three from the fiery furnace, astonishing though this was, but rather in the matched insight and courage they displayed in their preliminary examination before Nebuchadnezzar. Everyone knows about their deliverance from the fiery furnace. More of us need to know what they told the totalitarian tyrant of their day before they were cast into the furnace. Here it is:

Now if ye be ready that at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, and all kinds of music, ye fall down and worship the image which I have made; well: but if ye worship not, ye shall be cast the same hour into the midst of a burning fiery furnace; and who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands?

Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego answered and said to the king, O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter. If it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and he will deliver us out of thine hand, O king. But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up.—Daniel 3: 15-18.

Even today there is one thing worse than the fiery furnace. It is to worship false gods—to surrender to the lower standards of heathens in high places.

ALL THIS is but preliminary to sharing an experience of a few hours ago. I awoke early, long before dawn, and lay in the darkness thinking about the heavy burdens being carried by the leaders of our country and praying for them. Without any conscious attempt to find comfort, and with no particular awareness of divine direction, I found myself repeating the words: "He knoweth what is in the darkness, and the light dwelleth with him." Still unable to sleep, I put on the light and reached for my Bible and found the passage to which these words belong. It is part of the story of the unreasonable demand of Nebuchadnezzar that Daniel or his associates should reveal the king's forgotten dream and its interpretation or be put to death. Daniel and his companions asked the "mercies of the God of heaven concerning this secret." Then the records continue:

Then was the secret revealed unto Daniel in a night vision. Then Daniel blessed the God of heaven.

Daniel answered and said, Blessed be the name of God forever and ever; for wisdom and might are his; and he changeth the times and the seasons; he removeth kings, and setteth up kings; he giveth wisdom unto the wise, and knowledge to them that know understanding; he revealeth the deep and secret things; he knoweth what is in the darkness, and the light dwelleth with him.—Daniel 2: 19-22.

I closed my Bible and began to get ready for the day's work, feeling deeply reassured. In such a time as this, every one of us is under special obligation to play his full part in the common endeavor toward the Light. Specifically, we must not be afraid of the dark. In the long run the issues of time and eternity are not in our hands. Most certainly they are not in the hands of wicked men. They are in the hands of God. And one of the heartening things about our Heavenly Father is that "he knows what is in the darkness, and the light dwelleth with him." It is just because God does understand what is in the darkness that the late Dr. Rufus M. Jones could write: "These dark epochs have, strangely enough, almost invariably been seed epochs for a new day. It is not ease and security which produce the supreme treasures of the race. They come out of travail and agony."*

Let God Work in You

IT IS A LONG TIME since this story was published, and some of the details have been forgotten. It went something like this:

A ship, carrying a valuable cargo, was sunk under mysterious circumstances in the channel leading from a great harbor to the open sea. There it represented not only a loss, but it was also a hazard in the shallow water to all the other ships that had to pass that way. It was necessary to lift the ship and get it out of the way.

Marine engineers were engaged. Crews and heavy equipment were brought in. Cables were put under the sunken vessel. The most powerful hoisting equipment that could be mounted on ships was brought.

Engines labored. Winches groaned. Cables strained. But the ship remained fast in the mud. It could not be moved that way.

Then one of the engineers had an idea. He brought out a pair of the largest flat-bottomed barges he could find. He placed them side by side, and put some very heavy I-beams across them. To these he attached the cables that went under the sunken ship. When the tide was low, he tightened the cables. Then he waited for the tide to come in.

The rising water lifted the barges. The cables tightened like the strings of a violin. There were some tense minutes as the barges settled down.

Across the Desk

The following paragraph from the September 6 issue of Christian Century should be of interest to many Herald readers.

NO THEOLOGICAL DEVIATIONISM, SAYS PAPAL ENCYCLICAL

Moscow is not the only infallible source of dogma which does not intend to permit any deviationism within the ranks of the faithful. On August 22, Pope Pius XII issued an encyclical, which will be known as Humani Generis, that went into great detail as to what is and what is not permitted a Roman Catholic engaged in theological or philosophical speculation, biblical study or scientific research. The document will be discussed both within and without the papal church for years. In a sentence, it may be summarized as saying that the pope's word must be accepted on matters of doctrine, since, as he quotes, "He that heareth you [the pope], heareth me [Christ]"; but in other matters Catholic scholars are permitted a certain latitude "provided that all are prepared to submit to the judgment of the church." Newspaper reports from Rome speculate that this encyclical was issued at this time to squelch rumblings against the new dogma of the Assumption of the Virgin. Although a Vatican spokesman brushed off the remonstrances of the archbishops of Canterbury and York against promulgation of the dogma with the true observation that what the Anglicans are really against is the dogma of papal infallibility, there are rumors that all is not calm inside the Church of Rome itself. Some Catholic theologians in Holland, Belgium, Germany, and France are said to be dubious about the new dogma. Ever since the Jesuits established their pre-eminence at the 1870 council, which proclaimed papal infallibility, some members of other orders have been restive. Now the pope has sharply admonished any who might be considering reserving their unequivocal acceptance of the new dogma. And incidentally, he has taken the opportunity in the same document to put an end to any nonsense about the authority of papal declarations on doctrinal matters in encyclicals. "If," he says, "the supreme pontiffs in their official documents purposely pass judgment on a matter up to that time under dispute, it is obvious that the matter, according to the mind and will of the same pontiffs, cannot be any longer considered a question open to discussion among theologians."—Used by permission The Christian Century Foundation.

"The Legacy of Mormon"

UNDER THIS TITLE a Lake Charles, Louisiana, magazine, The Southwest News, carries a discussion of the history of Utah Mormonism. The author's most revealing statement is the opening paragraph:

Perhaps the most misunderstood religious group on the American continent today is the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints or as they are commonly known, the "Mormons."

The staff writer is not to be blamed that his slant is entirely from the Utah point of view as the subject matter treated has all the earmarks of the Mormon Publicity Bureau literature. Herein lies an unsuspected source of common misunderstanding for many who would know more about the legacy of Mormon.

To make this clearer, we quote: "Church records show that not more than 3 per cent of the men entered into the difficult human relationship imposed by polygamy, anyway." No documentary source is given for this interesting bit of church statistics. The same might be said for next to the last paragraph in the article.

An interesting belief of Latter-day Saints is "celestial marriage," a ceremony performed only in the temple, which has the effect of binding the couples not only until death but for eternity.

Herald readers may be interested in the following letter by President Israel A. Smith to the writer of the article:

Dear Mr. Fogleman:

A copy of The Southwest of August 21 last reaches my desk, and I have read your article on "The Legacy of Mormon."

Permit me to congratulate you on your objective and fair treatment. You apparently were pretty well advised when you wrote.

It ought to be of interest to you to learn there is another Latter Day Saint church organization that was formed by and among original members who denied Brigham Young's leadership and denounced the introduction of polygamy and some other doctrines which they alleged were heresies from the original faith. These claims have been and are easily established.

For your own information, I send you a pamphlet on the differences which I trust, if you are at all interested, will be of assistance.

We do not have the numbers or the material wealth—which of course are no criteria of spiritual values; but we are enjoying substantial growth and believe we are the only group of believers who represent Latter Day Saintism as established by Joseph Smith and associates in 1830.

Very truly yours,
Israel A. Smith.

Success

He has achieved success who has lived well, laughed often and loved much; who has gained the respect of intelligent men and the love of little children; who has filled his niche and accomplished his task; who has left the world better than he found it, whether by an improved poppy, a perfect poem or a rescued soul; who has never lacked appreciation of earth's beauty or failed to express it; who has always looked for the best in others and given the best he had; whose life has been an inspiration; whose memory was a benediction.

Be Strong in the Lord

A Sermon by LEONARD LEA

(From a wire recording by L. E. Fordham.)

Be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might.—Ephesians 6:10.

WE HAVE BEEN HAVING a number of baptisms at our church, not only what we might call the “natural increase”—children and young people and folks moving in—but also some adult conversions which have caused our hearts to rejoice in the spread of the gospel. I should like to tell you about one particular case that has been especially interesting.

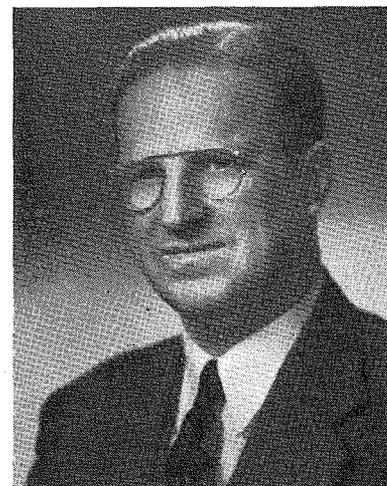

A young man and his wife have been attending a denominational church but felt that somehow they were missing something that Christ’s gospel had intended for them. In reading the Scriptures the young man came across the various references to the mode of baptism and had observed that in Bible times people were baptized by immersion in water. He thought that the baptism he had received upon his induction into his church was not sufficient to satisfy the demands of his faith, so he went to his pastor and discussed it with him. His pastor said, “Well, that’s been changed, we don’t immerse people any more. We have a more convenient method.” “Yes,” said the young man, “but I want to be baptized in the scriptural way—by immersion.” His pastor was apparently not too keen about the idea because his church had no font where he could baptize the young man; in fact there wasn’t one in all of the churches of his faith. They had to go to a church of another denomination to baptize the young man.

Afterwards he told some of our people, “I didn’t feel a bit different after I came up out of the water than when I went down into it. I was still unsatisfied.”

One of his neighbors happened to be a member of the Reorganized

Church, and as they were talking they got around to matters of faith and religion. This brother is not what you would call the aggressive type, and yet when the opportunity to tell the gospel story came to him, he knew enough about it to be able to tell it to this man; and he told it in a way that touched the hearts of both the young man and his wife. He called in another one of our young members, and they conducted a series of cottage meetings. The man and woman were converted and gave their names for baptism. Some weeks later in our church we had a baptismal service on Sunday afternoon, and the Spirit of God was there in abundant power. It must have been in answer to the prayer of those people that they would have the witness of God’s approval of what they were doing, because during the rest of that service of prayer and testimony there were tears in their eyes and they were visibly affected. On the following Wednesday at one of our group meetings we had the confirmation service, and again the Holy Spirit was present in abundant power, and we all rejoiced.

THIS BRINGS ME to my theme. It’s wonderful that there was a young man and his wife seeking God who had the strength of character to recognize what the demands of the gospel were as outlined in the Bible, and to look for it and not to cease looking until they found it. We are thankful too that they have as neighbors people who have sufficient strength of character to tell the story and not be reticent nor afraid, to bear witness and to give their testimony of what the gospel of Christ has done for them. This experience is just one that brings a great reward to those who try to continue in the labor for the Lord and build up the church of this latter day.

We are admonished in the Scripture text which I read a few moments ago, “Be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might.” I should like to make the general proposition that strong men and women have always been needed to do God’s work. People who are afraid, timid, weak, or unwilling to make the adventure and to do what they know is right, have not been able to serve God—no, not in a million years. It has been the strong souls, the courageous ones, who have served God even when danger and opposition were involved.

We think of how strong Moses had to be to lead the unwilling children of Israel out of captivity to their freedom and salvation. We think of Joshua who built the armies of Israel and developed the power by which they were able to overcome the enemies who stood in their path, opposing their movement to the Promised Land. How strong they were to take possession of it and wrest it from the hands of enemies when they finally got there! We think of the strength that enabled David to carve a kingdom out of a hostile environment. We think of brave and courageous women too: of Esther, the queen; of Jael, who destroyed Sisera, the enemy of Israel; of Ruth; of Mary; of Elizabeth; of Lydia. They too were very strong.

We need to recognize that physical strength is not enough. Something more than that is needed. God has to have people who have something more than strength. Goliath was a giant in body but he was mentally weak, and David slew him. Samson had tremendous strength, but a weakness for the wrong kind of women. Isaiah said to his people at one time, "Strengthen ye the weak hand and confirm the feeble knees. Say to them that are fearful of heart, be strong, fear not."

The affliction of those who are weak of heart and of purpose is that they are not able to do anything bravely or well. To the children of Israel, God said, "Therefore shall ye keep all the commandments which I command you this day. Keep all the commandments that ye may be strong and go in and possess the land."

The source of strength is obedience to the commandments of God. Much later Saint Paul was to give the same kind of message to his people, and he said to the disciples, "Watch ye, stand fast in the faith."

IN TIMES LIKE THESE we need to appeal to all of the people of the church, to all who at any time in their lives have felt the call of Christ, the call to give themselves to the Lord. This is a time when we need to say to our people, "Be strong." There are many times when we really need to be strong. One of them is in the time of danger. We all realize very deeply, and very seriously that this is a time of danger. The war in which we see the world engaged at the present seems to hold great danger. It is the danger of an unknown and uncertain future.

God has never failed in any of his purposes. There have been many times when it seemed that his work was being overwhelmed, that his servants would be lost and his cause crushed, but it has never come to pass. God and his work have always endured. Regardless of what we may think of the danger involved in the atom bomb which has been seen at work, and in the vastly greater threat of the hydrogen bomb yet to come, God will not fail. It is a spiritual thing, an intangible thing to which we cling—our faith that God is strong enough to overcome the effect of any bomb that any man or any group of men ever will be able to devise and build. After all the aeons of time in the world's history, God has never failed in his purposes; and I do not believe he is going to fail now. Frankly, although I can conceive of the possibility of terrible things coming upon the earth that will cause much suffering and destruction, I do not believe—my faith will not permit me to believe—that God's cause can fail, or ever will fail.

In our more immediate environment we face a different kind of danger—the danger from corruption and sin. We do not meet this as a nation; we must meet it as individuals. We often meet it alone in the quiet times. The temptation and pressure to do wrong can undermine us when we least expect it, and when we are least prepared to resist it.

But now is the time to resist, to be strong, to be determined—before the temptation comes, we must decide what we will do and what we will not do. Many people get into trouble and break down because they do not make some very necessary decisions ahead of the times when they will be tested. They do not know until the moment arrives what they will do. Then it may be too late. As I was speaking some weeks ago at one of our other congregations, I saw coming down the aisle an elderly couple who looked very sad, their shoulders bent, their heads bowed. Apparently they had come to the church for comfort, but they were going away with a heavy load upon their hearts. The pastor told me after they had left that their only son had been arrested for car theft. He was tried and sent to the penitentiary. He was one of our boys; he grew up here; he attended our church school classes, but he was weak. He had never made a decision about some of the things he would do, and some of the things he would not do.

If you haven't decided ahead of time what you will do or what you will not do, if you are not strong enough to stick by it, if you don't know what your principles are until you get into an evil situation, somebody else will make the decision for you. Somebody else made the decision for this young man who, after all the instruction he had received in the gospel, did not know his own mind and the will of the Lord concerning him.

ANOTHER TIME that we need to be strong is when there is suffering and trouble. To keep our faith then is indeed most difficult. Very few can escape it. "Into all lives some rain must fall." Times come in every life when we must, so to speak, walk through the valley of the shadow of death, when we cannot see one foot ahead of us. All we can do is to put out our hand, trusting that the hand of God will be there to lead us forward through the dark. In such a time we need to be strong. In the presence of death we need to be strong.

Not so long ago I was in the home of one of our fine families. For some time the mother's life had been threatened by an incurable disease. The doctors said she had cancer. She went to the hospital and was operated on. We prayed for her week after week, after week. We prayed for her in our prayer meetings. Sometimes we prayed when we had no hope that our prayers would be answered, and our elders went and administered to her again and again. As her husband and children attended church, there were times when we could see by the suffering in their faces how things were going at home. Eventually God saw fit to give her a great and wonderful blessing, and so she has appeared again among the people. Now we see the smile of comfort and returning physical welfare in her face. What a blessing it is to realize that God has seen fit to manifest his power and give to us the testimony of his goodness. That family had to be strong. That woman had to be strong, because she went through a terrible trial, but God was able by his grace and power to bring her through.

Sometimes when we are in want or distress for physical necessities, we need to have the strength, courage, and patience to see how things come out, to hang on when it looks as if there is no good in hanging on any longer.

We need to trust God. We need to be strong in times when decisions must be made. When one is suffering or being tried, if he can lift his gaze to heaven and open his spiritual ears, the Heavenly Father will speak to him and tell him what is good for his soul. One time when I was having a serious trial, I was thinking about my situation and the still small voice said within my soul, "You have made your decision in times when you were strong. Now you are weak. This is not the time to change your plans. Abide by your decisions until you are strong again." That helped me. I can testify to you that the voice of the Spirit was right. I have rejoiced many times that I obeyed the instruction which came to me and that I stood by the principles and decisions I had made when I was strong.

REMEMBER YOUR MOUNTAINTOP EXPERIENCES, the times when God comes to you and blesses you with his holy spirit. Let those moments in your life shine like a beacon light down the way you must go so that you shall not step either to the right nor to the left, but stay in the true path God has given you to tread.

People sometimes think that the righteous and good are the only ones who suffer. This is a mistake. Not all the humiliation nor all the trials come to those who try to serve God and remain faithful to their great principles. All who weaken or fail have their troubles, trials, disappointments, and heartaches. In addition to all the other heartaches and sorrow they have this bitter thought—that they have failed to do the thing they set out to do, and they lose not only the satisfaction of achievement in this world, but something of that eternal reward which the Heavenly Father has promised to them.

The Scriptures indicate to us the kind of strength we need. Paul, in writing to Timothy, said: "Now therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus." There is grace in Jesus Christ our Lord. There is power, there is help in him. How many times experience has taught us that this is true.

Often I have had to bow my head and ask for strength in order to continue my work, and frequently those prayers have been answered. Many times I have sat at my desk arranging my thoughts and trying to fashion an editorial that would bring some little bit of benefit to people of the church, and often as I have put together all of the best thoughts I could find I have sat there discouraged, thinking, "This will not do." Then, remembering that I had forgotten to pray, I have bowed my head and asked for God's light and help, and often help has come, not always immediately, but generally in time to meet my need.

I recommend that when you are weak and in need of help that you do not trust to your strength alone. Go to your Heavenly Father and confess your weakness to him. Ask him for help because he has a fountain of strength, inspiration, and power that is inexhaustible upon which you can draw to the full extent of your needs in your endeavor to serve him. We need spiritual strength, courage, moral character, stamina. We need all the strength that God can give us.

IN PASTORAL WORK we have learned a great deal from the good people with whom we have been associated. We have seen some of their magnificent strength, courage, and faith, and we have seen pitiable weaknesses, faults, and failures in other cases. In every congregation there are those who are weak and those who are strong. But the truth is that none of us need to be weak. We can all be strong if we call upon God in prayer because there is no limit to his mercy, power, and love. He will give out to us what we most deeply need. It is true that he calls upon us to do all that we can for ourselves. He isn't going to do everything, because he wants us to grow. He wants us to exercise our muscles in physical effort and our souls and minds in spiritual and in intellectual effort. God wants us to be able to do all that we can for ourselves. But when the time comes that we have reached the limit of our strength, then he will come to our aid if we ask him.

Let us return to the thought given by Paul: "Be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might." If we find strength in this world, it will be the strength of the Lord, and it will be the power of his might that will sustain and bless us to carry us through.

Then there was a shuddering of the cables, the barges rose with their burden, and the sunken ship floated free. Tug boats pulled them into the harbor. One engineer was wise enough to use the power that God had put into the world.

There is a power in the universe that belongs to God. It works in an almost countless number of ways. It is the power of the Spirit. We can contact that power in the quiet times of prayer. It waits for us to learn how to use it.

The spiritual forces are the greatest powers of the universe. In our own strength we are very weak. But if we are working with the eternal purposes, the power of the tides, the sun, the wind, and the stars are with us, and the hand of God strengthens our own.

Experiences of a Missionary - Part VI

Oelwein, Iowa

I have contacted many who were opposed to our work. This is true not only of members of other churches, but of ministers as well. Such people have caused us considerable trouble and in some places have resorted to methods that did not promote peace and friendship. I once held a series of services in a Union church near Oelwein, Iowa. The interest was good, and every evening a large number of people attended services. Among those who became interested in our work was a Mrs. Quitmyer who was superintendent of the church school. After some investigation she presented her name for baptism. After coming into the church, she became an outstanding worker.

This aroused the ire of some of the members of her husband's family. They sent for a minister of their church to come and conduct a series of tirades against the Reorganized Church. For nearly two weeks he continued this abuse, so some of our members wrote me, asking that I come to their defense at once.

I called upon the minister who had made the attack and asked him to meet the issue in a public discussion. This he refused to do. I then informed him if he did not do this, I would be compelled to make a reply in the same church where the attack was made. He tried hard to persuade me not to do this, but insisted it was his right to make an attack on our work whenever and wherever he pleased. He still declined to meet the issue, so we arranged for a reply. All our friends including the members of the church to which the minister belonged were notified of the reply. When the night came, the church was packed full. For nearly two hours we examined some of the statements made by this man and showed how our work had been misrepresented. It was apparent that all the best people of the community were our friends. At the close of the service, it was announced we would continue our services in the church. A woman sitting back in the audience shouted, "I won't come to hear you, you dirty dog." I told her that was her privilege, but I knew many others would come and would enjoy hearing the truth. Another woman who had been circulating all kinds of stories in the neighborhood began to call us hard names and threatened to resort to violence if the opportunity were given to her. Those who were so bitterly opposed to us were very much in the minority, and we found plenty of friends who were ready to defend us from the unchristian attacks made. As a result we baptized a large number of people in this community; they have been a credit to our church and are still holding on to the "Rod of Iron." The church and the minister that opposed us have never succeeded in that locality since. Many of the Oelwein Saints have moved Zionward and are excellent workers in the central areas of the church.

Difficult Times

There have been several periods during my ministry that the prospect for the work did not look promising, but each time the Lord has come to the rescue and the work has gone forward. I witnessed the weakness of man made apparent in the work of the church; but even as I have seen this, I have also seen the hand of Divinity sustaining and making strong the work of the Master. There may be periods in which the church will suffer, but even in these hours the Lord will never permit the church to fail.

Memories of President Frederick M. Smith

I relate here a conversation that I had with President Frederick M. Smith the day before he was stricken with his last illness. We had arranged to eat lunch together, which would permit us to discuss matters affecting the work of the church. Over a period of years we had found a feeling of fraternity existing between us that made us friends. He presented many problems that confronted the church and we discussed these freely. He informed me of some of the things he hoped to do at the General Conference which was soon to meet. Among other things we talked about was his successor in the Presidency of the church. I frankly informed him I was somewhat worried because of this condition.

As we sat in his car, he seemed to be in a deep spirit of meditation. Some months before we had talked over church work and at that time he indicated he did not think his work was finished, but hoped to continue for some time. On this occasion, however, he seemed to be in a different state of mind. At no time during this last conversation did he indicate he would long continue in the Presidency. No doubt he could have given me the name of his successor but he did not do so. However, he did give me that which even today I regard as his dying testimony; it came in these words: "Brother Holloway, the same God that has cared for this work in the years of the past will continue to care for it when I am gone."

He spoke with all the assurance of a man who stood on the brink of eternity. He had no fear as to the final outcome of the work his grandfather had been instrumental in founding and his own father had successfully maintained. It had been his lot to carry on the work left in his care during the years since his father's passing. The load had been heavy, but he had found the Master ever ready to sustain him in the hour when he needed help.

I shall never forget this last conversation I had with him. I have related only a small part of what we talked about that day, but suffice to say he was to me a prophet of God, and while he had his weaknesses, yet I believe he will stand in the final day as one of God's servants, being a prophet, seer, and revelator.

Only those who knew him best could appreciate his attitude. During one of the troubled conferences, I learned to respect him. He saw me walking along the street and stopped his car and asked me if I were going up in the business district of Independence. I told him that I was, and he asked me to ride. In fact, I was discouraged and sad and was trying to throw off the feeling. I had no place in mind that I particularly cared to go, so we drove for some time, discussing many different things that affected the church and its work. Among some of the things he told me was his desire to help some who had opposed him. They had even asked him if he ever prayed, then he said, "I am praying for those who are fighting me."

About eleven o'clock at night we drove into the cemetery where his father was buried. He asked me if I had ever visited the tomb and I replied I had not. He drove the car near the place where the body of his father reposes. We got out of the car and stood by the tomb. He talked of his father's last sickness and related some of the things that came from the lips of his father. He had pled with his father to settle some things that both of them knew would come in the course of time. His father had presided over the church for nearly fifty years and had gained the confidence of his brethren and was in condition to make a proper settlement in which they would listen to his counsel and advice. His father turning to him said, "No, son, I cannot do this. If I did, I would go out of this life in a storm, and that I cannot do. You will have to meet it when it comes."

From the tremor of his voice I knew he was deeply affected. He respected his father and implicitly believed the revelations that had come through him. His heritage was not an easy one. The load he carried was heavy, but he knew that as long as he placed his trust in the One who had called him, he would not be left alone.

That night I saw another side of his nature that was not always understood by the people of the church. From then on we remained good friends.

Reunion in Lamoni

The first reunion ever held in the Lamoni Stake was in 1904 at Davis City, Iowa. It was my happy privilege to attend all of that reunion. Several of the outstanding men of the church were present, including Joseph Smith, president of the church; Heman C. Smith, apostle and historian; Joseph Lambert, apostle; Duncan Campbell, one of the presidents of seventies; William Anderson and D. C. White of the stake bishopric; and Presiding Bishop E. L. Kelley. The reunion was well attended and the interest fine. It was during this reunion that David H. Smith, father of Elbert A. Smith, passed to his reward. Joseph was the speaker on Sunday morning and, in the course of his sermon, he mentioned the revelation given him in which the Lord said, "My servant David H. Smith is yet in my hand." Several of the leading men thought this revelation indicated David would get well. Joseph, however, knew better. He stated: "When David was first stricken, I and others were asked to administer to him. No sooner were my hands placed upon his head than my spirit went down like lead. The Lord showed me my brother would never get well." His interpretation of the revelation was that any power that bound David would be rebuked by the Lord, and in the end David would be free.

Testimony of Bishop E. L. Kelley

One of the most outstanding testimonies I have ever been privileged to hear was borne by Bishop E. L. Kelley. Brother D. C. White first arose and stated that Bishop Kelley was moved by faith and not by sight. Brother Kelley then followed with his testimony. He stated it was true that many times as Presiding Bishop of the church he had to depend on faith rather than on the things he saw. been cut or combed in years. Neither Many times he found himself meeting problems that were hard to solve. He had seen the time when the families of the missionaries were in dire circumstances and for months had gone without sufficient funds being placed in their hands.

On one of these occasions three men entered his office which at that time was located in the Herald Publishing House in Lamoni, Iowa. They began to discuss conditions in the church. They had a very clear knowledge of the problems that confronted the bishop. After talking for some little time one of the men arose and, walking over to where the bishop sat, laid on his desk a draft for a sum of money on a New York City bank. As Brother Kelley looked at the draft he felt happy, knowing he could use the funds in relieving the distress of the missionaries' families. He thanked the men for their interest and especially for the money represented in the draft. As they arose to leave his office, Brother Kelley turned and asked them their names. In reply one of them said, "It matters not as to our names, but we will tell you that we are the Three Nephites that were to tarry on the earth until the coming of the Master." The Spirit was present to bear testimony of the truth of this wonderful experience to the hundreds who heard. Some time afterwards I talked to Brother Kelley in his office, and he gave me some further details regarding the visitation of these messengers, and as far as I am concerned I have never doubted the story. It was the goodness of our Heavenly Father, with the assistance given by these Messengers of Christ, that brought relief to those who were in suffering.

Just a further word concerning Brother Kelley. Many times he found himself facing problems that tried his soul, but with faith in the church and in God he never faltered. It can be said of him that under no circumstances did he turn down those who came to him for help when he had means with which to supply their needs. Sometimes in General Conference he would listen to those who did not agree with him. These discussions would continue for several days and then without any notes, he would arise and give his answer from memory. Perhaps he was responsible for more legislation than any other man in the church. He was honored by his friends and greatly feared by those who opposed him. He passed to his reward, loved by all who knew him as a man of integrity, truth, and honor.

The Black Hills Country

Missionary work varies greatly in different parts of the country. In the West we have large areas of sparsely populated territory. Sometimes one can drive for many miles without seeing a house. This is especially true of the Black Hills country in Wyoming and South Dakota to which Elder A. A. Baker and I were assigned at one time. One good brother in the church offered us the use of a team and spring wagon so we could get into many places that were far removed from any railroad. We gladly accepted this offer and started out one Sunday morning to visit three different schoolhouses and hold services.

We had barely started when, going down a canyon leading to the Belle Fourche River, we came to a bad place in the road. Our wagon upset, pouring all our belongings out in the bottom of that canyon. We succeeded in getting our wagon back in the road and proceeded on our way.

After a few hours we came to the river. There were no bridges to be found, so we had to ford the river. The water was perhaps three feet deep. Our horses were thirsty and wanted to stop and drink. The river, like many western streams, had quicksand in it. We soon found both the team and spring wagon going down in this sand. Brother Baker was driving, and he did all he could to get the horses to pull us out. They refused to go. It became apparent we were not only going to loose our wagon but the team as well. I had just bought a new suit of clothes and I did not want to get them wet, but knowing the danger we were in, out I went into the water up to my waist and began to whip the horses. We succeeded in getting them under way and reached the opposite shore in safety.

About eleven o'clock we reached the schoolhouse, and I preached to a crowd of people, many of whom had traveled several miles to attend the service. In the afternoon we drove a few miles farther and held another service.

Our next stop was fifteen miles away, where we preached in the evening. Again we were favored with a fair-sized audience that gave excellent attention to our message. After the service closed, we were to return to the home of the brother who had lent us his team and wagon.

It was a dark night and the road was very bad. My partner did not know the way well, and soon we were lost. I walked several miles carrying a lantern to protect us from going over some precipice. We gave the horses a full rein and let them pilot us home. I drew a sigh of relief as we drove into the barn lot about 2 o'clock in the morning. I felt that divine providence had protected us even if we did have trouble on the way. A series of services was held in one of the schoolhouses we visited that day which necessitated our traveling more than twenty miles each day to fulfill our appointment. The meetings did not result in many conversions, but one fine young woman gave in her name so we felt repaid for our effort.

Some years later a branch was established near Hulett, and each year a reunion was held at what is known as the Devil's Tower. This is quite a landmark and is visited by many people each year.

Here and there we found a family located in a town or community who were members of the church. These families were usually isolated from any of our congregations and so had no church privileges. Missionaries were always glad to contact these Saints as it gave them an opportunity not only to encourage the isolated members but also to convert some of their neighbors and friends.

In the town of Whitehall, Montana, a family of Saints lived who were always glad to welcome missionaries. Brother Sacry and his family were well known to the people of that community. Their home was always open for holding services, and they would do all they could to get their friends to attend. We preached several sermons and the people there seemed to be interested.

One day as I was walking along the street, I contacted a man who was one of the strangest individuals I have ever met. So that our readers might have some idea of how he appeared I shall attempt a brief description of him. He was sitting on a building, repairing the roof. As the building was near the street, it gave him an opportunity to enter into conversation with me. He began by asking me if I were a preacher and I answered, "I sometimes preach." His hair had not had he lately washed his hands or face. There was no indication of personal pride in his appearance. His clothing was dirty and he had every appearance of a man who did not care what people thought of him.

After some questioning I soon discovered he was a rank atheist. I mentioned something about the destiny of man, and he at once declared there was no destiny, that when we die we are like the beasts of the field, we decay, and that is the end of all the human family. After some time I asked him this question: "Did you ever think you might be mistaken? That there is a God, and there is also a destiny for man?" He looked somewhat perplexed and finally admitted he had thought he might be mistaken but afterward decided it was an indication of insanity when he thought there might be a Supreme Being as well as a destiny for man. He was the product of his own thinking, and as far as happiness was concerned, he never knew what real happiness meant.

I met another man in Salt Lake City of a different type. At one time he had been an elder in our church. He gradually drifted from the church and finally became a spiritualist. After some time he became skeptical of all religion. His wife belonged to our church and continued to retain her membership. One day I was visiting in his home, and the subject of religion came up. He expressed himself as being proud of his atheistic belief. I asked him if he found himself a happier man now than when he believed in God. He replied that he was much happier. I then asked him if he reached that conclusion after mature thought and if he did, would he mind giving me his reason for being a happier man. He stated he had given much thought to the subject, and he was glad to give me the reason for being happier now that he did not believe either in a Supreme Being or in the destiny of man. He stated that in order to believe in God and a destiny, it was necessary to have faith. He found faith was a disease that affected the mind of man, and all disease produced suffering, therefore he had to get rid of this malady. When he did so he found himself a much happier individual. Now as he faced the bar of the great hereafter with his hope gone, his faith destroyed, he tried to make himself believe he was a happy man.

Happiness is not produced in this way. Happiness and security are found when men look to eternity knowing there is a destiny and placing their trust in God. There comes a time in the life of all men when they must put their trust in one who is greater than they are. As they place their hand in the hand of their Master, they have no fear. In that crucial hour they face their destiny hopefully, knowing that the Lord will never desert them, but will lead them on until they stand in his divine presence.

This man tried to make himself believe he was happy, but I am sure he failed in this. His companion remained faithful and devoted to her hope in Christ and had no cause of regret. Both passed to their reward, but I am sure the wife who retained her faith had a much better hope than her husband who had allowed darkness to enter his soul and thereby crowd out the prospect of a better day.

Pioneer Conditions

While in the West we held services in many places, especially in schoolhouses. While in the Bitter Root Valley we were invited to visit Brother Whitney and family, who lived nearly forty miles from Hamilton, Montana. In company with my wife I made the trip and held services in a schoolhouse near the Whitney home.

Only a few people lived in this vicinity, so we did not expect a large audience to greet us. However we did desire to do what we could to reach some of these who had never had the opportunity to hear the gospel. Brother Whitney had been converted and baptized in Michigan by that grand old missionary John J. Cornish. We found him and his family very much interested, even in their isolated condition. If we did no good in preaching to others, we did help this family as we renewed the hope of the gospel in them.

They lived on a homestead in a log house which they had built. Since the room was small, we erected a tent not far from the house for my wife and me to sleep in. All went well until one night two bears got into a herd of cattle and killed six calves. After that I could never get my wife to go to bed until I was ready to accompany her. While we stayed there, the coyotes would come down to our tent; we could hear them as they howled and sometimes they would get bold enough to come so near the tent we could see their eyes shining in the darkness. Such was frontier life and the conditions under which we carried on missionary work.

"Make Jesus Our Lord" — By RAY WHITING

THE greatest need of the church, as well as our greatest opportunity, is to "Make Jesus our Lord." This should be our theme not just for a missionary campaign but forever.

At first it may seem to be an easy thing to "Make Jesus our Lord." I am told repeatedly that "Only believe," or "Just accept him as your Savior" and salvation is assured. But it is not that easy. It is true that Jesus said, "My yoke is easy, and my burden is light," but he did call it a "yoke" and a "burden." He also said, "For which of you intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first, and counteth the cost?" It is a gift that costs us something. It is not free, but a "pearl of great price."

Who started this easy salvation anyway? Do you think it was easy for Abram to "get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show thee"? Was it easy for Moses to go against Pharaoh and his hosts when he could have been in a place of prominence with him? Was it easy for Christ in the garden and on the cross? Or for Peter being crucified head downward? Or for Paul who "of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one"? Or for Joseph Smith on the way to Carthage? Or for the widowed Emma? To talk about "only believe" in the presence of such would sound silly, wouldn't it? And it is silly!

Jesus also said, "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" and, "Break not my commandments for to save your lives." And again, "Wherefore, settle this in your hearts, that ye will do the things which I shall teach and command you." Therefore, to "Make Jesus our Lord" requires something, even a disciplined life—and that is difficult.

WE must surrender to him. When one surrenders to a superior power, he surrenders all. He becomes a prisoner, subject to the victor. He is a slave. But we react against such words as surrender, prisoner, and slave because the only experience we have with them means defeat, subjection to an enemy for his aggrandizement, and to our hurt. But here is another of the paradoxes of the gospel of Jesus Christ. To surrender to him does not mean defeat, but victory; not imprisonment, but liberty; not slavery, but freedom.

Many are not aware of it, but we are in bondage now; we are chained to terrible forces. We cannot free ourselves from them, but we can choose one or the other. There is no other way. Either we must yield to the way of flesh, sin, and death, letting it become our master and we its slave, or we must yield and "Make Jesus our Lord." "Know ye not that . . . ye are not your own? For ye are bought with a price; therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's."

If somehow we could ignore the way of the flesh and go our own way without its limitations, we might find another excuse for resisting God, but we cannot do this. The flesh cries out three times a day for food and we feed it or die. But if we surrender to God, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit . . . For they that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the Spirit, the things of the Spirit, for to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace . . . For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God."

Therefore, in surrendering to Christ we win a great victory over the forces of destruction. We are no longer in the power of death and hell but in the ranks of those who have eternal life. We are no longer bound; we are "free indeed." We are not prisoners, but rejoicing under the "law of liberty."

To obtain this, however, we must surrender all. God is a jealous God. He wants us all or not at all. "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." He does not want us only an hour or two on Sunday, while we spend the rest of our time on things which do not promote his interests. He does not want a "collection" on Sunday for a few cents, when we spend dollars the rest of the week on things of no value to his kingdom. A slave gives himself wholly to the affairs of his master; he has no other interests. Rather let us "Make Jesus our Lord."

WHAT shall we do then, since we must go either the way of the flesh or the way of the Spirit? Every passing hour takes us sixty minutes farther on one road or the other. We cannot escape it, but we do have the right of choice.

God has said, "This is my work and my glory, to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man." Through the death and resurrection of Christ, God gained immortality for us, but only through obedience to the gospel can men obtain eternal life or a life of quality. The Prophet Alma gave this good advice:

Therefore I beseech of you, that ye do not procrastinate the day of your repentance until the end; for after this day of life, which is given us to prepare for eternity, behold, if we do not improve our time while in this life, then cometh the night of darkness, wherein there can be no labor performed. Ye can not say, when ye are brought to that awful crisis, that I will repent, that I will return to my God. Nay, ye can not say this; for that same spirit which doth possess your bodies at the time that ye go out of this life, that same spirit will have power to possess your body in that eternal world. For behold, if ye have procrastinated the day of your repentance, even until death, behold, ye have become subjected to the spirit of the devil, and he doth seal you his; therefore the Spirit of the Lord hath withdrawn from you, and hath no place in you, and the devil hath all power over you; and this is the final state of the wicked.

Let us "Make Jesus Our Lord."

QUESTION:

We are told that we should not use fermented wine for the Communion, but in Section 26:1 it tells us that it "mattereth not what ye shall . . . drink, when ye partake of the sacrament, if it so be that ye do it with an eye single to my glory."

Section 86:1 states "that inasmuch as any man drinketh wine or strong drink among you, behold, it is not good, neither meet in the sight of your Father, only in assembling yourselves together, to offer up your sacraments before him."

This seems somewhat confusing.
Wisconsin W. J. M.

ANSWER:

Until the General Conference of 1913, there was no general agreement whether the definition of the word "wine" included both unfermented and fermented grape juice. Occasionally fermented wine was used in some of the congregations.

However, in the General Conference of 1913, the church adopted a ruling by the Joint Council of First Presidency, Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric that to be in harmony with the spirit of the revelations, only unfermented grape juice (wine) or water should be used.

This action brought unanimity and consistency in the church practice. (See answer to question by K. E. of California.)

JOHN BLACKMORE.

QUESTION:

In the early days of the Restoration Movement, did the Saints use fermented wine at Communion services? If they did, when was the change made to use grape juice?

California K. E.

ANSWER:

Until the General Conference of 1913, there was no unanimity in the practice of the church. Differences of opinion existed as to the exact definition of the word "wine." Some contended that fermented wine was permissible and interpreted the usage of the word "wine" as referring to fermented grape juice.

At the General Conference of 1913, a document was presented from the New South Wales District Conference, Australia, requesting

. . . . the General Conference to legislate or seek the counsel of the Lord through the President of the church with a view to unanimity throughout the church, as to the partaking of fermented or unfermented wine in the sacrament, as fermented wine is repugnant to a great many members of the church.

This request was referred to the First Presidency and Twelve for examination and report. The Joint Council of Presidency and Twelve reported

. . . . Resolved, in reply to the New South Wales resolution touching the kind of wine to be used in sacrament services of the church, we are of the opinion that fermented wine should not be used, but that either unfermented wine or water should be used, and to be in harmony with the spirit of revelation

This was adopted, and the use of unfermented grape juice or water became the unanimous practice of the church in its sacrament of the Lord's Supper services.

JOHN BLACKMORE.

QUESTION:

Doctrine and Covenants 26:1 says, "It mattereth not what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, when ye partake of the sacrament," and it goes on to say for the wine to be of our own make. Why shouldn't the bread be made by one of our own faith, also?

Michigan J. J. R.

ANSWER:

Evidently we are admonished in Section 26:1 that "wine" used in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper should not be purchased from our enemies, but should be of our own make because "wine" could be easily adulterated and be made of other material than the "pure fruit of the vine." Bread, on the other hand, is not so easily adulterated. However, it would be unwise to purchase bread for the Communion from our enemies. There may be room for discussion as to who are our enemies. The emblems for the sacred Communion should always be prepared by our friends. Also "wine" was considered a "strong drink." It was not until 1913 that the church ruled that the Communion wine should be unfermented.

JOHN BLACKMORE.

QUESTION:

If those who die in infancy are not tried and do not have to overcome, what assurance is there that free agency will not be abused in eternity as it was in heaven?

Missouri

E. F. B.

ANSWER:

Agency is one of the distinguishing features between man and animal, and though there is no Scripture to support us in this view, we doubt that the right of moral choice can ever be destroyed or taken away in eternity.

George A. Njeim

QUESTION:

Were the Book of Mormon plates taken from this earth after they were translated? This is one of the questions skeptical people often ask, and I should like to be able to answer clearly.

Missouri

Mrs. R. S.

ANSWER:

The testimony of Joseph Smith is that he delivered the Book of Mormon plates to the same heavenly messenger who gave them to him in the first instance. If they are not deposited in heaven they are under heavenly supervision. As a phenomenon that needs explanation, the location of the plates at the present time is incidental. The matter that each one has to face, and it is a very serious matter, is the testimony of three special witnesses and eight others who solemnly declared that they saw the Book of Mormon plates and that some of them handled them. This testimony has never been impeached. Besides, there is the challenge in the book itself: "And when ye shall receive these things [the plates and probably the translation of them] I would exhort you that ye would ask of God, the eternal Father, in the name of Christ, if these things are not true; and if ye ask with a sincere heart, with real intent, having faith in Christ, he will manifest the truth of it unto you, by the power of the Holy Ghost; and by the power of the Holy Ghost, ye may know the truth of all things."—Book of Mormon, page 775: 4, 5.

Hostess Work Gives Opportunity For Service Unlimited

GOOD MORNING. Won't you sign our guest book?"

Hostess work in our churches may be confined to a handshake and a proffered pen, or it may be unique. It may be a formal excuse for friendliness, or it may be a warm and vital part of branch life. To the alert hostess there is no end to the opportunities for being helpful and friendly to newcomers.

In the City of Zion (and in many of our outlying congregations) the branches make a real effort to establish a fraternal feeling with visitors, new members, and newcomers who are transferring their membership in from another group. The Stone Church has been a pioneer in this work, and the trial and error method here has resulted in a pattern that has helped other branches set up a hostess program.

Every branch has to set up its own program of service, to determine how many hostesses should be on duty at one time. A small meeting may only need one woman at the guest book, but a large service may require two or three on the welcoming committee. For its three services, the Stone Church uses seven hostesses every Sunday. It has been found, too, that it saves last minute trouble and nervous strain for the chief hostess if she makes out a schedule for her corps of helpers so that each woman knows a full quarter ahead which Sunday she will be on duty.

OF COURSE, the main work is still the friendly greeting at the door to strangers and the request to sign the guest book. But even this can be warmed with a real personal interest in the invitation to "come back and worship with us again" that will make an out-of-town visitor more eager to return. In a large congregation it's next to impossible for any one person to know all the members by sight so that newcomers can be picked out at a glance. It takes the sharp eyes of all—the hostesses on duty, the deacons, and regular members—to spot unfamiliar faces and start the friendly machinery rolling. At the Stone Church there is always a notice in the bulletin for visitors to register with the hostesses, and usually the minister in charge of the service remembers to include that request among his announcements. "Then," says the chief hostess, "if anyone deliberately walks out without registering, it isn't our fault. But only a few are ever missed."

The guest book doesn't go into cold storage during the week. On Monday begins the important job of "follow-ups." For the Stone Church in Independence this means sending out post cards bearing a picture of the Stone Church to all the people who signed the guest book at the Sunday services. Other branches could use pictures of their churches, or attractive informal note paper could be bought in wholesale lots and personalized for hostess use. To strangers, the hostess writes a brief friendly note welcoming them to the city and the church, and inviting them to come back soon and often. To members who are transferring into the branch, the note not only welcomes them but tells them what, when, and where services are held and gives the name of the group elder. There is only one rule of thumb to follow, and that is to keep the notes personal, informative, friendly, and sincere.

FOR THE PASTOR, an alert hostess can be a gold mine of information. One of the most important problems in large congregations is to keep track of all the members. New members are continually moving in, and old members are moving out. Others change their addresses although they stay within the congregation. "Only one of our members keeps us informed about where she lives," Pastor Glaude Smith says ruefully. "And she moves so often that I guess she feels somebody should keep a check list of where to find her." When members forget to send change of address information to their pastors, the hostesses on duty at the services can often pick up the news and relay it to the pastor's office.

A simple form with a request for change of membership can be drawn up to give a great deal of information. The address of the new member should be included, and space provided for background material about his experience, priesthood office, and talents. The hostesses who give these forms out and collect them can take note of the background material and give the new members' names to departments of the branch which could use their services. For a stranger, it is often hard to make the overture of offering his talents for service, and it is doubly heartwarming to have the branch make the first move to search him out and put him to work.

But the hostesses do not have to stop here. Their chance for service is limited only by their own vision. Mrs. Blanche Gault, the chief hostess for Stone Church, stresses to her volunteer workers that they should keep on the lookout for opportunities to help visitors and newcomers to the community in every possible way. In the past the hostesses have helped new gatherers to Zion find homes and lots to buy, apartments to rent, and assisted them in making social contacts. During the last war they entertained servicemen and introduced them to other members of the congregation who wanted to entertain them. One of the most unusual opportunities for service came when a young couple arrived in Independence with a load of honey to sell to pay for the expenses of their first trip to Zion. "I got busy on the phone," Mrs. Gault recalls, "and sold over 160 pounds of honey in five-pound lots. You can see what varied possibilities there are for giving helpful service to make visitors and new members happy with us here."

AN IMPORTANT PART of making new members feel at home in a branch can be accomplished by giving "newcomer parties." At the Stone Church these parties have been held in different forms, all of them successful and commendable. Once they gave a reception in the Annex to introduce new members socially to the pastor and his wife, department heads, priesthood members and any of the congregation who cared to drop in. "It was a big job, but everyone enjoyed it." On another occasion the pastor assisted by the hostesses gave a covered-dish supper for newcomers and newly baptized members. At other times the pastor holds open house for new members of his congregation, and the hostesses take care of the refreshments for him. "Something we've tried and found helpful," commented Mrs. Iva Hunter, Pastor Smith's secretary, "is to hold an impromptu program at these parties. We've discovered a lot of talent that way!"

Yes, hostess work in our churches may be a formal excuse for friendliness, or it may be a warm and vital part of branch life. For those women's departments which are willing to plan their hostess program and distribute the work systematically among their most alert members, this

Witness for Him

By MILDRED DORSEY

WE MUST BE living witnesses for Christ. We should each live to reflect the teachings of the church and show the world what we have. Members of the priesthood need living, breathing witnesses of those things they teach and preach. We, the lay members, must be willing to live the gospel truths.

When we moved to our present address, we found a nonmember neighbor lady who listened to "Morning Devotions." Evan Fry was usually the speaker. She regarded him as one of the outstanding men of our time and enjoyed listening to the service. She remarked that what he said was in harmony with everything she had ever read in her Bible. To her it seemed better than anything she had ever come in contact with before.

It was easy to tell her the story of our faith and our beliefs. It was easy, for the seed had already been planted. We gave her some church tracts and Heralds. At Conference time we obtained a missionary copy of the Book of Mormon for her. She seemed to find great strength and enjoyment in reading all these things.

She even attended Conference for three days, and each day she was more impressed with what she saw and heard. From that time on she had the desire to be baptized.

Our pastor's youngest daughter was baptized on May 28 at the College Street Church in Independence. (Our church in Leavenworth has no font.) On that day, we had the can be a service unlimited. The work demands warmth, energy, and imagination, but the rewards are great. There is much happiness to be found in willing, loving service to help others be happy in the beauty and fellowship of our church.

great pleasure of seeing our neighbor become our sister in the faith.

WE TRUST that we may sustain her and uphold her in her journey into this new life. One cannot grasp the gospel in its entirety in a few weeks or even in a few months. Some go through life without ever realizing the beauty and splendor as it is taught in these latter days. We little know the power and strength that are ours if we but live close to God and practice what we preach. I believe that if all who name the name of Christ in his great church would listen to that voice which is ever calling, and do as it directs, then indeed we would surely redeem Zion. We would see marvelous works and wonderful things come to pass. We would be so filled with love for others and so desirous of winning them to the good way of life, that they would know and feel our love and be willing to listen to the Restoration message from His witnesses.

The responsibility is ours, but it is not so much a responsibility as a privilege—a sacred trust that we alone can carry out. We have been warned, and we must warn our neighbor. The word cannot grow if it is locked away in our hearts or in a secret hiding place. When locked away, it disappears.

If we, the members in Christ, cannot reflect the teachings of the church; if we cannot reflect the preaching of our priesthood; if we cannot reflect that great love of God, then all the teaching and all the preaching will have been in vain.

We must awaken to the wonderful power that is at our very fingertips—awaken or be lost. This power is not lightly given. We must earnestly and humbly seek God's guidance if we are to be true witnesses for him.

My Search for the Kingdom

From my earliest childhood I have had the longing to know more about God, but it was not until I was twenty-seven that I started to make a concentrated search for him. I attended a revival meeting and, feeling that I was a sinner in need of repentance, I surrendered myself to the Master. Immediately I was encouraged by the people of this church (Holiness Movement) to take up the ministry, but somehow I could not convince myself that there was anyone in the church with authority to lay hands on my head and pronounce me a minister. I did teach in the Sunday school, however, and it was while doing this that I began to realize my need for greater study. I found many things in the Scriptures which the church would not permit me to teach. Seeing that I could find no satisfaction in this religion, I went with my wife to various other denominations; the result was that we became lost in a fog of confusion. Yet we knew somewhere the true church must exist. We began to fast and pray for God to direct us, and soon two Mormon elders came to our home. I could see that the Restored Gospel was what I had been searching for, but when they talked of polygamy and eternal progression, I felt that I had found something precious and then immediately lost it. Again I asked the Lord for guidance, and with his help I was able to point out the errors of Mormonism by using the elders' own books. I told them that I could accept the Book of Mormon, but I could not accept some of their doctrines. Then I asked them if there wasn't another church holding the same beliefs as their church did in the beginning. Reluctantly they said that there was an apostate group called the Reorganized Church which had broken away from the main body. They also told me there was a branch at Mt. Vernon, Illinois, some thirty miles away.

Soon we visited the Reorganized Church at Mt. Vernon. We sensed the Spirit of God among the people as soon as we entered, and I was sure I had found the truth. The Mormon elders returned and attempted to discourage me when they learned I was interested in the Reorganization. They argued that the very name, "Reorganized," indicated that it was not the right church. I said, "You could take a bunch of precious stones, scatter them, then regroup them and even call them by a different name, but the stones would remain the same." I also asked why they thought Utah should be headquarters for the church when even in the Mormon Doctrine and Covenants Independence is designated as the place for the gathering. This seemed to take the fight out of them. All along I had prayed, "God, don't let me be deceived." My mind is open, so please show me the right church."

Suddenly a terrible pain developed in my left leg. The doctor said I had a large blood clot in the main artery, but he could do nothing to relieve me. I felt led to call on the elders for administration, and the next day I was all right. A few weeks later I was healed of cancer through the united prayers of the Saints in Benton Church. By this time I was well converted to the Reorganized Church, but still I continued to pray for guidance. Finally I said, "Lord, my wife is better than I; if this is the right church, let her see it. I will take this as your answer." I found she was as thoroughly converted as I was, and we were baptized along with six others on July 30 this year.

The Church Beautiful Contest

In the Herald of April 17, we sponsored a contest, and offered for the most attractive church lawn two beautiful religious pictures. The contest closes October 1, therefore we suggest you have pictures taken both in color and black and white, and mail to the undersigned.

Now is a good time to begin work toward a more beautiful church house and grounds for next year. This would be a splendid project for a church school class or young people's group. Make your church lawn a beauty spot of which you may be justly proud.

The Home in Evangelism

An Important Phase of Women's Work of the Council of Presidents of Seventy

By HAROLD I. VELT

ALL ARE DEEPLY AWARE, I am sure, that we need more missionaries under appointment, for the gospel has yet to go into all the world. We need better trained and more efficient missionaries. Do the influences of home and better home-training have a place here?

We need missionaries with dependable, well-trained wives to accompany them, so that together they can give their lives in service to building a better world through the operation of the Holy Spirit's transforming grace. Do the influences of home and better home-training have a particular place here?

We need a continually expanding force of well-trained local or self-sustaining missionary men and women who love to tell the story of what the gospel has meant to their home, school, college, and church life. Has home-training with its influence a special place here?

We need men and women in ever-increasing numbers who have not had to learn the hard way of the detrimental effects of liquor, tobacco, and morally careless living. Too many thousands of hours of service have already been lost to the missionary cause of the church through misdirected energy. Tremendous forces for good have found outlets in crime because of wrong influence and lack of proper training. Is not this a challenge to home and home-training?

J. Edgar Hoover, head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the United States, has expressed real concern because of the extent of crime and its increase in our country. His greatest concern is because of the trend of teen-agers toward criminal activities. He tells us the appalling fact that one out of every twenty-three of our citizens has already been fingerprinted for crime. While our church members in general are averaging around $10.00 annually per member for tithing and General Church offerings, every average family of four in the United States is paying around $400.00 in crime tax. Added to this, the average cigarette user pays around $128.50 annually for tobacco, and the average drinker about three times that much or more. But back to the point. Mr. Hoover has said that crime could be cleaned up in "one generation" if people would "teach their children obedience in the home" and not wait for the officers of the law to take care of them when it is too late.

Does the work of women in the home have an important place here?

The Importance of the First Years

The Twelve and Seventy and others have their particular and special responsibilities in training, selecting, and building; they also have a definite responsibility in their home and family life. But is there anything more important in the long view of missionary work than the early training of children by their mothers?

Though women have not been given the rights and responsibilities of priesthood, the powers of motherhood and the influence that goes with it are such that they cannot be substituted by any other force in child-training and character-building. This is especially true during the early years. Child psychologists tell us, and correctly so, that the first three years are the most important in the formation of character of the man or woman to be.

The first eight years of life are extremely important—too important to neglect even a fraction of that time in the character development of a child—but the first three are still more vital in matters of discipline. The adult who insists upon having his own way regardless—of doing what he feels like, of attending church if he feels like it, of absenting himself from church to swim, fish, or hunt if he feels like it, of doing even worse if he feels like it—has most probably been the victim of neglect as far as early discipline and training are concerned. If he has been accustomed to getting everything he has cried and fussed for whether right or wrong during those first few years, undoubtedly it will hinder his possibilities in adult years as far as his powers of evangelism are concerned, to say nothing of the grave possibilities of criminal tendencies.

Baptism at Eight Years

The Lord has said:

And again, inasmuch as parents have children in Zion or in any of her stakes which are organized, that teach them not to understand the doctrine of repentance; faith in Christ the Son of the living God; and of baptism and the gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of the hands when eight years old, the sin be upon the head of the parents.—Doctrine and Covenants' 68: 4.

Notice, the main objectives as stated here is not to have our children baptized at the age of eight, but to train them in such a way that they will be ready and desirous of being baptized by that age—this because they have been influenced and taught to understand the doctrine of repentance, and because they have been taught to have faith in Christ. Having these prerequisites, which are necessary to valid baptism, they are baptized not because they are eight, but because they wish to do God's will in order that they may receive the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands.

Is there anything more important toward strengthening our missionary forces of the future than the work of the home in preparing children for receiving the Holy Ghost to guide their entire lives? And is there anyone better endowed by nature to exercise the required patience, love, and understanding in such work than mothers? And is there any place comparable to the home for exercising the kind of influence and training that will extend into the rewards of eternity?

Despise Not One of These Little Ones

In all ages there has been a tendency to think that babies and small children are too young to be trained. The disciples in Jesus' day made that error and were rebuked. On the ancient American continent, Jesus, with tears and affection, counseled the people to "behold their little ones" (III Nephi 8: 23-26). In latter days Jesus kindly rebuked Frederick G. Williams, Sidney Rigdon, Joseph Smith the prophet, and Newell K. Whitney—leading church authorities—for the lack of discipline and training in their homes. They were performing a great work, but somehow they fell into the easy error of taking too much for granted in supposing that their children would grow up all right and be saved to the church and its service without giving sufficient time, attention, study, prayer, and fasting to the matter of their training. (See Doctrine and Covenants 90: 6-9.)

It is not an easy task to train children in such a way as to guarantee their giving the best they have to the Master in future years, and it takes a great amount of time; yet it can be done. It is a most worthwhile thing when done effectively. When results come they are the most gratifying of all achievements in life. We are unfair to our little ones if we suppose that it does not matter whether they are trained for the Lord or not; and we are equally unfair if we suppose they are too young to train. We must have the co-operation of every home of the church if our missionary force of the future is to evangelize the world under the endowment of the Spirit. The time shall come, when our "children will grow up without sin unto salvation"

(Doctrine and Covenants 45: 10). We will not lose them to the church in those days. It will be when parents have arisen to their possibilities in full co-operation with the Lord, and by the aid of his Spirit have become truly skillful in training and educating their children for the Lord. Such conditions will bind Satan so that he shall have no power over the hearts of the children of men for a long time. (See II Nephi 12: 99; I Nephi 7: 60.)

What encouraging promises await us as we more fully enter into this very important phase of evangelism!

America's Great Need

By Maude D. Anderson

AT LEAST ONE CITY in our land has realized that the great need of Americans today is to get back to God. In that city, the transportation company has offered to give free rides to those who attend church. No doubt there are many who are happy to take advantage of the offer, but there is a far greater number who are utterly indifferent. Today there are many children being deprived of the greatest heritage which America has to offer, just as much as if they lived in the Sahara. That heritage is the right of every American child to attend church. Yes, more than half of the children of this country are being deprived of that privilege by the careless indifference of parents who simply can't be bothered. They try to salve their conscience by saying that they want their children to be able to choose their own religious faith when they are older, but if children never have an opportunity to develop a faith of any kind, how can they be expected to be anything but atheists?

This country was founded by people who realized that only a democracy recognizes the dignity and sacredness of the human personality. It was their deep and abiding faith in their Creator which made it the great nation that it is today. The Christian doctrine is the basis for true democracy. To be sure, many of its purported followers have introduced doctrines which sometimes make one wonder, but if the various man-made creeds were sifted out, all denominations could agree on a few basic principles of Christianity, and those few basic facts would form the structure for true democracy at its best.

The founders of our country said, "All men are created free and equal." This is truly the doctrine of Christianity. Nevertheless, after missionaries went into far-away places and carried that message, others followed in their wake whose only thought was greed and selfishness. If we are to convince the world that we have a better way of life, our nation must return to those first principles and restore the confidence which racial discrimination and arrogance have disrupted.

Today, too many want to shift all responsibility to the government. They ignore the fact that in a democracy they are a part of the government and that a whole can be no better than its parts. It is all very well to talk about outlawing social evils, but one cannot legislate righteousness. What good will it do to jail law-breakers if parents continue to ignore the necessity of training their children to appreciate the spiritual values which form the basis for democracy?

There is responsibility to democracy for it is political maturity. It implies honest, industrious, and public-spirited unselfishness by a self-disciplined people. It is only when each individual realizes his own responsibility to his Creator and to his fellow man that those imperfections in government will be eliminated and political maturity achieved.

Keep Faith Alive

By Addie Spaulding Stowell

EVERYONE has a philosophy of life—a decided way to live. Opinions resulting from environment and world happenings become imbedded in the consciousness and form individual attitudes. Every philosophy is backed by faith in what one sees and believes to be true.

Some of us have founded our faith upon tradition, many of which are outmoded by the onward progress of the world and would have been an asset to civilization only if buried with our grandfathers. But some of the traditions that have been handed down through the ages will stand throughout the future generations, either as an advancement toward a better life or with an imposing tendency toward degradation.

Let us examine ourselves carefully to see if the ideology we hold to is worthy of our faith. Is our faith founded upon a retrospect of the things to come? Is it the kind of faith that will lead us to move out in the face of difficulties and do the thing we have been commanded to do? Is it a faith that we can say with complete confidence, as did Abraham of old, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust him"? Abraham proved his faith by his works. His was a living faith that God would fulfill his promise if he did his part. He went so far in obeying the divine command as to raise his hand for the final blow to his son.

The Scriptures teach us, "Faith without works is dead." So true faith must be consummated by works to become effective.

WE SING, "Faith of our fathers, living still." Our fathers had the faith to believe in freedom. It was living faith that prompted them to cross the sea, explore an unknown wilderness, and brave the dangers incident to such a life that they might set up the cause of freedom.

Do we, as a church, have faith to move out and set up our cause of freedom? If we would keep such faith in this changing world, we must keep pace with the rapid progress and developments science is making.

Scientists are keeping their faith alive in what they have developed by costly research and demonstrated to us in a manner that cannot be doubted by an unbiased mind. Their faith has been proved by their works, even though they may not understand that it is faith which motivates their actions.

Whether we have pinned our faith on sociology, religion, or some other of the many aspects of life, it must stand the test in the shaking of the universe in the phenomena of world events. If our faith cannot support our philosophy in the era that is dawning, then we must earmark our philosophy a failure and trust in the things as they develop before us to be the Utopia for which the world is looking, forgetting that these scientific developments might be the means of our destruction. But if our faith is anchored to that holy faith of our fathers, it will carry us through, even as it carried them through to the establishing of a great nation.

THE holy faith of our fathers was stabilized by their belief in the philosophy of Jesus. He knew the conditions in all ages of the world, and he based his philosophy on a steadfast and sure foundation of love for every creature and for the good earth. If we would still maintain that standard of love, we must have a living faith as the groundwork for our success.

Scientists are actuated by a love for the work and faith in the experiments they are making. The sower of the fields loves the good earth and has faith in a reward for his labors. The love for humanity and faith in the results of their labors inspire doctors and surgeons to continue their research and probe all things to find the cause and cure for diseases that afflict the human body. And faith carries them through the countless hours of patient toil to accomplish their goal. Perhaps it is a love for conquest that inspires the mind to great things in penetrating the sky. But it is a living faith that predominates in those braving the conditions of the upper realm and seeking to pierce the mysteries of the cosmic ray.

Our faith in temporal things may waver when we see kingdoms fall and principalities and powers set at naught, but our faith in the spiritual well-being of the human race should always be firm.

It may be hard to differentiate between the temporal and the spiritual as one is dependent on the other. Even as the body without the spirit is dead, so temporal achievements without the spirit of faith cannot long remain alive.

To keep that living faith we must accept as valid all truths and be interested in analyzing events as they transpire.

If interest lags and many become unconcerned about the outcome of world events, faith will falter, and when the final testing time shall come only those who have kept their faith alive will be the victors.

TEMPLE CITY, CALIFORNIA.—The first services were held in the new church on June 4. A consecration service and open house was held on the afternoon of June 25, with visitors from other local churches as well as from other congregations of Los Angeles Stake. Stake President Garland E. Tickemyer gave the message.

August 27 was an eventful day, beginning with a breakfast for the priesthood and men of the group, honoring the seven young men who were called into active service with the California National Guard. The following left September 1 for Camp Cooke: Charles Bickel, Kenneth Briggs, Bob Hacker, Dick Hacker, Wesley Nunamaker, Rollin Postlewaite, and Alan Stiles. Seventy George Njeim brought the challenge to the men.

At the morning worship service, Barbara Louise, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William N. Swain, was blessed by her great-grandfather, Elder F. A. Cool, and Pastor Blaine O. Bender. At the same service, Dick Hacker was ordained to the office of deacon by Pastor Bender and Elder Lee Peterman. In the afternoon, a baptismal service was held at which time Gene Cornford was baptized by the pastor. Other baptisms since the group was organized on April 3, 1949, has been Metta and Rollin Postlewaite and Eula Fay Zimmerman.

The churches of Temple City held a series of five union services on Sunday evenings during the summer. Elder Blaine Bender was the speaker at the opening service on August 6 at the First Christian Church. Our church was host to the other churches on August 27, with the Reverend Kenneth Waterbury as the speaker. Music was furnished by our choir. Young people's fellowship was held prior to the preaching service, and refreshments were served afterwards.

The Communion service on September 3 had added meaning with the confirmation of Gene Cornford and the ordination of Fred Crum to the office of deacon preceding the partaking of the Lord's Supper.

Business meeting was held on August 23 with Elder Thomas R. Beil of the stake presidency in charge, assisted by the pastor. Officers for the coming year are as follows: pastor, Elder Blaine O. Bender; assistant pastors: Elders Royal Doss, Paul Moore, Lee Peterman, and Ralph Sharrock; managerial board, Fred Crum, Roy H. Ferguson, M. W. Gilbert, Frank Hanna and Herbert Saunders; secretary-recorder, Hazel Hanna; treasurer, A. L. Nunamaker; director of religious education, Royal Doss; young people's supervisor, Herbert Saunders; children's supervisor, Helen Bender; director of music, Lois Nunamaker; director of drama, Louise Hill; publicity for Herald, Helen R. Ferguson; librarian, Mary L. Gilbert; historian, Vaun Wellock; hostesses, Alice Hern and Millie Doss; custodian, William Swain; book steward, Clyde Davis; bishop's agent, William Swain.

The regular Wednesday evening prayer services have been well attended, and some fine spiritual experiences have been enjoyed. The Zion's League meets every Friday evening at the church for fun and fellowship. The women of the group have carried out a full program of activity, both in the daytime meetings and the Lo group which meets at nights. An old-fashioned pie and ice cream social netted a nice sum for the building fund. Plans are under way for a pit barbecue on September 16 in which the whole congregation is participating.—Reported by HELEN R. FERGUSON.

CENTRAL ILLINOIS DISTRICT.—The women's institute was held in Taylorville, Illinois. District leader Sister Lena Brown presided. Sister M. A. McConley of Independence, Missouri, was the guest speaker. The theme was "We Witness for Christ Through the Building of Zion's Homes."

The institute was opened by a prayer service in charge of District President Arthur Henson and Missionary James S. Menzies. At 11:00 o'clock a "Welcome to Visitors" was extended by Sister Brown, after which she gave a short talk on "Our Task." Then Sister Adelle Menzies spoke on "Zion's Homes." At noon there was a sack lunch by the Taylorville women.

The high light of the two days institute was Sister McConley's address: "Stewardship in the Home." Following the business meeting, Sister McConley discussed the new Handbook for the Women's Department.

Over one hundred attended the banquet that was held in a downtown hotel. This was followed by a talent program at the church. Different members of the district participated. Sister McConley also gave an interesting account of some of their experiences in Europe.

Other speakers at the institute were Sisters O. C. Henson and A. Halvey.

The next institute will be held in October.—Reported by GRACE OHRN.

NEW YORK DISTRICT.—Two Indian people from the Tuscarora Indian Reservation near Niagara Falls, New York, were recently baptized on the reservation at a service held by William Guthrie and S. W. Johnson. One of the new members, Sister Richard, is the wife of Chief Richard, prominent Indian legislator. Their daughter Beverly Richard has contributed her knowledge on Indian lore and costumes recently to the church youth at Deer Park and at District Zion's League functions.

A district-wide Zion's League retreat was held in Greenwood, New York, August 11, 12, and 13. With a rounded program of recreation, worship, and fellowship, the retreat was attended by over forty young people. The local school board permitted use of all the high school recreational and cafeteria facilities for the week end. Classes were taught by Rodney Burley, S. W. Johnson, and William Guthrie. The retreat was in charge of Fred Knapp, district Zion's League leader.—Reported by S. W. JOHNSON.

MAINE DISTRICT.—Reunion was held the week of July 29 to August 6 at their camp grounds on Lake Winneaugwamauk, Brooksville, Maine. Dormitories were filled to capacity. Many attended from the surrounding area and near-by branches.

The reunion staff consisted of District President Don Harvey, Counselors Chester Gray of Jonesport and Benjamin Carter of Stonington, District Evangelist Newman Wilson of Jonesport, Missionary William Guthrie, and Elder Stanley Johnson, president of New York District. All were under the leadership of Apostle Maurice L. Draper.

Elder William Guthrie was in charge of the adult classes and recreation.

Elder Stanley Johnson, assisted by William Wilson, district youth leader, was in charge of youth classes and recreation.

Elder Benjamin Carter served as camp dean and reunion book steward.

Elder Chester Gray supervised the dining hall and store.

The women's classes were under the leadership of Sister Helen Winslow of Machias, Maine.

The children's department was under the leadership of Sister Chester Gray of Jonesport. Mrs. Walter Bryant of Jonesport served as camp nurse. Priesthood classes were taught by Elders Maurice Draper and Don Harvey.

On August 5 the new youth chapel was made ready for dedication. This service was under the direction of Elders Draper and Don Harvey, district president.

On August 6 at the 11:00 service, a special program was planned for raising a building fund, looking forward to a better tabernacle for the grounds. Over $1,600 was pledged or received.—Reported by BENJAMIN L. CARTER.

HERALD HOUSE INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

The Second Star

By EMMA M. PHILLIPS

THE GOLD STAR that honored the sacrifice Sergeant Clyde Evans had made for his country during World War II was back in the window of the cottage that belonged to his grandmother, Mrs. Alice Evans. And beside it was another star—the star showing that Private Samuel Evans had given his life to his country while serving in Korea.

People of the village talked about the two stars, for they all knew the love that Grandmother Evans had for her two grandsons. They could remember the days when the children of the neighborhood had followed the two grandsons to the Dutch windmill cooky jar in Grandmother's kitchen.

Thus it was that when she stopped young Dick Perkins on the street, his first words were an expression of sorrow over the death of Samuel Evans. Dick and Sam had always been the best of friends.

"Sorrows are to be expected," said Grandmother Evans abruptly, "but I have not stopped to talk about my sorrows. Instead I want to ask you a favor."

A grin covered the face of the youth. "Name it," he said.

"Our church is having a contest to see who can invite the most people to come to church school. If Sam were here, he would invite you. So I'm inviting you. Will you come to church school next Sunday and then come to dinner at my place later?"

Dick shifted his weight from one foot to the other. "Gosh, I'd like to, but—but my girl friend Carol and I have a date in the afternoon with some of the gang from college."

"Fine, fine," and the purple fluff of a feather on Grandmother Evan's hat seemed to nod her approval. "Bring Carol to church school with you. That will give me one more count in the contest. I'll be expecting both of you for dinner." Grandmother winked and walked away before more excuses could be made. She smiled as she thought about how convenient it was to blame her eccentricities on her old age.

Half a block more, and she turned into the village hardware store. Without pausing she went directly to Frank Lloyd, youthful owner of the store. "How do you do, Mrs. Evans," he said very politely as he put down the hammer he was inspecting.

"Just because you have stopped raiding my cookie jar is no reason that you should start calling me 'Mrs.' I'm still Grandmother. But I've come to ask a favor of you. Our church is having a contest to see who can bring the most visitors to church school. You were Clyde's best friend during World War II. If he were still alive, he would invite you. But now I'm inviting you. Church school next Sunday and then dinner at my home later. Dick Perkins is coming and bringing his girl friend."

"Haven't any girl friend to bring."

"I can't understand why you haven't," said the woman as she pushed a lock of gray hair back into place. "You aren't the stiff, old bachelor type. Some woman should have the pleasure of having you for a husband."

Frank forced a chuckle that Grandmother knew was forced. "Be gone with you, Cupid," he said. "I'll be around on Sunday. Have the cookie jar filled up and ready for me."

AFTER CHURCH SCHOOL Grandmother and her three visitors remained for the eleven o'clock service. They sat together: Dick, Carol, Frank, and Grandmother. Before the service started a young woman and her small daughter came to sit at Grandmother Evan's other side.

She walked to the phone and called Mary.

It was Mary, widow of Clyde, and their child. Like her mother, little Betty's eyes were full of smiles and her auburn hair caught the light of the sun as it sifted through the stained glass of the church window.

After a few remarks, Mary leaned in front of Grandmother and said to Frank, "It's good to see you in church again."

He laid his hand on hers as he answered, "And, Mary, it's rather good to be here again. I know I should come more often." His hand patted the plump arm of the child, "Betty has grown so much I would hardly have known her."

But the eyes of the little one were not on the face of the man. They were on his bright tie. She leaned over to Grandmother and shrilly whispered, "Grandmother, why is that big dog on his tie chasing the little dog?"

The corners of Grandmother's mouth turned up, but she said calmly, "Let's talk about such things after church."

"All right, Grandmother, after church you tell me about the dogs."

THE DINNER TABLE of the Evans' home was extended to include two more guests, Mary and Betty. While the women were preparing dinner, the young men and the child walked through the garden.

At the table Carol started a discussion on the Doctrine and Covenants. "It is entirely different from what I thought it was," she confessed. "I was of the opinion that it was a secret book and that people of other churches were not allowed to read it."

"No," Frank said as he ladled rich gravy over his mashed potatoes. "There isn't anything in this church that is a secret. Anyone can inspect any part of it at any time."

The discussion continued about the Doctrine and Covenants and might have gone on longer had not the childish voice of Betty risen in a high-pitched protest of "But, Mother, I can't eat my carrots. I'm all full of crowing rooster cookies."

"Crowing rooster cookies," gasped her mother. "Where in the world did you get such things?"

"Out of Grandmother's Dutch windmill cooky jar," came the honest explanation.

Grandmother Evans looked toward the jar, "Now, Betty," she said reprovingly, "you aren't tall enough to reach into that jar."

"Oh, I didn't have to reach in. Frank got them for me."

The two women looked at the man. With a pretended gesture of embarrassment, he covered his face with his large hand. Laughter and merriment took the place of serious discussion.

The dinner party was a success, such a success that Grandmother Evans was able to secure promises from her guests to attend church school and to have dinner with her on the following Sunday.

AFTER ALL HAD LEFT and the house was quiet again, Grandmother lay down on her bed for a rest.

Her body relaxed, but her mind continued with the adventures of the day. She closed her eyes and meditated on the life that each of her dinner guests was living. She thought of Betty, cute little Betty with her auburn hair and her laughing eyes.

"Mercy," she said as she rolled over on the bed. "Mercy," she repeated again as she stood up and slipped her feet into her slippers. She walked to the phone and called Mary.

Grandmother talked leisurely so as not to let Mary know that she was calling with a definite purpose in mind. When the appropriate opening came in the conversation, she said casually, "Remember those orange-coconut cookies you used to make. Will you please make some for next Sunday? I'll make some more of my crowing rooster cookies."

After the conversation, Grandmother put down the receiver and smiled at the phone. Such unexpected things had happened during the day—and all because she had invited visitors to church school!

She counted on her fingers. "One, Carol has become interested in this church and will investigate it. Two, while she is investigating, she will see that Dick investigates it. Three, Frank has decided to attend church more often."

She smiled again at the phone as she gave her last finger a confirming pat. "Four, I'm going to engineer a romance. Mary should have a husband and Frank certainly needs a wife. And it's not right that a child like Betty should be deprived of a father to boast about." Grandmother chuckled, "Never thought that an invitation to attend church school would lead me into playing Cupid."

How I Stopped "Slanging"

By Blair Bryant

YOU THINK IT and almost say it, and I say it without thinking. What difference does it make?" one of my nonmember friends asked me when I told him what I thought of his swearing. My answer was unconvincing—"Well, at least I don't say it." But did I?

I soon realized that thinking a swear word is the next step to actual swearing. When I started to work this summer, I rarely had a real "cuss word" enter my mind, but once in an environment where profanity was common, I began to think and almost talk like the other men.

When reunion started, a friend and I went up for the week end. There we met another friend. All day long these two would ask, "What did you say?" when I "slanged." Finally I said, "Boys, from now on whenever I say something I shouldn't, I want you to call me on it."

After that I caught myself faster than they could. A week later when we went up for the close of reunion I slipped only a few times. I caught myself before they had a chance.

Now I have gained an almost complete victory over the habit. I even find that I have no swear words entering my mind. I am telling of this experience in hopes it may encourage others to stop "slanging." It makes me feel better to know that I am not being hypocritical when I call down others who are careless about what they say. I feel better, too, because I am using no language displeasing to my Master.

Apology

The lead feature in New Horizons for September 11 was written by Bernard Butterworth, but a number of copies were printed with an "Edward Butterworth" by-line. Our apologies to the author and to all Herald readers who received copies carrying the wrong by-line. EDITORS.

New Horizons

Institute at Brookings, Oregon

An institute will be held October 7 and 8 at Brookings, Oregon. The first service is scheduled for 7:00 o'clock Saturday evening at the home of A. V. Moore. District President J. L. Verhei will be the speaker. Sunday morning services are to be conducted at the Chetco Grange Hall: prayer and Communion, 8:30 a.m.; church school, 10:00; sermon by Missionary Elwin Vest, 11:00. DEATHS

GRIFFIN.—Sharon Ann, daughter of Walter and Margaret Beemer Griffin, was born September 13, 1948, at St. Thomas, Ontario, and was killed in an accident on August 14, 1950. She is survived by her parents; a brother, Gerald Eugene; her grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Harris of St. Thomas and Cecil Beemer of Corinth. Services were held at the L. B. Sifton Funeral Home, Elder Frank Gray officiating. Interment was in Elmdale Cemetery.

CURTIS.—Charles Ellsworth, son of Emsley and Martha Allison Curtis, was born February 11, 1868, at Mt. Pulaski, Illinois, and died August 14, 1950, at Colorado Springs, Colorado. He spent his youth in Independence, Missouri, and on February 10, 1890, was married to Sarah Francis Peabworth there. For the past fifty years he had lived in Colorado. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on May 20, 1877, by his father who was a missionary. Mrs. Curtis preceded him in death on April 15, 1942.

Surviving are three sons: Gomer R. of Swink, Colorado; Henry of Phoenix, Arizona; and Charles A. of Colorado Springs; four daughters: Grace Brown of Colorado Springs; Mrs. Laura Tabor of Lamoni, Iowa; Mrs. Estella Wheatley of Wray, Colorado; and Mrs. Ruth Simons of Warrensburg, Missouri; three brothers: J. Frank of Spokane, Washington; J. D. of Colorado Springs; and Edward A. of Kansas City, Missouri; two sisters: Mrs. Mary Welborn of Independence and Mrs. Rosa Landsberg of Bonner Springs, Kansas; twenty-four grandchildren and seven great-grandchildren. A daughter, Mrs. Ada Robinson, died in 1937. Funeral services were conducted at the Laws Chapel in Colorado Springs, his brothers, Elders J. D. Curtis and Edward A. Curtis, officiating. Interment was in Evergreen Cemetery, Colorado Springs.

KINSMAN.—Ira, son of Mr. and Mrs. John Kinsman, was born October 27, 1862, at Mitchell, Ontario, and died in the Memorial Hospital, St. Thomas, Ontario, after three months of illness (date of death not given). In March, 1889, he was married to Sarah Ann Skelding, and on August 18, 1897, was baptized into the Reorganized Church.

Besides his wife he leaves four daughters: Mrs. Robert Darrach of Sarnia; Mrs. Fred Cosan, Mrs. Alvin Mann, and Mrs. Preston Ford of St. Thomas; a son, Clarence of Sarnia; sixteen grandchildren and twenty-one great-grandchildren. Services were conducted at the P. R. Williams and Son Funeral Home by Elder Frank Gray. Interment was in St. Thomas Cemetery.

HACKEE.—John Robert, was born August 2, 1872, at Rosco, Missouri, and died July 28, 1950, at the home of his daughter in Cypress, California. He was married to Goldie Alice Foster on March 21, 1897; eleven children were born to them. Mrs. Hackee and four sons preceded him in death. He united with the Reorganized Church in 1900 and was ordained to the office of deacon in March, 1940. He moved from Lamar, Colorado, to Long Beach, California, in 1932, and in 1942 he married Lula Vivian, who survives him.

Besides his wife he leaves five sons: Paul of Murchison, Texas; Mark of Baldwin Park, California; Felix of Warrensburg, Missouri; Charles of Paramont, California; and Richard of Compton, California; two daughters: Mrs. Joe Ralston of Cypress, California, and Mrs. Hugh Ralston of LaJunta, Colorado; fourteen grandchildren, fifteen great-grandchildren four sisters, and three brothers. Funeral services were held at Mottell's Chapel, Elder John Davis officiating. Interment was in Sunny Side Cemetery, Long Beach.

SMITH.—Sarah Elizabeth Sampson, was born August 2, 1857, at White Rock, Michigan, and died July 6, 1950. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church for over sixty-seven years and during her life was one of the loyal pioneer Saints in Michigan. She was also a member of the Eastern Star and White Shrine. Many people pointed to her as one who helped them over the rough places in life, and even in her later years she was interested in the welfare of those about her. Her husband died sixty years ago, and a son James preceded her in death in 1926.

Surviving are three daughters: Mrs. B. E. Floyd, Mrs. A. F. Burstrom, and Mrs. George Hooper, all of Detroit, Michigan; two grandchildren and five great-grandchildren. Services were conducted at the Haley Funeral Home by Alma Grant and David Dowker. Burial was in Acacia Park Cemetery.

COX.—Mary Emma, was born October 11, 1884, in Cleveland, Iowa, and died on September 3, 1950, at Sacramento, California. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since about 1897, and at the time of her death was a faithful worker in the Sacramento Branch.

She is survived by her mother, Mrs. Mary Martha Allen, and a sister, Mrs. John Turner, both of Sacramento; a brother, Thomas T. Allen of Everett, Washington; and a daughter, Mrs. Marjorie Gene Oliver of Iowa City, Iowa. Her husband preceded her in death many years ago. Funeral services were conducted by Elder Myron Reed Schall at the Clar, Booth, and Yardley Mortuary in Sacramento. Interment was in East Lawn Cemetery.

GREEN.—Kenneth Henry, was born January 30, 1891, in Sanilac County, Michigan, and died August 30, 1950, of a heart attack at the home of Elder and Mrs. David Van Trump in Independence, Missouri, where he was attending prayer service. On June 28, 1918, he was married to Carrie E. Murphy at Kimball, Canada; two children were born to this union. For twenty-six years he was an employee of the Ford Motor Company in Detroit; he retired in March, 1949, because of ill health. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on July 4, 1905; was ordained a priest on September 1, 1912, an elder on June 23, 1918, and a high priest on September 19, 1937. He served as president of the Eastern Michigan District for twelve years, and as assistant pastor of Detroit Branch for several years. Last September he moved, with his family to Independence, where he continued to minister as his health permitted.

He is survived by his wife, Carrie, a son, Kenneth F. Green of the home; a daughter, Mrs. Eldon Simmons of Detroit; his mother, Mrs. C. K. Green of Independence; two brothers: Ralph F. Green of Detroit and John Blair Green of Independence; five sisters: Mrs. Jessie Schulte of Detroit; Mrs. Burrell Woods of Gonzales, Texas; Mrs. Winifred Campbell and Mrs. Lila Masterson of Independence; and Mrs. Thelma Masterson of Kansas City, Missouri; and two grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Stone Church in Independence, Elders Glaude A. Smith and Hubert Case officiating. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

THOMPSON.—John Clarence, son of Thomas E. and America Scott Thompson, was born May 17, 1884, at Zenia, Illinois, and died September 1 at his home in Independence, Missouri. He was baptized into the Reorganized Church on February 11, 1893, at Beeler, Kansas, where the family resided for twenty-one years. After the death of his father, he moved to Alexander, Kansas, where he was married to Mae Codington on February 21, 1909; while in this vicinity he was engaged in contracting and also served as sheriff of Rush County. In 1922, he moved with his wife and family to Independence where he was a finger-print expert on the police force.

He is survived by his wife, Mae, of Independence; three sons: Carlyle L., Clifford G., and Earl L., all of Independence; four brothers: Oran E., Heman C., and Thomas K. of Independence and Leonard L. of Arkansas City, Kansas; and one sister, Iva Blanche Gault of Independence. Two sons, Carlos and Elvin preceded him in death. Services were held at the Speaks Funeral Chapel in Independence, Elders Thomas Butler and Glaude Smith officiating. Burial was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

GREENSHIELDS.—Albert E., son of James and Margaret Greenshields, was born March 30, 1868, in Guelph, Ontario, and died August 23, 1950, at his home near Salem, Missouri. As a young man he pioneered in Oklahoma and Montana. On March 22, 1905, he was married to Zadie Vickery; four children were born to them. One son, Clarence, died in 1926. In 1935 the family moved to Missouri; from 1943 until his death, Mr. Greenshields resided on a farm just north of Salem. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since 1914.

Besides his wife he leaves a daughter, Ethel, and two sons: Fern and Delbert, all of Salem. Funeral services were held at the Spencer Chapel, Elder William Kuntz officiating. Interment was in Cedar Grove Cemetery, Salem.

WHITE.—Louis R., son of the late Mr. and Mrs. Bryant White, was born April 17, 1897, at Bay Minette, Alabama, and died July 14, 1950, in Bay Minette. On November 18, 1924, he was married to Sybil Marie Page, who survives him. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since childhood. Besides his wife he leaves one grandchild, five brothers, and two sisters. Funeral services were conducted at the Bay Minette Reorganized Church by Elders Franklyn Steiner and Brewton Greene.

ALLEN.—Loretta Furniss, was born March 25, 1887, in Ashley, Utah, and died July 24, 1950, at King Hill, Idaho. She was married to William Allen in 1903 at Driggs, Idaho, and the following year was baptized into the Reorganized Church. In 1905 they moved to Hagerman, Idaho, where they resided until they made their home in King Hill. They had twelve children, eleven of whom survive.

Besides her husband, she leaves six sons: Frank of American Falls, Idaho; Joseph of Shelly, Idaho; Jack of Glens Ferry, Idaho; Dick of Kilgore, Texas; George and Bud of King Hill; five daughters: Mrs. Brenetta Baker of Montpelier, Idaho; Mrs. Loretta Nickerson of Independence, Missouri; Mrs. William Allen of King Hill; Mrs. Ruby Nachtigal of Centerview, Missouri; and Mrs. Katherine Godfrey of Warrensburg, Missouri; three brothers: George of Driggs; Walter and Hugh of St. Anthony, Idaho; and two sisters: Mrs. Jane Lowe of Driggs and Mrs. Belle Blanchard of Hagerman, Idaho. One daughter, Mrs. Leafy McBride, preceded her in death. Funeral services were held in the Bey Chapel in Glens Ferry, Elder Orval J. Baker officiating. Burial was in the Glens Ferry cemetery.

 CHICO'S NEW PROJECT

H. Dean Hintz, pastor at Chico, California, has been in Independence with Mrs. Hintz to consult church authorities about plans for improvements in the church home at Chico. He has some fine ideas, and we wish him continued success in his work.

Observing that other churches in Chico have strawberry festivals and other annual occasions for sociability and fund-raising, Brother Hintz proposed the idea of an old-fashioned "Peach Social." It was adopted, and careful plans were made. There was paid advertising and a generous amount of publicity given by the "Chico Enterprise-Record." The articles were excellent, and many pictures of the festival were used. This was an outgrowth of the fine public relations developed by our congregation there.

The Peach Social was a great success. Other churches helped in many ways, and attended in generous numbers. Total attendance was 500. Pastor Hintz believes the greatest benefits were public good will and friendship for the church, and the morale-building effect on our own people. "But we also took in $400 for our building fund," he says. They sold a little multigraphed, hand-covered book containing sixty excellent peach recipes, and had a needlework booth. Refreshments featured peaches. Other people helped with the entertainment. The social was held at the beautiful home of Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Uhl. Brother Hintz hopes to make the Peach Social an annual affair.

"We have done our best to promote friendly relations with the people of our city, and especially with other churches. I believe we have benefitted in trying to co-operate," says Brother Hintz. He is president of the Ministerial Alliance there.

 APPRECIATION

Here is something to warm the heart on a chilly fall day. Looking among our notes, we found this lovely letter that we had planned to use months ago. Ruth Aslin, 3606 Agnes Street, Lynwood, California, wrote it: "I feel compelled to write a letter of gratitude to all connected with the publishing and editing of the 'Saints' Herald.' I'm so grateful to belong to a church that gives us this kind of reading material. Many times in my weakest moments of despair, I stop and pick up an issue of the 'Herald,' select an article at random, and have never yet failed to be helped and strengthened in my desire to be a better person. It has helped me at times when I've felt there was no answer to some of my problems. My hat goes off to the many fine people who furnish these interesting experiences and stories. May this wonderful work ever continue, and may our Heavenly Father bless all those connected with it."

Now, if you don't feel better after reading that, as certainly the author did after she finished writing it, we have missed a strong surmise.

Think of all the good people who have written articles, with no thought of reward but the consciousness of helping and doing good. The editors just keep things going. The "Herald" is really produced by the people for the people. What you do helps. You make it all possible. In fact, you, and many like you, make the gospel work possible. May we say thanks to you?

Handwork

How Bible Children Lived

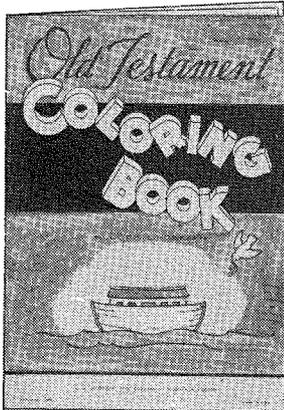

Ruth and Benjamin, brother and sister in the Palestine of Bible times, almost become real-life characters in the 29 outline drawings of this book as events in their everyday life are convincingly pictured. When coloring each illustration, the child receives an interesting step-by-step story on "how Bible children lived"—what they did at play, in school, on holidays, what they ate, what happened in the market place, etc. Size 8½x11 inches.

Price each 25c

Children in the Bible

Contains thirty simple outline pictures to color, each with a brief story. Favorite children of the Bible are the subjects: Joseph, David, Samuel, the twins (Jacob and Esau), Baby Jesus, etc. Includes 15 pictures from the Old Testament and 15 from the New Testament. Size 8½x11 inches.

Price each 25c

Old Testament Coloring Book

Sixteen of the best Bible stories in each book presented sufficiently simple for the small child to color. Short descriptive titles in large type for every picture are worded to the child's vocabulary. A Scripture reference is indicated for each design.

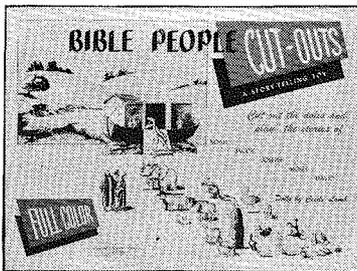

The Old Testament Book includes Rainbow of God's Promise, The Baby Moses, David the Shepherd Boy, and many others.

New Testament Coloring Book

The New Testament Book portrays the Birth of Jesus, the story of the Loaves and Fishes, Jesus and the Children, and others as well known.

Each book has 16 pictures to color, each page 8¾x11½ inches.

Price 20 cents each; $2.25 per dozen

Bible People Cut-Outs

This unusual handwork set has been prepared for the youngster's own use. All together there are six large sheets of Bible people, animals, and objects, in full color to be cut out and assembled into stand-up story scenes. Noah, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, and David are the familiar characters whose Bible lives can be dramatized. 10x14 inches, set in envelopes.

Educating the Congregation

THERE ARE SOME splendid congregations in the church of which we may be very proud. We look to them for strength and leadership. They contribute something of importance to other groups.

Such a fine congregation comes into existence only through patient growth and development. It is possible because the members individually and collectively have been educated. Some pastors and officers have exercised a fine spiritual leadership over them.

Every pastor is an educator—to name but one of his many duties. He sees what his congregation needs and talks to the people about it in a kindly, constructive way. Thus he is able to enlist their co-operation in elevating the dignity and beauty of the services and increasing their respect for the church and its property.

A wise pastor will find a brief time during the Sunday morning service—a time when the largest number of his congregation are before him—to talk to them very briefly about their relationship to the work of the church and its services. He will be careful never to scold or criticize. He will talk about problems in a pleasant, friendly way. He will ask for their help and co-operation. He will be careful to make no demands and issue no orders.

Most people are very willing to respond to reasonable requests in the work of the church. All the leaders need to do is to ask them, and be sure that they understand clearly what is wanted.

This plan of a gradual education of the congregation, one point at a time, has brought great benefits to a number of churches. A little bit of guidance given each Sunday will result in great improvements during a year.

Keep the Church Alive

A KEEN BUSINESSMAN takes care of his business contacts. He joins innumerable clubs and business organizations to get acquainted with men who may be useful in his business concerns.

In the same way a man who senses the importance of such things as honesty, integrity, and moral cleanliness takes care of his religious contacts. It is important for him to know men and women who are also interested in these things, and who know how to promote and safeguard them.

The best place to meet such people, of course, is at church. But the church has to be maintained. It will not be there, ready and waiting to help, unless it is kept alive by the continued attention, service, and support of those same people who want and need its ministry.

Who keeps your church alive when you are at home or busy with other concerns? If you value the service of your church in your community, what are you doing to maintain it?

News & Notes

INCREASE

During the month of August, there were 500 baptisms into the general church. This is the largest number of baptisms since 1929. The next largest was in 1947 when 434 were baptized.

PRIESTHOOD PROGRESS

During the month of September, F. M. McDowell, Director of Priesthood Education, participated in the following district and regional meetings:

Ontario Youth Conference, Erie Beach, September 2-4.

Priesthood Institute, Minneapolis, Minnesota, September 8-10.

District Institute, Fargo, North Dakota, September 15-17.

Four-District Priesthood Workshop, Council Bluffs, Iowa, September 22-24.

He reports a continuing high quality of interest, devotion, and participation on the part of the local priesthood. Much interest is manifest in the new materials now available for priesthood study, reference, and classwork.

NEWS FROM HAWAII

A letter from A. Orlin Crownover reports that "Elder Samuel Lee has made slow but steady improvement. He has been wonderfully blessed, and though he still has a considerable distance to go on the road to recovery, he nevertheless had done remarkably well. He has reasonably good physical mobility, and his mind seems to be very alert and clear."

EACH ONE BRING ONE

Aleta Runkle and Sadi Nagel are helping the Department of Religious Education to promote and co-ordinate the attendance campaign now being conducted in the church school throughout the general church.

NAUVOO

The 1950 spring issue of the "Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society" carried an article by Sister Mabel Atkinson about "The New Nauvoo." The article tells how Nauvoo is becoming world famous because a new type of cheese, known as the Nauvoo Blue Cheese, is being produced there. The author of the article is the wife of Robert H. Atkinson, former pastor at Nauvoo.

KIRTLAND REUNION

The "Lake County News Herald" of August 14 contained a long write-up about the Kirtland Reunion and a picture of Kirtland Temple. The article says in part: "They have patterned their church organization after the New Testament church. They have offered no new doctrine, but they are Bible literalists and believe that they were called to restore 'the lost Gospel.'"

GRACELAND COLLEGE

Paul Deaver of the Music Department and Iola Kaestner of the Home Economics Department completed their Masters degree requirements this summer.

Mr. Deaver finished his Master's work at the Chicago Conservatory of Music. He also studied in the School of Education at DePaul University.

Mrs. Kaestner fulfilled her requirements at the University of Wisconsin.

"What Thinkest Thou?"

"And when he was come into the house, Jesus . . . said, What thinkest thou, Simon." —Matthew 17: 25.

My friend sat in the guest chair in my office. He leaned over and put his finger on my knee for special attention. "There is a subject," he said, "that you should write on for an editorial—What thinkest thou?—It is the most important thing before us today."

"But you could write that one better than I could," I replied.

"I can write some things, but not editorials. You do it."

Then the conversation turned to other matters. But the idea lingered.

* * * * *

Ponder that question a while. Suppose Jesus had put it to you instead of Simon Peter?

What do you think? Many people do not think. They eat, dress, go and come, and spank the children. They drive themselves to many things, but not to think. What do you think?

* * * * *

This is a thrice-told tale, at least. Long ago, when Graceland College was quite new, a Quaker teacher was employed there. Every evening after supper he went into his room, shut the door, and left the light turned off for an hour. Then the light came on. The men students in the dormitory became very curious. What went on in the hour of darkness?

Abandoning discretion and good manners, one of the bolder lads asked him, "What do you do in the dark?"

Astonished, the Quaker replied, "I think." It was the lad's turn to be astonished. Imagine, taking time out to think!

Then the Quaker asked a question, "When do you think?"

The young man had no answer. He had organized all his time for many activities, but none for thinking.

When do you think?

I have been interviewing some local leaders in recent weeks. I ask them about their life and work, and they give me facts and business statistics. Then I say, "Back of every man's life is an idea, a thought, a purpose. What is yours?"

In most cases they have it well thought out; they have tested it in life and experience many times; and they give me a clear reply. You would be surprised how many times spiritual values enter into their statements.

If someone asked you for your basic philosophy, could you state it clearly? What thinkest thou?

* * * * *

Millions of men in this country think that profits are more important than anything else in life. That is what makes a mess of life for them, for others, and for all the rest of us.

There are millions of people in the world now who think that all must submit to tyranny, whether they want it or not. They have adopted the tyrant's formula, "Submit, or die!" And, on our side of the struggle, people are dying because they will not submit. And who knows? Before it is over, we may have to face the same alternative, and decide whether it is better to submit, or to die.

Millions think that sin and pleasure are the most desirable of all experiences. They do not know that "The wages of sin is death." And so, thinking wrongly, they die.

What do you think?

Our church people have their philosophy, too. They believe that the canon of Scripture is not closed, that God reveals his will to those who love him and seek his counsel. They believe in his gospel, the plan for the salvation of the world, and that eternal life is the reward for those who are obedient and good.

Some think that the world is destined for perdition and that nothing can be done to save it; that Christ will return with his kingdom, bringing peace and happiness for the blest, and that all others will be damned. That's what they think.

There are others who think that we must build the kingdom of God, that the Christian society and the Christian world must begin with converted Christian individuals studying and preparing themselves, planning and organizing together, and working together under Christ's leadership and under the divine plan.

"What thinkest thou?"

* * * * *

Everything depends upon the quality and the subject matter of our thinking. You will find some people who are wrong on all subjects, some right about a few things, some right always.

A study of history shows us one truth at least: a superior society can be built only by a superior people.

Great plans may be formed by inspired leaders, but only informed and dedicated followers can fulfill the plans.

The great society—the great Christian Society—that can redeem the world from selfishness, sin, war, trouble, and suffering, can be built only upon the lives of an informed and dedicated Christian people.

If we prepare, plan, organize, and work for our purpose, we can succeed. If we dream and wait, we shall indubitably fail.

What thinkest thou? L. J. L.

Valuable Letters

A few days ago Brother Samuel Winship of Fayette City, Pennsylvania, brought to us a number of letters written by the late President Joseph Smith, which we are pleased to place with many others written by him, for preservation in the archives and for possible use in historical research. Since Brother Winship was here to see us, we have wondered if there are others who have personal letters written by President Joseph Smith, W. W. Blair, David H. and Alexander H. Smith, and members of the apostolic council who have gone on to the other side. Certainly we should be pleased to get them for our Historical Department.

Politics Everybody Business if We Want Freedom Preserved

BY ROBERT L. BISHOP

(Editor's note: The following was featured as a guest editorial in the "Press Democrat," Santa Rosa, California, and is used by permission of that publication. The author is a high priest and a member of the Santa Rosa city council.)

Webster defines politics as "the science and art of government." It is this type of politics which all of us must be increasingly concerned about.

In fact, our future welfare and safety are tied up with our active interest and participation in politics.

There was a time when many thought they could either "take politics or leave them alone." The march of events (many of them tragic) has proved that whenever the majority waive their rights to decide their own political destiny, they lose their freedom.

The basic fact which many overlook is that our politics are inextricably tied to our national and international economics. In other words, the ideals of the people we elect to make our laws and administer them eventually result in good or bad government. Good or bad government is reflected in the cost of government.

The basic cost of government is borne by our taxes. Therefore, good or bad government directly affects our national economy. Putting it bluntly, since politics and taxes are inseparable, a nation may either promote or destroy its economy as a result of placing its politics in the hands of the right or the wrong people.

Let's face, with equal candor, the fact that when we speak of our national economy, we are also talking about our food, shelter, clothing, and luxuries (if any) of our individual families. For instance, when we talk about the British Labor government, we are not talking about some form of politics apart from the British way of life. The Labor government establishes and regulates the British standard of living.

We are not discussing whether the nature of that regulation is good or bad. We are simply emphasizing that politics affect the very core of our lives.

It has been wisely said that "the power to tax is the power to destroy." The truth of that observation becomes more apparent when we study the varying political approaches made by the governments of Europe and Eastern Europe in particular.

Of course it is equally true that the power to tax, when wisely used, becomes the power to build. One wise observer of our times states that what happens to us politically will in a large measure determine what happens to us in every other sense, now and in the future.

Since our world is now so small in terms of time and space, it is important to recognize that the politics of other peoples impinge upon our own way of life. A striking case in point is the Korean action with all its ramifications. It is now apparent that the Korean trouble will affect every phase of our daily living. In many homes this effect will be deeply tragic as well as economic.

In this urgent situation, what can be done to protect ourselves here and now? The very magnitude and complexity of the problem tends to confuse and overwhelm us. Obviously there is no final, pat answer in the form of a permanent cure-all.

However there are some simple fundamentals to keep in mind, and perhaps the most important of these is, that since our politics are administered by men, we must as never before endeavor to elect men of integrity and proven capacity to carry on our government.

Obviously this is not easily done, but the penalty for failure to make the effort is to suffer the disastrous consequences that result from the careless selection of incompetent representatives.

Following the selection of representatives to conduct our political affairs, it is imperative that we take the trouble to get the facts regarding issues involved, and learn how our politicians conduct themselves in meeting such issues.

It is our right and responsibility to give our representatives the benefit of our suggestions and constructive criticism. In no other way can we insure our present and future welfare.

Politics must be our business if our way of life is to be preserved.

The Role of Ministry in the Healing of Men

By DR. EVAN SHUTE

A lecture to the Seventy and Missionary Elders, given at the College Street Church in Independence, Missouri, on Friday, March 31, 1950.

TEXT: Mark 1: 26-40; 2: 1-5.

HEALING MEN means healing the body as well as the spirit. As you would suspect, a physician feels a little more competent to deal with the first part of this topic than with the latter. However, I have deliberately allowed them to overlap in this talk, as they do in actual life. Since I am unequal to my subject, will you let me meander through it, much as a horse long confined to the stable explores a new field in the April sun. Remember we have come through a hard winter up in Canada.

One must wonder about the final values of medical effort. All physicians are impressed by the value of life. It is the most specialized, valuable, and distinguished feature of the world we know. We are taught that its values hereafter will be heightened by proximity to God and eternal realities when we are shorn of all the fashions of this world that now crowd in tightly upon us. Whenever we are at a loss as to what to do about the wounded or sorely ill, we are expected and commanded to persevere life blindly, to preserve it even in the face of leprosy or cancer or consuming pain, even despite the wishes of the patient or his relatives, or in the face of complete hopelessness as to any happy outcome.

There is little doubt that sometimes medical men quietly administer doses of narcotics to the hopelessly and painfully ill that they would hesitate to give to people in better condition—but then severe pain seems to inure patients to the depressing action of narcotics, and it is always difficult or next to impossible to differentiate the dose that is really demanded from the one that implies an excess of medical pity. Mercy killings are as ancient as mankind and will continue to occur, I presume, much oftener than the newspapers are able to record. But even if euthanasia became legalized and a board of five or ten physicians decided that in certain specific, most carefully considered cases, death should be the medical prescription, it would be a very difficult matter to execute the judgment. Who wants to be an axman, even at the behest of the law, or even at the direction of his country? Think how any one of you would feel if such a medical court, however sanctioned by the mercy, morality, and ethics of our epoch, ordered you to carry out its sentence. You would shrink, as would the most humane physician.

And yet, however important is the preservation of life, there are so many fractional lives in the world, people who live as beasts or half-men, people whose minds are stunted to idiotic levels, people whose moral characters are warped, asocial, or even dangerous to society and the welfare of their fellows, those who rape and beget other idiots lawlessly, or who murder for a price. It is difficult to offer good reasons for the preservation of such lives, despite the heroic reclamation of men like Loyola or Augustine or many a stalwart of the Salvation Army.

When I was at the Chicago Maternity Center, which was in the heart of the Halsted and Newberry Street slums, many a crap game went on under our rear windows. Those taking part, always fearful of interruption by a rival gang, carried loaded revolvers. These were held for them by a ring of eager boys while the older men knelt in turn to the great god "Craps." We could boast of many a baby delivered by our predecessors in the slums of twenty years before, babies who had developed into these local gangsters. Once in a while, at 4:00 a.m., in a lousy, stinking, crowded tenement, we wondered what the new life we were ushering in, and preserving with all the solicitude of medical science, would develop into in the unsolicitous, cruel, rapacious world so unimpressed and unimproved by social science.

Any busy practitioner of some maturity has had time to reflect on the values of the lives he has saved or bettered. What good has it done to rescue these people? Often enough, of course, the answer is reassuring and rewarding. The doctor feels he has relieved suffering, has lifted a load of apprehension from pitying and pitiful hearts, has permitted a wonderful talent to bloom and bear fruit for the comfort and glory of mankind, has saved a man who could lead a nation to peace or through the fields of war, or could discover a new healing or a new gadget. But such results of his work are rather exceptional.

A COMMON EXPERIENCE—I won't call it the rule—is that the man who has been helped remains as savage or obdurate as before, cheats, drinks, forecloses mortgages, beats his wife, plays politics while Europe burns—in short is not a whit better for the lend-lease of life now granted him. He forgets both the God who gave him more years and the doctor who was, perhaps, God's left hand; and too often the doctor has to sue him for his bill. Indeed, the collection of overdue accounts is the most cynicizing experience a doctor goes through—and he works at it only second to Himself, was permitted monthly!

Not only are some of these things true of our healing, but, if I may presume to lay a hand on the altar, it seems almost as true of God's interventions among the ailing. Certain examples come to mind to illustrate this fact:

One of the most remarkable examples of healing that ever occurred in the lifetime of a venerable missionary of ours saved the life of a child very far gone indeed. The child grew up. But that person's life could be said to be one long torture, and is relatively hopeless and useless. Did God through his minister do well to save that only child?

A remarkable thing I have seen was the sudden subsidence of fever in a severe case of streptococcus infection—and that in the days before antibiotic drugs—at 10:00 o'clock one Sunday morning. That was coincident with concerted prayer on that person's behalf by our congregation. Yet that girl shortly thereafter left the church and has now been lost track of. She had pronounced musical abilities which we needed then and still could use.

IT WOULD seem that the Lord's healings, whether now or in the time of the Gospels, may appear rather haphazard by any criteria thoughtful men would propose. He withholds healing where we cry in anguish for it and where it seems logically demanded—and vice versa. Truly his ways are often beyond our discovery. The great patterns we can recognize, but individual braids we cannot disentangle. We can know so little of his ultimate or even penultimate ends.

Another mystery in God's healings is their immediate purpose. All but one of the lepers Jesus healed went thankless away. We have no record of their either listening to his message thereafter or coming to his succor. It was purely an unregarded mercy. And Paul, his ablest disciple, the man who molded Christianity was permitted indefinitely to suffer a thorn in the flesh, perhaps a disability of sight. Of what use to heal a man of viper poison if he survives only to die a Roman felon?

DO HEALINGS CONVINCe? It was well said: "These signs shall follow them that believe." When Jesus raised Lazarus, a prodigious feat surely, many hastened to report this blasphemy to the Pharisees who thereafter sought with fresh urgency to destroy Him. Our minds run in easy ruts, and scarcely any of us ever peer over the edge. The scientifically-trained person is tied to the wheels of the monotonous chariot of cause and effect. He dare not free himself, once he has adjusted his pace to that linkage. Thereafter he lives in the reflected glory of the often meager physical truth it conveys. A miracle is such an unpleasant jolt to a tidy academic mind. Indeed, orderly, blinkered minds can be such dreadfully self-satisfied things that, seeing one, God must often be minded, as he was in Green Pastures, to "pass a miracle."

One of the greatest instances of this in our day is found in the studies on telepathy of Rhineland and his group at Vanderbilt. They have mathematically demonstrated the fact of telepathy. The proof is unobjectionable and silencing. Yet the acceptance of their findings is far away. No evidence is adequate to overcome the powerful counter prejudice. It opens windows into far and unpredictable vistas. Scientists, like other men, often prefer to draw the blinds.

The recent surveys of the Atlantic Basin by Professor Ewing's group in relation to the legend of "Lost Atlantis" offer another case in point. They found vast plains, thousands of square miles in extent, whose fundamental basalt was covered thinly, with perhaps only one hundred feet of sediment, this showing no evidence of stratification! This phenomenon challenges all geological views of the origin of the stratified or sedimentary rocks! What about the discovery of sediments seven thousand feet thick on the Bermuda Rise, or of prehistoric beach sand at two and at three and a half miles below the surface, far from any modern beaches—in one case twelve hundred miles from land. Or the Hudson River Valley cut far out on the eastern Continental Shelf, as much as eighteen hundred feet deep in places? That coast has dropped nearly two miles since the river first began to flow! Or what of the remarkable fish whose lower jaw slid in and out instead of opening in the usual way?

Or how shall geologists explain the rock crystals in Maryland suggesting that those rock formations were once at the magnetic pole? And how shall astronomers explain the planet Venus which seems to have been unknown to ancient star gazers.

BEFORE ALL SUCH PUZZLES, the scientist, like the rustic, stands at gaze. He simply suspends judgment. Most men do that before miracles, come to no conclusion but what their amazement implies, and are moved toward no conviction—unless perhaps to a distrust of such "lawlessness"—the invasion of the known by forces unknown and perhaps inimical, certainly unpredictable.

Yet miracles of healing have their place. They strengthen the belief of those who already believe. For there are all shades in our conviction. Few of us, perhaps, would go to the cross or into a lion's den for what we "believe." Only a few men and women in every age have been found worthy when called to the test of martyrdom. Perhaps such valorous saints need no help to surety. But weaker ones, as I am, may need it, and to us the sight of the "Moving Hand" is sometimes vouchsafed, either for warning or encouragement. Such incidents are lively reminders of the presence of a transcendent power, and tell us that we are not alone, that God is aware and cares. "His eye is on the sparrow, and I know he watches me." In the “latter days,” the epoch of concentration camps and “voluntary confessions,” we need to bear this in mind.

MY MIND COMES TO REST in the several dilemmas I have touched on only in the purity and promise of children. My life is spent ushering them into the pews of the world, although that does not demand striped trousers nor a flower in the buttonhole. It's a good task, with good results. It is so obvious that if heaven contains men at all, it must be as little children—or mothers. The rest of us will be looking over each other's shoulders through the crowded door. Theoretically, the innocence of childhood can be preserved, and the life of a Saint Francis or Saint John proves it. Now I find the children of the wicked as lovely as those of the much better. Nothing can be derived from a being or place that does not possess it. Could that mean that our souls are not too unlike, really, whether the world calls us good or bad, and that when we finally slough our skins and a few bones, our inside selves will be not too unlike and all be redeemable? In that hope the most disillusioned can find hope, and my doubts rest.

Now miracles of healing must be well attested, otherwise they degrade the trusting into a state of stupid credulity, and they embarrass and disillusion the faithful who scrutinize them more objectively. Many years ago I began to feel that a miracle of healing should never be reported unless its evidences could stand repetition in a court of law. The diagnosis must be both accurate and reasonable, and confirmed by skillful medical witnesses. The course taken by the disease must be sufficiently off the norm to excite not only wonder and awe, but the respect of those familiar with the remarkable variability the disease may exhibit. There should be confirmatory visual records, wherever possible, such as X rays or photographs taken before and after “God intervened.” Now I would be the first to admit that such evidence is usually hard to come by, is rarely compiled beforehand for later comparison, and even when airtight is sure to be questioned. When a student in Toronto, I heard an old sister testify of the immediate correction of her deformed foot. How I wished that the X-ray evidence that would have been so easy to obtain at the time had been there to accredit the wonderful story. Such criteria should be aimed at, and, indeed, Lourdes in France has achieved something of this nature, as Sir Berttram Windle points out. Now this wins no more or only very few to Catholicism, but it makes the claim of rational and knowledgeable Catholics to God's proximity worthy of respectful hearing. No one, however scornful, can evade really sound evidence. Whether one accepts it or is moved by it is quite a different matter, but sometimes and unpredictably men otherwise adamant do hear that voice. We should have a mesh for every fish.

I have long been offended by some of the silly tales of dubious healings related in our congregations. Discerning people are upset by these. They make one incredulous of even the best reports. False Christs are just antichrists. Pseudomiracles discount all supreme interventions by God in the traditional order of his creation.

PERHAPS I SHOULD CONCLUDE with some practical suggestions on the place of our ministry in the healing of the sick. When called to the bedside of ill members, you always go—even when on occasion doubting the need or the wisdom of the request. You are called at night by those who are too thoughtless to call you by day, or by those who have been ill for weeks past. So few ask if they can send a car for you, or if you have the price of a streetcar fare—and I have known elders who did not—they rarely offer to drive you home. Such callous and selfish attitudes doctors are accustomed to find in the sick and their families, but you must become hardened to it while still keeping a soft shell exposed to the divine impulses. You may know many reasons why the illness is a just punishment, or would seem to be such, or may know of incidents in the petitioner's past life rendering your request for healing something less than whole-hearted and hopeful. Yet you must make it. Often you are called repeatedly when your first prayers fail. How many times should you pray over the affliction? Perhaps the doctor tells you or you already know that the illness is a progressive and steady degeneration, or you know that a vital organ has been attacked by cancer, a knowledge from which the patient has been protected. Still you must attend and must pray the prayer of faith and hope to One who can do all things and intervenes in unexpected ways and persons. God's unexpected mercies are man's hope, for we all deserve so little at his hands.

I suspect that all such efforts of ours in ministry help. They may not avert death, operation, or palsy. But they encourage the patient and his family, they establish God-contacts, and they carry on a noble tradition the priesthood has long maintained—just as the Roman Priest carrying the Host to the dying through night and storm exerts a profound effect on all who hear the passing bell. We are called to strenuous and exhausting duties, as well as to lofty experiences. I have never been quite sure about repeated administrations, believing that the Lord should neither be harangued nor overruled, and that an unrelieved petitioner should be as fixed in the attitude of prayer two weeks after the initial administration as he was at the moment the elders laid hands on him. His call upon God should surely not cease or weaken as they put on their overcoats. Yet we all know of men who have been helped only after repeated calls upon God, and are reminded that Jesus in Gethsemane appears to have prayed three times before he got an answer, even a response in the negative.

You come to the sick in body or soul, bearing gifts. All the great things are gifts. Indeed, you cannot purchase really fine things, such as the gift of healing, sympathy, love, or creative talent like the ability to paint, compose, write, or speak. In a world full of price tags, one of your superiorities over the medical man is this emphasis you should lay on the pricelessness of your kind of help and healing. Indeed, you can point out that a price tag marks a thing down, shows it is second rate.

FINALLY, how shall ministers conduct themselves where physicians are concerned? That depends on the patient, the malady, and the doctor. On account of the last two factors, it will often be wise to speak to the physician, ask about the diagnosis and the expected outcome, and ask what one can do to assist. Nearly any doctor will welcome both such help and your intelligent approach to what is often a great worry to him. Some patients need to know that death is approaching, that wills should be made and relatives summoned—and yet need encouragement, too, in their last great crisis. Some people merely think they are ill and need to be jollied out of their mistake. Some have problems, domestic or economic, that the doctor has no time for, no sympathy with, nor power to aid. In these spheres the minister's help may be unique and bridge the gap needed for convalescence or to secure the future of loved ones.

The doctor too rarely can help the whole man. He is like Alcoholics Anonymous. I know some men completely rehabilitated by that non-clerical organization. But I know of one who has been freed of drink only to run amok sexually, corrupt a widow, and be about to ruin her children, until we intervened with the help of the law.

The minister must help to heal the whole person, body and spirit. If body alone is healed, the last state of that man may be worse than the first—as was found to be true in the ancient days of belief in possession by devils. The doctor often feels frustrated by the results of his labors—if he ever dares to raise his head. What man is better, or how does the world improve with two tonsils less or another scar on the lower abdomen? The ethical hopelessness of their task prevents most doctors from reflecting, or it makes them casual and cynical, or it tells them that the real ends of their work are Cadillacs and Country Clubs and a fashionable wedding for their daughters. Yet every doctor thinks children lovable and worth saving. In them life has not been warped and God's purpose in man marred.

THE CHURCH'S ministry somehow tries to keep the wonderful engine fashioned by the Great Designer from defilement while the doctor keeps the chassis in good repair. Let the elder remember that he is at least on a par with the dignified and impatient mechanic labeled M.D. Indeed, the engineer who devises the motor is generally regarded as being the superior of the man who merely mends its dented fenders. Do not be too humble before the doctor, therefore. Like all other scientifically-trained men, he grasps very little of knowledge as a whole, and, as he studies, this deficiency in his mental equipment becomes increasingly apparent. He is like Dr. Mattill, the great biochemist who presided at a recent Vitamin E Symposium in New York City during a session devoted to enzyme studies. I sat through it quite uncomprehendingly. How relieved I was to hear him at the end of it get up and ask: "Does anyone here have any questions? Does anyone dare to ask any questions?" Most or nearly all of those present must have been as mystified as I was—and yet in that special field I might be regarded as slightly competent. Acquainted as I have been with many medical experts, I have found how regularly they were stumped by the mysteries of their work and how humble the scholars among them were. So much medical "knowledge" is temporary, and tomorrow is looked back on as just a silly tradition. Indeed, if I were to offer advice to any youngster about to enter medical research I would urge him to challenge something all medical men take for axiomatic. Almost certainly such a "fact" could scarcely stand close analysis, and he would make a real contribution to knowledge by his new approach.

Be humble in your contact with medical ministry, therefore, but quietly confident, dignified, and in no degree subservient. If you're talking to a good doctor, he knows how much remains unknown. If he isn't a good doctor, you'll soon be aware of what is unknown to him.

This has been a meandering survey of the broad area where your ministry overlaps that of physicians. It is hard to draw distinctive lines between our efforts, and what boundaries there are have often fluctuated and will move one way and another in time to come. But because man was formed "a living soul," he cannot be departmented successfully. The minister and the physician handle one person. If he fights with his wife, his blood pressure will rise or he will get migraine headaches or a tender bowel. The doctor cannot solve all of that problem with a bland diet or aspirin. In the same way the elder who upsets all pastoral efforts, wrangles in business meetings, or snarls his gossip behind backs may merely have a nagging duodenal ulcer or arthritis, and he won't be a better man till his wheels are straightened. Get the body mechanic to tinker with him before his children leave him and the church, and end up in taverns, the courts, or the haven of Catholicism.

Ministry has power, needs power, and should work toward the whole man. Doctors would if they could.

Experiences of a Missionary - Part VII

South Dakota

IN 1908 I was appointed to labor in South Dakota with Edward Rannie. Going to our field we opened the work in Huron and continued for some weeks in that part of the state.

About that time I received a letter from a lady living in the southwestern part of the state, asking me to come and hold a series of meetings. She believed several would come into the church if a proper effort were put forth. She offered to meet me at the nearest railroad station, more than forty miles from where she lived. After some correspondence I set a date and promised to come. Taking the train, I went to Presho where the lady was to meet me.

A Lady's Promise

On my arrival there I waited several hours, expecting this woman to come after me, but she failed to put in an appearance. It was homestead country with only occasional houses. Upon inquiry I found there was a grocery store and post office about twenty miles distant. I did not have money enough to pay my fare back to where I had friends, neither did I have sufficient funds to hire a liveryman to take me where the woman lived. I did have sufficient money to hire the liveryman to take me to the post office and from there I would walk the remaining twenty miles. We left Presho late in the afternoon and did not reach the office until sundown. I went into the store and asked if there was anyone living near there where I could stay all night. I was informed the nearest settler was about fifteen miles distant. The postmaster said there was a man about two miles away working in a hay camp, who lived in the neighborhood where I wanted to go, and that he might be able to give me some advice that would enable me to locate the people I was hunting for.

Converts

The liveryman returned to Presho, and I took my grips and started in search of the hay camp. I had not gone far until I found it. I explained my condition to the man who was putting up hay and found he was an uncle of the woman who had written for me to come. He had turned his team out for night but got them and drove me to his home, which we reached about two o'clock in the morning. He was kind and hospitable to me and soon we developed a lasting friendship. I remained in his home while in that locality and succeeded in converting and baptizing Brother Kearnes, his wife, and their son.

Some outstanding spiritual experiences came to me while I was in the area. I had to travel some twenty miles to get my mail, as it came only two days of the week and it was often delayed. I had left home when our oldest child, Esther, was only a month old. While I was in this part of the state, she became very ill. My wife had called the family physician and the doctor pronounced her condition serious. My wife wrote telling me of her illness. I was nearly one thousand miles from home, without money, and forty miles from telephone or telegraph service. I wondered if our baby was alive or if she had passed into the great eternity. Naturally I was discouraged.

As I walked across the prairie that day, I longed to know how our daughter was. I not only wished she might be better but, knowing the healing power found in the gospel, I sought the Lord and asked that she might be healed. As I prayed the Spirit came to me and brought light that cheered me. I was made to know that at that very moment our daughter was on her way to complete recovery. Words cannot express how glad I was in knowing the Lord had heard my cry and had given me the information that brought peace and happiness into my soul. A few days later I received a letter from my wife confirming that which I received through spiritual light. Deep in my heart I thanked my Heavenly Father for revealing to me that which meant so much to me in the hour of deep despair.

Prophetic Experience

Another spiritual experience came to me while I was in that section and impressed me most deeply. Many times I had been told by people that were it not for our believing in the Book of Mormon and that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God, they could accept our work. I wondered why the Lord would place in his work that which was such a stumbling stone to many people. I had been reading the Book of Mormon and was deeply impressed with the spiritual content found in it. After spending the entire day reading from its pages, I retired for the night.

By L. G. HOLLOWAY

I soon fell into deep sleep and had a most outstanding dream. In this dream I saw in the northwest sky a large circle. There was also a large circle in the southwest. In between these two circles I saw a smaller one with three spokes; this circle was spinning like a top. Soon it disappeared and a most beautiful framework became visible. In this frame appeared the date "1914," and beneath the date these words, "War on land and sea." I realized millions of people were witnessing the same thing as seen by me. Soon this inscription disappeared and another inscription appeared. It read, "The Book of Mormon is divine." I thought millions of people saw this statement which meant that instead of the Book of Mormon being such a stumbling stone it would now become one of the outstanding witnesses for Christ. I shouted for joy as I awoke.

The Spirit of the Master enveloped me and revealed the meaning of the dream. War was to begin in 1914 that would terminate in the loss of many lives, reaching into the millions. Following this terrible conflict, the ten tribes would come to the attention of the world, and they would bring a record of God's dealing with them; their record would bear witness to the truth of the Book of Mormon. It was not made known to me how long after the war this would take place, but I am sure it will come. This experience I wrote to my wife and also in my diary which I have in my possession at the present time. This was given to me some six years before the war started. I have witnessed the fulfillment of the first part of the dream, and I am sure the part relating to the Book of Mormon will also be fulfilled. The book then will not be a stumbling stone, but will be one of the strong evidences of the divinity of our work.

I remained in that locality for several weeks doing what missionary work I could and succeeded in converting a few more people to the gospel. Friends gave me sufficient funds to take me to the eastern part of the state, so I left for that field.

A Walk in the Rain

For some reason South Dakota has never been a field in which our work has prospered there being only three organized groups in the entire state. However, we do have quite a number of Latter Day Saints scattered in different parts of the state. Living near Kidder was Brother J. P. Bierlein who invited me to hold services in that vicinity. I took a train for Kidder arriving late at night. On inquiry I found Brother Bierlein lived about two miles out in the country. Under ordinary conditions, I would not mind walking that distance, but on my arrival in Kidder I found it raining heavily. It was my first visit to this place, and being unacquainted, I dreaded to hunt for his home in the darkness, of night and with the rain falling in torrents. Following directions given me, I started out and after some time came to a farmhouse that I concluded must be his home. I rapped on the door, and there was no response. I called, but still heard no answer. I went to the barn and thought I might find some hay in which I could make my bed, but again I was disappointed in finding no hay.

The only thing to do was return to town and try to find a place to stay. Carrying my baggage I got back to Kidder about midnight. After some effort I aroused a man in a hotel; he was kind enough to let me share his bed with him as the hotel was crowded that night. The next morning a telephone call came from Brother Bierleins' daughter; she informed me that her father was in Texas looking after some business but would be home in a short time. She also informed me they had heard my rapping on the door and also my calls, but became afraid and would not answer. They had sat up the remainder of the night and had even called some of the neighbors in as they thought a burglar must have made the noise. The next morning they talked the matter over and decided it must be the missionary instead of a burglar so called the hotel to find out.

Brother Bierlein came home in a day or two and we arranged to hold services. I conducted meetings in some of the near-by places with excellent interest, and much good resulted from this visit. We had many hearty laughs over the incident, but I would not care to repeat the experience.

In Hecla, South Dakota, I had the pleasure of holding services in the high school building. The Methodist minister also invited me to speak in his church, which I did. I was glad to do this as there had been much opposition to our work on the part of some of the Methodists, and this to a large extent removed the bitterness.

Return Home

This closed the work in South Dakota, and I was glad to turn toward home. I had not seen our baby from the time she was one month old until she was six months of age. When I arrived home her mother was out of the house, and the baby was in her buggy crying as if her heart was broken. When I entered the room I went to her and began to talk to her. She ceased crying, and looked at me in astonishment. She knew I was a stranger. My wife soon came in and we had a very joyful meeting.

The lot of a mother is a hard one when she is left to care for the family and the many problems to meet. The life of the missionary is also hard as he finds himself far from home, lonely, discouraged, and homesick to see his wife and children.

Reflections on Glauud Rodger

I have often thought of Brother Glauud Rodger, one of our first missionaries to Australia who spent five long, weary years away from his family. Some years ago I stood by his grave in Elko, Nevada, and as I looked on the wooden board that marked the place where his body rests I asked myself, "Do you love the gospel? Are you willing to sacrifice for it as this servant of Christ sacrificed?" I had to answer that such love as he manifested is not found in ordinary men. After he returned to America, he was not permitted to remain long at home but was sent to the Pacific Slope Mission. There disease took hold of him and for days and weeks he struggled, hoping to recover and see his family again. That privilege was denied him, and he passed to his reward without being granted the desire of his heart.

As I stood beside his grave that day, I could not help feeling that here was a man who gave his all that mankind might enjoy the sweets of the gospel, not only the pleasure that it brings in this life, but that which awaits the pure in heart in the celestial kingdom of our God. No one except Christ and the Father can fully sense the sacrifice of the missionary and his family. For fear someone will think we are placing too much stress on the sacrifice made by those who are sent out to warn the world, let me add this: I consider the mission field a glorious opportunity, and in a very marked way men are repaid for every sacrifice they make.

As I go back over the years of labor in the field, I am persuaded by my own experience that happiness is found when you give something of real worth that continues to live in the souls of men. Some of the happiest moments of my life have been spent in preaching the gospel to those who have been converted to the teaching of Christ. As we share with him the saving of the world, we also share with him the glories of the great eternity.

A Missionary's Reward

A missionary many years ago was laboring in the city of St. Louis, Missouri, and as he was passing along one of the principal streets where the multi-millionaires lived, he could not help admiring these homes. He was a poor man, having very little of this world's goods, and naturally he thought of the great wealth represented in these homes. As he walked he felt a craving for some of this wealth. He could use it not only for his own welfare, but also in helping his fellow men. As he looked upon these homes he said in his heart, "Lord, might I not possess the wealth of Lindle Avenue?" No sooner did he say this, than the question came to him, "Would you exchange your experience in this latter-day work for the wealth of Lindle Avenue?" There was only one answer, "No, Lord, I would not exchange my experience in this wonderful work for the wealth of Lindel Avenue."

Every missionary who has faithfully done his part can say the same thing. While these experiences cannot be equal with the hope of eternal life, yet they are a foretaste of that which men will receive in the presence of the Master.

I can recall several times when I have convinced men of the truth of the gospel and have been privileged to baptize them into the church, these same people have come to me afterward and told me they were happy to be members and that they had felt the power of the gospel in their lives, transforming them from darkness and despair to a condition of light and peace. Such is the testimony of those who have been brought into the marvelous light of this latter-day evangel. This work has opened to them a most wonderful field, and they have known the truth of the message as restored by angelic hands.

Training Leaders for the Rural Church - By GERALD GABRIEL

THE training of leaders is a most important task of the rural church. This problem is shared by all rural organizations. The few leaders found are leaders not only in the rural church but frequently in other organizations also. The rural church has developed leaders in the past and gladly shared them with farm and community organizations, which often resulted in overworking certain individuals. Today other rural organizations train leaders which the rural church may call upon for assistance. Never before in history have there been so many leaders in rural life. The growing church must use them.

Rural people often refuse to accept responsibility on the grounds that they are not qualified or do not have the time. Quite often the latter is true, since the few leaders available are already doing more than their share. Some may have the time, but feel inadequate for the tasks they are asked to perform. Many have had little or no preparation for such tasks and, willing though they be, have a horror of bungling a job before the eyes of their friends. Consequently, in the small congregation, willing leaders too often must take on many leadership responsibilities concurrently.

True leadership is voluntary, non-professional, and a service given without financial reward. Leadership is a result of training and practice, and of the functioning process of group action. The true leader is a member of the group, often developed under the stimulus of a definite need created by a changing social order. That stimulus arising from a sense of need will largely determine his success and continuous leadership.

Dr. Sanderson, Leadership of Rural Life, says:

The demands for rural leadership will be met only as those who are in position to stimulate and train leaders have a clear understanding of just what is involved in the process of leadership, for with such insight their faith in the possibility of creating leaders will be strengthened, and they will be confirmed in the conviction that the slow process of building leadership is the surest means of any permanent rural improvement.

THE potential leader must first have the conviction that the church is worth while. He must be concerned with its message and the place of the church in the community. Everyone desires to be led; everyone at some time or another desires to lead. Leadership-followship in this relationship are reciprocal. Leadership is desirable for social prestige. The rural church desires good leadership that the church may have prestige in the community.

In creating leadership, the church must first create a sense of obligation in each member to do his part in achieving the objective of the church. This is really creating morale, making for a lively appreciation of the purpose and objective of the church. When a job needs doing, there must be volunteers to help. When members are content to let someone else do the work, their morale is weak. Leaders must have enthusiasm for their work and loyalty for the objectives of the church.

Leaders sometime fail to volunteer because of negative criticism. Members of any organization must be made conscious of what this kind of criticism does for them. It has been aptly stated, "Anyone can find what is wrong with people, but it takes intelligence to find what is right." It is good policy for any organization to use criticism, but always remember that positive criticism is encouraging while negative criticism is discouraging. If criticism is due, it should be positive when given in the presence of others; negative criticism should always be given in private. Member critics may be put in places of responsibility to keep them busy in their own work so they will have less time to criticize. This will also help them to develop sympathy for the shortcomings of others.

Dr. Sanderson also says:

One important condition for the favorable development of leadership is to give young people all the responsibility they can carry. Youth may not have the wisdom of older people, but they have the initiative and courage that should be exercised rather than suppressed. The organizations, churches, granges, et cetera, which throw responsibility upon their young people are lively ones. Young people will not respond unless they are trusted. Herein lies the value of such groups as the 4-H clubs, Scouts, and similar organizations for the adolescent, which give opportunity for development and training in positions of leadership.

LEADERSHIP is trained, in the last analysis, only through experience. However, this is a slow process and sometimes very costly. Leadership has significance to the trainee when the actual experience is taking place. This may be an apprentice working under the supervision of someone else and can be effectively accomplished by rotating or shifting leadership responsibility to trainees under good supervision. This type of supervision will analyze and interpret successes or blunders as they happen and thus avoid many unpleasant experiences.

It is important to make leadership easy for beginners. Physical activities such as ushering and serving at church socials do well for the first steps. Group mental activities such as singing in the choir and enrolling in discussion groups or training classes may follow second in this leadership learning process. Training in individual mental activities, such as conducting worship programs in classes of small groups or doing contact work with more experienced members, may be the third step. These steps can be made a pleasant task for the new leader; being pleasant they are desirable and encouraging to the trainees.

Many "hard knocks," embarrassing situations, and discouragements may be avoided if the apprentice leader has had some previous study in leadership-training classes before his responsibility becomes very great. Some ideas will have to be "unlearned" if the potential leaders do not have a thorough knowledge of fundamentals.

Ordway Tead in "The Art of Leadership" says that a leader should have (1) a knowledge of the general characteristics of human nature; (2) self-knowledge of his own unique combination of qualities with their varying degrees of strength and weakness; (3) a working grasp of the right attitude to possess in dealing with people; (4) an ability to ply all this knowledge to the mobilizing of energy and enthusiasm for the special objectives of the organization; and (5) the will to make deliberate efforts at broadening his total personality in cultural direction. In addition, there must be available literature prepared for the potential leader's specific problems in the form of handbooks, manuals, etc. The trainee is better prepared if he has some general knowledge of related fields. Less supervision is needed after the apprentice gets the "feel" of the work, for he begins to interpret, analyze, and take note of the experiences of other leaders. Leadership is not, however, attained at this point. The rural church will do well to provide training courses for its leaders and potential leaders. (Continued on page 19.)

Christiana Salyards

THE LORD must have helped me many times in my work, because I didn't know the Scriptures at all. Why, I had hardly read a chapter in the Bible when I first started to write quarterlies."

The frail woman lying in the bed at Resthaven spoke humbly. Looking back over her years of writing for the church, her thought was not that she had set records for service but that God had been kind enough to make her an instrument in his work. She had been the first to write quarterlies for the Reorganized Church when the Sunday school movement was begun. For many years she was the only one to write quarterlies for all ages. For thirty-five years she wrote the senior quarterly. She also wrote three books. In her work she may have influenced more people in the church through the written word than any other single member.

CHRISTIANA SALYARDS, daughter of Charles and Katherine Stedman, was born on March 30, 1861, in Rochelle, Illinois. She was a baby when the Civil War began, and one of her earliest memories is of Lincoln's second election to the presidency. From Rochelle, the family moved to Depue, Illinois, where Christiana was graduated from high school when she was seventeen and began her school teaching career in the country schools near by.

When she was twenty-three, she went to Kansas to care for her grandparents for the winter. The grandparents were Latter Day Saints who had been in the original church under the leadership of Joseph the Martyr and were now in the Reorganization. Two months later she was baptized in the Little Blue River on October 27, 1884, by Elder Alma Kent.

Up to this time, Christiana had found little opportunity to study the Scriptures, much less the particular doctrine of the church she had joined. Now she began studying tracts, and prayed that she might have some assurance that this church had the truth. The second week following her baptism, she had a spiritual experience which gave her a faith that has lasted throughout her life.

Returning to her home in Illinois, Christiana went back to her teaching and studying. The beginning of her writing for the church was most casual. One Sunday afternoon while she was reading the Mother's Home Column in the Herald, she decided to write a letter to the column which was directed to Marietta Walker. When she had written the letter and stood holding it in her hand, she was astonished by a sudden baptism of the Spirit. At the time she could not understand it, but later she knew that it was because this was the first time she had used a pen in the service of the church.

This letter began a long and pleasant relationship with Marietta Walker whose name even then was almost legendary in the church. The two met when Christiana visited Lamoni on her vacations, and before long Sister Walker was urging the young woman to move to Lamoni to teach so that she might help more with church work. One day while Christiana was walking to the post office to get the mail, a voice spoke to her, "I have called thee in righteousness and will hold thy hand." It was a comforting message, but puzzling as she had no thought of doing any specific church work then.

ABOUT THAT TIME the Sunday school movement was gaining prominence in most churches, and a Sunday school association was set up by the Reorganized Church to begin the work. There were no Latter Day Saint quarterlies, and the authorities did not know of anyone to get for the job of providing them. Marietta Walker urged them to get the young schoolteacher from Illinois. Letters were written, visits were made, some persuasion was used. In the end, Christiana moved from Depue to Lamoni, and "on the Monday after the Fourth of July, 1892," she went to work.

At first, Brother J. A. Gunsolley was assigned to help her, but he had no more idea of where or how to begin than she did. As a model of what a quarterly should be like, Christiana had brought a Congregational quarterly with her from Depue. The content did not interest her, but the format did. On that first Monday morning she sat down with Brother Gunsolley in Sister Walker's living room. On the table before them was a King James Bible, the Inspired Version, an old Bible dictionary, and the one quarterly. With these tools, they began the first quarterlies for the Reorganized Church.

Together they completed two quarterlies for the three grades, senior, intermediate, and primary. Then Brother Gunsolley became ill and had to drop the work. Christiana was terrified. She could not possibly go on with the work alone. To keep busy while she waited for Brother Gunsolley to recover, she decided that she could go ahead and write the review questions for the last lesson they had finished. Then she decided to go ahead and try writing the next lesson for the three grades. When she found she could do it, she lost her fear of carrying the responsibility alone. After that, she wrote all the quarterlies for many years, and wrote the senior quarterly until 1927.

IN HER PRIVATE LIFE, Christiana Stedman was not idle. In 1895 she married Richard Salyards who was secretary of the church for thirty years and also served as private secretary to Joseph Smith. Although she had no children of her own, she reared her husband's three children in addition to her writing and housekeeping. "Whenever I found myself slipping behind in one of my jobs, I'd get a girl in to live with us and help me get caught up," she remembers now. As a result, she had help about half the time.

"I was a kitchen-apron editor," she recalled. Most of her work was done on the dining room table while she kept one eye on the kettles on the kitchen stove in the daytime, and shared the writing space with the children as they prepared their school lessons in the evening. "But only one page of manuscript was ever lost" in this close work, she said. At that time all her writing was done in longhand with a pen; only in later years was she supplied with a typewriter and desk to make her work easier.

"As a general thing, I had to work hard." Lying on the comfortable bed at Resthaven, she stared at and beyond the ceiling. "The Lord may have helped me, but he made me do what I could by myself first. When I got to the end of my tether, he was always there. Like the time I had to write thirty-five lessons for all three grades in two months. That meant really 105 lessons! I just bowed my head on my hands and said, 'Lord, I can't do it this time if you don't help me.' Then I budgeted my time and started to work, and he helped me. We got the lessons finished on time."

IN 1918, the Salyards moved from Lamoni to Far West Stake, and in 1924 to Independence. In 1927, at the age of sixty-six, Sister Salyards turned over the responsibility of writing the senior quarterly to someone else. But her work was not done. She turned her attention to writing books, and by 1942 had written three books: Life of Christ, Men Nearest the Master, and The Enduring Word. Age, plus the loss of both her husband and her health, slowed up her work. In 1948, having no relatives in or near Independence, she went to live at Resthaven. "I found a few people here whom I had known before, so I feel among friends."

But even age and poor health could not dull her driving spirit. She began and finished what she refers to as the "statement" of her life.

The rough draft is still in manuscript form, and it is hard to tell if it will ever be turned into the polished product that the author would like to see go out under her name. Frail as she is, her eyes light up and her voice becomes stronger when she speaks of it. "Why, I could revise it myself if they would let me! I don't want anybody changing my experiences around. I have my typewriter right here in the room and could peck out a little every day."

One wishes that she could.

Why Should I Vote? — By Dave Schmidt

A Department for Debatable Topics

The views expressed in this article do not commit the "Herald" or its editors but stand on their own merits. Should other views on this topic be offered for publication, they should be affirmative, free from personal references, and possess literary merit.—Editors.

IT IS MY OPINION that those who are undecided in regard to the merits or demerits of any measure to be voted upon would act wiser not to vote. Certainly such voting is as apt to do as much damage as it is to do good.

The same is true regarding candidates for public positions. Unless we have reasons to believe the candidate we vote for will fulfill and discharge the duties of the office better than the others, we should not vote for him. To support a candidate simply because he belongs to our church, party, or organization is shallow principle. Such choosing is back of most of the corruption in every political organization.

I prefer to vote for the one who I think will be the most efficient even if in so doing I am required to vote against my organization, church, party, best friend, or nearest of kin. Furthermore, I believe it is the duty of everyone who would vote to inform himself, if possible, regarding the character and fitness of any candidate for public position so that he may vote intelligently.

I also believe it is the duty of every would-be voter to inform himself, if possible, in regards to the merits or demerits of the propositions or measures to be voted on so that he may have definite convictions of his own regarding them, rather than voting for or against them just because others in whom he has confidence are voting a certain way.

Until we as voters have a better concept regarding the measures and men we are voting for, our progress in government and other organizations will necessarily be slow.

After the vote is taken on a measure, those in the minority should abide by the law or decision. However, if it still seems to be a bad law or a mistaken decision they should continue to work for its repeal or correction. By so doing they are more loyal to the government than those who, for the sake of unity, say nothing. The influence one exerts for or against a measure is of greater importance than his personal vote.

Question Time

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. Address questions to Herald Editors rather than panel members. We shall try to take all questions in the order they are received. Be patient, there may be several ahead of yours. Only signed questions sent by contributors will appear here.—EDITOR.

QUESTION:

Where is the spirit assigned at death, also at the time of the resurrection?
Wisconsin Mrs. I. D.

ANSWER:

The spirits of men are assigned by the Lord to whom they first go at death, to their appropriate places according to their spiritual standing and fitness in one or another of the four groups into which humanity is divided in the future world. Some are placed with the celestial group, some with the terrestrial, and some with the telestial, all of these being in line for salvation in varying degrees of glory. There is a fourth state known as perdition to which belong the wicked who have rejected and crucified to themselves the Christ, thus committing the unpardonable sin. These remain in chains of darkness until the judgment day when they are resurrected. For them there is no salvation.

These spirits all remain in their appointed places until their resurrection, the righteous (including both the celestial and terrestrial groups) coming forth to immortal life in the flesh, the first at Christ's appearing, and the second just after he comes. The celestial will reign with Christ upon the earth during the thousand years, and though the terrestrial are raised on the earth, we know of no statement affirming that this will be their abode during that period, but mention is made of their inheriting another kingdom. The telestial people remain in the spirit state until the end of the millennium when they will be raised and judged. The sons of perdition are also raised after the telestial and just before the judgment, when they will be sent away with the devil and his angels.

After the thousand years are past, the earth will be wholly changed and celestialized to become the eternal abode of the celestialized beings. Where terrestrial and telestial groups will find their permanent places we are not told, though it cannot be on the earth.

QUESTION:

Daniel 12: 1 mentions Michael, the great prince for the "children of thy people." Who is he?
Nebraska N. H. B.

ANSWER:

Modern revelation answers the question. "And the Lord appeared unto them, [read the entire paragraph and look up the index in Doctrine and Covenants] and they rose up and blessed Adam, and called him Michael, the Prince, the Archangel."—Doctrine and Covenants 104: 28.

JAMES E. BISHOP.

QUESTION:

In the gospels it is stated "Go out into the highway, and hedges, and compel men to come in, that my house may be filled." What does this mean?
Alberta L. L. A.

ANSWER:

The reference is a part of the parable of the great supper found in Luke 14: 15-24, which describes a phase of the work of God under the restoration of the latter days. The supper signifies the spiritual feast which will be provided in the Zion of this last dispensation in preparation for the coming of the Lord, the first call being "to them that were bidden," referring to the Gentiles to whom the invitation had been extended in the New Testament dispensation. Their right of opportunity did not end with the apostasy, for which reason the latter-day restoration of the gospel came to the Gentiles and is still being preached to them. The order is "First to the Gentiles, then to the Jews."

Another description of this supper or feast is found in Doctrine and Covenants 58: 3; this also corresponds to the prophecy of Isaiah 25: 6. The first call is to the rich, the learned, wise and noble, which is descriptive of the Gentile nations in their highly developed civilization whom the parable represents as being too busily engaged in secular affairs to respond. The second call is for the poor, maimed, halt, and blind to be gathered in; for there is yet to be room. Again the servants are sent out to compel them to come. The second call was to outcast and downtrodden Israel as indicated in Doctrine and Covenants 87: 3; 104: 12, 13, 43; 17: 2; 18: 3 and other places.

The children of Israel are represented in the Scriptures as having been scattered to remote parts of the earth, their identity lost to themselves and to the world. These include vastly more than the known Jews who are but a remnant of the whole. They are described as without the knowledge of God, in spiritual darkness, blind and deaf, some of them in idolatry, and as being the downtrodden of the nations. These are the people whom the Lord will call to his gospel feast when the exalted of earth refuse.

The urgency of this call to Israel is expressed in the word "compel," which is not used in the sense of compulsion but of strong persuasion (see dictionary). Young's literal translation puts it, "constrain to come in," and Moffatt's "press the people to come in." It merely signifies that the appeal will be strongly made. This is described in the Scriptures as the special endowment of the Spirit and power of God:

The word may go forth unto the ends of the earth, unto the Gentiles first, and then behold, and lo, they shall turn unto the Jews; and then cometh the day when the arm of the Lord shall be revealed in power, in convincing the nations, the heathen nations, the house of Joseph, of the gospel of their salvation. For it shall come to pass in that day that every man shall hear the fullness of the gospel in his own tongue, and in his own language, through those who are ordained unto this power, by the administration of the Comforter.—Doctrine and Covenants 87: 3, 4.

Jesus spoke to the Nephites of that day of Israel's restoration:

And then shall the power of heaven come down among them; and I also will be in the midst, and then shall the work of the Father commence, at that day even when this gospel shall be preached among the remnant of this people. Verily, I say unto you, at that day shall the work of the Father commence among all the dispersed of my people; yea, even the tribes which have been lost.—III Nephi 10: 4, 5.

For 120 years now the invitation has been going to the Gentile nations. The time is near when it will go to Israel under such power of the Spirit that the Lord's house will be filled. God says this will be "the day of my power" (Doctrine and Covenants 58: 3).

Letters

Guided by Prayer

I first heard about this gospel by mail. I was living in Groveton, Texas. My sister Tillie had written me a letter, telling me about some of the elders who had been around my father's place preaching. My mother, father, and sister had been going to hear them and had enjoyed the services. At that time I had heard of the Mormons but didn't know much about them.

The next spring we came back to Michigan for a visit, and I saw my mother and sister baptized. While we were home, Brother Summerfield came to my father's house to preach a few times. We enjoyed every sermon we heard. He preached on the new gospel that was brought back to earth by the hands of an angel and on faith, repentance, baptism by immersion, and the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Spirit. When we went away those thoughts seemed to stay with me, and I started reading my Bible more. I had been sprinkled in the Presbyterian Church, but this did not seem adequate according to the Scriptures.

Later we returned to Michigan, and I had the opportunity to hear more sermons. I continued to fast and pray that I might know the truth of this work and that, if it were the will of my Heavenly Father for me to change my religion, he would make it known to me.

One morning while sweeping the living room floor at my mother's, I leaned upon the broom and said to myself, "I wonder if God is going to answer my prayers and if they do preach the true doctrine of Jesus Christ, and if my Heavenly Father would like for me to change." Just then the words came to me, "Only trust and obey." The words didn't come alone but with the power and witness of the Holy Spirit. I looked to the right and then to the left; there wasn't another person in the room that I could see, and I said the words over to myself, "Only trust and obey." Then I said, "I believe I know now that God wants me to accept his gospel and be baptized." When I said this I felt the power of the Holy Spirit from the top of my head to the bottom of my feet.

I had heard about different spirits, so I prayed, "If this is the Holy Spirit, will you please let it rest again," and it did for the third time. So I made up my mind right there to accept this gospel and be baptized.

My sister Tillie was going out to practice for a church entertainment, so I wrote a note to Brother Summerfield and sent it by her, asking him if he would baptize me Sunday morning. The word came back he would be glad to.

When my husband came home Saturday night, I told him I was going to be baptized. I suppose he felt as I did on the start, because he said, "You belong to a church; you are good enough. Why do you want to join the Mormon Church?" And I said, "They are not Mormons. I feel that I have been directed, and I do believe in the restored gospel." I asked him if he would go to see me baptized, and his answer was no.

I knew I had my own soul to look after, and I knew no one could do that for me, so I said to myself, "I will take my stand for Christ if I have to give up all." With that thought in mind, I went forward and was baptized, and God has helped me and blessed me through sickness and afflictions and has answered many prayers.

There were several things I wanted to see come to pass, so I kept on praying for my husband and family. God had given to us two girls of whom I have always been very proud. I began to pray for them when they were very young, asking God to help me rear them; and when they reached the age he saw fit for them to accept the gospel, to put it in their hearts and minds to do so. One day the oldest one came to me and said, "Mamma, when we go back to Grandma's in Michigan I want to be baptized." She was past nine years old. I had been praying for it, but wasn't looking for my answer quite so soon. I said, "You are young, but I would like to see you accept the gospel. If you do I would love to see you live it." Her answer was, "Mamma, I am willing to try." So I took her in my arms and said how glad I was to think I didn't need to coax or persuade her. When she was ten years old we went to Michigan, and she was baptized by Elder Pendleton.

The younger girl came to me when she was only eight years old and said she would like to be baptized. I said, "We may not get to go to Michigan this year but I want you to pray to God and tell him what you would like to do, and ask him to take care of you until we do get to go back and you are able to be baptized. I will pray for you, and I am praying for your Daddy, and I want you girls to pray for him too." The following year we were able to return to Michigan.

When we got to Bay City, Brother Hawm had gone to Vasser to attend a two-day meeting, but I was told at the church he would be back on Monday. We had sold a place up there and were having everything straightened up on Monday. Mr. Shaw, my sister-in-law, and I started down to the lawyer's office. We left my husband there and went over to Brother Hawm's. He had just got back from the meeting and had brought others with him. I told him my youngest daughter wanted to be baptized, so he said they would all go over to the church. I was to meet my husband at a certain place, and I told Brother Hawm how I had been praying for him and asked him to explain some things to him. He said he would, and when we met my husband, Brother Hawm walked to the church with him. I then left him and went into a store and got my husband a pair of pants, a shirt, and a pair of socks. When I got to where our girls were, I said to Ruth, "Hurry and get into your dress that you're to be baptized in." They noticed my package and asked, "Mamma, what have you in the paper?" I said, "Some things for your Daddy." And they asked, "Is Daddy going to be baptized?" I said, "I do not know, but I hope so." When we got to the church, my husband came to meet me. I said, "I wish you were going to be baptized, too." He said, "I would, but I haven't anything to be baptized in," and I said, "Yes you have. I bought some extra clothes for you."

I can't begin to tell how happy I was. God had answered so many prayers in the way I had asked him to. I still had faith to believe he was going to grant this request, so I didn't let my husband lose any chance by not having the things there for him to be baptized in. Father and daughter were baptized together.

I have had to live away from the church nearly ever since I accepted the Restored Gospel until the last few years, but I have found out as long as we are close to the Master and try to live our religion that our Heavenly Father will help and bless us wherever we may be.

Respect Brings Greater Service

If my people will respect the officers whom I have called and set in the church, I will respect those officers; and if they do not, they cannot expect the riches of gifts and the blessings of direction.—Doctrine and Covenants 125: 14.

By ELSA V. DAVIES

THIS COUNSEL is usually and quite properly applied to the work of the ordained ministry of the church, but all who have labored in any office of a branch, whether it be that of janitor or departmental leader, have felt the need of respect as they have attempted what is a new adventure for them. More failure to take responsibility is due to fear than we generally realize—a fear that one is not worthy nor acceptable.

As members we can help to bring confidence to our many officers if we but take the right attitude toward them. At this time of the year in many places, men having been called of God are presented and accepted by branches and districts. Branches are setting in order their departments by electing new officers or shuffling old ones so that each can give the maximum of his ability. We are made to realize again that God is the author of this wonderful organization, each part or office working together as do the parts of the mighty universe. We feel thankful for the direction and blessing promised to us through his church by means of these officers and leaders, but if we rest content with admiration of the plan alone we soon find ourselves asking the question, "What is the church doing toward establishing Zion and saving the world from the calamity which looms more grotesquely as the years roll on?" A serious duty faces each of us before Zion can be established. In the revelation to the church given through President Israel A. Smith in October, 1948, the Lord said, "The church is admonished again that joint responsibility is laid on all."

Local work often falls heavily on men earning their livelihood, and respect is indeed due them from every member.

IF THERE IS NO REASON why a brother or a sister should not take a certain position, then our duty is to give that person whole-hearted support when elected. To feel the confidence of the group as one sets out on a task, brings out the very best. Beginning with a handshake of encouragement, we should be interested in the budding plans that our confidence has aroused in him and offer help along the way. We must allow

Elsa V. Davies is the wife of C. A. Davies who is a missionary and one of the associate editors of The Standard, official church paper of Australia. She is also the sister of Bishop Don Alberts who visited the States two years ago. She is the mother of two fine children. Outstanding among her many talents is the gift of song and the ability to do exquisite needlework. She is the district leader of women of Southern N. S. W., and Wandell College is held in her home. Sister Mable Davey writes: "Wandell College, as they call an institute, is held in the Davies' home. They turn their home upside down and inside out to make it over into dormitory rooms, classrooms, and dining rooms. We had thirty-one women there for two weeks."

In a letter written after Conference, Sister Elsa said: "I often dream of the things I would do and the things I would see if I were privileged to be present at a conference. I felt such joy when I read of the church's more specific move toward the building of Zion. I want to live for years and years to see things happen." EDITOR.

no unkind criticism to enter our hearts and encourage others to overlook the weak spots and to notice the successes of the new office-bearer. Remember the Lord has said that unless we soften our hearts and are ready to receive, we cannot expect blessing or direction through his church. We know that our spiritual contact will be largely through the local officers and leaders. We cannot expect to receive ministry in person through an apostle all the time. He has wider duties to perform in other fields, and it has been given to the local workers to carry the burden with us. The work of this church is a mutual thing. By our love and respect we aid the whole church program, and at the same time put ourselves in a position to claim the blessing and direction of the Lord.

It takes courage, even though one has latent abilities, to accept a position in the church when the branch has older and more skilled members, but it should always be kept in mind that they were young and inexperienced at the beginning of their service.

Another thing to remember is that most people are happy to see the young members taking an active part. While occasionally there may be criticism offered, it is more often constructive than malicious. In the women's department, for example, even though there might be a qualified and experienced teacher available, unless others are encouraged to prepare a lesson and given a chance to teach, they will never qualify.

The local church may make a drive for more decorum in its worship chapel. The pastor may instruct the deacons to usher people out after service, so that the sacredness of the worship hour will not be spoiled by visiting. When the officer, old or young, stands at the end of the pew, we should be willing to file out quietly without resentment. Once again we receive the lasting blessing of that hour when we respect the officers.

IT SEEMS TO BE in human nature to ignore an officer and deal through another at times if we think we dislike a particular person, but we should remember that a majority of the local branch elected that officer and be willing to abide by the rule of the majority. He or she must have some ability that commends itself to most of the people. If we endeavor to work co-operatively, we will most likely find why this person was chosen for the office. We may discover skill and quality that we would never have known unless we worked in close contact and in sympathy with him.

Little children watch the respect or disrespect with which older people treat their officers and follow their example. Imagine a church school leader making a success of his work if half a dozen families speak disparagingly of the teachers and leader around the table! The children come to church school with an air of cynicism, and consequently receive nothing; while the leader reads the disinterest in their faces and goes home discouraged. It is hard to bring a lively message from a heavy heart. Officers are told to magnify their calling, but we are also responsible for the good they can do. Parents have a definite obligation to encourage all members of the family to respect their officers and leaders.

Saints should study the duties of the departmental officers and plan to make their approaches through the right officer and channel, so that each is helped and encouraged in his particular office by the confidence shown him.

Wives of the officers and leaders of departments certainly have an influence and responsibility in this respect. The way we speak to our companions can help make or mar their office. We cannot speak disrespectfully to our husband or son who holds an office and expect others to do so with respect. It brings pity for the man so treated, which is at once fatal to his work, and others follow in disrespect or disregard; there is no blessing either way.

Again it is true that the Lord has commanded the men of the priesthood to magnify their office and calling, but there is a part for every member to play. If we obey the instruction given by the prophet and sincerely believe that "the responsibility is laid upon all . . . and all will share in the glory," we shall respect our leaders and officers so that they can execute their calling for our mutual benefit.

Keeping Up With Our Children

By Pauline J. Arnson

IN MOST STATES the children have been in school a month, and the shy first grader already has become more confident and happy as he has associated with other children and learned some wonderful facts from his classwork. The older children are getting into the swing of school life and, having been introduced to their new subjects, are beginning to feel satisfaction as they learn more about these interesting studies. If the class is devoted to the manual arts, the first steps have been mastered, and now straight seams and neat stitches can be produced and the proper tools can be selected as the class starts to make book ends or stools. In four weeks our children have grown in knowledge and ability and in the art of getting along with others, and we look forward with them to the end of the school term when they will have mastered some part of science, art, or language.

What has happened to most of the mothers this month? Following right after the summer activities and the sewing, which had to be done to make the "chicks" presentable as they went to school, has come the housecleaning. Many are admitting to themselves that they dread the opening of fall club work and the other activities in which they are expected to take part. Next month will come Thanksgiving, then Christmas and New Year, and the succeeding months filled to the brim with many inescapable duties. At the end of the year, all they will be able to chalk up to their credit side is that the days have been filled to overflowing with routine tasks, and it will be difficult to look forward with any degree of enthusiasm to a return of the same next fall.

WHY CAN'T WE LEARN from our children? They are busy with many activities and duties, yet the days, weeks, and months bring to them a feeling of exhilaration because they are learning more about life, about people, about things, and they are becoming proficient in many avenues of endeavor. Next year they will continue this pattern of learning, and finally from these fledglings will come capable young stenographers, typists, scientists, historians, and musicians prepared to make their way in the world. The daily practice and study have been responsible for these miracles.

What would you like to master this year? You have plenty to occupy your time, no doubt, but variety is the spice of life, and there are many things women can do that will bring zest to their lives and keep them up to date and interesting.

Do you "hunt and peck" on father's or son's portable? Borrow or buy a typewriting book, the kind the high school youngsters use. Set aside fifteen minutes a day just after lunch to practice. Follow the instructions faithfully, and by next year you will be so efficient that you will be hinting that "a portable would surely be a nice addition to the home."

Are you proud of young daughter's piano playing and the honor she received when she placed in the state music contest? And aren't you miserable when you feel that you play too poorly to substitute at church school when the regular pianist is absent? What can you do? PRACTICE. Begin by limbering up your fingers on some Czerny exercise book, or ask a music teacher for the name of a manual for the adult beginner. There are many good methods available, written by successful teachers.

Most church members are interested in the missionary program, and women are expected to witness for Christ to their neighbors and friends. Can you tell the story of the gospel in a simple and accurate way? Do you know the latest developments in archæology which are corroborating the Book of Mormon story? Have you read the latest books written by our church men on Christ in America? Do you know what tracts are available? Are you familiar with their contents?

YOU MIGHT SUGGEST to the program chairman of the women's department that some of this study be included in the year's work. But whatever happens, know more about the church next May than you do now. These are only a few suggestions. They can be multiplied ad infinitum according to your interests. But a word of caution may be timely. Choose only one subject to master. Don't have too many irons in the fire.

If you follow this plan, next year by this time you will have started to develop another skill and be well on the way to success.

NEOSHO, MISSOURI.—Church meetings are now held at 202½ East Spring Street in a rented hall. The membership is steadily increasing by members moving in and by baptisms. The branch prayed for help in the music department and were blessed by the coming of Brother and Sister R. W. Ginrich and three children. Sister Ginrich willingly became the pianist.

The branch also prayed for more priesthood members. At the Communion service of August 6, Elder L. V. Aldridge of Sulphur Springs, Arkansas, was an unexpected guest. Brother Aldridge delivered the morning sermon of August 19. Brother and Sister Aldridge attend the Neosho Branch.

The first two weeks of June, Elder Arthur E. Starks of Springfield, Missouri, presented a series of illustrated sermons. Brother Starks is an uncle of Arthur E. Starks who compiled the Concordance to the Book of Mormon. At the close of the series Bobby Lee Martin, son of Sister Ethel Martin, was baptized.

In February Pastor Ted Linder baptized Sister Era Oehring and Sister Ethel Martin. On Children's Day he baptized Rogene Ginrich and Carolyn Linder. During the reunion at Racine, Missouri, he baptized Mary June Martin.

Special speaker for two Sundays in May was Brother C. J. Hunt of Independence, Missouri.—Reported by MRS. TROY OEHRING.

FREESOIL, MICHIGAN.—Rally day was held on September 3. Elder John Blackstock, president of Central Michigan District, had charge of the 9:30 prayer service. Two brothers were spoken to under inspiration through Brother Blackstock. One was admonished to prepare himself for the ministry. The other one to do a greater work than he had already done.

This service was followed by preaching by Brother Blackstock. His theme was: "The Necessity of Inspiration From God in the Lives of Men and Women Today." A cooperative dinner was held at the noon hour amid a profusion of flowers which decorated the church.

At two o'clock in the afternoon, baptismal services were held at near-by Saugle River. The group returned to the church where confirmation of the candidate was held, and the service closed with an interesting talk by Elder Blackstock.

Evening service was a business meeting in charge of Brother Blackstock. Provisions were made for the studying of the financial law during the month of December. Reports were read and a budget set up for the ensuing year. Officers for the coming year are: Elder Charles Martin, pastor and branch president; Priest Kleber Hill, associate pastor; Mrs. William Tubbs, secretary; William Tubbs, treasurer; Joseph Timinskis, church school director; Mrs. Bessie Bennett, women's leader; Mrs. Clifford Tubbs, music director; Mrs. Kleber Hill, publicity agent; Geneva Edwards, librarian; Clifford Tubbs, Kleber Hill, and Charles Martin, building committee; Mrs. William Tucker, Floyd Tubbs, and Mrs. Kleber Hill, auditing committee.

Present were Saints from Prudenville, Saginaw, Midland, Manistee, Scottville, and Ludington.—Reported by MRS. KLEBER HILL.

PENSACOLA, FLORIDA.—August 21 marked the beginning of an epoch in the history of women's work and progress of the Negro mission in Pensacola. On this date Willa Rasmussen, Pensacola Branch leader of women, assisted by Evelyn Breshears, counselor to the district director of women, and Grace Hawks met with the Negro women and organized a circle, according to the rules of the general women's department as set forth in the new Handbook.

The meeting opened with a favorite theme song, "Take Time to Be Holy," after which each woman present offered a short prayer. Evelyn Breshears was in charge of the devotional and used as her theme, "Service," illustrated by the story of Dorcas of Bible fame, followed by a poem, "Do It Now." A beautiful spirit of humility was present and a willingness to serve was evident.

The following officers were elected: Henrietta Booker, leader; Idella East, assistant; Edna Floyd, secretary; Carrie Blue, treasurer; Idella East, assisted by Grace Hawks, teachers; Katie Booker, friendly visitor; Edna Floyd, Estelle Boulware, and Carrie Blue, social committee; and Carrie Blue, Alma McLester, and Estelle Boulware, ways and means committee.

The name chosen for the circle was "Rising Sun." The name is significant, for it shows the people are working towards a branch of their own with priesthood and services of their own. This dream is partially realized, as Priest W. T. Blue has recently been ordained to the office of elder, and regular services are being conducted in a new building located on Belmont Street near the corner of "E" Street.

This group is commendable, for they have accomplished much by working together. It had its beginning with the E. R. Booker family. Those marrying into the family and others won now make up the present membership of sixteen. Some members of the Booker family are college graduates, and the women's leader and her assistant are public school-teachers.

Elder C. C. Rummell met with these Saints regularly in their homes and ministered to their needs, conducting prayer services, serving the Communion, and preaching to them. Since the death of Elder Rummell, Elders A. L. Dungan, L. G. Tipton, H. M. Cooper, B.

The Ministers Manual

(Dorans)

BY HALLOCK AND HEICHER

This standard source book for ministers, in its 26th edition, contains suggestions of sermon outlines, orders of services, illustrations, material for special days, suggested texts and themes, guides for church departments and activities, and an abundance of homiletic material for all occasions. Among new features added in this edition are a roster of important historical persons whose anniversary dates occur in 1951, table of Easter Sundays extended to 1980, and a list of prominent Church-Year Days for the coming five years.

C. Jones, and district and general church officials have ministered to the group.—Reported by MRS. WILLA RASMUSSEN.

PITTSBURG, KANSAS.—Elder T. W. Bath was re-elected branch president at the business meeting at the church, September 6. Other officers elected for the coming year are: Mrs. A. S. Evans, clerk; A. S. Evans, treasurer; Curtis Pearson, church school director; Mrs. Sam Landrum, music director; Mrs. T. W. Bath, women's leader; Mrs. Clyde Wiley, children's supervisor; Joan Margrave, publicity agent; Dale Swall, young people's leader; Mr. and Mrs. Warren Jackson, custodians; Mrs. Roy Heller, Herald correspondent; Mrs. Joe McAdams, historian; J. W. Jones, trustee; R. G. Smith, solicitor; and Roy Heller and Joe McAdams were appointed by the branch president as auditing committee.

Mrs. T. W. Bath was hostess to the combined women's groups at her home, September 7. Mrs. Harry Shank from Carthage, Missouri, presented her wire recording of Elder Ray Whiting's talk to the women's department at reunion. Mrs. Grace Graves played a piano solo.

Elder G. Wayne Smith from Kankakee, Illinois, has held cottage meetings the first two weeks in September. He preached at the Sunday morning services, September 10 and 17, and showed and explained some Book of Mormon slides at the evening service of September 10.

Vacation church school was held the third and fourth weeks in August. Mrs. Clyde Wiley was supervisor with the following teachers and helpers assisting: Mrs. Harold Summers, Mrs. Kenneth Colyer, Mrs. Leonard Boone, Mrs. Al Comstock, Mrs. T. W. Bath, Mrs. Roy Heller, Mrs. David Sheppard, Barbara Landrum, Marie Gates, Rosalie Gates, Wanda Ohlhausen. Of the forty-nine children enrolled, thirty-five had perfect attendance and nine missed only once.

Baptisms by Pastor Bath in June and July included Joyce Ann Rector, Judy Jackson, Wanda Ohlhausen, Shirley Shipman, Johnny Sheppard, Lavetta Crowe, and Vernetta Crowe. Confirmations of these seven new members took place July 2, under the hands of Elders S. Farrington, J. W. Jones, and T. W. Bath.

Katherine Ann Sheppard, infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sherman Sheppard of Caney, Kansas, was blessed by Elders J. W. Jones and S. Farrington on July 2.

Two new members were baptized on September 17, Steve Lewis by G. Wayne Smith, and Wayne Gathman by T. W. Bath. They were confirmed the same day by Elders Smith and S. Farrington.

Patriarch Elbert A. Smith was a guest Sunday morning, September 17.—Reported by MRS. ROY HELLER.

LIMA, OHIO.—The Northwestern Ohio District conference was held in the new church building in February. There was a record attendance. In May our first mother-daughter banquet was held.

On Children's Day the children presented a program at the morning service, following which three children—Kenneth Waltz, Samuel Rose, and Janice Archer—were baptized by Pastor Earl Walker. During the confirmation service in the evening, music was furnished by the junior girl's choir.

Junior church school has been conducted one Sunday of each month by Church School Director Paul Zellers.

Apostle Maurice L. Draper, Missionary Roy Ashenhurst, and District President Alvin C. Wadsworth were guests one evening in May.

Evangelist John R. Grice held services during the week of July 16 to 23. On July 23 home-coming day was observed, and many from a distance attended.

On September 3, twenty-eight Lima Saints attended services at the Chiland, Michigan, Branch. In the afternoon Brother Walker baptized Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Atkinson and Loyal Waltz in a lake near the Atkinson's summer cottage. Confirmation service was held September 10.—Reported by BLANCHE WALKER.

CENTRAL MISSOURI STAKE.—The Senior Zion's League gathered at Knob Noster State Park at Knob Noster, Missouri, on September 2 and 3 for the annual fall retreat. Saturday afternoon was spent in playing softball, volleyball, and in swimming. There was good attendance from throughout the stake; around 125 young people attended. After supper the Stake Missionary John T. Puckett led devotional services around a campfire. The high light of that service, as well as the whole retreat, came when the group went two by two and cast a piece of wood upon the fire. After the stick had been placed upon the fire, the couple stood for a moment for silent prayer. This symbolized placing themselves in service of the Lord. Placing our energies, whether large or small, in the service of our Master.

For a while the fire did not seem to be improved by the addition of new wood, but by and by it began to glow with the enthusiasm of new life and leap into the air as the energies of youth were being consumed. This was a very inspiring service and the smoothness and the harmony of it was a challenging inspiration for all present.

After the campfire service, comical and educational movies were presented, then a late evening snack of watermelon was served which well rounded off the day's activities.

Everyone was up early Sunday morning for prayer service. Brother Puckett was in charge, assisted by Carlos Smith of Buckner, stake young people's director; Raymond Day, assistant director of Holden, and Stake President Harry J. Simons of Warrensburg. The theme was "Companioning With God," and a good response was given by the Leaguers. A panel discussion was held at 10:00 on the different ways of being a companion with God; and the Communion service was held at 11:00. Stake Bishop Willard C. Becker gave the address. Stake President Simons delivered the afternoon sermon which closed the retreat. His address centered around the theme of walking together with God.—Reported by JAMES CHRISTENSON.

Training Leaders for the Rural Church

FOR every professional leader in the rural church, there are one hundred nonprofessional leaders. The voluntary leader receives assistance in analyzing problems from the paid or professional leaders, which enables him to foresee the next steps to take.

The progressive rural church will profit by taking advantage of voluntary leaders, for without them the church will cease to exist. With them the church becomes a church of the people. The rural church must encourage its young people to become leaders in civil and community organizations where they will receive valuable training in leadership. However, the church cannot rely wholly upon other organizations to train its leaders. It must furnish supervision for training in actual experiences at reunions, camps, conventions, conferences, and institutes. The church must develop literature and give supervision that will help to analyze and throw light on their problems. Encouragement must be given to leaders consecrated to the task of community-building.

Personality Portraits - By IONE SARTWELL

HOW OFTEN we stand and admire a dazzling fountain, but when we are thirsty

I liked Larry the first time I met him. The minute he gripped my hand, looked me straight in the eye, and said, "I'm very glad to meet you," I knew he was all that clergy, educators and grandparents could desire in a young man: clean-cut, intelligent, "up and coming," enthusiastically moral and ethical. Larry was just a file clerk when I first knew him, but he had big ideas. So did I. We were both what many people call "religious," and although we believed in different types of religion, we found a great deal of common ground in our beliefs and wasted several hours of the taxpayers' money interpreting the Scriptures on government time. I was not the only one attracted to Larry. His eager way of speaking and his ready smile drew many into his circle of friends. One felt he'd met someone when he'd met Larry.

It was through Larry that I met John. John said, "How do you do" —politely, colorlessly, and turned back to his work. Larry and I immediately fell into conversation, sparkling, witty, challenging. The minutes flew fast when I was with him, each one enjoyable. Yet—sometimes when I left, I felt I had stayed too long.

When Larry left for college to study for the ministry, our ways parted; and it was not until two years later that I again met John. I had gone to college myself in the meantime, but during summer vacation I was to work with him on the mustiest job on the government payroll—screening old files. "Perhaps you will have someone interesting to work with," a friend encouraged. "We-e-ll," I drawled, "I do know John a little, but he's a quiet, mousy little man." So I braced myself for three months of monotony.

I came to know John well in those three months. When I walked out of that dingy basement room which was our office for the last time—I again felt I'd met someone.

IT WAS SHEER COINCIDENCE that I saw Larry when I went back to school. We had both transferred to the same college without either knowing about the other. Oh, it was good to see him. My face lit up, and I thrust out my hand to receive his warm handclasp. The same handclasp, the same—no, a different Larry. A Larry whose smile shone down on me from above, a Larry whose words came to me in another-world language. I wanted to tell him, "I worked in your old department this summer." I wanted him to ask what files we had screened. I wanted to tell him how many boxes and boxes and boxes we had completed, and how crabby the C. O. was, and how many silly new rules he had instituted. But, instead, he talked of sin and salvation and the Crucifixion. He was a minister in his own right now, and I visioned, as he talked, a church full of people, eager, emotional, swayed by his oratory. Finally he asked, "So you worked with John this summer? Tell me—is he living a good Christian life now?"

John said, "How do you do," politely, colorlessly, and turned back to his work.

Funny. I had never thought of John in terms of religion. He had said one time, "I like to get up early on Sunday mornings and go fishing." And another time, "I like to dance. That's why I'm not a good church member." He had even got drunk one Christmas Eve! But he had told me that shamefacedly. Suddenly the whole summer ran before my eyes like an unwinding reel. I saw it all in a moment; yet each picture stood out clearly, individually. . . .

"I just heard by the grapevine that your next-door neighbor, Mr. J. steps out with one of the girls in his office; that's why she was transferred," I informed him one day. His look of surprise stopped me. I never did know whether he was surprised at Mr. J. or me. "Oh? I didn't know that. I never have time—"

"Would you like to see a picture of my little boy?" he asked. I looked and saw a happy two-year-old dressed in a baseball suit, holding a bat in his left hand. "He looks like you," I said, and smiled at the love and pride in his face. When had I thought John was colorless?

"How do you put up with him?" I asked one day, referring to the supposed helper on the job who never did anything right. "I guess I'm just sorry for him. He was in the Aleutians a long time, you know, and, well—maybe I ought to encourage him more—make him think he's doing a good job. Do you think that would help?

Stories of the Philippines. "Guerillas?" I asked. "Oh, no! Why, those people are as intelligent as we are. Many of them are highly educated." At another time, "Some of the fellows made piles of money selling army equipment just before they left, but somehow I couldn't bring myself—" John was going to have to draw on his $200 savings account as soon as school started. . . .

"I'd like to live so that when I die I'll leave the world in some way better than it was when I came into it." I said that. My scornful laugh brought me back with a start. . . .

"I say," repeated Larry, "Is John living a good Christian life?"

"Yes," I replied fervently, "yes, he is."

"I'm glad to hear that." Larry turned away.

I breathed a long, deep sigh—a contented sigh—for I had just drunk from a clear, cool stream.

Creating Attitudes

BY ERLITA RHODES

RELIGIOUSLY I'm a doodler—and I have lots of company!

I was shocked when I made this discovery. For a long time I had known something was the matter. A person born and reared in the church should know more about it—be more consecrated and willing to do something for it. It was only in thinking about some comments made by another member that I discovered how I got this way.

I was brought up to be—not a Christian but a doodler. I was introduced to church with a pencil and paper. There were no facilities for nursery-age children, so I came "upstairs" to sit with pad and pencil. Church became a school for doodlers. I wasn't trained to listen to stories and participate in activities to fit my intellectual level. I was trained to close my ears to what was said and fritter away the hour entertaining myself.

All through childhood I perfected this technique. Of course my doodling went through a process of development from wiggly lines to houses and people to alphabets and figures. The hours weren't completely wasted!

During my teens my doodling took the form of note-writing, bringing in the social angle which entertained two or three other doodlers as well as myself. I've planned more parties, designed more dresses, arranged more week ends, and hatched more wild ideas in church than almost any other place.

You can't tell a doodler by his expression. He looks attentive and interested, yet a radio-static photo of what goes on in his mind in one hour at church would shock the best psychiatrists. I don't believe I'm a doodler because I'm below normal intelligence, but because that's what my religious experience has taught me to be.

* * * * *

Until we realize the importance of the first impressionistic years and give the children in the church a proper introduction to religion, we'll never develop a group of people educated and consecrated to the Restoration message.

Perhaps you're not a doodler (mental or otherwise), but can you remember what last Sunday's sermon was about?

It All Depends on What You Want

When James A. Garfield was president of Hiram College in Ohio, he was approached by the father of a prospective pupil.

"Can't you simplify the course?" he asked. "My boy will never take it all in. He wants to get through by a shorter route."

"Certainly," answered Garfield. "I can arrange for that. It all depends, of course, on what you want to make of him. When God wants to make an oak, he takes a hundred years; but when he wants to make a squash, he requires only two months."—The Toastmaster's Manual.

How to Get Started

YOUNG PEOPLE who would like to succeed in business are always asking, "How do the big men get started?"

The answer is so simple that many refuse to take it seriously. Get a job that will put you where you are in frequent contact with the boss or the manager, where you help him to get his personal part of the work done, and you can know the principle facts and figures of the business.

What type of knowledge will qualify you for that kind of job? Take a few months to learn shorthand, how to run a typewriter competently with a standard touch system, and the basic principles of bookkeeping. Then select the business in which you wish to make your success, and apply for a job. If you are better than the crowd, your chances of working close to the head man will be improved.

A phone directory could be filled with the names of men who began as secretaries. Go into their biographies, and you will find that as junior assistants they were close to the big men and learned how business deals were made. With shorthand they could give accurate accounts of exactly what was said and done, while others fumbled and tried to remember. With the typewriter they could make neat reports and finish up details when the boss had time only for the main decision. With a knowledge of bookkeeping, they knew what the important figures meant. These are the essentials of success.

Get a college education if you can. It will help you in endless ways. But if you hope to succeed in business, you are a cripple without the knowledge of how to take notes in shorthand, how to run a typewriter, and how to add a column of figures and read a balance sheet.

NISEWANGER.—Edmonia Pearl, daughter of George A. and Sarah Pearl Redding, was born June 13, 1900, at Clearwater, Nebraska, and died September 10, 1950, at the University of Kansas Hospital in Kansas City, Kansas. On September 7, 1913, she was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church at Hulett, Wyoming. After studying two years at Grace-land, she went to Independence, Missouri, where on April 2, 1922, she was married to William H. Bullard. Mr. Bullard died on September 18, 1935, and on May 25, 1928, she married Charles J. Nisewanger. She will be remembered by those who knew her as a cheerful, optimistic woman with a ready smile and kindly word.

Besides her husband she leaves her parents, now of New Haven, Wyoming; seven sisters: Mrs. Vivian Paxton of Blue Springs, Missouri; Mrs. Henry Watt of Madras, Oregon; Mrs. Roy Melchert of Pontiac, Michigan; Mrs. August Salsberg of Burns, Oregon; Mrs. Otis Applegate of Princeville, Oregon; Mrs. Tommy Thomas of Emmett, Idaho; and Mrs. Junior Wood of New Haven, Wyoming; and two brothers: Lloyd Redding of New Haven and George Redding of Harbor City, California. Funeral services were held at the George C. Carson Chapel, Elder Glaude A. Smith officiating. Interment was in Mound Grove Cemetery.

KENNEDY.—Jeannette, was born January 1, 1869, at Ft. Day, West Virginia, and died August 6, 1950, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Clara Buchanan, in Charleroi, Pennsylvania. She was a member of the Lock Four North Charleroi Branch. Her husband preceded her in death five years ago.

She is survived by her daughter, Mrs. Buchanan, a son, Donald Kennedy of Monongahela, Pennsylvania; two sisters: Mrs. Sarah Hensley of Russell, Kentucky, and Mrs. Clara Stewart of East Liverpool, Ohio, and one grandchild. Funeral services were conducted by Elders Henry M. Winship and Clarence I. Winship at the Robe Mortuary in Donora, Pennsylvania. Interment was in the Memorial Park at Donora.

ATKINSON.—Annie Pearl Dent, was born February 1, 1885, at Merlin, Ontario, and died July 27, 1950, of a heart attack at her home in Merlin. She had been a member of the Reorganized Church since childhood.

She is survived by her husband, Charles; two daughters: Mrs. Max Houston of Windsor, Ontario, and Mrs. Max Marshall of Merlin; a sister, Mrs. Carlyle Sales of Merlin; two brothers: George Dent of Winnipeg, Manitoba, and Charles Dent of Merlin. Her only son, Gerald, died last June. Funeral services were conducted at the Reorganized Church, Evangelist R. T. Brown and J. C. Dent officiating. Interment was in Merlin cemetery.

FISH.—William Hodgson, son of Joseph and Mary Fish, was born March 13, 1877, on a farm near Mallard, Iowa, and died on the same farm August 5, 1950. He had spent his entire life here. On September 30, 1903, he was married to Christiana Truog, who died four weeks after their wedding. He never remarried. He had been a member of the Reorganized Church since March 10, 1922.

MOORE.—Mary Belle, daughter of Benjamin Franklin and Martha Washington Elliott, was born March 28, 1859, at Bardstown, Kentucky, and died September 1, 1950, at Resthaven, Independence, Missouri. She was married to Leroy Simpson Moore in 1879; four sons were born to them. Mr. Moore and two sons, Winfred and Claude, preceded her in death. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church on January 26, 1886, at Beaver, Arkansas, the first member of her family to join. Through her efforts, her brother, sister, and several others later were baptized. She was an active worker at the Campus Shop before entering Resthaven about six months ago. She had been a resident of Independence since 1918.

Surviving are two sons: Earl M. Moore of Fort Worth, Texas, and Ross H. Moore of Independence; five grandchildren and five great-grandchildren.

DOBBINS.—F. Elmer, died August 3, 1950, at the University of Kansas Medical Center after three weeks of illness; he was forty-one years old. An electrical engineer, he had been associated with Black and Veatch, consulting engineers, for the past ten years. He was a member of the Reorganized Church and attended Central Church in Kansas City, Missouri. He also held membership in the American Institute of Electrical Engineers and the Masonic Order.

He is survived by his wife, Elnora, of the home; his father, F. S. Dobbins of Whitman, Massachusetts; two sisters: Miss Lucille Dobbins of Providence, Rhode Island, and Mrs. Miriam Johnson of Kansas City; and a brother, Ernest Dobbins, of Lamoni, Iowa. Services were held at the Newcomer Chapel in Kansas City, Elder Glaude Smith officiating. Following the service the body was cremated.

ALLEN.—Jennie May, died September 16, 1950, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. William Havlen, in East St. Louis, Illinois. She was seventy-five years old. Born in Little Sioux, Iowa, she later moved to Kansas City, Missouri, and for the past two years had lived with her daughter. She was a member of the Reorganized Church.

Surviving are two daughters: Mrs. Elnor Rowland of San Francisco, California; two sons: Don Grim of Blackwell, Oklahoma, and Dale L. Butterworth of Long Beach, California; and eight grandchildren. Funeral services were held at the Sedlack Chapel, Henry Brunckhorst officiating. Burial was in Mount Hope Cemetery.

MIDGORDEN.—Annie Elizabeth, daughter of James and Mary Jane Allen, was born May 18, 1871, at Alton, Illinois, and died September 17, 1950, at the home of her nephew, Dr. S. C. Barrows, in Lamoni, Iowa. Following the death of her parents, she and her two sisters made their home with their mother's parents, James and Jane Whitehead, who immigrated from England to join the Saints at Nauvoo where her grandfather served as Joseph Smith's personal secretary. In 1889 they moved to Lamoni where, on October 13 of that year she was baptized a member of the Reorganized Church. Before her marriage to John Midgorden on November 11, 1914, she worked as a bookkeeper in B. D. Fleet's General Store and the State Bank of Lamoni. Mr. Midgorden preceded her in death on November 5, 1944.

She is survived by a sister, Mrs. Jennie Barrows of Lamoni; two stepsons: Orville Midgorden of Lamoni and Leonard Midgorden of Ames, Iowa; several grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

LARSEN.—Mary Grace Marmoy, was born November 20, 1896, and died September 19, 1950, at Omaha, Nebraska. She was baptized into the Reorganized Church on August 29, 1909, and on June 29, 1924, was married to A. Edward Larsen. A graduate of Grace-land College (class of 1919), she used her scholastic training in the work of the church. She was active in young people's work and taught in the church school department.

She is survived by her husband; a daughter Sally Jo of Omaha; a son Edward of Los Angeles, California; two sisters: Mrs. Josephine Ravell of Hickman Mills, Missouri, and Miss Iola Marmoy of St. Joseph, Missouri; and a brother, Samuel Marmoy of Independence, Missouri.

Correction

In the obituary of Mary S. Brewster (issue of September 25, 1950) only five children were given as having been born to the deceased. This should read, "Of the seven children born, five survive," and the name of Thomas H. Brewster, Mentor, Ohio, should be added to the list of survivors.

 MEMORIES

A friend drops in to chant the glories of the great Northwest where we have never been but hope to go some fine day. And we have a few nostalgic memories that make the heart itch where it can't be scratched. The ocean off Santa Monica, with marching ranks of towering clouds preparing an invasion of the mainland. Carmel-by-the-Sea, with its wonderful crescent beach of cream-colored sand, blue-green water, and the white ruffle of foam ceaselessly fluttering between them. The long drive up the coast past the seal rocks and the ancient cypress trees. Monterey, and the historic buildings inherited from the Spanish occupation. The first look down into the redwoods in the Great Basin of Santa Clara County, and the crepuscular light under the giant trees that were old before the time of Christ. Twin Peaks and old Frisco, the city of commerce, culture, and sin on the long peninsula. The smell of clams, fish, and mudflats bared to the sun in the bay. The round clay hills like loaves of bread in Contra Costa County. The dripping mistlands like something out of a fairy tale between Calistoga and Santa Rosa. Peach blossoms in January in the orchards of Napa Valley. The little river where the steamboat used to come bearing loads of lumber and grain. . . . Wondering—will we be permitted to see, in the heavenly Hereafter, all the lovely places of the earth that we are missing now?

 WEATHER

No climate in the world has better weather than Missouri in the fall. Skies are misty blue, with puffy white clouds floating about like celestial marshmallows. There is a cool, refreshing drift of air from the north, and the humblest citizen feels fit to take on the whole world. If they ever came this way, the Chambers of Commerce of Florida and California would drop their feuds with each other, and make common cause against a real competitor—Missouri! Home Town has this wonderful climate every fall—for two whole days!

 IF

If I can stop one heart from breaking,
I shall not live in vain;
If I can ease one life the aching,
Or cool one pain,
Or help one fainting robin
Unto his nest again,
I shall not live in vain.

—Emily Dickinson, "Poems."

 NEW NAME

Brother J. Charles May, engaged in his missionary work, had some publicity prepared in advance of his appearance in one town. The printer apparently failed to understand the copy, and advertised him as representing "The Recognized Church of Jesus Christ of Latterday Saints." Brother May recalled that a similar experience had happened some years ago, in which President F. M. Smith received a letter addressed that way, and commented to Brother May, "Wouldn't it be wonderful if every member of the church so lived that this would be recognized as the Church of Jesus Christ?"

Story-Builders

In Black and White

Ready now are 6 more sets of Book of Mormon Suede-O-Graphs. The script for each one is contained in the book, "Between the Covers of the Book of Mormon," by Verda Bryant, $1.25 each. Each plate is printed on a suede finish paper which does not need to be backed with flannel, but will readily adhere to the regular flannel backgrounds. Colors to be used are indicated for each scene and character. Tempera paints are recommended for adults and crayons for children.

No duplications of characters have been made, unless more than one is needed for the same scene. For this reason, later units cannot be used without having the previous sets.

- UNIT 4 - 8 plates - $1.05
- UNIT 5 - 7 plates - $1.05
- UNIT 6 - 4 plates - $.60
- UNIT 7 - 5 plates - $.60
- UNIT 8 - 5 plates - $.60
- UNIT 9 - 9 plates - $1.05

These units cover Chapters 10 to 35 inclusive in the book, "Between the Covers of the Book of Mormon."

On Listening to the Sermon

Incline your ear, and come unto me: hear, and your soul shall live.

—Isaiah 55: 3.

THERE ARE TIMES when one goes to church with his soul hungry and waiting to be fed. At such times he endures the usual preliminaries as an ordeal that cannot be avoided. When the sermon begins, he says, "This is what I came to hear," and sits up.

But do you know how to listen to a sermon? There is a saying, "It is not what is given to us that counts; it is what we can carry away." We come to the house of the Lord with such little dippers and small buckets. How much do you take away? What is your "take-home-pay" in spiritual terms?

First, be in good physical condition to listen. You should have had enough sleep and rest the night before. You should not be stuffed from overeating. It is better to eat a light breakfast, or to fast. An empty stomach makes an alert mind.

Second, take an active interest in the preacher and his message. Listen with question marks in your mind.

Third, take notes on quotations, main points, and any good statements. Study these things afterwards.

Fourth, you need not be confined to what the preacher says, especially if he is dull. You can silently add footnotes and illustrative material. But it is not right for your mind to go wandering away from your body into heathen places. That is cheating.

Fifth, you will find that others have been thinking about the sermon too, some of their ideas will be good. Discuss it with them. A good sermon is like yeast; it starts something that grows.

Introducing...

LOTTIE (CLARKE) DIGGLE, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan (page 14), was born in Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, where she was graduated from high school in 1901. She studied for a time at the University of Saskatchewan and then became a schoolteacher. In 1912 she was married to Carl E. Diggle, who died in 1945. They had three children, one son and two daughters: W. M., Averill McCreadie, and Eileen Freeland. Sister Diggle's hobbies are writing, water colors, and health studies. She is a life member of the W. C. T. U. and has a Long-service medal. She was president of the club two years. She belongs to the Canadian Club of which she was archivist two years and held an executive position four years. She did public health work for five years, and was a Home and School Club member for three years. She has served as music director of the Saskatoon Branch and Northern Saskatchewan District for many years. She also is a teacher in the church school and publicity agent for the branch.

ESTHER ALICE BROCKWAY, Independence, Missouri (page 15), was born in Wichita, Kansas, and was baptized there when she was eight years old. She was graduated from Wichita High School East in 1929 and completed a stenographic course at the Wichita Business College that same year. Following this, she attended Kansas State Teachers College at Emporia and received her Bachelor of Science in Education in 1935 and her Master of Science in Education in 1941. Her hobbies are sewing, embroidering, growing flowers, and refinishing furniture. She taught school for two years in Western Kansas and then came to Independence; she has worked in this vicinity for ten years as a stenographer. At present she is payroll clerk for a local utility firm. She is a member of the Stone Church and Messiah Choirs.

News & Notes

SORROW

Mrs. Nina G. Smith, wife of President Israel A. Smith, died early Sunday morning, October 8, at her home in Independence. For over four years Sister Smith has been suffering from a heart ailment. At the time of the death, President Smith was attending the conference of High Priests at Kirtland, Ohio.

Sister Smith was an active church worker. She was one of the founders of the Independence Music Club and during World War II served as a Gray Lady at the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital. For twenty-four years she sang in the Messiah Choir. She was a member of the Independence Mothers' Club. She has also been an active member of the women's department and was an honorary member of the General Church Women's Council.

The Independence Music Club, with the consent of President Smith, has established a Nina G. Smith Memorial Loan Fund for worthy music students. This will be a perpetual fund, and those wishing to express a tribute to Sister Smith may send contributions to this address:

EUROPEAN MISSIONS

Because of some important administrative decisions to be made in the work of the church abroad, the recent Joint Council arranged for President F. Henry Edwards and Bishop G. L. DeLapp to join Apostle Blair Jensen in Europe. They will go from the High Priest Conference at Kirtland, Ohio, to New York, then to Amsterdam by plane on October 10. Mission centers to be visited include Rotterdam in Holland, Berlin and other cities in Germany, through to Scandinavia and finally to England.

They will have the benefit of personal counsel with our appointees in these missions: Elders Eugene Theys, Glenn Johnson, Thomas Worth, Frank Fry, and Eric Rowe. They hope to complete their work so as to return to America by December 15.

MORE SERVICE TO CHURCH

Dr. Roy A. Cheville was ordained an evangelist at a special service held in the Coliseum of Lamoni, Iowa, on the afternoon of October 1. President Israel A. Smith was in charge of the service. Apostles Arthur A. Oakman and Charles R. Hield ordained Brother Cheville to the higher office.

The ordination to the office of evangelist will in time free Brother Cheville of administrative duties and permit him to give emphasis to his spiritual ministry and counseling at Graceland College.

PRIESTHOOD IN ZION

Three hundred and sixty members attended the first session of the priesthood school October 2 at Stone Church and Kansas Street Church. Each session of the series will be two hours long. The Melchisedec priesthood had 140 members present at the school, and the Aaronic priesthood had 220 in attendance.

The Melchisedec group is studying "The Church and the Home Together." The Aaronic group is studying "The Restoration Story."

"Come and See"

"And Nathanael said unto him, Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth? Philip saith unto him, Come and see."—John 1: 46.

Nathanael

Nathanael was a good man, a very good man, and apparently he knew it. He intended to be good. Jesus paid a tribute to him—"an Israelite in whom there is no guile."

But Nathanael had a fault that sometimes afflicts those who think they know all about one subject: he had a closed mind and a cool heart.

There was a bit of local prejudice in that day, and people indulged some pride for their citizenship in certain towns. Nathanael of Galilee had an amused contempt for Nazareth. And when Philip (John, carefully noting all these things, said he was from Bethsaida) told Nathanael about Jesus, he asked ironically, "Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" Philip would have a hard time selling him anything out of that market.

Philip

Philip understood his man. He knew better than to argue. Nathanael might win an argument, but he could not beat the facts. Philip knew that if he could be persuaded to go to see Jesus, he would be impressed, and that if he witnessed the works of Jesus he would be convinced. There was just one thing to do with such a man.

"Come and see!" he challenged. He took Nathanael by the arm and started moving him in the direction of Jesus. It was the best possible move.

How often all we need to do is to start moving people in the direction of Jesus. If they go, they must be impressed by him, and possibly converted.

Nathanael was converted. He exclaimed, "Rabbi, thou art the Son of God." The light of revelation must have given him that swift understanding.

The Importance of Seeing

Just before our Morning Devotions there is a radio program by a livestock reporter. He may not know it, but many listeners tune in simply so they will not miss any of the program by Evan Fry and his assistants. But Bob Riley has some good lines of his own, and one of them comes near the end of his description of the cattle for sale. He says, "Come in and have a look at them, won't you?" A good look at a cow will tell you more about her than all the descriptions anybody could print. We buy what we see.

The motor car dealer knows that he has one task to perform. If he can get you to come into his showroom and look at the cars, he has a chance to make a sale. If he can't get you to come in, he has no chance at all. He likes to say, "Come in and look around!"

Demonstration

A demonstration is stronger than an argument. But the demonstration had better be good.

A story is told of the inventor of a dispensing machine who was trying to sell his idea. He took his vendor to the president of a company, and set it up on a desk. Then he put in a nickel. Nothing happened, except that the machine kept the nickel—an experience most of us have had with vending machines and parking meters. That ended the interview on a note of laughter, and the inventor had a hard time to get another hearing. It is best not to let a demonstration fail.

Whether we are aware of it or not, we are demonstrating our religion every day by the things we do and say. People watch us to see whether our works match up with our professions of faith. We had better not fail.

Invitation

In some of our recent local conversions, members had been talking to their friends about the church, its history, and its doctrine. It is amazing how much shopping around people do, looking for a real faith, a true religion, and a church with God in it. A great deal of religion goes across the neighborhood fences. Some of our people have been telling the gospel story to their neighbors. Then, as soon as possible, they bring them to church—Sunday school, prayer meetings, preaching services, and social affairs.

These visits give them new experiences. They hear and see for themselves. They do not have to be told whether there is power in the church. They learn that for themselves.

In other words, our members give them the challenge of Philip, "Come and see!"

The Visitors

It is not insincere to want to be your best for the sake of company. But it would be a finer thing to want to be our best for home folk, too. We never know when someone else is bringing friends to church to let them know what it is like. We must not disappoint these members and their friends. We should try to make our lives and our church work as good as possible all the time.

It is hard to realize the fact, but it is true that there are a few non-members present in nearly every congregation watching us, learning about us, and making a judgment of the church.

Many thousands of people visit the church in answer to the invitation, "Come and see." Let us be ready to receive them. And let us show in our lives the faith that gives life meaning.

Across the Desk

The following is from Apostle D. T. Williams:

I have before me a report coming from Charles Neff, giving us a fine picture of the improved conditions in Omaha Branch. For instance, you will be interested in knowing that the average attendance at morning preaching services last year was 187.5, which is a 28.5 per cent increase over the year before. Regarding prayer services, he advises us that the average attendance this past year has been 45.7 or 40 per cent increase over the previous year. There have been thirty-nine baptisms and two ordinations. There also have been forty-two tithing statements registered, which constitutes a 411 per cent increase. He points out that $6,300 have been collected for local branch expenses. In his letter he says:

Most of the thirty-nine baptisms have taken place since January. I'm sure we'll have fifty by the end of the calendar year. Mission attendance averaged thirty-two at the eleven o'clock service and thirty-one at church school. Seventy-five women are active in various women's groups, and fifty-five to sixty-five young people are active in church work. In nearly every case the reason for inactivity on the part of priesthood members is due to old age, physical incapacity, attending out-of-town colleges, or being called to military service.

I feel that Brother Neff is to be highly commended for the good work he is doing in his area of responsibility.

Ideals

Ideals are like stars; you will not succeed in touching them with your hands. But, like the seafaring men on the desert of waters, you choose them as your guides, and following them reach your destiny.—Carl Schurz.

HAWAII CONTINUED

UNDER THE CAREFUL PROGRAMMING of Brethren Miller and Crownover, the latter having been in Hawaii for several weeks, on

Leis presented at airport on June 20

Monday morning, June 26, Brother Miller and wife, Elders Crownover and James Kemp who had been with us at Hawaii, Brother Siegfried, and I took an early plane to the Island of Molokai, spending most of the day there, viewing the leper colony made famous by Father Damien, and going on by plane in the afternoon to the Island of Maui. Here we had an excellent dinner at the home of Sister Wassman and family, and registered for the night at the Maui Grand Hotel.

Here we met David, another Kahanamoku, also a member of the church, who was employed by the hotel as a receptionist.

The next day we visited the extinct crater of Haleakala Volcano, in the forenoon, and had lunch at the home of Brother and Sister Richard Haak. At four we were on the plane for Hilo, on the Island of Hawaii, largest of the Sandwich group.

Here we were also royally welcomed, many leis presented. Among those meeting the plane were Brother and Sister Miguel de la Cruz, and Sister Bernice Lee (nee Kahana-moku).

Soon we were at a banquet at the Y.M.C.A. About two hundred were present, many of them nonmembers. Elder Kemp presided with ability and tact. We were officially greeted by Elder de la Cruz. Both of us responded. Hilo and Halaula Branches were represented, the latter by Elder Arthur Kong. Sister Bernice Lee had charge of the musical program and the presentation of gifts which came from many of the Saints.

At Hilo, Brother Siegfried and I "had the run" of the home of Sister Masa Shirota, right beside the Hilo Church which, by the way, appears adequate, with a very large lot, due, we were told, to the foresight of Apostle Myron A. McConley.

Breakfast at Sister Lee's on Wednesday began the day. We had lunch at Kemp's and were the dinner guests at the Lunai Cafe of Richard Iseri and wife, a daughter of Sister Shirota.

In the evening a baptismal service was held at the church when six were added to the Hilo Branch: Andrew Kashimoto, prominent insurance and businessman; Susama Shigemasa, Harry Matsuo, Dorothy Brown, Helen Mitsuda, and May Hara, all baptized by Brother Kemp. All were confirmed a few minutes later, and Charles Aki was ordained an elder by Bishop Miller and Elder C. Gilleland.

At the Hilo banquet, June 27

When I occupied at 7:30, the day before being an anniversary of the death of the Prophet, I took occasion to discuss the founder's prophetic calling.

Stake Organizations

A Statement From The First Presidency

ONE OF THE MOST IMPORTANT actions taken by the General Conference of 1950 was that authorizing the organization of stakes at Independence, Missouri; Detroit, Michigan; and Los Angeles, California. The record reads as follows:

April 6, 1950

To the General Conference,
Greetings:

After careful thought and prayer, and with the approval of the Joint Council of First Presidency, Council of Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric, we recommend that the Saints in Independence, Missouri, be organized as the Center Stake of Zion.

We also recommend that Elder Charles V. Graham be selected as president of the Center Stake, and that Bishop Harold W. Cackler be selected as bishop of the Center Stake.

If the foregoing recommendations receive your endorsement, a conference of the members of the church concerned will be called and their approval of the stake organization and of the selection of Elders Graham and Cackler will be sought. If this is given, the selection of counselors in the Stake Presidency and Stake Bishopric and of the Stake High Council will then go forward under the direction of the First Presidency and other general officers concerned.

Very sincerely yours,
THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
By Israel A. Smith.

On motion of Elders E. J. Gleazer, Sr., and James C. Daugherty the recommendation was approved.

April 6, 1950

To the General Conference,
Greetings:

After careful thought and prayer and with the approval of the Joint Council of First Presidency, Council of Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric, we recommend the organization of the Detroit International Stake to include the Saints in Wayne, Washtenaw, Livingston, Monroe, Oakland, and Macomb counties in Michigan, and the County of Essex in Ontario, totaling approximately 3,300 persons.

With the approval of the Council, we also recommend that Elder W. Blair Mc-Clain be selected as stake president and that Bishop L. Wayne Updike be selected as stake bishop, subject to the approval of the stake conference.

We recommend, further, that completion of the stake organization be referred to the First Presidency and other general officers concerned.

Very sincerely yours,
THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
By Israel A. Smith.

This was duly approved on motion of Elders A. A. Oakman and T. A. Beck.

April 6, 1950

To the General Conference,
Greetings:

After careful thought and prayer, and with the approval of the Joint Council of First Presidency, Council of Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric, we recommend the organization of the Los Angeles Stake to include the Saints in Los Angeles County, California, totaling approximately 3,100 persons.

With the approval of the Council, we also recommend that Elder Garland E. Tickemyer be selected as stake president and that Bishop J. Stanley Kelley be selected as stake bishop, subject to the approval of the stake conference.

We recommend, further, that completion of the stake organization be referred to the First Presidency and other general officers concerned.

Very sincerely yours,
THE FIRST PRESIDENCY,
By Israel A. Smith.

Brethren C. R. Hield and Eugene Closson moved to approve the recommendation. . . . After discussion, the motion to approve the recommendation prevailed.—Daily Herald, April 7, 1950, pages 92, 93.

We are now happy to report that these stakes have been organized and are now functioning.

The Center Stake of Zion

The Saints of Independence, Missouri, met in conference at historic Stone Church on Monday, May 8, 1950, at 8:00 p.m., to consider the proposed stake organization. President Israel A. Smith was in charge of the service; he was assisted by Presidents F. H. Edwards and W. Wallace Smith, Apostle D. T. Williams, and Bishop G. Leslie DeLapp.

At this service the Independence Saints gave unanimous approval to the stake organization. On recommendation of the First Presidency, the action of the General Conference in authorizing the selection of Elder Charles V. Graham, as president of the Center Stake of Zion, and Elder Harold W. Cackler, as bishop of the Center Stake of Zion, was also unanimously approved. President Smith then stated that Elder Graham had asked that Elders Glaude A. Smith, pastor of Stone Church, and Fred O. Davies, pastor of Walnut Park Church, be selected as his counselors and members of the Center Stake Presidency. This carried unanimously. The recommendation by Bishop Cackler that Elder M. L. Parker be associated with the Stake Bishopric as counselor was also approved by unanimous action.

The First Presidency then stated that after consultation with the other general officers concerned and with the stake president, they recommended that the following named brethren, already members of the high priesthood, be set apart as members of the Stake High Council:

Lloyd L. Bland	Joseph E. Kelsey
L. F. P. Curry	Donald V. Lents
Ralph A. Harder	Howard C. Timm
Chris B. Hartshorn	Roy E. Thrutchley
	Wilfred E. Wakeman

The selection of these brethren as members of the Stake High Council was approved, the vote being taken on each name separately.

All the brethren selected as members of the stake presidency, the stake bishopric, and the stake high council (except Elder Roy A. Thrutchley) were set apart in their several offices at a special service held May 14, 1950, at 7:15 p.m. at the Stone Church. Elder Thrutchley, who was absent from the city at the earlier ordination service, was ordained at the beginning of the stake business meeting held in the Stone Church on Monday, August 28, 1950.

At the time of the organization of the Center Stake of Zion, there were

Center Stake Officers

The total financial resources of the stake at the time of its organization, and exclusive of general church properties within the City of Independence, amounted to approximately $640,000.00 in congregational buildings, lands and furnishings, and approximately $53,591.34 in cash reserves in the treasuries of the various congregations.

The Detroit International Stake

The conference for completing the organization of the Detroit International Stake was held at the McKenzie High School at 9275 Wyoming Street, in Detroit, on Saturday and Sunday, May 27 and 28, 1950. It was preceded by special meetings for the priesthood and the prospective stake officers. Presidents F. Henry Edwards and W. Wallace Smith presided and were assisted by Apostle C. George Mesley and Bishop Walter N. Johnson. The Saints participating included those residing in Wayne, Washtenaw, Livingston, Oakland, Macomb, and Monroe counties in Michigan and Essex County in Ontario.

Similar procedure was followed here as in Independence. The stake officers chosen, all of them high priests, were as follows:

M. L. PARKER, Counselor

President	W. Blair McClain
Counselors	L. O. Brockway E. V. Osborn
Stake Bishop	L. Wayne Updike
Counselor	C. O. Carlson

STAKE HIGH COUNCIL:

nishings, and approximately $20,000.00 in cash reserves in the treasuries of the various congregations.

The Los Angeles Stake

The organization of the Los Angeles Stake was effected June 17 and 18, 1950, by action of the Conference of all members living in the area formerly designated as the Los Angeles Metropolitan District. The boundaries of Los Angeles County constitute the boundaries of the new stake, the area being approximately seventy-six miles from Long Beach to Lancaster and seventy-two miles from the widest point on the coast to the city of Pomona.

The Southern California mission has a long and interesting history dating to the earliest days of the Reorganization when able followers in the Utah faction of the church who had previously become dissatisfied or who broke with that group upon learning that "Young Joseph" had formed a reorganization of the church got together in Southern California, principally around San Bernardino. This group, which included the families of the Carmichaels, Mills, Badhams, Schnells, Adams, and others formed the nucleus of church organization in and around Los Angeles that has had a steady growth through the years. This growth was accentuated by population shifts to the West Coast during World War II. During the years 1948 to the date of organization of the stake, a considerable reorganization of the work of the church in the area was effected. Five new missions were organized, four new buildings were acquired or built, and a building site was purchased for another congregation.

President Smith presided over the business session which was held at Central Los Angeles Church, 3851 South Grand Avenue, Los Angeles, the evening of June 17, 1950. He was assisted by President F. Henry Edwards, Apostle E. J. Gleazer and Bishop Henry L. Livingston. The procedure was the same as that established in the organization of the

The members of the stake presidency and stake bishopric were set apart to their several offices on Sunday afternoon, May 28, and the members of the stake high council were set apart that evening.

At the time of the organization of the Detroit International Stake, there were 3,300 members. The total financial resources amounted to approximately $120,000.00 in congregational buildings, lands, and fur-

The members of the stake presidency and stake bishopric were set apart the afternoon of Sunday, June 18, and the members of the stake high council were set apart the evening of the same day.

Despite a strike of streetcar conductors that tied up transportation in Los Angeles at that time, approximately one thousand people were in attendance at the organization conference.

Total financial resources of the stake at the time of organization included approximately $210,000 in congregational buildings, land, and furnishings, and $25,000 in cash reserves in the treasuries of the various congregations.

At the time of organization there were 3,084 church members accredited to it. These members worship in eight branches and missions as follows:

The Temple City Branch was organized one week after the organization of the stake; Blaine O. Bender, pastor.

WE ARE HAPPY TO REPORT that the personnel of two of these stake high councils has already been strengthened by the ordination of Elder Lawrence Southerland by action of a conference held July 29, 1950, at the Los Angeles Stake Reunion and of Elders Willard Shotwell, Randall Hulse, Herbert Voltmann by authorization of a conference held in Detroit, September 9, 1950.

The church and particularly those directly concerned are to be congratulated that these stakes are now properly organized and are functioning smoothly. The transition from district to stake organization will not be fully accomplished at Detroit and Los Angeles until all the Saints in these important centers learn to take advantage of the privileges of high priestly leadership now available to them. But so far the work has been well begun, and the Saints are moving forward co-operatively and in the spirit of expectancy. There is every reason to believe that they will be greatly blessed of the Lord.

We are particularly happy that the brethren chosen for official positions have been available and that they are supported by excellent groups of presiding elders for the various congregations, together with many experienced and devoted departmental leaders. The work should become steadily stronger in these key places of our church endeavor.

Are You Sleeping, Brother John?

By ALETA RUNKLE

SUNDAY MORNING is such a good time to sleep. All week we have crawled out at 6:00 or so. When the alarm goes off Sunday, we turn over with the luxurious thought, "Oh, well, I don't really have to get up this morning." Then it is such fun to dawdle over breakfast and laugh over Blondie and Dagwood's recent escapade. Suddenly we look at the clock and discover that we are really going to have to turn on the speed if we make it to church at eleven. We arrive just as church school is being dismissed. There aren't many there—guess a lot of people just couldn't make it.

Some of us couldn't make it because the family was coming in for dinner, and it kept us stepping from early morning until 10:30 to get the food prepared. Some of us got the children ready and took them to church school, then came home to finish some jobs around the house. Many of us so enjoyed the freedom from the pressure of our weekday schedule that we slowed down our morning routine. And so we cheated ourselves of the rich fellowship of shared ideas in the church school hour.

I was wondering the other day how many hours the average American spends a week listening to the radio. How much time is spent at the movies, swimming pools, and golf courses? Add to that the hours spent in "chit-chat," and the total should come to a sizable amount of leisure each week. And yet many of us do not have one hour a week in our schedule for instruction in the methods of building the kingdom. All of these time-consuming activities are good in themselves and enrich our lives in many ways, but they should not rob us of our "first hours." Christ said, "Seek ye first . . ."

You know how good you feel when you do something that helps the Cause—you feel so right with yourself somehow. There is nothing that can match the inner glow of well-being that comes when you do something for God. Maybe you're a busy housewife who doesn't have much time to give outside her home. Then this next week besides helping your children prepare their church school lessons, why don't you and your husband spend an evening studying and discussing the lessons and Scriptures for your class? You will strengthen and deepen your family relationships by such an experience. Sunday morning you may have to get up a bit earlier so that the entire family can go, but adults need to be taught as well as children, you know. Take others along with you. They may be waiting for your invitation. There is no describing the joy that will be yours if you help someone discover the way.

We miss so much happiness that we could know if we would only try. It may be an effort the first Sunday to get to church school on time with lessons well-prepared, but the rewarding feeling of deep satisfaction will encourage you to be there the next Sunday. Paul said, "Study to show thyself approved . . ." Begin this Sunday.

Christian Education and Leadership Training Curriculum

Among the most devoted and capable workers for Christ are those who constantly improve their minds and skills for their tasks. A tested and approved method of improving efficiency in church school workers is by means of the curriculum developed for this very purpose, as set forth in Christian Education and Leadership Training Curriculum, Bulletin Number 103. Secure your free copy from The Department of Religious Education, The Auditorium, Independence, Missouri, for details of the plan and a complete list of the courses offered.

Experiences of a Missionary - Part VIII

Friends in Church Service

For a number of years I was closely associated with the late John F. Garver, who occupied in the Quorum of Twelve from 1922 until he entered the First Presidency in 1946. This association continued until I was superannuated in 1946. During those years I labored either under his administration or was associated with him in charge of the field. Prior to 1922, for some years I was in charge of missionary work in Utah, Idaho, Oregon, and Nevada. Following my ministry in the West, I was transferred to Ohio and Pennsylvania and there supervised the missionary work in those fields. Sometimes the responsibility was heavy. Decisions had to be made that required not only a knowledge of conditions, but also the seeking of divine wisdom. I am glad to pay a tribute to President Garver that I feel is due him. I found him to be one of the fairest men I have ever known. I have also associated with other men of the Twelve—President F. Henry Edwards, Apostle Clyde Ellis, and Apostle George G. Lewis. I have enjoyed their association and have found them to be men of integrity, upright in character in all their dealings. I have worked, too, with John W. Rush-ton, Heman C. Smith, D. T. Williams, and some others. It would be difficult to mention all with whom I labored during the forty-one years I was under appointment, but suffice to say I have found true and loyal friends who have given food, clothing, and money, demonstrating their discipleship upon the standard laid down by Christ.

Debates

SINCE the organization of the church in 1830, our men have often had to defend our doctrinal and historical claims in public debate. These discussions have been held in all parts of the country with representatives of many different churches. In recent years some church people have believed that these discussions have not always resulted in good to the church, and so have not favored them.

I do not believe we should seek trouble and challenge everybody we meet to a debate. I do think, however, that with well-stated propositions and able representatives much good has come to the church as a result of these discussions. Some men are good preachers in the pulpit but not successful in debate. Some who are good debaters are not outstanding preachers. Others are excellent debaters as well as good preachers. Sometimes debating will spoil a good preacher as it has a tendency to make him take the negative approach.

My experience has taught me that if our work is attacked and we come to the rescue by meeting an opponent, good will comes to the church. I have engaged in many public debates with men of other churches. I shall endeavor to give some of the experiences I have had.

No two debates are alike, even with the same opponents. Every debate has its own features, and there are high lights that stand out in the minds of the people. Climaxes do not come in every speech made, but there are times when these climaxes do come and leave an impression in the minds of the people that is never forgotten.

My First Debate

The first debate I ever engaged in was held at Bitter Root Valley in Montana. A minister of the Methodist Church attended a service I held near the home of Brother Johnson and took exception to something I said. He was an experienced debater and challenged me to meet the issue. He wanted to debate only one proposition which read as follows: "Resolved, men are saved by faith and not by work."

Never having debated in my life, I rather dreaded to meet this man. I immediately wrote Brother Isaac M. Smith, who was working in that field, and asked him to come to help me. To this request Brother Smith informed me he could not come, but advised me to go ahead and hold the discussion, and if I failed he would prefer charges against me for being incompetent. Of course he was only joking about the charges.

The night came for the discussion and people came out in large numbers to hear it. My opponent proved to be a perfect gentleman, and never at any time reflected in the slightest on our church or any man connected with it. He tried to prove that man was saved by faith and not by work, while I endeavored to show that faith and works go hand in hand—that faith is dead without works. Each of us made two speeches, and this was supposed to end the discussion. My opponent attempted to make a third speech, and I told him that was unfair.

I offered to continue the discussion the next night if he wished and to this he consented. When the audience was dismissed, some of his church members went to him and told him he was very foolish to continue the debate as he was whipped already, and it would be worse the next night. The next night came and again my opponent attempted to defend his position. He had hard work to fill in his time, and when I replied he found he had exhausted his argument and stated he knew he had failed to vindicate himself, but still believed he was right. He stated I was an experienced man, and for that reason had the best of the argument. He showed his kindness by inviting my wife and me to take dinner with him and his wife the next day, which we did. I regard this man as one of the finest Christian gentlemen I have ever known and wish I could say as much of all I have met in public discussion.

Burlington, Colorado

While laboring in Colorado under the direction of Brother John W. Rush-ton, I was requested by him to meet a challenge that had come from near Burlington, Colorado. A man by the name of Goalen had been holding services in a neighborhood where we had a few members. Night after night he continued to attack our people, until one of our brethren signed propositions with him. The brother who signed these propositions was not an experienced debater, and as a result I affirmed six propositions to my opponent's one. This gave him an unfair advantage over me, but it was all I could do.

I was fortunate in having Brother Jacob Curtis as a moderator, and he rendered very valuable help indeed. I am sure he would have made a much abler defense of our work than I could, as he had met a number of these men in discussion. Be that as it may, I did the best I could under the conditions and believe our cause did not suffer from the debate. We found that public sentiment was strongly against us at the beginning, and many nights Brother Curtis and I expected to be "egged." My opponent was abusive and did all he could to cast reflection on the church as well as its founder, Joseph Smith.

The chairman of that debate was a man who made no claim of religion but he was a fair and honorable man and presided with dignity and ability. Every night he would turn to me and ask me some question, as he said "in the interest of education," and I would try to answer in a fair and honorable way. Then he would ask my opponents some questions, and for some reason they would find themselves in a hot discussion. In many ways this helped me, as the listeners were friendly to the chairman, and they could see the unfairness of my opponent. The debate proceeded night after night until the Book of Mormon came up for consideration. I affirmed it was of divine origin and worthy the respect and belief of all Christian people. Of course my opponent combated this with all his strength.

One of my defenses of the Book of Mormon was the purity of its teaching on marriage. I pointed out the statement which says, "Truly David and Solomon had many wives and concubines, which thing was abominable before me, saith the Lord." To my great surprise this statement was challenged by Mr. Goalen. Polygamy, he said, was acceptable to the Lord and was not an abomination as the Book of Mormon declared. He made a defense of that accursed doctrine by quoting from the Old Testament where the Lord gave the wives of Saul to David. He used the same argument that a Utah Mormon would use in defense of polygamy. From that time on to the end of the debate he continued to defend polygamy. Among other things I told him was that I had heard all kinds of criticism of the Book of Mormon, but he was the only man in all my experience who condemned it for defending the monogamous system of marriage.

Public sentiment from that moment began to turn in our favor, with perhaps one exception. One night after the debate had closed for that session, a woman came up to me and tried to insult me by asking all kinds of questions that were reflective on the church. I refused to discuss anything with her, so she turned to Brother Curtis; he too refused to debate the question with her. She then went to my opponent and said, "Whip him; skin him alive; tear him to pieces. You are doing a fine job. You are right. Polygamy as practiced by David and Solomon was not an abomination."

I went to my stopping place that night sad and discouraged. I had believed that the public sentiment was in our favor but seeing this woman endorse the corruptible stand of my opponent made me wonder if she were expressing the belief of the audience. After arriving at the home of a member where Brother Curtis and I were staying, I made some inquiry regarding this woman. I was informed that she had run away with another man a few days before, and had just returned, that her reputation in that neighborhood was very bad, and I should not worry regarding what she said to my opponent because it did not represent the view of the people of the community. Shortly after this the debate closed, but as far as I know, my opponent has never gone back to hold services in this place since. I met him some time afterward in Burlington, Iowa, where he was moderating for W. G. Roberts; he continued to defend polygamy. Brother E. E. Long was meeting Roberts in that city. I stopped for one night to hear the debate.

W. G. Roberts in Nebraska

Brother Frank A. Russell and I were engaged in a series of services near Ough, Nebraska, in which we found a very fine interest developing. The schoolhouse where we were conducting the services would not hold the people who came for miles to hear. After some time we received a challenge from the Church of Christ (nonprogressive) signed by one of their champion debaters. We took the matter up with Apostle J. W. Wight, and he gave his consent for us to meet the challenge. Brother Russell had never debated, and the propositions were signed by that Goliath of Campbellism, W. G. Roberts. It was decided that the task was mine to meet him. He boasted he had met our church twenty-six times in debate. Some of my friends warned me that he was one of the most cunning debaters who had ever appeared against us. I dreaded to meet a man of his reputation and skill and felt I needed help from a divine source.

Before the debate started, I had a dream in which I was told that my opponent would take a position regarding Revelation 14: 6, 7 in which he would claim the angel mentioned was Jesus Christ. As a result I prepared an argument to meet his interpretation. The night came and Brother Russell and I went to the church where the debate was to be held in Wauneta, Nebraska. We were strangers in a strange land, but we believed we had the truth and that the Lord would help us in our defense. The house was packed to the door. Our opponent got up and boasted of his strength and how he was going to give the boy a whipping. He said he did not like to do it, but the job had to be done and he was the man most able to do it.

In my opening speech I had quoted the statement of Scripture already mentioned. In reply, as I had seen in the dream, he said this did not refer to an angel that appeared to Joseph Smith, but referred to Jesus Christ. Then in a boastful manner he turned and asked me, "Aren't you sorry you said what you did? I don't like to give you a whipping, but I am going to do it."

In my second speech that night I informed him that if his interpretation of Revelation 14: 6, 7 were true, then of necessity he must believe in not one but a plurality of Jesus Christs. He looked at me in a surprised manner, and then I gave my reason for saying this. I read the Scripture again to the audience wherein it states, "I saw another angel." The word "another" indicated more than one. Then I read it as he interpreted the passage, "I saw another Jesus Christ fly through the midst of heaven."

From that time on until the end of the debate, I had the good will and confidence of the people, which is a very necessary thing in public discussion. As the debate proceeded from night to night, the confidence of the people in me grew, and it became apparent that my opponent had lost the respect of those present. He resorted to every known tactic that he thought would intimidate me. One night he told the audience I was a Seventy and that no Seventy had a right to wear an overcoat. He pronounced curse upon curse on my head as he declared that the Scripture clearly stated no Seventy should have two coats. He further pronounced a curse upon me for wearing shoes. The anathema of heaven would follow me, so he stated, all my life, for no Seventy should wear shoes. His entire thirty minute speech was taken up in pronouncing these judgments upon my head which he had hoped would win the favor of the audience, but it was very apparent his speech had not accomplished what he hoped it would. In my reply I asked him to give me the Scripture that forbade my having an overcoat or shoes. If he could not do this the audience would be compelled to believe that he had misrepresented not only the Scripture but me as well.

Furthermore I knew he had been fighting our work for years, and that for each debate he was paid from $85.00 to $125.00. Even with the sum of money he was receiving it seemed that he had grown poor and was needing a pair of shoes. He may believe that by telling me the judgments of God would follow me I would get scared and remove my shoes so he could get them. I insisted that he did not need to resort to such tactics, but that if he were really in need of shoes and would come and ask me for mine I would give them to him.

He immediately asked me for them. I asked him if he were poor, and he answered he was. I then asked him if he would put the shoes on now, and he stated he would. The only thing that I could do under the circumstances was to take off my shoes and give them to him. When my speech was ended, his moderator came carrying the shoes back to me. First I declined to take them, but his moderator insisted I must put them on as it was a very cold night, being twenty degrees below zero. I started to put them on, when my opponent came up and asked me if I did not give him the shoes, and I told him I did. He said, "They are mine," and I said "Yes." He continued, "Well, if you want them you must pay me for them." I asked him how much he wanted for them and he said, "Fifty cents." I gave him the money and so purchased my shoes.

There was only one family of Latter Day Saints who lived within a hundred and fifty miles and even this family lived more than twenty miles away. I ate my meals in a restaurant, and one morning after eating I walked to the counter and asked how much I owed for the meal. The man who owned the restaurant stated no money was due him, but there was some due me. I thought he was joking and perhaps wanted to give me the meal. He walked behind the counter and putting his hand on a shelf began to take some money from it. He counted out $11.25. As he gave it to me, he told me a number of friends had come in and given him the money to give to me and to tell me it was to reimburse me for the fifty cents with which I had purchased my shoes.

Public Sentiment Against Roberts

Public sentiment had turned against Roberts, and he was working hard to regain the good will of the people. He informed the audience it was the entire religious world against Mormonism and named every church in that community. He cried out, "Oh! my dying friends—you Methodists and Baptists and Presbyterians, I am defending your church against the insidious attacks of Mormonism. I plead with you, stand by me. If I go down in defeat, you all go down with me. I am standing for your mother's blessed Bible. I am your friend, so please do not desert me. It is the Christian world against this accursed religion." When I arose to reply, I told the audience my opponent had made a labored effort to win some friends. I said that I wanted their friendship too, but I did not need to resort to the methods he employed. I said, "I appeal to your fairness and sense of honor which I am sure you will exercise. He calls you his friends and would have you believe he is your friend. But, I ask you, what kind of a friend? I have here in my possession a leading publication of his church in which appear some editorials from his own pen. These editorials were not written in the heat of debate but in the quietude of his office in which he could weigh well the things he was saying. You people of the churches he mentioned in his speech will be interested to know what he said about you."

I then read from these editorials some of the bitter things he expressed regarding the very churches mentioned. He called them "harlots" and "daughters of the old mother of harlots." He condemned them for almost every crime in the catalog of crimes. "This is the kind of a friend he is to you."

He arose and raised a point of order, stating to the chairman that I was trying to poison the minds of the people against him and demanded that I retract my statements. The chairman arose and said, "Mr. Roberts, you are the very man who has attempted to poison the minds of the people against Mr. Holloway. I have thought several times I would call you to order and then again I thought to give the calf more rope and let it hang itself. You are the man who is guilty, not Mr. Holloway." With this ruling of the chair, Roberts ordered the chairman to sit down. The chairman then turned to my opponent and said, "I am chairman of this debate, and I am taking no orders from you."

As the debate continued, and my opponent's church was on trial, he grew more drastic and insulting. Many times he would give the signal, and some of his church members and ministers would attempt to intimidate me. After trying different things, they decided to hiss me as I showed the weakness of their church. The first time they hissed, I stopped in the middle of a sentence and looked straight at a number of their preachers who were sitting on the front seat. After a few seconds I resumed my speaking without saying anything in the way of rebuke. In a short time they again hissed, and again I looked at them but remained silent. I resumed my speaking, and for the third time they hissed.

This time I turned to the audience and said, "You hear this hissing. If it were coming from the audience, I would feel quite sad. This hissing is coming from this row of preachers who belong to my opponent's church. When I consider all the things the Lord has made, there are only two that hiss. One of these two is a snake, the other is a goose. I would not want to say these hissers are snakes, so I must decide they are geese!" From that time on there was no more hissing.

Meets Roberts in Missouri

I had two debates with this man. The last one was in Worth, Missouri. One Sunday afternoon a large tent seating not less than one thousand people was packed full. The Book of Mormon was under discussion. I had made a presentation of some of the internal evidences of its divinity, especially emphasizing this promise made in the Book of Moroni 10:4, 5:

And when ye shall receive these things, I would exhort you that ye would ask God, the eternal Father, in the name of Christ, if these things are not true; and if ye shall ask with a sincere heart, with real intent, having faith in Christ, he will manifest the truth of it unto you, by the power of the Holy Ghost; and by the power of the Holy Ghost, ye may know the truth of all things.

I pleaded with those present to make a test of this wonderful promise. I felt sure the Lord would come to their aid and give them necessary light if they earnestly sought for that which would permit them to know of the divinity of the book.

As my time was called, my opponent arose to his feet and told the audience he had gone to the Lord and had sought to know if the Book of Mormon were true. He stated he had bowed down in his bed chamber and had poured his soul out in prayer. As he prayed he said that the Lord spoke to him and told him the Book of Mormon was a great big lie. He repeated this a number of times, affirming each time that the Lord had told him the book was false.

In my reply I called attention to the fact that all during the debate my opponent had stated time and time again that the last word the Lord had ever spoken to mankind was given to John the Revelator on the Isle of Patmos more than eighteen hundred years ago.

QUESTION:

What is the meaning of the statement in Doctrine and Covenants 83: 6: "But whoso breaketh this covenant after he hath received it, and altogether turneth therefrom, shall not have forgiveness of sins in this world nor in the world to come"? Does it mean that the ordained man who turns down his work and goes back to world affairs cannot be forgiven?

Indiana Mrs. A. M.

ANSWER:

The statement evidently does not so apply. The minister who neglects or gives up his work under the priesthood may suffer great loss in his reward, but not eternal damnation, unless he also forsakes the gospel and yields himself to wrongdoing. Years ago the Lord said:

Many elders have been ordained unto me, and are come under condemnation, by reason of neglecting to lift up their voices in my cause, and for such there is tribulation and anguish; haply they themselves may be saved (if doing no evil), though their glory, which is given for their works, be withheld, or in other words, their works are burned, not being profitable unto me.—Doctrine and Covenants 116: 2.

The language of the passage quoted in the question is not clear as to its application, though a careful study of the paragraph as a whole does admit a reasonable interpretation. The theme of the paragraph is priesthood and the men who function in it. But an interjectional statement referring to others than men of the ministry enters in the midst of it in these words:

And also all they who receive this priesthood [that is, accept and obey the gospel at their hands] receiveth me, saith the Lord, for he that receiveth my servants receiveth me, and he that receiveth me receiveth my Father, and he that receiveth my Father receiveth my Father's kingdom. Therefore all that my Father hath shall be given unto him; and this is according to the oath and covenant which belongeth to the priesthood. Therefore all those who receive the priesthood receive this oath and covenant of the Father, which he can not break, neither can it be moved; and whoso breaketh this covenant, after he hath received it, and altogether turneth therefrom, shall not have forgiveness of sins in this world nor in the world to come.—Doctrine and Covenants 83: 6.

This other class of persons must refer to those who accept the gospel at the hands of God's ministry. It is they who receive Christ, the Father, and the kingdom, having eternal life; and it is they who, having once obeyed, if they turn away and repudiate their covenant, are left without hope of forgiveness in this world or the next. The text goes on to mention still another class who do not accept the ministry of God's servants when it is offered; they, too, are sinning against light and truth, for which there is no forgiveness.

Other Scriptures confirm this teaching of nonforgiveness for these two classes. We quote but two, one applying to church members, the other to nonmembers:

If we sin willfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries.—Hebrews 10: 26, 27.

And if they be evil, to the resurrection of endless damnation; being delivered up to the devil, who hath subjected them, which is damnation; having gone according to their own carnal wills and desires; having never called upon the Lord while the arms of mercy were extended towards them; for the arms of mercy were extended towards them, and they would not; they being warned of their iniquities, and yet they would not depart from them; and yet they were commanded to repent, and yet they would not repent.—Mosiah 8: 84-88.

The warning of nonforgiveness applies to any and every man who, knowing the gospel of salvation, turns back. Whether he who turns away goes from out the temple of God into the world of darkness and sin, or whether, standing upon the threshold under the blaze of divine light, looks in and sees the glory of God's righteous kingdom, yet rejects the divine appeal, the sin of the two is the same, and the result is the same. Both have chosen to reject the only means of forgiveness, cleansing, and salvation.

CHARLES FRY.

QUESTION:

In Doctrine and Covenants 57: 1 we find the statement concerning land purchased "even unto the line running directly between the Jew and Gentile." What does this mean?

Indiana

Mrs. B. D.

ANSWER:

This paragraph in Doctrine and Covenants refers to Independence, Missouri, the Temple Lot, and land westward, which the people were advised to purchase. The western boundary of Missouri from 1820 to 1837 was the parallel of longitude running north and south through the mouth of the Kansas or Kaw River. The progenitors of the Indians, according to the Book of Mormon, came from Jerusalem. The land west of this Missouri line was held by the Indians by treaty. Hence it is this western part of Jackson County they were advised to purchase.

The following publications are recommended if further information is desired: W. Z. Hickman's History of Jackson County, 1920; Houck's History of Missouri; Walter B. Stevens' Centennial History of Missouri, 1921; Violette's History of Missouri, and C. H. McClure's History of Missouri, 1920.

The Osage Treaty of 1808 placed the line twenty-four miles east of the mouth of the Kaw River, or about six miles of eastern Jackson County. There were several partitions, but the Enabling Act of 1820 placed the western boundary on a line running north and south through the mouth of the Kansas River. The Platte purchase in 1836 added to Missouri the present northwestern counties extending to the Missouri River.

S. A. BURGESS.

QUESTION:

Is it correct for the ministry to teach that Joseph Smith wrote the Book of Mormon by divine inspiration or to make expression such as "While Joseph was writing the book" without any mention of the translation of the plates by the use of the Urim and Thummim? Would not such statements be misleading to nonmembers?

ANSWER:

To teach is to instruct, to cause to know, and it would be misleading to say that Joseph Smith wrote the Book of Mormon, since like the Bible, it is the product of many writers who lived in many centuries. "While Joseph was writing the book" is an inexactitude, for he did not write it. He did the dictating as he deciphered the characters by inspiration, using the Urim and Thummim. Several wrote, but the bulk was written by Oliver Cowdery.

JAMES E. BISHOP.

What Lack I Yet? - By LOTTIE CLARK DIGGLE

IN A RECENT SERMON a young elder stated that there had been a period in his life when he was satisfied with his personal righteousness. Then realization came that he was far from perfection. Through effort he rose above a particular fault, then another, and yet another, only to realize that he must always be reaching up to a higher level.

Lives there a Saint who can afford to rest on his laurels; who can afford to say "Soul, take thine ease"? Stagnation is death in Christian living in its highest sense. Sainthood means effort, growth, progress, and continuous climbing. From baptism until death, there need never be a dull moment in the life of a Saint. He must work, watch, and pray only to rise from his knees for further striving.

To be a regular attendant at church school, preaching, and prayer services is not enough. Added to this must be the filing of an inventory, the payment of tithing, surplus, and offerings, a genuine co-operation in branch activities with a willingness to serve in any capacity. The member who observes these things is making a commendable beginning. Still he must ask himself, "What lack I yet?" as the rich young ruler inquired of Jesus Christ. The answer might well be, "No one can assist in this work except he shall be humble and full of love, having faith, hope and charity, being temperate in all things whatsoever shall be entrusted to his care."—Doctrine and Covenants 11: 4.

Are all the strivings and virtues of the young ruler to be counted as nothing and to be of no avail? Just as biscuits are a failure even though all the ingredients but baking powder have been included, so when a man keeps the letter of the law and neglects the spirit of it, he lacks the essentials and power for kingdom-building.

A HUMBLE MAN gives his alms in secret, refuses self-glorification, sacrifices his desires, his means, and his time; seeking the will of the Almighty, he submits graciously. He realizes that to the Source of all Intelligence, his knowledge is infinitesimal. He studies to improve himself at every opportunity.

Can the heart and mind of man conceive the depth of meaning of the word "love"? Surely Paul must have had some concept of it when he wrote the thirteenth chapter of I Corinthians. He lists the possession of great talents and equally great gifts which he declares are as nothing without charity. According to Paul, sacrifice of means, comfort, and even of life itself is unprofitable without the spirit of love. A Saint cannot permit himself the luxury of reveling in self-pity, gossip, false pride, or envious thoughts.

The first commandment, "Thou shalt have none other gods before me" (Deuteronomy 5: 7), was given a different wording in Deuteronomy 6: 5: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul and with all thy might." Jesus called this the first and great commandment.

Children in church school are glibly taught the evils of idol worship. Teachers implant in their students' minds the ridiculous picture of intelligent human beings bowing down before a silver doll or a plaster of Paris image of Jesus and his mother. Nevertheless idol worship in another form can become a hindering force among members of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ who worship their hard-earned dollars, the god of popularity, pleasure, comfort and ease, or overweening pride.

There may be those who place husband or children before service for the Lord. An otherwise excellent wife and mother objected strenuously because her husband's duty as a servant of the Lord called him to be absent from home for weeks at a time.

A woman who had been an active worker in her branch, after the birth of her second baby devoted all her time to her home and two little ones, and felt quite virtuous in doing so. An elderly sister and friend told her of a dream in which she had seen the young mother's downstairs spotless but the upstairs neglected. At once the mother replied, "I am keeping my upstairs as spotless as the downstairs which you see. The dream cannot be taken literally. I feel sure that it means that I have been devoting all my time to my home and family and neglecting the higher work, which is service for the Lord."

When she was alone, she prayed, "Lord, if you will show me how to make my work easier, I will give you all the time I have left."

As the days went this mother was given many ideas for modernizing her inconvenient home and was shown how order and planning could lessen the burdens of child care, cooking, and housework.

An individual may worship "work," which is a good thing in itself, but when a person is too busy with his own activities to take time off to go to church, to visit a sick neighbor, to chat with a friend or passer-by, then work becomes an idol and the worker a slave.

ONE OFTEN HEARS the query among Saints, "Is it possible to attain perfection?" Members of the church might indeed become discouraged because their task for kingdom-building has no end; there seems always to be one more obstacle to overcome. No one could accomplish so great a task alone, but Christ goes with his followers all the way. One has but to keep hold of His guiding hand to find renewed strength, encouragement, and direction.

The Triumph of Eternal Judgment

THE NEWSPAPERS of the nation have been printing a great many stories lately about gambling and the men who promote it with the hope of enriching themselves, even if it be at the cost of impoverishing others. The activities of the criminals promoting gambling have become so great that the participants who felt they were immune to the anti-gambling laws find themselves under the necessity of explaining their activities to various courts of the land. These gamblers knew that their activities were against the law, but evidently felt they were immune to punishment.

One man in New York who amassed quite a fortune was finally sent to the penitentiary after living a life of luxury. The reporters said that after he got into prison, he lost his self-assurance, and seemed to be quite confused and depressed at the turn of events. Many of the men engaged in the gambling rings have been distressed that they have been called into account for their activities.

The Lord has declared a day of judgment upon all men, and Doctrine and Covenants 1: 1, 2 mentions the judgments of God upon the wicked:

... for verily the voice of the Lord is unto all men, and there is none to escape, and there is no eye that shall not see, neither ear that shall not hear, neither heart that shall not be penetrated; and the rebellious shall be pierced with much sorrow, for their iniquities shall be spoken upon the housetops, and their secret acts shall be revealed; ... the wrath of God shall be poured out upon the wicked without measure; unto the day when the Lord shall come to recompense unto every man according to his work, and measure to every man according to the measure which he has measured to his fellow man.

Truly, the wicked thoughts of evil men are being shouted from the housetops. Many of these people apparently felt free from unwanted publicity, or they would have lived differently.

The same principle of eternal judgment blesses the efforts of the righteous, who sometimes fear that the kind deeds they do in secret will be wasted rather than that they will move in power to establish the kingdom. Sometimes, as church members we become unduly discouraged because we are so few in number compared to the great multitudes that dwell on earth. Nevertheless, the Lord has promised us that if we would keep his commandments, he would bless our efforts, so they would be greatly magnified. "The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened."—Matthew 13: 32.

We should do the little, kindly, humble acts that come our way, rather than wait idly until the day arrives when we can do a great work, because it is through our learning to work together in love and patience that we grow in understanding to the place where God is able to bless us as he desires.

A NUMBER OF YEARS AGO I heard Brother John Garver tell about the time someone prophesied to him that he would do a great work for the Lord. He was very much distressed about it, and prayed, "Lord, how can I do a great work for you? I am not qualified for it." The Lord then told him that any work done for his sake was a great work.

If we are actively engaged in doing the responsibilities that come to us each day in a spirit of kindness, patience, wisdom, and a love for all of God's creation, the principle of eternal judgment will operate to see that our works of kingdom-building are magnified for the nations to see, just as surely as the wicked designs of men desired to be kept secret are broadcast.

And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow unto it; and many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths, for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem.—Isaiah 2: 2, 3.

The Use of Olive Oil

By ELLA LAMBKIN

SOME PEOPLE have a very strong dislike for the smell of olive oil. To me this strange odor means comfort and relief from pain.

When I was a child if I had a cold, an earache, leg ache, cut finger, anything—out came the oil bottle and that soothing odor which meant sure relief. God was good to us.

I remember one time when a cousin visited us. We were playing out-of-doors when she decided to investigate "those interesting-looking beehives," each sitting on its own foundation in a long row. My sister and I warned her to stay away from the bees or they would come out and sting her. Ethel found a long stick and, beginning at one end, went gleefully down the row, pounding each little house as she went, laughing at us for running away.

We had never really seen the bees come out. My sister and I stopped at a safe distance and watched to see if they really would. Then they came. Ethel's cries brought Mother and Aunt Libby on the scene.

We were long "wagon-wheel" miles from a doctor. The men were all away. The women stripped Ethel, killing bees as they went along. They weretangled in her hair and in her clothes. Her body was swollen an angry red from head to toe, and her eyes swollen shut.

Mother brought out the olive oil bottle, thankful that it was full. Aunt Libby asked if that would do any good. Mother said it couldn't do any harm, and then bathed the child's body in the oil. The swelling went down enough so that the two women could begin the task that was to continue the rest of the day, picking out the stingers.

Late in the evening Mother gave Ethel another olive oil bath. She went to sleep and slept all night. She lived to grow up.

WHEN I WAS IN HIGH SCHOOL, our family contracted the itch, brought back, it was said, by soldiers from the Spanish-American War in Cuba. The folks got some vile smelling salve, and every night there was a rubbing session. I didn't like it, and anyway I was at that stage of dreamy devotion. I remembered that the Doctrine and Covenants said alcohol was good for bathing the body. I knew that olive oil was good for everything, so each night and morning I gave my spots an alcohol rub and an application of olive oil. I was the first one of the family to be clear of the trouble.

Shortly after this the editor of our small town paper lived near us. When their new baby came, one of our church women cared for it. She brought her own bottle of oil and used it. The mother protested one day. She had supplied a bottle of olive oil. Our sister explained that she preferred to use her own because it was blessed. She had to explain what she meant. The baby had colic, and the oil always brought relief. When the mother was left alone with the baby, she gave it some oil when the colic pains started. But they were up all night with a crying baby.

I remember the next night. Our family was in bed when a knock came. Dad went to the door. The editor handed him a bottle of oil, explained their difficulty, and said, "Will you please do whatever it is you do to the oil?" They reported later that they had no more trouble.

Doctors of today may smile at some of these things but, lacking knowledge, we found that our faith worked.

And that odd odor of olive oil brings me a memory of comforted ills.

The Teacher - By MAUDE D. ANDERSON

WE OFTEN HEAR people say, "Experience is the best teacher," and no doubt this is true.

Would one who had never tasted an avacado know what it is like merely because somebody had told him about it?

Could the person who had never been close enough to an orange tree to smell the fragrance of the blossoms know what was in store for him because someone else had had that experience?

Does a small child know what is meant when he is told that the stove is hot, unless he has had the experience of finding out when it was at least uncomfortably warm?

If you had never heard a coyote howl on a cold winter night, would you know how it should sound?

If you wanted to know what Grand Canyon looked like, would you be content merely to look at a picture if there were an opportunity to see it firsthand?

If it be true of these things, then it is equally important in things of a spiritual nature. Why be content to listen to the experiences others relate when there is opportunity for all to enjoy the same rich experiences?

The Calling of Church Women

By MAY RICHARD HAMM

THE SCRIPTURES show that women have a call to service. They need not be ordained as are members of the priesthood to be helpful in the social order. Yet the church could not do without women who feel the responsibility of their high calling as mothers, helpmates, and teachers.

The command, "Let women keep silent in the churches," (I Corinthians 14: 34) does not mean that God considers the masculine mind superior and has no need of feminine intelligence in the church. He needs the help of good, intelligent women in order to have good, intelligent men in his priesthood. In 1830 God spoke to Emma Smith, giving specific instructions as to how she could best help her husband accomplish his mission on earth. "Let thy soul delight in thy husband, and the glory which shall come upon him. Keep my commandments continually, and a crown of righteousness thou shalt receive."—Doctrine and Covenants 24: 4. Every priesthood member needs the help of his wife just as Joseph Smith needed Emma's help. The best words that any man can say to his wife are, "I am going to need you." To be needed as a helpmate is one of the highest callings a woman can have in the church.

In I Timothy 2: 15, Paul says, "Women shall be saved in child-bearing." By "childbearing" Paul meant much more than simply giving birth to a child. He meant motherhood in its highest sense, for God needs good motherhood as much as he needs good priesthood.

Good motherhood has to learn to share. A young father in trying to get acquainted with his new baby was so awkward that the young mother became alarmed. She was about to tell him that he was too awkward to handle the baby when her own mother took her aside and said, "Don't worry about the baby—it won't break. And stop being so possessive. Remember, it's his baby too." The young mother took the advice, and gradually her husband became as adept at handling the baby as she herself was. As a result he is a good father to their children instead of a figurehead. Yet a few words would have shown his wife's lack of faith in his ability as a father and may have destroyed what little faith he had in himself.

God did not intend that women should take over the entire care and responsibility of the family any more than he intended that they should take the whole responsibility of the church. In both fields they are called to be partners with their men. Often their share of the partnership is to be a true helpmate in faith. They must have not only faith in God but faith in their husbands. When the husband is a member of the priesthood, the quiet faith of the wife can be a very real help to him in his developing ability to carry the responsibility God has given him.

WOMEN ARE CHALLENGED by the number of things they are required to teach in order to render proper service to God. The older women are to be "teachers of good things" to the young women. Among the "good things" they must teach the young women to love their husbands and children (Titus 2: 4). In Doctrine and Covenants 68: 4 specific instructions are given as to how children are to be taught. Women must be taught by their mothers, then in turn teach other younger women how to "guide the house" and keep it above reproach (I Timothy 5:14).

But more important than all of these things, older women should teach younger women that the power of faith and love can accomplish great things.

Whole Wheat Recipes

WHOLE WHEAT BREAD

- 1 large potato
- 1 tablespoon salt
- 2 tablespoons brown sugar or honey
- 1 cup condensed milk
- 2 cups water
- 1 cake compressed yeast or 1 package dry yeast

Cook sliced potato slowly in 1½ cup of water until done. Mash well to avoid lumps. Add salt, sugar or honey, and milk to potato and potato water, heat until hot. Remove from fire and add rest of water. Cool until lukewarm and add yeast; let set two or three hours or overnight. Stir in as much whole wheat flour as mixture will take; with hands knead in enough flour to make a spongy loaf (do not add white flour). Let rise until double in size. Knead down and put into baking pans. Let rise again and bake for one hour in oven 350°. For a larger batch of bread, add more salt, sugar, and liquids to given recipe.

BUTTERSCOTCH MERINGUE BARS

- 1½ cups whole wheat flour
- 1 teaspoon baking powder
- ¾ teaspoon salt
- ½ cup brown sugar
- ¼ cup shortening
- 2 eggs

Combine dry ingredients and cut in shortening. Mix in egg yolks until crumbly and thoroughly combine. Pack in 7 x 11 pan. Cover with meringue made as follows:

- 2 egg whites
- 1 cup brown sugar
- 1 cup nutmeats (if desired)
- 1 teaspoon vanilla

Beat egg whites until stiff. Add sugar slowly, beating to make a stiff meringue. Spread on first mixture and bake at 325° for thirty minutes. Cut into squares before serving.

SUGAR COOKIES

- ¾ cup shortening
 - 2 cups brown sugar or 1½ cup honey
 - 2 eggs
 - 3½ cups whole wheat flour
 - ¼ teaspoon salt
 - ½ cup canned milk
 - 2 teaspoons baking powder
 - 1 teaspoon vanilla
- Nuts, raisins, or other fruit may be added if desired

Mix all ingredients together and put in pans by spoonfuls. If honey is used, add an extra ½ cup of flour. Also for rolled cookies more flour is required. For a very crunchy cookie, add various kinds of fruit, nuts, and coconut.

While at Honolulu I was quite "taken over" by a young miss of four years, Juliet Clark. Her mother was a Directo, daughter of Sister Directo, one of the much-respected women of the church. Juliet clung to my hand, though occasionally leaving to join playmates. At our farewell meeting she gave me her picture. On the back is written: "To Grandpa Smith, Juliet (Directo) Clark."

My greetings to Juliet. May she ever remain the happy and carefree girl I saw at Honolulu.

At this meeting were a number of Utah Mormon elders whom we met at the close. Result: an argument on church differences. These boys are well intentioned, but they are quite ignorant of material and vital facts as well as the real issue between the churches, that of heretical doctrines now a part of their religious economy.

Among the many personalities at Honolulu held especially in memory is Elder Virgil Etzenhauser, at one time a missionary to Hawaii. Virgil has visited Independence a number of times since he resigned as an appointee, at which times I met him casually. I had not believed that I really knew him. So it was a pleasure to meet him again, see him participating in worship, and hear his testimony. He took part in the ordinances, assisting with ability, his language and bearing evidencing a safe foundation spiritually. My contact with him is one of the high points of my stay in Honolulu. Virgil is a descendant of one of the first—if not the earliest of the families that settled at Independence after the dispersion.

Another old friend who, noting my presence in the city in the daily press, visited us at Makiki Church, is Frank B. Almond, at one time a missionary to Tahiti. Frank is now doing editorial work for the Star-Bulletin at Honolulu, having recently made such connection. His wife was yet in California, but he was expecting her to join him soon.

Just before leaving Honolulu, I had Frank, Virgil Etzenhauser, and Brother Crownover at a noonday luncheon which all enjoyed very much. Frank promised he would at some time talk to the Honolulu Saints about his experiences in Tahiti. (I have learned recently that he did occupy at Makiki since I was there.) He handed me a letter of greetings to the Saints in Tahiti, in the native language, which I was glad to present to them through Brother Butterworth. It was signed "Feranata"—Tahitian for Frank, and it brought cheer to his friends there. Most of them remembered his ministry which in respect to some phases was outstanding from what we were told.

If opportunity offered, I planned to see Brother Almond on my way home. On account of the brief stop at Honolulu on September 7, I was deprived of the opportunity.

When I addressed the Saints at Honolulu on Sunday, July 25, among several nonmember strangers in the congregation was Elmer C. Jenkins, son of Sister E. T. Jenkins of Independence. After the service he introduced himself to me, and we had some conversation during and after the Waller meeting. Later Brother Siegfried and I ran across Elmer in the business section of Honolulu. He invited us to lunch with him at the Commercial Club, and we were pleased indeed to get better acquainted with him, as he is a gentleman of high character and ability, serving at the head of a large loan company.

Almost from the day we arrived at Honolulu, we kept in contact with the plane company to be certain if possible that we would be able to get from Suva (Fiji) to Papeete, meeting with little success. By the time Bishop Miller, wife, and others left on Wednesday, July 5, we had become convinced that it was unwise to go on from Honolulu. Pan-American informed us that the Trapas Line had already discontinued the service we required, and the French consul told us he had received advices from Noumea that all flights into Papeete for July had been canceled and to "book no reservations." We exhausted every source of information with the same result. We counseled with Brethren Miller and Crownover and finally—very reluctantly—we decided to return home.

This decision was not reached without a wireless to Brother Butterworth which brought no reply until a few minutes before plane time, which failed to convince us that he had been advised as to the facts. We hesitated to fly three or four thousand miles without some assurance that we could get to Tahiti. So after arranging for the wireless to Brother Butterworth, telling him we were forced to go home, we left for California.

Brother Siegfried stopped at Los Angeles and I proceeded to San Francisco, arriving at two o'clock on the morning of July 8. I was in bed at the St. Francis Hotel by 3:00 a.m. At 8:00 I received a telephone call from Elder Alma C. Andrews, Berkeley, advising me he had received a message from Brother Butterworth assuring me that if I would be in Suva by the eighteenth of July, I would be able to get to Papeete on the twentieth. I decided I would proceed to Suva and leave the rest with Providence. I made a reservation for a Tuesday plane and spent Saturday, Sunday, and Monday with Brother Andrews, being domiciled at his home.

The time spent in California was profitable. I spoke at 11:00 a.m. on Sunday at Berkeley and at Danvers Street, San Francisco, in the evening. And on Monday, after viewing the new San Leandro church, I addressed about forty of the priesthood at the Andrews' home, Sister Andrews and other sisters serving refreshments. It was a profitable occasion to all, I believe.

Early Tuesday we went to the airport south of San Francisco, and at 9 a.m. I was off again for Honolulu. Word had been sent, and at 4:30 I was again greeted at the airport by quite a number of the Saints. This time I was given a room at the Mission House.

In the meantime Brother Siegfried decided to hazard another try, joining me on Friday, the fourteenth. At midnight on Sunday, the sixteenth, we embarked for Suva (Nandi Airport), arriving late on Tuesday (the next day). Here we registered at the hotel and waited anxiously for the promised plane.

LANSING, MICHIGAN.—In a branch business meeting held September 9 with District Missionary James Phillips presiding, these officers were elected: Elder Francis H. Boman, branch president; Elder John Luce, junior church pastor; C. W. Sanderson, church school director; Alice Dudley, secretary; Effie Tubbs, treasurer; George Whitmore, music; and Mable Foster, women's department leader.

Missionary Phillips was the morning speaker on the following Sunday.

A social evening was held in the church parlors, honoring Misses Beverly Dudley and Joanne Wilder who have entered the Sanitarium for training; also Mary Hathaway who is attending Graceland.

The annual achievement day and installation program of the women's department was held in the lower auditorium of the church. There were displays of flowers and handcraft.

On September 24 a promotion day program under the supervision of Myrtle Sayers was presented by the pupils of the junior church classes. Elder J. Hodge, Grand Rapids, was the speaker for the 11:00 hour, following the blessing of Sandra Sue, infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Paul Sullivan, by Evangelist E. R. Carter and Elder Francis Boman. Mrs. Sullivan is the former Gertrude Carter.—Reported by THELMA LARSON.

MINOT, NORTH DAKOTA.—A preaching service was held September 15 at the Logan schoolhouse with Elders C. Houston Hobart and Nelt Wager in charge, and was followed by another service in the evening in which Elder Hobart showed slides and talked on the findings in the old ruins in Mexico and Central America.

Elder Hobart also visited several of the isolated Saints in this area. All Saints in the area are invited to attend the services at the Logan schoolhouse.—Reported by VIRGIL D. SMITH.

MOKILEIA, OAHU, HAWAIIAN ISLANDS —Reunion was held at Camp Erdman August 7 to 13. There was a regular attendance of over one hundred throughout the week and a gain of approximately 25 per cent over the previous year. The attendance on the last Sunday was about 160 which was a sizeable increase over the year before. Assisting in the direction and work in the camp were the counselors to the district president, Elders Prescott A. Foo and James M. Kemp. Elder Avon Yap was in charge of registration and physical arrangements. Brother John C. Ledo was business manager and in charge of camp security. Sister Emily Inouye taught the women's class. Sister Maurine Crownover was supervisor of the work for the children. District President A. Orlin Crownover was instructor of the general class and also was in charge of prayer services. Elders Foo and Kemp taught the men's class, and Brother Yap taught the young people's class. Evangelist Charles A. Lee was an active attendant of the reunion. —Reported by ELDER A. ORLIN CROWNOWER.

FARGO, NORTH DAKOTA.—The Red River District of eastern North Dakota and western Minnesota held a priesthood institute September 15, 16, and 17 in the new church home at Fargo.

Dr. Floyd McDowell was in charge of the class discussions. A social hour was held Friday evening.

On Saturday morning the themes were "Why Should Priesthood Be Concerned About Family Life?" and "What Kind of Family Life Shall We Build?" A banquet was given in the evening, followed by a worship service built around the picture, "Head of Christ," by Hofmann. All lights were out except the spot light on the picture.

The institute was planned just for priesthood but all members were invited.—Reported by IRENE E. ROTZIEN.

DINUBA, CALIFORNIA.—District President Lawrence McDonald was in charge of the annual election of officers held September 16. Those elected were Elder G. E. McGoon, pastor; Robert Hurley, counselor; Betty Fowler, church school director; Mae Hurley, secretary; Pete Brown, treasurer and youth leader; and Lula Park, women's leader.

There were two adults baptized during the year, Sister Jane Wise and Brother Harvey Akers.—Reported by LULA F. PARK.

CROSS TIMBERS, MISSOURI.—The homecoming recently held was attended by people who had attended the first meeting here. Brothers Amos T. Higdon and McCrea, who were present, had baptized many of these people. First meetings were held at the invitation of Brother Jamison forty some years ago.

The leader of the group is Elder Everett Mawhiney. Attendance at the homecoming was 134 registered, and about a fourth not registered. Meetings are held at Oak Grove schoolhouse, about three miles southwest of Cross Timbers.—R. L. TILDEN.

STONE CHURCH.—Three people were baptized and confirmed on September 24: William Walter Sumit, baptized by his grandfather, James Gault, and confirmed by President Wallace Smith and James Gault; Victoria Annette Breeze, baptized by Russell Resch and confirmed by L. J. Richards and Clifford Wood; and Bernard Albert McLaughlin, baptized by Russell Resch and confirmed by Glaude Smith and L. J. Richards.

"The Greatest of These Is Charity"

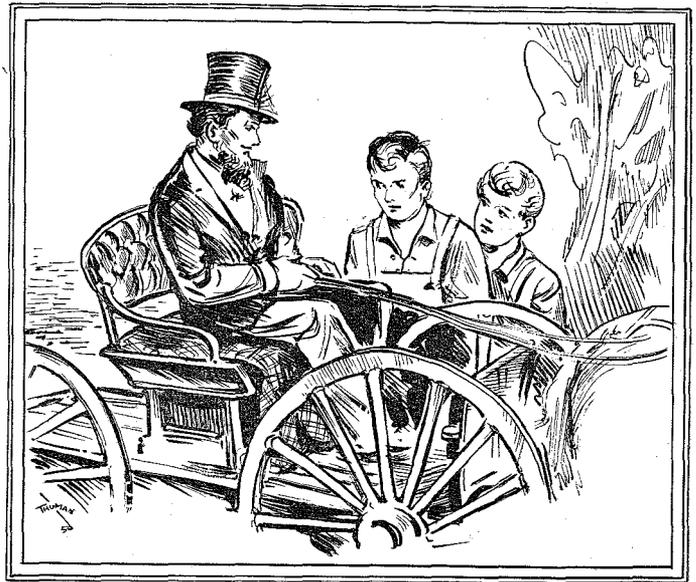

By Marie Gosline

TOO MANY TIMES we look for dark spots in another's character, while instead we should look deep into his heart. This does not mean that we should be taken in by his faults—to "swallow him whole" as some would say—nor even that we should make allowances for him. Rather, we should simply "skip" his weaknesses—step over them as one does a rock on the path—unless we can help him to overcome the dark spot, to erase it from his character, to put a bright spot in its place. For in so many of the lowliest people, God has placed a bit of beauty, just a little ray of light if we will but seek it. There is something beautiful in practically all of us, but sometimes this beauty has become hidden in the mud of our wasted lives. Many of us have chosen, or circumstances and environment have forced us, to walk the dark path.

This puts an added burden on the rest of us. It is not our place to raise our eyebrows a trifle higher or lift our noses in the air; it is up to us as Christian men and women to do what Jesus would have done in like circumstances. He was never self-righteous. He took the sinner by the hand and led him away from sinning. He loved the weak ones and was ready and willing to do something for them. Christ asked them no questions—if they were Jew or Gentile, if they had been to church the previous Sunday, if they had confessed their sins. He simply saw their need—their great need for him—and had charity.

I REMEMBER JOHN, a Lithuanian. Except for one dark spot in his character, he was a good man. He was kind to his wife and children most of the time, and most of the time he was an ideal neighbor. John always kept his garage on the alley unlocked, and if anyone needed a tool he was more than welcome to it. "Don't bother to ask," John always said, "just help yourself." He kept the neatest and by far the prettiest garden on the block. His flower crops were rotated so there was always a profusion of bloom.

But as time went on, this dark spot of John's character grew larger and larger. Without fail, John would go on a drinking spree every two weeks. In the small hours on a Sunday morning, his dented and battered car would be driven up the alley, and as it hit the garage door everyone in the neighborhood knew what his wife had been

Maybe we spend too much time looking for the "cobweb on the hat" as my young brothers used to.

fearing all evening—John had come home drunk again! If John had not cared about this dark spot, things might have taken a different turn, but he loathed himself for it. He was like a gnat caught in a spider's web. Then a neighbor took an interest in John. There flashed through this person's mind a picture of John—not when he was drunk but when he was sober—a picture of him working in his garden. All at once this person knew what to do if the opportunity should come, and one morning it came in the person of John's wife who knocked weakly on the neighbor's door. "You have company?" she asked, her eyes red and swollen from weeping. Such a pleading there was in her voice as she said, "Can you help me? It's about my John."

It was not more than two or three days after this that John became a regular attendant at the Alcoholics Anonymous meetings. Today John has a new car without any dents. He has a new home. But it isn't what John has that counts so much. It's what John is. He is no longer ashamed of himself. He can hold up his head.

All this happened because a neighbor could see something that was deep inside. This person could easily have said, "Isn't liquor an awful thing? My! my!" and thought "Thank heaven I don't drink" or "I'm glad I was brought up in a home where there wasn't any liquor." But one soul was saved—John's soul, to say nothing of his life and the lives of others—all because John was willing and his neighbor was charitable—charitable enough to make a ten cent telephone call to A.A.

MAYBE WE SPEND too much time looking for the "cobweb on the hat" as my young brothers used to. But I must tell you the story of the cobweb so you'll know what I mean.

New Horizons

When my sister and I were children, we lived in the country about three miles from church. Had my brothers been older, they could easily have walked the distance there and back, but since old Brother Clark, a neighbor, drove to church, it was much easier for the boys to walk to the corner and there "catch" a ride with Brother Clark in his buggy. The boys could hardly wait from one Sunday to the next—not because it meant another ride to church school, but because it meant another ride with Brother Clark! And it was many weeks before we finally found out why that ride was so important to them.

Brother Clark was a good old man, but he was not one to be meticulously dressed, and there was a cobweb that hung on the side of his hat. This cobweb was with him always, and the boys could hardly wait from one Sunday to the next to see if it would be gone or had changed position or been brushed away.

Sometimes I wonder how many of us are looking for cobwebs and giggling behind soiled hats. How many of us are looking for dark spots? How many of us instead look for beauty in another? When we find a cobweb do we brush it off, do we help another get rid of the dark spot, or do we just shrug our shoulders? Do we, perhaps, gossip about the unfortunate ones? As Christians we should be above this. It is easy enough for us to become self righteous, to say to ourselves, "Thank heaven, I and mine are not like that," when someone else is having difficulties. Let's not forget to have "faith, hope, and charity . . . and the greatest of these is charity."

Monument

A Florida back-country woman was hoeing out in front of her little weather-beaten house. A neighbor stopped and said: "Effie May, it ain't fitten for you to be hoeing out here today when the whole town knows you just had a letter from the government saying that your boy, Jim, is laying dead in one of those furrin lands. It just ain't fitten."

Effie May looked at her neighbor with bleak, level eyes. "Friend," she said, "I know you mean well, but you just don't understand. This is Jim's land, and it rejoiced his heart to see green things growing, because it meant that his Maw and the young 'uns would be eating. This is his hoe, and when I'm hoeing I can almost feel his big strong hands under mine and hear his voice saying, 'That's good, Maw, that's good.' I can't afford any stone monument for Jim. Working, not weeping, is the only headstone I can give him. So, if you don't mind, neighbor, I'll do my grieving in my own way."—Contributed by Don Blanding.

Know Your Church

By HARRY W. BLACK

MANY PEOPLE have gained knowledge of the church by studying the Three Books, but few have interpreted the instruction, "Know your church," to mean "Know your fellow members better."

As a young Englishman in America, I am surprised and sometimes a little upset at the apparent lack of knowledge members in the States have of the English mission. I do not say this with bitterness, but I am deeply concerned. This concern springs from a desire to unite more fully the peoples of the world in their quest for the kingdom.

Upon arriving in America, I was asked various questions about the British Isles and the way British people live. There are some differences of course, but basically the English are much the same as Americans. By nature they are more reserved. This has led to much misunderstanding on the part of many people in the States. For instance, my Graceland friends gave me three days to catch the meaning of a joke. Even in such a seemingly insignificant matter there is a need for greater understanding. Recreation, transportation, food, and housing differ from the "American way." Numerous limitations in these fields are the result of necessity, not choice. Those who do not know of the problems facing the English people are apt to misjudge them; what may appear to be backwardness is actually conservatism.

I WAS PRIVILEGED to serve as church school leader of my home branch in England. As such I became acquainted with the hardships facing other British church workers. Lack of material presents a much bigger problem there than in America. Financially, the two countries are quite different. Many things considered cheap here are often prohibitively expensive in Britain. The well-planned reunions held in the States cannot be duplicated in England because of transportation and food shortages. In order to judge fairly the growth of the church in Britain, one must take into consideration the many problems facing the Saints there.

Again I stress the importance of "knowing" the church by knowing its peoples. Until each member makes it his business to understand the hopes and abilities and limitations of those in other lands, the task of redeeming Zion will remain a difficult one.

Great occasions do not make heroes or cowards; they simply unveil them to the eyes of men. Silently and imperceptibly, as we wake or sleep, we grow strong or weak; and at last some crisis shows us what we have become.—Cannon Westcott, of Heroes and Cowards.

If he were correct in that position, I wanted him to explain how he could say truthfully that God had spoken to him and told him that the Book of Mormon was a great big lie. He finally admitted that he had not had any such an experience and at no time had he received from the Lord indication that the book was not true. A deacon in another church came to me and said, "You have exposed that man so many times if he told the truth about you people we would not believe him." Sometimes when I was affirming some proposition, he would wait until his last speech to make statements, knowing I could not reply at that session; this he hoped would leave a bad impression in the minds of the audience at least for a time. At the close of one of our Sunday afternoon sessions, he stated that the Book of Mormon was not satisfied in crucifying Christ once, but taught that Christ was crucified both in Jerusalem and here in America. Many in the audience that afternoon did not know of the unreliability of my opponent, and I discerned that he was making a very great impression on their minds. There was a storm coming, and I knew I would not have all these people present to hear my reply. I turned to my moderator and asked him what could be done. He replied, "nothing."

As I thought the situation over, divine light was given to me how to meet this lying attack. I arose to a point of order, which was my right to do. The chairman, who was a very fair man, asked me to state my point. I asked him if he would permit a statement before I made my point of order, and he gave me that opportunity. I stated before that large audience that at no time had I suggested the thought that Christ was crucified in America. Furthermore, not one hint was to be found in the Book of Mormon that Christ was crucified here in America. Neither was it the belief of our church that Christ was crucified twice. We believed that Christ was crucified in Jerusalem as all other Christians believe. My point of order was that we were misrepresented regarding this matter, and I asked that my opponent be made to retract his statement. The chairman ruled on the point of order and commended me for my stand. Roberts not only withdrew his statement but confessed he had misrepresented the facts.

A Dream of Snakes

During that week of debate I had a dream in which I saw two snakes. One of them was on a high shelf, but the other was crawling around among the people. It appeared very friendly, but I knew it would bite some of the children in the crowd. It was my business to protect the children, therefore I placed myself between the serpent and the children so it could do them no harm. I dealt the serpent blow after blow and injured it severely, but with all the pounding I was able to give it, I could not kill it. It continued to show life, and I knew there was still danger. The interpretation of this dream was made clear. The children were members of my opponent's church, and he and his moderator were the serpents. The one on the shelf was the moderator. I found during the debate it was necessary to be careful not to offend those who were very friendly toward us and who did not approve the tactics of my opponent. He was discredited not only among those outside his church, but also among the majority of his own members, including the pastor of the local congregation. Many times during the course of the debate, the pastor would get up and walk out when my opponent was speaking and would return and listen attentively to what I had to present. I am sure he was our friend, as he refused to endorse Mr. Roberts for another debate in that locality.

News and Notes

Following a twenty-minute opening service by Elder Fred Davies, Seventy J. C. Daugherty spoke to the combined priesthood. Later the three quorums of elders met under the leadership of their presidents, Ralph Freeman, Clyde Baker, and Myron Zerr. The Aaronic priesthood met in three classes: the priests taught by Glaude Smith, the teachers taught by L. J. Richards, and the deacons taught by William LaGrece. District President Charles Graham is in charge of the school.

WICHITA

Apostle D. T. Williams, Bishop Walter N. Johnson, and Seventy J. C. Daugherty attended the Kansas District Conference held September 30 and October 1 at Wichita, Kansas. Brother Williams reports that excellent progress has been made in the building of the new church. The church will have a seating capacity of 500 in the lower auditorium and 500 in the upper auditorium. It is estimated that between 400 and 500 people attended the district conference.

MOVING AHEAD

During the week end of September 23-24 the Kaw River Valley group met at Lawrence, Kansas, under the direction of J. C. Daugherty and J. D. Anderson. The group had a larger attendance than ever before at such a meeting. Prior to the meeting, Brothers Daugherty and Anderson toured the valley and visited Saints.

This area will be organized into the Kaw Valley Missionary Area, and a conference will be held in Lawrence on November 26.

CHRISTMAS IS COMING

The first of nine rehearsals of the Independence Messiah Choir was held in the Auditorium on October 1. Preparations are being made for the network broadcast that will be given December 17 and the Auditorium performance on December 24. Franklyn S. Weddle was in charge. George Hulmes is president of the Independence Messiah Choir.

LEADER, PRESENT AND FUTURE

Roger Deitrick, whose home is in El Sobrante, California, and who is at present a student of Graceland College, received a $1,500 Scottish Rite scholarship from the Scaife Scholarship Foundation Incorporation. He postponed the scholarship until his last two years of college so he could attend Graceland College.

Before going to college Brother Deitrick was the vice-president of the local Zion's League and president of the boys' league at the local high school. He won a gold cup from the Bank of America for achievement in science and mathematics. He also won a boys' scholarship plaque for having the highest grades among the boys at the school.

POPOL VUH

An article appearing in the September 10 issue of the "American Weekly" discussed the mysteries concerning the "Popol Vuh," sacred book of the ancient Indians of Central America. Members of the church will be interested in reading the conception the author of the article has about this old writing.

"Stepping Stones" Wanted

Mrs. E. R. Davis, 1222 West Linden, Independence, Missouri, would like to obtain a copy of Stepping Stones for September 24, 1922.

Seattle District Institute and Conference

An institute for church school workers in Seattle District will be held October 27, 28, and 29 with Apostles Reed M. Holmes and Edmund J. Gleazer, Sr., in charge. Registration will be fifty cents; meals will be as follows: lunch, Saturday, $.50; dinner, $1.00; pot lunch Sunday noon to be furnished by the two Seattle Branches. All church school leaders and teachers are urged to arrange for assistants to conduct local church school services on Sunday so that they will be free to attend the institute. Items to be considered at the annual conference on Sunday at 2:00 p.m. are reports of officers, election, annual budget, and recommendations for ordination to priesthood. Those wishing overnight accommodations may write to Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Rhoades, 122 East Sixtieth, Seattle 5, Washington. Meetings are to be conducted at the First and Second Churches in Seattle.

G. L. SWENSON,
District President.

Northwestern Ohio District Conference

The Northwestern Ohio District conference will be held October 21 and 22 at the church in Toledo (2524 Lawrence Avenue), beginning at 7:30 p.m. Saturday with a service for young people. Sunday's schedule is as follows: 9:15 a.m., prayer service; 10:45, business meeting; 1:30 p.m., sermon by Elder Raymond Ashenhurst; 2:30, close of conference. "Make Disciples for Christ" will be the conference theme.

ALVIN C. WADSWORTH,
District President.

"Herald" Wanted

Mrs. W. E. Jacoby, 120 Hinton Avenue, Moberly, Missouri, needs a copy of the May 8, 1948, Herald.

Attention, California Members

N. J. Hodges, 103 Leggett Drive, Porterville, California, has been ill for several months and would appreciate having an elder call on him. He is confined to his bed most of the time.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYERS

Mrs. Roland Prather of Lamoni, Iowa, expects to be operated on October 16 at the Methodist Hospital in Des Moines, Iowa, and requests the prayers of the Saints that she may have a speedy recovery.

Mrs. Ed B. Meyers, Bogota, Illinois, requests prayers for the spiritual welfare of her family and for a spiritual and physical blessing for herself.

Stanley Stautenburg, R. R. 2, Ravenna, Ontario, asks for the continued prayers of the Saints that he may regain his health.

Mrs. George J. Webb, Dunkirk, Montana, asks the Saints to pray for the small group of Saints that meet each Sunday afternoon in Dunkirk for classwork. It is hoped these meetings may someday result in the formation of a mission.

Mrs. D. L. Jones, Desert Hot Springs, California, requests prayers for herself and her family. Her husband has cardiac asthma, and she and her daughter are ill also.

Prayers are requested for N. J. Hodges, 103 Leggett Drive, Porterville, California, who has been ill for several months.

ENGAGEMENTS

Rhode-Arrasmith

Dr. and Mrs. M. E. Arrasmith of Kansas City, Missouri, announce the engagement of their daughter, Janice Suzanne, to Harld T. Rhode, Jr., son of Mr. and Mrs. Harold Rhode of Tabor, Iowa. Both Miss Arrasmith and Mr. Rhode are graduates of Graceland College, class of '50; Mr. Rhode is now attending Iowa State College. The wedding will take place in the spring.

Williams-Deal

Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Deal of Cameron, Missouri, announce the engagement of their daughter, Donna Jean, to Merlyn Eugene Williams, son of Mr. and Mrs. David Williams of Kewanee, Illinois. The wedding will take place next spring.

WEDDINGS

Mount-Sample

Melva Lou Sample, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Sample of Miami, Oklahoma, and John K. Mount, son of Mrs. R. C. Mount of Welch, Oklahoma, were married August 26 at the Reorganized Church in Miami. Elder B. F. Kyser performed the double-ring ceremony. Mrs. Mount is a graduate of Graceland College. They are making their home in Miami, where both are employed.

Kelly-Dougherty

Altabelle Dougherty, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Howard F. Dougherty of Independence, Missouri, and William Harold Kelly, son of Mr. and Mrs. George S. Kelly of Kansas City, Missouri, were married September 1 at the Englewood Reorganized Church in Independence. Elder Herbert C. Lively performed the double-ring ceremony. Both bride and groom are graduates of Graceland College, class of '48, and both attended the University of Michigan where Mr. Kelly received his degree in engineering last spring. He is now doing graduate work at the university. They are making their home in Ann Arbor.

Holst-Heide

On September 10 at the Evergreen Reorganized Church, Lamoni, Iowa, Mava Joyce Heide was married to Donald Holst, son of Mr. and Mrs. Harvey Holst of Quasqueton, Iowa, and Lois Elaine Heide was married to Gerald O. Lane, son of Mr. and Mrs. Herman Lane of Blythdale, Missouri, in a double wedding ceremony. Elder W. E. Shakespeare officiating. Both brides are the daughters of Mr. and Mrs. Alma Heide of Lamoni.

Potter-Tilton

Ruth Carolyn Tilton, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Tilton of Fort Collins, Colorado, and Robert Allen Potter, son of J. C. Potter of Independence, Missouri, were married at the Reorganized Church in Fort Collins on September 3. Elder K. G. Brol-liar officiating. The bride is a graduate of Graceland College, class of '49. They are making their home in Independence where both are employed.

Correction

In the Smith-Phillips wedding announcement which appeared on page 23 of the September 18 issue of the Herald, it was stated that the groom was the son of Mr. and Mrs. John Smith. This should read: "Floyd Smith, son of Mr. and Mrs. Lee Smith."

BIRTHS

Mr. and Mrs. Melvin Jones of Hamilton, Illinois, announce the birth of a daughter, Sydra Diane, born August 21. Mrs. Jones is the former Alice Mathews. Both parents attended Graceland.

A son, Kenneth Ray, was born on June 7, to Mr. and Mrs. Glenn Lasater of Seattle, Washington. Mrs. Lasater is the former Marilyn Smith of Nauvoo, Illinois.

A daughter, Carolyn Janelle, was born on July 22 to Mr. and Mrs. Russell Anderson of Seattle, Washington.

 THE WAR

There was a story to cause some thinking in the news of September 27. The North Koreans captured a number of American troops. They bound the hands of our men behind their backs, and turned machine guns on them. Two pretended to be dead and so survived in spite of their wounds. For five days they were without food and water. (Try that sometime when you feel like griping.) Then they were rescued.

These two men told a strange story. A North Korean soldier refused to participate in the shooting, so the Communists bound his hands too and shot him. He did not survive. He gave his life in protest against that atrocity.

One wonders: What was his background? What impelled him to that heroic sacrifice? It indicates that there may be many friends of freedom north of the thirty-eighth parallel.

Nomie brings this quip: "The Communists have lost their Seoul."

 GOING TO KIRTLAND

It has been like this for days: "Are you going to Kirtland?" No. "Are you going to Kirtland?" No. "Are you going"

Then somebody says you can go, and the money is ready.

You have never been to Kirtland. You have read about it, written about it, but somehow it has always eluded you. You lie awake at night thinking about it, what it must have been in the old days, and what it is today.

Consultations by phone and in person on arrangements, schedules, accommodations. But you can't just go up and buy a ticket to Kirtland. No railroad touches it. You can go to Painesville, Willoughby, and Cleveland, which seem to be in the suburbs of Kirtland. (Like poor Jonah who, ordered to Nineveh, bought a ticket to Tarshish, was bumped, and carried back to Joppa in a water taxi.) Then which? You take the agent's advice and get your reservations.

Look! Which line are you going on? Well, there's a better one—better accommodations and connections. . . . After a while you get all straightened out.

What to take? Will it be warm or cold? No matter what you decide, it will be a mistake. You start piling them up: medium suit, topcoat, slacks, shirts, socks, hankies, undies, notabook, pencils, and pens (a must for editors), toothbrush, shaving kit, hair tonic, shoebrush, and so on ad lib. The suitcase that looked so big is now overflowing. Now, what to leave out?

An experienced traveler kisses his wife good-by, puts on his hat, and takes off for three months with not a worry and hardly any luggage. But Johnny Deskbound goes on a five-day trip and carries half of his possessions.

Train time, farewell at the station, and excitement enough for a trip around the world. So, off you go.

Ready or not—Kirtland, here we come!

 IDEA

Here's an idea for the luxury trade manufacturers. In many a family Mr. is hot, Mrs. is cold. Too many covers on the bed for him are too few for her. . . . How about a divided electric blanket, with an individual heat control for each side. Her side could be pink, his blue. It would prevent arguments, hurt feelings, and perhaps even prevent some divorces. . . . The manufacturers could have them ready for the Christmas trade—this Christmas.

More Book of Mormon

Story-Builders

In Black and White

Ready now are 6 more sets of Book of Mormon Suede-O-Graphs. The script for each one is contained in the book, "Between the Covers of the Book of Mormon," by Verda Bryant, $1.25 each. Each plate is printed on a suede finish paper which does not need to be backed with flannel, but will readily adhere to the regular flannel backgrounds. Colors to be used are indicated for each scene and character. Tempera paints are recommended for adults and crayons for children.

No duplications of characters have been made, unless more than one is needed for the same scene. For this reason, later units cannot be used without having the previous sets.

- UNIT 4 - 8 plates - $1.05
- UNIT 5 - 7 plates - $1.05
- UNIT 6 - 4 plates - $.60
- UNIT 7 - 5 plates - $.60
- UNIT 8 - 5 plates - $.60
- UNIT 9 - 9 plates - $1.05

These units cover Chapters 10 to 35 inclusive in the book, "Between the Covers of the Book of Mormon."

They Who Build

They who build on Graceland's hill
Need pray direction for their will.
They must lay foundations down
Forty years beneath the ground.
And the towers must from the sod
Mount a million dreams to God.
Walls so flexible be planned
That the strain of growth will stand.
Growing minds will scatter light
Far beyond the breadth and height.
Entrance doors must be so wide
That no learner be denied.
Windows opened out on skies
Where expanse for dreaming lies.
And the trees that separate
Inner love from outer hate
Must for future Graceland house
Beauty in luxuriant boughs.
They build to incubate a kind
That mirrors the eternal mind.
They who build on Graceland sod,
Lay their wood and stone to God.

Graceland College Day is observed throughout the church on October 29 this year. On the cover is a photograph of a portion of the college campus with Walker Hall, women's dormitory, in the background. Cleo M. Hanthorne, Graceland's "Poet Laureate," included the above poem in The Bell Tower's Eye, a book of poems about Graceland.

Eternal Life

SCIENTISTS TELL us that the cells composing our bodies are constantly replaced by new cells, so that our bodies are completely renewed about once every seven years. Yet we live on and pursue our life purpose undisturbed by this constant renewal. This is the order of life. We are made that way.

With this in mind it does not seem specially difficult to believe that when the time comes for us to leave this world our Heavenly Father will furnish us with new bodies suited to our new life. Nor does it seem that we need fear this change, for the important part of us—the spirit, the essential person—continues to live and to grow.

Life is full of parallels like this, and they all point toward the great truth of our survival after death. If we believe this multiplied evidence, we have no need to fear. We work for the best that we know, secure in the assurance that we shall live—here or hereafter—to enjoy the best fruits of our best endeavors.

News & Notes

NEWS FROM EUROPE

A cablegram received from President F. H. Edwards and Bishop G. L. DeLapp announces that they arrived safely in Rotterdam, Holland, on October 11. En route they stopped at Ireland and at London, England.

GRACELAND COLLEGE

The newest attraction at the Memorial Center is the table games which can be checked out for parties and group activities. Among the games are checkers, dominoes, monopoly, par-chesi, table bowling, and carom.

Other articles may also be checked out for use by students. Tin cups and plates, forks and spoons, griddles for open fires or stove use, and four long-handled frying pans are among them. Punch bowls and ladles and two portable record players with amplifiers are articles which can be used at more formal gatherings.

FORWARD

Miss Nelle Morgan, R.N., director of nurses at the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital, has been appointed by Governor Forrest Smith to the Missouri State Board of Nurse Examiners.

From 1945 to 1947, Sister Morgan was president of the Missouri State Nurses' Association, and since 1946 has served on the Governor's Advisory Council for the Hospital Construction Act.

Sister Morgan graduated from the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital School of Nursing in 1930 and continued her education in Washington University in St. Louis and at Michigan University at Ann Arbor.

PREPARATION DAY

On October 5, the first Preparation Day program for 1950-51 was held in the Stone Church. Services were held in the forenoon and in the afternoon.

Elders Arthur Rock and Ralph Freeman were in charge of the fellowship service. Mrs. Gail Wilson, stake women's leader, was in charge of the devotional period that preceded the fellowship service.

Other speakers and teachers were Mrs. G. B. Wilson, Mrs. John Darling, Mrs. Preston Hubble, Mrs. Lawrence Jones, Mrs. Fred Stevens, Mrs. Paul Kelsey, Mrs. Melvin Benner, Mrs. Frank Hoecker.

There was a nursery for preschool children.

COURTESY AWARD

Two Kirtland, Ohio, women figured in the recent "Courtesy Award" sponsored by the Wiloughby Chamber of Commerce. Mrs. Flora Nutter won a prize for her letter nominating Mrs. Carolyn Davidson as the Courtesy Award winner for the month of August.

The letter told how Sister Davidson had befriended a blind woman, Mary Burgin. Seventeen years ago Sister Davidson found the blind woman wandering in a snowstorm. Since then Sister Burgin has lived with the Davidsons.

Both women are active in church doings in Kirtland.

The Meaning of Brotherhood

"And he stretched forth his hand toward his disciples, and said, Behold my mother and my brethren."—Matthew 12: 49.

In all ages and in all lands, the ties of family life have been strong. Wherever they are weakened, one can look for a tragic deterioration in the quality of the individual.

We feel a special love for mother, and a special respect for father. We will do more for a brother or sister than we will do for strangers. We will make sacrifices. If we are the kind of people we should be, and if our homes have been good ones, we will do these things.

It has occurred to many that if the quality of family life could be extended to the larger society, everybody would be better off and happier. It is a thought so common that it must be regarded as a truth. A co-operative society will provide more good for all than a purely competitive society.

* * * * *

The truth of brotherhood was certainly well known to Jesus. He gave it great meaning in his life and teachings.

Jesus was very quick to see the possibilities in a practical object lesson, and he knew how to make use of an incident that was happening before the eyes of his disciples.

One day while he was talking to the people and answering questions, his family came to see him, but the crowd held them away. A disciple, taking in the situation, told him, "Behold, thy mother and thy brethren stand without, desiring to speak to thee."

Here was a chance to teach a lesson on brotherhood. Jesus said, "Who is my mother? and who are my brethren?" Then in a dramatic gesture, he stretched out his hand toward his disciples and said, "Behold my mother and my brethren!"

Jesus had no intention of being rude to his family. He loved them.

But he made a great teaching experience of the occasion. His larger family were the people of the faith—"whosoever," he said, "shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven."

* * * * *

Our need of brotherhood is built into our natures. We need each other. No man can live to himself alone. Nobody has all the skills necessary to provide the means of civilized life. No man can be his own cloth-maker, tailor, gardener, dentist, doctor, printer, or a thousand other things. To be efficient, we must specialize.

Have you ever thought that you, personally, need many thousands of other people and the products that they bring to the market, in order to live the good life? At the same time, your work goes out to many thousands of others in exchange for what you get.

The necessity of brotherhood has its basis in our interdependence, our need of each other.

* * * * *

God put the basis of brotherhood into the natures of his people. He distributed his gifts far and wide. He did not give all wisdom, all talent, or all the good ideas to any one person or group, regardless of what some may think. He gave something to everybody. We are all needed.

That, too, happens to be the basis of democracy. It will take all of us to make the good society. We need our brothers and sisters in the faith, and they need us. Zion, when it is built, will be the result of a great co-operative effort.

Albert Schweitzer, the scholar, musician, philosopher, and medical doctor, who has devoted his life to the poor natives of the colony at Lambarene', West Africa, has said:

All of us live spiritually by what others have given us, often unwittingly, in the significant hours of our life. At the time, these significant hours may not even be perceived. We may not recognize them until years later when we look back. We all owe to others much of the gentleness and wisdom that we have made our own.

We are interdependent spiritually and culturally, as well as economically and politically.

* * * * *

It isn't easy to get the spirit of brotherhood to penetrate very far into us. A lawyer friend recently told me this: "Church people are so intolerant, they attack each other so bitterly. Why is it that a religion of gentleness and kindness makes some people mean?"

One of our own young women recently wrote of an experience she and her husband had in a certain church school: they had proposed some new studies for the class they were attending. The plan was rejected. She wrote:

What made me unhappy, however, was the bitterness with which they denounced the idea. They didn't just say that they didn't like it; they leaped upon it, berated me for suggesting it, exclaimed bitterly that the church school was not for such discussions...

There you have one of the reasons why brotherhood so often fails. That sort of thing should not be possible in the church.

Needless to say, this is one of the things that must be overcome in our effort to promote brotherhood. We must recognize the weakness and danger within ourselves. We must say, "This shall not happen again."

WE WOULD like to take this opportunity to call your attention to "Graceland College Day," which will occur this year on October 29. As in the past the response of the Saints throughout the church in its world-wide reach has been very generous toward this worthy cause. With more and more of our young people from all over the world attending Graceland College, the opportunities for service to these young people is extended through this arm of church activity. It is our intention that these contacts shall be of such an enduring nature that they will carry over into the future life of those individuals whose lives are touched in this way, and as a consequence benefit the church immeasurably.

Each district president and branch pastor will shortly receive a letter calling his attention to "Graceland College Day," and we urge that attention be given to this in meetings that day. As in the past the offerings received will be used to further the educational facilities which will be made available to church boys and girls. To the end that we shall have a successful response to this movement, we urge attention to the details of the program, some of which are outlined in the Pastor's Handbook.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY.

Appointments

The following appointments have been made by the Joint Council of First Presidency, Twelve, and Presiding Bishopric:

Donald V. Lents, to continue as chaplain at the Independence Sanitarium and Hospital.

J. C. Stuart, to continue assignment to Chicago.

John F. Sheehy, transferred from Chicago District to Maine District.

Donald E. Harvey, transferred from Maine to St. Joseph, Missouri, as missionary.

Merle E. Howard, transferred from St. Joseph, Missouri, to Southern Ohio District, Columbus, objective.

Wayne Simmons, to the Spanish-speaking people.

Alan Dean Tyree, appointed to the Kaw River Valley, Kansas.

Richard D. Anderson, assignment effective June 1, 1951.

For the Joint Council,
ISRAEL A. SMITH, President

Travelogs

WHEN BISHOP SIEGFRIED and I arrived July 18 at Nandi Airport on the Island of Fiji, Suva seaport a hundred twenty miles away, we were informed by the office of Trapas Airline that a plane would arrive the next day and leave for Papeete soon thereafter. This was welcome news indeed, and a confirmation of what Brother Butterworth had assured us by wireless.

Fiji is a British possession, and the inhabitants are mostly Fijians and Indians. We took an auto ride about the area adjacent to Nandi and saw many thousands of acres of cane, sugar being a major industry in Fiji. We also inspected a pineapple canning factory.

We saw native Fijians with their enormous "hairdo," and barefooted policemen with ornate uniforms down to the waist, wearing slashed shirts. The Indians—many of them—wore turbans.

The Trapas Catalina plane arrived on Wednesday, July 19, and at 1:00 a.m., Thursday we embarked. We were two of the sixteen passengers packed into a small cabin made smaller because of our baggage.

At 7 a.m. we stopped at Fileolo on the northern tip of Samoa for breakfast and then proceeded on to Aitutaki where we spent the night.

Leaving Aitutaki at 6 o'clock on the morning of the second day after leaving Nandi (it was still Thursday, July 20), at approximately twelve o'clock noon, we circled the bay at Papeete. Here I lost my sense of direction and remained completely "turned around" all the time we were in Tahiti.

Of course we were in a state of speculation as to what we would find, who would be at the dock to meet us, etc.

We landed on the bay and taxied closer to the dock. Health officials came aboard: "Was anybody on board from a certain island [rumor had it that there was smallpox there]? No. Then came the city police. Then we were directed onto a launch where we were greeted by Elder John Mervin with a hearty handshake and leis.

At the dock we were met by our missionaries, Elders F. Edward Butterworth and Allen J. Breckenridge and Horahitu, Sister Mervin, her daughters Deda and Joan, and her son-in-law Alexi with additional leis. Soon we were cleared at customs and immigration; our baggage was taken over, and we were escorted to "Tarona," our church, a few blocks from the dock where the Saints were assembled.

Brother Siegfried and I literally had been "cooped up" for two days. We knew we appeared disheveled, and our spirits were drooping somewhat as we were led down the aisle to the pulpit and given places of honor between Elder Mervin, who presided, with our missionaries and Paia a Metuaaro, former appointee, and others.

All the priesthood members were banked behind us, dressed in white with black ties, and all the women and girls in the congregation were dressed in white and wore white hats; it was an impressive sight and one long to be remembered. Our orchestra of about twenty-five pieces was there, and when Brother Mervin began the services, all stood while the musicians, led by Elder Breckenridge, played the national airs of France, America, England, and China. After we were seated, prayer was offered by Elder Mervin and Horahitu, whose name in full is Taruiarii a Tauhiti, who is a real orator, welcomed us to the islands on behalf of the Saints. Helps for Graceland Day

THROUGHOUT THE CHURCH on Sunday, October 29, alumni and friends of Graceland College will be participating in the annual observance of Graceland College Day. This material is being presented in advance of that day to assist speakers and program planners as they prepare to minister on that occasion in sermon, song, and story.

Theme

The theme of Graceland College Day for the next two years will be "A Greater Graceland." This emphasis has been authorized by the Board of Trustees of the college with the approval of the First Presidency and Presiding Bishopric of the church. The phrase is intended to describe certain improvements which the college hopes to make in buildings and campus, using funds derived from Graceland Day offering throughout the church.

Background

During the past several years enrollments have swelled, and the need to offer new courses and better facilities for more students has become apparent. The needs have been met in part with splendid additions to campus facilities. Improvements include the addition of a Memorial Student Center which is the worship and recreation headquarters of the campus, a modern heating plant needed to furnish heat to old and new structures on the campus, a classroom building, an enlarged library, a remodeled and redecorated dining hall, conversion of a former bakery into a men's dormitory, conversion of a former dormitory into a music building with practice rooms and studios, conversion of several homes into dormitories. These improvements have been made possible through church appropriations, through alumni and Graceland Day gifts, and in other ways. The Memorial Center was made possible entirely by donations from alumni and the offerings of the people of the church on Graceland College Days in the past. Currently, financed through General Church appropriation, a new dormitory for men is being erected on the campus.

To make all of these changes possible, it has been necessary to tear up the campus—installing heat, water, and sewer lines, making excavations for the buildings, and so on. While emphasis was being placed on providing these major improvements, made urgently necessary by the times and the swelling enrollments, some other improvements of similar importance to the smooth flow of campus life have had to be by-passed temporarily. Now the time has come, college administrators feel, to give attention to these improvements.

The Need

The need for 1950-51 as seen by college administrators is summarized in the following five basic projects. Funds derived from Graceland Day offerings in 1950 will be used for all or as many of these projects as are possible, depending on the limitations of funds received.

- 1) Development of a Master Campus Plan for the future location of buildings, roads, and other facilities. The campus cannot grow by guess. New parts must relate to an intelligent whole. Recent structures added to the campus have been located in accordance with a preliminary campus plan.
- 2) Beautification of campus grounds which have been defaced as a necessary by-product of the construction of buildings on the campus. The campus sorely needs improved landscaping. The preliminary campus plan calls for an outdoor amphitheater in connection with the Memorial Center.
- 3) Expansion of the library to provide more study space, more room for books, and other library facilities. Books are only one of several items recommended for private study by students in modern library practice.
- 4) Remodeling and redecoration of the Walker Hall reception room. Designated as a reception room for the women residents of this campus dormitory, the spacious room of late has had to serve as the living room for the entire student body on the campus. Now the Memorial Center takes over this function. The years of heavy use have taken their toll of the Walker reception room. Graceland Day funds will make possible the renovating of this important facility.

5) Changes in roads so that no main-traveled roadway will cut through the campus. Present-day campus planners recommend the elimination of all through streets from main campus areas for purposes of safety and ease of moving student pedestrian traffic from class to class and from dormitory to class. The preliminary campus plan would eliminate bottlenecks and hazard points in present roadways, and send all through traffic around rather than through the campus. Sidewalks also need to be constructed to meet needs created by the erection of new buildings.

The Latest Word

Graceland is continuing its onward march. This year's enrollment of 575 is a slight increase over last year. Three of Graceland's staff members who had been on leaves of absence to work on graduate degrees have returned to the campus to fill their accustomed roles as teachers and counselors to Graceland's students. Jerry Runkle, who teaches business and economics subjects, has returned after two years of graduate study toward his doctor's degree at the University of California. William Gould, who teaches speech and English, has returned after one year at Columbia University where he obtained his Doctor's degree. Mrs. William Gould, who also had a year's leave, has returned to teach secretarial science subjects after further study at Columbia. More and more students are coming to Graceland, and Graceland's teachers are meeting the challenge by improving their abilities to teach.

Workshops

A milestone in relations between Graceland and the church was passed this summer when members of the First Presidency joined with other general church officers, members of the college faculty and other educators, members of the Board of Trustees alumni, and students to spend several days discussing important ramifications of the general question, "What kind of college does the church need?" The meeting—called a workshop—was held on the Graceland campus. More will be heard about this workshop as committees set up for the purpose continue their studies of problems raised. The college is relating itself more closely to the church day by day as the school discovers more and more about what the college can give in service to the parent organization.

As this history making workshop was being held, another workshop of similar significance was also meeting on the college campus. Musicians and leaders in religious education came together for several days of discussions, lectures, and demonstrations at Graceland. Present planning indicates that other workshops and institutes for church workers will be held on the campus in succeeding summers. The facilities of the college may thus be extended to encompass the educational needs of not only the youth of the church—but the entire membership.

New Courses

Graceland is matching the forward strides in education with steps of her own. This year two new courses were established: basic science and communications. The first, according to the catalog, gives the student "the opportunity to develop an appreciation of the ever-expanding relationships between man and his environment." Communications is "a laboratory course to develop skills in using our modern language in writing, reading, speaking, and listening." The establishment of these courses puts Graceland in the forefront with other educational institutions that are pioneering in these fields.

New Teachers

There are other changes in teaching personnel this year. Miss Kleta Finley of Kansas City has replaced Miss Ethelyn Dewey, retired, as instructor of education subjects. Miss Finley returns to her Alma Mater as teacher after having studied at Iowa State Teachers College, the University of California, and Columbia University. She has had wide experience as a teacher in the elementary schools of the Midwest, and now she will be educating other young men and women who desire to become teachers. She holds the M.A. degree from Columbia.

Mrs. Thelma Silsby of Lamoni is teaching piano at Graceland this year, as she has done in other years. Hers is a temporary appointment replacing Mrs. Edwin Browne who is on leave this year.

Enrollment Facts

A study of this year's enrollment pattern reveals interesting facts. Thirty-eight states are represented in the student body, and there are students from Canada, England, Hawaii, and Australia. Men outnumber women three to two. There is no shortage of young men and women learning to be teachers at Graceland. That department this year has the largest enrollment it has enjoyed in recent times.

Housing

Men's housing is crowded. The new dormitory for men will not be completed until the fall of 1951. In the meantime men are living in homes throughout Lamoni, in residences converted into dormitories, and in Baker Hall. College officials are currently investigating the possibility of providing temporary housing on the campus yet this year to relieve the load on other housing facilities. The housing pressure came late this year, owing to the fact that a large number of men did not indicate their intention of enrolling at Graceland until the last two weeks of August.

Modern Methods

Graceland's Teaching Materials Service—also known as the Audio-Visual Aids Department—is housed in new quarters, the area formerly occupied by the Graceland Bookstore in the basement of the Administration building. This department is fast becoming one of the most important at the college as Graceland's instructors take advantage of modern methods of teaching made possible by developments in electronics and other fields.

Thoughts for Graceland Day Sermons

The church has always fostered education. One of the greatest periods of spiritual and numerical growth in the church occurred at the time of the "School of the Prophets" in Kirtland Temple. At Nauvoo the church established America's first municipally-operated university, and originated a system of education which was co-ordinated from kindergarten through college. The first school in Jackson County was established by members of the church. The college itself is the oldest and largest junior college in Iowa. It is considered one of the finest junior colleges in America.

The Scriptures of the church are full of instruction referring to education and its importance for the church member. Such phrases as these have become by-words among church members—"Seek ye out of the best books"—"Seek learning even by study and also by faith."

The college was established by the church to be a place where the learner could go and receive a high quality of instruction in an environment that would be suitable for saintly growth. The college continues to uphold this standard. The Lord, speaking to his young people today through his servants, has admonished them to attend the church college. Members of the faculty and staff of the college sense the tremendous responsibility which is theirs to be servants of the young in the field of education. They carry a spirit of devotion to the church and devotion to truth in the fields of their specialization which is a unity of beauty and a pillar of strength to the youth of the church who come to Graceland's halls.

Young people of the church come to Graceland to learn, and they return to serve. To the spirit which they bring to the campus is added enlarged vision and improved skills for tasks motivated by divine impulsion. For many of them, Graceland becomes a miniature foretaste of Zion's living.

An investment in Graceland is an investment in the church. Among the aims and objectives listed in the college catalog, this one is named first: "To develop a fellowship of students whose lives are activated by the ideals and principles of Christian living as interpreted by the thought and program of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, to encourage participation in its corporate activities, and to promote the disposition to share in the development of its spiritual and social program." Graceland affirms that religion at its best is education at its best—that education at its best is religion at its best. Graceland is the church at work in the field of higher education. At best, "The Graceland Spirit" is the Spirit of Christ.

Not all may attend Graceland. But Graceland seeks to serve all of the church as she sends her young graduates back to the home branches better prepared to serve, as she makes contributions in research, as her teachers extend the arm of education to points beyond the classroom through church publications, lectures, and in other ways. Graceland hopes to emerge with a new role in the future, serving as the headquarters for summer workshops and institutes for church workers.

Those who cannot go to Graceland should capture the spirit of the young Jesus growing "in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man." Then they will have captured the Graceland spirit, and will in a sense, be a Graceland.

Poems About Graceland

UP THE HILL TO COLLEGE

Here in the broad lap of the dormitory where the year relaxes and into the vari-colored leaves, and ripe fruits,
and fading flowers,
here I shall lay my tired head for a quiet rest and a dream, a prayer.

Here I give thanks for October's lazy skies, for the sun's glow, and the glistening grass,
and the air's tang.

Here I shall lay my head, and be a boy mumbing a ritual farewell to boyhood.

I pray a still, transition prayer.
It is a man's world on top the hill.

Here, with October, I release my hold on beauty, comfort,
purposeless boyish ease, and raise a man's head to look at winter, and at life.

When I have rested, I shall go up the hill, and look not back.

For a moment I shall lie in the broad green lap, and sap a full measure of man's courage up.

For the man's world must know me for a man, beyond this soft valley
on the sunlit hillside.

Snug, I lie in the long curves of the lawn—

smug no more.

Within me, restless as the autumn wind, prophecies of rage and triumph rise to urge me on.

I shall take up the pain of skepticism;
I shall doubt, and plan, and strive.

Hold me and bless me.

Then I'll stow away your memory, and go,

with long, straight muscles that your curves will gall,
I'll stride to meet the sun!

Note: Marietta Walker has been called the "Mother of Graceland." She donated much of the land on which the college now stands, and she championed the establishment of the college. Two buildings on the campus carry her name: Walker Hall is a women's dormitory; Marietta Hall provides facilities for practice for music students and houses music studios.

MARIETTA WALKER

She loved to see the violets grow,
Yet planted on this violet field
Seeds that when nourished to their yield
Would be a better kind of men,
And women with a clearer view
Of work that they were born to do.

She loved the breeze that swept the hill
Yet saw a vision of the place
With buildings broad upon its face,
Blocking the wind's unbroken path,
To house the kind of men who plan
The partnership of God with man.

The broad green summit of the hill
Was rock to lay foundations on.
She blest the future Graceland son
With visions of his heritage
And such abundant caring that
Out of her loves she cast up stone
To lay the walls of Graceland's home.

An Alumnus Looks at Graceland

College Day - By W. REED EMSLIE

EACH YEAR the observation of Graceland College Day brings to mind many happy experiences of my own college years. These are pleasant memories of a period of activity which have left an indelible impression upon everyday thought and action.

Not so pleasant are reminiscences of the critics who caustically suggested that time spent in college would be time wasted. For one in my meager circumstances, time should be more profitably expended in some productive effort—not heedlessly squandered in fruitless academic pursuit.

After three years at Graceland, I announced my plans for attending a university; this precipitated an even higher lifting of eyebrows.

Followers of Christ's teachings who criticize those who seek educational advantages do so because of an overview of Christianity which has been blurred by faulty perspective. One of the many significant statements attributed to the Christ indicates a compelling need for educational and intellectual achievement. He said, "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word of God."

INTERRELATIONSHIPS between the word of God and educational and intellectual advancement may not at first be apparent. There are those whose concept of this statement stems from an attempt to interpret it literally. It seems unlikely, however, that such an interpretation was intended. The spoken word is too easily distorted, misinterpreted, or misconstrued. Shades of meaning are lost in translation from one language to another.

A more comprehensive approach to the meaning of the word of God must be discovered. In his prayer for glorification, the Master more clearly defined the nature and meaning of this all-important element of human life. Petitioning for his apostles, he prayed, "Sanctify them through thy truth: thy word is truth."

It becomes apparent, then, that Christian philosophy embraces the thesis that two major elements should control and guide all activities of human life. These are bread and the word of God, or physical sustenance and truth. When either of these basic elements is lacking, man ceases to live. Without food, physical life processes cannot function. The human body returns to the elements from which it came. Without truth, there is no purpose in living. The spiritual man withers. Life becomes an "eat to live" and "live to eat" existence.

COLLEGE DAY ACTIVITIES are centered around a recognition of the necessity for this second requirement in a well-rounded life. The influence of truth on human activity is and always has been extremely profound. In Doctrine and Covenants, section 90, truth is defined as being "knowledge of things as they are, and as they were, and as they are to come." Others have expressed its meaning to be "steadfast fidelity to order and law." The phraseology used to convey the meaning is of little consequence. Its importance to mankind and the responsibility of institutions of higher learning in regard to truth remain unchanged.

Colleges and universities are dedicated to the task of discovering and disseminating the truth. In so doing, they help provide humanity with an essential element of life. To lose sight of their objective is to fail in achievement of the purposes for which these institutions have been established.

The relative importance of educational and intellectual advancement in the lives of Christ's followers should be clear. It places upon each Christian a twofold responsibility.

First: Individual responsibility for personal discovery of truth. Through education and the development of mental capacity, we may progress toward a greater comprehension of the laws through which God creates and controls the universe. To accomplish this task, we must establish a definite program of self-improvement and then follow it. Each succeeding year, we should function on a higher intellectual plane.

Second: Collective responsibility for establishment and support of institutions of higher learning from which all may seek and discover truth. Fulfillment of this second objective is a steppingstone toward accomplishment of the first. Perhaps the simplest and most successful means of enhancement of our appreciation of the nature of truth is through study on the collegiate level.

In order to qualify as true followers of Christianity, then, it is imperative that each of us discharges this twofold responsibility. Christians must continually seek improvement and expansion along educational and intellectual lines. Institutions of higher learning must be established and supported in order to provide the facilities for use of all who seek the more abundant life. Continued support and participation in Graceland College Day activities will contribute toward a discharge of these responsibilities. In this way, it will be possible to free mankind from intolerance, fear, superstition, and above all—ignorance—the one luxury we cannot afford.

Experiences of a Missionary - Part IX

Other Debates in Nebraska

AFTER the debate in Wauneta, Nebraska, we went to Ough. There Brother F. A. Russell met Reverend Terry in debate. I acted as moderator for Brother Russell while Roberts acted as moderator for Terry. Public sentiment was very much in our favor there. Brother Russell made an able defense of our work and was especially strong in his negative arguments. His opponent kept referring to our books as being dirty, vile, and vicious. Brother Russell kept insisting that his opponent present what he considered "dirty, vile, and vicious," but Terry declined to do this, saying it was so bad it could not be read before a mixed audience. Brother Russell challenged this statement and offered to read any passage from the Doctrine and Covenants or Book of Mormon which might be selected, without a single blush on the part of anyone in the audience. This was never done, so Brother Russell informed the audience he himself would read from the books that had been denounced by his opponent. He read many fine passages from both books, proving the statements made concerning them were untrue.

Mr. Terry was an addict to tobacco, and each evening would spit on the floor. Brother Russell read that section of the Doctrine and Covenants in which the Lord condemned the use of tobacco and, pointing down to a puddle of spit made by his opponent, said, "It is no wonder that some preachers do not like this Doctrine and Covenants." A roar of laughter went up from the audience, and from that time on to the end of the debate Terry refrained from using tobacco while on the stand.

Bellingham, Washington

Brother S. S. Smith was doing pastoral work in Bellingham, Washington, when challenged to debate. It was decided by the general authorities that I be sent to meet this challenge. I signed propositions with a Mr. Williams, and a time for holding the debate was set. My opponent represented the Church of Christ (Non-Progressive). In his opening statement, he indicated his willingness to make it a clean debate, to which I readily agreed. I found him true to his promise. At no time did he make any statement that reflected on our church or a single man who had ever been connected with it. As the debate proceeded, my opponent grew weaker in his defense and criticism of our work. Several of my friends came to me and stated they believed he would not be able to continue to the end. I thought he would, but one morning his moderator came to Brother Smith and stated that his man had collapsed, and if the debate were to continue, it would be necessary for him to represent his church. To this I consented, and that night we found a new man opposing us. His name was Bruce, and he was entirely different from my former opponent. Instead of making it a clean debate, he was ready to resort to any method he thought would make it hard for our church. As time passed on he would misquote not only the Scripture, but other books. Many times we exposed him in this, but it did not seem to affect him in the least. When it was made clear to the audience that he had been dishonest, he would laugh but never attempt a defense. One of the things that provoked more discussion than any other was the origin of his church. Like many, he insisted the church was organized at Pentecost and had come down unbroken from that time. I showed from his own histories that their church had a very modern origin. To overcome these facts, it was necessary to get rid of these histories. He arose and addressed himself to the chairman, and asked that I be prevented from using any book but the Bible. The chairman, without hearing from my moderator or me, ruled that the debate must be confined to the Bible and the Bible alone. Brother Smith, my moderator, made a strong plea, showing that the rules which we had signed permitted the use of other books beside the Bible, and we insisted these rules must be observed. The chairman, however, refused to change his decision. As a last resort I appealed to the house which had the right to reverse this ruling. When the vote was taken there were only six people in the entire audience who voted to sustain the chairman, while over three hundred voted that I be permitted to use other books besides the Bible. I thanked the audience for its fairness, and later I discovered that the chairman was a member of my opponent's church, and it had been arranged for him to preside that night so he could make this ruling. It is needless to say that our opponent did not benefit by this method, while our cause won many friends. In his closing remark, he frankly confessed he had made some terrible blunders and if he ever held another debate with our church he would employ a different method.

I am not attempting to give all that came up in the course of public debates, but enough that the reader might get a glimpse of some of the matter that is presented. Every debate has its own outstanding features, and no two are alike. Each becomes distinctive in some of the matter presented.

Cardin, Oklahoma

While I was laboring in western Iowa under the direction of brethren J. F. Garver and F. Henry Edwards, a minister of the Christian Church in Cardin, Oklahoma, made an attack on our work. He took the Book of Mormon and the Doctrine and Covenants, threw them on the floor, and tramped on them. He issued a challenge to our people and went from house to house and dared them to meet him in debate. There was no honorable way out except to meet the challenge. The brethren asked me to attend to the matter, so I went to this man, signed propositions, and set a date for the opening of the debate. One of the largest buildings in the town was used, and we found it all too small to accommodate those who wanted to attend. Mr. Leonard, my opponent, was a highly educated man and a noted debater.

I selected as my moderator Brother Lee Quick. Brother George Harrington also rendered valuable assistance. Our people from Miami and Joplin, Missouri, attended in large numbers. At the opening of the debate my opponent treated me in a very gentlemanly manner, but the longer the discussion continued, the more abusive he became. Many times the chairman would rebuke him for some of the things he said but nothing seemed to have much weight with him. Time after time he would refer to me as an "ignoramus" and say he felt it beneath his dignity as an intellectual giant to attempt to answer some of the criticisms I was offering. I informed him that I did not consider myself equal in intelligence to many in the church, especially those who might be regarded representative men. I made no claim to the superior wisdom he indicated he possessed, but there was one thing evident and that was everybody knew who was getting the best of the debate. One could hear the people talking in the stores, upon the streets, in fact everywhere, and they all said the Latter Day Saints were winning. He might continue to call me an ignoramus, but what I wanted him to answer was this: even though he regarded me as being mentally beneath him, if he could not meet an ignoramus what would he do if he were to meet an intelligent man? That was one of the strongest indications that his church was so weak and its doctrines so out of harmony with the plan given by Christ that no one could defend it.

At the close of the debate, I had the pleasure of baptizing some of the people who were faithful, devoted members of his church at the opening of the discussion. There was one thing I was sure of, and that was he would never again go from house to house and challenge our members to meet him. He had found out to his sorrow that he had not succeeded in overthrowing our work, and had lost some of his own members as a result of the discussion. It was not long following this debate until the members refused to sustain this minister of their church, and so it was necessary for him to look for another pastorate. He learned by the bitter experiences of life that it does not pay to make an attack on the work of Christ.

Andover, Missouri

For some time the members and especially an evangelist by the name of William Campbell of the Church of Christ (Non-Progressive) had desired to engage us in debate at Andover, Missouri. At the suggestion of the stake authorities I signed propositions in which Mr. Elmore was to represent his church, and I was to represent ours. As the time drew near for holding the debate, Mr. Elmore decided he could not come, so Mr. Campbell was chosen to take his place. Four propositions were to be debated.

1. Resolved: The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints is in harmony with the Bible in origin, organization, doctrine, and practice. I affirmed this while my opponent denied.

2. Resolved: The Church of Christ is in harmony with the Bible in origin, organization, doctrine, and practice. This my opponent affirmed while I denied.

3. Resolved: The Book of Mormon is of divine origin and worthy of the respect and belief of all Christian people. This I affirmed while my opponent denied.

4. The Bible is the final and complete word of God to man. This was affirmed by Mr. Campbell while I denied.

Brother J. F. Garver acted as my moderator and Reverend Partridge, pastor of the local Methodist Church in Lamoni, acted as chairman. Mr. Campbell did not use abusive methods, and proved to be well informed as far as a knowledge of the Bible was concerned.

The Man McClure

One thing he did, however, that proved to be of no benefit to his church, was to send for a Reverend McClure to help him. He had begged me to cut down the time in the number of sessions on the Book of Mormon, saying he knew so little about it he could not even fill in the time. After he pleaded with me to reduce the time, I consented out of my desire to be fair with him. Mr. McClure was an old antagonist of our church and had done everything he could to injure it. When I learned this man had been sent for, I informed Mr. Campbell I would expect him to stand by the original agreement we had signed and continue the full allotted time. This he refused to do.

On the closing night of the discussion, McClure arose and read some unfair proposition in which he wanted an opportunity to strike at our church, but refused to allow his church to be examined. He stated if we did not meet this challenge he was going to expose us during the next three nights. Brother Garver asked him if he could furnish endorsements from his church, and he took from his pocket an endorsement and read it to the audience. Brother Garver then asked him for the date of that endorsement and it was many years old. We insisted he bring it up to date. We knew his church would not endorse him. I offered to meet him, using the same propositions I had used with Mr. Campbell, but he refused to do this. It was later determined by a statement by Mr. Campbell that he was furnishing a tent in which Mr. McClure would give his expose', thereby connecting him with this unfair attack. Brother Garver and I attended this expose', and of course our work was misrepresented and maligned by this unscrupulous man. Brother E. E. Long prepared three sets of propositions offering to meet McClure on any one of the three sets but he took to "tall timber" and was not seen after this in Andover. It might be of interest to our readers to know that the chairman of the debate, Mr. Partridge, and his wife later united with our church and were faithful, devoted members. After coming into our church, Brother Partridge was ordained an elder and did a fine piece of work. This debate no doubt was the opening wedge that permitted him to see the work under fire and in some measure helped him to find the truth.

Some years later when I was on my way to General Conference in Independence, I met Mr. McClure in St. Joseph, Missouri. He made a further attack on our work at that time in which I defended our church and called his attention to the cowardly assault he made on the church in Andover, and how he refused to defend himself or his church at that time. I never met him after this as he soon passed away and now awaits the day of final judgment before which he and all men must finally stand and answer to the Great Judge for their conduct while here in mortality. Every time and every place I met him, he showed the same hatred that characterized his attitude in Andover.

Wakenda, Missouri

In Wakenda, Missouri, we had a few members who carried on church work as a mission. Some of our missionaries had held services in that locality; among them were Brother Charles May and others. Their preaching had attracted the attention of the members of the Church of Christ (Non-Progressive). One of their ministers, William Freeman Jones, especially desired to engage in debate. Brethren Garver and Edwards were in charge of this field and asked me to take the matter up if I thought it advisable to meet the man. I made some investigation and found there was considerable interest on the part of the general public as to the differences in the two churches. Propositions were signed, and in a short time the debate was under way.

Hardly had it started when I received a letter from some members of the Church of Christ, informing me that Jones had been a representative of their church but had been found guilty of lying about another minister and was expelled from their organization. This letter was signed by a number of their members and was accompanied by sworn statements to the effect. On receiving this information, I called my opponent and his moderator, also the pastor of their church in Wakenda, and handed them this letter. I further informed them I had agreed to meet this man as an accredited minister of their church, only to learn that he was expelled; and that unless he could furnish me with proper credentials showing he was endorsed by his church, it would be necessary for me to go before the people and tell them he had been expelled and withdraw from the discussion.

After talking the matter over, the pastor and others of his church offered to sign any endorsement I wished, and agreed that they personally would become responsible for what he would say and the matter in which he conducted the debate. As a result of the signing of this latter agreement, the debate continued. Of course the public was not informed as we did not care to discredit him, but this had a very wholesome effect upon him during the debate. For fear of being exposed himself, he never attempted to drag in anything that was reflective on our church.

Near the close of the debate, he did indicate he thought that I had mistreated him, and that I would suffer for it some day. In reply I stated I had tried to treat him with all consideration and fairness. I told the audience I could have been hard on him had I desired to do so, and no one knew this any better than my opponent. He immediately arose and begged my favor. He apologized for everything he had said and stated he had no reason for making the criticism he did. I believe he thought I was going to produce the affidavits and letter telling how he had been expelled from his church. This I had no intention of doing. Everybody knew he was not equal to the task of defending his church, so why should I discredit him further.

It was not personal victory I desired; I wanted only to show the weakness of the church he represented. Many friends were made to our cause and after several years some who attended still mentioned the debate and showed an interest in our church. Brother Richards acted as my moderator and rendered excellent help.

I considered my opponent one of the weakest men I have ever met in public debate. He could neither make an argument nor answer one. At one time he failed so miserably in defending his position that the people of the town got out a petition asking him to answer some of the questions I had propounded. Several of the members of his church came to me and informed me they were leaving the church as they were convinced it could not be defended. I felt sorry for them but believed I had done them a favor in showing that their church never had met the approval of the Master and was man-made from the very beginning of its existence.

One of the strong texts I used against them was made by Paul: "Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof: from such turn away." I challenged my opponent to name a single thing in his church that indicated Christ had in any way endorsed it or had anything to do with it. There was nothing to be found in it that could not be duplicated by man. The longer the discussion continued, the weaker my opponent became. The members of his church showed every evidence of dissatisfaction and discouragement. Instead of growing in number as was expected to be the result of the debate, their congregation lost members. The nonmembers who attended were convinced my opponent had failed in his defense and that largely because of the weakness of his church.

Church of Christ (Temple Lot)

While laboring in Wisconsin, I came in contact with some Church of Christ (Hedrickite) representatives. They were eager for debate and challenged us wherever they appeared. After some time I signed propositions with Elder Clarence L. Wheaton, an apostle in that organization. The debate was held in Lancaster, Wisconsin. Brother J. F. Curtis acted as my moderator, while Mr. Moler acted as moderator for Elder Wheaton. The debate was largely attended by members of the two churches involved. As far as I know this was the first debate ever held between these two organizations. Our church was put on trial first. Its history was carefully presented, as the proposition read, "Resolved: The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints is the true and lawful continuation of the church organized on April 6, 1830, and the same in origin, organization, doctrine, and practice." Elder Wheaton affirmed a similar proposition for his church. The Church of Christ does not accept a president of the church while we do, and much of the discussion centered upon this feature of church organization. Lineage also came in for a careful examination and was hotly contested. A climax came, however, when it was pointed out that section 83 of the Doctrine and Covenants had been endorsed by the Hedrickites in their General Conference, and this section not only provides for high priests, but also provides for lineage. When Elder Wheaton's attention was called to this he remained silent, and at no time could we get him to even mention this endorsement of his church. It might be well to state that at different times Elder Wheaton's organization has endorsed the 1835 edition of the Doctrine and Covenants only to repudiate it later on.

At one time Mr. Hedrick occupied as prophet, seer, and revelator of that church. As such he gave a revelation setting forth some of the things that would take place in the history of this nation. One of the most important things mentioned in this so-called revelation was the overthrow of this government in 1878. Mr. Wheaton defended this statement and attempted to prove the government was overthrown in that year. It was made clearly evident that this did not happen and therefore the so-called prophecy was false. Following this debate, another one was held in Dekalb, Illinois, between Brother J. F. Curtis and Elder Wheaton. It is needless to say Mr. Wheaton did not meet with success in this debate, while Brother Curtis was able to maintain our cause by a clear presentation of our beliefs and the history of the church. Since these debates, no further discussions have taken place between that church and ours.

Rochester, New York

The last debate in which I took part was held in Rochester, New York. A Mr. Page of the Non-Progressive faction of the Church of Christ (Campbellite) represented their church. Brother A. L. Loving acted as my moderator. Page was very anxious to engage in debate and expected to reap a harvest in additional members to his church as a result of it. Our church was first placed on trial, and for four sessions it came under the hammer of our opponent. He proved to be very poorly provided with the facts of history relating to our work. He boasted of being an experienced debater, but as far as relating to the conflict was concerned, he did not indicate he had outstanding ability.

As the discussion continued, he grew weaker in his criticism, and by the time the first proposition ended, it was apparent he was about through. As his church was placed on trial, he stayed as far from the proposition as it was possible to do. He gave me nothing to criticize so far as his speeches were concerned. I gave him fair warning that if he did not come out and take a stand and debate the proposition he had signed, I would be compelled to bring out the facts of the origin, or

Report to Mid-Century White House Conference

The following is a copy of the report compiled at the request of the committee for the Mid-Century White House Conference on Children and Youth. In it the major services given the children and young people of the church are outlined. This action should result in a better understanding of the functions and purposes of the Reorganized Church on the part of those attending the conference in December.—Editors.

SUBJECT: Report of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints on services rendered to children and young people in the United States

INTRODUCTION

As one of the smaller non-Protestant denominations, of about 140,000 members in 800 congregations, the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints is limited in its resources and in personnel giving leadership in the area of youth work. Yet it is avidly interested and straining every resource to minister to its children and youth. This fact is perhaps best certified by the constant growth of church membership, which includes congregations in the United States, Canada, Europe, Britain, Australia, and the islands of the Pacific. In the United States, membership is widely scattered, with the largest concentration in Missouri, Michigan, and California. The predominant leadership of the church is supplied by volunteer ordained ministers, including many of professional status, in a ratio of about one hundred to one with the full-time ministry.

OBJECTIVE

The objectives of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints in its work with children and young people are essentially spiritual. The keynote of Latter Day Saintism is trusteeship, and the objectives include the development in each child of a sense of expert trusteeship in those areas covered by his inherent possibilities. The aim of the church is to open the eyes of youth to their God-given potentialities and to create in them standards of values which, being spiritual, will endure. The method is to bring them to a recognition of a personal communion with a living and purposeful Deity through the paths of worship and study, and by means of the experiences growing out of wholesome recreation and service to one's fellow man.

COMMON AREAS OF SERVICE TO CHILDREN AND YOUTH

(1) Church School

A progressive program of instruction is provided from kindergarten through college age. Quarterlies, workbooks, and weekly periodicals are provided by the church's own publishing house. Flannelgraphs, Story-O-Graphs, and other visual aids are used regularly in instruction, which is given entirely by volunteers. Teacher-training is provided with credit for proficiency.

(2) Church Membership to Children and Youth

Church membership is conferred with baptism, which is provided for from eight years up. Participation in church activities, worship, and in business meetings, where they have voting rights, is encouraged. Instrumental, vocal, and speech expression are provided by individual participation and, where numbers permit, through the formation of children's and young people's choirs and orchestras.

(3) Literature

Literature for children and youth is provided each age range in the form of books, pamphlets, periodicals, and even the comic style picture books for biblical, Book of Mormon, and church history reading. A youth department in the church's family magazine provides both special materials for youth and opportunities for creative writing by the young people.

(4) Reunions

Over forty family-type camps of a week or more duration are conducted each summer throughout the nation. Attendance may vary from two or three hundred to two thousand, with a proportionate percentage of children and youth present. In addition to recreational and worship opportunities, the reunion program includes daily classwork for each gradation in age. It is conducted in the church school style but with emphasis upon activity.

B. MINISTRY IN THE HOME

Probably the most unique service offered by this church to its youth is provided through its program of ministry in the home by lay members of the priesthood and women's department workers. Both of these groups of volunteers receive training as continuously as possible in ministering to the spiritual and material needs of families. Financial assistance and personal counseling are available where needed. Services offered by the church to children and youth are described in homes not taking advantage of them, and encouragement, never coercion, is used to lead the children back to church. A deep spiritual ministry which provides a rich neighborly relationship is thereby provided all members, young and old.

SPECIAL FEATURES IN WORK WITH CHILDREN

(1) Junior Church

On three Sundays out of four, junior church services are offered for children through junior high school age.

(2) Vacation Church School

Vacation church school of one to two weeks duration each summer represents a rapidly growing field which serves not only a great number of member children but also a large number of nonmembers. Special literature and helps are prepared for each year by the Department of Religious Education of the church.

(3) Children's Prayer Services

Children's prayer services, while not universal, are conducted in some areas on Wednesday evening at the time of the adult services. There, within their own group, under devoted volunteer leadership, children learn to pray vocally and to bear testimony to God's goodness to them.

(4) National Programs

National programs, including Cubbing, Boy Scouting, Girl Scouts, Camp Fire, 4-H, etc., are used in many of our congregations to serve the everyday needs of children and young people. The church also has its own girls' programs: The Skylarks for girls seven through ten, and the Orioles for those eleven to fifteen. These are activity programs which include in their requirements the study of church doctrine, history, etc., and the practice of devotions. To supplement the Boy Scout program, the church pioneered in the development of the God and Country Award, which is the church's award to Scouts who qualify in service to and knowledge of the church. A similar award termed the "Light of Life" is available for girls and has been approved by the national organizations. These two programs add much of spiritual value to the activity program.

SPECIAL FEATURES IN WORK WITH YOUTH

(1) The Zion's League

The Zion's League is the name of the program for youth of our denomination from age fifteen through twenty-four. Every congregation of any size has a Zion's League. The program is supported by a League Annual issued yearly, which includes helps for leaders and program suggestions, based on monthly themes, for every week of the year. The local League operates on a commission plan which involves the division of all members into four basic commissions: worship, study, service, and recreation. Each commission, with adult guidance, develops a program a month and guides the special activities of the League in the area designated. The program is sufficiently flexible to serve neighborhood nonmembers as well as members. It is an excellent aid to the teaching of the democratic principles as well as spiritual values upon which the church depends for its growth and effectiveness.

(2) Youth Retreats and Youth Conferences

Short-term youth retreats and youth conferences serve young people throughout the nation, including those in isolated areas.

(3) Youth Camps

Youth camps for teen-agers are now located in fifteen states throughout the nation. Again the church pioneered in youth camps, having conducted its first youth camp at the historic site of Nauvoo, Illinois, in 1928. These camps are designed for practice of the good life and for the development of leadership in democratic procedures as much as for the inculcation of church doctrine.

(4) Ministry to College Students

Ministry to college students is provided for in the church program. The church maintains a nonsectarian junior college with an enrollment of over 500 students, including nonmembers. The school is highly accredited and has a well-balanced collegiate program. The faculty members are largely ordained ministers who minister to the students through their classes, extra-curricular activities, and personal lives. Several hundred students attending other universities and colleges across the land are bound together through the efforts of a special committee on ministry to college students which, by means of personal contact, conferences, and a regular publication, serves to help these young members retain their tie with the church and their spiritual life on a high plane during college years. The committee is composed chiefly of university and professional persons including ordained lay ministers.

(5) Standards

High standards of conduct are expected from and are usually represented in the lives of active young people of the church. Smoking, abusive language, drinking, and loose morals are not characteristic of the members of the church. High educational, cultural, and vocational standards are encouraged. Marriage is looked upon as a sacrament. All in all, every effort is made to teach and to demonstrate that true religion offers the individual the richest opportunity for happiness in this life as well as the hereafter, and that obedience to divine law and service to others are essential to the achievement of that state. It is basic to the philosophy of the church that its members shall be representatives of the Christian way of life, and that its congregational and community life shall stand out as an exemplary pattern for society.

PROBLEMS FACING THE CHURCH IN YOUTH WORK

(1) The quality and training of leadership is always a number one problem. Our ministry, both lay and full time, are taken from all walks of life on the basis of qualities already demonstrated or the potential indicated. Though many hold advanced degrees in a wide variety of fields, a seminary education is not a requirement for ordination. This is largely overcome by the selection of able, full-time ministers with adequate background. Their training is carried through conferences, institutes, and personal guidance. The training of the volunteer ministry is more difficult and dependent upon their response to the helps offered.

(2) A similar problem exists in regard to nonministerial leadership as given by men and women to church school, youth activities, etc. Credit courses are offered; literature is prepared; training conferences are held; but the all-important element of close personal supervision by persons qualified is hardest to provide. The solution to this problem is largely dependent upon our success in increasing the quality and training of our ministry.

(3) The problem of equipment for the training and use of our youth leaders is constantly with us. This shortage is measurable in two closely, inter-related factors: (a) finances available to pay the bills, and (b) qualified personnel to do the work. A long-term program of education in the financial responsibilities of church membership is producing results in a more constant income from a larger percentage of members. As fast as the means are assured, the church is reaching out for the best qualified individuals to do the work.

(4) The goal of developing a people guided by spiritual ideals is constantly threatened by the infiltration of nonspiritual influences. To combat this, three steps are being taken:

(a) Programs of activity and ministry for our youth are being intensified.

(b) Ministry to the home, which is recognized as the dominant influence in childhood, is being intensified also.

(c) The movement of families to centers of church membership is underway. The association with youth of kindred standards and the guidance of better leadership is available in these centers. The "gathering" movement is represented in both the history and doctrine of the church with Independence, Missouri, designated as the "Center Place" of this movement.

RECOMMENDATIONS

(1) Let us try to determine what human qualities are essential within the nature of this "perfect" citizen we are trying to create before we begin to discuss how to mold those qualities.

(2) We hope that the White House Conference will make every effort to arrive at some decisions regarding the forces most common and most dangerous to the well-being of our children and youth and will begin the formulation of a united plan for overcoming them, by all means possible, including legislation and education.

(3) As previously implied, efforts should be made to agree as to those influences best designed to produce the ideal citizen and to unite our efforts in strengthening those influences.

STATISTICAL INFORMATION

a. Membership is conferred by baptism from eight years up. The official membership total is 120,000 in the United States and 20,000 in Canada and abroad.

b. Membership is distributed in all states and territories with the heaviest proportions in Missouri (about one fifth), Michigan, and California.

c. With roughly 40,000 members under twenty-one years of age, studies indicate active participation by about 50 per cent or 12,000 under twelve years of age and 25 per cent or 6,000 from twelve to twenty-one years, for a total of 18,000. Members and nonmembers on the fringe represent probably 2,000 more or 20,000 in all.

d. Our children live for the most part in urban areas, with probably 35 per cent in rural areas.

e. Children of our denominations vary as to those of the nation, except that a larger percentage is white.

RELATIONSHIPS

The relations of our official church body with other churches and with national and local organizations of good repute is generally excellent. The prejudices of the past are rapidly dissolving in the face of wiser moves on our part and a better understanding of our beliefs on the part of others. Our church officials and members are found volunteering their time, talents, and money to every worth-while movement from ministerial alliances and community chests to the United Nations Organizations.

Helping to "Roll" the Work Along

In my youth I thought I would have to be an ordained minister to help in the work of the church. In 1890 I was married to one of the best girls in Missouri, and planned to build our home in Lamon. However, as I was working on the lot, I heard a voice from heaven say that I should prepare to move to Canada where my father owned a farm. So instead of building in Iowa, I bought Father's farm; this was in 1895. After taking my first crop to market, I went to Bishop Terrel and paid my tithing. Then as I stepped out on the street in Chatham, I heard a heavenly voice say, "You are now helping to roll this work along." The Spirit enveloped me with such power that I had to sing, "Glory to God in the highest." I returned to my farm and began plowing the ground for another planting. As I plowed it seemed to me the very ground cried out, "You are helping to roll the work along." I understood then why the people in Jerusalem could not keep from singing "Hosanna" as Christ rode into the city. This good influence stayed with me for days, and I no longer felt I could not assist the church unless I was ordained. I knew my duty was to farm and pay my tithing.

If everyone does his part, this work can go forward and Zion will be established.

The Gospel a Treasure

In the day of sod houses and sandstorms, two little girls walked along a sandy path in Oklahoma. Weary and footsore, they wished they could find a hidden treasure somewhere so they could buy new shoes that wouldn't leak sand. Perhaps the angels heard that wish, for as the younger child walked slowly along the path, she seemed to hear a voice say, "Someday you will find a treasure that was buried on a hill." As she turned, she saw a beautiful hill lit up by the setting sun. Twenty years later, when an elder told her of the Angel's Message and how the Book of Mormon was taken from Hill Cumorah, she knew she had found the treasure promised her. Now as she walks in the old, old path she finds treasures all along the way. Sometimes there are stumbling stones, like sand in the worn shoes of her childhood, but with Christ to bless her and guide her, she goes forward in faith. She has set her course and will not turn from it. Thus she hopes to guide others to the light.

From an Appreciative Subscriber

Recent articles in the Herald have meant much to me; I read some of them several times. Along with many other grateful readers, I want to express my thanks to the men and women who contribute to the Herald and Daily Bread. The latter is a fine guide to help us worship more intelligently. Our first thought at daily worship is, "Father, bless all who make it possible for us to have this help in planning our devotionals." I am thrilled to read articles by our young people who desire to help in building the kingdom. Their vitality and willingness are an inspiration. May all who contribute be blessed in their work.

Question Time

Any sincere question from our readers will receive consideration from the editors. If it is of general interest, it will be referred to the Question Time panel, and the answer will be printed. Please keep the question short—fifty words or less should be sufficient. Your personal problems, the answers to which concern you alone, will be answered by letter. Address questions to Herald Editors rather than panel members. We shall try to take all questions in the order they are received. Be patient, there may be several ahead of yours. Only signed questions sent by contributors will appear here.—EDITOR.

QUESTION:

Please explain Genesis 6: 56, Inspired Version, where it says, "Wherein the sins of the parents cannot be answered upon the heads of the children, for they are whole from the foundation of the world."

In Deuteronomy 5: 9, Inspired Version, we read, "I, the Lord thy God, am a jealous God visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generations of them that hate me."

Colorado

W. L.

ANSWER:

Genesis 6: 56 refers to a different type of sin than that mentioned in Deuteronomy 5: 56. The first reference is made to the Adamic sin which the blood of Christ atoned for. The second reference is for individual sins, and the evil of these sins is, in the majority of cases, carried to the children.

QUESTION:

What is Babylon and what does the fall of it mean as spoken of in Revelation 18: 2, 3.

Oregon

Mrs. R. W.

ANSWER:

John was a Jew, and to a Jew there was no nation as cruel and wicked as Babylon. The Babylonians destroyed Jerusalem and took her people into captivity where they remained for seventy years. She stood for everything that was ungodly.

The Babylon in question was undoubtedly civil and ecclesiastical Rome. As far as the Jews and the early Christians were concerned, Rome and the Roman Empire stood for all the things that ancient Babylon stood for. It was the Roman soldiery that destroyed Jerusalem immediately after Christ and perpetuated the desolation of abomination spoken of by Christ in the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew. Hardly was that accomplished until Roman persecution was directed against the infant church. From the time of Constantine's toleration of the Christian Church, Babylon (Rome) became mystery Babylon. Outwardly she masked herself with the garb of Christianity, but inwardly she remained the unregenerate that she previously was.

When the Roman treasury failed to support the numerous wars of conquest, the empire turned to the individual citizen for financial help. No one citizen had enough money for the great undertaking, so the citizens joined together and pooled their money and gave it to the government. For repayment the rulers levied taxes on the conquered people. Even our modern banking system has its roots in Roman civilization. The colonial wars of the last century were nothing but exploitation wars. Though the ancient Roman Empire—Babylon—was destroyed years ago, her offspring is carrying on in her cruel and ungodly spirit.

This is the Babylon civil and ecclesiastical, that shall fall, and is now falling. In Doctrine and Covenants, section one, paragraph three, the imminence of her fall is clearly stated. GEORGE NJEIM.

QUESTION:

Please reconcile Alma 9: 67; 10: 7-12 with Doctrine and Covenants 83: 4. The Book of Mormon says the Nephites kept the Law of Moses. Is there any record that they received the Melchisedec priesthood?

Michigan

E. L. H.

ANSWER:

To reconcile the citations from Alma and the Doctrine and Covenants, it is well to remember that the holy priesthood was taken away in the time of Moses because the people rejected the gospel message and "hardened their hearts." Apparently they were entitled to receive its ministrations in the time of Alma, because they accepted the message he was sent to deliver to them. His authority was from God and was conferred upon his son Alma (Mosiah 9: 51; 11: 19; 13: 63), who devoted himself wholly to "the high priesthood of the holy order of God," and was called "according to the holy order of God which is in Christ Jesus" and "was from the foundation of the world," Melchisedec being a "high priest after this same order" (Alma 2: 28; 3: 73, 85; 9: 68-73; 10: 7).

Days of Preparation

By MRS. JOHN R. DARLING
Stake Women's Secretary

THIS SUMMER was a very challenging one for us—three months of working in reunions and youth camps. Since women's work is my chief interest, I found myself confronted everywhere with the same questions: What are the women of Independence doing? How are they organized? How does their organization function? With this in mind, I am submitting the following information concerning the Independence Stake Women's organization.

Each congregation in Independence might be compared with the individual congregations elsewhere, with the women's leader or supervisor and her roster of workers. Hence, with a group of sixteen congregations, it is very necessary to have stake women's officers who are interested in helping to promote the activities and unification of such a large program. This group of stake women's officers, working with the priesthood in charge of the stake, has been promoting a program the past year, and will continue through this year, whereby the workers from all congregations can meet once a month in a "Preparation Day Program" to train for their specific responsibilities back in their own congregations. The results have been splendid, with all the women's officers concentrating their efforts toward this one day for personal preparation for their responsibilities.

Some may wonder why we chose to call these Preparation Day Programs. For the source of our inspiration, we refer them to sections 141 and 142 of the Doctrine and Covenants, which were given to the General Conference through President Israel Smith: All are admonished to qualify themselves in spirit by ministry and by witnessing for Christ. . . . The hastening time is upon us. . . . And we are also told that now is the time . . . of unusual preparation for my church as an organization, for my people.

One women's leader likened the Preparation Day Program to a table which is spread with food, and even as all members of a family gather around to partake of the food so, also, may our women come together and receive the stimulation and inspirational food as offered in classes by priesthood members and leaders, then return to their congregational and home activities better qualified for their responsibilities. It is intended that the congregational programs be an outgrowth of these Preparation Day Programs as the leaders adapt and supplement the prepared materials to the needs of their individual groups.

The Program

At 10:00 a.m. each first Thursday of the month, the women from all over Independence and surrounding territory congregate at the Stone Church in an atmosphere of worshipful music and meditation. After a brief devotional period at 10:30, the morning session is devoted to a stimulating talk by one of the leaders of the church on the theme for the month. At noon the women adjourn to the lower auditorium for a social hour with their "sack lunch," and then reconvene for a short business meeting at 12:45. The afternoon session at one o'clock deals with the individual organizations, with supervisors, Daughters of Zion, visiting supervisors, cradle roll workers, and study guide chairmen all meeting in their respective classes where they receive ideas, stimulation, and materials to take back to their own congregations. Thus we plan monthly for our Preparation Day Programs, arranging to have them planned and printed and in the hands of the women at least a month in advance.

Our Stake Organization

Many women's supervisors have been replaced by new ones for this coming year. Feeling the need for meeting them personally and promoting a sense of unity on the year's program, Mrs. G. B. Wilson, stake women's leader, called a meeting at the Women's Center. The Stake Executive Council also was present to help discuss and plan the work for the coming year.

Mrs. Wilson greeted the women as they assembled around a worship center arranged by two of her associates. A medley of hymns was played as the women gathered. "A Challenge to Christian Ideals" was the thought expressed in the devotional service; this was followed by a selection, "Soft Were Your Hands, Dear Jesus" (O'Hara).

Mrs. Wilson extended a challenge to the supervisors to learn readily their duties and responsibilities, evaluating carefully the privilege of service. She then introduced the officers: assistant women's leader; Daughters of Zion supervisor; secretary-treasurer; music chairman; cradle roll supervisor; visiting supervisor; and study guide chairman. As each was introduced, she stated briefly her objectives for the year's work. The roll was called with each congregation represented by the supervisor or her assistant. Many items of business were presented and discussed, and Mrs. Wilson announced the first Preparation Day Program to be held on October 5 from 10:30 a.m. to 2:30 p.m., and continuing throughout the year on the first Thursday of each month. It was also announced that members of the Daughters of Zion would join in a covered dish luncheon at noon of our first Preparation Day at the Women's Center Building. The following themes were announced for the year's program:

The Happiest Person I Know

By MAUDE D. ANDERSON

MRS. ZANY has a pastime which quite a number of people seem to enjoy, although she is more expert at it than most others. Possibly this is because she devotes more time and effort to it. Her hobby is "fault magnification," and it makes no difference what her neighbors may do, by the time she gets through examining them with her high-powered microscope, the smallest and most insignificant episode becomes a neighborhood scandal. She has completely ruined more reputations than any woman in town, yet for some reason, and despite the fact that she has plenty of this world's goods, she is the most unhappy person of my acquaintance.

Now Mrs. Marvel has a hobby in sharp contrast to that of Mrs. Zany; hers is "fault reducing." If she hears of some episode which is a bit questionable, she is quick to see some plausible reason why the person did not act wrong intentionally.

When Mrs. Marvel's husband died, she was left with the family home and car, but not much more. Since she had a very small income and had led a sheltered life, about the only work which she could do was dishwashing. She soon had a number of jobs washing dishes for various parties and socials. In her spare time she learned to drive the family car, for she was determined to take those long jaunts into the country which had been her greatest pleasure while her husband lived. She never went alone on these trips; usually she was accompanied by some friend who would not otherwise have an opportunity to enjoy such an outing. They explored every historic spot in the country round about and always brought home some souvenir of their trip—a rock for the cactus garden, an unusual plant, a beautiful butterfly, or something equally interesting. If anyone in the neighborhood should be ill, Mrs. Marvel was the first to lend a helping hand.

Unlike Mrs. Zany (who was always well dressed), Mrs. Marvel could never be considered really well groomed—frankly she had neither the time, the means, nor the inclination. It made no difference to her what the style was, she wore whatever happened to be most comfortable and convenient at the time, providing it was neat and clean. Her large rambling house was a miniature museum. She collected everything from her great-grandmother's prettiest dishes and the first newspaper printed in the state, to Indian arrowheads and broken oxcart wheels. No matter where this lady might go, she always had some interesting bit of information to talk about. Perhaps it was nothing more important than the old tombstone they had seen in some forgotten cemetery, but she could always make the story fascinating. As to her acquaintances, she always had some pleasant bit of news to relate about them which would leave the listener with a more kindly feeling.

Yes, she is without doubt the happiest person I know.

ganization, doctrine, and practice of his church. He still ignored the warning I had given him, so it became my duty to go before the audience and give the facts relating to Campbellite history. As I showed the origin and belief of his church, Mr. Page tried to ignore them. His moderator was clearly dissatisfied with his defense and asked him to take a stand, but he refused to.

The next night he dismissed this moderator and sent for another one living in Buffalo, New York. This man lasted only one night, refusing to continue longer. The Campbellites had sent for this last man hoping he would be able to help my opponent in his defense, but after listening to one session, he saw clearly that nothing could be done so refused to continue longer as moderator.

The membership advised him to quit and not to debate further, but he persisted in his course. By the next session, however, he indicated he had changed his mind, and began to look for a place to quit. I had challenged him to name one thing that indicated there was any divinity connected with his church. His church had started in the wisdom of man, had continued without divine approval, and was man-made from its beginning to the present time. I then quoted Paul's statement, "Having a form of godliness but denying the power thereof, from such turn away." He claimed this was a reflection on his church and demanded I retract the statement or he would quit the debate. This I refused to do. It was apparent he was using this as an excuse to quit as suggested by the members of his church who were sick at heart because of the manner in which he had conducted his part of the debate. I informed him he was the man who had persisted in holding the debate, and as far as I was concerned I was not a quitter. At the close of that session, he packed up his books and refused to continue longer.

Brother Loving and I decided to continue holding services in our place of meeting, so we invited the audience to meet us there. I am glad to say several of our friends came out to hear what we had to say. Our local pastor, Brother Shay, rendered some valuable assistance as well as other members of our group in Rochester. I was really proud of them for they manifested a Christlike spirit all during the debate. Even in the heat of the conflict when the opposition was waging a fierce battle, they remained calm and showed every indication of being followers of Christ. That which was true of the debate in Rochester has always been true with every debate in which I have participated as far as our people are concerned. This has always helped our cause.

Historic Grounds

The debate in Rochester was near historic grounds. Hill Cumorah is only twenty-five miles away and Joseph Smith lived only a short distance from the place where the plates from which the Book of Mormon was translated were found. It was here that Joseph had his first vision in 1820 when he went to the woods to pray.

From the very first the church has met all kinds of opposition, and every weapon that could be used against it has been used by the opposition to overthrow the work, but at no time have its opponents succeeded in carrying out their desires.

We have had some very able defenders of the gospel who have been willing to meet the opposition and have gone out in the fear of God and have returned with sheaves for the Master's kingdom.

Value of Debating

At the present time we do not have any who are engaged in this kind of work. Personally I believe much lasting good has come as a result of our men defending our work against the attacks of its enemies. Many have been converted and have been baptized into the church as a result of hearing a discussion between our men and those outside of our church. These have proved themselves to be excellent timber in the kingdom.

It is true that debating is hard work for those who engage in it. I have spent sleepless hours trying to solve some problem my opponent has presented and to find an answer that would be satisfactory not only to me, but to the audience as well. I am glad to say after having seen the work under fire and every criticism that could be conceived in the mind of its opponents hurled against it, I have found it is defensible and has stood the test.

In each debate the disputants select their moderators, and the two moderators select a chairman who presides during the sessions. The chairman should be neutral, not favoring either side. He decides all points of order, but if either disputant is not satisfied with his rulings, an appeal can be taken to the house. The moderators are assistants to the principals in the debate and in every way possible become aids to the men doing the debating.

Hedge's Rules of Logic usually governs in parliamentary procedure. Other rules are agreed upon by the disputants, and the propositions are signed by the individuals doing the debating. I give this information so that our readers might understand how a debate is carried on.

OCEAN LAKE, OREGON.—On September 17, Elder J. L. Verhei and Lloyd Shannon visited the Ocean Lake group and held classes in the I. O. O. F. Hall. In the afternoon, baptismal service for Mrs. Hazel Carver was held at the Wallace Farm at Otis. There on the bank of Salmon Creek this group of Saints was formed into a mission. Officers appointed by Elder Verhei are: Mrs. Lela Ostendorp, superintendent; Mrs. Naomi Ruth Wallace, secretary; Mrs. Rose M. Wallace, treasurer; Elmer Wallace, custodian; Mrs. Hazel Carver, publicity agent; Mrs. Lucille Board, musical director.

Church school will be held regularly in the I. O. O. F. Hall with preaching services once or twice each month.—Reported by MRS. HAZEL CARVER.

ALBANY, OREGON.—A meeting was held September 14 at the home of Brother and Sister James Steinbrink for the purpose of starting a church school. In charge of the meeting was District President J. L. Verhei of Portland, Elder V. E. Chapman of Vancouver, Washington, and Elder and Sister Thompson of Sweet Home. The meeting was closed with a hymn and a prayer by Elder Chapman.—Reported by BETTIE CHAMBERS.

ESCATAWPA, MISSISSIPPI.—A series of services conducted by Elder W. J. Breshears of Pensacola, Florida, and Elder Franklin Steiner of Mobile, Alabama, was held August 23 through September 3. Elder W. J. Breshears illustrated with slides the following topics:

"How to Enter the Kingdom," "The Church That Christ Built," "What Happened to the Church Christ Built," "The Great Restoration," "Ye Must Be Born Again," "Jesus Christ in Ancient America," "Joseph's Land," "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse," "Zion," and "Witnessing for Christ Through Stewardship."

Elder W. F. Steiner preached on the following topics: "Scriptures: Past, Present, and Future," and "God's Promises to the Faithful."

All-day services were held August 27, the adults beginning with prayer service in the place of church school at 9:45 a.m. Through the direction of the Lord, Brother Breshears spoke directly to Pastor A. N. Barnes, Elder D. W. Sherman, and Daniel McQueen.

Preaching followed the prayer service at 11:00 a.m., 2:00 p.m., and 7:30 p.m.

September 3 closed the series with a baptismal service at 4:00 p.m. Those entering the water of baptism were Jimmie Roberts, Charles A. Taylor and son Arvis Taylor. They were confirmed by Elders G. C. Gibson, W. F. Steiner, A. N. Barnes, D. W. Sherman, W. J. Breshears, and J. L. Barlow. Each candidate was presented the Church Member's Manual by Pastor A. N. Barnes. The priesthood assisted Brother Breshears and Brother Steiner throughout the services.

Special musical selections were by Daniel McQueen, Margaret Ann Davis, Mary Jo Davis, Margie West, and Hildred Thomas. Anthems were sung by the choir under the direction of Mrs. C. L. Barnes.—Reported by MRS. HILDRED THOMAS.

DETROIT, MICHIGAN.—The Detroit International Stake conference was held September 10 at the Northern High School. The sessions began at 3:00 o'clock in the afternoon with a fine prayer service supervised by the Stake Presidency: Elders W. B. McClain, L. O. Brockway, E. V. Osborn, and Apostle C. G. Mesley.

In the following business session, budgets and programs for the coming season were examined and approved thus clearing the way for what appears to be one of the very finest educational and worship endeavors attempted in this area.

Progress and property analysis reports were presented by President McClain and Bishop Updike.

Unanimous acceptance was accorded the recommendation of Elders Willard Shotwell, Randall Hulse, and Herbert Voltmann to high priesthood. These three were also approved for inclusion in the membership of the Stake High Council which is thereby increased to a current membership of ten.

The conference also approved recommendations of the following: to the office of elder, Paul Crinzi of River Rouge congregation, Vere Rosebury of Detroit East Side congregation, and Robert Voltmann of Lola Valley congregation; to the office of deacon, Roland Curtis of Pontiac; to the office of teacher, Claude E. Cook of Pontiac; to the office of priest, Robert Burger of Plymouth, Albert L. Barr of East Side, and Dahryl McClain of Highland Park.

In the beginning of the evening worship service arranged by Stake Presidency and Apostle Mesley, Elders Shotwell, Hulse, and H. Voltmann were ordained high priests and were then ordained to the Stake High Council by Apostle C. G. Mesley. Apostle Mesley was the speaker in the lecture period in this service.

One high light of the conference was the superb singing of "How Lovely Are Thy Dwellings" (Liddle) and "Fear Not Ye, O Israel" (Buck) by Pauline Frisbie, and accompanied by Doreen Trudell; another was the violin selection by Sister Murray Jones.—Reported by HARRY E. DEPEW.

EVERETT, WASHINGTON.—The Seattle District Women's Institute was held on September 23 and 24. There were sixty-six registrants. The branches represented were Seattle First and Second, Tacoma, Olympia, Bremerton, Puyallup, Everett, Centralia, Bellingham, and Shelton. Sister Gilberts welcomed the members from other branches.

Sister Margaret Johnson led the group discussion on "Are You Witnessing for Him?" the theme of the institute. A representative from each group present gave a report on past activities and future plans in their endeavor to witness.

After a lunch the ladies were reassembled for an afternoon meeting. A worship service was planned and presented by the Bremerton group as a prelude to this meeting.

Sister Ruth Selzer conducted an educational class on meeting procedure. In the second half of the afternoon meeting, Sister Le Baron told of her recent visit to some of our church shrines.

During a period of relaxation the Everett group prepared and served dinner. After the meal the entertainment took on an informal air with group singing and numbers presented by the different groups. A playlet on friendly visiting was presented by Tacoma and Puyallup.

Those staying overnight were entertained in the homes and all met on Sunday morning at 8:30 for fellowship under the leadership of Granville Swenson and Elliott Gilberts.

Sister Florence Gilmore, study chairman of the Rainier group, led the church school on the subject, "How our choices in life determine the way we shall go."

District President Granville Swenson was the speaker for the eleven o'clock service. He followed the theme of the institute in his discourse.

The high light of the institute was the Sunday afternoon service. "Portraits of the Restoration" was presented by the Everett and Seattle First and Second Branches, under the leadership of Sister Frances Inslee.

A fitting climax to the day was a short play presented by two ladies from Puyallup. The playlet, "What Lack I Yet," portrayed an incident in the lives of women at the time of Christ's visit to the earth.

Formula for Progress

By LOUISE SCOTT WRIGLEY

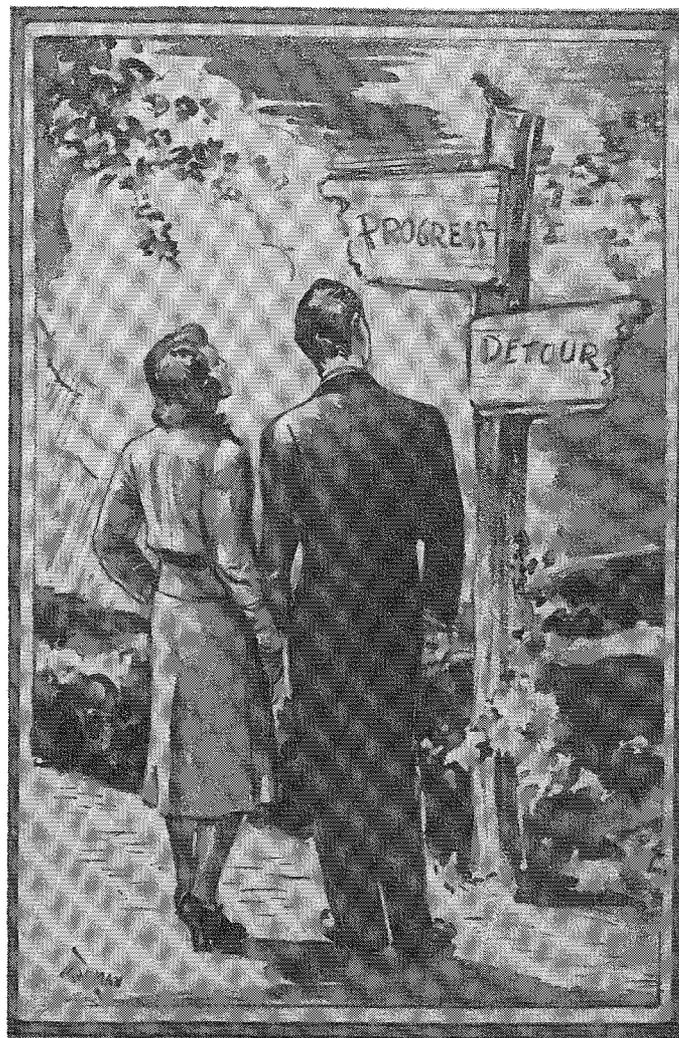

IT HAS BEEN SUGGESTED that "we are growing old when a new idea hurts." While we are smiling tolerantly at this bit of humor, we might well be jolted into realizing that perhaps we are the very ones who are building a shell around ourselves, hugging to ourselves what we believe, and jealously guarding our hearts from any new idea which might seek to creep in. We are needlessly denying ourselves the privilege of growth, which is God's plan for us.

The insidious process of growing into oneself until one can see only his own opinions and can acknowledge no right but that of his own ideas is a destructive process which, in the final analysis, can very well claim us completely. All of us fall prey to it in one form or another, and it requires the utmost diligence for us to weed it out. It is never announced by fanfare, by great trial, or by astonishing circumstances. It is a quiet, slow, year-to-year thing that is content with feeding upon itself.

Were it recognizable at once, it would be less deadly. Instead of that, it suddenly crops up in the most promising people. It takes form in a stubborn resistance, in a rebellion to authority, in contention, in belief that we are being pushed out by someone who wants our job, in a critical attitude where constructive suggestion would be so much more desirable. It assails us all at some time, and is just another clever way Satan has of getting us to deviate from the goal we have set for ourselves. If it does no more harm than enticing us to use precious energy in doing less than our best, then it has still conformed successfully to Satan's design.

THIS WALL OF RESISTANCE to progress is being faced many times by workers in all phases of church life, though it may be said to our credit that we have many, many co-operative members who are willing to work hard to support anything that is better, anything that more nearly approaches the thing we strive for. Still, for various reasons, people resent change. As a result, when a new idea is introduced it almost always has to be "sold" to the people whom it will affect, even though its advantages and merit may be at once apparent.

Time and again, wide-awake young members are confronted with discouragement and misunderstanding in their home branches because of what they feel is a static attitude on the part of other branch members, sometimes (certainly not always) the older members. While these younger members may, in many instances, be right, there are two sides to the question which must be considered in their proper relationship.

It is certainly true that our young people have gone on with their educations at the behest of older counselors, and have been taught many valuable aids to study, many ways in which to improve upon the old methods of doing things. Now they want to offer those ideas and changes as part of the extended service they may render by way of their training. None of us would want to feel that these young people are being denied the chance to help the church's progress by the very things they were sent away to learn for the benefit of all. We should all be interested in any development which will bring us closer to Zion's living. Yet, in many branches, there is a certain unwillingness to let the young people enter in with their efforts, lest they do something brash and foolish.

Young people, by very reason of their being young, are sometimes impulsive, not thinking through some of their actions. For that reason, older, wiser heads hold back . . . sometimes to their own detriment. The point is, they hold back on principle, rather than after fair consideration of the specific proposal.

THERE IS VALUE in both the impulsive vitality of youth and the policy of careful caution with which the older generation moves along, else why should God see that we have them both, one a balance against the other? We need to work together, having charity for one another, that each may bring his contribution, be it stability or vision, to the completed whole. None of us should wish to deprive others of this privilege. Should we attempt it and triumph, still we will be most lonely and desolate, the more so because we denied someone else the joy of participation. Each of us needs every other one of us. There is not a soul living who is not dependent on his friend or his brother for the thing which each of them alone can bring to the effort.

Contention and bickering and selfishness are not of the Lord. They cannot be included in his plan. Neither can the unseeing attitude which some people adopt toward the offering of others be a part of the way the Lord desires for us.

For the inspiration of us all, we have been given the young people with their urgent zeal, their willingness to forge ahead on untried paths. For the protection of us all, we have been given the blessing of experienced associates to guide us. For every heart there is the avenue of prayer to give us reassurance and fill us with the knowledge that we can approach our God, and that his help and his blessings will be forthcoming, and be poured out in overflowing measure.

Because these young people are trying hard to find their niche, and in their uncertain, hopeful, buoyant eagerness are met with a brusque attitude of "what was good enough for father . . ." they are offended, hurt, and bewildered. In their immaturity there is danger of their forming hasty judgments regarding all of their church associates, measured by a few, and the result is their loss, and the church's loss as well.

This loss is a deep one. It is felt not only now, but will be felt increasingly as their generation becomes the older generation and they, with their excellent contributions, are missing from the ranks of the faithful.
